Preface

This book was first published in mimeographed form in 1963. Although a large publishing company predicted that there would only be “250 to 300 people in the U.S. who would be sufficiently interested in a work of this kind to buy it,” it was an immediate success and thousands of copies were sold. Finally, in 1980 Moody Press brought out a condensed version of Mormonism—Shadow or Reality? under the title of The Changing World of Mormonism. As we prepare this Preface for the fifth edition, we are pleased to announce that about 65,000 copies of these publications have been distributed throughout the world. In the Introduction to The Changing World of Mormonism, Wesley P. Walters, Contributing Editor for the Journal of Pastoral Practice, wrote the following:

“Oh, this stuff is dynamite!” exclaimed a prestigious director of a Mormon Institute of Religion. “I tell you, though you may not believe it, I have seen people get utterly crushed, almost devastated with some of the material that the Tanners have reproduced.”

“I will tell you,” he continues, “there was an Institute teacher here, not long ago . . . who lost his testimony and went out of the church on the basis of this stuff.”

That description of the effects of Jerald and Sandra Tanner’s publishing efforts to unmask Mormonism is hardly an overstatement.

... Their major work, Mormonism—Shadow or Reality?, has sold more than thirty thousand copies without any advertising campaign, simply because it is the most definitive work in print on the fallacies of Mormonism. This condensed version of that earlier work, though still of necessity lengthy, sets forth the heart of their extensive research.

Since Mormonism—Shadow or Reality? is critical of the Mormon Church, one would expect that it would have a very limited circulation among the Mormon people. We are happy to report, however, that a rather large percentage of the copies have been sold directly to Mormons. Many of the books, in fact, have been sold in Salt Lake City, Utah, which is the center of Mormonism. The response by the Mormon people has been very encouraging. Leroy Searle made this comment:

This reviewer was reared a devout Mormon, for many years was a firm believer, and was the president of an LDS Seminary at Granger High School. . . .

The appearance of the Tanner’s book is certain to arouse considerable renewed controversy, . . . I am certain that this book will become a standard in scholarly work dealing with the history of Utah and Mormonism. . . . The overall result is a publication of tremendous interest for both Mormon and non-Mormon, and a valuable collection of selected quotations from rare early literature of Mormonism. . . .

As a discussion of doctrinal history, the work is a real achievement in scholarship . . . a search for truth, no matter of what world, will continue. The Tanners are to be commended whether freely or reluctantly, for having had the courage to assist in that search. (Nova, A Newspaper of Opinion, Logan, Utah, January 11, 1965, p. 5)

Another member of the Mormon Church made this comment in a letter:

Perhaps by way of interest, I might mention that I had studied deeply into our history and doctrine before coming upon your materials, . . . It’s my opinion that your book, Mormonism—Shadow or Reality, if widely read by Mormon and Non-Mormon alike, would do more harm to the church than any other volume published in the last 50 to 75 years. It could almost tear the Church apart. Your approach is novel; you’ve used our own history and doctrine, and your quotations are accurate (Letter from Arizona, dated July 28, 1965).

In 1965 we received a visit from Wallace Turner, a correspondent for the New York Times. He made these comments concerning our work in his book, The Mormon Establishment:

Dr. Thomas F. O’Dea, . . . insists that the church is in the midst of a crisis. . . . But in keeping with Dr. O’Dea’s theory of the sleeping crisis, one of the most influential apostates of the 1960s has been a young machinist, who with his wife, left the church and now makes a living printing books and documents which contradict official Mormon pronouncements.

His name is Jerald Tanner. His wife, Sandra, is a great-great-granddaughter of Brigham Young . . . They lived in the summer of 1965 in an old house at 1350 S. West Temple Street . . . He and Nathan Eldon Tanner, the high LDS official, are both descended, he thought, from John Tanner, the man who helped Joseph Smith in the 1830s. Both the young man and his wife grew up in the LDS church. He drifted away first and she followed . . . the three of us sat in the high-ceilinged living room of the old house and discussed the general question of how one feels on leaving the company of the Saints.

“It was a long time before I could admit I didn’t believe the Book of Mormon,” said Sandra Tanner, dandling Brigham Young’s great-great-great-grandchild on her knee. “It was weeks after that before I could say it out loud.” . . .

The Tanners operate as the Modern Microfilm Company. They specialize in copying books and documents that are out of print, or have been suppressed in one way or another, but that bear on the history and doctrine of the LDS church. When I talked with them, they had thirty-one titles for sale. The best seller was Mormonism—Shadow or Reality? prepared by them jointly . . . Near the end of their book attacking the LDS church and denouncing its doctrines the Tanners have signed individual statements setting out their religious experience. Jerald Tanner wrote that he was born and reared in the Mormon church, but that he was nineteen years old before he heard the Word of Christ preached . . . He considers himself a Protestant, a believer in Christ and in the doctrines of eternal salvation preached by Protestants. However, he now refuses to accept any of the doctrine that belongs exclusively to the LDS church. . . .

Sandra Tanner’s statement shows that she had doubts about her religion, but was generally able to contain them—until “I met Jerald and we began studying the Bible and Mormonism together. As we studied I began to see the contradictions between the Bible and the teachings of the Mormon church.”

As a child she had been taught to admire her ancestor, Brigham Young. This was the point at which Jerald Tanner made his attack on her faith. He did it in Brigham Young's own words.

"Then Jerald had me read some of Brigham Young's sermons in the Journal of Discourses on Blood Atonement," Mrs. Tanner wrote. "I was shocked! I knew what Brigham Young was saying was wrong but I couldn't reconcile these sermons with the things I had always been taught concerning him. I knew these were not the words of a Prophet of God.

"As I studied I not only found errors in Mormonism, I also began to comprehend there was something wrong in my own life. As I studied God's word I realized I was a sinful hypocrite."

That day as she talked in the living room of the old house across from the ballpark in Salt Lake City, she remembered her first meeting with Jerald Tanner. She was visiting her grandmother.

"I fell in love with him," she said quite simply and without embarrassment. Then she used a typical Mormon analogy to explain what she thinks their present life purpose to be. "What we do is more of a mission, you might say." . . .

There also is the demonstration by the Tanners that an apostate from the Mormon church generally takes with him their techniques of indefatigable research and argument that he was taught while in the church's embrace. The Tanners' masterwork, Mormonism—Shadow or Reality? is an intricate weaving of arguments from many sources against the fundamental precept of the Saints' doctrine—that Joseph Smith, Jr., was a prophet of God . . .

With the Tanners the church today finds itself faced by its own techniques of argument and its own words turned back against it to create doubts and uneasiness among some members. The campaign is effective, too, and of this there is no doubt. (The Mormon Establishment, by Wallace Turner, Boston, 1966, pp. 153-162)

In between the time Mormonism—Shadow or Reality? was first published and the revised edition appeared in 1972 many important things happened. By far the most significant was the rediscovery of the papyri from which Joseph Smith "translated" the Book of Abraham, for this papyri proves that the Book of Abraham is the work of Joseph Smith's own imagination. Another important discovery was that the Mormon Church had been suppressing important accounts of Joseph Smith's First Vision which differ from the account printed in the Pearl of Great Price.

Wesley P. Walters made a number of significant contributions to Mormon history. His most important being the discovery of an original document which proves beyond all doubt that Joseph Smith was a "glass looker" and that he was arrested, tried and found guilty by a justice of the peace in Bainbridge, New York, in 1826. Mr. Walters also discovered that there was no revival in Palmyra, New York, in 1820 as the Mormon Church has always maintained. This discovery certainly casts a shadow of doubt upon Joseph Smith's story of the First Vision.

Many other important discoveries were also made since we first printed Mormonism—Shadow or Reality? In 1967 we began publishing our work The Case Against Mormonism. This was a three-volume study which dealt with many of the latest discoveries. Dr. Kenneth Kantzer, who was Dean of Trinity Evangelical Divinity School and now serves as Editor of Christianity Today, made these statements in a review of the first two volumes of this work:

These books represent no ordinary polemic against Mormonism. This is the definitive, fully-documented, utterly devastating case against the divine authority and truthfulness of the foundational documents upon which the Mormon religion is based. Every evangelical pastor should have these books in his library and every intelligent lay Christian should know about them and refer to them. . . . It is difficult to see how the Mormon church can survive the devastating destruction of its foundations as presented in these volumes. Certainly for any Christian, disturbed by Mormon claims, these works are utterly convincing. (Evangelical Beacon, Minneapolis, Minn., vol. 42, no. 1, October 8, 1968, p. 7)

At the time we were writing The Case Against Mormonism, we also completed a two-volume work entitled, The Mormon

Kingdom. Besides these volumes we printed a number of other books on Mormonism. The 1972 edition of Mormonism—Shadow or Reality? was actually a condensation of the best material from all of our books.

Since 1972 there have been a number of significant developments. For instance, before June, 1978, the Mormon Church firmly maintained that blacks were to be "denied the priesthood" and that they were "not equal with other races where the receipt of certain spiritual blessings are concerned . . ." (Mormon Doctrine, 1966, p. 527). On June 9, 1978, however, the Mormon newspaper, Deseret News, announced that the President of the Church had a revelation that the curse had been removed and that blacks could hold the priesthood. We deal with this matter in the updated material for Chapter 21 of this book.

On May 3, 1980, the church's Deseret News revealed that a paper had been discovered which contained the characters Joseph Smith copied directly from the gold plates of the Book of Mormon. This find was reported to have been made by Mark Hofmann. Less than a year after this startling announcement was made, the church's newspaper reported that the same man had discovered a blessing in which Joseph Smith designated his son, Joseph Smith III, as his successor. In 1983 we learned that Mark Hofmann had a letter by Martin Harris which became known as the White Salamander letter. We soon became suspicious of the authenticity of the letter. After bombs killed two people in Salt Lake City in 1985, an investigation disclosed that Hofmann's documents were forgeries. Since the Mormon leaders bought many of the forgeries, the claim of inspired leadership appears to be seriously shaken. The reader will find information on this in the updated material for Chapters 6 and 13.

In 1974 we were finally able to obtain a copy of Joseph Smith's suppressed 1831 polygamy revelation. This revelation commanded the Mormons to marry the Indians so that "their posterity may become white, delightful and just, . . ." (see the updated material for Chapter 16). In 1976 we were allowed to examine a microfilm copy of Joseph Smith's diaries. These diaries, which had been suppressed for about 130 years, have provided some very important evidence concerning the falsification of the published History of the Church (see updated material for Chapter 7).

Since the question of women in the Mormon Church has received so much attention since 1980, we included some helpful information concerning their place in Mormon theology in the 1982 edition of this book (see updated material for Chapter 9, p. 172-A). Another interesting question that we explore is the possibility of a Mormon-CIA connection. We became interested in this matter when we learned that the Mullen Company, which handled public relations for the Mormon Church, was used as a cover for the CIA and that a CIA agent helped with the publication of a book which was favorable to the church. The cover arrangement for the Mullen Company was revealed after it was discovered that some of the planning for the Watergate break-in took place in its offices (see updated material for Chapter 27).

The case against Mormonism grows stronger every year, but the size of this book precludes adding much new material. Our newsletter, The Salt Lake City Messenger, is sent free to all those who wish to keep up to date. Our address is found on the title page of this book. On October 7, 1972, Dr. Jennings G. Olson, of the Department of Philosophy at Weber College, made these comments about Mormonism—Shadow or Reality?:

. . . there is now in existence a book which every Mormon and interested non-Mormon should study and ponder. The book is by Jerald and Sandra Tanner, and it is called Mormonism: Shadow or Reality? . . . it is tightly packed with serious, responsible research which no one can deny is the most comprehensive and thorough analysis and evaluation of Mormonism ever produced in the history of the Church.

Any Mormon of Elemental identification who wants to “answer” the Tanners will have his hands full for a long time to come because the Tanners have the microfilm sources from the early Mormon Church which no one before has had in such abundance. . . . I seriously doubt Dr. Nibley will take this new revised book on, because he is quoted often enough in it to be identifiable as one of the major contributors to Mormonism’s obfuscation of issues; and he has actually contributed (unknowingly perhaps) to the growing painful dilemmas now facing the Elemental Mormonism I have previously identified . . . if Dr. Nibley or anyone else decides to “answer” the Tanner’s book point for point I certainly promise to study that book carefully and review it in public. In the mean time I will state publically [sic] this book of the Tanner’s is a major contribution in the search for integrity and truth about Mormonism, and I shall quote it a number of times. (“The Uniqueness of Mormonism: An Evaluation,” by Jennings G. Olson, October 7, 1972, pp. 22-23)

It has now been fourteen years since Dr. Jennings Olson issued his challenge, yet the Mormon Church has remained officially silent concerning Mormonism—Shadow or Reality? Robert L. Brown and his wife Rosemary privately published a book entitled They Lie in Wait to Deceive. This book claims to answer some of the charges we made against the Book of Abraham, but Mr. Brown acknowledged he was “not a spokesman for the LDS church, nor was I ‘commissioned’ by them to do this work.” In any case, we answered the Browns’ misrepresentations in our book Can The Browns Save Joseph Smith? Some information concerning their book is also found in Chapter 22 of this book.

Ian Barber is another individual who attempted a rebuttal. In the Preface to his booklet, What Mormonism Isn’t: A Response to the Research of Jerald and Sandra Tanner, Mr. Barber emphasized that he was “not in any way attempting to speak officially for the Mormon Church, and neither have I been commissioned or involved with any group or organization in the research, planning and writing of this material.” In the Introduction to the same booklet, Mr. Barber acknowledges that “The Church has not officially responded to the claims of the Tanners.” Mr. Barber apparently felt that something had to be done because of the impact of our material in New Zealand:

In recent months in Auckland some attention has been focused on the publications and writings of former Mormons, Gerald and Sandra Tanner, . . . The recent attentions, however, have been precipitated by the actions of two former L.D.S. Church members in Auckland.

While involved with the L.D.S. Church, Ron and Roberta Rees had built a very successful book-distribution business stocking titles of special interest to other members throughout. During 1980 the Rees’ acquired material originating from the Tanners’ research, and apparently became convinced as to the validity of the fundamental thesis underlying such efforts. They voluntarily withdrew themselves from formal affiliation with the L.D.S. Church as a result, and have now converted their business, “Beehive Books,” into a distribution point for material from the Modern Microfilm Company. (What Mormonism Isn’t, Introduction)

On June 12, 1981, Mr. and Mrs. Rees reported to us in a letter that “nearly 70 Mormons” had come out of the church:

On May 17th we sent to every Mormon Church leader and every Mormon on our mailing list in New Zealand a copy of our mailer . . .

The response has been amazing . . . The most wonderful thing is that we have been able to assist nearly 70 Mormons out of Mormonism and many of them to the real Lord Jesus Christ. We have a Mormon Bishop, 5 returned missionaries and two stake high councilmen now on our mailing list. Every day some one approaches us and we are able to show them that Mormon claims are false . . . It really touches us when a returned missionary who has just been shown all the evidence in your books that we have in our shop says with tears in his eyes “The Church is not true and I have wasted two years of my life and all that money for nothing.” Two days later he accepted the Lord and is being baptised at the end of this month. He is helping his mother and aunt out of the church. The aunt rang us earlier this week and we sent her a library copy of “Mormonism Shadow or Reality?” She phoned us back yesterday to say she had read it (must be a speed reader) and she now knows that the church is not true. She is a third generation Mormon!

Some people declare to us after seeing the truth and coming to know that Mormonism is not true . . . “it’s like getting out of a prison.” One young man who said those exact words has now accepted Christ and was baptised earlier this week.

A later report from another couple involved in the work in New Zealand said that “117 persons have left the church” (Letter dated July 23, 1981).

In any case, Ian Barber has to concede so much in his rebuttal that it can hardly be considered a threat to our work. For more comments on Mr. Barber’s booklet see Chapter 22 of this book.

Although the church may eventually be forced into bringing out a rebuttal to Mormonism—Shadow or Reality? and The Changing World of Mormonism, the fact that it would allow 65,000 copies to be published without an official response seems to show that there are no real answers to the questions we have raised. While some would argue that the church does not like to engage in controversy, its attack on the advocates of the Spalding theory demonstrates that this is simply not true (see Deseret News, Church Section, August 20, 1977). The truth of the matter is that the church leaders do not mind controversy if they feel they can come out ahead. We believe, however, that the church has too many secrets to hide to come out in open opposition to Mormonism—Shadow or Reality? A man who talked to one of the church’s apostles claimed that he “told me to quit studying materials put out by the Tanner’s . . . I told him ‘surely some day there will be an answer to these questions.’ He told me there never would be an answer and I should stop my inquiries. This was too much for me to handle” (Letter dated August 13, 1978). The continual silence of church leaders to the charges contained in our book has tended to arouse suspicion in the minds of many people that there are no answers. An article written by David Merrill indicated that church leaders have tried to restrain their scholars from dealing with our publications: “The official attitude of the Mormon hierarchy towards the Tanners has been one of silence and apparent unconcern. They have, however, actively discouraged LDS scholars and intellectuals from jousting with the Tanners or any of the other professional critics of the church” (Utah Holiday, February 1978, p. 7).

While the church has refused to openly come to grips with Mormonism—Shadow or Reality? an anonymous rebuttal was printed in 1977 which we have traced to the Church Office Building in Salt Lake City. This booklet was entitled, Jerald and Sandra Tanner’s Distorted View of Mormonism: A Response to Mormonism—Shadow or Reality? In the book Answering Dr. Clandestine: A Response to the Anonymous LDS Historian we gave the following information concerning this sneaky attack:

If the reader will look carefully at the front of Jerald and Sandra Tanner’s Distorted View of Mormonism, he will find that more than the name of the author is missing. A careful examination shows that no publisher is given . . . when we try to trace the source of the pamphlet we find a cover-up that reminds us of the Watergate episode. (The reader will remember that a great deal of literature was printed anonymously by some of Nixon's supporters. . . . In the Senate investigation of Watergate and the subsequent investigation of the CIA, the public became aware of the methods used by undercover agents. We learned of clandestine meetings where material or money changed hands, of agents working under assumed names and of post office boxes being rented to carry on ultra-secret operations. Some of those involved in this work talked of "deniability"—i.e., the idea that the "enemy" must not be able to trace back the true source of an operation directed against him.)

When we tried to trace the source of Jerald and Sandra Tanner's Distorted View of Mormonism, we found that the whole matter had all the earmarks of an intelligence operation mounted by the CIA or the KGB. "Deniability" seemed to be the name of the game.

It was obvious that Zion Bookstore was the distributor of the booklet. The name of the store might suggest that it is owned by the Church, but it is actually owned by Sam Weller . . . when we asked Mr. Weller where he was getting copies of Jerald and Sandra Tanner's Distorted View of Mormonism, he replied that he did not know! He said that it was all a very secret operation. He claimed that he had received a letter giving details of how he could handle the pamphlet, but that the writer was not identified. . . . Mr. Weller indicated that he had received 1,800 free copies of the pamphlet. We reasoned that this must represent a large amount of money, . . .

So far we have been unable to trace exactly how Zion Bookstore received the pamphlets. According to one report, the books were first mailed anonymously to a post office box. From there they were transported to a publishing company near Redwood Road and were subsequently picked up by an employee from Zion Bookstore. We talked with Wilfrid Clark, who works for Sam Weller. Mr. Clark maintained that he did not know anything about a publishing company picking up the books from a post office box. He said that all he knew about the matter was that Zion Bookstore received an anonymous letter containing a key to a room in a self storage company on Redwood Road. He claimed that he personally went to the company and picked up the booklets. . . .

As we followed the tracks of this conspiracy to destroy our work, we found that they led right into the Mormon Church Office Building in Salt Lake City. Actually, it was more than a year ago when we first heard that something was afoot. We had a visit with a young Mormon singer who had some questions regarding church history. He told us he had an appointment with a woman at the Church Office Building who claimed she had been part of a committee which was organized to evaluate our research. The committee worked on our material until they received an order from the Prophet—i.e., the President of the Church—that they were to desist from the project. We were unable to learn anything more about this purported committee, but one of the top Mormon historians did tell us in a telephone conversation in Dec. 1976 that a manuscript had been prepared to refute the allegations contained in our work. He was not sure if the church would actually publish it, but the writing had been done.

One of the major clues which led to the discovery of the source of the pamphlet Jerald and Sandra Tanner's Distorted View of Mormonism was an unpublished thesis by Richard Stephen Marshall. . . . We cite the following from Mr. Marshall's paper:

Recent years have seen the emergence of a new kind of anti-Mormon literature which uses Mormon historical records (history has long been used to attack the Church) to try to show that the Church was more human than divine. This new kind of literature is best typified by Jerald and Sandra Tanner and their Modern Microfilm Publishing Company located in Salt Lake City. They have been prolific since 1961 and have at present, a world-wide reputation. The writer encountered materials published by them while living in Australia several years ago. . . .

A recent leaflet printed by the Tanners entitled 20,000 Books Met With Silence notes the lack of official response from the Church to Mormonism—Shadow or Reality?

Many prominent Mormons have expressed a high regard for the work the Tanners have done. . . . T. Edgar Lyon, a Mormon historian and long-time teacher at the Institute of Religion at the University of Utah told this writer he thought the Church should subsidize the Tanners, although he said it tongue-in-cheek.

Reed Durham using virtually the same words as Lyon said that he thought the Church should subsidize the Tanners because of all the historical research they do for it. He teaches a class at the Institute of Religion at the University of Utah on the problems of Mormon history called "Special Studies in Mormon History." He uses the Tanner's book, Mormonism—Shadow or Reality? as the text for the class. . . .

Durham said he would like to write a book answering the accusations of the Tanners point by point. To do so, however, would require certain admissions that Mormon history is not exactly as the Church has taught it was, that there were things taught and practiced in the nin[e]teenth century of which the general Church membership is unaware. He said that the Church is not ready to admit that yet. He also said that due to the large number of letters the Church Historian's Office is receiving asking for answers to the things the Tanners have published, a certain scholar (name deliberately withheld) was appointed to write a general answer to the Tanners including advice on how to read anti-Mormon literature. This unnamed person solicited the help of Reed Durham on the project. The work is finished but its publication is delayed, according to what Leonard Arrington told Durham, because they can not decide how or where to publish it. Because the article is an open and honest approach to the problem, although it by no means answers all of the questions raised by the Tanners, it will probably be published anonymously, to avoid difficulties which could result were such an article connected with an official Church agency." ("The New Mormon History," by Richard Stephen Marshall, A Senior Honors Project Summary, University of Utah, May 1, 1977, pp. 57, 61, 62) (Answering Dr. Cladestine: A Response to the Anonymous LDS Historian, 1978, pp. 1-3)

The pamphlet Jerald and Sandra Tanner's Distorted View of Mormonism appeared just seven months after Mr. Marshall revealed that the Church Historical Department was preparing a response which "will probably be published anonymously." The reader will notice that Church Historian Leonard Arrington was identified with this project. Dr. Arrington denied any knowledge of this matter on three different occasions, but his entire defense was shattered when a man who had lost faith in the church turned over to us a letter written by Arrington which made it plain that he had distributed photocopies of the typed manuscript three months before it was published. We have printed a photograph of Dr. Arrington's letter in our book Answering Dr. Cladestine, page 24. This book also contains a refutation of the claims put forth in Jerald and Sandra Tanner's Distorted View of Mormonism.

Two years after we uncovered this secret plan to discredit our work, we discovered that an employee at the Church Office Building had been spying on us under an assumed name. This spying operation began almost four years earlier. On October 11, 1976, this man, who was at the time "employed by the FBI in a clerical capacity," assumed the alias "Stan Fields" in a letter he wrote to us from California:

Dear Friends in Christ: I am a feollow [sic] Ex-Mormon for Jesus, and would like to be added to your mailing list, . . . What is it like being “Apostates” in the capitol of the “Saints”? It really fas[c]inates me how anyone could survive as long as you have.

Thank you in advance for answering my questions . . . God’s blessings on you as you do His work, Sincerely in Christ

This man not only assumed an alias, but he opened up a post office box in Pleasant Hill, California (P.O. Box 23114) for the purpose of deception. (It is common practice, of course, for those who are engaged in spying operations to cover their tracks by assuming an alias and renting a post office box.) In any case, Mr. “Fields,” who professed to be our Christian brother, spied on our operation for about four years and also penetrated a number of groups of Ex-Mormons for Jesus. By dishonest means he obtained the names of many Mormons who have questions about their religion. He diligently worked to obtain photographs of critics of the Mormon Church and gathered large files of information.

In his zeal to provide a good cover for himself, Mr. “Fields” went so far as to claim that his own church was “Satan inspired” (Letter dated July 22, 1978), and even pretended to pass out material critical of the church around Temple Square. His nefarious career, however, came to a sudden end in July, 1980, when we discovered his true identity. We also found that he was employed at the Mormon Church Office Building in the Genealogical Department. When we directly confronted him in the Church Office Building with the evidence of his spying activities, he made no attempt to deny the basic charges. Although he claimed that he “was not spying for the church,” he acknowledged he had used church equipment to carry out his duplicity. (For a complete account of this matter see our publication Unmasking a Mormon Spy: The Story of Stan Fields.)

A few things concerning the new and enlarged edition of Mormonism—Shadow or Reality? that we first published in 1982 should be explained to the reader. To begin with, although we made some changes throughout the book, the largest portion remained the same as in the 1972 edition. Only two of the thirty-eight chapters were retypeset. At the end of a number of the chapters we added updated material. Since we wanted to keep the page numbers as close to the 1972 edition as possible, we assigned a letter to each additional page. For instance, Chapter 1 ends on page 4. We added updated material to this chapter, but instead of assigning the number 5 to the next page, we called it 4-A. By this method we were able to start Chapter 2 on page 5 as it appears in the 1972 edition. With the exception of changes made in the updated material in Chapters 6 and 13, the 1986 edition is exactly the same as that published in 1982.

When we originally published Mormonism—Shadow or Reality? in 1972, we did not have a typesetting machine. An IBM typewriter with “proportional spacing” was used and the copy reduced in size for printing by the photo-offset method. Since we did not have italicized type for book titles and emphasis, we had to use underlining in its place. In the Preface to the 1972 edition we wrote: “Capitalization and underlining are used for emphasis throughout this book.” Since 1972 we were able to obtain typesetting equipment. Now we are able to use three different styles of type for the updated material—i.e., regular type, bold type and italics for book titles.

In the 1972 edition of this book we had a chapter entitled “Appendix B,” which contained “New Information.” This was material which we became aware of after we had written the largest portion of the book. In this edition we have eliminated Appendix B and incorporated the most important part of this material into the chapters where it properly belongs. Although we mention some of our own religious beliefs in this volume, those who are interested in knowing more should see our book, A Look at Christianity.

The Mormon people have greatly assisted in the writing of this book. Some of them have allowed us access to their own research, others have helped in various ways. Others who are not members of the church have provided help. Both members and non-members of the Mormon Church have given books, pamphlets and photographs to us.

The University of Utah Library and the Utah State Historical Society have greatly assisted by allowing photographs to be made of many of their rare books. The Yale University Library, the Mormon Church Genealogical Library, the Brigham Young University Library and the Salt Lake Public Library have also provided help. James Wardle, who owns one of the largest private libraries on the subject of Mormonism, has given us a great deal of help and material. He has given us books, pamphlets, photocopies of rare documents, microfilms and typed material. Mr. Wardle is to be commended for his helpfulness to those who wish to do research. LaMar Petersen, who is considered to be one of the best informed scholars on Mormon history, has given us a great deal of help and encouragement. He has constantly provided us with new material and has permitted us to go through his note cards, which contain many important references. Much of the material used in this book was actually found by Mr. Petersen. Wesley P. Walters has also given us a great deal of help and material. He has also made some of the most important discoveries concerning Mormonism and has been very free with his material. He has sent us a continual stream of photocopies and microfilms of rare documents. We will have more to say about his work in the chapters which follow. We would also like to thank H. Michael Marquardt, one of the most knowledgeable scholars on Mormon history, for freely sharing the fruits of his research with us. Grant Heward has furnished a great deal of valuable material and help on the Egyptian language and Joseph Smith’s Egyptian Papyri, and Jerry Urban has provided encouragement and support when we really needed it.

The Apostle Paul admonishes us as follows:

Prove all things; hold fast that which is good.
(1 Thessalonians 5:21)

Keeping the Apostle Paul’s statement in mind we wish to present this study of Mormon history and doctrine.

Joseph Smith

Brigham Young

The Hill Cumorah

1. A Marvelous Work?

In 1830 the Mormon Prophet Joseph Smith published the Book of Mormon—a book which purports to be a history of the “former inhabitants of this continent.” The same year he organized a church in the state of New York.

Today, there are two main groups which claim to base their teachings upon Joseph Smith’s works. They are the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints and the Reorganized Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints. The Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints is by far the largest of these two groups. It claims to have about 3,000,000 members, and church leaders predict that if the church continues to grow at the same rate, they will have 10,000,000 members by 2000 A.D. (Deseret News, Church Section, October 21, 1967, p. 1).

Members of the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints are commonly referred to as “Mormons.” The Mormons have their headquarters in Salt Lake City, Utah. In this book we will deal primarily with this church.

Miraculous Claims

The claims of Mormonism are such that they cannot be ignored. The Mormon Apostle LeGrand Richards claims that “There is not an honest man or woman in this world who loves the Lord who wouldn’t join this Church if they knew what it was” (Deseret News, Church Section, January 22, 1966, p. 16).

The story of Joseph Smith is really very interesting. When he was a young man, his family moved to the state of New York. Within a few miles of his home there was a hill, which Joseph Smith later called the Hill Cumorah. According to Joseph Smith, this was no ordinary hill, for on this hill two of the greatest battles in history were fought. Bruce R. McConkie, of the First Council of Seventy, states: “Both the Nephite and Jaredite civilizations fought their final great wars of extinction at and near the Hill Cumorah (or Ramah as the Jaredites termed it), which hill is located between Palmyra and Manchester in the western part of the state of New York. It was here that Moroni hid up the gold plates from which the Book of Mormon was translated” (Mormon Doctrine, 1966, p. 175).

On page 454 of the same book, Bruce R. McConkie stated: “It is reported by President Brigham Young that there was in the Hill Cumorah a room containing many wagon loads of plates.”

An ordinary person would probably see nothing of importance about this hill, but to the Mormons this is one of the most important places on earth.

While Joseph Smith was digging a well for Clark Chase, he found “a chocolate-colored, somewhat egg-shaped stone” (Comprehensive History of the Church, by B. H. Roberts, vol. 1, p. 129). This might have been just an ordinary stone (maybe a little unusual in appearance), but to Joseph Smith it was a “Seer Stone.” This stone had been prepared by God, and through it Joseph Smith received revelations. Joseph Smith claimed that on the night of September 21, 1823, he had a visitor. But this was no ordinary visitor, it was an Angel sent from God. The Angel told Smith that gold plates were buried in the Hill Cumorah. The next day Joseph

Smith found these plates, and, if his story is true, he made the greatest discovery in the history of archaeology. Archaeologists have searched for years trying to piece together the history of the ancient inhabitants of this land, but Joseph Smith turned over one stone and found all the answers. Underneath this stone he found a box which contained the gold plates. These plates contained “an account of the former inhabitants of this continent, and the source from whence they sprang.” More important than this, however, they contained “the fulness of the everlasting Gospel.” According to the Mormon leaders, the Book of Mormon is far superior to the Bible because it contains the “pure” words of Christ. The Bible, they claim, has been altered by wicked Priests. The Mormon Apostle LeGrand Richards states:

... the “everlasting gospel” could not be discovered through reading the Bible alone . . . this is the only Christian church in the world that did not have to rely upon the Bible for its organization and government; . . . if we had no Bible we would still have all the needed direction and information through the revelations of the Lord “to his servants the prophets” in these latter-days. (A Marvelous Work and a Wonder, 1966, p. 41)

After the Mormon Church was organized, Joseph Smith gave a revelation which stated that the Saints were to gather to Jackson County, Missouri. To the Mormon leaders, this was no ordinary land; they taught that this was the place where the “Garden of Eden” was located. Bruce R. McConkie stated: “The early brethren of this dispensation taught that the Garden of Eden was located in what is known to us as the land of Zion, an area for which Jackson County, Missouri, is the center place” (Mormon Doctrine, p. 20). In Daviess County, Missouri, Joseph Smith found the remains of an altar which he claimed was built by Adam. Bruce R. McConkie stated: “At that great gathering Adam offered sacrifices on an altar built for the purpose. A remnant of that very altar remained on the spot down through the ages. On May 19, 1838, Joseph Smith and a number of his associates stood on the remainder of the pile of stones at a place called Spring Hill, Daviess County, Missouri” (Mormon Doctrine, p. 21). O. B. Huntington made these statements in an article published in the Mormon publication The Juvenile Instructor:

Adam’s Altar, which was mentioned, I have visited many times. I sat upon the wall of stone and reflected upon the scenes that had taken place thousands of years ago right where I was. There were the rocks that Father Adam used . . . Joseph said, “That altar was built by our Father Adam and there he offered sacrifice.” . . . according to the words of the Prophet Joseph, mankind in that age continued to emigrate eastwardly until they reached the country on or near the Atlantic coast; and that in or near Carolina Noah built his remarkable ship, in which he, his family, and all kinds of animals lived a few days over one year without coming out of it. (The Juvenile Instructor, November 15, 1895, pp. 700-701)

(For additional information on this subject see our publication Archaeology and the Book of Mormon, pp. 74-78.)

In June, 1834, while traveling toward Independence, Missouri, Joseph Smith discovered a “skeleton of a man.” This was no ordinary skeleton, however. It was revealed to Joseph Smith by “the Spirit of the Almighty” that “the person whose skeleton” was before him was “Zelph” a “white Lamanite” and a “man of God,” who was killed during the “last great struggle of the Lamanites and Nephites” (History of the Church, vol. 2, pp. 79-80).

In the year 1835 a man came to Kirtland, Ohio, with some mummies and rolls of papyrus. Joseph Smith examined the rolls and stated that “one of the rolls contained the writings of Abraham, another the writings of Joseph of Egypt” (History of the Church, vol. 2, p. 236). When Josiah Quincy visited Nauvoo in 1844, Joseph Smith showed him the papyrus rolls. Quincy later wrote:

“And now come with me,” said the prophet “and I will show you the curiosities.” . . . There were some pine presses fixed against the wall of the room. These receptacles Smith opened, and disclosed four human bodies, shrunken and black with age. “These are mummies,” said the exhibitor. “I want you to look at that little runt of a fellow over there. He was a great man in his day. Why, that was Pharaoh Necho, King of Egypt!” Some parchments inscribed with hieroglyphics were then offered us. They were preserved under glass and handled with great respect. “That is the handwriting of Abraham, the Father of the Faithful,” said the prophet. “This is the autograph of Moses, and these lines were written by his brother Aaron. Here we have the earliest account of the Creation, from which Moses composed the First Book of Genesis.” . . . We were further assured that the prophet was the only mortal who could translate these mysterious writings, and that his power was given by direct inspiration. (Figures of the Past, by Josiah Quincy, as quoted in Among the Mormons, Edited by William Mulder and A. Russell Mortensen, 1958, pp. 136-137)

In 1843 “six brass plates” were found near Kinderhook, Illinois. At least one of these plates is still in existence, but it is considered to be of little importance. Joseph Smith, however, claimed that these plates were ancient records: “I have translated a portion of them, and find they contain the history of the person with whom they were found. He was a descendant of Ham, through the loins of Pharaoh, king of Egypt, and that he received his kingdom from the Ruler of heaven and earth” (History of the Church, vol. 5, p. 372).

Joseph Smith claimed that his powers as a “Seer” extended even beyond the earth. In the journal of Oliver B. Huntington we find the following:

Inhabitants of the Moon

“The inhabitants of the moon are more of a uniform size than the inhabitants of the earth, being about 6 feet in height.

“They dress very much like the quaker style and are quite general in style, or fashion of dress.

“They live to be very old; coming generally, near a thousand years.”

This is the description of them as given by Joseph Smith the Seer, and he could “See” whatever he asked the father in the name of Jesus to see. (“Journal of Oliver B. Huntington,” vol. 3, p. 166 of typed copy at Utah State Historical Society)

Although many people could not accept Joseph Smith’s claims, there were a number of people who gave support to his ideas. Martin Harris, for instance, provided Joseph Smith with financial support and became one of the “Three Witnesses to the Book of Mormon.” Like Joseph Smith, Martin Harris was a visionary man. William A. Linn gives this information:

Daniel Hendrix relates that as he and Harris, were riding to the village one evening, and he remarked on the beauty of the moon, Harris replied that if his companion could only see it as he had, he might well call it beautiful, explaining that he had actually visited the moon, and added that it “was only the faithful who were permitted to visit the celestial regions.” (The Story of the Mormons, New York, 1902, p. 35)

For many years after Joseph Smith’s death the Mormons continued to teach that the moon was inhabited. On July 24, 1870,

Brigham Young, the second President of the Mormon Church, made this statement:

Who can tell us of the inhabitants of this little planet that shines of an evening, called the moon? . . . when you inquire about the inhabitants of that sphere you find that the most learned are as ignorant in regard to them as the ignorant of their fellows. So it is in regard to the inhabitants of the sun. Do you think it is inhabited? I rather think it is. Do you think there is any life there? No question of it; it was not made in vain. (Journal of Discourses, vol. 13, p. 271)

As late as 1892 the teaching that the moon was inhabited appeared in a church publication. In an article published in the Young Woman’s Journal, O. B. Huntington stated:

Astronomers and philosophers have, from time almost immemorial until very recently, asserted that the moon was uninhabited, that it had no atmosphere, etc. But recent discoveries, through the means of powerful telescopes, have given scientists a doubt or two upon the old theory.

Nearly all the great discoveries of men in the last half century have, in one way or another, either directly or indirectly, contributed to prove Joseph Smith to be a Prophet.

As far back as 1837, I know that he said the moon was inhabited by men and women the same as this earth, and that they lived to a greater age than we do, that they live generally to near the age of a 1000 years.

He described the men as averaging near six feet in height, and dressing quite uniformly in something near the Quaker style.

In my Patriarchal blessing, given by the father of Joseph the Prophet, in Kirtland, 1837, I was told that I should preach the gospel before I was 21 years of age; that I should preach the gospel to the inhabitants upon the islands of the sea, and—to the inhabitants of the moon, even the planet you can now behold with your eyes. (The Young Woman’s Journal, published by the Young Ladies’ Mutual Improvement Associations of Zion, 1892, vol. 3, pp. 263-264)

While very few Mormons today would try to defend Joseph Smith’s ideas about the “inhabitants of the moon,” the church still teaches that the Book of Mormon is scripture, that Adam’s altar is in Missouri, and that the Book of Abraham was translated from the Egyptian papyrus.

Although Joseph Smith lived to be only 38 years old, the Mormon leaders claim that he had numerous visits from “glorious personages” from heaven. Not only was he visited by God the Father and His Son Jesus Christ, but by John the Baptist, Peter, James, John, Moses, Elijah, Elias, Michael, Raphael, Nephi, Moroni, Mormon, and possibly others.

Obviously, Joseph Smith was either one of the greatest prophets who ever walked the face of the earth, or the whole thing is a fraud from beginning to end. John Taylor, the third President of the Mormon Church, made this statement:

. . . if God has not spoken, if the angel of God has not appeared to Joseph Smith, and if these things are not true of which we speak, then the whole thing is an imposture from beginning to end. There is no half-way house, no middle path about the matter; it is either one thing or the other. (Journal of Discourses, vol. 21, p. 165)

Joseph Fielding Smith, who recently became the tenth President of the Mormon Church, stated:

Mormonism, as it is called, must stand or fall on the story of Joseph Smith. He was either a prophet of God, divinely called, properly appointed and commissioned, or he was one of the biggest frauds this world has ever seen. There is no middle ground.

If Joseph Smith was a deceiver, who wilfully attempted to mislead the people, then he should be exposed; his claims should be refuted, and his doctrines shown to be false. . . . I maintain that Joseph Smith was all that he claimed to be. . . . Attacks have been made from the beginning to the present, and yet every one has failed. The world has been unable to place a finger upon anything that is inconsistent, or out of harmony in the revelations to Joseph Smith, with that which has been revealed before, or predicted by the prophets and the Lord himself. (Doctrines of Salvation, 1959, vol. 1, pp. 188-189)

The Only True Church?

The Mormon Church sends missionaries throughout the world with the message that God has spoken from heaven and restored the true Church of Christ to the earth. These missionaries are instructed to teach that the Mormon Church is the only true church and that Joseph Smith was a prophet of God. They are supposed to teach the contact that his church is false and that the Mormon Church is the only true church. Conclusion number nine, which the contact is supposed to reach, is: “There was a complete apostasy and my church is false” (A Uniform System For Teaching Investigators, published by the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints, p. 9).

The Mormon Church teaches that all other churches are in a state of apostasy. More than fifty pages of the introduction to the History of the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints are devoted to proving that all churches except the Mormon Church are in apostasy. The following is found on page XL: “Nothing less than a complete apostasy from the Christian religion would warrant the establishment of the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints.”

The Mormon leaders claim that in 1820 God the Father and His Son Jesus Christ visited Joseph Smith and told him that he “must join none” of the churches, “for they were all wrong; and the Personage who addressed me said that all their creeds were an abomination in his sight; that those professors were all corrupt; that: ‘they draw near to me with their lips, but their hearts are far from me, they teach for doctrines the commandments of men, having a form of godliness, but they deny the power thereof’” (Pearl of Great Price, Joseph Smith, 2:18-19).

In the Elders’ Journal, which was edited by Joseph Smith, the following appeared: “Is it any wonder then, that we say of the priests of modern days, that they are of their father the devil . . . we shall see all the priests who adhere to the sectarian religions of the day, with all their followers, without one exception, receive their portion with the devil and his angels” (Elders’ Journal, vol. 1, no. 4, pp. 59-60).

The following questions and answers appear in The Seer, which was edited by the Mormon Apostle Orson Pratt:

Q. Who founded the Roman Catholic Church?

A. The devil, through the medium of Apostates, who subverted the whole order of God . . .

Q. Did the great Protestant Reformers restore the Church of Christ to the earth?

A. No . . .

Q. But did not any of the Protestant Reformers have authority to Baptize and Confirm?

A. Not any of them . . .

Q. But did not the first Protestant Reformers receive their ordination and authority from the Catholics?

A. Yes: and in this manner they received all the authority that their mother church was in possession of; and the mother having derived her authority from the devil, could only impart that which his Satanic majesty was pleased to bestow upon her. . . . (The Seer, p. 205)

The Mormon Apostle Orson Pratt also wrote: “The gates of hell have prevailed and will continue to prevail over the Catholic Mother of Harlots, and over all her Protestant Daughters; . . . the apostate Catholic church, with all her popes and bishops, together with all her harlot daughters shall be hurled down to hell . . .” (Pamphlets by Orson Pratt, p. 112).

Brigham Young, the second President of the Mormon Church, made these statements concerning Christianity:

The Christian world, I discovered, was like the captain and crew of a vessel on the ocean without a compass, and tossed to and fro withersoever the wind listed to blow them. When the light came to me, I saw that all the so-called Christian world was grovelling in darkness. (Journal of Discourses, vol. 5, p. 73)

We may very properly say that the sectarian world do not know anything correctly, so far as pertains to salvation . . . They are more ignorant than children. (Ibid., p. 229)

Brother Taylor has just said that the religions of the day were hatched in hell. The eggs were laid in hell, hatched on its borders, and then kicked on to the earth. (Ibid., vol. 6, p. 176)

The Christian world, so called, are heathens as to their knowledge of the salvation of God. (Ibid., vol. 8, p. 171)

Our Elders may tell the priests that there are fifty-one chapters in Genesis, and but few of them, if any, will know that there are only fifty. With regard to true theology, a more ignorant people never lived than the present so-called Christian world. (Ibid., p. 199)

Every intelligent person under the heavens that does not, when informed, acknowledge that Joseph Smith, jun., is a Prophet of God, is in darkness, and is opposed to us and to Jesus and his kingdom on the earth. (Journal of Discourses, vol. 8, p. 223)

John Taylor, who became the third President of the Mormon Church, made these statements:

What! are Christians ignorant? Yes, as ignorant of the things of God as the brute beast. (Journal of Discourses, vol. 6, p. 25)

We talk about Christianity, but it is a perfect pack of nonsense . . . the Devil could not invent a better engine to spread his work than the Christianity of the nineteenth century. (Ibid., p. 167)

What does the Christian world know about God? Nothing; . . . Why, so far as the things of God are concerned, they are the veriest fools; they know neither God nor the things of God. (Ibid., vol. 13, p. 225)

Although the present-day leaders of the Mormon Church are becoming more subtle in their attacks on other churches, they still teach that the Mormon Church is the only true church and that all others are in a state of apostasy.

The Best People?

The Mormon Church not only teaches that all other churches are in a state of apostasy, but it also makes claims that most other churches would not dare to make. John Taylor, who became the third President of the Mormon Church, stated: “. . . we are the only people that know how to save our progenitors, how to save ourselves, and how to save our posterity in the celestial kingdom of God; . . . we in fact are the saviours of the world, . . .” (Journal of Discourses, vol. 6, p. 163).

Brigham Young once boasted: “We are the smartest people in the world” (Journal of Discourses, vol. 6, p. 176). On another occasion he said: “I remarked to brother Kimball last Sabbath, that this people are the best people that ever lived upon the earth; . . .” (Ibid., vol. 4, p. 269).

Joseph Fielding Smith, the tenth President of the Mormon Church, still maintains that the Mormons are the best people on earth:

Saints are the best people. We are, notwithstanding our weaknesses, the best people in the world. I do not say this boastfully, for I believe that this truth is evident to all who are willing to observe for themselves. We are morally clean, in every way equal, and in many ways superior to any other people. (Doctrines of Salvation, vol. 1, p. 236)

Joseph Young made this statement on July 26, 1857:

I want you to tell them, and tell all the great men of the earth, that the Latter-day Saints are to be their redeemers— . . . Believe in God, Believe in Jesus, and believe in Joseph his Prophet, and in Brigham his successor. And I add, "If you will believe in your heart and confess with your mouth that Jesus is the Christ, that Joseph was a Prophet, and that Brigham was his successor, you shall be saved in the kingdom of God," . . . (Journal of Discourses, vol. 6, p. 229)

In the History of the Church, vol. 7, page 287, Brigham Young made this statement: "Every spirit that confesses that Joseph Smith is a Prophet, that he lived and died a Prophet and that the Book of Mormon is true, is of God, and every spirit that does not is of anti-Christ."

Joseph Fielding Smith, the tenth President of the Mormon Church, says that there is "no salvation without accepting Joseph Smith. If Joseph Smith was verily a prophet, and if he told the truth . . . then this knowledge is of the most vital importance to the entire world. No man can reject that testimony without incurring the most dreadful consequences, for he cannot enter the kingdom of God" (Doctrines of Salvation, vol. 1, pp. 189-190).

Thus we see that the claims of the Mormon Church are of such a nature that it cannot be considered as just another church. It is either the only true church, or it is nothing but a shadow. Brigham Young himself stated: "By your own experience you know that 'Mormonism,' if not true, is worse than nothing; and if true, its value is beyond our computation" (Journal of Discourses, vol. 8, p. 54).

The Mormon Apostle Orson Pratt stated that if the Mormon religion had errors in it the Mormon people would be grateful if someone would point them out:

. . . convince us of our errors of doctrine, if we have any, by reason, by logical arguments, or by the word of God, and we will be ever grateful for the information, and you will ever have the pleasing reflection that you have been instruments in the hands of God of redeeming your fellow beings from the darkness which you may see enveloping their minds. (The Seer, pp. 15-16)

After making a long and careful study of the Book of Mormon and the history of the Mormon Church, we have come to the conclusion that the claims made by the Mormon Church leaders are false. In this book we will try to present some of the evidence which has led to this conclusion.

bad for your growing, impressionable girls. Comedies, farces, operas of the lighter sorts, dramas, concerts and negro shows are good to cheer and amuse all, even the dear innocent girls, so once a week, say, we will allow Our Girl to visit a theatre. Out of door sports in winter or summer are excellent if conducted by the proper people and in proper places. It is self-evident that reading and quiet games are beneficial to all. Yet, see to it that the book is elevating in tone and treatment, and full of such thoughts as you want impressed on the plastic young mind. The games will be interesting, if you will help to make them so. The point is, that you yourselves must enter into every one of these amusements and attend every one that you allow your daughter to attend if that is at all possible. If you are kept at home, you will find your girls will be willing to get most of their innocent "fun" at home, if you will allow them to invite their young friends to share their pleasure. Don't scowl and be cross when the young visitors come in, but welcome them with a smile, and do you take the lead of their fun and frolic; at least take the leading-strings in your own firm yet gentle hands, turning the current whenever it seeks to approach danger-spots, and with all the enthusiasm you can muster enter into the youthful sports and plays. I know one mother who goes down upon her knees in company with her young daughters just before the young visitors arrive and asks the blessings of God to rest within the portals of that house and upon the heart of every inmate and visitor while enjoying themselves together. I may add, the young people love to visit at that house and consider it an honor to be invited there. In one last word let me call your attention to the fact that you must insist upon one especial point in every sort and kind of amusement and that last word, that especial point, is moderation.

OUR SUNDAY CHAPTER.

THE INHABITANTS OF THE MOON.
O. B. HUNTINGTON.

ASTRONOMERS and philosophers have, from time almost immemorial until very recently, asserted that the moon was uninhabited, that it had no atmosphere, etc. But recent discoveries, through the means of powerful telescopes, have given scientists a doubt or two upon the old theory.

Nearly all the great discoveries of men in the last half century have, in one way or another, either directly or indirectly, contributed to prove Joseph Smith to be a Prophet.

As far back as 1837, I know that he said the moon was inhabited by men and women the same as this earth, and that they lived to a greater age than we do—that they live generally to near the age of a 1000 years.

He described the men as averaging near six feet in height, and dressing quite uniformly in something near the Quaker style.

THE YOUNG WOMAN'S JOURNAL.

In my Patriarchal blessing, given by the father of Joseph the Prophet, in Kirtland, 1837, I was told that I should preach the gospel before I was 21 years of age; that I should preach the gospel to the inhabitants upon the islands of the sea, and—to the inhabitants of the moon, even the planet you can now behold with your eyes.

The first two promises have been fulfilled, and the latter may be verified.

From the verification of two promises we may reasonably expect the third to be fulfilled also.

ONE truth after another men are finding out by the wisdom and inspiration given of God to them.

The inspiration of God caused men to hunt for a new continent until Columbus discovered it. Men have lost millions of dollars, and hundreds of lives to find a country beyond the north pole; and they will yet find that country—a warm, fruitful country, inhabited by the ten tribes of Israel, a country divided by a river, on one side of which lives the half tribe of Manasseh, which is more numerous than all the others. So said the Prophet. At the same time he described the shape of the earth at the poles as being a rounded elongation, and drew a diagram of it in this form:

which any one can readily see will allow the sun's rays to fall so near perpendicular to the center that that part of the earth may be warmed and made fruitful. He quoted scripture in proof of his theory which says that "the earth flieth upon its wings in the midst of the creations of God," and said that there was a semblance in the form of the earth that gave rise to the saying.

HOUSEHOLD DEPARTMENT.

DAINTY HOUSEKEEPING.

LUCY PAGE STELLE.

IHAVE in mind, as I write, one of those mirth-provoking cartoons that give one some suggestion of truth as well. It was two pictures of a kitchen that was prepared for the new servant. The first showed how tastily it was fixed with a flowering plant in the window, a pretty chintz ruffle on the mantle shelf with a few tasteful ornaments, with a comfortable rocking chair with a neat tidy upon it, and so on. The next picture showed the kitchen after Bridget had unfixed the place to suit herself. The flowering plant was reduced to a few dry stems. Some utensils were on the shelf, the tidy from the rocking chair was gone, and perfect havoc was wrought generally by the iconoclastic Bridget. To be sure, Bridget's early education was not conducive to elegance and refinement of surroundings, her only thought being the accomplishment of what she is paid to do.

It seems to me that a lady's sur-

10,000,000 Mormons Before 2000 A.D.

On page one we stated that the Mormon Church has “about 3,000,000 members, and Church leaders predict that if the Church continues to grow at the same rate, they will have 10,000,000 members by 2,000 A.D.” According to the May 1981 issue of the Ensign, page 19, the church had 4,638,000 members at the close of 1980. It is expected that there will be over 5,000,000 members before 1982 has passed. An article in the Church Section of the Deseret News recently predicted that the goal of 10,000,000 will be reached before the turn of the century. On April 6, 1980, the Salt Lake Tribune reported that “the church has 30,004 full-time missionaries—the most in its history.” The Ensign, May 1981, page 19, informs that about 211,000 people were converted to the Mormon Church during 1980.

Change in Missionary Discussions

On page 3 we mentioned a six-lesson plan which Mormon missionaries memorized to teach investigators. It was known as A Uniform System For Teaching Investigators. In 1973 a new eight-lesson plan, The Uniform System For Teaching Families, was published by the church. When the old missionary lessons were printed they contained no copyright notice. Because of this both John L. Smith and Hal Hougey reprinted the plan and widely distributed it to non-Mormons. Since potential converts became aware of the memorized lessons before they were presented, it undoubtedly cost the Mormon Church many members. In printing the new lesson plan the church leaders made sure that this would not happen again. There were no less than 129 warnings that The Uniform System For Teaching Families was copyrighted by the “Corporation of the President of The Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints. All rights reserved.”

This manual was not as blunt with regard to other churches as the previous lesson plan but still maintained they were in a state of apostasy.

In 1979 the Mormon Church reprinted a missionary manual entitled, Missionary Discussions For The Jewish People. On pages JC-15 and JC-17 we find the following:

Missionary: After the days of the Apostles, revelation from heaven to the Church of Jesus Christ ceased, and divine authority was taken from the earth. This was the beginning of the false Christianity that has now multiplied into hundreds of rival churches. . . . Eventually, many pagan rituals, ceremonies, and teachings were added to the Christian church, and the church became known as the universal or “catholic” church . . . many individuals protested, often at the cost of their own lives. These protestors or reformers grew in number, which eventually resulted in the Protestant Reformation. In spite of the attempts of the reformers to reestablish the Messiah’s original church, they had no authority or revelation from God; and the final result of their efforts was to replace one apostate church with hundreds of apostate churches.

The Mormon Church was criticized for having a memorized discussion plan, and in 1981 it brought out a new plan which only has the missionary “Memorize and present the boldface portions essentially word-for-word.” The lightface portions are supposed to be presented in the missionary’s “own words.” This discussion plan should seem more natural to the contact than the older method of presentation.

More on Moon Men

On page 2 we furnished some information which indicates that Joseph Smith thought the moon was inhabited. An anonymous typewritten article (not to be confused with the response prepared by the Historical Department) suggests that we have been dishonest with regard to this matter:

Since nothing new can be learned, the ill-wishers invent ways to shackle Joseph with “lunar lunacy.” Unfortunately, since the Tanner’s work is revered as a “masterpiece” of the “most authentic, best documented” materials on Mormonism (See II), Joseph, in his innocence, is stealthily “framed” with moon-mania.

The anonymous writer says that Oliver B. Huntington’s account about Joseph Smith describing the inhabitants of the moon “is only the senile but loving memories of an aged Mormon whose Church honored him by publishing his recollections rather than covertly hiding them in embarrassment: the offense with which Mormons are so notoriously charged.” While it is true that Mr. Huntington’s statement was written toward the end of his life, we can hardly believe that the church leaders would publish Huntington’s statement under the title, “The Inhabitants of the Moon,” just to humor him. They must have believed what Huntington said about the moon. Apostle Abraham H. Cannon took enough interest in Huntington’s statement to record the information in his diary (see the “Daily Journal of Abraham H. Cannon,” vol. 18, p. 57).

The anonymous writer tries to discredit Huntington’s statement because it mentions a blessing given by Joseph Smith’s father:

The blessing given by Joseph Smith Sn. has been discussed. Such blessings, if they exist, are on record with the Church. Therefore, one wonders why no one has found Mr. Huntington’s 1837 Patriarchal blessing. The credibility of the claims of the Mormon foe rest in its existence. The fact of the matter is, he did not receive a Patriarchal blessing from anyone in 1837. No such Patriarchal blessing exists. (See 6.) Mr. Huntington received his Patriarchal blessing at the hands of Hyrum Smith on Nov. 14, 1843 . . . Oliver did receive a father’s blessing on Dec. 7th, 1836 . . . Included in this blessing was the following: “. . . before thou art twenty-one thou wilt be called to preach the fullness of the gospel, thou shalt have power with God even to translate thyself to Heaven, and preach to the inhabitants of the moon or planets, if it shall be expedient, . . .” It is likely that Mr. Huntington’s dim recollection of the early days mixed his father’s pronouncement with his 1843 Patriarchal blessing, which he thought was given in 1837.

We feel that the anonymous writer is making a very serious error when he states that “Such blessings, if they exist, are on record with the Church.” Actually, Joseph Smith, Senior’s own book containing Patriarchal Blessings has a short sketch added by authority of the Mormon historians George A. Smith and Wilford Woodruff which makes it clear that “A considerable number of blessings which were given by that Patriarch, were not recorded, through the negligence of the Scribes” (typed copy).

The fact that Huntington received a Patriarchal Blessing from Hyrum Smith in 1843 certainly does not rule out an earlier blessing by Joseph Smith’s father. Even though the Patriarchal Blessing books are still suppressed, we have learned that Huntington also received a blessing from Patriarch John Smith.

While it is true that Oliver B. Huntington received a blessing from his father William Huntington which sounds like the blessing mentioned in the article published in The Young Woman’s Journal, we feel that it is likely that he also received a blessing from Joseph Smith, Senior, which mentioned visiting the moon. Michael Marquardt has given us a typed extract from a blessing given by Joseph Smith’s father to Lorenzo Snow on Dec. 15, 1836. Lorenzo Snow, who later became President of the Church, received this promise: “Thou shalt have power to translate thyself from one planet to another; and power to go to the moon . . .”

The wording of the blessing given to Lorenzo Snow by Joseph Smith, Senior is so similar to the wording we find in the blessing given by Oliver B. Huntington’s father that we feel there must be a connection between the two. Below is a comparison:

BLESSING GIVEN BY JOSEPH SMITH, SEN. December 15, 1836: Thou shalt have power to translate thyself from one planet to another; and power to go to the moon . . .

BLESSING GIVEN BY WILLIAM HUNTINGTON. December 7, 1836: . . . thou shalt have power with God even to translate thyself to Heaven, & preach to the inhabitants of the moon or planets, . . .

We believe that William Huntington may have obtained his wording from Joseph Smith's father. Since Oliver claimed he did receive a Patriarchal Blessing from Joseph Smith, Sen., it seems very likely that his father's blessing was dependent upon it. It is also interesting to note that the blessing to Lorenzo Snow was given only a week after William Huntington's blessing. If the church leaders would allow us to examine the Patriarchal Blessings of Joseph Smith, Sen. and his son Hyrum we might find even more information about visiting the moon. Access to these blessings has even been denied to some of the top Mormon scholars.

At any rate, Eugene England has recently published George Laub's Journal, "Commenced, January 1, 1845." It contains an account of the teaching of the Patriarch Hyrum Smith (Joseph Smith's own brother and a member of the First Presidency) on "the plurality of gods & worlds," in which we find the following:

. . . every Star that we see is a world and is inhabited the same as this world is peopled. The Sun & Moon is inhabited & the Stars

& (Jesus Christ is the light of the Sun, etc.). The Stars are inhabited the same as this Earth. (George Laub's Journal, as cited in Brigham Young University Studies, Winter 1978, p. 177)

Another statement indicating that Joseph Smith himself believed the moon was inhabited has come to light. It appears in a typewritten paper entitled, "sayings of the Prophet Joseph." We have not been able to determine the author of this paper, but it comes from the file of a Mormon scholar. On page 3 of this paper we find this intriguing statement:

Father Rogers said in the St. George Temple that he heard the Prophet say in the Kirtland Temple, that the moon was inhabited by a race of people about middle stature and very mild and they would never have put the Saviour to death if he had come among them.

Unfortunately, this brief statement does not give "Father Rogers" first name. Samuel Hollister Rogers, however, was in Kirtland and lived long enough to have mentioned this matter at the St. George Temple. There may have been other men by the name of Rogers who could meet these qualifications, but more research needs to be done with regard to this matter. In any case, evidence that the Smith family believed the moon was inhabited appears to be mounting.

2. Change, Censorship and Suppression

The fact that Mormonism is changing is very obvious to anyone who studies the history of the church. Things that were approved of when Mormonism first began are now condemned, and things that are now approved were once condemned. An example of such a change might be the Mormon Church's attitude toward dancing. Today most wards in the Mormon Church have a recreation hall where dances are held.

Dancing seems to be a vital part of the church's recreation program, but this has not always been the case. A member of the church today might be surprised to find out that if he lived in Kirtland in 1837, he could have been cut off from the church for participating in a dance. Joseph Smith made the following comment under the date of October 22, 1837: "Sunday 22.—The church in Kirtland disfellowshipped twenty-two brethren and sisters until they make satisfaction for uniting with the world in a dance the Thursday previous" (History of the Church, by Joseph Smith, vol. 2, p. 519). On page 520 of the same volume, Joseph Smith stated: "Most of those who were complained of for participating in the recreation on the 19th and had not confessed, acknowledged their fault to the High Council on the first of November, and the remainder were required so to do or be cut off from the church."

Dancing was apparently introduced into the church during the Nauvoo period. Joseph Smith became very interested in dancing, for under the date of January 1, 1844, he recorded the following in the History of the Church:

A large party took a new year's supper at my house, and had music and dancing till morning. (History of the Church, vol. 6, p. 155)

Dancing became so popular in Nauvoo that the Mormons were even dancing in the Nauvoo Temple prior to the dedication. The Mormon writer Truman G. Madsen stated:

... a group of the Saints met in the Nauvoo Temple. Part of the morning was spent in sweaty, gritty cleaning and painting. . . . Later, bathed and dressed in their temple robes, they participated in temple worship . . .

The group next adjourned to the upstairs rooms and relished a feast of raisins and cakes. And then, until late in the evening, they enjoyed music and dancing. What? The whole of life—even dancing—surrounded by a temple of God? Yes. And why not? (Dialogue: A Journal of Mormon Thought, Spring 1966, pp. 130-131)

Thus we see that the Mormon Church's stand on dancing has changed over the years. At first a member might have been excommunicated for dancing, but today it is one of the most popular entertainments in the church.

Changing Doctrines

Dr. Hugh Nibley, of the Brigham Young University, claims that the Mormon Church has not changed its doctrines in the last hundred years:

Yet of all churches in the world only this one has not found it necessary to readjust any part of its doctrine in the last hundred years. (No, Ma'am, That's Not History, a Brief Review of Mrs. Brodie's Reluctant Vindication of a Prophet She Seeks to Expose, by Hugh Nibley, p. 46)

It does not take much research to reveal the fact that Dr. Nibley is mistaken when he says that the Mormon Church has not changed its doctrine. Take for example the doctrine of plural marriage. John Taylor, who became the third President of the Mormon Church, once declared:

"... we are not ashamed here in this great metropolis of America *** to declare that we are polygamists. We are not ashamed to proclaim to this great nation, to rulers and people, to the president, senators, legislators, judges; to high and low, rich and poor, priests and people, that we are firm, conscientious believers in polygamy, and that it is part and parcel of our religious creed." (Life of John Taylor, p. 255)

Brigham Young, the second President of the Mormon Church, once stated: "The only men who become Gods, even the Sons of God, are those who enter into polygamy" (Journal of Discourses, vol. 11, p. 269).

Today the Mormon leaders teach that "plural marriage is not essential to salvation or exaltation" (Mormon Doctrine, 1958, p. 523). Bruce R. McConkie also stated that "any who pretend or assume to engage in plural marriage in this day, . . . are living in adultery, have already sold their souls to Satan and . . . will be damned in eternity" (Ibid., pp. 522-523).

Obviously, there has been a major doctrinal change regarding polygamy.

Rebaptism

Today the Mormon Church does not believe in rebaptism. President Joseph Fielding Smith stated:

It is unnecessary, however, to rebaptize persons merely as a renewal of their covenants every time they transgress in order that they may obtain forgiveness, for this would greatly cheapen this sacred ordinance and weaken its effectiveness. One baptism by water for the remission of sins should be enough, . . . (Doctrines of Salvation, vol. 3, p. 335)

As we examine the early history of the Mormon Church, however, we find that rebaptism was a very popular practice among the Mormons during the days of Joseph Smith and Brigham Young. In the Church Chronology, under the year 1856, the following is found: "A general reformation took place throughout the Church, most of the Saints renewing their covenants by baptism" (Church Chronology, by Andrew Jensen, p. 55).

The following testimony is found in the Temple Lot Case:

All the members of the church that came into Utah were instructed to be baptised under Brigham Young, . . .

After this, the church had another reformation, and under that we were baptized the second time and were baptized for the same thing . . . I do not know whether we had got out of Christ then or not." (Temple Lot Case, p. 341)

The Mormon Apostle Orson Pratt made this statement in 1875:

That seems to be a kind of standing ordinance for all Latter-day Saints who emigrate here, from the First Presidency down, all are rebaptized and set out anew by renewing their covenants. (Journal of Discourses, vol. 18, p. 160)

Brigham Young claimed that the practice of rebaptism was established by revelation: “At this time came a revelation, that the Saints could be baptized and rebaptized when they chose, and then that we could be baptized for our dear friends, . . .” (Journal of Discourses, vol. 18, p. 241).

August W. Lundstrom testified in the Reed Smoot Case that the Mormon Church discontinued the practice of rebaptism in 1898; he also gave this testimony:

Mr. VAN COTT. Just what was your point with Apostle Cowley about that ordinance of rebaptism? “Mr. Lundstrom. It was in regard to the discontinuance of rebaptizing, which previously had been customary, when cases came up and rebaptizing was requested by parties; and at that time we received instructions not to rebaptize any more. (Reed Smoot Case, vol. 2, p. 159)

Mr. LUNDSTROM. I found inconsistencies in the doctrine—changes being made. I had become a Mormon because I thought it was the only true religion. I was sincere as long as I believed it to be the true church and being revealed from God; but when I found changes creeping in—later revelations, as they were called, being open contradictions to former revelations—I began to study a little closer, and in fact I found a weak point in the wall, and when I touched it it became a large enough hole so that I could crawl through. The foundation was not solid, so I left it. My conviction that I had before fell through. Believing sincerely that it was the truth previously, I became just as well convinced after that it was not the truth. (Ibid., p. 154)

There are a number of different doctrines—for example, plural marriage, rebaptism and the law of adoption—which were so important in the early Mormon Church that God had to give revelations concerning them that were repudiated by later Mormon leaders. Contrary to Dr. Nibley’s statement, there are probably few churches that have made as many doctrinal changes as the Mormon Church.

Censorship

The Mormon leaders have made many important changes in the policies and doctrines of the church. Because they do not want their people to know that such changes take place, they sometimes alter the church records. An example of a change in policy that caused a number of changes in Mormon records is the attitude of the Mormon leaders toward the “Word of Wisdom.” The “Word of Wisdom” is a revelation given by Joseph Smith on February 27, 1833. It forbids the use of hot drinks, alcoholic beverages and tobacco. The Mormon writer John J. Stewart made this statement concerning the “Word of Wisdom”:

. . . no one can hold high office in the Church, on even the stake or ward level, nor participate in temple work, who is a known user of tea, coffee, liquor or tobacco. . . .

The Prophet himself carefully observed the Word of Wisdom, and insisted upon its observance by other men in high Church positions, although he seems to have been quite tolerant of others’ weakness in this regard. (Joseph Smith, The Mormon Prophet, Salt Lake City, 1966, p. 90)

In spite of this statement by John J. Stewart, Joseph Smith did not keep the “Word of Wisdom,” and at times he would even advise others to disobey it. In a thesis written at Brigham Young University, Gary Dean Guthrie gives the following information:

Joseph tested the Saints to make sure their testimonies were of his religion and not of him as a personable leader. Amasa Lyman, of the First Presidency, related: Joseph Smith tried the faith of the Saints many times by his peculiarities. At one time, he had preached a powerful sermon on the Word of Wisdom, and immediately thereafter, he rode through the streets of Nauvoo smoking a cigar. Some of the brethren were tried as was Abraham of old. (“Joseph Smith As An Administrator,” Master’s Thesis, Brigham Young University, May 1969, p. 161)

Mr. Guthrie’s source for this reference is the diary of the Mormon Apostle Abraham H. Cannon, vol. XIX, October 1, 1895. The original journal is now located in the Special Collections Dept. of the Brigham Young University Library, and photographs are on file at the Utah State Historical Society and the University of Utah Library.

Because of the importance that is now placed upon the “Word of Wisdom,” most members of the Mormon Church are shocked when they find out that Joseph Smith did not keep it. It is very surprising to learn that Joseph Smith, the man who introduced the temple ceremony into the Mormon Church, would not be able to go through the Temple if he were living today because of his frequent use of alcoholic beverages. In his history, Joseph Smith admitted several times that he drank wine, and under the date of June 1, 1844, he stated that he had “a glass of beer at Moessers.” The statement concerning the glass of beer was apparently very embarrassing to later Mormon leaders, for in recent editions of the History of the Church it has been deleted. When Joseph Smith’s statement was first published in the Latter-Day Saints’ Millennial Star, it read as follows:

Then went to John P. Greene’s, and paid him and another brother $200. Drank a glass of beer at Moessers. Called at William Clayton’s, . . . (Millennial Star, vol. 23, p. 720)

When this statement was reprinted in the History of the Church, seven words were deleted without any indication:

Then went to John P. Greene’s, and paid him and another brother $200. Called at William Clayton’s, . . . (History of the Church, vol. 6, p. 424)

Other important changes concerning the “Word of Wisdom” were made in Joseph Smith’s History. At one time Joseph Smith encouraged some “brethren” to break the “Word of Wisdom”:

It was reported to me that some of the brethren had been drinking whisky that day in violation of the Word of Wisdom.

I called the brethren in and investigated the case, and was satisfied that no evil had been done, and gave them a couple of dollars, with directions to replenish the bottle to stimulate them in the fatigues of their sleepless journey. (Millennial Star, vol. 21, p. 283)

When this was reprinted in the History of the Church, twenty-three words were deleted without any indication:

It was reported to me that some of the brethren had been drinking whisky that day in violation of the Word of Wisdom.

I called the brethren in and investigated the case, and was satisfied that no evil had been done. (History of the Church, vol. 5, p. 450)

Another important change was made in the History of the Church under the date of June 27, 1844—the day of Joseph Smith’s death. In the version that was first published, Joseph Smith recommended that the Apostle Willard Richards use a pipe and tobacco to settle his stomach:

Dr. Richards was taken sick, when Joseph said, “Brother Markham, as you have a pass from the Governor to go in and out of the jail, go and get the Doctor a pipe and some tobacco to settle his stomach,” and Markham went out for them. When he had got the pipe and tobacco and was returning to jail, . . . (Millennial Star, vol. 24, p. 471)

This has been changed to read:

Dr. Richards was taken sick, when Joseph said, “Brother Markham, as you have a pass from the Governor to go in and out of the jail, go and get the doctor something he needs to settle his stomach,” and Markham went out for medicine. When he had got the remedies desired, and was returning to jail, . . . (History of the Church, vol. 6, p. 614)

ment is based. That assumption may be true, but it is often false; and when neither logic nor the logician can determine which, then syllogising is mere building on the sand. Therefore it is well for us that the Lord does not arm the messenger of salvation with sophistry, but with truth, because those who have the truth and the ability to apply it can at once discern the specious falsehoods of dishonest claptrap, and send conviction and remorse into the hearts of those who thought to confound them. Witness the answers of Christ to the Scribes and Pharisees, and see also the admirable handling of Zeezrom, the lawyer, by Amulek (Book of Mormon, pars. 239-40).

Let no one suppose, however, that the mere profession of truth enables men to use this power. They must, as before stated, have the ability to apply it. Now, the Lord's mode of imparting this ability is through the gift of the Holy Ghost; and the Holy Ghost leads men into truth without the noise and clamour of debate, wherein men generally lose the very truths they are debating about, and get the spirit of the Devil, which causes them to hate and often to destroy each other. If the Saints would testify with power, or the Priesthood preach with effect, they must be earnest in their work, and so live that the good Spirit will dictate them continually.

HISTORY OF JOSEPH SMITH.

A Presidential election was recently held on board the Osprey, and the result was as follows:—

Joseph Smith,	65 gentlemen,	and 6 ladies.

Friday, 31.—“State of Illinois, } ss.

May 31, 1844.

Then and there personally appeared before me, Joseph Smith, Mayor of the City of Nauvoo, the undersigned H. T. Hugins, of Burlington, Iowa Territory, and made solemn oath that Thomas B. Johnson did, on the 30th day of May, 1844, declare in his presence that he intended to bring dragoons and troops of the United States from Iowa Territory into this city, for the purpose of resisting the authority and power of the Municipal Court of said city, and that he should disregard entirely the authority of said court, and that he deemed the authority of said court of no effect. Deponent further states that said Johnson, in his said conversation, had reference to the case of Jeremiah Smith, which had been decided by said court.

H. T. HUGINS.

Subscribed and sworn to before me, this 31st day of May, 1844,

WM. W. PHELPS, Clerk M. C.”

Upon the foregoing affidavit, I issued a capias to arrest T. B. Johnson for threatening the peace of the city with United States dragoons. At 10 a.m., called at my office. At 1 p.m., called to see sister Richards, who was sick. I administered to her the laying on of hands, when she felt better. Afternoon, I attended General Council, when brother Emmett made his report. Rode out in the evening to Van Orden's, and paid him $100. Two or three Indians staid in the hall all night.

Saturday, June 1. At home. Some gentle showers.

At one, p.m., I rode out with Dr. Richards and O. P. Rockwell. Called on Davis at the Boat. Paid Manhard $90. Met George J. Adams, and paid him $50. Then went to John P. Greene's, and paid him and another brother $200. Drank a glass of beer at Moessers. Called at William Clayton's, while Dr. Richards and O. P. Rockwell called at the Doctor's new house. Returned home at 4½ p.m.

At 8 p.m., Peter Maughan, John Saunders, and Jacob Peart called at Dr. Richards' to consult about a coal-bed on Rock River. I suggested that it would be profitable to employ the Maid of Iowa in the business of carrying the coal, &c.; and all approved of this plan.

President B. Young and Elder John E. Page held a Conference in Pittsburgh.

President Brigham Young and Elder John E. Page held a conference in Pittsburg.

I received the following letter:—

Joel H. Walker to Joseph Smith—Proposes to Join Prophet in Western Volunteer Movement.

BOSTON, May 9th, 1844.

MY DEAR SIR.—Being so closely confined in the postoffice in this city, where I have been but a short time, I have not, before this morning been aware that you had petitioned Congress in relation to raising a military force to protect our Southern Frontier.

My purpose in addressing you is to offer my services, either in military or civil duty, as I am so much confined that my health must suffer if I remain a great length of time.

If I can make myself known to you by reputation which I think possible, I have every confidence, if in your power, you will favor my wishes.

At any rate, I hope you will write me at your earliest convenience upon receipt of this.

The reader will notice that the Mormon historians tried to make it appear that Joseph Smith was recommending “medicine” rather than “a pipe and some tobacco.”

It would appear from the reference as it was first published that the Apostle Richards was accustomed to the use of tobacco, for tobacco would certainly not settle the stomach unless a person was accustomed to its use. The Apostle Richards apparently never overcame his desire for tobacco, for Claire Noall related the following: “While his father lay ill during the last weeks of his life, Heber John used to light his pipe at the hearth and take it to him. He told this story to his daughter, Rhoda Richards Stevenson. She repeated the story to me” (Intimate Disciple, A Portrait of Willard Richards, Salt Lake City, 1957, p. 620).

At any rate, recent Mormon leaders have been very embarrassed about the early leaders’ disregard for the “Word of Wisdom,” and they have made several important changes in the History of the Church and other publications to cover up this change in policy. The Mormon Apostle John A. Widtsoe, however, claimed that they did not try to cover up anything in Joseph Smith’s History:

The Prophet and the Church stand in this history free of historical interpretations and other external trappings. There are no arguments for its case. There are no attempts to “cover over” any event. (Evidences and Reconciliations, 3 volumes in 1, Salt Lake City, 1961, p. 332)

It does not take much research to show that this statement is completely false. At one time we made a study of the changes in the History of the Church and estimated that more than 17,000 words had been added and over 45,000 deleted from the time the history was first printed. We now have evidence to show that many important changes were made even before the history was first printed. These changes were made after Joseph Smith’s death. In other words, the Mormon historians altered Joseph Smith’s words before the first publication of his history appeared. If any legal document had been changed in the same way that the History of the Church has, someone would be in serious trouble. We will deal with the changes in Joseph Smith’s History of the Church at greater length in Chapter 7.

Changing an Article of Faith

It is very interesting to note that even Joseph Smith’s fourth “Article of Faith” had to be changed. In this article Joseph Smith taught that there were only four things required for salvation—i.e., Faith in the Lord, Repentance, Baptism and Laying on of hands for the gift of the Holy Ghost. This article was not changed until many years after Joseph Smith’s death. Later Mormon historians could see that Joseph Smith had failed to mention Temple Work (Temple Work is taught to be essential for the highest exaltation in the Celestial Kingdom), so they altered Joseph Smith’s words to read that Faith, Repentance, Baptism and Laying on of hands for the gift of the Holy Ghost are only the “first principles and ordinances of the gospel.”

The fourth Article of Faith originally read as follows:

We believe that these ordinances are: 1st, Faith in the Lord Jesus Christ; 2d, Repentance; 3d, Baptism by immersion for the remission of sins; 4th, Laying on of hands for the gift of the Holy Ghost. (Pearl of Great Price, 1851 edition, p. 55)

In modern editions of the Pearl of Great Price this Article of Faith has been changed to read as follows:

4. We believe that the first principles and ordinances of the gospel are: first, Faith in the Lord Jesus Christ; second, Repentance; third, Baptism by immersion for the remission of sins; fourth, Laying on of hands for the gift of the Holy Ghost. (Pearl of Great Price, 1955 edition, p. 60)

Key to Theology

In the year 1855 the Mormon Apostle Parley P. Pratt published a book entitled Key to the Science of Theology. Two years later Parley P. Pratt was “assassinated” at Van Buren, Arkansas. The church, however, has continued to reprint his book. In 1965, the Deseret Book Co., which is owned by the Mormon Church, printed the “Ninth Edition.” We have compared the 1965 reprint with the original 1855 edition and have found that many important changes have been made. Some of the most important changes are concerning the doctrine of polygamy. In the original 1855 edition we find the following:

This is heaven’s eternal law, as revealed to the ancients of all ages, who held the keys of eternal priesthood, after the order of the Son of God; and, as restored with the priesthood of the Saints of this age.

Again, it was a law of the ancient Priesthood, and is again restored, that a man who is faithful in all things, may, by the word of the Lord, through the administration of one holding the keys to bind on earth and heaven, receive and secure to himself, for time and all eternity, more than one wife.

Thus did Abraham, Isaac, Jacob, Moses, the Patriarchs and Prophets of old.

The principal object contemplated by this law, is the multiplication of the children of good and worthy fathers, who will teach them the truth, and train them in the holy principles of salvation. This is far preferable to sending them into the world in the lineage of an unworthy or ignorant parentage, to be educated in error, folly, ignorance and crime.

The peculiar characteristics of the blessings included in the Everlasting Covenant made with Abraham, Isaac, Jacob and their lineage, was the multiplicity of their seed; and the perpetuity of the royal, priestly and kingly power in their lineage.

To assist in carrying out and fulfilling this covenant, good and virtuous women were given to their faithful Prophets, rulers, and wise and virtuous men; and, as it was said of the four wives of Jacob, “These did build the house of Israel.”

While peculiar blessings and encouragements were given to a good and faithful man, and to his wives and children; while they were honoured of God, and respected by all who knew them; while the father of a hundred children was had in greater honour than the hero of a hundred battles, adultery, fornication, and all unlawful intercourse was strictly prohibited, and even punished by the strictest laws—the penalty of which was death.

A daughter of Israel, who, by prostitution, was rendered unworthy, or unqualified for the duties of a virtuous wife and mother, was considered unfit to live. While the male who would thus trifle with the fountain of life, and contribute to render a female unworthy to answer the end of her creation, was also condemned to death.

Strict laws were also given and diligently taught to both sexes, regulating the intercourse between husband and wife. (Key to the Science of Theology, 1855, pp. 163-164)

In the 1965 edition, page 164, three hundred and forty-one words have been deleted without any indication:

This is heaven’s eternal law, as revealed to the ancients of all ages, who held the keys of eternal priesthood, after the order of the Son of God; and, as restored with the priesthood of the Saints of this age.

Strict laws were also given and diligently taught to both sexes, regulating the intercourse between husband and wife.

Hundreds of other words concerning the doctrine of polygamy have also been deleted without any indication. Many of Parley P. Pratt’s statements concerning the Godhead were changed or deleted without any indication. (For more information concerning this matter see our Case Against Mormonism, vol. 1, pp. 39-43)

It is very obvious that the changes in Parley P. Pratt’s book were deliberate falsifications, yet the Mormon leaders are not willing to admit that changes have been made. In a letter dated May 11, 1966, the Mormon Apostle LeGrand Richards stated: “. . . I know that the Church is true, and that the original doctrines as they were revealed from heaven have not been changed . . .” On pages 61 and 62 of his booklet, No, Ma'am, That's Not History, Dr. Nibley stated: “The gospel as the Mormons know it sprang full-grown from the words of Joseph Smith. It has never been worked over or touched up in any way, and is free of revisions and alterations.”

These statements by Dr. Nibley and LeGrand Richards are, of course, completely untrue. The Mormon leaders not only change the doctrines of the church, but they also change their books to make it appear that no doctrinal changes have been made. The changes in the Key to Theology were made many years after the Apostle Parley P. Pratt's death. An edition was published in 1883 (26 years after his death). We compared the 1883 edition with the original 1855 edition at the places where major changes were later made. In every instance the 1883 edition agreed with the first edition. This proves that the changes were made at least 26 years after Parley P. Pratt's death!

These changes cannot be explained away as “typographical errors” or accidental omissions. It is very evident that they were deliberate and premeditated. It is absolutely impossible to believe that every word concerning polygamy would accidentally be omitted from the reprint of this book. Thus we see that censorship is a very important thing in the Mormon Church. It is apparently felt that more converts can be won to the church with a bogus history than with a true, factual one.

Journal of Discourses

Heber C. Kimball apparently objected to the censorship of his sermons, but Brigham Young was converted to the idea of censorship. He once stated:

Brother Heber says that the music is taken out of his sermons when brother Carrington clips out a word here and there: and I have taken out the music from mine, . . .

I know that I have seen the day when, let men use language like brother Heber has to day, and many would apostatize from the true faith. In printing my remarks, I often omit the sharp words, . . . (Journal of Discourses, vol. 5, p. 99)

After being censored, the sermons of the Mormon leaders were printed in the Deseret News. Later they were changed again and printed in the Journal of Discourses. But even after all of this censorship, many of these sermons are almost unbelievably crude and filled with doctrines which the Mormon leaders no longer teach.

The Mormon Apostle John A. Widtsoe made this statement concerning the Journal of Discourses:

. . . Brigham Young secured stenographic reports of his addresses. As he traveled among the people, reporters accompanied him. All that he said was recorded. Practically all of these discourses (from December 16, 1851, to August 19, 1877) were published in the Journal of Discourses, which was widely distributed. The public utterances of few great historical figures have been so faithfully and fully preserved. (Discourses of Brigham Young, by John A. Widtsoe, Preface vi)

Although the Apostle John A. Widtsoe claimed that the sermons of Brigham Young were “faithfully” preserved in the Journal of Discourses, when he reprinted them in his book Discourses of Brigham Young he made some important changes. For instance, in one sermon Brigham Young made some very unpatriotic remarks:

. . . I ask, had we not reason to feel that our enemies were in the ascendant? That even the government, by their silent acquiescence, were also in favor of our destruction? (Journal of Discourses, vol. 2, p. 173)

When the Apostle Widtsoe reprinted this reference twelve words were deleted without any indication:

. . . I ask, had we not reason to feel that our enemies were also in favor of our destruction? (Discourses of Brigham Young, Salt Lake City, 1954, p. 478)

In a sermon delivered April 6, 1853, Brigham Young admitted that he was not a visionary man or given to prophecy:

Wait patiently, brethren, until it is done, and put forth your hands willingly to finish it. I know what it will be. I am not a visionary man, neither am I given to prophesying. When I want any of that done I call on Brother Heber—He is my prophet, he loves to prophesy, and I love to hear him. I scarcely ever say much about revelations, or visions, . . . (Journal of Discourses, vol. 1, pp. 132-133)

In reprinting this quotation the Mormon Apostle John A. Widtsoe deleted thirty-nine words without any indication:

Wait patiently, brethren, until it is done, and put forth yours hands willingly to finish it. I know what it will be. I scarcely ever say much about revelations, or visions, . . . (Discourses of Brigham Young, p. 410)

As we have already shown, in one sermon Brigham Young taught that the principle of rebaptism was established by revelation:

At this time came a revelation, that the Saints could be baptized and re-baptized when they chose, and then that we could be baptized for our dear friends, . . . (Journal of Discourses, vol. 18, p. 241)

The doctrine of rebaptism was entirely deleted when John A. Widtsoe republished this statement:

At this time [1840] came a revelation that we could be baptized for our dear friends, . . . (Discourses of Brigham Young, p. 462)

Other changes have been made which we will not mention here (for a more thorough treatment of this matter see our Case Against Mormonism, vol. 1, pp. 43-48). All of these changes have been made in spite of the fact that in the preface to the Discourses of Brigham Young it is claimed that no liberties have been taken with the words of Brigham Young:

No liberties have been taken, in this book, with the words of Brigham Young. In a few instances, errors in language or spelling, which should have been caught by the printer, have been corrected. (Discourses of Brigham Young, Preface, p. vii)

Lucy Smith's Book

In the October, 1845, conference of the church, Joseph Smith's mother, Lucy Smith, “gave notice that she had written her history, and wished it printed before we leave this place” (Times and Seasons, vol. 6, p. 1014). The book was finally printed in 1853 by the Apostle Orson Pratt under the title Biographical Sketches of Joseph Smith the Prophet, and His Progenitors for Many Generations. At first the Mormon newspaper Deseret News recommended that this book “should be possessed by all Saints who feel in the least degree interested with the history of the latter day work” (The Deseret News, November 16, 1854). By the year 1865, however, Brigham Young told members of the Mormon Church that he wanted Lucy Smith's history to be suppressed. In the Latter-Day Saints' Millennium Star for October 21, 1865, Lucy Smith's history was severely condemned by the First Presidency of the Church:

Happening lately, while on a preaching trip . . . to pick up a book which was lying on a table . . . we were surprised to find that it was the book . . . by Lucy Smith, . . . Our surprise at finding a copy of this work may be accounted for, by the fact of our having advertized some time ago that the book was incorrect, and that it should be gathered up and destroyed, so that no copies should be left; . . . In Great Britain diligence has been used in collecting and in disposing of this work, and we wish that same diligence continued there and also exercised here at home until not a copy is left. . . . We could go through the book and point out many false statements . . . but we do not feel to do so. It is sufficient to say that it is utterly unreliable as a history, as it contains many falsehoods and mistakes . . . we, therefore, expect every one in the Church, male and female, if they have such a book, to dispose of it so that it will never be read by any person again. . . . those who have been instructed respecting its character, and will still keep it on their tables, and have it in their houses as a valid and authentic history for their children to read, need rebuke. It is transmitting lies to posterity to take such a course, and we know that the curse of God will rest upon every one, after he comes to the knowledge of what is here said who keeps these books for his children to learn and believe in lies (Millennial Star, vol. 27, pp. 657-658).

The Mormon leaders talked as if Orson Pratt had made a very serious mistake in publishing the book as Mrs. Smith had written it. About 10 or 11 years after Lucy Smith's death the Mormon leaders decided to revise her book. Joseph F. Smith stated:

. . . it was disapproved by President Young on August 23, 1865, and the edition was suppressed or destroyed. While some statements contained in the work were considered somewhat overdrawn . . . its many merits were fully recognized by the authorities, many of whom were greatly disappointed at the necessity of issuing the order to temporarily suppress its further circulation.

Subsequently, a committee of revision was appointed by President Young consisting of President George A. Smith and Judge Elias Smith, cousins of the Prophet, men personally familiar with the family and thoroughly conversant with Church history. They were instructed carefully to revise and correct the original work throughout, which they did, reporting their labors to President Young to his entire satisfaction. (History of Joseph Smith by His Mother, 1954 edition, Introduction)

When Brigham Young told the "committee of revision" to "revise and correct" this book, he did not mean to put in footnotes where there were errors—as any honest historian would do—but rather to make actual changes in the text.

In comparing the first edition of Lucy Smith's history— i.e., the edition Brigham Young tried to destroy—with the edition printed in 1954, we have found that 436 words have been added, 1,379 words deleted and 220 words have been changed. This is a total of 2,035 words added, deleted or changed without any indication. In addition, 736 words have been deleted with the omissions properly indicated.

On page 225 of the first edition of Lucy Smith's book we find the following:

HERE I shall introduce a brief history of our troubles in Missouri, given by my son Hyrum, before the Municipal Court, at Nauvoo, June 30, 1843, when Joseph was tried for treason against the state of Missouri:-

In the 1954 reprint (p. 259) this has been changed to read:

HERE I shall introduce a brief history of our troubles in Missouri, given by my son Hyrum, when Joseph was before the Municipal Court, at Nauvoo, June 30, 1843, on a writ of Habeas Corpus:

Photographic proof of a number of important changes in Lucy Smith's book can be found in our Case, vol. 1, pp. 60-63.

Book-Burning

For many years the Mormon Church has encouraged the destruction of publications that are critical of Joseph Smith or the church. The Deseret News (the Mormon paper published in Salt Lake City) carried a disgraceful article in 1953, in which the following statement appeared:

Good-natured Sven A. Wiman can manage a cautious grin when his married daughter relates in English, and which he can understand pretty well, how when he returned home each evening from his part-time employment in various used book stores throughout Sweden he would produce an anti-Mormon book and then proceed to burn it. Sweden, you learn, has literally no end of anti-Church books, and

Elder Wiman set himself up as a one-man cleanup committee to destroy as many of these diatribes against the Church as possible. (Deseret News, Church Section, May 16, 1953, p. 10)

This article gives the impression that book-burning is a good activity to be engaged in if it is directed against books critical of the church.

In 1965 we were visited by a student from Brigham Young University who had recently completed a mission for the Mormon Church in Texas. He related that while on his mission he was instructed to see that books critical of the Mormon Church were removed from libraries. He said that he was instructed to take a set of new Mormon books—furnished by the church—to each library and offer them in exchange for their old books dealing with the church. In this way he was able to trick the librarian into giving him the older books which were critical of the church. He said that the method was very effective in Texas, and that many of the books critical of the church were removed from the libraries by this method. That such a project was actually carried out by some Mormon missionaries has now been verified by the Mormon writer Samuel W. Taylor. He stated:

. . . I wonder how many good-will tours by the Tabernacle Choir would be required to repair the damage done to the Mormon image when Playboy, with its enormous circulation and impact on young people, published the fact that Mormon missionaries were engaged in a campaign of book-burning? The item was a letter from a librarian of Northampton, Mass., Lawrence Wikander, published first in the American Library Association's Newsletter on Intellectual Freedom, May, 1963, and subsequently reprinted in Playboy. Wikander told of two Elders arriving at his library to inspect the index of Mormon material. They offered a list of "more up-to-date material" and after delivering it made the following proposition:

Now that we had these books which told the truth about their religion, undoubtedly we would like to discard other books in the library which told lies about the Mormon Church. Other libraries, they said, had been glad to have this pointed out to them.

Following the expose in Playboy a friend of mine tried to find out how extensive the missionary book-burning campaign had been. A number of returned missionaries from both domestic and foreign missions admitted that they had participated in it; but data as to when and how and by whom the project had been originated was, understandably, unavailable.

Self-appointed Comstocks among us have for years been dedicated to the unholy quest of seeking out and destroying books considered unfavorable . . . My brother Raymond was approached by a zealot offering a number of rare Mormon books bearing library stamps; the devout saint blandly admitted stealing them to protect the public, but said he was sure that Raymond, with his background of research and firm testimony, would not be harmed. (Dialogue: A Journal of Mormon Thought, Summer 1967, p. 26)

Suppressing the Records

Because of the fact that many church policies and doctrines have changed, and because many changes were made in the vital records of the church before they were published, it has become necessary for the Mormon leaders to hide these records from members of the church.

In the preface to the book A New Witness For Christ In America, vol. 2, the Apostle John A. Widtsoe stated: "The best place to obtain information for and against the Church is the Library of the Church Historian." In April of 1961 we decided to put this statement to the test. We wrote to approximately twenty of the authorities in the Mormon Church, asking for permission to have some of this information. The following is a copy of the letter which we sent to each of them:

Dear Mr. _____,

The Apostle John A. Widtsoe once stated, "The best place to obtain information for and against the Church is the Library of the Church Historian.” (A New Witness For Christ in America, Preface, p. vii.)

We are writing a book and we need some of this information. As we know that the Church makes microfilms, we would like the following things microfilmed.

1. Joseph Smith’s history of the church in the original handwritten form.

2. All of Joseph Smith’s journals.

3. The Far West Record.

4. The original handwritten manuscript of the Book of Mormon.

Enclosed is ten dollars for this work. We are sending this same letter to several other authorities in the church. Therefore, there should be enough money to cover the cost of this work.

If there is any possible reason why we cannot obtain microfilm copies, can we come to the Historians Office and examine these manuscripts?

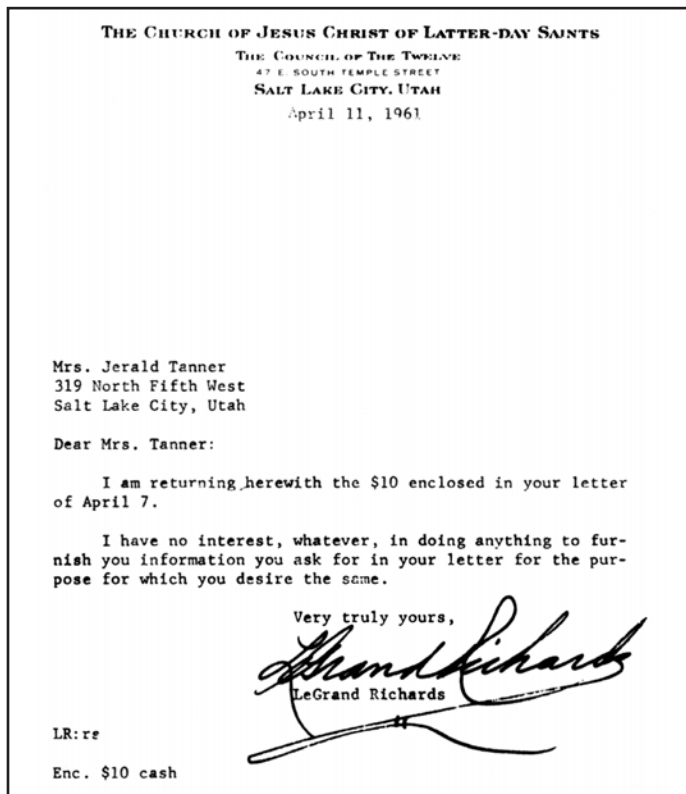

Sincerely,

Mrs. Jerald Tanner

The answers received concerning this request were very evasive. The first request, as to whether we could obtain microfilms of these documents, was denied. The second request, as to whether we could go to the Historian’s Office and examine the manuscripts, was simply ignored.

The letter addressed to Apostle Howard W. Hunter was answered by Claude B. Petersen, Secretary to the Council of the Twelve. In the letter he stated: “We are returning the ten dollars which was enclosed with your letter. The microfilms which you request are not available.”

The Mormon Apostle LeGrand Richards very bluntly stated that he had no desire to help us.

The letter addressed to David O. McKay, the ninth President of the Mormon Church, was answered by A. Hamer Reiser, Assistant Secretary to the First Presidency. In this letter he stated:

I have been directed to say that since the Church Historian has already refused the use of the private journals listed in your letter, this being his prerogative, his action is approved and the request is denied.

J. Reuben Clark’s letter was answered by his secretary. In the answer she stated:

President Clark has directed me to return to you herewith the ten dollars you sent him, and to suggest that if you so desire, you might wish to write directly to the Church Historian’s Office for the information you request.

After reading J. Reuben Clark’s suggestion, we decided to present the request directly to the Historian’s Office. We wrote to Joseph Fielding Smith, who was the Church Historian at the time and who recently became the tenth President of the Church.

In our Case, vol. 1, pages 68-76 we have published photographs of 17 letters from the authorities of the Mormon Church. From these letters it is obvious that Apostle John A. Widtsoe’s statement, “The best place to obtain information for and against the Church is the Library of the Church Historian,” was completely false.

Dr. Nibley Refused

One good example of the suppression of early Mormon documents is the story of the Alexander Neibaur journal. Hugh Nibley, professor in the departments of history and religion at the Brigham Young University, mentioned this journal in his book, The World and the Prophets, and in a letter dated March 8, 1961, he gave us the following information concerning it:

The day my great-grandfather heard that remarkable account of the First Vision from Joseph Smith he wrote it down in his journal; and for 40 years after he never mentioned it to a soul. Therefore, when I came across the story unexpectedly I handed the book over to Joseph Fielding Smith and it is now where it belongs—in a safe.

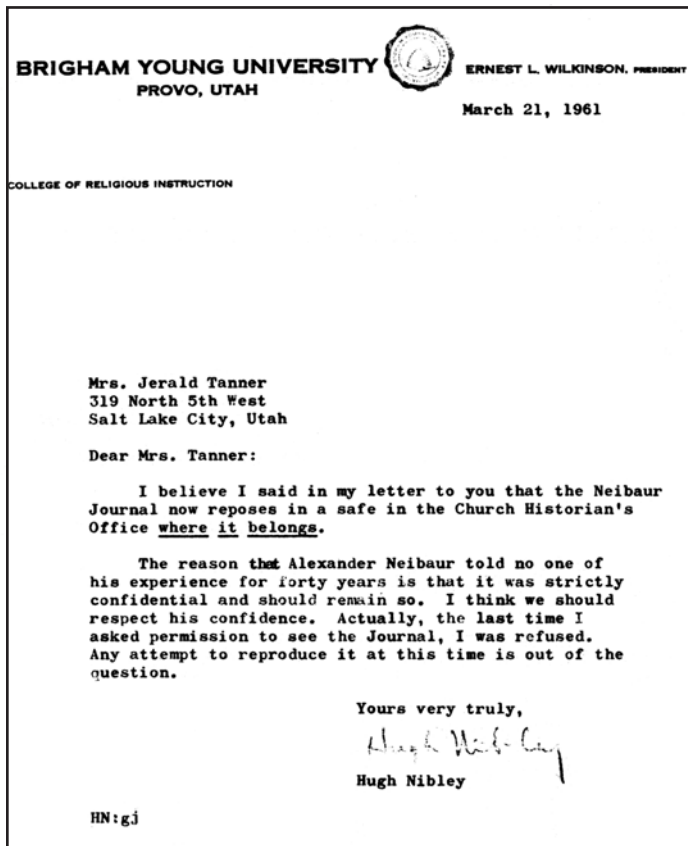

Upon learning that this journal was in the possession of the LDS Church Historian, we wrote and requested a copy of it. Joseph Fielding Smith replied as follows:

Private journals are filed in this office with the understanding that they will be available to members of the family, but not to the general public. The furnishing of copies of journals also follows this ruling.

I am sorry but this office is not in a position to furnish you with the microfilm or photograph of the Alexander Neibaur journal which you requested in your letter. The ten dollars you enclosed is herewith returned.

Two things should be noted about Joseph Fielding Smith’s reply: First, he refused to make a copy of the journal. Second, he stated that journals were placed in the Historian’s Office with the understanding that relatives could not only see, but also obtain copies of the journals. Strange as it may seem, however, on March 21, 1961, we received a letter from Hugh Nibley in which he stated that even he was refused permission to see this journal.

It is strange indeed that Dr. Nibley would be denied permission to see his own great-grandfather's journal, especially since he was the one that donated it to the Historian's Office. If Dr. Nibley were an enemy to the church, this would be easier to understand. Many within the church, however, feel that he is the church's greatest scholar. Louis Midgley says that "Nibley more than anyone else has assumed the role of defender of the Faith and the Saints" (Dialogue: A Journal of Mormon Thought, Spring 1967, p. 119). It is certainly strange that a man who has a reputation as the "defender of the Faith and the Saints" should be denied access to his own great-grandfather's journal. Perhaps Dr. Nibley was disturbed over this matter, for in a letter to us, dated June 20, 1961, he stated: "Nothing would delight me more than to see all the Church records made available to those who would know how to use them" (Letter from Hugh Nibley, dated June 20, 1961).

Apostles' Threats

Another instance of suppression occurred when we desired access to the Joseph Lee Robinson autobiography and journal. The Apostle LeGrand Richards, a descendent of Joseph Lee Robinson, was the first to draw our attention to this journal. When we went to his office he showed us some typed excerpts from the journal. We asked to see the original journal. LeGrand Richards took us to the LDS Genealogical Library, where he checked out the microfilm of the original journal. We were allowed to read a few pages and then Mr. Richards rose to leave. We asked the woman who had brought the microfilm if we could return another time and read the journal; when she said yes, Mr. Richards promptly and emphatically instructed her not to let us see the journal again. When we asked LeGrand Richards what he was trying to hide, he immediately walked out. On several occasions we tried to see this microfilm, but we were informed that it was "out." The Church Historian's Office also refused to let us see the original journal. In a letter to a member of the church, dated September 26, 1960, Apostle Richards admitted that he had denied us access to this journal. He stated: "I took Sandra and her husband to the Genealogical society where they got out the microfilmed copy of my great grandfather's journal and permitted them both to read his statement in his own handwriting and after they had done that, Sandra's husband wanted to have the privilege of reading all of the journal. I told them not to permit him to do so; . . ."

Some time later, contrary to the instructions of LeGrand Richards, the Genealogical Library permitted us to read the journal, and we copied some important extracts, which we intend to present in this work. After LeGrand Richards found out that we intended to use these references, he became fearful that the truth would become known. In a letter dated December 20, 1961, the Apostle Richards threatened us with a law suit, in a desperate attempt to keep the truth hid.

Since the Apostle Richards did not really have a case against us, we have continued to use extracts from this journal for the last ten years. Needless to say, no suit has been filed against us.

LeGrand Richards is not the only Apostle who has threatened to sue us. Wallace Turner, a correspondent for the New York Times, relates the following:

One of the remarkable statements demonstrating this prejudice is in a long speech by Mark E. Petersen, one of the apostles, in a conference at Brigham Young University in August, 1954. . . . A convention of LDS teachers of religion at the college level was called together and Apostle Petersen spoke to them on "Race Relations—as They Affect the Church." . . .

Petersen is the fifth-ranking member of the Council of Twelve Apostles . . .

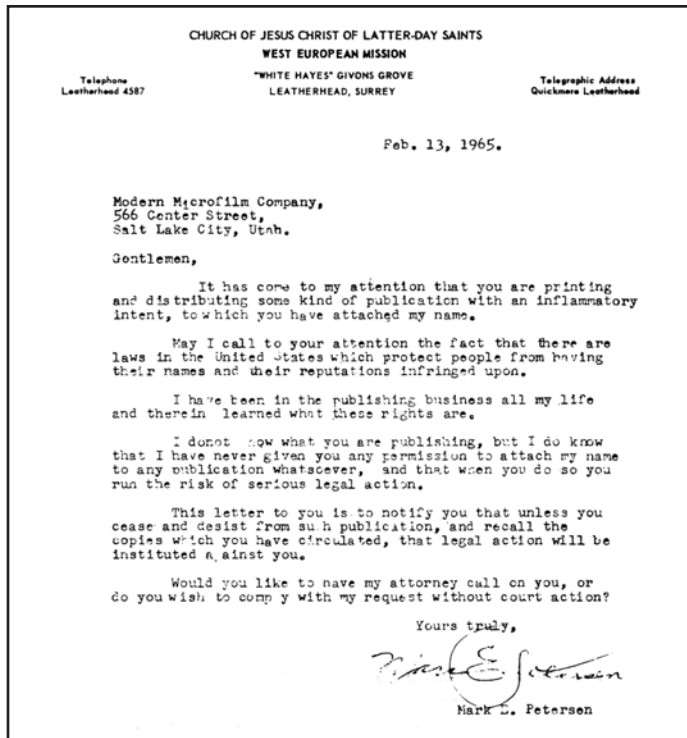

This speech was delivered in a closed meeting. A copy of it came into the hands of James D. Wardle, the Salt Lake City barber who is a member of the Reorganized LDS Church. Wardle has enjoyed many years of baiting his Utah Mormon townsmen, and made his copy available to Jerald Tanner the LDS apostate who specializes in circulating anti-LDS materials. Tanner went to the LDS library, found a copy of the speech and assured himself that it was the same speech he had received from Wardle. But the church would not give him a copy he could take away with him.

Using the Wardle copy as his source, Tanner began to circulate the address. At that time Apostle Petersen was in England leading the mission there. In early 1965 he wrote to Tanner threatening to sue him if he did not stop publication and recall the previously issued copies of the speech. Tanner gleefully reproduced and circulated the letter. Since then Petersen has returned to Salt Lake City and no suit has been filed. (The Mormon Establishment, pp. 249, 250, 253, 254)

Below is a photograph of the letter which we received from the Apostle Mark E. Petersen.

As Wallace Turner stated, we reproduced the Apostle Petersen's letter (together with the letter written by the Apostle Richards) and distributed thousands of copies. Many of them were distributed at the conference of the Mormon Church. Mark E. Petersen had returned from Europe to attend this conference. Although conference is held only fourteen blocks from Modern Microfilm Co., neither Mr. Petersen nor his attorney called upon us. Since we had printed nothing but the truth, the Apostle Petersen did not have any case against us. It is interesting to note that even though the Mormon leaders tried to suppress this speech, a portion of it ended up in the New York Times on December 28, 1965. We will quote from this speech in Chapter 21.

Mormons Protest Suppression

Juanita Brooks, a noted historian who is a member of the Mormon Church, claims that the church leaders refused to let her see some affidavits that they had in their possession. In a footnote on page 217 of her book, The Mountain Meadows Massacre, she stated:

Some time before his death, the late Judge David H. Morris, of St. George, Utah, told the writer of affidavits which he had taken at the order of the First Presidency of the Church from the participants in the massacre who still lived in southern Utah. . . .

After his death, the writer asked his daughter, Mrs. Paul Hafen, about them and learned that . . . she had taken the affidavits to Salt Lake City and given them to David O. McKay of the first presidency of the Latter-day Saints church.

After two unsuccessful attempts to get an interview with President McKay, the writer made an appointment by long distance telephone. After traveling more than three hundred miles to keep that appointment, she was refused audience as soon as the office girl learned "specifically what is it you wish to speak to him about?"

The writer then asked for another appointment, offering to stay in the city indefinitely, if necessary. This was refused. She was, however, permitted to talk to Mr. Joseph Anderson, private secretary to the first presidency, who listened to her request and promised to do what he could for her. He asked her to return the next morning.

At that time, Mr. Anderson said that he and President J. Rueben Clark had read the affidavits and President Clark had decided that they should not be made available. The large, worn envelope which contained them and the telegram authorizing them lay on the table during this conversation. The most difficult thing to understand about all this is not so much the refusal to show the affidavits as the consistent and repeated refusal to discuss the question. (The Mountain Meadows Massacre, 1962, pp. 217-218, footnote)

Some people claim that the reason we have been denied access to the records is that we have been critical of the doctrines and teachings of the LDS Church. While this may have something to do with it, it is obviously not the entire reason. A Mormon Seminary teacher told us not to feel bad because Mormon writers were having the same problems. During the last few years even Mormon writers have begun to raise their voices against the suppression of the documents. For instance, in 1966 Leonard J. Arrington, President of the Mormon History Association, stated:

It is unfortunate for the cause of Mormon history that the Church Historian's Library, which is in the possession of virtually all of the diaries of leading Mormons, has not seen fit to publish these diaries or to permit qualified historians to use them without restriction. (Dialogue: A Journal of Mormon Thought, Spring 1966, vol. 1, no. 1, p. 26)

Ralph W. Hansen, formerly Manuscript Librarian for the Brigham Young University, also complained of "the relative inaccessibility to scholars of the files of the Church Historian's Office, . . ." (Ibid., p. 157).

During the past ten years we have exerted a great deal of pressure on the church to discontinue the practice of suppressing the records. This has placed the Mormon leaders in a very embarrassing position. Many people would be inclined to agree with Philip A. M. Taylor's observation that "secrecy does more harm to the Church's reputation than could result from any disclosures from the archives, . . ." (Dialogue: A Journal of Mormon Thought, Autumn 1966, p. 110).

The fact that many Mormons are joining with us in criticizing the Church Historian's Office could force the Mormon leaders to adopt a more honest and open policy with regard to the church records. For more information concerning this matter see our Case Against Mormonism, vol. 1, pp. 67-86.

Mormonism Continues to Change

On page 5 of this book we demonstrate that the Mormon Church completely changed its teaching concerning polygamy. We quoted President Brigham Young as saying: “The only men who become Gods, even the Sons of God, are those who enter into polygamy” (Journal of Discourses, vol. 11, p. 269). President John Taylor said: “. . . we are not ashamed . . . to declare . . . that we are firm, conscientious believers in polygamy, and that it is part and parcel of our religious creed” (Life of John Taylor, p. 255). The fact that the Mormons have completely disregarded this “doctrine” is evident from a statement made by Assistant Church Historian Davis Bitton: “Today probably no modern people is more antipolygamist than the orthodox Mormons, . . .” (Journal of Mormon History, vol. 4, 1977, p. 101).

As we mentioned in the Preface, after we published the 1972 edition of this book, the Mormon leaders changed another important doctrine. This is the notorious anti-black doctrine which denied the priesthood to all who had “one drop of Negro blood.” (For more information concerning this matter see the updated material in Chapter 21.)

Removing Critical Material From Libraries

On page 10 of this book we printed information showing that Mormon missionaries were engaged in a plan to remove material critical of the church from various libraries. In 1978 Ed Sanders, of Harding College, reported that this activity was still going on:

Recently, two young Mormon “elders” visited the Beaumont Memorial Library at Harding College . . . After something like a half hour, they approached the check-out desk with a number of books in their hands. They told the librarian they would like to take these volumes, which were “quite old and not in the best of condition,” and replace them with newer editions. Fortunately, the college librarians are professionals, and consequently, were more than a little suspicious. A call was placed to the Bible Department to confirm that it would be best to keep the books already in the library collection. The Bible Department spokesman was emphatic that these books were not to be allowed to be “replaced.” In fact, it was decided that they were to be added to the collection of rare and valuable books which are kept in a secure area of the library.

You have probably guessed already that what the young men were doing is part of a nationwide pattern. Mormon missionaries are visiting libraries all over the country, taking old books and offering to replace them with new volumes. Of course, what they are actually doing is removing from public access many counter-Mormon books, and earlier Mormon writings which now prove embarrassing to the Latter Day Saint movement.

Some librarians will undoubtedly be gullible enough to trade old volumes for newer editions, or even different publications, unless they are made aware of what is occurring. Tell your local librarian so that she may be properly alert to the public interest. (Alternative, vol. IV, no. 3, 1978, p. 15)

Battle Over Suppression of Records Continues

On page 13 of this book we indicated that the pressures we exerted against the suppression of Mormon records were beginning to have a real effect and that “even Mormon writers have begun to raise their voices against the suppression of the documents.” For many years Joseph Fielding Smith had been Church Historian. Smith, of course, ruled the Church Historian’s Office with an iron hand and would not let scholars have unrestricted access to the documents. In 1970 he became the 10th President of the Mormon Church, and turned the Church Historian’s Office over to the Apostle Howard W. Hunter. This did not satisfy some of the more liberal Mormons, who by this time had become very aroused over the policy of suppression. Sometime after Hunter’s appointment, a group of Mormon scholars presented the Mormon leaders with a list of suggestions on how they should run the Historian’s Office. They wanted a trained historian to be appointed as Church Historian. They also wanted the records to be made available to scholars and for the church itself to start printing the rare documents. When we heard of these requests we could not see how the church leaders could possibly comply with them without undermining the entire foundation of the church. Take, for instance, the idea of appointing a qualified historian. A true historian, if he were honest with himself, could never approve of the methods used by Joseph Fielding Smith and other Church Historians in the past. Besides, it had become traditional for a member of the Quorum of the Twelve Apostles to fill this position. In the “Guide To The Historian’s Office Library-Archives” we read: “Since the days of Nauvoo this important responsibility has been assigned to a member of the Quorum of the Twelve Apostles.” It seemed very unlikely, then, that the church would appoint a trained historian, but on January 15, 1972, we received a surprise when we read the following in the Salt Lake Tribune:

Dr. Leonard J. Arrington, noted Utah educator and author, has been named historian of The Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints, . . . Howard W. Hunter of the Council of Twelve Apostles will be released . . .

In the Deseret News for January 15, 1972, we find the following statements in an editorial:

The appointment of Dr. Leonard J. Arrington as church historian . . . is itself an historic step.

It marks the first time that this important post has been filled by going outside the membership of the church’s general authorities.

While Dr. Arrington is an active Mormon, many people consider him to be very liberal. It was Arrington, in fact, who openly criticised the church for not publishing the diaries of the early Mormon leaders and for not permitting “qualified historians to use them without restriction” (Dialogue: A Journal of Mormon Thought, Spring 1966, p. 26). In the same article Dr. Arrington remarked:

Just as Mrs. Brodie’s biography, and certain others, are usually regarded (by the Mormons, at least) as “anti,” most of the “pro” biographies are undeviating pictures of sweetness and light. These err even more on the side of incredibility than the blacker portraits of the anti’s.

While the appointment of Leonard Arrington as Church Historian was certainly a surprise, the choice of James B. Allen and Davis Bitton as assistant historians made some wonder what direction the church was headed in. Allen had previously published an article which undermined Joseph Smith’s story of the First Vision, and Bitton had written an article in which he made an attack on the accuracy of Joseph Smith’s History of the Church. Now, what could the church leaders have had in mind when they appointed such liberals to the Church Historian’s Office? The only reasonable explanation is that the policy of suppressing the records had failed and that the Mormon leaders were trying to present a new image to the world. They were apparently going to try to make it appear that they were proud of the records they had suppressed for so many years.

In any case, after his appointment, Dr. Arrington announced great plans for the Historical Department. Many of them, however, have been thwarted by men who follow the philosophy of Ezra Taft Benson, President of the Council of the Twelve Apostles. Benson is a man who believes that it is wrong to tell the whole truth about Mormon history. He believes, in other words, that there should be a cover-up with regard to certain things that have occurred in the past. Arrington, on the other hand, is more open and scholarly in his approach.

Dr. Arrington's problems began just after his appointment to the office of Church Historian when he announced the formation of a group known as "Friends of Church History." When about 500 people showed up for the first meeting, the General Authorities apparently became fearful that such a large group studying history might uncover things which would prove embarrassing to the church. Orders were given to hold up the project, and no meetings have been held since November 30, 1972 (see Answering Dr. Clandestine, p. 41). Although no official announcement has ever been made, it is reasonable to assume that "Friends of Church History" is now defunct.

Some of Dr. Arrington's other projects seem to be endangered by the attitude of the General Authorities. One of his dreams was to have the church publish a one-volume history. This dream seemed to become a reality in 1976 when James B. Allen and Glen M. Leonard produced the book The Story of the Latter-day Saints. In the Foreword to this book, Dr. Arrington said that "two of our finest historians" had been assigned to the project—as we have already pointed out, James B. Allen is Assistant Church Historian. Dr. Arrington went on to state that he had personally approved the manuscript for publication. Although most Mormons would consider this a harmless publication, President Benson felt that it was too humanistic and it is rumored that he wanted it shredded. In a letter dated June 23, 1978, President Benson stated: "The book, The Story of the Latter-day Saints, will not be republished." It appears, therefore, that as far as Mormon history is concerned, the views of Leonard Arrington and Ezra Taft Benson are diametrically opposed.

Leonard Arrington's most important project was to oversee the production of a sixteen-volume sesquicentennial history of the Mormon Church. These volumes were to be authored by prominent Mormon scholars. The Salt Lake Tribune for April 26, 1975, quoted Dr. Arrington as saying:

"We have signed contracts with 16 persons, each of whom is writing one volume of the set," said the church historian. "Each requires several years of intensive research and none will be available before 1978. We hope all 16 volumes will be ready by 1980."

The original idea behind the project was to have the volumes ready for the 150th anniversary of the church—the sesquicentennial celebration of 1980. While Dr. Arrington said he hoped "all 16 volumes will be ready by 1980," 1980 passed without a single volume being published!

From what we have been able to determine, some of the scholars who were working on the volumes were too frank in their presentation and this caused great consternation among some of the Apostles. Since that time church leaders have been dragging their feet in an effort to delay or even cancel publication of the volumes. The church leaders find themselves in a difficult situation, however, since Deseret Book Company had signed an agreement with the sixteen authors which would be binding in court. In order to suppress the history without the possibility of lawsuits, the General Authorities decided to pay each author who had finished his work $20,000 (those who have not completed their volumes were to receive a smaller amount). Since there were sixteen authors to be paid off and other costs involved, the church may have spent hundreds of thousands of dollars. That the General Authorities would approve this massive project and then abort it after some of the church's top scholars spent years working on it shows a total lack of inspiration.

In the Salt Lake City Messenger, Jan. 1979, we observed:

There is reason to believe that Benson wants to remove Arrington from his position as church Historian. Some feel that he will gradually be "phased out." It is also reported that it is becoming increasingly difficult for Mormon scholars to get access to documents in the Historical Dept. If Dr. Arrington should survive under the leadership of President Spencer W. Kimball, it is very unlikely that he will remain Church Historian if Ezra Taft Benson becomes President.

It now appears that the church has begun the process of "phasing out" Dr. Arrington. The Salt Lake Tribune for July 3, 1980, announced:

PROVO (AP) — The history research division of the Mormon church's historical department will move to Brigham Young University, officials announced Wednesday.

The departments's library and archives division and arts and sites division will remain at the church's Salt Lake City headquarters, said church President Spencer W. Kimball. . . .

Director of the new institute will be Dr. Leonard J. Arrington, church historian.

Most of the division's personnel will be transferred to BYU, where they will become part of the faculty and staff.

Although President Kimball tries to persuade members of the church that "This transfer of the work of professional historians from a Church department to an institute in the university is a forward step," (Deseret News, Church Section, July 5, 1980), it is obvious to anyone who really examines the situation that this is a real demotion for Church Historian Leonard Arrington. While he may remain Church Historian in name, it is clear now that church leaders have removed the powers which used to go with this title. Before Arrington's appointment, the Church Historian had charge of the records and would make decisions as to who could see the various documents. Now it appears that there will be about a forty-five mile gap between the Church Historian and the church records—i.e., the distance between Provo and Salt Lake City:

Dr. Arrington and some History Division staff members eventually will move to the BYU campus but, the institute has not yet been assigned a particular building or office area in Provo. The Church's library and archives will remain in Salt Lake City. (Deseret News, Church Section, July 5, 1980)

It is obvious, then, that Church leaders want to get Dr. Arrington as far away from the Church Office Building as possible and to reduce his influence with the Mormon people. It has been claimed that it will not be too long before Arrington retires, and planning the move and setting up operations in Provo will no doubt take up much of his remaining time.

While we do not know exactly what direction Mormon leaders will take with regard to historical research, it is evident that the treatment of Dr. Arrington shows there is still a great deal of opposition to the idea of "telling it like it is." Klaus J. Hansen, who wrote his thesis at the church's Brigham Young University, made some interesting observations about the idea of having "an unvarnished version" of church history:

I am of course, one of those who have contended that the Church Historian's Office as well as other Church depositories may well contain important secret documents whose release might have a profound effect on Mormon historiography if not Mormon history. The possible, even probable, existence of further records of the Council of Fifty . . . is perhaps the most obvious example. . . .

Every so often I am asked if my research into Mormon history hasn't strengthened my testimony—a rhetorical question which I am generally expected to answer with a resounding yes. My questioners, of course, assume either that the Church has no skeletons to hide or that, in the unlikely

THE CHURCH OF JESUS CHRIST OF LATTER-DAY SAINTS

The Council of the Twelve
47 East South Temple Street, Salt Lake City, Utah 84150

June 23, 1978

Dear Brother ██████████

In answer to your letter of June 19, regarding the book, The Story of the Latter-day Saints, a few of my concerns are directed in a talk which I gave to the Religious Educators in September 1976. A copy of that address is enclosed.

The book, The Story of the Latter-day Saints, will not be republished.

With regard to your second question, on the article from Dialogue, "Seers, Savants, and Evolution: An Uncomfortable Interface," the article is historically inaccurate and doctrinely unsound. The author interpreted his "facts" in a way to support his pro-evolutionary stands and to discredit President Joseph Fielding Smith.

I trust that this will answer your questions.

Faithfully,

Ezra Taft Benson
President

event that they do, it would be much better to exhibit them in public. I suppose not a few Mormons would be taken aback by Joseph Smith's remark to Brigham Young that "If I were to reveal to this people what the Lord has revealed to me, there is not a man or a woman that would stay with me." A historian who would make it his business to juxtapose myth and reality in Mormon history might not expect results quite that dramatic, yet the fact is that an unvarnished version of the history of the Church that lets the chips fall where they may is potential dynamite. If historians, therefore, do not necessarily agree with the still relatively conservative and restrictive policies of the Church Historian's Office they should at least understand that these proceed from an internal logic. (Dialogue: A Journal of Mormon Thought, Summer 1970, pp. 107, 110)

Historians Face Crisis

Since writing the above, the situation facing Mormon historians has turned from bad to worse. Professor Louis C. Midgley, openly attacked the "New Mormon History" in a paper presented at the Western History Association. In the Sunstone Review, vol. 1, no. 3, p. 16, we find the following:

Of special interest to students of Mormonism was the session . . . in which Louis C. Midgley presented a paper, "A Critique of Mormon Historians: The Question of Faith and History." Midgley, a professor in the Department of Government at Brigham Young University, has been working on a book-length manuscript attacking the methodology of the "New Mormon History." . . .

Calling much of the recent professional historical writing on and by the Mormons the "New Mormon Apology," Midgley argued that "what is behind the writing of at least some recent Mormon history is a rash and unnecessary caving in on crucial issues." . . . He specifically accused some Mormon historians of undermining traditional Mormon beliefs . . . he argued that some Mormon historians are seeking a "middle ground"—a position somehow suspended between the tradi[t]ional positions that Joseph Smith was either a prophet or a fraud. For Midgley, if historians do not choose the prophet-side, only the other position is possible. Not only is there no middle ground, but for an historian to suspend belief or remain "objective" is to side with non-believers.

Davis Bitton, who has served as Assistant Church Historian under Leonard Arrington, responded to Professor Midgley's arguments.

The big blow for Mormon historians, however, came on August 22, 1981, when Boyd K. Packer, one of the Twelve Apostles of the Church, "criticized Church historians for 'forsaking things of the Spirit' in their histories" (Seventh East Press, An Independent Student Weekly, Provo, Utah, October 6, 1981). That Apostle Packer really meant business in this speech became evident when it appeared as the lead article in the Summer 1981 issue of Brigham Young University Studies. In this speech, Packer gave the following warning to Mormon historians:

I have come to believe that it is the tendency for many members of the Church who spend a great deal of time in academic research to begin to judge the Church, its doctrine, organization, and leadership, present and past, by the principles of their own profession. . . . In my mind it ought to be the other way around. . . .

You seminary teachers and some of you institute and BYU men will be teaching the history of the Church this school year. This is an unparalleled opportunity in the lives of your students to increase their faith and testimony of the divinity of this work. Your objective should be that they will see the hand of the Lord in every hour and every moment of the Church from its beginning till now. . . . there is no such thing as an accurate or objective history of the Church which ignores the Spirit. . . . Church history can be so interesting and so inspiring as to be a very powerful tool indeed for building faith. If not properly written or properly taught, it may be a faith destroyer.

President Brigham Young admonished Karl G. Maeser not to teach even the times table without the Spirit of the Lord. How much more essential is that Spirit in the research, the writing, and the teaching of Church history . . .

There is a temptation for the writer or the teacher of Church history to want to tell everything, whether it is worthy or faith promoting or not.

Some things that are true are not very useful.

Historians seem to take great pride in publishing something new, particularly if it illustrates a weakness or mistake of a prominent historical figure . . .

The writer or the teacher who has an exaggerated loyalty to the theory that everything must be told is laying a foundation for his own judgment. . . .

Some time ago a historian gave a lecture to an audience of college students on one of the past Presidents of the Church. It seemed to be his purpose to show that that President was a man subject to the foibles of men. He introduced many so-called facts that put that President in a very unfavorable light, particularly when they were taken out of the context of the historical period in which he lived. . . .

Teaching some things that are true, prematurely or at the wrong time, can invite sorrow and heartbreak instead of the joy intended to accompany learning. . . . The scriptures teach emphatically that we must give milk before meat. The Lord made it very clear that some things are to be taught selectively and some things are to be given only to those who are worthy.

It matters very much not only what we are told but when we are told it. Be careful that you build faith rather than destroy it.

President William E. Berrett has told us how grateful he is that a testimony that the past leaders of the Church were prophets of God was firmly fixed in his mind before he was exposed to some of the so-called facts that historians have put in their published writings. . . . What that historian did with the reputation of the President of the Church was not worth doing. He seemed determined to convince everyone that the prophet was a man. We knew that already. All of the prophets and all of the Apostles have been men. It would have been much more worthwhile for him to have convinced us that the man was a prophet, a fact quite as true as the fact that he was a man.

He has taken something away from the memory of a prophet. He has destroyed faith . . .

That historian or scholar who delights in pointing out the weaknesses and frailties of present or past leaders destroys faith. A destroyer of faith—particularly one within the Church, and more particularly one who is employed specifically to build faith—places himself in great spiritual jeopardy. He is serving the wrong master, and unless he repents, he will not be among the faithful in the eternities . . .

In an effort to be objective, impartial, and scholarly, a writer or a teacher may unwittingly be giving equal time to the adversary . . .

In the Church we are not neutral. We are one-sided. There is a war going on, and we are engaged in it. It is a war between good and evil, and we are belligerents defending the good. We are therefore obliged to give preference to and protect all that is represented in the gospel of Jesus Christ, and we have made covenants to do it . . .

And I want to say in all seriousness that there is a limit to the patience of the Lord with respect to those who are under covenant to bless and protect His Church and kingdom upon the earth but do not do it . . .

There is much in the scriptures and in our Church literature to convince us that we are at war with the adversary. We are not obliged as a church, nor are we as members obliged, to accommodate the enemy in this battle.

President Joseph Fielding Smith pointed out that it would be a foolish general who would give access to all of his intelligence to his enemy. It is neither expected nor necessary for us to accommodate those who seek to retrieve references from our sources, distort them, and use them against us.

Suppose that a well-managed business corporation is threatened by takeover from another corporation. Suppose that the corporation bent on the takeover is determined to drain off all its assets and then dissolve the company. You can rest assured that the threatened company would hire legal counsel to protect itself.

Can you imagine that attorney, under contract to protect the company having fixed in his mind that he must not really take sides, that he must be impartial?

Suppose that when the records of the company he has been employed to protect are opened for him to prepare his brief he collects evidence and passes some of it to the attorneys of the enemy company. His own firm may then be in great jeopardy because of his disloyal conduct.

Do you not recognize a breach of ethics, or integrity, or morality?

I think you can see the point I am making. Those of you who are employed by the Church have a special responsibility to build faith, not destroy it. If you do not do that, but in fact accommodate the enemy, who is the destroyer of faith, you become in that sense a traitor to the cause you have made covenants to protect. . . .

Rest assured, also, that you will get little truth, and less benefit, from those who steal documents or those who deal in stolen goods. There have always been, and we have among us today, those who seek entrance to restricted libraries and files to secretly copy material and steal it away in hopes of finding some detail that has not as yet been published—this in order that they may sell it for money or profit in some way from its publication or inflate an ego by being first to publish it. . . .

I would not contribute to publications, nor would I belong to organizations, that by spirit or inclination are faith destroying. There are plenty of scholars in the world determined to find all secular truth. There are so few of us, relatively speaking, striving to convey the spiritual truths, who are protecting the Church. We cannot safely be neutral.

Many years ago Elder Widtsoe made reference to a foolish teacher in the Mutual Improvement Association who sponsored some debate with the intent of improving the abilities of the young members of the Church. He chose as a subject “Resolved: Joseph Smith was a prophet of God.” Unfortunately, the con side won.

The youngsters speaking in favor of the proposition were not as clever and their arguments were not as carefully prepared as those of the opposing side. The fact that Joseph Smith remained a prophet after the debate was over did not protect some of the participants from suffering the destruction of their faith and thereafter conducting their lives as though Joseph Smith were not a prophet and as though the church he founded and the gospel he restored were not true. . . .

The final caution concerns the idea that so long as something is already in print, so long as it is available from another source, there is nothing out of order in using it in writing or speaking or teaching.

Surely you can see the fallacy in that . . .

You do not well to see that it is disseminated. It may be read by those not mature enough for “advanced history,” and a testimony in seedling stage may be crushed.

Several years ago President Ezra Taft Benson spoke to you and said:

It has come to our attention that some of our teachers, particularly in our university programs, are purchasing writings from known apostates . . . in an effort to become informed about certain points of view or to glean from their research. You must realize that when you purchase their writings or subscribe to their periodicals, you help sustain their cause. We would hope that their writings not be on your seminary or institute or personal bookshelves. We are entrusting you to represent the Lord and the First Presidency to your students, not the views of the detractors of the Church.

I endorse that sound counsel to you.

Remember: when you see the bitter apostate, you do not see only an absence of light, you see also the presence of darkness.

Do not spread disease germs! (Brigham Young University Studies, Summer 1981, pp. 259, 262-271)

To the Mormon scholar D. Michael Quinn, Apostle Packer’s words were a call to battle. In an emotionally charged speech, Dr. Quinn rebutted the charges made by Boyd K. Packer, Louis Midgley and Ezra Taft Benson, who is next in line to be President of the Church. The Seventh East Press reported:

Mormon apostles Ezra Taft Benson and Boyd K. Packer are advocating a kind of religious history which borders on idolatry, asserted D. Michael Quinn, associate professor of history at BYU in a recent lecture to the university’s student history association.

In an address entitled “On Being a Mormon Historian,” Quinn, who holds a Ph.D. in history from Yale University, addressed recent criticisms made against Mormon historians by Elders Benson and Packer and BYU Professor of Political Science Louis Midgley.

Stating that he was speaking only for himself, Quinn . . . explained that by the time he was age fifteen he had read all the standard works except for part of the Old Testament . . . Quinn also briefly recounted his entrance into the field of LDS history and his prayerful approach to researching and writing that history.

Turning to Elder Packer’s caution that previously-published material is not always suitable for re-publishing, Quinn described the “odd situation” created by General Authorities criticizing individuals for reprinting material that was viewed by General Authorities of an earlier era as faith-promoting and “appropriate for children and recent converts.”

Quinn expressed the opinion that for LDS historians to avoid what Elder Packer called “the unworthy, the unsavory, or the sensational” would be of questionable honesty and professional integrity and would do a “disservice to the cause of the Church,” and open the Church and its historians to justified criticisms.

Quinn also discussed Elder Benson’s counsel against “environmental explanations” of the background of revelations and Church history. Quinn stated that to ignore such backgrounds in a non-religious history is “inept at best and dishonest at worst.” Quinn agreed with the sentiment expressed by Elder Benson that to use environmental observations as a basis for rejecting Joseph Smith’s inspiration would be inappropriate. Nevertheless, he continued, a discussion of such influences is important since “revelations come from specific questions that prophets ask God, and those questions arise because of conditions prophets experience.”

Noting Elder Packer’s concern that an accurate history of the Church must consider the spiritual powers operating therein, Quinn asserted that Packer has created “an enemy that doesn't exist," for it is impossible for any good historian, Mormon or otherwise, to write about Mormonism without discussing the prophetic claims of its leaders. . . .

Commenting on Elder Packer's statement that historians should "demonstrate the hand of the Lord in every hour and every moment of the Church," Quinn expressed the belief that such an approach demonstrates the "view that the official acts and pronouncements of the prophets are always the express will of God," a position which Quinn sees as "the Mormon equivalent of the Roman Catholic doctrine of papal infallibility." Such a doctrine of infallibility, Quinn explained, denies the principle of free agency and goes against Joseph Smith's assertion that a prophet is only a prophet when he is acting as such. To ignore the limitations and errors of significant statements of the prophets, Quinn feels, would be as false as to ignore their visions, revelations and testimonies.

Quinn went on to state that to play down the human side of prophets would not be sacred history, for the sacred history of the scriptures portrays not only the "spiritual dimensions and achievements of God's leaders" but also matter of factly demonstrates their weaknesses.

As examples, Quinn cited the scriptures' "treatment of Noah's drunkenness, Lot's incest, Moses' arrogance, Jonah's vacillation," Peter and Paul's disagreements, Alma's youthful iniquity, and "the Lord's condemnations of Joseph Smith in the Doctrine and Covenants." While sacred history shows God's leaders as "understandable human beings with whom people can identify and still revere the prophetic mantle," Elders Benson and Packer, Quinn asserted, expect a history which makes LDS leaders "flawless and benignly angelic." Such a history of "demigod-like Church leaders," Quinn stated, "borders on idolatry."

While Quinn noted that Elder Packer accused Mormon historians of ignoring "fundamentals before presenting advanced information," Quinn expressed the opinion that in reality Elder Packer "is not advocating a gradual exposure to historical truth, but excludes that possibility." He further asserted that Elder Packer's approach is not the same as Paul's recommendation of milk before meat, but rather a steady diet of milk. "A diet of milk alone," Quinn observed, "will stunt the growth, if not kill, a child."

Quinn also accused Packer of advocating a history of the Church that denies any information which might be used against the Church by anti-Mormons. "Using this standard," Quinn stated, "much of the Old Testament, the Gospel of John, and many of Paul's epistles would not have been included in the Bible."

Quinn tearfully expressed discouragement at being labeled subversive and advocated following the example of sacred history in approach and philosophy. (The Seventh East Press, November 18, 1981)

Since Ezra Taft Benson will probably become the next President of the Church, there has been some concern that D. Michael Quinn may have sacrificed his career as a Mormon historian when he made this rebuttal. Many Mormons would count this as a great loss because Dr. Quinn is probably one of the best historians the church has ever produced. However this may be, Quinn certainly demonstrated a great deal of courage when he publicly challenged the suppressive policies advocated by Benson, Packer and Midgley.

As we indicated earlier, Leonard Arrington seems to have been stripped of his powers as Church Historian. There now seems to be a question as to whether he even retains the title. Although he was referred to as "the Church Historian" in the March 1979 issue of The Ensign (p. 51), a recent advertisement for a book by Arrington and Bitton seems to indicate that he no longer claims the title:

For many years Leonard J. Arrington and Davis Bitton served as Church Historian and Assistant Church Historian for The Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints. Arrington is currently Director of the Joseph Fielding Smith Institute for Church History at Brigham Young University and Bitton is Professor of History at the University of Utah. (Sunstone Review, vol. 1, no. 3, p. 23)

The reader will remember that Apostle Boyd K. Packer criticized a historian for trying to "convince everyone that the prophet was a man." Interestingly enough, the new book by Arrington and Bitton, which deals with "two apostles" and other Mormons, is entitled Saints Without Halos: The Human Side of Mormon History. It is also interesting to note that this new book is not being published by the church but rather by Signature Books in Salt Lake City.

As to Arrington's most important project, the sixteen-volume sesquicentennial history of the Mormon Church, another year (1981) has passed without the church publishing a single volume! The reader will remember that Arrington hoped that "all 16 volumes will be ready by 1980."

3. Changes in the Revelations

The Mormon Apostle John A. Widtsoe stated:

The Doctrine and Covenants is a compilation of the revelations received by Joseph Smith . . .

The book itself is a witness for the truth of the Prophet's claims. The explanations of old doctrines and presentation of new ones are convincing evidences of their divine origin. Enemies of the Church have rather carefully avoided the discussion of this book. They have been afraid of it. (Joseph Smith—Seeker After Truth, 1951, pp. 251, 254)

Contrary to the Apostle Widtsoe's statement, anti-Mormon writers have not been afraid to discuss the Doctrine and Covenants. In fact, they have made some rather serious charges concerning it. The most serious charge, we feel, is that the revelations found in the Doctrine and Covenants have been changed. Melvin J. Petersen quotes the anti-Mormon writer Henry Caswall as making this statement concerning the Doctrine and Covenants: "Two editions of this work were published, the first in 1833, and the second in 1835. Great inconsistencies [sic] exist between the several parts of the book and the editions of 1833 and 1835 are in several respects repugnant to each other." Some of the Mormon writers have admitted that changes were made. For instance, the Mormon historian B. H. Roberts admitted that paragraphs were added to the revelations:

. . . some of the early revelations first published in the "Book of Commandments," in 1833, were revised by the Prophet himself in the way of correcting errors made by the scribes and publishers; and some additional clauses were inserted . . . and paragraphs added, to make the principles or instructions apply to officers not in the Church at the time some of the earlier revelations were given. (History of the Church, vol. 1, p. 173)

In a thesis written at Brigham Young University, the Mormon writer John William Fitzgerald stated:

1. Differences in wording and differences in wording that change the meaning have occurred in certain sections that appeared first in A Book of Commandments published in 1833 and that appeared later in The Doctrine and Covenants published in 1835. ("A Study of the Doctrine and Covenants," Master's thesis, Brigham Young University, 1940, p. 329)

On page 333 of the same thesis we find this statement:

2. Changes in wording and in meaning occur not only in the verses of corresponding chapters and sections but also in the introductions to the chapters and sections themselves.

In another thesis written at the Brigham Young University, Melvin J. Petersen stated: "Many words were added to the revelations in order to more clearly state what Joseph Smith intended to write . . . Many times phrases were added to increase the ability of the reader to get the meaning of the verse" ("A Study of the Nature of and Significance of the Changes in the Revelations as Found in a Comparison of the Book of Commandments and Subsequent Editions of the Doctrine and Covenants," Master's thesis, Brigham Young University, 1955, typed copy, p. 147).

On pages 162-163 of the same thesis, Melvin J. Petersen wrote:

. . . Joseph Smith's language, as found in the revelations credited to him, needed correcting. There were many grammatical errors in the revelations he first published . . . Joseph Smith in revising the first published commandments, found many of them needing clarification; therefore he enlarged upon them in order that the meaning might be more easily discerned. . . . Certain omissions were made when unnecessary material was deleted from the revelations; also incidents that were past and of no significance except to a few.

On page 140 of the same thesis, Melvin J. Petersen said:

Having discussed the problem of additions to the commandments as being necessary and practical with a growing organization, we find another problem arising concerning words that were omitted. . . . In the 1835 edition, Section thirty-two, verse three was added in the place of verses five and six. Why such a change? Joseph Smith, while reviewing the revelations, was dissatisfied with the wording of verses five and six in portraying the concept he had received, and therefore he omitted verses five and six of Chapter four and rewrote in their place verse three of the 1835 edition which is identical with Section five, verse nineteen of the present 1921 edition.

In chapter forty-four of the Book of Commandments (Section forty-two, 1921 edition) the last three verses were left off.

Strange as it may seem, Dr. Hugh Nibley, who at one time wrote that Mormon teachings are "free of revisions," has now written a letter in which he admits that Joseph Smith's revelations have been changed. In this letter he stated: "1. Revelations have been revised whenever necessary. That is the nice thing about revelation—it is strictly open-ended" (Letter from Dr. Hugh Nibley to Morris L. Reynolds, dated May 12, 1966).

While there have been a few Mormon writers who have been willing to admit that Joseph Smith's revelations have been changed, many have not been that honest. The Mormon Apostle John A. Widtsoe stated that the revelations "have remained unchanged. There has been no tampering with God's word" (Joseph Smith—Seeker After Truth, p. 119).

Joseph Fielding Smith, who became the tenth President of the Mormon Church in 1970, made this comment concerning Joseph Smith's revelations:

Inspiration is discovered in the fact that each part, as it was revealed, dovetailed perfectly with what had come before. There was no need for eliminating, changing, or adjusting any part to make it fit; but each new revelation on doctrine and priesthood fitted in its place perfectly to complete the whole structure, as it had been prepared by the Master Builder. (Doctrines of Salvation, vol. 1, p. 170)

Hugh B. Brown, who served in the First Presidency under David O. McKay, stated that "None of the early revelations of the Church have been revised, and the Doctrine and Covenants stands as printed including sections 5 and 7" (Letter to Morris L. Reynolds, dated May 13, 1966). A photograph of Brown's letter and more information concerning this matter is found in our Case Against Mormonism, vol. 1, pages 132-133.

Book of Commandments

To properly understand the changes that have been made in the revelations we must understand the history of the Doctrine and Covenants.

In 1833 the Mormon Church published the revelations that had been given to the church by Joseph Smith in a book entitled “A Book of Commandments.” The Mormon writer William E. Berrett stated:

In the latter part of 1831, it was decided by a council of Church leaders to compile the revelations concerning the origin of the Church and its organization. The collection was to be called the “Book of Commandments.” . . . Joseph Smith received a revelation which was made the preface for the new volume and is now Section 1 of the Book of Doctrine and Covenants. In this preface we read: “Search these commandments, for they are true and faithful.” . . .

After accepting the collection as scripture it was voted to print 10,000 copies. (The Restored Church, 1956, pp. 138-139)

The church was unable to print as many copies of the Book of Commandments as they had planned because the printing press was destroyed by a mob. In 1835 the revelations were printed again, and the name of the book was changed to the Doctrine and Covenants. New revelations were added to this book, and many of the previous revelations were revised. In modern editions of the Doctrine and Covenants we find the following on the page just following the title page:

Certain parts were issued at Zion, Jackson County, Missouri, in 1833, under the title, Book of Commandments for the Government of the Church of Christ.

An enlarged compilation was issued at Kirtland, Ohio, in 1835, under the title, Doctrine and Covenants of the Church of the Latter-day Saints.

The exact number of Book of Commandments printed before the mob destroyed the printing press is not known; however, David Whitmer—one of the three witnesses to the Book of Mormon—stated:

Early in the spring of 1833, at Independence, Mo., the revelations were printed in the Book of Commandments. Many of the books were finished and distributed among the members of the church . . . (An Address to all Believers in Christ, Richmond, Mo., 1887, p. 55)

In February, 1834, Wilford Woodruff—who became the fourth president of the church—wrote:

. . . I saw the Book of Commandments or revelations given through Joseph Smith, and I believed them with all my heart and rejoiced therein; and after spending several days, and holding several meetings, we returned home rejoicing. (“Journal History,” February 1834, as quoted in “A Study of the Nature of and the Significance of the Changes in the Revelations as Found in a Comparison of the Book of Commandments and Subsequent Editions of the Doctrine and Covenants,” p. 142)

David Whitmer said that the revelations were printed in the Book of Commandments correctly . . .

These revelations were arranged for publication by Brothers Joseph Smith, Sydney Rigdon, Orson Hyde and others, in Hiram, Ohio, while I was there, were sent to Independence to be published, and were printed just exactly as they were arranged by Brother Joseph and the others. And when the Book of Commandments was printed, Joseph and the church received it as being printed correctly. (An Address to all Believers in Christ, p. 56)

That the church approved of the Book of Commandments and used it from the year 1833 until 1835, can be seen from a letter written by the leaders of the church in Missouri in July, 1834. In this letter it was stated:

It will be seen by reference to the Book of Commandments, page 135, that the Lord has said to the Church—and we mean to live by His words: “Let no man break the laws of the land, . . .” (History of the Church, vol. 2, p. 129)

In the same letter it was stated: “. . . we entreat the philanthropist, the moralist, and the honorable men of all creeds and sects, to read our publications, to examine the Bible, the Book of Mormon, and The Commandments . . .” (History of the Church, by Joseph Smith, vol. 2, p. 133).

David Whitmer said the following concerning the Book of Commandments:

I say it was printed complete (and copyrighted). It was printed complete and many copies distributed among the members of the church, before the printing press owned by the church was destroyed. Brother Joseph and the brethren received it at first as being printed correctly, but they soon decided to print the Doctrine and Covenants. (An Address to Believers in the Book of Mormon, p. 5)

The Doctrine and Covenants was printed in the year 1835. Since the same revelations that were published in the Book of Commandments were put into the first edition of the Doctrine and Covenants, one would expect them to read exactly the same as when they were first published. This is not the case, however, and David Whitmer, one of the three witnesses to the Book of Mormon, made this statement concerning this matter:

Some of the revelations as they now appear in the book of Doctrine and Covenants have been changed and added to. Some of the changes being of the greatest importance as the meaning is entirely changed on some very important matters; as if the Lord had changed his mind a few years after he give the revelations, and after having commanded his servants (as they claim) to print them in the “Book of Commandments,” and after giving his servants a revelation, being a preface unto His Book of Commandments, which says: “Behold this is mine authority, and the authority of my servants, and my preface unto the Book of Commandments, which I have given them to publish unto you, oh inhabitants of the earth.” Also in this preface, “Behold I am God, and have spoken it; These commandments are of me.” “Search these commandments, for they are true and faithful.” The revelations were printed in the Book of Commandments correctly! This I know, . . . Joseph and the church received it as being printed correctly. This I know. But in the winter of 1834 they saw that some of the revelations in the Book of Commandments had to be changed, because the heads of the church had gone too far, and had done things in which they had already gone ahead of some of the former revelations. So the book of “Doctrine and Covenants” was printed in 1835, and some of the revelations changed and added to. (Letter written by David Whitmer, published in the Saints’ Herald, February 5, 1887)

Not For Reproduction

The Mormon Church has suppressed the truth concerning the Book of Commandments and the changes in the revelations. The Brigham Young University allowed us to make photocopies of the first 41 pages of Wilford Woodruff’s copy of the Book of Commandments, which they had on microfilm. When the Church Historian’s Office found that we had obtained these photocopies, they immediately sent word to the Brigham Young University Library to keep us from obtaining any more photocopies of these rare documents. Consequently, when we wrote to the Brigham Young University Library, asking for the remaining pages of the Book of Commandments, we received a letter in which the following statement appeared:

We are unable to send you a photocopy of the Book of Commandments. We were supplied this copy by the Church Historian’s office for the use of our patrons but not for photo-duplication or other forms of publication . . . you will need to secure the permission of the Church Historian’s library to have it reproduced, as they own the manuscript copy. (Letter dated April 11, 1961)

Since the copyright on the Book of Commandments expired many years ago, it is very obvious that the only reason they would not allow us to have these photocopies was that they wanted to keep them hid from the general public. We appealed to William E. Berrett (Vice Administrator of the Brigham Young University) to help us obtain these photocopies of the Book of Commandments. Mr. Berrett did try to help us, and in a letter to us dated May 5, 1961, he stated:

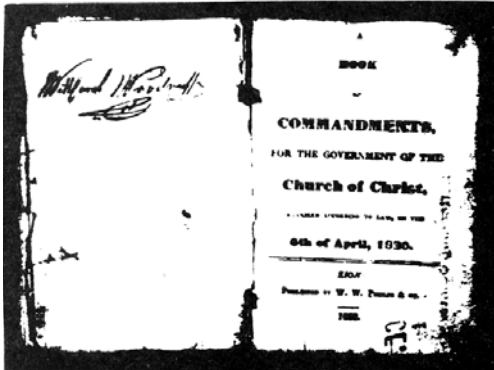

I regret that I cannot achieve any success in helping you obtain a copy of the Book of Commandments which you seem to desire. I have written to the Church Historian’s Office but find that their policy will not permit the original Book of Commandments which they possess, . . .

I did not disclose to them who I wanted the copy for, but in their reply they indicated that they had refused a copy to you and that I would have to divulge the name of the individual who wanted a copy.

In 1961, with the help of several others, we had the Book of Commandments reprinted by photo-offset printing (the first 41 pages from the photocopies obtained at BYU and the remaining pages from a microfilm of the copy at Yale University).

A man who did some of the photographic work on our reprint—work that had to be done before we could take it to the printer—told us that he was actually asked to destroy our photocopies of the Book of Commandments and then tell us that he had had an “accident” with them. Fortunately, he refused to do this, and we were able to bring out our reprint. Even though we were successful in getting the book printed, the newspapers in Salt Lake City refused to let us advertise it (see our Case Against Mormonism, vol. 1, pp. 51-52).

A few months after our reprint of the Book of Commandments came out, Wilford Wood—not to be confused with Wilford Woodruff—published a photographic reprint of the Book of Commandments and the first edition of the Doctrine and Covenants under the title of Joseph Smith Begins His Work, vol. 2. He had previously published the first edition of the Book of Mormon under the title of Joseph Smith Begins His Work, vol. 1. The Mormon leaders were apparently not as worried about Mr. Wood's reprints as they were about ours, for the Deseret Press (the church press) did the printing, and they were advertised in the newspapers in Salt Lake City. Since Mr. Wood's reprints did not tell that the revelations and the Book of Mormon had been changed, the church leaders did not try to suppress his books at that time. Instead, they promoted them and allowed him to display his original copy of the Book of Commandments in the window of the Deseret Bookstore, which is owned by the Mormon Church. The leaders of the church evidently felt that by using reverse psychology they could make the Mormon people believe that they were glad that the Book of Commandments had been reprinted. Since Mr. Wood's books did not tell of the changes, the church leaders evidently felt that they were safe as long as members of the church did not compare them with the present editions. It appears, however, that this idea backfired and that members of the church did compare them and found that many changes had been made.

On October 9, 1964, a man reported to us that the Deseret Bookstore had refused to sell him copies of Joseph Smith Begins His Work, volumes 1 and 2. On October 10, 1964, Sandra Tanner went to the Deseret Bookstore and asked the clerk concerning these books. The clerk, supposing she was a Mormon, said: “President David O. McKay won't let us sell that anymore.” The clerk went on to say, “We've had several people leave the Church because of those books. The priests and ministers of the other churches are using these books to confuse people. Because of the confusion we can't sell them anymore. President McKay has taken them out of circulation.”

On October 13, 1964, Wesley P. Walters wrote to the Deseret Bookstore requesting copies of Joseph Smith Begins His Work, volumes 1 and 2. Verny Noble, of the Paid Order Dept., replied:

Thank you for your letter ordering “Joseph Smith Begins His Works” Vol 1 & 2 by Wilford Wood. We are sorry to inform you that these two books are no longer available. (Letter dated October 16, 1964; photographically reproduced in our Case, vol. 1, p. 52)

When we told Wilford Wood that the church was trying to suppress his book he wrote us a letter in which he said:

I would like to know if you would permit me to use your letter to show it to President McKay or those responsible for stopping the sale of the book at the Deseret Book Company. . . . There are plenty of books, both volumes and always will be and anyone who is hurt from the original story of the Prophet Joseph Smith and the foundation of the Church upon which it is built will have to pay the consequences for pretending to love the Prophet and working against him. (Letter by Wilford C. Wood, dated Oct. 27, 1964)

We understand that Wilford Wood met with the President of the Church but was unsuccessful in his attempt to get the ban removed from his reprints. On March 22, 1967, Wilford Wood sent us a carbon copy of a letter which he wrote to Edmond C. Gruss. In this letter he stated:

Answering your letter of March 10th, . . . The answers are as follows:

One. Are these volumes presently out of print? No. They have never been out of print. . . .

Two. Did Pres. McKay stop the sale of the books at Deseret Book Store? The answer is, “No.” . . .

Three. Without mentioning any names or talking about the General Authorities personally, this is what happened. The man who is supposed to answer all of the questions about the church in the Improvement Era is the man who stopped the Deseret Book from selling the book. He it is who has constantly been a thorn in my side in almost every thing that I have done historically. He can not stand for people to hear the facts about the early history of the church, especially those things which he can not answer.

What a pity it is if the foundation and the establishment of the building which he lives in is wrong and far be it from me to say that anyone who belongs to the Church in this generation can claim to believe in the Prophet Joseph Smith and yet deny the facts about the restored gospel.

For your information President McKay has told me more than once that he would see to it that the Deseret Book sold Volumes one and two of Joseph Smith Begins His Work. So far he has been unable to do so. I love President McKay with all of my heart and I know that he would do nothing to deny anything pertaining to the Prophet Joseph Smith. (Letter written by Wilford C. Wood to Edmond C. Gruss, dated March 22, 1967)

Those people who read the Improvement Era will know that Joseph Fielding Smith was the “man who is supposed to answer all of the questions about the Church.” For years he wrote an article entitled, “Your Question.” In 1970 Joseph Fielding Smith became the tenth President of the Mormon Church. Since Joseph Fielding Smith became President of the Church the ban on Wilford Wood's reprints has continued. On November 6, 1971, we called the Deseret Bookstore and asked about these reprints. We were told that they were “OUT OF PRINT.” This statement is, of course, completely untrue. They have been making this same statement for several years, yet we have sold hundreds of copies during this period. Other bookstores which are not controlled by the Mormon Church have also continued to sell these reprints.

The suppression of Wilford Wood's reprints must be especially embarrassing to the Mormon Apostle Thomas S. Monson, for when these books were printed he was the Assistant Plant Manager of the church's Deseret Publishing Company. He signed affidavits stating that these books were photographically reproduced from the original books. In Joseph Smith Begins His Work, vol. 2, for instance, we find an affidavit signed by Thomas S. Monson which contains this statement:

We the undersigned of the Deseret News Publishing Company certify that the printing of these original books, A Book of Commandments—1833, and Doctrine and Covenants—1835, as contained herein, were produced by photo-offset method from books in Wilford C. Wood's possession and owned by him.

For more information concerning the suppression of these reprints and photographic reproductions of Wilford Wood's letter to us see our Case, vol. 1, pages 52-56.

Other Changes

Besides being printed in the Book of Commandments, many of the revelations were also printed in the church paper, The Evening and Morning Star; before they were ever printed in the Doctrine and Covenants. The way they were printed in the Evening and Morning Star agreed with the way they were printed in the Book of Commandments.

When the revelations were altered in the Doctrine and Covenants, the Evening and Morning Star was reprinted and the revelations were also changed in it to agree with the Doctrine and Covenants. In other words, it was not a true reprint but a falsified or bogus reprint. Clarence L. Wheaton and Angela Wheaton state:

... to make a bad matter worse, they reprinted the first fourteen numbers of the Evening and Morning Star at Kirtland in 1835, where they changed every revelation printed therein, which had harmonized with the Book of Commandments, so that they would be in agreement with the altered and mutilated versions as they appeared in the Doctrine and Covenants. (The Book of Commandments Controversy Reviewed, Independence, Mo., 1950, p. 67)

The Book of Commandments had 65 chapters, however, it can be shown that the changes made in these chapters did not constitute all of the changes made in the Doctrine and Covenants. Section 68 of the Doctrine and Covenants was not printed in the Book of Commandments, but it was printed in the Evening and Morning Star. When it was reprinted in the Doctrine and Covenants it was changed. In their book, The Book of Commandments Controversy Reviewed, page 81, Clarence and Angela Wheaton state that "323 words were added and 21 left out."

Just how many changes were made in the revelations can not be determined unless the church will allow all of the revelations, in their handwritten form, to be filmed. This, of course, they have refused to do.

When a woman wrote the Historian's office requesting a microfilm of these revelations in their handwritten form, she received the following reply:

We are enclosing herewith a $25.00 in currency you forwarded for a microfilm of the original handwritten revelations of Joseph Smith. This work has never been microfilmed.

Melvin J. Petersen, who wrote his thesis at BYU, found that 703 words have been changed, 1,656 words added and 453 words deleted since the revelations were first printed in the Book of Commandments ("A Study of the Nature of and the Significance of the Changes in the Revelations . . .," typed copy, p. 118).

Besides the thousands of changes that were made in the revelations that were first published in the Book of Commandments and other early publications, one whole section on marriage has been removed. Also, the Lectures on Faith, which comprised 70 pages of the 1835 edition of the Doctrine and Covenants, have been completely removed from later editions. (Mormon writers admit that the section on marriage and the Lectures on Faith have been removed, but very few of them will admit that there have been actual meaning changes in the revelations which are still printed in the Doctrine and Covenants.)

All of these alterations have been made within 140 years. Imagine what would have happened to the Bible if the churches that preserved it had altered it at the same rate the Mormons have altered the Doctrine and Covenants. We would be lucky to have anything the way it was originally written! Mormon writers accuse non-Mormons of making changes, yet their own church has been guilty of this very thing. For instance, Dr. Hugh Nibley made this statement concerning a non-Mormon writer:

He begins by telescoping a helpfully explanatory letter from Brigham Young into a short, cynical, and brutal note, omitting the little dots which indicate that one is making deletions in a quotation, so that the reader assumes that he has B.Y.'s own statement before his eyes. . . . This, we should warn the student, is a bit drastic; it is in fact libellous—but what are the chances of its being discovered? (Sounding Brass, p. 118)

Evidently Dr. Nibley is well informed on the rules a writer should follow when making quotations. Why have the Mormon leaders not followed these rules? Where are the "little dots" to show that deletions have been made in Joseph Smith's revelations?

Study of Changes

In order to show some of the important changes that were made in the revelations we obtained photographs of Yale University's original copy of the Book of Commandments. Because of the age of the book a few of the pages were not too clear; therefore, we have used photographs from another original copy of the Book of Commandments to replace the photographs that were unclear.

We have compared these pages with the revelations as published in the 1966 printing of the Doctrine and Covenants and have marked the changes on the photographs. Therefore, the text is an exact photographic reproduction of the pages of the original Book of Commandments, and the handwriting shows the changes that would have to be made in the text to bring it into conformity with the 1966 printing of the Doctrine and Covenants. Although there have been many changes in the chapter headings, we have not bothered to mark them.

The Book of Commandments has 160 pages in it, but since we are very limited on space in this study, we have selected only the pages which contain important changes. Notice that we have assigned a letter to some of the changes that we want to discuss later in the study.

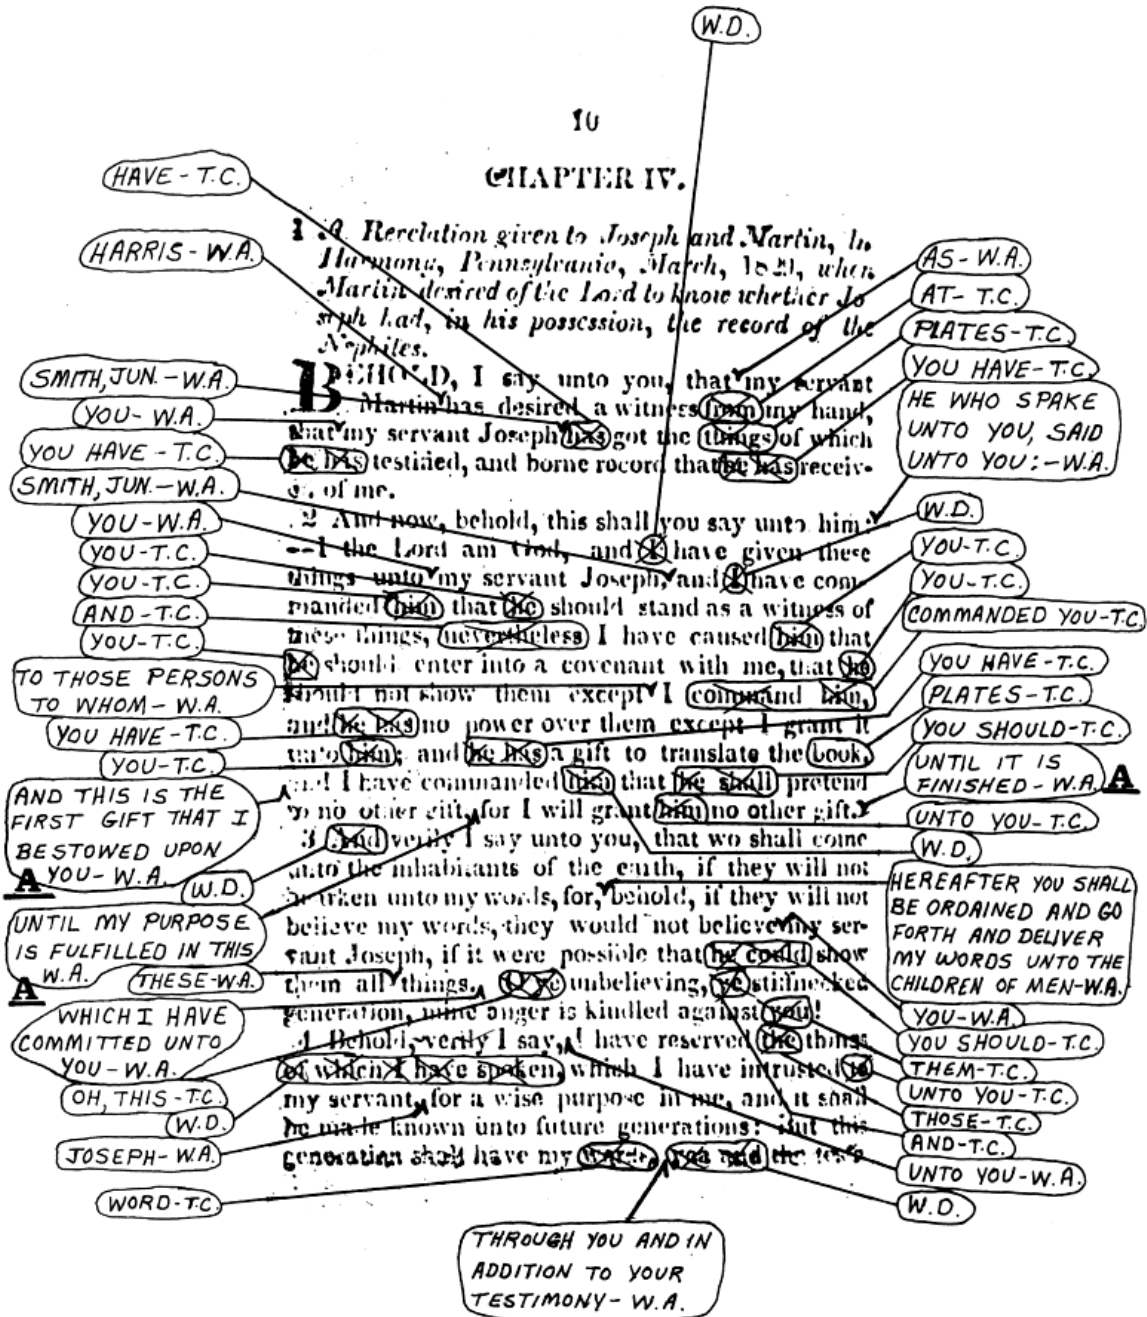

As we indicated earlier, other revelations besides the ones which appeared in the Book of Commandments were also changed. Some of these revelations were first published in the Evening and Morning Star and the Times and Seasons. We have cut out some of these revelations from photographs of the original publications and have marked the changes which would have to be made in them to bring them into conformity with the current edition of the Doctrine and Covenants. Sections 121, 122 and 123 of the Doctrine and Covenants were taken from letters originally written by Joseph Smith and others while in Liberty Jail. More than 3,700 words were deleted from these letters when they were reprinted in the Doctrine and Covenants. We do not have room to show all of these changes here, but those who are interested will find all of these changes marked in our Case, vol. 1, pp. 171-180.

2 Revelation to the elders of the church, assembled in Kirtland, Ohio, given February, 1831.

O HEARKEN, ye elders of my church, and give ear to the words which I shall speak unto you:

2 For behold, verily, verily I say unto you, that ye have received a commandment for a law unto my church, through him whom I have appointed unto you, to receive commandments and revelations from my hand.

3 And this ye shall know assuredly, that there is none other appointed unto you to receive commandments and revelations until he be taken, if he abide in me.

4 But verily, verily I say unto you, that none else shall be appointed unto this gift except it be through him, for if it be taken from him he shall not have power, except to appoint another in his stead:

5 And this shall be a law unto you, that ye receive not the teachings of any that shall come before you as revelations or commandments:

6 And this I give unto you, that you may not be

MY servant, Oliver, was called, by his ordinance, to proclaim the everlasting gospel, by the spirit of the living God, from people to people, and from land to land, in the congregations of the wicked, in their synagogues, reasoning with and expounding all scriptures unto them: And behold and lo, this is an example unto all those who were ordained unto this priesthood, whose mission is appointed unto them to go forth: And this is the example unto them, that they shall speak as they are moved upon by the Holy Ghost; and whatsoever they shall speak, when moved upon by the Holy Ghost, shall be scripture; shall be the will of the Lord; shall be the mind of the Lord; shall be the word of the Lord; shall be the voice of the Lord, and the power of God unto salvation; Behold this is the promise of the Lord unto you, O ye my servants: wherefore, be of good cheer, and do not fear, for I the Lord am with you, and will stand by you; and ye shall bear record of me as a Jesus Christ, that I am the Son of the living God; that I was; that I am; and that I am to come. This is the word of the Lord unto you my servant, Oliver; and also unto my servant, Luke, and unto my servant, Lyman, and unto my servant Will; and unto all the faithful elders of my church: Go ye into all the world, and preach the gospel to every creature; acting in the authority which I have given you, in the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost; and he that believeth, and is baptized, shall be saved, and he that believeth not shall be damned, and he that believeth shall be blessed with signs following, even as it is written: And unto you it shall be given to know the signs of the times, and the signs of the coming of the Son of man; and of as many as the Father shall bestow records, to you shall be given power to seal them up unto eternal life: Amen.

And now, concerning the items in addition to the laws and commandments, they are these: The first which hereafter in the due time of the Lord, other bishops to be set apart unto the church, to minister even according to the first; wherefore, shall be high priest, who is worthy; and he shall be appointed by a conference of high priests. And again, no bishop or pastor, which shall be set apart for the ministry, shall be tried or condemned for any crime, save it be before a conference of high priests; and in as much as he is found guilty before a conference of high priests, by testimony first caused to be impaled, he shall be condemned according to the laws of the church. And again, in as much as priests have children in Zion, that teach them not to understand the doctrine of repentance; faith in Christ the Son of the living God; and of baptism and the gift of the Holy Ghost by the laying on of the hands, with eight years old: the sin be upon the heads of the parents, for this shall be a law unto the inhabitants of Zion, and their children shall be baptized for the remission of their sins when eight years old, and receive the laying on of the hands: and they shall teach their children to pray, and to walk uprightly before the Lord. And the inhabitants of Zion shall also observe the Sabbath day to keep it holy. And the inhabitants of Zion, also, shall remember their labors, in as much as they are appointed to labor, in all faithfulness, for the altar shall be had in remembrance before the Lord. Now I the Lord am not well pleased with the inhabitants of Zion, for there are idlers among them; and their children are also growing up in wickedness: They also seek not earnestly the riches of eternity, but their eyes are full of grackness. These things ought not to be, and must be done away from among them: wherefore let my servant Oliver carry these sayings unto the land of Zion. And a commandment I give unto you, that he that doeth not his part before the Lord in the season thereof, let him be had in remembrance before the judge of my people. These sayings are true and faithful: wherefore transgress them not, neither take therefrom. Behold I am Alpha and Omega, and I come quickly: Amen.

NO MAN HAS A LEGAL RIGHT TO THIS OFFICE, TO HOLD THE KEYS OF THIS PRIESTHOOD, EXCEPT HE BE A LITERAL DESCENDANT AND THE FIRSTBORN OF AARON. BUT, AS A HIGH PRIEST OF THE MELCHIZEDEK PRIESTHOOD HAS AUTHORITY TO OFFICIATE IN ALL THE LESSER OFFICES HE MAY OFFICIATE IN THE OFFICE OF BISHOP WHEN NO LITERAL DESCENDANT OF AARON CAN BE FOUND, PROVIDED HE IS CALLED AND SET APART AND ORDAINED UNTO THIS POWER, UNDER THE HANDS OF THE FIRST PRESIDENCY OF THE MELCHIZEDEK PRIESTHOOD. COPY OF A LETTER, WRITTEN BY J. SMITH JR. AND OTHERS, WHILE IN PRISON. Liberty Jail, Clay Co. Mo.

To Bishop Partridge, and to the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter Day Saints, in Quincy Illinois, and to those scattered abroad, throughout all the regions round about.

Your humble servant Joseph Smith is prisoner for Christ's sake, and the saints, taken and held by the power of mobocracy under the exterminating reign of the execrable Governor Lilburn W. Boggs, in company with the other prisoners had beloved brethren, Caleb Baldwin, Lyman Wight, Hysom Smith, and Alexander McKee, send unto you greeting: May the grace of God the Father, and the Lord our Saviour Jesus Christ, rest upon you all, and abide with you for ever; and may faith, virtue, knowledge, temperance, patience, godliness, brotherly kindness and charity dwell in you and abound, so that you may not be barren or unfruitful.

We know, that the greater part of you are acquainted with the wrongs, high toned injustice and cruelty which is practised upon us; we have been taken prisoners, charged falsely with all kind of crimes and thrown into a prison enclosed with strong walls, and are surrounded with a strong guard who are as indefatigable in watching us, as their master is in laying snares for the people of God. Therefore under these circumstances, dearly beloved brethren, we are the more ready to claim your fellowship and love. Our situation is calculated to awaken our minds to a sacred remembrance of your affection, and kindness; and we think that your situation will have the same effect; therefore, we believe, that nothing can separate us from the love of God, and our fellowship one with another; and that every species of wickedness and cruelty practised upon us, will only tend to bind our hearts and seal them together in love.

It is probably, as unnecessary for us to say, that we are thus treated and held in bonds, without cause as it would be for you to say, that you were smitten and driven from your homes without any provocation; we mutually understand and verily know, that if the citizens of the state of Missouri, had not abused the saints, and had been as desirous of peace as we were, there would have been nothing but peace and quietude to this day and we should not have been in this wretched place but burthened with the society of demons in human form and compelled to hear nothing but oaths and curses, and virgins echoes of drunkenness and debaucheries of every description; neither would the cries of orphans and widows have ascended to God or the blood of the saints have stained the soil, and cried for vengeance against them. But "we dwell with those who hate peace" and who delighted in war and surely their unrelenting hearts, their inhuman and murderous disposition—and their cruel practices, shock humanity, and defy description. It is truly a tale of sorrow, lamentation and we, too much for humanity to contemplate. Such a transaction cannot be found where kings and tyrants reign, or among the savages of the wilderness, or even among the furious beasts of the forest. To think that man should be mangled for sport, after being cruelly put to death. Wrench him to their last mortal agon from them, while their helpless children were clinging around them and crying for food—and then, to gratify the insatiable desires of their more than inhuman oppressors, be violated, is held to be extreme.

They practice these things upon the saints who have done them no wrong, had committed no crime, and who were as innocent and virtuous people; and have proved themselves lovers of God by forsaking and enduring all things for his sake. "If men needs be that offences come, but wo to those by whom they come."

Important Changes

As we indicated earlier, we have placed letters by some of the changes which we wish to discuss.

CHANGE A. (see page 18) This is certainly one of the most significant changes in the Doctrine and Covenants. David Whitmer, one of the three witnesses to the Book of Mormon, gave this interesting information:

After the translation of the Book of Mormon was finished, early in the spring of 1830, before April 6th, Joseph gave the stone to Oliver Cowdery and told me as well as the rest that he was through with it, and he did not use the stone anymore. He said he was through the work God had given him to perform, except to preach the gospel. He told us that we would all have to depend on the Holy Ghost hereafter to be guided into truth and obtain the will of the Lord. (An Address To All Believers In Christ, Richmond, Missouri, 1887, p. 32)

The fact that Joseph Smith was not planning on doing any other work besides the Book of Mormon is well verified by the revelation given in March of 1829. This revelation was printed in the Book of Commandments as Chapter 4. Verse 2 reads as follows: “. . . and he has a gift to translate the book, and I have commanded him that he shall pretend to no other gift, for I will grant him no other gift.”

By the year 1835, when this revelation was reprinted in the Doctrine and Covenants, Joseph Smith had pretended to at least one other gift besides that of translating the Book of Mormon. He had pretended to the gift of rewording the Bible (Inspired Version), and a short time after this he brought forth the Book of Abraham. Certainly this revelation commanding Joseph Smith to pretend to no other gift but to translate the Book of Mormon could not remain in its original uncensored form. The church had decided to go beyond the Book of Mormon and accept Joseph Smith's other writings as scripture. This change in church policy necessitated a change in the revelation. Therefore, it was changed to read as follows:

And you have a gift to translate the plates; and this is the first gift that I bestowed upon you; and I have commanded that you should pretend to no other gift, until my purpose is fulfilled in this; for I will grant unto you no other gift until it is finished. (Doctrine and Covenants, Section 5, verse 4)

Thus the entire meaning of this revelation was changed, making it appear that the Lord would grant him other gifts besides that of translating the Book of Mormon. At least 22 words were added to this verse to make the change. David Whitmer made this statement about this matter:

. . . he [Joseph Smith] was not called to organize and establish the church any more than the rest of us Elders. . . . as if God had commanded Joseph to pretend to no other gift but to translate the Book of Mormon, that he would “grant him no other gift,” and then afterwards God had changed his mind and concluded to grant him another gift. God does not change and work in this manner. The way the revelation has been changed, twenty-two words being added to it, it would appear that God had broken His word after giving His word in plainness; commanding Brother Joseph to pretend to no other gift but to translate the Book of Mormon, and then the Lord had changed and concluded to grant Joseph the gift of a Seer to the Church. . . .

May God have mercy on the heads of the church for their transgression is my prayer. (An Address To All Believers In Christ, pp. 57-58)

CHANGE B. (see page 18) Notice that the words “you must wait yet a little while, for ye are not yet ordained” have been added to this revelation. This revelation was supposed to have been given in March of 1829. Some Mormon writers have claimed that God has a right to add to His word after it is given. But, we ask, why would the Lord wait more than five years to give them this information? What good would it do to give them this information years later? In order for a warning to do any good it has to be given right at the time.

Many of the changes in the revelations appear to be equivalent to locking the barn door after the horse has got out.

CHANGE C. (see page 18) Notice that 154 words have been deleted from verses 5 and 6 of this revelation. Melvin J. Petersen, a Mormon apologist, stated:

Joseph Smith . . . was dissatisfied with the wording of verses five and six in portraying the concept he had received, and therefore he omitted verses five and six of Chapter four and rewrote in their place verse three of the 1835 edition . . . (“A Study of the Nature of and the Significance of the Changes in the Revelations . . .,” typed copy, p. 140)

Melvin Petersen seems to feel that Joseph Smith had a perfect right to do this. Although we feel that Joseph Smith had a right to revise his own writings, we do not feel that he had a right to revise the revelations which he claimed to be the words of God. In the very first revelation that was published in the Book of Commandments we read:

Behold, this is mine authority, and the authority of my servants, and my Preface unto the Book of my Commandments, . . .

Search these commandments, for they are true and faithful, and the prophecies and promises which are in them, shall all be fulfilled. What I the Lord have spoken, I have spoken, and I excuse not myself, and though the heavens and the earth pass away, my word shall not pass away, . . . (Book of Commandments 1:2 and 7)

If these were really revelations from God, Joseph Smith would have had no right to revise them. David Whitmer made this statement concerning the change in Chapter 4:

The next change I will notice is one of importance. It is in Section 4, Doctrine and Covenants [section 5 of current Utah Edition]: Chapter 4. Book of Commandments. Half a page has been left out of this revelation. I believe that the object of those who left it out was to strike out the following words:

And thus, if the people of this generation harden not their hearts, I will work a reformation among them, and I will put down all lying, etc., ****and I will establish my church, like unto the church which was taught by my disciples in the days of old.

They knew that the order of offices in the Church of Latter Day Saints, was not like the order in the Church of Christ of old; because the Church of Christ of old had in it only elders, priests and teachers: so they left out this part of the revelation when they published the Book of Doctrine and Covenants. (An Address To All Believers In Christ, p. 60)

CHANGE D. (see page 19) This revelation is supposed to contain a translation of a parchment written by the Apostle John. Joseph Smith was supposed to have translated it by means of the Urim and Thummim. When this revelation was published in the Book of Commandments in 1833, it contained 143 words, but when it was reprinted in the Doctrine and Covenants in 1835, it contained 252 words. Thus 109 words had been added.

Mormon writers are unable to explain why Joseph Smith changed this revelation. Melvin J. Petersen made this statement:

In Chapter six of the Book of Commandments we find a revelation which was a translation from parchment upon which the Apostle John wrote his Gospel. When the 1835 edition of the Doctrine and Covenants was published this revelation had many additions and a few changes. (Section thirty-four.) The additional words and sentences reveal more concerning John and his ministry. How Joseph Smith had this information revealed to him, by means of the Urim and Thummim, is not clear. . . . What part revelation played in receiving this information concerning John is not known, nor is it known as to how the translation was enacted. We do know that additions and changes were made by Joseph Smith. . . .

Joseph Smith left nothing in his writings to indicate why he added to this translated version . . . and so any plausible answers will be merely conjecture (“A Study of the Nature of and the Significance of the Changes in the

The next important change I will speak of, is made in a revelation which was given to Brothers Joseph Smith, Oliver Cowdery, and myself in Fayette, New York, June, 1829. . . . In the Book of Commandments [Chapter 15] it reads thus:

Behold I give unto you a commandment, that you rely upon the things which are written; for in them are all things written, concerning my church, my gospel, and my rock. Wherefore if you shall build up my church, and my gospel, and my rock, the gates of hell shall not prevail against you.

But in the Book of Doctrine and Covenants [Sec. 18:2-11] it has been changed and reads thus:

Behold I give unto you a commandment, that you rely upon the things which are written; for in them are all things written, concerning the foundation of my church, my gospel, and my rock; wherefore, if you shall build up my church upon the foundation of my gospel and my rock, the gates of hell shall not prevail against you.

The change in this revelation is of great importance; the word “them” refers to the plates—the Book of Mormon: We were commanded to rely upon it in building up the church; that is, in establishing the doctrine, the order of offices, etc.:

For in them are all things written concerning my church, my gospel, and my rock.

But this revelation has been changed by man to mean as follows: That therein is not all things written concerning the church, but only all things concerning “the foundation of” the church—or the beginning of the church: that you must build up the church, beginning according to the written word, and add new offices, new ordinances, and new doctrines as I (the Lord) reveal them to you from year to year: . . . When the Book of Doctrine and Covenants was compiled in 1834, the church had then received many revelations to establish new offices and doctrines that are not even mentioned in the New Covenant of either of the two sacred books. They changed this revelation in order to sustain these new doctrines. If they had not made this change, the plain language of the original revelation would have condemned the Book of Doctrine and Covenants. I want to repeat that I was present when Brother Joseph received this revelation through the stone: . . . I know of a surety that it was changed when printed in the Doctrine and Covenants in 1834 . . . There are several of the old Book of Commandments yet in the land; bring them to light and see for yourselves that these revelations were changed just as I tell you.

These changes were made by the leaders of the church, who had drifted into error and spiritual blindness. Through the influence of Sydney Rigdon, Brother Joseph was led on and on into receiving revelations every year, to establish offices and doctrines which are not even mentioned in the teachings of Christ in the written word. In a few years they had gone away ahead of the written word, so that they had to change these revelations, as you will understand when I have finished. (An Address To All Believers In Christ, 1887, pp. 58-59)

CHANGE I. (see page 22) Notice that 97 words have been added. David Whitmer made this statement concerning this interpolation:

The next change of importance is in a revelation given in Fayette, New York, June, 1830 . . .

The heading over it in the Book of Commandments is as follows: “The Articles and Covenants of the Church of Christ, given in Fayette, New York, June, 1830.” Two paragraphs have been added to it, having been thrust into the middle of it. Paragraphs 16 and 17 is the part added, [verses 65-67 in current Utah Ed.] which part speaks of high priests and other high offices that the church never knew of until almost two years after its beginning: As if God had made a mistake in the first organization of the church, and left out these high important offices which are all above an elder; and as if God had made a mistake and left these high offices out of that revelation when it was first given. Oh the weakness and blindness of man! (An Address To All Believers In Christ, p. 59)

CHANGE J. (see page 22) Notice that in this revelation Emma Smith, Joseph’s wife, is told that she would be supported “from” the church, but in the Doctrine and Covenants it has been changed to make it appear that Joseph Smith would support her “in” the church. The Mormon leaders have condemned other churches for having a paid ministry. This change seems to have been made to cover up the fact that Joseph Smith was receiving money from the church.

CHANGE K. (see page 23) Notice that over 400 words have been added to this revelation. Part of the interpolation concerns the visitation of Peter, James and John to Joseph Smith. The Mormon leaders claim that they restored the Melchizedek Priesthood. David Whitmer, however, claimed that the Melchizedek Priesthood came into the church by a process of evolution rather than by revelation. The fact that these words concerning the visitation of Peter, James and John had to be added to the revelation tends to confirm David Whitmer’s charge. We hope to say more about this in a chapter on Priesthood.

CHANGE L. (see page 23) Notice that in the Book of Commandments the Mormons were told to “consecrate all” their properties to the church, but in the Doctrine and Covenants they were told only to “consecrate of” their properties.

The Mormons were accused of attempting “to establish communism.” The change in the revelation was evidently made to cover up the truth concerning this matter. Fawn Brodie says that Joseph Smith set up an economic order in his church which followed with a certain fidelity the life history of the typical communistic society of his time. . . . Joseph issued a revelation setting up the United Order of Enoch. . . . Private property became church property, and private profit a community spoil. . . .

Whatever surplus the steward exacted from the land, or whatever profit the mechanic derived from his shop, was contributed to the church storehouse and treasury, the convert keeping only what was “needful for the support and comfort” of himself and family. The spirit of true Marxian communism—“from each according to his ability, to each according to his need”—was implicit in the whole system. (No Man Knows My History, p. 106)

Sidney Rigdon may have been the one who influenced Joseph Smith to start the United Order. The Mormon writer Klaus J. Hansen states:

Parley P. Pratt, Oliver Cowdery and two other Elders, . . . stopped over at Kirtland, Ohio, and converted almost the entire Campbellite congregation of Sidney Rigdon, including Rigdon himself. These “Disciples of Christ,” who lived in a communistic order, became the nucleus for the Mormon settlement in Ohio. Joseph Smith, at first, likewise attempted to establish a communitarian society. (“The Theory and Practice of the Political Kingdom of God in Modern History, 1829-1890,” M.A. thesis, Brigham Young University, 1959, typed copy, pp. 74-75)

Fawn Brodie says that “Joseph’s enthusiasm for the United Order was always tempered by the fact that it was Rigdon’s conception” (No Man Knows My History, p. 108). He decided that it would not work out as he had planned, and therefore it became necessary to change the revelation to cover up the original plan.

CHANGES M, N, O, P and Q. These changes are concerning Priesthood which we will deal with in another chapter.

CHANGES R and S. (see page 26) Aleah Koury, of the Reorganized LDS Church, made this accusation against the Utah Mormon Church:

In order to lend support to the doctrine of a plurality of gods, the contents of a letter written by Joseph Smith and others on March 20, 1839, were deliberately altered. . . .

Approximately a year after Joseph obtained his freedom from prison, these original letters were published in the Times and Seasons, Nauvoo, Illinois, . . . If there had been any errors in these letters, Joseph and those who signed them with him had ample opportunity to correct them, . . . this was the only printing of these letters during Joseph's lifetime.

However in January, 1855, more than ten years after the death of Joseph Smith, the Utah church reprinted the first letter in the Millennial Star, . . . and in doing so, deliberately changed and altered the letter from the original as printed in the Times and Seasons. . . . portions of this altered letter were placed in the 1876 edition of the Utah Doctrine and Covenants as revelations from God, . . .

A comparison . . . reveals some of the deliberate alterations made in order to support the doctrine of a plurality of gods. Reference to deity in the Times and Seasons account reads:

. . . was ordained in the midst of the council of heaven in the presence of the eternal God, before this world was.

This statement was altered in the Utah church publications to read:

. . . was ordained in the midst of the Council of the Eternal God of all other gods before this world was . . .

In addition, the following statement was also added to the Utah church publications which has no counterpart in the original letter:

A time to come in the which nothing shall be withheld, whether there be one God or many gods, they shall be manifest.

This whole fabrication was a deliberate misrepresentation to implicate Joseph Smith in the promulgation of an unscriptural doctrine of a plurality of gods foreign to the teachings of the original church. (The Truth and the Evidence, Independence, Mo., 1965, pp. 25-27)

Garland E. Tickemyer, a minister in the Reorganized LDS Church, presents an entirely different view, however. His idea seems to be that Joseph Smith himself may have changed the letter before it was printed in the Times and Seasons:

The writer has joined in criticisms of the Utah Mormon Church for this apparently unwarranted "doctoring" of the letter to make it compatible with their plurality of Gods views.

In the process of doing research for this thesis, the writer became aware of a claim of the Utah Mormons that they had the original letter in their archives and that their Doctrine and Covenants version was taken direct from the original.

On March 30, 1954, while passing through Salt Lake City, the writer spent considerable time in gaining access to this purported original letter. . . .

The letter originally published in the Times and Seasons is evidently a synopsis of this letter and even the Utah Mormon Doctrine and Covenants version contains only excerpts of this letter. . . . We did not attempt to compare the wording throughout because of shortage of time. Since our interest was principally in the two disputed phrases we looked for them. We found that the Utah version is a correct copy of the letter we examined so far as the two phrases are concerned.

The disputed statements "whether there be one God or many," is not a forthright endorsement of a plurality of Gods concept. However, the phrase "in the midst of the council of Gods" is a fairly obvious reference to a plurality of Gods.

We now have the first evidence in this letter of something that was written during Joseph's lifetime. . . . when the letter was published the wording was changed, undoubtedly with the consent of and probably by its writers. We are still left to wonder which represented Joseph Smith's true view; the one written under the stress of prison life, or the more carefully considered version that he released to the world as representing the belief of the church. One gains the impression that he or his companions may have been speculating on the possibility of eternal progression but were not sufficiently certain of their position to make it official. ("A Study of Some Representative Concepts of a Finite God in Contemporary American Philosophy With Application to the God Concepts of the Utah Mormons," M.A. thesis, University of Southern California, 1954, typed copy, pp. 48-51)

If Joseph Smith suppressed the statements on the plurality of Gods when the letter was printed in the Times and Seasons (as Garland Tickemyer's thesis suggests), then he was guilty of deliberate deception. In a speech delivered June 19, 1844, when Joseph Smith was openly teaching the plurality of Gods, he stated:

"I will preach on the plurality of Gods. . . . I am bold to declare I have taught all the strong doctrines publicly, and always teach stronger doctrines in public than in private" (History of the Church, vol. 6, p. 474). If Joseph Smith suppressed the words concerning the plurality of Gods from the Times and Seasons, this statement would certainly be false.

Be this as it may, the Utah Mormon leaders find themselves faced with a dilemma. If they say that Joseph Smith changed the letter, they make him a deceiver. If, on the other hand, they say that the letter was changed in 1855 when Joseph Smith's History was printed in the Millennial Star, they implicate Brigham Young, the second President of the Mormon Church, who approved the revision of Joseph Smith's History. The Reorganized Church is in trouble if it can be shown that Joseph Smith changed the letter (which Tickemyer's thesis seems to show), but the Utah Mormon Church is in trouble either way. Even if the references to the plurality of Gods were in the original letter, why did Joseph Smith delete them before publication? And why were many of the words—approximately 3,700—which were printed in the Times and Seasons deleted in the Doctrine and Covenants?

Unthinkable?

Mormon leaders have been very free in accusing others of making changes. The Apostle Mark E. Petersen says that "deliberate falsifications and fabrications were perpetrated" in the Bible (As Translated Correctly, Salt Lake City, 1966, p. 4). On page 27 of the same book, the Apostle Petersen states: "It seems unthinkable to the honest and devout mind that any man or set of men would deliberately change the test of the Word of God to further their own peculiar purposes."

We certainly agree that it would be dishonest to change the "Word of God," but we wonder how the Mormon leaders can justify the changes in Joseph Smith's revelations, since they consider them to also be the "Word of God." Bruce R. McConkie stated: "As now constituted the Doctrine and Covenants contains 136 sections . . . Most of these sections came to Joseph Smith by direct revelation, the recorded words being those of the Lord Jesus Christ himself" (Mormon Doctrine, 1966, p. 206).

Now, certainly after we see the charges made against the Bible by the Mormon leaders, we would expect Mormon writings to be completely free of changes or alterations of any kind. Of all Mormon writings we would expect the Doctrine and Covenants to be the most pure and free from revision. The reason for this is that the Doctrine and Covenants purports to be the revelations given directly from God to Joseph Smith—not just a translation. We would expect these revelations to be completely free from alteration. Yet, upon careful examination, we find thousands of changes. How can the Mormon leaders explain this?

While many of the Mormons deny that the revelations were changed, some admit that changes were made but try to justify them by saying that God has a right to change His word. Melvin J. Petersen wrote:

Once a man has been recognized and accepted as a prophet and favored with communications from God, his great responsibility is to make sure, inasmuch as he has power to do so, that those to whom the communications are directed, understand what God has revealed for them. The power is his to revise, correct, omit, or change any of his writings in order that he might manifest more clearly what God revealed through him. . . .

A prophet cannot be justly criticized when he rewrites the commandments he received from God, for he is only doing that which is part of his role as a prophet. ("A Study of the Nature of and the Significance of the Changes in the Revelations . . .," pp. 164-165)

We cannot understand how Melvin Petersen can reason in this way. David Whitmer, one of the three witnesses to the Book of Mormon, made this statement concerning this matter: “Is it possible that the minds of men can be so blinded as to believe that God would give these revelations—command them to print them in His Book of Commandments—and then afterwards command them to change and add to them some words which change the meaning entirely? As if God had changed his mind entirely after giving his word? Is it possible that a man who pretends to any spirituality would believe that God would work in any such manner?” (Saints’ Herald, February 5, 1887).

Outwardly, Joseph Smith seemed to be very opposed to any changes being made in the revelations. When Oliver Cowdery asked him to change one of the revelations, he wrote:

I immediately wrote to him in reply, in which I asked him by what authority he took upon him to command me to alter or erase, to add to or diminish from a revelation or commandment from Almighty God. (History of the Church, vol. 1, p. 105)

Joseph Fielding Smith says that “Joseph immediately answered by letter that he could not alter the revelations of the Lord” (Essentials in Church History, p. 109).

Edward Stevenson wrote the following:

In order to show how particular the Prophet was regarding revelations which he received from the Lord, I will relate an incident which occurred in Liberty jail. While the Prophet was receiving a revelation, the late Bishop Alexander McRae was writing as Joseph received it. Upon this occasion Brother McRae suggested a slight change in the wording of the revelation, when Joseph sternly asked:

Do you know who you are writing for?

Brother McRae, who at once discovered his mistake, begged the Prophet’s pardon for undertaking to correct the word of the Lord. (Reminiscences of Joseph, the Prophet, Salt Lake City, 1893, p. 42)

David Whitmer claimed that Cowdery told him that Rigdon was the one who convinced Joseph Smith that it would be all right to change the revelations:

I want to tell the brethren, that when the Doctrine and Covenants was published and presented to that assembly on that occasion, a very few of the brethren knew at that time about those “changes” in revelations concerning “Joseph’s gift” and “to rely upon the Book of Mormon in building up the church,” etc. In time it was generally found out, and the result was as I have stated. I want to state also that Oliver Cowdery told me that Rigdon was the cause of those changes being made: by smooth talk he convinced Joseph, Oliver, and F. G. Williams that it was all right. Oliver told me that he had sorely repented of that thing; and he repented of the other errors he had been led into by Rigdon and others. Bro. John Whitmer likewise. Thank God I can say that Bro. John and Bro. Oliver come out of their errors, repented of them, and died believing as I do to-day. I stand today just where I and the others stood in the early days of the church when the Bible and the Book of Mormon were the rule and guide to our faith. (Saints’ Herald, February 5, 1887)

In the “Explanatory Introduction” to the Doctrine and Covenants (p. v) we find what purports to be the testimony of the Twelve Apostles to the Doctrine and Covenants. Among the names signed on this purported document we find that of the Apostle William E. McLellin. In later years, however, McLellin claimed that this “testimony” was a “base forgery” (see our Case, vol. 1, p. 189). McLellin also had a great deal to say about the changes in the revelations. The Salt Lake Tribune for October 6, 1875, printed the following statement regarding McLellin:

His faith was first shaken by the changes made in the revelations. He had been careful to keep copies of the originals, presented proof that all the early revelations were changed three times, and considerably amended before they appeared in their present form.

William E. McLellin is reported as saying:

“In 1835 in Kirtland another committee was appointed to fix up the revelations for print again. I was teaching their high school in the lower room, the printing office being overhead. And I was often in Joseph’s office, and know positively that some of the revelations were so altered, mutilated and changed that a good scholar would scarcely know them. In one revelation I counted 20 alterations! Hence, who can depend upon them? I cannot. I will not. . . . All your trouble arises from your taking that mutilated and altered Doctrine and Covenants.” (Saints’ Herald, vol. 17:556-557, as quoted in Changing of the Revelations, by Daniel Macgregor, Independence, Mo., p. 6)

Chas. W. Lamb quotes this statement from a letter written by W. E. McLellin in 1877:

For instance he says: — “I found that Smith did not always tell the truth. . . . He materially altered his own revelations before they were ever printed.” (The Return, Davis City, Iowa, Nov. 1890, p. 364)

Since William E. McLellin was an Apostle in the Mormon Church, his statements are certainly important. Even more significant, however, is the fact that David Whitmer, one of the three special witnesses to the Book of Mormon, would write a book in which he criticized Joseph Smith for changing the revelations. He stated:

. . . when the Book of Doctrine and Covenants was published, . . . a very few of the brethren then knew about most of the important changes that had been put in the Book of Doctrine and Covenants. In time it was generally found out, and the result was that some of the members left the church on account of it. . . . When it became generally known that these important changes had been made in the Doctrine and Covenants, many of the brethren objected seriously to it, but they did not want to say much for the sake of peace, as it was Brother Joseph and the leaders who did it. The majority of the members—poor weak souls—thought that anything Brother Joseph would do, must be all right; so in their blindness of heart, trusting in an arm of flesh, they looked over it and were led into error, . . .

Some of the Latter Day Saints have claimed that God had the same right to authorize Brother Joseph to add to any revelations certain words and facts, that He had to give him any revelations at all: . . . God does not change and work in any such manner as this; all those who believe that God does work this way, my prayer for them is that they may repent, for they are in utter spiritual blindness. (An Address To All Believers In Christ, by David Whitmer, Richmond, Mo., 1887, p. 61)

On page 49 of the same book, David Whitmer stated:

You have changed the revelations from the way they were first given and as they are to-day in the Book of Commandments, to support the error of Brother Joseph in taking upon himself the office of Seer to the church. You have changed the revelations to support the error of high priests. You have changed the revelations to support the error of a President of the high priesthood, high counselors, etc. You have altered the revelations to support you in going beyond the plain teachings of Christ in the new covenant part of the Book of Mormon. You have changed and altered the revelations to support the error of publishing these revelations in a book: the errors you are in, revelations have been changed to support and uphold them. You who are now living did not change them, but you who strive to defend these things, are as guilty in the sight of God as those who did change them. (An Address To All Believers In Christ, p. 49)

For more information on the changes in the revelations see our Case Against Mormonism, vol. 1, pages 131-191.

Was the Book of Commandments Finished?

On page 15 of this book we quoted David Whitmer, one of the three witnesses of the Book of Mormon, as making this statement about the Book of Commandments: “Many of the books were finished and distributed among the members of the church . . .” RLDS Church Historian Richard P. Howard, however, maintains that the last part of the book had not been completed at the time the printing press was destroyed by the mob:

. . . the typesetting for the Book of Commandments had progressed through five large galley-proof sheets, each containing thirty-two pages (sixteen printed on either side of each sheet) or a total of 160 pages including the title page. . . . The typesetting on the Book of Commandments was interrupted, . . . by the mob depredation committed against the church . . .

Church members managed to salvage a small number of sets of the five galley sheets already printed and later had them bound and distributed. It is impossible to determine the precise number of copies of the unfinished Book of Commandments distributed in this way, but there must have been several hundred at least, since a number of references to the Book of Commandments were made in the writings of church leaders of that period. (Restoration Scriptures, Independence, Missouri, 1969, p. 200)

On page 266 of the same book, Richard Howard has published a photograph from the “MS to the Book of Commandments” which seems to show that the last portion of the book had not been printed when the mob arrived. In any case, some of the printed pages were salvaged and bound into books, and there is no reason to question David Whitmer’s statement that These revelations . . . were printed just exactly as they were arranged by Brother Joseph and the others. And when the Book of Commandments was printed, Joseph and the church received it as being printed correctly.

More on Suppression of Wood Reprints

On pages 16-17 of this book we speak of the suppression of Wilford Wood’s photographic reprints of the Book of Commandments and the first editions of the Doctrine and Covenants and Book of Mormon. These books were originally printed by the church’s own Deseret Press under the title, Joseph Smith Begins His Works, volumes 1 and 2. After we called attention to the ban on these books, Deseret Bookstore made some effort to counteract our charges. It was reported to us that these volumes were sold or displayed at some of the Deseret Bookstores. On September 18, 1976, we called the main store in Salt Lake City to enquire about the matter. We were told that they were “not permitted to” sell those books. When we called the Cottonwood branch, a man stated he had “never seen it in [the] year I’ve been here.” A woman at the Fashion Place branch said it was “out of stock.” The Valley Fair branch, however, had the books and was selling them for $2.95 less than the regular price.

On January 10, 1981, we decided to check out this matter again. A woman at the church section of the main store in Salt Lake City said they “haven’t ever sold them.” When she was pressed about the matter, however, she indicated that another department which handled out of print books might be able to help. The man in this department said that he did have volume 2. The branch stores all indicated they were “out of stock” but would have some in a week or two. On December 3, 1981, we checked again and found that the main store and two of the three other branches in Salt Lake City had the books for sale.

This whole matter with regard to the Wood reprints demonstrates the inability of the Mormon leaders to deal forthrightly with the issues. In a letter dated February 28, 1977, Apostle Mark E. Petersen made this surprising statement:

I do not happen to have a copy of “Joseph Smith Begins His Work,” by Wilford Wood, because we do not accept his writings. He was a man who was “far out” to say the least, and of course he took great delight in embarrassing us by digging up things that certain of our men had said or written but which were not authentic or valid.

Apostle Petersen was apparently reminded that Joseph Smith Begins His Works is an exact photographic reproduction of Joseph Smith’s own publications and that when he worked for Deseret Publishing Company Apostle Thomas S. Monson had signed an affidavit certifying to the authenticity of the reproduction (see page 17 of this book). In a letter dated April 4, 1977, Apostle Petersen added to the confusion by stating:

I have just received your letter of March 28. You certainly have a gift either to misunderstand what I say, or to misinterpret, or to put a wrong conclusion on my words.

When I wrote you about Wilford Wood and said that I did not have his book “Joseph Smith Begins His Work,” I was not commenting on that book at all because I have never seen it. How could I comment on it? You yourself say that it contains the Lectures on Faith, which I knew nothing about because, as I say, I have not seen the book.

I am well acquainted with the Lectures on Faith. We have accepted them all through the years from the time of Joseph Smith. They were published in our Doctrine and Covenants for many years . . .

This “affidavit” that you speak about is merely to certify that the Deseret News Publishing Company printed these books as originals from Wilford Wood. There is nothing wrong with that affidavit. I might say to you that when Wilford Wood had that publication made, I myself was the general manager of the Deseret News, and I gave permission for our plant to publish that book. The affidavit was simply to say that we published it for him, so nobody needs to either trust or distrust that certified statement so far as church doctrine is concerned.

My comment on Wilford Wood was simply that he was an unreliable man. . . . I have gone over many of his writings before we published them and I have argued with him and persuaded him to change some of his things when he was wrong, although I was not successful always. . . .

I am reading again another paragraph of your letter, on page 2, concerning Wilford Wood and “Joseph Smith Begins His Work,” and again say to you that I was not commenting on the contents of that book because I have never seen it and I try not to talk about things I don’t know anything about.

You say, “I think that you can very easily see why I would be greatly confused.” There is no reason why you should be confused because we are telling the truth and we stand by the truth, but we don’t stay by alleged statements made by irresponsible people and Wilford Wood was one of those individuals.

Joseph Anderson, of the Church Historical Department, was certainly more forthright about this matter. In a letter dated July 29, 1974, he wrote:

The two volumes issued by Wilford Wood entitled, Joseph Smith Begins His Work, were actual photographic reproductions of the 1830 Book of Mormon, the 1833 Book of Commandments, the 1835 Doctrine and Covenants and the Lectures on Faith. Therefore, they are accurate reproductions because they are photographically reproduced. The 14 Articles of Faith were taken by Wilford Wood from an early newspaper and are not officially approved by the Church.

. . . Joseph Smith made many corrections in the 1837 and the 1840 editions of the Book of Mormon. . . . you will find in comparison with the 1830 and the current Book of Mormon that there are many changes, but these were made by Joseph Smith. The same is true of the revelations contained in the 1833 Book of Commandments and the 1835 Doctrine and Covenants. Joseph Smith, being the one who received these revelations and had them recorded, likewise would have a right to add or to subtract from, or change, the revelations and did so in some cases. Therefore, there will be some differences between those early publications and the current Doctrine and Covenants.

Important Change in Recently Canonized Revelation

On April 3, 1976, the Church Section of the Deseret News reported:

Two revelations received by former Presidents of the Church, were accepted as scripture Saturday afternoon, April 3, by vote of Church membership. . . .

The new scriptures, which will be arranged in verses as part of the Pearl of Great Price, include the account of the Prophet Joseph Smith's vision of the Celestial Kingdom received Jan. 21, 1836. . . .

It was later decided that these revelations should be added to the Doctrine and Covenants. In any case, after these two revelations were canonized by the Mormon Church, H. Michael Marquardt, a student of church history, discovered that the one concerning Joseph Smith's vision of the Celestial Kingdom had been altered. Mr. Marquardt found that this revelation was recorded in Joseph Smith's own diary under the date of January 21, 1836, and read as follows:

The heavens were opened upon us and I beheld the celestial Kingdom of God, . . . I saw father Adam and Abraham and Michael and my father and mother, my brother Alvin . . . (Joseph Smith's 1835-36 Diary, January 21, 1836; printed by Modern Microfilm Co.)

When the Mormon leaders printed this revelation they deleted the words "and Michael" without any indication. It reads as follows in the new edition of the Doctrine and Covenants:

The heavens were opened upon us, and I beheld the celestial kingdom of God, . . . I saw Father Adam and Abraham; and my father and my mother; my brother Alvin, . . . (Doctrine and Covenants, 1981, Section 137, verses 1, 5)

At first glance the deletion of the words "and Michael" does not appear too important. In Mormon theology, however, a serious problem is created by the statement, "I saw father Adam and Abraham and Michael." According to Joseph Smith's other revelations, Adam is Michael. In the Doctrine and Covenants 107:54 we read: "And the Lord appeared unto them, and they rose up and blessed Adam, and called him Michael, the prince, the archangel." In 27:11 we read: "And also with Michael, or Adam, the father of all, the prince of all, the ancient of days." Thus it is clear that if Adam is Michael, Joseph Smith could not have seen "Adam, and Abraham and Michael." Mormon leaders must have been aware that this would create a problem in Mormon theology, and therefore they deleted the words "and Michael" from the revelation.

This change was apparently made sometime while the church was under Brigham Young's leadership. The fact that the change was made after Joseph Smith's death is evident from Mr. Marquardt's research. He found that the revelation was copied into the handwritten manuscript of the History of the Church (Book B-1, p. 695), with the words "and Michael" still included. Mr. Marquardt also found that the words were in the duplicate copy of the "Manuscript History" (Book B-2, p. 618). This is significant because the Mormon leaders did not even start the duplicate copy until almost a year after Joseph Smith's death (see Brigham Young University Studies, Summer 1971, p. 469). This would mean that the change had to have been made after Smith's death. By the time the revelation was published in the Deseret News, September 4, 1852, the words "and Michael" had been deleted. Thus it appears that the change took place sometime between 1845 and 1852 and that current Mormon leaders have canonized a falsified revelation.

With regard to the vision of the Celestial Kingdom, it is also interesting to note that the Mormon leaders have only canonized the first part of the vision. Over 200 words which appear in Joseph Smith's diary are not included. (The History of the Church 2:380-81 also bears witness to this fact.) Among the words missing from the canonized revelation, we find the following:

. . . I also beheld Elder McLellin in the South, standing upon a hill surrounded with a vast multitude preaching to them and a lame man standing before him supported by his crutches, he threw them down at his word and leaped as a hart, by the mighty power of God . . .

It would probably prove to be embarrassing if the Mormon leaders canonized this prophecy about McLellin, because the History of the Church informs us that he was "Excommunicated from the Church at Far West. Thence forward he took an active part in the persecution of the Saints in Missouri, and at one time expressed the desire to do violence to the person of Joseph Smith, . . . Subsequently he attempted what he called a reorganization of the Church, . . ." (vol. 3, pp. 31-32).

In the same revelation Joseph Smith claimed that he "saw the 12 apostles of the Lamb who are now upon the earth who hold the keys of this last ministry in foreign lands standing together in a circle . . . and I finally saw the 12 in the celestial Kingdom of God . . ."

In the Bible, Jesus predicted that the Apostle Judas would fall; Joseph Smith, however, seemed to be oblivious to what was about to happen to his Apostles. At least half of the Apostles were eventually excommunicated, and four of them apparently died out of the church (see Essentials in Church History, 1942, pp. 663-65). Since Apostles William E. McLellin and William Smith (Joseph Smith's own brother) tried very hard to destroy the Mormon Church, we wonder how Joseph Smith could have seen "the 12 in the celestial Kingdom of God." In any case, the present-day leaders of the Mormon Church did not seem to feel that it would be wise to canonize this part of the revelation.

The Kirtland Revelation Book

In 1979 we photographically printed a manuscript which had been suppressed by the Mormon leaders for a century and a half. This is Joseph Smith's Kirtland Revelation Book, a handwritten manuscript containing copies of early revelations. Although the Kirtland Revelation Book does not give us original copies of the revelations which were first printed in the Book of Commandments, it does provide evidence concerning falsifications made in some later revelations. For instance, a revelation given on March 15, 1832, has been altered to disguise the fact that Jesse Gause, a man who later denied the faith, had been called to one of the highest offices in the Mormon Church—i.e., a "councillor unto my Servant Joseph." Michael Marquardt called this change to our attention several years ago. He had been studying another handwritten copy of this revelation and noticed that Jesse Gause's name was crossed out and the name Frederick G. Williams inserted in its place. The name "Frederick G. Williams" appears in the Doctrine and Covenants 81:1, and the heading to the revelation

Photographs of two handwritten copies of the revelation to Jesse Gause. Notice that the name has been changed to Frederick G. Williams in both copies (see arrows). The photograph at the top is taken from Joseph Smith's Kirtland Revelation Book in the Church Historical Department. The second copy is owned by the RLDS Church and appeared in H. Michael Marquardt's article, "The Strange Beginnings of the Mormon High Priesthood Presidency" (The Journal of Pastoral Practice, vol. IV, no. 2, p. 91).

states: “Frederick G. Williams called to be a High Priest and a Counselor in the First Presidency of the Church.” The 1981 printing of the Doctrine and Covenants, which appears in the new “triple combination,” has a longer heading to the revelation. It admits that, “The historical records show that when this revelation was received in March 1832, it called Jesse Gause to the office of counselor to Joseph Smith in the First Presidency. However, when he failed to continue in a manner consistent with this appointment, the call was subsequently transferred to Frederick G. Williams.” Although we feel that this is certainly a step in the right direction, the wording is so evasive that a person would not understand that the revelation has actually been changed.

The Kirtland Revelation Book establishes beyond all doubt that it was Jesse Gause that the revelation was given to and the name Frederick G. Williams is a falsification. The page index at the front of the book plainly stated that on page 17 the reader would find a “Revelation to Jesse Gauze,” but when we turn to the revelation itself we find his name blotted out and the name “Frederick G. Williams” inserted between the lines. Moreover, on pages 10 and 11 of the same book, under the date of March 8, 1832, we find this statement by Joseph Smith:

Chose this day and ordained brother Jesse Gause and Broth Sidney to be my councillors of the ministry of the presidency of the high Priesthood . . .

Mormon scholar D. Michael Quinn has admitted that this revelation has been tampered with:

For some reason, the introductory words “my servant Jesse” in this document were altered to read “my servant Frederick G. Williams,” and the latter version appears in the published editions of the revelation. There is no question that the revelation was directed to Gause, because the page index to the book read “Revelation to Jesse Gauze [sic] March 15—1832.” Since Williams later replaced Gause in the presidency apparently someone felt justified in substituting the names. This unfortunate alteration has not only violated the context of the original document, but it has further obscured the existence of Gause as one of the General Authorities of the church and has erroneously indicated that Williams was a counselor in 1832 [see Doctrine and Covenants, Section 81]. (Journal of Mormon History, vol. 1, 1974, p. 24, n. 15)

In the Preface to Joseph Smith’s Kirtland Revelation Book, we show other instances where this manuscript proves falsification in the revelations. At the present time H. Michael Marquardt is compiling early texts of Joseph Smith’s revelations from manuscript and printed sources. This work will throw more light on the question of changes in Joseph Smith’s revelations.

4. Joseph Smith and Money-Digging

In this chapter we will discuss the evidence showing that Joseph Smith was involved in money-digging and how this relates to the Book of Mormon.

Joseph Smith's 1826 Trial

In the Salt Lake City Messenger for August, 1971, we announced one of the most important discoveries since Joseph Smith founded the Mormon Church in 1830. This is the discovery by Wesley P. Walters of an original document which is more than 140 years old, found in Norwich, New York. This document proves that Joseph Smith was a "glass looker" and that he was arrested, tried and found guilty by a justice of the peace in Bainbridge, New York, in 1826. (The reader will find a photograph of this document on the next page.) The importance of this discovery cannot be overstated, for it establishes the historicity of the account of the trial which was first published in Fraser's Magazine in 1873. We quote the following from that publication:

STATE OF NEW YORK v. JOSEPH SMITH

Warrant issued upon written complaint upon oath of Peter G. Bridgeman, who informed that one Joseph Smith of Bainbridge was a disorderly person and an impostor.

Prisoner brought before Court March 20, 1826. Prisoner examined: says that he came from the town of Palmyra, and had been at the house of Josiah Stowel in Bainbridge most of time since; had small part of time been employed by said Stowel on his farm, and going to school. That he had a certain stone which he had occasionally looked at to determine where hidden treasures in the bowels of the earth were; that he professed to tell in this manner where gold mines were a distance under ground, and had looked for Mr. Stowel several times, and had informed him where he could find these treasures, and Mr. Stowel had been engaged in digging for them. That at Palmyra he pretended to tell by looking at this stone where coined money was buried in Pennsylvania, and while at Palmyra had frequently ascertained in that way where lost property was of various kinds; that he had occasionally been in the habit of looking through this stone to find lost property for three years, but of late had pretty much given it up on account of its injuring his health, especially his eyes, making them sore; that he did not solicit business of this kind, and had always rather declined having anything to do with this business.

Josiah Stowel sworn: says that prisoner had been at his house something like five months; had been employed by him to work on farm part of time; that he pretended to have skill of telling where hidden treasures in the earth were by means of looking through a certain stone; that prisoner had looked for him sometimes; once to tell him about money buried in Bend Mountain in Pennsylvania, once for gold on Monument Hill, and once for a salt spring; and that he positively knew that the prisoner could tell, and did possess the art of seeing those valuable treasures through the medium of said stone; that he found the (word illegible) at Bend and Monument Hill as prisoner represented it; that prisoner had looked through said stone for Deacon

Attleton for a mine, did not exactly find it, but got a p—— (word unfinished) of ore which resembled gold, he thinks; that prisoner had told by means of this stone where a Mr. Bacon had buried money; that he and prisoner had been in search of it; that prisoner had said it was in a certain root of a stump five feet from surface of the earth, and with it would be found a tail feather; that said Stowel and prisoner thereupon commenced digging, found a tail feather, but money was gone; that he supposed the money moved down. That prisoner did offer his services; that he never deceived him; that prisoner looked through stone and described Josiah Stowel's house and outhouses, while at Palmyra at Simpson Stowel's, correctly; that he had told about a painted tree, with a man's head painted upon it, by means of said stone. That he had been in company with prisoner digging for gold, and had the most implicit faith in prisoner's skill.

Arad Stowel sworn: says that he went to see whether prisoner could convince him that he possessed the skill he professed to have, upon which prisoner laid a book upon a white cloth, and proposed looking through another stone which was white and transparent, hold the stone to the candle, turn his head to book, and read. The deception appeared so palpable that witness went off disgusted.

McMaster sworn: says he went with Arad Stowel, and likewise came away disgusted. Prisoner pretended to him that he could discover objects at a distance by holding this white stone to the sun or candle; that prisoner rather declined looking into a hat at his dark coloured stone, as he said that it hurt his eyes.

Jonathan Thompson says that prisoner was requested to look for chest of money; did look, and pretended to know where it was; and prisoner, Thompson, and Yeomans went in search of it; that Smith arrived at spot first; was at night; that Smith looked in hat while there, and when very dark, and told how the chest was situated. After digging several feet, struck upon something sounding like a board or plank. Prisoner would not look again, pretending that he was alarmed on account of the circumstances relating to the trunk being buried, [which], came all fresh to his mind. That the last time he looked he discovered distinctly the two Indians who buried the trunk, that a quarrel ensued between them, and that one of said Indians was killed by the other, and thrown into the hole beside the trunk, to guard it, as he supposed. Thompson says that he believes in the prisoner's professed skill; that the board which he struck his spade upon was probably the chest, but on account of an enchantment the trunk kept settling away from under them when digging; that notwithstanding they continued constantly removing the dirt, yet the trunk kept about the same distance from them. Says prisoner said that it appeared to him that salt might be found at Bainbridge, and that he is certain that prisoner can divine things by means of said stone. That as evidence of the fact prisoner looked into his hat to tell him about some money witness lost sixteen years ago, and that he described the man that witness supposed had taken it, and the disposition of the money:

And therefore the Court find the Defendant guilty. Costs: Warrant, 19c. Complaint upon oath, 25 1/2 c. Seven witnesses, 87 1/2 c. Recognisances, 25c. Mittimus, 19c. Recognisances of witnesses, 75c. Subpoena, 18c.—$2.68. (Fraser's Magazine, Feb. 1873, pp. 229-230)

Above is a photograph of Justice Albert Neely's bill showing the costs involved in several trials in 1826. The fifth item from the top mentions the trial of "Joseph Smith The Glass looker." When the letter "s" was repeated in documents of Joseph Smith's time, as in the word "glass," the two letters appeared as a "p" (see the word "assault" in items 1, 4, 7 and 9). To the left we have typed out the portion of the bill which mentions Joseph Smith. This bill proves that the published court record is authentic.

Although the Bainbridge court record was printed a few times it did not become too well known until Fawn Brodie printed it in her book No Man Knows My History. Immediately after her book appeared the Mormon leaders declared that the record was a forgery. The following appeared in the “Church Section” of the Deseret News:

... the alleged find is no discovery at all, for the purported record has been included in other books . . . after all her puffing and promise the author produces no court record at all, though persistently calling it such. . . . This alleged record is obviously spurious . . . The really vital things which a true record must contain are not there, though there is a lot of surplus verbiage set out in an impossible order which the court was not required to keep.

This record could not possibly have been made at the time as the case proceeded. It is patently a fabrication of unknown authorship and never in the court records at all. (Deseret News, Church Section, May 11, 1946, as quoted in A New Witness For Christ in America, vol. 2, 1959, pp. 430-431)

The Mormon Apostle John A. Widtsoe stated:

This alleged court record . . . seems to be a literary attempt of an enemy to ridicule Joseph Smith by bringing together all the current gossip of that day and making him appear to confess to it. . . . There is no existing proof that such a trial was ever held. (Joseph Smith—Seeker After Truth, Salt Lake City, 1951, p. 78)

The Mormon scholar Francis W. Kirkham claimed that he did a great deal of research with regard to this matter and came to the conclusion that the court record was spurious:

A careful study of all facts regarding this alleged confession of Joseph Smith in a court of law that he had used a seer stone to find hidden treasure for purposes of fraud, must come to the conclusion that no such record was ever made, and therefore, is not in existence. . . . No record exists and there is no evidence to prove one was ever made in which he confessed in a justice of the peace court that he had used a seer stone to find hidden treasures for purposes of fraud and deception. (A New Witness For Christ in America, vol. 1, pp. 385, 386, 391)

The document which Wesley P. Walters found is Justice Albert Neely’s bill showing the costs involved in several trials in 1826. The fifth item from the top mentions the trial of “Joseph Smith The Glass looker.” Below is a photograph of this portion of the document (see complete document on page 33 of this book).

The fact that the document says that Joseph Smith was a “Glass looker” fits very well with the published version of the trial. In fact, this statement alone seems to show that the published account of the trial is authentic. Besides this, however, Neely’s bill provides additional evidence. It states that the trial took place on “March 20, 1826,” and this is precisely the date found in the published account of the trial: “Prisoner brought before Court March 20, 1826” (Fraser’s Magazine, February 1873, p. 229). In Albert Neely’s bill the fee for this trial is listed as “2.68,” and this is the exact figure found in the printed record: “Costs: . . . $2.68.”

In the face of this evidence it is impossible to continue to deny the authenticity of the court record.

In the book Joseph Smith and Money Digging we devoted over 15 pages to a study of this court trial. On page 38 we concluded:

“Although the evidence supporting the authenticity of the ‘court record’ seems to be rather convincing, more research needs to be done.” We did show, however, that the court record was brought to Salt Lake City by Emily Pearsall, the niece of Albert Neely. When Charles Marshall published the record in Fraser’s Magazine, he stated:

During my stay in Salt Lake permission was courteously accorded me to copy out of a set of such judicial proceedings not hitherto published. I cannot doubt their genuineness. The original papers were lent me by a lady of well-known position, in whose family they had been preserved since the date of the transactions. (Fraser’s Magazine, Feb. 1873, vol. VII, p. 229)

In her attack on Fawn Brodie’s book, F. L. Stewart cast doubt upon the statement that Albert Neely was a justice of the peace in Bainbridge in 1826:

But was Albert Neely a justice of the peace in Bainbridge in 1826? He lost an election as justice for the year 1828. The election was held in November, 1827, and he received the fewest votes of all the candidates. He was later a justice of the peace in Manlius, New York, in 1838. No known records indicate that he was a justice in Bainbridge in 1826. (Exploding The Myth About Joseph Smith, The Mormon Prophet, New York, 1967, pp. 69-70)

During the past few years Wesley P. Walters has been doing a great deal of research concerning the court record. He has made several trips to New York in search of evidence. By June 23, 1971, he was able to give this encouraging report in a letter to a friend:

As I am sure you are aware, the document was printed three times—once in England (with a reprinting of this in N.Y.), once by Tuttle in the Schaff-Herzog Ency., and once by the Methodists. The first and last of these printings give the court costs. This summer I spent a few days at Norwich and among the county records I found some bills from the town of Bainbridge. Bills for the years 1826 and 1827 were missing, presumably among the water-damaged items the court house threw out some while back. However, the bills from 1825 and 1828 were there and give an example of what the J.P. charges were at that time. A subpoena was 6¢ each, so that a charge of 18¢ in the document must represent 3 subpoenas; Recognisance charge was 25¢, so that the document’s charge of 25¢ is in perfect agreement and the charge of 75¢ for “recognisance of witnesses” must represent three such witnesses. . . . To my mind there is enough agreement here to make the possibility of the document being a forgery out of the realm of possibility.

Finally, the other surrounding circumstances all are in proper place. . . . Miss F. L. Stewart in Exploding the Myth casts doubt on the court record because there was no evidence that Albert Neely was a J.P. in 1826. Well, I found his official appointment papers signed by the 3 circuit judges and the 15 county supervisors and the date of his appointment was November 16, 1825. If the bills for 1826 had been available still, I am sure there would have been an itemized account of all the warrants he issued, and cost involved for the town and county, as there are in the other justices bills for 1825 and 1828. In fact, the itemized bills were totaled and at the annual meeting of the Board of Supervisors the total amounts were “audited and allowed.” In their Supervisor’s record book for 1826 Albert Neely’s name appears under the town of Bainbridge as being paid $6.34 by the town and $15.44 by the county. So as far as I am concerned, there is no question in my mind that Albert Neely was a J.P. in 1826 and that Smith was tried before him, and that the published record is really a genuine account of what happened.

There are other little details that fit into place as well . . . from every angle the whole matter has the ring of genuineness about it. (Letter written by Wesley P. Walters, dated June 23, 1971) was back searching for the missing bills. Toward the end of July, 1971, we received a phone call announcing the important discovery—i.e., the discovery of Justice Neely’s bill for 1826. Wesley P. Walters also sent us a letter telling of other important discoveries. In this letter we find the following:

By this time you should have gotten over the shock of my phone call about finding the 1826 Neely bill. . . .

In addition to what I sent you recording the bill for the trial of “Joseph Smith The Glass Looker” . . . there is also the bill of Constable Philip M. DeZeng. His charges include ones for “Serving warrant on Joseph Smith and tr[avel]” ???<<?? very faint, water damage, “Subpoening 12 Witnesses & travel”; “attendance with Prisoner two days & 1 nigh[t]”; “Notifying two Justices” and “10 miles travel with mittimus to take him.” . . . There are also bills from Arad Stowell (one of the witness[es] in the trial) for 1826 when he was serving as school commissioner.

Below is a photograph of the bill of Constable Philip M. DeZeng. Notice that the date 1826 is written at the top of the bill. The arrow points to the place where Constable DeZeng tells of “Serving Warrant on Joseph Smith . . .”

On October 28, 1971, Wesley P. Walters made an affidavit concerning the discovery of these documents:

REVEREND WESLEY P. WALTERS, being first duly sworn upon his oath, deposes and states:

On Saturday, May 22, 1971, while in Norwich, New York, I, Wesley P. Walters, of Marissa, Illinois, was shown by the County Historian, Mrs. Mae Smith, where Chenango County kept their dead storage, which was in a back, poorly-lit room in the basement of the County Jail. While looking through this material in company with Mrs. Smith, we came across the county bills from the early eighteen hundreds. These bills were arranged in bundles by townships, and the townships bound together by years. There were bills from all the town officials, including an itemized listing of cases tried by each of the local Justices of the Peace, and an itemized listing of costs by the Constables who served warrants and made arrests. I realized that if the bills for 1826 and 1830 for the Town of Bainbridge could be located, there would doubtless be references to the two trials of Joseph Smith, the founder of the Mormon Church. I was successful in locating the bills for 1824, 1825, 1828, and 1829, but could not find those for 1826 and 1830. There was still much material to look through, and my schedule required that I leave without finishing my search.

On July 28, 1971, I was able to return to Norwich and in the late afternoon I went back to the County Jail accompanied by Mr. Fred Poffarl of Philadelphia. After looking through some of the remaining material for a short while, Mr. Poffarl discovered two cardboard boxes in the darkest area of the room, containing more bundles of bills, all mixed up as to date, and some badly water-soaked and mildewed from being shoved against a leaky wall. I looked in one box while Fred looked in the other. It was in Mr. Poffarl’s box that the 1826 bills were soon found, followed by the 1830 ones. When I opened the 1826 bundle and got part way through the pile of Bainbridge bills, all of which were very damp and mildewed, I came upon, first, the J.P. bill of Albert Neely and then upon the Constable’s bill of Philip M. DeZeng. On Mr. Neely’s bill was the item of the trial of “Joseph Smith The Glass Looker” on March 20, 1826, and a cost to the county from Mr. Neely of $2.68. On the bill of Mr. DeZeng were the charges for arresting and keeping Joseph Smith, notifying two justices, subpoenaing 12 witnesses, as well as a mittimus charge for 10 miles travel “to take him,” with no specification as to where he was taken on the Mittimus. Likewise, in the 1830 bundles I found both the Constable’s and Justice’s bills that mentioned the arrest and trial of Joseph Smith as a disorderly person July 1, 1830. I photographed as well as made Xerox copies of all these items, as well as some typical examples of other 1825, 1826, and 1828 bills.

In my opinion, the bills are authentic, of the same paper quality and ink quality as the other 1826 and 1830 bills and appeared to me to have remained tied up and untouched since the day they were bound up and placed away in storage by the Board of Supervisors of Chenango County, New York. The historical importance of these bills was drawn to the attention of the County and they, at last report, were making arrangements to house these items in a safer and more suitable place. (Affidavit by Wesley P. Walters, dated October 28, 1971)

Importance of Discovery

Now that Wesley P. Walters has proven beyond all doubt that the Bainbridge court record is authentic, it will be very interesting to see how the Mormon leaders will react. As we have shown, their position in the past has been that the court record is “spurious.” The Mormon scholar Francis W. Kirkham has stated that if the court record could be proven authentic, it would show that Mormonism itself is untrue:

A careful study of all facts regarding this alleged confession of Joseph Smith in a court of law that he had used a seer stone to find hidden treasure for purposes of fraud, must come to the conclusion that no such record was ever made, and therefore, is not in existence. . . . If any evidence had been in existence that Joseph Smith had used a seer stone for fraud and deception, and especially had he made this confession in a court of law as early as 1826, or four years before the Book of Mormon was printed, and this confession was in a court record, it would have been impossible for him to have organized the restored Church. (A New Witness For Christ In America, vol. 1, pp. 385-387)

If a court record could be identified, and if it contained a confession by Joseph Smith which revealed him to be a poor, ignorant, deluded, and superstitious person—unable himself to write a book of any consequence, and whose church could not endure because it attracted only similar persons of low mentality—if such a court record confession could be identified and proved, then it follows that his believers must deny his claimed divine guidance which led them to follow him. . . . How could he be a prophet of God, the leader of the Restored Church to these tens of thousands, if he had been the superstitious fraud which “the pages from a book” declared he confessed to be? (Ibid., pp. 486-487)

In his book The Myth Makers, Dr. Hugh Nibley has written almost 20 pages in an attempt to discredit the “Bainbridge court record.” On page 142 of Dr. Nibley’s book we find this statement: “. . . If this court record is authentic it is the most damning evidence in existence against Joseph Smith.” Dr. Nibley’s book also states that if the authenticity of the court record could be established it would be “the most devastating blow to Joseph Smith ever delivered. . . .” (Ibid.).

In his History of the Church, Joseph Smith admitted that he worked for Josiah Stowel, but did not acknowledge the fact that he was arrested or that he used a “seer stone” to find treasures:

In the month of October, 1825, I hired with an old gentleman by the name of Josiah Stowel, who lived in Chenango county, state of New York. He had heard something of a silver mine having been opened by the Spaniards in Harmony, Susquehanna county, state of Pennsylvania; and had, previous to my hiring to him, been digging, in order, if possible, to discover the mine. After I went to live with him, he took me, with the rest of his hands, to dig for the silver mine, at which I continued to work for nearly a month, without success in our undertaking, and finally I prevailed with the old gentleman to cease digging after it. Hence arose the very prevalent story of my having been a money-digger.

“During the time that I was thus employed, I was put to board with a Mr. Isaac Hale, of that place; it was there I first saw my wife (his daughter), Emma Hale. On the 18th of January, 1827, we were married, . . . at the house of Squire Tarbill, in South Bainbridge, Chenango county, New York.” (History of the Church, vol. 1, p. 17)

Joseph Smith’s mother did not mention the trial but admitted that Josiah Stowel came to seek Joseph Smith’s help in locating hidden treasures:

A short time before the house was completed, a man, by the name of Josiah Stoyal, came from Chenango county, New York, with the view of getting Joseph to assist him in digging for a silver mine. He came for Joseph on account of having heard that he possessed certain keys, by which he could discern things invisible to the natural eye.

Joseph endeavoured to divert him from his vain pursuit, but he was inflexible in his purpose, and offered high wages to those who would dig for him, in search of said mine, and still insisted upon having Joseph to work for him. Accordingly, Joseph and several others, returned with him and commenced digging. (Biographical Sketches of Joseph Smith the Prophet, London, 1853, pp. 91-92)

The Mormon historian B. H. Roberts states that Stowell came to Joseph Smith because he had “heard of Joseph Smith’s gift of seership”:

. . . in October, 1825, to be exact, Joseph engaged to work for an elderly gentleman, Josiah Stoyal, of Bainbridge, . . . Near Bainbridge was an extensive cave, . . . a local legend had it that it was an old mine formerly worked by Spaniards; and that they had concealed within it much of the treasure they had discovered, . . .

Mr. Stoyal believed this legend and had employed men to explore the cave for the treasure. Having heard of Joseph Smith’s gift of seership, he came to the Smith residence to employ him in this undertaking. Joseph hired out to Mr. Stoyal and went with him and the rest of his men to Harmony, Pennsylvania, where for something like a month they vainly sought to find the “hidden treasure.” . . . Although Mr. Stoyal gave up the search for the “Spanish treasure,” Joseph continued for some time in his employment. (Comprehensive History of the Church, vol. 1, pp. 81-82)

The Mormon writer Hyrum L. Andrus made these interesting comments concerning this matter:

According to Mother Smith, he wanted the Prophet to work for him because he had heard that Joseph “possessed certain means by which he could discern things invisible to the natural eye.” She does not say what Joseph had in his possession. But Stoyal was acquainted with Joseph Knight, Sr., and may have heard from him of the Urim and Thummim which were with the gold plates. Joseph could also have had the seer stone at this time. . . . Having worked for Josiah Stoyal, he was marked in the popular mind as a money digger; and in the opinion of those with whom he had worked, he was subject to the code of the money diggers which required him to share what he found. Martin Harris stated that the money diggers claimed “they had as much right to the plates as Joseph had, as they were in company together.” In taking this position, they asserted “that Joseph had been traitor, and had appropriated to himself that which belonged to them.” That these men were actively opposed to the Prophet is attested to by David Whitmer. While in Palmyra in 1828, he conversed with some men who assured him “that Joseph Smith certainly had golden plates, and that before he had attained them he had promised to share with them, but had not done so and they were very much incensed with him.” (God, Man and the Universe, Salt Lake City, 1968, pp. 70, 71, 74, 75)

At any rate, since Joseph Smith did not mention the 1826 trial in his History, and since the court record was not printed until many years after his death, Mormon scholars concluded that the record must be “spurious.” Fawn Brodie reprinted it from the New Schaff-Herzog Encyclopedia of Religious Knowledge. Since this was not printed until 1883, there was a wide gap between the date of the trial and the published version. Because Mormon writers contested the authenticity of the trial, scholars began to search for more documentation. Helen L. Fairbanks, of Guernsey Memorial Library, Norwich, N.Y., made a very interesting discovery. She found that W. D. Purple, who had lived at Bainbridge and claimed to be an eyewitness to the trial had written concerning it in The Chenango Union, May 3, 1877. Wesley P. Walters has confirmed the fact that W. D. Purple was in Bainbridge in 1826. In a letter dated July 30, 1971, he stated: “. . . William D. Purple in May 1826 entered a complaint against someone whom he thought had stolen his coat, so he is there in 1826. This is mentioned in Tarble’s bill.” We have printed W. D. Purple’s account in its entirety in the book Joseph Smith and Money Digging, but we feel that it is so important that we shall include a portion of it in this book:

More than fifty years since, at the commencement of his professional career, the writer spent a year in the present village of Afton, in this County. It was then called South Bainbridge, . . .

In the year 1825 we often saw in that quiet hamlet, Joseph Smith, Jr., . . . He was an inmate of the family of Deacon Isaiah Stowell, . . . Mr. Stowel . . . took upon himself a monomaniacal impression to seek for hidden treasures which he believed were buried in the earth. He hired help and repaired to Northern Pennsylvania, in the vicinity of Lanesboro, to prosecute his search for untold wealth which he believed to be buried there. . . .

There had lived a few years previous to this date, in the vicinity of Great Bend, a poor man named Joseph Smith . . . Mr. Stowell, while at Lanesboro, heard of the fame of one of his sons, named Joseph, who, by the aid of a magic stone had become a famous seer of lost or hidden treasures. . . . He, with the magic stone, was at once transferred from his humble abode to the more pretentious mansion of Deacon Stowell. Here, in the estimation of the Deacon, he confirmed his conceded powers as a seer, by means of the stone which he placed in his hat, and by excluding the light from all other terrestrial things, could see whatever he wished, even in the depths of the earth. . . .

In February, 1826, the sons of Mr. Stowell, who lived with their father, were greatly incensed against Smith, as they plainly saw their father squandering his property in the fruitless search for hidden treasures, and saw that the youthful seer had unlimited control over the illusions of their sire. . . . They caused the arrest of Smith as a vagrant, without visible means of livelihood. The trial came on in the above mentioned month, before Albert Neeley, Esq., the father of Bishop Neeley of the State of Maine. I was an intimate friend of the Justice, and was invited to take notes of the trial, which I did. There was a large collection of persons in attendance, and the proceedings attracted much attention.

The affidavits of the sons were read, and Mr. Smith was fully examined by the Court. . . .

On the request of the Court, he exhibited the stone. It was about the size of a small hen's egg, in the shape of a high-insteped shoe. It was composed of layers of different colors passing diagonally through it. It was very hard and smooth, perhaps by being carried in the pocket.

Joseph Smith, Sr., was present, and sworn as a witness. . . .

The next witness called was Deacon Isaiah Stowell. He confirmed all that is said above in relation to himself, and delineated many other circumstances not necessary to record. He swore that the prisoner possessed all the power he claimed, and declared he could see things fifty feet below the surface of the earth, as plain as the witness could see what was on the Justice's table, and described very many circumstances to confirm his words. Justice Neeley soberly looked at the witness and in a solemn, dignified voice, said, "Deacon Stowell, do I understand you as swearing before God, under the solemn oath you have taken, that you believe the prisoner can see by the aid of the stone fifty feet below the surface of the earth, as plainly as you can see what is on my table?" "Do I believe it?" says Deacon Stowell, "do I believe it? No, it is not a matter of belief. I positively know it to be true."

Mr. Thompson, an employee of Mr. Stowell, was the next witness. . . . The following scene was described by this witness, and carefully noted: Smith had told the Deacon that very many years before a band of robbers had buried on his flat a box of treasure, and as it was very valuable they had by a sacrifice placed a charm over it to protect it, so that it could not be obtained except by faith, accompanied by certain talismanic influences. So, after arming themselves with fasting and prayer, they sallied forth to the spot designated by Smith. Digging was commenced with fear and trembling, in the presence of this imaginary charm. In a few feet from the surface the box of treasure was struck by the shovel, on which they redoubled their energies, but it gradually receded from their grasp. One of the men placed his hand upon the box, but it gradually sunk from his reach. . . . Mr. Stowell went to his flock and selected a fine vigorous lamb, and resolved to sacrifice it to the demon spirit who guarded the coveted treasure. Shortly after the venerable Deacon might be seen on his knees at prayer near the pit, while Smith, with a lantern in one hand to dispel the midnight darkness might be seen making a circuit around the spot, sprinkling the flowing blood from the lamb upon the ground, as a propitiation to the spirit that thwarted them. They then descended the excavation, but the treasure still receded from their grasp, and it was never obtained. . . . These scenes occurred some four years before Smith, by the aid of his luminous stone, found the Golden Bible, or the Book of Mormon. (The Chenango Union, Norwich, N.Y., May 3, 1877, as reprinted in A New Witness For Christ In America, vol. 2, pp. 362-367)

For a complete reprint and study of Dr. Purple's account see our book Joseph Smith and Money Digging, pages 23-29. While Mormon writers were willing to concede that Purple mentioned the trial in 1877, they felt confident that no earlier mention of the trial would be discovered. Dr. Francis W. Kirkham made this statement:

No account of the life of Joseph Smith . . . prior to Purple in 1877, and Tuttle in 1883, assert that Joseph Smith confessed in a court of law that he had used a seer stone for any purpose, and especially that the record of such confession was in existence. (A New Witness For Christ In America, vol. 1, pp. 386-387)

Further research, however, led to the discovery that the court record had been printed in Fraser's Magazine ten years prior to the time when it was printed by Tuttle. In a "Supplement" to his book, Dr. Kirkham conceded that it had been printed in 1873.

Finally, Dale L. Morgan, a noted historian, discovered that the trial was actually mentioned as early as 1831 in a letter published in the Evangelical Magazine and Gospel Advocate, printed in Utica, N.Y. The letter is "signed A.W.B., and Mr. Morgan identifies him from subsequent articles as A. W. Benton" (No Man Knows My History, p. 418A). Since Mr. Benton lived in Bainbridge, his account is very important. Wesley P. Walters has furnished us with a photograph of Benton's account as it appears in the Evangelical Magazine and Gospel Advocate. We cite the following from that publication:

Messrs. Editors— . . . thinking that a fuller history of their founder, Joseph Smith, jr., might be interesting . . . I will take the trouble to make a few remarks . . . For several years preceding the appearance of his book, he was about the country in the character of a glass-looker: pretending, by means of a certain stone, or glass, which he put in a hat, to be able to discover lost goods, hidden treasures, mines of gold and silver, &c. . . . In this town, a wealthy farmer, named Josiah Stowell, together with others, spent large sums of money in digging for hidden money, which this Smith pretended he could see, and told them where to dig; but they never found their treasure. At length the public, becoming wearied with the base imposition which he was palming upon the credulity of the ignorant, for the purpose of sponging his living from their earnings, had him arrested as a disorderly person, tried and condemned before a court of justice. But considering his youth, (he then being a minor,) and thinking he might reform his conduct, he was designedly allowed to escape. This was four or five years ago. (Evangelical Magazine and Gospel Advocate, April 9, 1831, p. 120)

In the book Joseph Smith and Money Digging we have photographically reproduced A. W. Benton's entire letter. From what we quoted above, however, the reader will notice that Benton claimed that Joseph Smith was "arrested as a disorderly person." This agrees well with the court record, for it states that Joseph Smith was "a disorderly person and an impostor." Benton also agrees with the court record in stating that Joseph Smith was found guilty. Benton said that Joseph Smith was a "glass-looker," and the reader will remember that Justice Neely's bill refers to "Joseph Smith The Glass looker." The court record states that the trial took place on March 20, 1826. This would have been five years prior to the time Benton wrote his letter in 1831. Mr. Benton states that the trial took place "four or five years ago."

Dr. Hugh Nibley tried to dismiss Benton's letter as "fiction." In his book, The Myth Makers, page 157, we find this statement:

. . . we are inclined to regard A.W.B.'s story of the 1826 trial as fiction . . . without the reality of the peep-stones, the whole legend of the 1826 trial collapses. . . . the 1826 trial, unattested in any source but his for fifty years, was a product of A.W.B.'s own wishful thinking.

Actually, there was some good evidence from a Mormon source to show that Joseph Smith had some trouble with the law at the time he was working for Josiah Stowell. In 1835 Oliver Cowdery, one of the three witnesses to the Book of Mormon, wrote the following:

Soon after this visit to Cumorah, a gentleman from the south part of the State, . . . employed our brother . . . This gentleman, whose name is Stowel, resided in the town of Bainbridge, . . . Some forty miles south, . . . is said to be a cave . . . where a company of Spaniards, . . . coined a large quantity of money; . . . our brother was required to spend a few months with some others in excavating the earth, in pursuit of this treasure. . . .

On the private character of our brother I need add nothing further, at present, previous to his obtaining the records of the Nephites, only that while in that country, some very officious person complained of him as a disorderly person, and brought him before the authorities of the county; but there being no cause of action he was honorably acquitted. (Latter Day Saints' Messenger and Advocate, Oct. 1835, vol. 2, pp. 200-201)

While Oliver Cowdery disagrees with the court record when he states that Joseph Smith was acquitted, he is in agreement with the court record and with A. W. Benton's letter in stating that Joseph Smith was charged with being "a disorderly person."

The Mormon writer F. L. Stewart tried to make it appear that the statement by Cowdery referred to another incident altogether, but Richard L. Anderson, who rejected the authenticity of the court record, had to admit that she was in error:

... Stewart attempts to equate this early trial with one mentioned by Lucy Smith in Wayne County in 1829. But this conclusion violates Cowdery's description both in location and chronology; the trial he mentions took place "previous to his obtaining the records of the Nephites." (Brigham Young University Studies, Winter 1968, p. 232)

Now that the authenticity of the court record has been established, the Mormon Church leaders are faced with a dilemma. The court record plainly shows that Joseph Smith was deeply involved in magic practices at the very time he was supposed to be preparing himself to receive the plates for the Book of Mormon. The court record shows that Joseph Smith was searching for buried treasure in 1826, and according to his own story, the plates for the Book of Mormon were taken from the Hill Cumorah the following year. Joseph Smith claimed, however, that he had known that the plates were buried in the Hill Cumorah since 1823. He made this statement concerning the discovery of the plates:

Convenient to the village of Manchester, . . . stands a hill . . . not far from the top, under a stone of considerable size, lay the plates, deposited in a stone box. This stone was thick and rounding in the middle on the upper side, and thinner toward the edges, so that the middle part of it was visible above the ground, but the edge all around was covered with earth.

Having removed the earth, I obtained a lever, which I got fixed under the edge of the stone, and with a little exertion raised it up. I looked in, and there indeed did I behold the plates, . . .

I made an attempt to take them out, but was forbidden by the messenger, and was again informed that the time for bringing them forth had not yet arrived, neither would it, until four years from that time; . . . (Pearl of Great Price, Joseph Smith 2:51-53)

Now, it is interesting to note that in the court record Joseph Smith confessed that "for three years" prior to 1826 he had used a stone placed in his hat to find treasures or lost property. According to Joseph Smith's own statement, then, he began his money-digging activities in about 1823. The reader will remember that the messenger was supposed to have informed Joseph Smith of the gold plates on September 21, 1823. From this it would appear that Joseph Smith became deeply involved in money-digging at the very time the messenger told him of the gold plates and that he was still involved in these practices for at least three of the four years when God was supposed to be preparing him to receive the gold plates for the Book of Mormon. These facts seem to undermine the whole foundation of Mormonism.

A Common Practice

At the time the Book of Mormon was printed many people were engaged in searching for buried treasures. On July 24, 1822, the Palmyra Herald reprinted the following statements from the "Montpelier (Vt.) Watchman":

Indeed, digging for money hid in the earth is a very common thing; and in this state it is even considered an honorable and profitable employment. We could name, if we pleased, at least five hundred respectable men, who do, in the simplicity and sincerity of their hearts, verily believe that immense treasures lie concealed upon our Green Mountains; many of whom have been for a number of years, most industriously and perseveringly engaged in digging it up.

On February 16, 1825, the Wayne Sentinel (a newspaper published in Joseph Smith's neighborhood) reprinted the following from the "Windsor, (Vermont) Jour.":

Money digging.—We are sorry to observe even in this enlightened age, so prevalent a disposition to credit the accounts of the Marvellous. Even the frightful stories of money being hid under the surface of the earth, and enchanted by the Devil or Robert Kidd, are received by many of our respectable fellow citizens as truths. . . .

A respectable gentleman in Tunbridge, was informed by means of a dream, that a chest of money was buried on a small island . . . he started off to enrich himself with the treasure. After having been directed by the mineral rod where to search for the money, he excavated the earth . . . Presently he and his laborers came . . . upon a chest of gold . . . One of the company drove an old file through the rotten lid of the chest, and . . . the chest moved off through the mud, and has not been seen or heard of since. . . . Whether he actually saw the chest, or whether it was the vision of a disordered brain, we shall leave to the public to determine.

Many of the people who were digging for buried treasure in Joseph Smith's time were very superstitious. There were many strange stories connected with these treasure hunts. Martin Harris, one of the three witnesses to the Book of Mormon, related the following:

Mr. Stowel was at this time at old Mr. Smith's, digging for money. It was reported by these money-diggers, that they had found boxes, but before they could secure them, they would sink into the earth. A candid old Presbyterian told me, that on the Susquehannah flats he dug down to an iron chest, that he scraped the dirt off with his shovel, but had nothing with him to open the chest; that he went away to get help, and when they came to it, it moved away two or three rods into the earth, and they could not get it. There were a great many strange sights. One time the old log school-house south of Palmyra, was suddenly lighted up, and frightened them away. Samuel Lawrence told me that while they were digging, a large man who appeared to be eight or nine feet high, came and sat on the ridge of the barn, and motioned to them that they must leave. They motioned back that they would not; but that they afterwards became frightened and did leave. At another time while they were digging, a company of horsemen came and frightened them away. These things were real to them, I believe, because they were told to me in confidence, and told by different ones, and their stories agreed, and they seemed to be in earnest—I knew they were in earnest. (An interview with Martin Harris, published in Tiffany's Monthly, 1859, p. 165)

On another occasion Martin Harris admitted that he participated in some money-digging activities and that a stone box slipped back into the hill:

Martin Harris (speaking to a group of Saints at Clarkston, Utah in the 1870's): I will tell you a wonderful thing that happened after Joseph had found the plates. Three of us took some tools to go to the hill and hunt for some more boxes, or gold or something, and indeed we found a stone box. We got quite excited about it and dug quite carefully around it, and we were ready to take it up, but behold by some unseen power, it slipped back into the hill. We stood there and looked at it, and one of us took a crow bar and tried to drive it through the lid to hold it, but it glanced and broke one corner off the box. Some time that box will be found and you will see the corner broken off, and then you will know I have told the truth. (Testimony of Mrs. Comfort Godfrey Flinders, Utah Pioneer Biographies, vol. X, p. 65, Genealogical Society of Utah, as cited in an unpublished manuscript by LaMar Petersen)

It appears that even Brigham Young, the second President of the Mormon Church, was influenced by the superstitions of his day. In a sermon delivered June 17, 1877, he stated:

But do you know how to find such a mine? No, you do not. These treasures that are in the earth are carefully watched, they can be removed from place to place according to the good pleasure of Him who made them and owns them. . . . Orin P. Rockwell is an eye-witness to some powers of removing the treasures of the earth. He was with certain parties that lived near by where the plates were found that contain the records of the Book of Mormon. There were a great many treasures hid up by the Nephites. Porter was with them one night where there were treasures, and they could find them easy enough, but they could not obtain them.

I will tell you a story . . . told me by Porter, . . . he is a man that does not lie. He said that on this night, when they were engaged hunting for this old treasure, they dug around the end of a chest for some twenty inches. The chest was about three feet square. One man who was determined to have the contents of that chest, took his pick and struck into the lid of it, and split through into the chest. The blow took off a piece of the lid, which a certain lady kept in her possession until she died. That chest of money went into the bank. Porter describes it so [making a rumbling sound]; he says this is just as true as the heavens are. I have heard others tell the same story. I relate this because it is marvelous to you. But to those who understand these things, it is not marvelous. . . . I could relate many very singular circumstances. . . . I believe I will take the liberty to tell you of another circumstance that will be as marvelous as anything can be. . . . Oliver Cowdery went with the Prophet Joseph when he deposited these plates. Joseph did not translate all of the plates; there was a portion of them sealed, . . . the angel instructed him to carry them back to the hill Cumorah, which he did. Oliver says that when Joseph and Oliver went there, the hill opened, and they walked into a cave, in which there was a large and spacious room. He says he did not think, at the time, whether they had the light of the sun or artificial light; but that it was just as light as day. They laid the plates on a table; it was a large table that stood in the room. Under this table there was a pile of plates as much as two feet high, and there were altogether in this room more plates than probably many wagon loads; they were piled up in the corners and along the walls. The first time they went there the sword of Laban hung upon the wall; but when they went again it had been taken down and laid upon the table across the gold plates; it was unsheathed, and on it was written these words: "This sword will never be sheathed again until the kingdoms of this world become the kingdom of our God and his Christ." . . .

. . . People do not know it, but I know there is a seal upon the treasures of earth; men are allowed to go so far and no farther. I have known places where there were treasures in abundance; but could men get them? No. You can read in the Book of Mormon of the ancient Nephites holding their treasures, and of their becoming slippery; so that after they had privately hid their money, on going to the place again, lo and behold it was not there, but was somewhere else, but they knew not where. (A Sermon by Brigham Young, Delivered at a Special Conference Held at Farmington, June 17, 1877, Journal of Discourses, vol. 19, pp. 36-39)

Brigham Young also tells that even the priests from the various churches were influenced by a fortune-teller:

I never heard such oaths fall from the lips of any man as I heard uttered by a man who was called a fortune-teller, and who knew where those plates were hid. He went three times in one summer to get them,—the same summer in which Joseph did get them. Baptist, Presbyterian, and Methodist priests and deacons sent for him to tell where those plates were, and to get them out of the hill where they were deposited; . . . this fortune-teller, . . . was a man of profound learning.

He had put himself in possession of all the learning in the States,— . . . had been educated for a priest, and turned out to be a devil . . . He could preach as well as the best of them, and I never heard a man swear as he did. He could tell that those plates were there, and that they were a treasure whose value to the people could not be told; for that I myself heard him say. (Remarks of Brigham Young, July 19, 1857, Journal of Discourses, vol. 5, p. 55)

The man I refer to was a fortune-teller, a necromancer, an astrologer, a soothsayer, and possessed as much talent as any man that walked on the American soil, and was one of the wickedest men I ever saw. The last time he went to obtain the treasure he knew where it was, and told where it was, but did not know its value. Allow me to tell you that a Baptist deacon and others of Joseph's neighbors were the very men who sent for this necromancer the last time he went for the treasure. . . . He would call Joseph everything that was bad, and say, "I believe he will get the treasure after all." He did get it, and the war commenced directly. (Journal of Discourses, vol. 2, pp. 180-181)

In 1831 The Palmyra Reflector suggested that there was a relationship between the "fortune-teller" and Joseph Smith:

It is well known that Jo Smith never pretended to have any communion with angels, until a long period after the pretended finding of his book, and that the juggling of himself or father, went no further than the pretended faculty of seeing wonders in a "peep stone," and the occasional interview with the spirit, supposed to have the custody of hidden treasures; and it is also equally well known, that a vagabond fortune-teller by the name of Walters, . . . was the constant companion [sic] and bosom friend of these money digging impostors.

There remains but little doubt, in the minds of those at all acquainted with these transactions, that Walters, who was sometimes called the conjurer, and was paid three dollars per day for his services by the money diggers in this neighborhood, first suggested to Smith the idea of finding a book. Walters, . . . had procured an old copy of Cicero's Orations, in the Latin language, out of which he read long and loud to his credulous hearers, uttering at the same time an unintelligible jargon, which he would afterwards pretend to interpret, and explain, as a record of the former inhabitants of America, and a particular account of the numerous situations where they had deposited their treasures previous to their final extirpation. (The Palmyra Reflector, February 28, 1831, as quoted in A New Witness For Christ in America, vol. 2, p. 73)

However this may be, the early Mormon leaders grew up at a time when people were very superstitious. The Mormon historian B. H. Roberts made these comments:

Credulity: Yes, the Prophet's ancestors were credulous in that some of them believed that they were healed of bodily ailments by the power of faith in God. Others had dreams, as their neighbors had, . . . It may be admitted that some of them believed in fortune telling, in warlocks and witches—. . . Indeed it is scarcely conceivable how one could live in New England in those years and not have shared in such beliefs. To be credulous in such things was to be normal people. (A Comprehensive History of the Church, by B. H. Roberts, vol. 1, 1965, pp. 26-27)

Peep Stones

At the time the Book of Mormon came forth many people believed in "peep stones." These stones were sometimes placed in a hat and used to locate buried treasure. The following appeared in the Wayne Sentinel on December 27, 1825:

Mr. Strong—Please insert the following and oblige one of your readers.

Wonderful Discovery.—A few days since was discovered in this town, by the help of a mineral stone, (which becomes transparent when placed in a hat and the light excluded by the face of him who looks into it, provided he is fortune's favorite,) a monstrous potash kettle in the bowels of old mother Earth, filled with the purest bullion. Some attempts have been made to dig it up, but without success. His Satanic Majesty, or some other invisible agent, appears to keep it under marching orders; for no sooner is it dug on to in one place, than it moves off like "false delusive hope," to another still more remote. But its pursuers are now sanguine of success—they entrenched the kettle all round, and driven a steel ramrod into the ground directly over it, to break the enchantment. Nothing now remains, but to raise its ponderous weight, . . .

By the rust on the kettle, and the color of the silver, it is supposed to have been deposited where it now lies, prior to the flood. (Wayne Sentinel, Dec. 27, 1825, p. 2)

Joseph Smith's "seer stone" was apparently found while he was helping to dig a well. Willard Chase made these statements in an affidavit dated December 11, 1833:

I became acquainted with the Smith family, . . . in the year 1820. At that time, they were engaged in the money digging business, which they followed until the later part of the season of 1827. In the year 1822, I was engaged in digging a well. I employed Alvin and Joseph Smith to assist me; . . . After digging about twenty feet below the surface of the earth, we discovered a singularly appearing stone, which excited my curiosity. I brought it to the top of the well, and as we were examining it, Joseph put it into his hat, and then his face into the top of his hat. . . . The next morning he came to me, and wished to obtain the stone, alledging that he could see in it; but I told him I did not wish to part with it on account of its being a curiosity, but would lend it. After obtaining the stone, he began to publish abroad what wonders he could discover by looking in it, and made so much disturbance among the credulous part of community, that I ordered the stone to be returned to me again. . . . some time in 1825, Hiram Smith . . . came to me, and wished to borrow the same stone, . . . I told him it was of no particular worth to me, but merely wished to keep it as a curiosity, and if he would pledge me his word and honor, that I should have it when called for, he might take it; . . .

In the fall of 1826, a friend called upon me and wished to see that stone, . . . But to my surprize, on going to Smith's, and asking him for the stone, he said, "you cannot have it;" I told him it belonged to me, repeated to him the promise he made me, at the time of obtaining the stone: upon which he faced me with a malignant look and said, "I don't care who in the Devil it belongs to, you shall not have it."

In the month of June, 1827, Joseph Smith, Sen., related to me the following story: "That some years ago, a spirit had appeared to Joseph his son, in a vision, and informed him that in a certain place there was a record on plates of gold; and that he was the person that must obtain them," . . .

He [Joseph Smith] then observed that if it had not been for that stone, (which he acknowledged belonged to me,) he would not have obtained the book . . .

In April, 1830, I again asked Hiram for the stone which he had borrowed of me; he told me I should not have it, for Joseph made use of it in translating his Bible. (Mormonism Unveiled, Painesville, Ohio, 1834, pp. 240, 241, 242, 246 and 247)

The Mormon historian B. H. Roberts accepted the story that Joseph Smith's stone was found in a well. He made the following statement in the Comprehensive History of the Church, vol. 1, p. 129:

The seer stone referred to here was a chocolate-colored, somewhat egg-shaped stone which the Prophet found while digging a well in company with his brother Hyrum, for a Mr. Clark Chase, near Palmyra, N.Y. It possessed the qualities of Urim and Thummim, since by means of it—as described above—as well as by means of the Interpreters found with the Nephite record, Joseph was able to translate the characters engraven on the plates.

The Mormon Apostle John A. Widtsoe stated:

Some use was made also of the seer stone and occasional mention was made of it. This was a stone found while the Prophet assisted in digging a well for Clark Chase. By divine power this stone was made serviceable to Joseph Smith in the early part of his ministry. (Joseph Smith—Seeker After Truth, by John A. Widtsoe, 1952, p. 267)

George Q. Cannon, who became a member of the First Presidency, stated:

One of Joseph's aids in searching out the truths of the record was a peculiar pebble or rock which he called a seer stone, and which was sometimes used by him in lieu of the Urim and Thummim. This stone had been discovered to himself and his brother Hyrum at the bottom of a well; and under divine guidance they had brought it forth for use in the work of translation. (Life of Joseph Smith, by George Q. Cannon, 1958, p. 56)

Martin Harris, one of the three witnesses to the Book of Mormon, made this statement concerning Joseph Smith's "stone":

"These plates were found at the north point of a hill two miles north of Manchester village. Joseph had a stone which was dug from the well of Mason Chase, twenty-four feet from the surface. In this stone he could see many things to my certain knowledge. It was by means of this stone he first discovered these plates.

"In the first place, he told me of this stone, and proposed to bind it on his eyes, and run a race with me in the woods. A few days after this, I was at the house of his father in Manchester, two miles south of Palmyra village, and was picking my teeth with a pin while sitting on the bars. The pin caught in my teeth, and dropped from my fingers into shavings and straw. I jumped from the bars and looked for it. Joseph and Northrop Sweet also did the same. We could not find it. I then took Joseph on surprise, and said to him—I said, 'Take your stone.' I had never seen it, and did not know that he had it with him. He had it in his pocket. He took it and placed it in his hat—the old white hat—and placed his face in his hat. I watched him closely to see that he did not look one side; he reached out his hand beyond me on the right, and moved a little stick, and there I saw the pin, which he picked up and gave to me. I know he did not look out of the hat until after he had picked up the pin.

"Joseph had had this stone for some time. There was a company there in that neighborhood, who were digging for money supposed to have been hidden by the ancients. Of this company were old Mr. Stowel—I think his name was Josiah—also old Mr. Beman, also Samuel Lawrence, George Proper, Joseph Smith, Jr., and his father, and his brother Hiram Smith. They dug for money in Palmyra, Manchester, also in Pennsylvania, and other places. When Joseph found this stone, there was a company digging in Harmony, Pa., and they took Joseph to look in the stone for them, and he did so for a while, and then he told them the enchantment was so strong that he could not see, and they gave it up. There he became acquainted with his future wife, the daughter of old Mr. Isaac Hale, where he boarded. He afterwards returned to Pennsylvania again, and married his wife, taking her off to old Mr. Stowel's, because her people would not consent to the marriage. She was of age, Joseph was not.

"After this, on the 22d of September, 1827, before day, Joseph took the horse and wagon of old Mr. Stowel, and taking his wife, he went to the place where the plates were concealed, and while he was obtaining them, she kneeled down and prayed. He then took the plates and hid them in an old black oak tree top which was hollow. . . .

"The money-diggers claimed that they had as much right to the plates as Joseph had, as they were in company together. They claimed that Joseph had been a traitor, and had appropriated to himself that which belonged to them. For this reason Joseph was afraid of them, and continued concealing the plates. . . . Joseph had before this described the manner of his finding the plates. He found them by looking in the stone found in the well of Mason Chase. The family had likewise told me the same thing.

“Joseph said that the angel told him he must quit the company of the money-diggers. That there were wicked men among them. He must have no more to do with them. He must not lie, nor swear, nor steal.” (Interview with Martin Harris, Tiffany’s Monthly, 1859, pp. 163-165, 167 and 169)

After Joseph Smith organized the Mormon Church he did not have much to say about his money-digging activities. He did, however, admit that he had been engaged in this practice. In the July, 1838, issue of the Elders’ Journal, Joseph Smith attempted to answer the questions that were most frequently asked him. Question No. 10 read as follows:

Question 10. Was not Jo Smith a money digger.

Answer. Yes, but it was never a very profitable job to him, as he only got fourteen dollars a month for it. (Elders’ Journal, July, 1838, p. 43; reprinted in the History of the Church, vol. 3, p. 29)

According to David Whitmer, one of the three witnesses to the Book of Mormon, Joseph Smith gave the stone which he used to translate the Book of Mormon to Oliver Cowdery. Later this stone was brought to Utah. A newspaper reporter wrote the following in his account of an interview with David Whitmer:

With this stone all of the present Book of Mormon was translated. It is the only one of these relics which is not in the possession of the Whitmers. For years Oliver Cowdery surrounded it with care and solicitude, but at his death old Phineas Young, a brother of Brigham Young, and an old-time and once intimate friend of the Cowdery family, came out from Salt Lake City, and during his visit he contrived to get the stone from its hiding place, through a little deceptive sophistry, expended upon the grief-stricken widow. When he returned to Utah he carried it in triumph to the apostles of Brigham Young’s “lion house.” (Des Moines Daily News, October 16, 1886)

We know that by 1856 Joseph Smith’s “seer stone” had been brought to Utah, for Hosea Stout recorded the following in his diary under the date of February 25, 1856:

President Young exhibited the seer’s stone with which The Prophet Joseph discovered the plates of the Book of Mormon, to the Regents this evening

It is said to be a silicious granite dark color almost black with light colored stripes some what resembling petrified poplar or cotton wood bark It was about the size but not the shape of a hen’s egg. (On The Mormon Frontier; The Diary of Hosea Stout, vol. 2, 1964, p. 593)

Book of Mormon From Stone

In the Book of Mormon we read: “And the Lord said: I will prepare unto my servant Gazelem, a stone, which shall shine forth in darkness unto light, . . .” (Book of Mormon, Alma 37:23). Prior to 1981 the Doctrine and Covenants 78:9 identified “Joseph Smith, Jun.” as Gazelam.

Joseph Smith claimed that his Urim and Thummim—which he also used to translate—consisted of “two stones in silver bows . . .” (History of the Church, vol. 1, p. 12). It would appear, then, that Joseph Smith fastened two of his “seer stones” together to make his “Urim and Thummim.” The testimony given in the 1826 trial shows that as early as 1826 Joseph Smith was using two different stones.

However this may be, Joseph Smith’s father-in-law, Isaac Hale, noticed a definite relationship between the method Joseph Smith used to translate the Book of Mormon and the way he searched for buried treasures. Isaac Hale’s affidavit was published in Mormonism Unveiled in 1834, but Mormon writers have claimed that the affidavits published in this book were corrupted by Philastus Hurlburt. The Mormon writer Richard L. Anderson, however, has discovered that the statements from “Joseph Smith’s in-laws and their Pennsylvania friends” were “apparently procured by Howe’s direct correspondence independent of Hurlburt” (Dialogue: A Journal of Mormon Thought, Summer 1969, p. 25). They were first printed in the Susquehanna Register and then reprinted in the New York Baptist Register. Wesley P. Walters has sent us a photograph of Isaac Hale’s affidavit as it appeared in the Susquehanna Register. The following is taken from Mr. Hale’s affidavit:

“I first became acquainted with Joseph Smith, Jr. in November, 1825. He was at that time in the employ of a set of men who were called ‘money-diggers;’ and his occupation was that of seeing, or pretending to see by means of a stone placed in his hat, and his hat closed over his face. In this way he pretended to discover minerals and hidden treasure. . . . Smith, and his father, with several other ‘money-diggers’ boarded at my house while they were employed in digging for a mine that they supposed had been opened and worked by the Spaniards, many years since. Young Smith gave the ‘money-diggers’ great encouragement, at first, but when they had arrived in digging, to near the place where he had stated an immense treasure would be found—he said the enchantment was so powerful that he could not see. . . .

“After these occurrences, young Smith made several visits at my house, and at length asked my consent to his marrying my daughter Emma. This I refused, and gave him my reasons for so doing; some of which were, that he was a stranger, and followed a business that I could not approve: he then left the place. Not long after this, he returned, and while I was absent from home, carried off my daughter, into the state of New York, where they were married without my approbation or consent. . . . In a short time they returned, . . .

“Smith stated to me, that he had given up what he called ‘glass-looking,’ and that he expected to work hard for a living, and was willing to do so. He also made arrangements with my son Alva Hale, to go up to Palmyra, and move his (Smith’s) furniture &c. to this place. . . . Soon after this, I was informed they had brought a wonderful book of Plates down with them. . . . The manner in which he pretended to read and interpret, was the same as when he looked for the money-diggers, with the stone in his hat, and his hat over his face, while the Book of Plates were at the same time hid in the woods!” (The Susquehanna Register, May 1, 1834)

David Whitmer, one of the three witnesses to the Book of Mormon, frankly admitted that Joseph Smith placed the “seer stone” into a hat to translate the Book of Mormon:

I will now give you a description of the manner in which the Book of Mormon was translated. Joseph would put the seer stone into a hat, drawing it closely around his face to exclude the light; and in the darkness the spiritual light would shine. A piece of something resembling parchment would appear, and on that appeared the writing. (An Address To All Believers In Christ, by David Whitmer, 1887, p. 12)

Emma Smith, Joseph Smith’s wife, related the following to her son:

In writing for your father I frequently wrote day after day, after sitting by the table close by him, he sitting with his face buried in his hat, with the stone in it, and dictating hour after hour with nothing between us. (The Saints’ Herald, May 19, 1888, p. 310)

Martin Harris, one of the three witnesses to the Book of Mormon, also stated that a stone was used:

On Sunday, Sept. 4, 1870, Martin Harris addressed a congregation of Saints in Salt Lake City. He related an incident which occurred during the time that he wrote that portion of the translation of the Book of Mormon which he was favored to write direct from the mouth of the Prophet Joseph Smith, and said that the Prophet possessed a seer stone, by which he was enabled to translate as well as from the Urim and Thummim, and for convenience he then used the seer stone. . . . Martin said that after continued translation they would become weary, and would go down to the river and exercise by throwing stones out on the river, etc. While so doing, on one occasion, Martin Harris found a stone very much resembling the one used for translating, and on resuming their labor of translation, he put in place the stone he had found. He said that the Prophet remained silent, unusually and intently gazing in darkness, no traces of the usual sentences appearing. Much surprised, Joseph exclaimed, “Martin! What is the matter! All is as dark as Egypt!” Martin’s countenance betrayed him, and the Prophet asked Martin why he had done so. Martin said, to stop the mouths of fools, who had told him that the Prophet had learned those sentences and was merely repeating them, etc. (Historical Record, by Andrew Jensen, vol. 6, 1887, p. 216)

The Mormon writer Arch S. Reynolds stated: “This stone did shine forth to us in darkness when he received the B. of M. characters with their English equivalents when he had his eyes hidden from natural light in a hat as testified by his associates” (How Did Joseph Smith Translate?, by Arch S. Reynolds, p. 7). Mr. Reynolds also gave the following information:

The Seerstone that the Prophet Joseph Smith used was, according to the Millennial Star, Vol. 24, p. 86, a chocolate-colored stone about the size of an egg that was oval in shape. It was found by Joseph in a well . . .

It is well known that Joseph used this stone to translate the first part of the Book of Mormon record while Martin Harris was scribe. This is proved by Martin’s description of the medium and its use. After Joseph used it for receiving revelations and translating the Nephite record, he gave it in the care of Oliver Cowdery . . . We find Joseph using this instrument, however, after that date. Orson Pratt declared that:

Joseph received several revelations to which I was witness by means of the Seerstone, but he could receive also without any instrument. (Millennial Star, vol. 40, no. 49) . . .

On May 17, 1888, we find this same Seerstone offered on the altar of the Manti Temple by President Wilford Woodruff. Brother B. H. Roberts describes the incident:

President Woodruff May 17, 1888, at a private dedication mentioned, “before leaving I consecrated upon the altar the Seerstone that Joseph Smith found by revelation some thirty feet under the earth, and carried by him throughout life.”

This is the very Seerstone that the Prophet used part of the time when translating the Book of Mormon; the one he took from the well he was digging with his brother Hyrum, near Palmyra, for Mr. Clark Chase, and which he was falsely accused of taking from the children of Mr. Chase, spoken of in chapter ten of this work. (Comprehensive History of the Church, vol. 6, p. 230)

On the next page Roberts says:

What became of the Seerstone immediately after this is not known. The writer (Roberts) knows, that it was in the possession of the Church as a matter of conversation between President Smith and himself (Roberts); and he has reason for knowing that it is now in possession of the Church—this year of 1930. (Ibid., p. 231)

(The Urim and Thummim, by Arch S. Reynolds, 1953, pp. 18-20)

In a letter written March 27, 1876, Emma Smith, who was married to Joseph Smith, stated that the entire Book of Mormon, that we have today, was translated by the use of a stone. James E. Lancaster states:

How can the testimonies of Emma Smith and David Whitmer, describing the translation of the Book of Mormon with a seer stone, be reconciled with the traditional account of the church that the Book of Mormon was translated by the “interpreters” found in the stone box with the plates? It is the extreme good fortune of the church that we have testimony by Sister Emma Smith Bidamon on this important issue. . . . a woman . . . wrote to Emma Bidamon, requesting information as to the translation of the Book of Mormon. Emma Bidamon rep[li]ed . . . March 27, 1876. Sister Bidamon’s letter states in part:

Now the first that my husband translated, was translated by the use of the Urim and Thummim, and that was the part that Martin Harris lost, after that he used a small stone, not exactly black, but was rather a dark color. . . .

Sister Bidamon’s letter indicated that at first the Book of Mormon was translated by the Urim and Thummim. She refers to the instrument found with the plates. However, this first method was used only for the portion written on the 116 pages of foolscap which Martin Harris later lost. After that time the translation was done with the seer stone. (Saints’ Herald, November 15, 1962, p. 15)

David Whitmer, one of the three witnesses, admitted that he never did see Joseph Smith use what was later known as the Urim and Thummim—i.e., the two stones set in silver bows. This information is found in the article by James E. Lancaster:

According to the testimony of Emma Smith and David Whitmer, the angel took the Urim and Thummim from Joseph Smith at the time of the loss of the 116 pages. This was in June, 1828, one year before David became involved with the work of translation. David Whitmer could never have been present when the Urim and Thummim were used. All of this he clearly states in his testimony to Brother Traugher:

With the sanction of David Whitmer, and by his authority, I now state that he does not say that Joseph Smith ever translated in his presence by aid of Urim and Thummim, but by means of one dark colored, opaque stone called a “Seer Stone,” which was placed in the crow of a hat, into which Joseph put his face, so as to exclude the external light. Then, a spiritual light would appear before Joseph, upon which was a line of characters from the plates, and under it, the translation in English; at least, so Joseph said.

Mr. Lancaster quotes an interview with David Whitmer which was published in the Chicago Inter-Ocean, October 17, 1886. In this interview the following statement appeared:

By fervent prayer and by otherwise humbling himself, the prophet, however, again found favor, and was presented with a strange, oval-shaped, chocolate-colored stone, about the size of an egg, only more flat, which, it was promised, should serve the same purpose as the missing Urim and Thummim (the latter was a pair of transparent stones set in a bow-shaped frame and very much resembled a pair of spectacles). With this stone all of the present Book of Mormon was translated. (Saints’ Herald, November 15, 1962, p. 16)

One thing that has caused confusion is the fact that the “seer stone” was sometimes called the Urim and Thummim. Bruce R. McConkie, of the First Council of the Seventy, makes this statement concerning the seer stone:

The Prophet also had a seer stone which was separate and distinct from the Urim and Thummim, and which (speaking loosely) has been called by some a Urim and Thummim. (Mormon Doctrine, 1966, p. 818)

Joseph Smith’s brother William referred to the stone as the Urim and Thummim:

The manner in which this was done was by looking into the Urim and Thummim, which was placed in a hat to exclude the light, (the plates lying near by covered up), and reading off the translation, which appeared in the stone by the power of God. (William Smith On Mormonism, reprinted in A New Witness For Christ In America, vol. 2, p. 417)

Wilford Woodruff also called the seer stone the Urim and Thummim. The following is found in a thesis submitted to the Brigham Young University by Walter L. Whipple:

Some have felt to question Wilford Woodruff’s correctness in calling the instrument the Urim and Thummim. On the same date of December 27, 1841, Elder Woodruff claims to have been shown the Urim and Thummim, Brigham Young recorded in his history the showing of the instrument—only he said that it was the “seer stone.”—27.—I met with the Twelve at brother Joseph’s. He conversed with us in a familiar manner on a variety of subjects, and explained to us the Urim and Thummim which he found with the plates, called in the Book of Mormon the Interpreters. He said that every man who lived on the earth was entitled to a seer stone, and should have one, but they are kept from them in consequence of their wickedness, and most of those who do find one make an evil use of it; he showed us his seer stone. (“Textual Changes in the Pearl of Great Price,” M.A. thesis, Brigham Young University, typed copy, p. 9)

President Joseph Fielding Smith admits that the “seer stone” was sometimes called the Urim and Thummim:

The statement has been made that the Urim and Thummim was on the altar in the Manti Temple when that building was dedicated. The Urim and Thummim so spoken of, however, was the seer stone which was in the possession of the Prophet Joseph Smith in early days. This seer stone is now in the possession of the Church. (Doctrines of Salvation, vol. 3, p. 225)

Embarrassed Over Stone

The fact that Joseph Smith used a stone, which he placed in a hat, to translate the Book of Mormon has caused a great deal of embarrassment because it so closely resembled crystal gazing. Crystal gazing is an ancient practice, and crystal gazers have claimed to see writings in their stones in the same way that Joseph Smith was supposed to have translated the Book of Mormon. In the book Strange Superstitions and Magical Practices, page 53, we read:

Among primitive peoples there is a widespread belief in the magical efficacy of quartz crystals—one of the most common of all luminous stones. These mineralogical specimens are frequently the main prop of the magician. They are used for this purpose by the aborigines of Australia, Polynesia and North America, among others.

On pages 137-138 of the Encyclopedia of Witchcraft and Demonology, by Rossell Hope Robbins, the following information appears: “In England, for example, in 1467 a William Byg was convicted of using a crystal stone to locate stolen property; . . .”

The Mormon writer Arch S. Reynolds stated:

During the early history of the Latter-day Saints’ Church, many people arose with so-called seer-stones, claiming to have power of seeing many things such as seeing the place where lost articles were also where the Book of Mormon plates were hidden. Some of these clairvoyants were the means of leading many astray from the truth. One of the earliest of these peepstone gazers was . . . Miss Chase, sister of Willard Chase, . . . Miss Chase found a green glass, through which she claimed she could see where Joseph Smith kept the Gold Plates. . . .

Brewster had a stone by which he pretended to receive revelations. There were others in the early rise of the Church . . . who tried to lead factions from the Church and pretended to receive revelations by stone or Urim. . . .

From the earliest days of the Church we have had many who have claimed to have had the power to see things in so-called peepstones. There are stones among the Church members that are considered by some to be the means of their receiving communications from the unseen world.

Edwin Ruston dug in the ground in the city of Nauvoo, Illinois, as a dream had previously shown, and obtained a seerstone about five feet underground, on May 4, 1846. He was a resident of Nauvoo at the time he obtained it. The stone, which still exists, appears to be a little smaller than a quarter of a baseball, and is crystal clear. He never tried to use the stone, as far as we know. It now reposes in the possession of his son-in-law, C. W. Christensen, of Salt Lake City, Utah. (The Urim and Thummim, by Arch S. Reynolds, pp. 21-24)

Not only true media have been used by God’s seers throughout the centuries; but false ones such as peepstones, crystal balls, etc. have been brought forth by the Adversary to further his diabolic work and hinder God’s plan on earth. (Ibid., p. 28)

Bruce R. McConkie, of the First Council of the Seventy, made this statement:

In imitation of the true order of heaven whereby seers receive revelations from God through a Urim and Thummim, the devil gives his own revelations to some of his followers through peep stones or crystal balls. (Mormon Doctrine, 1966, pp. 565-566)

In early Utah the anti-Mormon paper, Valley Tan, accused the Mormons of using “peep stones”:

. . . the Mormons . . . have better facilities for obtaining information than through newspapers. About every other family, and generally the one between, is possessed of either astrological science or a “peep-stone.” . . . through the latter—a small globular-shaped pebble—they can see cattle beyond mountains twenty or a hundred miles, or even a greater distance off. (Valley Tan, October 5, 1859, p. 2)

Although this is probably an exaggeration, there were many who used “peep stones” in Utah. In John M. Whitaker’s journal, for instance, we find the following:

Sister Greaves . . . told me of her troubles with her Bishop, Orson F. Whitney, going to her sisters place and getting information from a sear [seer?] stone. I tried in several ways to explain what a fine man Bishop Whitney was, and could not understand why he sought such a source of information—“I sincerely believe he has more faith than that,—” and she said, “you see dear, he has a little Adam in him.” (Excerpts from the Daily Journal of John M. Whitaker, typed copy, vol. 1, p. 151)

For more information on “seer stones” and their use by the Mormon people see our book, Joseph Smith and Money Digging, pages 10-12.

Mormon apologists have a difficult time explaining the fact that Joseph Smith used a “seer stone.” The Mormon Apostle John A. Widtsoe made this statement:

Some use was made also of the seer stone and occasional mention was made of it. This was a stone found while the Prophet assisted in digging a well for Clark Chase. By divine power this stone was made serviceable to Joseph Smith in the early part of his ministry. There is no evidence that this stone was used in Joseph’s sacred work. (Joseph Smith—Seeker After Truth, 1951, p. 267)

Notice that the Apostle Widtsoe states there is “no evidence that this stone was used in Joseph’s sacred work,” yet on page 260 of the same book Widtsoe states that Joseph did use the stone in his “spiritual work”:

Before Joseph received the Urim and Thummim he had a stone, obtained during the digging of a well for Clark Chase. This stone, through the blessing of the Lord, became a seer stone which was used frequently by him in his spiritual work.

The use of the seer stone explains in part the charge against Joseph Smith that he was a “peep stone gazer.” . . . The use of the seer stone and the Urim and Thummim was well-known to the people of his time and neighborhood.

The use of stones in sacred work has been frequent; for example, the ball known as the Liahona, the rod of Aaron, and the twelve stones used by Lehi. (Joseph Smith—Seeker After Truth, p. 260)

Joseph Fielding Smith, who recently became the tenth President of the Mormon Church, seems to be embarrassed over the use of the stone. Although he admits that Joseph Smith had a stone, he is unwilling to admit that he used it in the translation of the Book of Mormon:

While the statement has been made by some writers that the Prophet Joseph Smith used a seer stone part of the time in his translating of the record, and information points to the fact that he did have in his possession such a stone, yet there is no authentic statement in the history of the Church which states that the use of such a stone was made in that translation. The information is all hearsay, and personally, I do not believe that this stone was used for this purpose. . . . It hardly seems reasonable to suppose that the Prophet would substitute something evidently inferior under these circumstances. It may have been so, but it is so easy for a story of this kind to be circulated due to the fact that the Prophet did possess a seer stone, which he may have used for some other purposes. (Doctrines of Salvation, by Joseph Fielding Smith, vol. 3, pp. 225-226)

A few things should be noted concerning Joseph Fielding Smith's statement. He says that the information concerning the use of the stone in the translation of the Book of Mormon is "hearsay." In making this statement Mr. Smith seems to overlook the fact that not only Joseph Smith's wife and brother testified that a stone was used, but also David Whitmer and Martin Harris, who were witnesses to the Book of Mormon. These people were all eye witnesses to the translation. Joseph Fielding Smith claims that "there is no authentic statement in the history of the Church which states that the use of such a stone was made in that translation." While it is true that Joseph Smith suppressed this in his own History of the Church, still the Comprehensive History of the Church, by B. H. Roberts, very definitely states that a stone was used in the translation of the Book of Mormon.

The fact that Joseph Fielding Smith is embarrassed over the use of the stone is evident from his statement that "It hardly seems reasonable to suppose that the Prophet would substitute something evidently inferior under these circumstances." Perhaps President Smith is reluctant to admit that a stone was used because of the criticism of anti-Mormon writers.

M. T. Lamb made this observation concerning the use of the stone:

Finally, according to the testimony of Martin Harris, Mr. Smith often used the "seer stone" in place of the Urim and Thummim, even while the later remained in his possession—using it as a mere matter of convenience.

It seems almost too bad that he should thus inadvertently give the whole thing away. You must understand that the Urim and Thummim spoken of, and called throughout the Book of Mormon "the Interpreters," had been provided with great care over 2500 years ago by God himself, for the express purpose of translating these plates. They are often mentioned in the Book of Mormon as exceedingly important. They were preserved with the greatest care, handed down from one generation to another with the plates, and buried with them in the hill Cumorah over 1400 years ago; as sacred as the plates themselves. So sacred that only one man was allowed to handle or use them, the highly favored prophet, Joseph Smith himself. But now, alas! after all this trouble and pains and care on the part of God, and on the part of so many holy men of old this "Urim and Thummim" is found at last to be altogether superfluous; not needed at all. This "peep stone" found in a neighbor's well will do the work just as well—and is even more convenient, "for convenience he used the seer stone." So we are left to infer that when he used the Urim and Thummim at all, it was at some inconvenience. And probably he only did it out of regard to the feelings of his God, who had spent so much time and anxiety in preparing it so long ago, and preserving it to the present day for his special use! (The Golden Bible, by M. T. Lamb, 1887, pp. 250-51)

Joseph Fielding Smith, confronted with so much evidence that a stone was used in the translation of the Book of Mormon, finally has to admit, "It may have been so, but it is so easy for a story of this kind to be circulated due to the fact that the Prophet did possess a seer stone, which he may have used for some other purposes." President Smith does not explain what "other purposes" the stone might have been used for.

In an unpublished manuscript on the Book of Mormon, La Mar Petersen states:

Today the Church is silent regarding the stone. It seems somehow beneath the dignity of a Prophet to have ever placed one in his hat. Little or no information can be obtained as to the present whereabouts of the stone. [A.] William Lund, assistant Church historian says: "I have been here in the Library more than forty years and I have never seen it." Yet there are at least three definite statements in responsible Church organs that it does, or did, repose there.

On page 225 of his book, Doctrines of Salvation, vol. 3, Joseph Fielding Smith stated:

The Urim and Thummim so spoken of, however, was the seer stone which was in the possession of the Prophet Joseph Smith in early days. This seer stone is now in the possession of the Church.

David C. Martin presents some evidence to show that President Smith keeps the "seer stone" locked in a safe:

As an added note, Dean Hooper, Rockford, Illinois, in a conversation with Joseph Anderson, Assistant to the Council of the Twelve of the "Utah" Church, at a Chicago Stake Conference, January, 1971, quotes Anderson as saying that the "Seer" Stone that Joseph Smith used in the early days of the church is in the possession of the church and is kept in a safe in Joseph Fielding Smith's office. Anderson has seen it a number of times there. Slightly smaller than a chicken egg, oval, chocolate in color. (Restoration Reporter, vol. 1, no. 2, June, 1971, p. 8)

Relationship to Book of Mormon

A careful examination of the whole story of the coming forth of the Book of Mormon and even the text of the book itself reveals that it originated in the mind of someone who was familiar with the practice of money-digging. To begin with, the "seer stone" used in "translating" the book seems to have been nothing but a common "peep stone." Many people in Joseph Smith's area were using these stones to search for buried treasures. Mormon scholars admit that Joseph Smith found the stone while digging a well, and the testimony given in the 1826 trial shows that he used his stone to search for treasures. Even Martin Harris, one of the three witnesses to the Book of Mormon, admitted that the money-diggers "took Joseph to look in the stone for them, and he did so for a while, . . ." (Tiffany's Monthly, 1859, p. 164). On page 169 of the same publication Martin Harris claimed that Joseph "had before this described the manner of his finding the plates. He found them by looking in the stone found in the well of Mason Chase. The family had likewise told me the same thing." Henry Harris also stated that Joseph Smith told him he saw the plates in the hill Cumorah by means of the stone: "He said he had a revelation from God that told him they were hid in a certain hill and he looked in his stone and saw them in the place of deposit; . . ." (Affidavit of Henry Harris, as quoted in A New Witness For Christ In America, vol. 1, p. 133). Hosea Stout also claimed that Joseph Smith used the stone to find the Book of Mormon plates: "President Young exhibited the seer's stone with which the prophet discovered the plates of the Book of Mormon, to the Regents this evening" (On The Mormon Frontier, The Diary of Hosea Stout, vol. 2, p. 593).

Evidence also shows that in "translating" the Book of Mormon, Joseph Smith placed the stone in a hat in the same manner "as when he looked for the money-diggers." According to witnesses, the plates didn't even have to be present when Joseph Smith was "translating." The Mormon writer Arch S. Reynolds gives this information:

At another time David Whitmer gave a description of the procedure:

Joseph Smith did not see the plates in translation, but would hold the interpreters (Urim and Thummim) to his eyes and cover his face with a hat, excluding all light, and before him would appear what seemed to be parchment on which would appear the characters of the plates on a line at the top, and immediately below would appear the translation in English, . . . (Kansas City Journal, June 5, 1881.)

(How Did Joseph Smith Translate? p. 6)

The evidence proves that the plates were not always before Joseph during the translation. His wife and mother state that the plates were on the table wrapped in a cloth while Joseph translated with his eyes hid in a hat with the seer stone or the Urim and Thummim. David Whitmer, Martin Harris and others state that Joseph hid the plates in the woods and other places while he was translating. Also if Joseph hid his face in a hat while translating what good would the plates have been to him in helping him read the characters? Where it was dark he could not have seen the characters anyway, and the plates were too large to be hidden in a hat. (Ibid., p. 21)

As we examine the Book of Mormon story in the light of the money-digging activities of the 1820's, we notice that the gold plates from which the Book of Mormon was "translated" were supposed to have been a very valuable treasure. In fact, when the "first published consecutive account of the origin of the Church" appeared in 1834 and 1835 it stated that Joseph Smith desired to have the Book of Mormon plates to make himself wealthy. This account was republished in the Times and Seasons as follows:

... I have said that two invisible powers were operating upon his mind during his walk from his residence to Cumorah, and that the one urging the certainty of wealth and ease in this life, has so powerfully wrought upon him, that the great object so carefully and impressively named by the angel, had entirely gone from his recollection, that only a fixed determination to obtain now urged him forward, ... No sooner did he behold this sacred treasure than his hopes were renewed, ... he thought, perhaps, there might be something more equally as valuable, ... which could he secure, would still add to his store of wealth. These, in short, were his reflections, without once thinking of the solemn instruction of the heavenly messenger, that all must be done with an express view of glorifying God.

On attempting to take possession of the record a shock was produced upon his system, by an invisible power, which deprived him, in a measure, of his natural strength. He desisted for an instant, and then made another attempt, but was more sensibly shocked than before. What was the occasion of this he knew not—there was the pure unsullied record, as had been described—he had heard of the power of enchantment, and a thousand like stories, which held the hidden treasures of the earth, and supposed that physical exertion and personal strength was only necessary to enable him to yet obtain the object of his wish. He therefore made the third attempt with an increased exertion, when his strength failed him more than at either of the former times, and without premeditating he exclaimed: "Why can I not obtain this book?"

"Because you have not kept the commandments of the Lord," answered a voice, within a seeming short distance.

He looked, and to his astonishment, there stood the angel who had previously given him the directions concerning this matter. (Times and Seasons, vol. 2, pp. 392-393)

In Joseph Smith's History as published in the Pearl of Great Price, Joseph Smith 2:53, he does not mention the fact that the angel rebuked him for attempting to obtain the plates to become wealthy:

I made an attempt to take them out, but was forbidden by the messenger, and was again informed that the time for bringing them forth had not yet arrived, neither would it, until four years from that time; ...

Fortunately, Paul R. Cheesman has brought to light a document written by Joseph Smith which the church suppressed for 130 years. In this manuscript Joseph Smith stated:

... I immediately went to the place and found where the plates was deposited ... and straightway made three attempts to get them ... I cried unto the Lord in the agony of my soul why can I not obtain them behold the the [sic] angel appeared unto me again and said unto me you have not kept the commandments of the Lord which I gave unto you therefore you cannot now obtain them for the time is not yet fulfilled ... I had been tempted of the adversary and sought the Plates to obtain riches and kept not the commandment that I should have an eye singled to the glory of God therefore I was chastened and sought diligently to obtain the plates and obtained them not until I was twenty one years of age ... ("An Analysis of the Accounts Relating Joseph Smith's Early Visions," Master's thesis, Brigham Young University, 1965, pp. 130-131)

Even Joseph Smith's mother seems to have had an interest in the value of the treasures found in the hill Cumorah. Speaking of the breastplate which was found with the Book of Mormon plates, she said: "The whole plate was worth at least five hundred dollars: ..." (Biographical Sketches of Joseph Smith the Prophet, London, 1853, p. 107). In later printings of Mrs. Smith's book, these words have been completely deleted without any indication (see photograph in our Case, vol. 1, p. 61). The Mormon leaders have also deleted her description of the Urim and Thummim. In this description Joseph's mother claimed that the Urim and Thummim "consisted of two smooth three-cornered diamonds set in glass, and the glasses were set in silver bows, which were connected with each other in much the same way as old fashioned spectacles" (Ibid., p. 101).

In an affidavit given December 8, 1833, William Stafford told of the great interest which the Smith family had in money-digging:

... I first became acquainted with Joseph, Sen., and his family in the year 1820. ... They would say, for instance, that in such a place, in such a hill, on a certain man's farm, there were deposited kegs, barrels and hogsheds of coined silver and gold-bars of gold, golden images, brass kettles filled with gold and silver—gold candlesticks, swords, &c &c. They would say, also, that nearly all the hills in this part of New York, were thrown up by human hands, and in them were large caves, which Joseph, Jr., could see, by placing a stone of singular appearance in his hat, in such a manner as to exclude all light; at which time they pretended he could see all things within and under the earth,—that he could see within the above mentioned caves, large gold bars and silver plates—that he could also discover the spirits in whose charge these treasures were clothed in ancient dress. (Mormonism Unveiled, Painesville, Ohio, 1834, pp. 237-238)

It is very interesting to compare Stafford's statement about the caves with a statement by Brigham Young which we have previously quoted:

Oliver says that when Joseph and Oliver went there, the hill opened, and they walked into a cave, in which there was a large and spacious room. ... They laid the plates on a table; it was a large table that stood in the room. Under this table there was a pile of plates as much as two feet high, and there were altogether in this room more plates than probably many wagon loads; they were piled up in the corners and along the walls. The first time they went there the sword of Laban hung upon the wall; but when they went again it had been taken down and laid upon the table across the gold plates; ... (Journal of Discourses, vol. 19, p. 38)

Heber C. Kimball, who was a member of the First Presidency, also spoke of "the vision that Joseph and others had, when they went into a cave in the hill Cumorah, and saw more records than ten men could carry? There were books piled up on tables, book upon book" (Journal of Discourses, vol. 4, p. 105).

The Mormon writer Edward Stevenson made these interesting statements about the cave:

It was likewise stated to me by David Whitmer in the year 1877 that Oliver Cowdery told him that the Prophet Joseph and himself had seen this room and that it was filled with treasure, ... as well as the portion of gold plates not yet translated, ... no Rochester adventurers shall ever see them or the treasures, although science and mineral rods testify that they are there. At the proper time when greed, selfishness and corruption shall cease to reign in the hearts of the people, these vast hoards of hidden treasure shall be brought forth to be used for the cause and kingdom of Jesus Christ. (Reminiscences of Joseph the Prophet, Salt Lake City, 1893, pp. 14-15)

The Book of Mormon makes these statements concerning hidden treasures:

And behold, if a man hide up a treasure in the earth, and the Lord shall say—Let it be accursed, because of the iniquity of him who hath hid it up—behold, it shall be accursed.

And if the Lord shall say—Be thou accursed, that no man shall find thee from this time henceforth and forever—behold, no man getteth it henceforth and forever. (Book of Mormon, Helaman 12:18-19)

... whoso shall hide up treasures in the earth shall find them again no more, because of the great curse of the land, save he be a righteous man and shall hide it up unto the Lord.

For I will, saith the Lord, that they shall hide up their treasures unto me; and cursed be they who hide not up their treasures unto me; for none hideth up their treasures unto me save it be the righteous; and he that hideth not up his treasures unto me, cursed is he, and also the treasure, and none shall redeem it because of the curse of the land. (Book of Mormon, Helaman 13:18-19)

The reader will remember that Brigham Young told of a “chest of money” that moved by itself “into the bank,” and that Martin Harris told of a “stone box” which “slipped back into the hill.” In Joseph Smith’s 1826 trial, Jonathan Thompson testified that “on account of an enchantment the trunk kept settling away from under them when digging; . . .” This idea of treasures slipping into the earth seems to be reflected in the Book of Mormon:

Behold, we lay a tool here and on the morrow it is gone; and behold, our swords are taken from us in the day we have sought them for battle.

Yea, we have hid up our treasures and they have slipped away from us, because of the curse of the land.

O that we had repented in the day that the word of the Lord came unto us; for behold the land is cursed, and all things are become slippery, and we cannot hold them. (Book of Mormon, Helaman 13:34-36)

In Mormon 1:18 we read that the people “began to hide up their treasures in the earth; and they became slippery, because the Lord had cursed the land, that they could not hold them, nor retain them again.”

From the evidence we have presented it becomes clear that the Book of Mormon had its origin among a people who believed in “seer stones” and money-digging.

Working with the Rod

One of the most important changes Joseph Smith made in his revelations was an obvious attempt to cover up the fact that he had endorsed the idea that Oliver Cowdery had a gift from God to work with a divining rod. Below is a comparison of the way this revelation was first published in the Book of Commandments and the way it has been changed to read in recent editions of the Doctrine and Covenants (see photograph on p. 19, Change F).

Book of Commandments: “Now this is not all, for you have another gift, which is the gift of working with the rod: behold it has told you things: behold there is no other power save God, that can cause this rod of nature, to work in your hands, . . .” (Chapter 7:3)

Doctrine and Covenants: “Now this is not all thy gift, for you have another gift, which is the gift of Aaron; behold, it has told you many things;

“Behold, there is no other power, save the power of God, that can cause this gift of Aaron to be with you.” (Section 8:6-7)

The reader will notice that the words “working with the rod” and “rod of nature” have been entirely deleted from this revelation.

In the Vermont Historical Gazetteer we find some information that would seem to show that Joseph Smith and Oliver Cowdery derived their interest in working with the rod from their parents:

About 1800, occurred the “Wood scrape.” . . . It was a religious delusion, . . . the cause of great excitement here, and of a good deal of notoriety in this part of the State. . . .

Before 1860, I had conversed with more than 30 old men and women who were living here in 1800, . . . the substance of which was that the Woods dug for money . . . they used hazel-rods which they pretended would lead them to places where money, had been buried, . . . His [Nathaniel Wood’s] peculiar religious doctrines will appear as we proceed. . . . he regarded himself and his followers as modern Israelites or Jews, under the special care of Providence; . . .

A man by the name of Winchell, as he called himself when he came here, was the first man who used the hazel-rod. . . . He was a fugitive from justice from Orange county, Vermont, where he had been engaged in counterfeiting. He first went to a Mr. Cowdry’s, in Wells, who then lived in that town, near the line between Wells and Middletown, . . . Cowdry was the father of Oliver Cowdery, the noted Mormon, who claimed to have . . . written the book of Mormon, as it was deciphered by Smith from the golden plates. . . . Winchell staid at Cowdry’s some little time, keeping himself concealed, . . .

Winchell next turns up in Middletown, . . . and here he began to use the hazel-rod (whether he had before used it at Cowdry’s, in wells, I cannot say). . . .

Before we proceed further, we should, perhaps, say a word about this rod, . . . The best description we can give of it is this: It was a stick of what has been known as witch-hazel—a small bush or shrub very common in this vicinity. It was cut with two prongs, in the form of a fork, and the person using it would take the two prongs, one in each hand, and the other end from the body. From the use of this stick Winchell an[d] [t]he Woods pretended to divine all sorts of things to suit their purpose. . . . The men, under Winchell, . . . commenced digging . . . becoming weary, their enthusiasm began to cool, . . . Winchell held up his rod, got some motion from it, and told them the money was in an iron chest and covered with a large stone, and that they would soon come to it. . . . He impressed it upon them, that the occasion was one of “awful moment,” that there was a “divinity” guarding the treasure, and that if there was any lack of faith in any one of the party, or any should utter a word while removing the stone and taking out the chest, that this divinity would put the money forever beyond their reach, . . . Some one of the party stepped on the foot of another, the latter crying out in pain. “Get off from my toes.” Winchell exclaimed with a loud voice, “The money is gone, flee for your lives!” Every man of the party dropped his bar or lever, and ran as though it was for life. . . .

The Woods then commenced using the hazel rod and digging for money, which was in the Spring or early summer of 1800, and continued in this until late in the Fall, . . . Jacob Wood, known as Capt. Wood, one of the sons of Nathaniel, was the leader in the use of the rod. “Priest Wood” his father, seemed to throw his whole soul into the rod delusion, but his use of the rod was mostly as a medium of revelation. It was “St. John’s rod” he said, and undoubtedly was very convenient for him, as he was much more fruitful in his prophecies than before— . . . all the Woods and their followers, had each a rod, which was used whenever they desired any information. If any one was sick, they sought the rod to know whether they would live or die, and to know what medicine to administer to them. In all their business matters, they followed, as they said, the direction of the rod, . . . Many of the old people have told me, that almost every day during that season, Capt. Wood, or some other one, could be seen with the two prongs of the rod twisted around his hands, in search for buried treasures. . . .

Mr. Clark in his letter says: “By what I have heard of them (the Woods,) I have no doubt that the movement gave origin to the Mormons.” . . .

That the system of religion promulgated by Nathaniel Wood, and adopted by his followers in 1800, was the same, or “much the same,” as the Mormons adopted on the start, is beyond question. . . . The Woods were very fruitful in prophecies, especially after the hazel rod came to their use, so were the Mormons in the beginning of their creed, and both the Woods and the Mormons claimed to have revelations, . . . I have been told that Joe Smith's father resided in Poutney at the time of the Wood movement here, and that he was in it, and one of the leading rodsmen. Of this I cannot speak positively, for the want of satisfactory evidence, . . . I have before said that Oliver Cowdery's father was in the 'Wood scrape.' He then lived in Wells, afterwards in Middletown, after that went to Palmyra, and there we find these men with the counterfeiter, Winchell, searching for money over the hills and mountains with the hazel-rod, and their sons Joe and Oliver, as soon as they were old enough, were in the same business, . . .

Gov. Ford of Illinois, in his history of the Mormons, says of Joe Smith.

That his extreme youth was spent in idle, vagabond life, roaming in the woods, dreaming of buried treasures, and exerting the art of finding them by twisting a forked stick in his hands, or by looking through enchanted stones. He and his father before him, were what are called "water-witches," always ready to point out the ground where wells might be dug and water found.

. . . They used the rod, that is, the elder Smith and Cowdery, and pretended by that to obtain revelations, . . . and their sons Joe jr. and Oliver, . . . commenced their education with the use of the hazel-rod or forked stick, in searching for hidden treasures—though afterwards they used what they called enchanted stones. (The Vermont Historical Gazetteer, Edited by Abby Maria Hemenway, Claremont, N.H., 1877, vol. 3, pp. 810-819)

Although the material above was not printed until many years after the events were supposed to have occurred, the "Rodmen" were mentioned in the Vermont American as early as 1828:

About the year 1800, one or two families in Rutland county, . . . pretended to have been informed by the Almighty, that they were descendants of the ancient Jews, . . . They claimed, also, inspired power with which to cure all sorts of diseases-intuitive knowledge of lost or stolen goods, and ability to discover hidden treasures of the earth, . . . most of the connexions of its originators were drawn in, . . . numbering nearly forty persons. The instrument of their miraculous powers, was a cleft stick, or rod, something of the form of an inverted Y; . . . excavations were made in the mountains, some to a great depth; . . . From the bowels of the mountain valuable ore was to be taken; the building was to be erected into a furnace for smelting and refining it; and the horses' bones were to be converted into crucibles! (Vermont American, Middlebury, Vermont, May 7, 1828)

Joseph Smith's father was undoubtedly a believer in the practice of working with the rod. In an affidavit, dated December 2, 1833, Peter Ingersoll stated:

I, Peter Ingersoll, first became acquainted with the family of Joseph Smith, Sen. in the year of our Lord, 1822. . . .

The general employment of the family, was digging for money. . . . I was once ploughing near the house of Joseph Smith, Sen. about noon, he requested me to walk with him a short distance from his house, for the purpose of seeing whether a mineral rod would work in my hand, saying at the same time he was confident it would. . . . he cut a small witch hazel bush and gave me direction how to hold it. He then went off some rods, and told me to say to the rod, "work to the money," which I did, in an audible voice. He rebuked me severely for speaking it loud, and said it must be spoken in a whisper. This was rare sport for me. While the old man was standing off some rods, throwing himself into various shapes, I told him the rod did not work. He seemed much surprized at this, and said he thought he saw it move in my hand. It was now time for me to return to my labor. (Affidavit of Peter Ingersoll, as found in Mormonism Unveiled, Painesville, Ohio, 1834, p. 232)

A. B. Deming gathered some evidence showing that Joseph Smith himself used a rod when he was young. In her statement Mrs. S. F. Anderick stated:

In 1812 my parents moved to a farm two miles from the village, and in the township of Palmyra, New York. . . . He [Joseph Smith] claimed, when a young man, he could tell where lost or hidden things and treasures were buried or located with a forked witch hazel. He deceived many farmers, and induced them to dig nights for chests of gold, when the pick struck the chest, someone usually spoke, and Jo would say the enchantment was broken, and the chest would leave.

Willard Chase, a Methodist who lived about two miles from uncle's, while digging a well, found a gray smooth stone about the size and shape of an egg. Sallie, Willard's sister, also a Methodist, told me several times that young Jo Smith, who became the Mormon prophet, often came to inquire of her where to dig for treasures. She told me she would place the stone in a hat and hold it to her face, and claimed things would be brought to her view. . . . I heard that Jo obtained it and called it a peep-stone, which he used in the place of the witch hazel. (Naked Truths About Mormonism, Oakland, California, January, 1888, p. 2)

Isaac Butts made these statements in his testimony:

I was born in Palmyra, N.Y. . . . I attended school with Prophet Jo. . . . Young Jo had a forked witch-hazel rod with which he claimed he could locate buried money or hidden things. Later he had a peep-stone which he put into his hat and looked into it. I have seen both. . . . Jo and others dug much about Palmyra and Manchester. (Ibid., p. 2)

C. M. Stafford stated:

Jo claimed he could tell where money was buried, with a witch hazel consisting of a forked stick of hazel. He held it one fork in each hand and claimed the upper end was attracted by the money. . . . My mother-in-law, Mrs. Rockwell, said that Prophet Jo Smith told her there was money buried in the ground and she spent considerable time digging in various places for it. . . . Jo Smith told me there was a peep-stone for me and many others if we could only find them. Jo claimed to have revelations and tell fortunes. . . . Jo had men dig on a tunnel forty or fifty feet long in a hill about two miles north of where he claimed to find the plates. I have been in it. (Ibid., April, 1888, p. 1)

It would appear, then, that Joseph Smith learned about "working with the rod" from his father. He participated in this practice in his youth, and claimed to have a revelation from God which approved of Oliver Cowdery's "gift of working with the rod." Later, however, he became embarrassed about his money-digging activities and changed the revelation to remove all reference to the rod.

Although the Utah Mormon leaders appear to want their people to remain in the dark concerning the changes in the revelations, the Reorganized LDS Church leaders have made some real progress toward facing this problem. Richard P. Howard, RLDS Church Historian, makes these startling admissions in a book recently published by his church:

Several writers have established that both in Vermont and in western New York in the early 1800's, one of the many forms which enthusiastic religion took was the adaption of the witch hazel stick. . . . For example, the "divining rod" was used effectively by one Nathaniel Wood in Rutland County, Vermont, in 1801. Wood, Winchell, William Cowdery, Jr., and his son, Oliver Cowdery, all had some knowledge of and associations with the various uses, both secular and sacred, of the forked witch hazel rod. Winchell and others used such a rod in seeking buried treasure; . . . when Joseph Smith met Oliver Cowdery in April, 1829, he found a man peculiarly adept in the use of the forked rod. . . . and against the background of his own experiments with and uses of oracular media, Joseph Smith's April, 1829, affirmations about Cowdery's unnatural powers related to working with the rod are quite understandable. . . .

By the time that Joseph Smith approached the reinterpretation and rewording of this document for the 1835 edition of the Doctrine and Covenants, he had had time and experience necessary to place his 1829 assessment of the meaning of Cowdery's gift of working with the rod in a somewhat more accurate perspective. Both he and Cowdery had developed away from an emphasis on the religious or mystical meanings in such mechanical objects as the water witching rod. Joseph's 1835 wording of this document expressed in more general and symbolic terms the significance and promise of the relationship of trust still existing between Cowdery and himself. It left behind the apparent 1829 reliance upon external media, which by 1835 had assumed in Joseph's mind overtones of superstition and speculative experimentation. (Restoration Scriptures, Independence, Mo., 1969, pp. 211-214)

Affidavits and Statements

As we indicated earlier, in 1834 E. D. Howe published a number of affidavits and statements by people who were familiar with Joseph Smith's money-digging activities. Mormon writers have always dismissed these statements as being of little value. The Mormon writer F. L. Stewart stated: "All apparently were heavily edited by Hurlburt or dictated by him, as they bear a remarkable similarity in language and style" (Exploding The Myth About Joseph Smith, The Mormon Prophet, p. 25). The Mormon Apostle John A. Widtsoe said: "The famous affidavits in Howe's book are remarkably alike in composition. One hand must have written them" (Joseph Smith—Seeker After Truth, p. 80).

In the light of Richard L. Anderson's recent discovery this argument can no longer be maintained. The reader will remember that Dr. Anderson discovered that the statements from "Joseph Smith's in-laws and their Pennsylvania friends" were "apparently procured by Howe's direct correspondence independent of Hurlburt" (Dialogue: A Journal of Mormon Thought, Summer 1969, p. 25). These statements were first published in the Susquehanna Register and then reprinted in the New York Baptist Register. Now that Howe's printing of these statements from Pennsylvania has been shown to be accurate, we must take a more serious look at the affidavits from the Palmyra-Manchester area. This is especially true now that the 1826 court record has been proven authentic. In the past Mormon writers have claimed that Joseph Smith's neighbors made up the stories of his use of the stone for money-digging. The court record, however, shows that Joseph Smith himself admitted that "he had a certain stone which he had occasionally looked at to determine where hidden treasures in the bowels of the earth were; . . . That at Palmyra he pretended to tell by looking at this stone where coined money was buried in Pennsylvania, and while at Palmyra had frequently ascertained in that way where lost property was of various kinds; that he had occasionally been in the habit of looking through this stone to find lost property for three years, . . ."

Now, in light of this confession by Joseph Smith himself, the statements by his neighbors must be seriously considered.

Peter Ingersoll made these statements in his affidavit:

I, Peter Ingersoll, first became acquainted with the family of Joseph Smith, Sen. in the year of our Lord, 1822. . . .

In the month of August, 1827, I was hired by Joseph Smith, Jr. to go to Pennsylvania, to move his wife's household furniture up to Manchester, where his wife then was. When we arrived at Mr. Hale's, in Harmony, Pa. from which place he had taken his wife, a scene presented itself, truly affecting. His father-in-law (Mr. Hale) addressed Joseph, in a flood of tears: "You have stolen my daughter and married her. I had much rather have followed her to her grave. You spend your time in digging for money—pretend to see in a stone, and thus try to deceive people." Joseph wept, and acknowledged he could not see in a stone, now, nor never could; and his former pretensions in that respect, were all false. He then promised to give up his old habits of digging for money and looking into stones. . . .

Joseph told me on his return, that he intended to keep the promise which he had made to his father-in-law; but, said he, it will be hard for me, for they will all oppose, as they want me to look in the stone for them to dig money: and in fact it was as he predicted. They urged him, day after day, to resume his old practice of looking in the stone. (Affidavit of Peter Ingersoll, as printed in Mormonism Unveiled, pp. 232, 234 and 235; reprinted in Joseph Smith and Money Digging)

William Stafford gave the following information in his affidavit:

Joseph Smith, Sen., came to me one night, and told me, that Joseph Jr. had been looking in his glass, and had seen, not many rods from his house, two or three kegs of gold and silver, some feet under the surface of the earth; and that none others but the elder Joseph and myself could get them. I accordingly consented to go, and early in the evening repaired to the place of deposit. Joseph, Sen. first made a circle, twelve or fourteen feet in diameter. This circle, said he, contains the treasure. He then stuck in the ground a row of witch hazel sticks, around the said circle, for the purpose of keeping off the evil spirits. Within this circle he made another, of about eight or ten feet in diameter. He walked around three times on the periphery of this last circle, muttering to himself something which I could not understand. He next stuck a steel rod in the centre of the circles, and then enjoined profound silence upon us, lest we should arouse the evil spirit who had the charge of these treasures. After we had dug a trench about five feet in depth around the rod, the old man by signs and motions, asked leave of absence, and went to the house to inquire of young Joseph the cause of our disappointment. He soon returned and said, that Joseph had remained all this time in the house, looking in his stone and watching the motions of the evil spirit—that he saw the spirit come up to the ring and as soon as it beheld the cone which we had formed around the rod, it caused the money to sink. We then went into the house, and the old man observed, that we had made a mistake in the commencement of the operation; if it had not been for that, said he, we should have got the money. . . . Old Joseph and one of the boys came to me one day, and said that Joseph Jr. had discovered some very remarkable and valuable treasures, which could be procured only in one way. That way, was as follows:—That a black sheep should be taken on to the ground where the treasures were concealed—that after cutting its throat, it should be led around a circle while bleeding. This being done, the wrath of the evil spirit would be appeased: the treasures could then be obtained, and my share of them was to be four fold. To gratify my curiosity, I let them have a large fat sheep. They afterwards informed me, that the sheep was killed pursuant to commandment; but as there was some mistake in the process, it did not have the desired effect. This, I believe, is the only time they ever made money-digging a profitable business. . . . When they found that the people of this vicinity would no longer put any faith in their schemes for digging money; they then pretended to find a gold bible, . . . (Ibid., pp. 238- 239)

Joshua Stafford gives the following information in his statement:

I, Joshua Stafford, became acquainted with the family of Joseph Smith, Sen. about the year 1819 or 20. They then were laboring people, in low circumstances. A short time after this, they commenced digging for hidden treasures, and soon after they became indolent, and told marvelous stories about ghosts, hob-goblins, caverns, and various other mysterious matters. Joseph once showed me a piece of wood which he said he took from a box of money, and the reason he gave for not obtaining the box, was, that it moved. At another time, he, (Joseph Jr.) at a husking, called on me to become security for a horse, and said he would reward me handsomely, for he had found a box of watches, and they were as large as his fist, and he put one of them to his ear, and he could hear it "tick forty rods." (Ibid., p. 258)

Joseph Capron made these statements:

I, Joseph Capron, became acquainted with Joseph

Smith, Sen. in the year of our Lord, 1827. . . . The family of Smiths held Joseph Jr. in high estimation on account of some supernatural power which he was supposed to possess. This power he pretended to have received through the medium of a stone of peculiar quality. The stone was placed in a hat, in such a manner as to exclude all light, except that which emanated from the stone itself. This light of the stone, he pretended, enabled him to see any thing he wished. Accordingly he discovered ghosts, infernal spirits, mountains of gold and silver, and many other invaluable treasures deposited in the earth. He would often tell his neighbors of his wonderful discoveries, and urge them to embark in the money digging business. Luxury and wealth were to be given to all who would adhere to his counsel. . . . The sapient Joseph discovered, north west of my house, a chest of gold watches; but, as they were in the possession of the evil spirit, it required skill and stratagem to obtain them. Accordingly, orders were given to stick a parcel of large stakes in the ground, several rods around, in a circular form. This was to be done directly over the spot where the treasures were deposited. A messenger was then sent to Palmyra to procure a polished sword: after which, Samuel F. Lawrence, with a drawn sword in his hand, marched around to guard any assault which his Satanic majesty might be disposed to make. Meantime, the rest of the company were busily employed in digging for the watches. They worked as usual till quite exhausted. But, in spite of their brave defender, Lawrence, and their bulwark of stakes, the devil came off victorious, and carried away the watches. . . . At length, Joseph pretended to find the Gold plates. This scheme, he believed, would relieve the family from all pecuniary embarrassment. His father told me, that when the book was published, they would be enabled, from the profits of the work, to carry into successful operation the money digging business. (Ibid., pp. 258-260)

We do not have room here to include all of the affidavits published in Howe's book, but they are found in their entirety in our book Joseph Smith and Money Digging, Part 3.

The Treasure Hunt Revelation

Ebenezer Robinson, who was at one time the editor of the Mormon Church paper, Times and Seasons, gave the following information in The Return:

A brother in the church, by the name of Burgess, had come to Kirtland and stated that a large amount of money had been secreted in a cellar of a certain house in Salem, Massachusetts, which had belonged to a widow, and he thought he was the only person now living who had knowledge of it, or to the location of the house. We saw the brother Burgess, but Don Carlos Smith told us with regard to the hidden treasure. His statement was credited by the brethren, and steps were taken to try and secure the treasure, of which we will speak more fully in another place. (The Return, vol. 1, 1889, p. 105)

We soon learned that four of the leading men of the church had been to Salem, Massachusetts, in search of the hidden treasure spoken of by Brother Burgess, viz: Joseph Smith, Hyrum Smith, Sidney Rigdon and Oliver Cowdery. They left home on the 25th of July, and returned in September. (Ibid., p. 106)

Joseph Smith's History tells of this trip:

On Monday afternoon, July 25th, in company with Sidney Rigdon, Brother Hyrum Smith, and Oliver Cowdery, I left Kirtland, . . .

From New York we continued our journey to Providence, on board a steamer; from thence to Boston, by steam cars, and arrived in Salem, Massachusetts, early in August, where we hired a house, and occupied the same during the month. . . . (History of the Church, vol. 2, p. 464)

Joseph Smith received a revelation concerning the treasure hunt, which is still published in the Doctrine and Covenants. In this revelation we read the following:

I, the Lord your God, am not displeased with your coming this journey, notwithstanding your follies.

I have much treasure in this city for you, . . . and its wealth pertaining to gold and silver shall be yours.

Concern not yourselves about your debts, for I will give power to pay them.

. . . And inquire diligently concerning the more ancient inhabitants and founders of this city;

For there are more treasure than one for you in this city. (Doctrine and Covenants, Sec. 111, verses 1, 2, 4, 5, 9, 10)

Mr. Robinson informs us that the treasure was never found, and Joseph Smith was unable to pay his debts as the revelation had promised:

We were informed that Brother Burgess met them in Salem, evidently according to appointment, but time had wrought such a change that he could not, for a certainty point out the house, and soon left. They however, found a house which they felt was the right one, and hired it. It is needless to say they failed to find that treasure, or the other gold and silver spoken of in the revelation.

We speak of these things with regret, but inasmuch as they occurred we feel it our duty to relate them, as also some of those things which transpired under our personal observation, soon after. (The Return, vol. 1, p. 106)

The Mormon historian B. H. Roberts stated:

While the Prophet gives a somewhat circumstantial account of this journey to Salem and his return to Kirtland in September, he nowhere assigns an adequate cause for himself and company making it—the object of it is not stated. (Comprehensive History of the Church, vol. 1, p. 411)

B. H. Roberts admitted that the Mormon leaders went to Salem seeking “an earthly treasure,” but claims that the other treasures spoken of in the revelation were of a spiritual nature:

Here we have an opportunity of discerning the difference between the ways of God and the ways of men. Whereas these brethren had come seeking an earthly treasure, God directs their attention to spiritual things, telling them there are more treasures than one for them in that city; and instructs them to inquire diligently concerning the ancient inhabitants and founders of that city, doubtless having in view the securing of their genealogies and the redemption of the past generations of men who had lived there; so that if for a moment the weakness of men was manifested in this journey, we see that fault reproved and the strength and wisdom of God made manifest by directing the attention of his servants to the real and true treasures that he would have them seek, even the salvation of men, both the living and the dead. (Comprehensive History of the Church, vol. 1, p. 412)

While it is interesting to note that B. H. Roberts admitted that the Mormon leaders went to Salem seeking “an earthly treasure,” his explanation of the revelation seems to be an attempt to keep from facing reality.

Mormon Scholars Concede Authenticity of 1826 Trial Documents

On page 36 of this book we quote an attack upon the authenticity of Joseph Smith's 1826 trial which appeared in Dr. Hugh Nibley's book, The Myth Makers—a book containing a fictitious account of “the case of the World versus Joseph Smith.” The Chairman, who defends the Mormon position, maintained that “if this court record is authentic it is the most damning evidence in existence against Joseph Smith.” He also states that it would be “the most devastating blow to Smith ever delivered, . . .” Since Wesley P. Walters discovered the original bills of Constable DeZeng and Justice Albert Neely, Dr. Nibley has kept silent about the matter. The first Mormon scholar to attempt to deal with this issue since Walters' discovery was Marvin S. Hill, who was serving as Assistant Professor of History at Brigham Young University. While Mormon writers like Nibley and Kirkham had claimed it would be all over for Joseph Smith if the court record was proven authentic, Dr. Hill maintained that even if Joseph Smith was guilty of “Glass Looking,” this does not prove that he was a religious fraud:

. . . Reverend Wesley P. Walters of the United Presbyterian church in Marissa, Illinois, discovered some records in the basement of the sheriff's office in Norwich, New York, which he maintains demonstrate the actuality of the 1826 trial and go far to substantiate that Joseph Smith spent part of his early career in southern New York as a money digger and seer of hidden treasures. A periodical in Salt Lake City [The Salt Lake City Messenger] which heralded Walters's findings said they “undermine Mormonism” and repeated a statement by Hugh Nibley in The Myth Makers, “if this court record is authentic it is the most damning evidence in existence against Joseph Smith.” . . .

A preliminary investigation by the writer at the sheriff's office in Norwich, New York, confirmed that Walters had searched thoroughly the bills of local officials dated in the 1820s, many of which were similar to the two bills in question. The originals, however, were not at the sheriff's office but in Walters's possession. Presumably they will be available for study at a later date. Until then, the final question of their authenticity must remain open. If a study of the handwriting and paper of the originals demonstrates their authenticity, it will confirm that there was a trial in 1826 and that glass looking was an issue at the trial. . . . if the bills should prove authentic and demonstrate that Joseph Smith was tried as a “Glass Looker,” what shall we make of him? Nearly everybody seems to have conceded that if Joseph Smith was indeed a gold digger that he was also a religious fraud. This is a view, however, of our own generation, not Joseph Smith's. Joseph himself never denied that he searched for buried treasure. . . .

If there was an element of mysticism in Joseph Smith and the other early Mormons which led them to search for treasures in the earth, it does not disprove the genuineness of their religious convictions. (Brigham Young University Studies, Winter 1972, pp. 224, 225, 231, 232)

Writing in the Winter 1972 issue of Dialogue: A Journal of Mormon Thought, pages 77-78, Dr. Hill conceded:

There may be little doubt now, as I have indicated elsewhere, that Joseph Smith was brought to trial in 1826 on a charge, not exactly clear, associated with money digging. . . . Brodie's . . . thesis that the prophet grew from necromancer to prophet assumes that the two were mutually exclusive, that if Smith were a money digger he could not have been religiously sincere. This does not necessarily follow. Many believers, active in their churches, were money diggers in New England and western New York in this period. Few contemporaries regard these money diggers as irreligious, only implying so if their religious views seemed too radical. . . . For the historian interested in

Joseph Smith the man, it does not seem incongruous for him to have hunted for treasure with a seer stone and then to use it with full faith to receive revelations from the Lord.

In a new book entitled, The Mormon Experience, pages 10-11, Church Historian Leonard J. Arrington and his assistant Davis Bitton have now admitted that Joseph Smith was tried as a “glass looker”:

Smith's self-admitted employment by Josiah Stool resulted in the youth's being brought to trial in 1826, charged with either vagrancy or disorderly conduct. Bills drawn up by the local judge and constable refer to Smith as a ‘glass looker’ (one who, by peering through a glass stone, could see things not discernible by the natural eye). The bills class the offense as a misdemeanor and indicate that at least twelve witnesses were served with subpoenas.

The anonymous Mormon historian, whom we refer to as “Dr. Clandestine,” accepts the reality of the recently discovered bills but refuses to face the serious implications of the discovery:

In drawing conclusions from the evidence they do present, the Tanners are often guilty of the non sequitur: in other words, the conclusions arrived at are not supported by the evidence. For example, they state (on page 33) that the recently discovered bill of charges from the 1826 trial of Joseph Smith “proves that the published court record is authentic.” The published “court record” appeared in contradictory versions in 1831, 1873, 1877, and 1883, several of which allegedly quote detailed testimony from this trial. The Tanners' statement would lead the reader to believe that the bill of charges substantiates the entire published versions of the trial (including all alleged testimony—p. 34), whereas these recent discoveries verify quite limited facts: there was a trial in 1826 in which Joseph Smith was described as “The Glass Looker” and charged with a misdemeanor, twelve witnesses were subpoenaed, a mittimus was issued, and the total court costs were $2.68. (Jerald and Sandra Tanner's Distorted View of Mormonism, p. 18)

Dr. Clandestine has certainly not done his homework regarding this matter, and therefore he has reached an erroneous conclusion. He states that “The published ‘court record’ appeared in contradictory versions in 1831, 1873, 1877, and 1883, several of which allegedly quote detailed testimony from this trial.” Dr. Clandestine could never have made this statement if he had even briefly examined the original publications to which he refers. To begin with, the 1831 account which he speaks of is not a printing of the “court record” at all; it is merely a statement about the trial by A. W. Benton of Bainbridge, N. Y. Dr. Clandestine is also in error when he refers to the publication of the “court record” in 1877. This is a newspaper account of the trial which appeared in the Chenango Union under the date of May 3, 1877. It is not a printing of the “court record” as Dr. Clandestine would have the reader believe, but only the reminiscences of Dr. W. P. Purple who was present at the trial. It is a valuable piece of historical writing, but it does not purport to be a reproduction of any part of the written “court record.”

While Dr. Clandestine has struck out twice with regard to the documents, he is right in referring to the 1873 version as a printing of the “court record.” It appeared in Fraser's Magazine, February 1873. The 1883 printing is also a copy of the “court record” and is found in New Schaff-Herzog Encyclopedia of Religious Knowledge, 1883, vol. 2. Now, while Dr. Clandestine mistakenly claims that the accounts of the trial printed in 1831 and 1877 are reproductions of the “court record,” he overlooks the fact that the “court record” was also printed in the Utah Christian Advocate in January 1886.

When we compare the three printings of the “court record”

we find that they are essentially the same. One short paragraph (40 words) appears to have been accidentally omitted in Fraser's Magazine, but it certainly does not make any substantial difference in the trial and is found in both of the other printings. All three of the printings were copied from the original pages of the document. We feel that the Mormon Church would give almost anything to have the three accounts of the First Vision by Joseph Smith in such harmony.

In the book, Answering Dr. Clandestine: A Response to the Anonymous LDS Historian, page 13, we demonstrate that the printed versions read the same by comparing a portion of the 1873 printing with that which appeared in 1886. We then ask Dr. Clandestine where he finds any important difference between these two printings of the “court record”? We feel that it is a misrepresentation to say that they are contradictory. A number of Mormon writers have made this claim, and Dr. Clandestine, who has apparently never taken the time to examine the documents, has followed them into a serious error.

Dr. Clandestine accuses us of using too much repetition, but when we see how he skips over things, we are even more convinced that some repetition is necessary. If Dr. Clandestine will re-examine Mormonism—Shadow or Reality? he will see his idea that he can accept the authenticity of Justice Albert Neely's bill and yet reject the printed “court record” is untenable.

Another Discovery Concerning 1826 Trial

In 1977 Wesley P. Walters reported another discovery which throws even more light on the 1826 trial:

Joseph Smith, Jr., before he became the founder and prophet of Mormonism, had made part of his living as a “glass looker.” . . . This money digging activity and the court trials that grew out of that illegal practice have received new clarification through a recently discovered letter from a judge who, in 1830, tried Joseph Smith in Colesville, south central New York. The letter was written in 1842 by Joel King Noble, a justice of the peace in Colesville, Broome County . . .

Our knowledge of Joseph Smith's activities in the Bainbridge area had previously, to a large extent, depended on the printed record of a trial at South Bainbridge in 1826, in which Joseph had admitted to his “glass looking” practices and was accordingly found guilty of breaking the law, though no sentence is recorded. . . . the discovery in 1971 of the bills of cost handed in to the county by Constable Philip DeZeng and Justice Neely for their services during the arrest and trial of Joseph Smith in 1826 have now established beyond doubt that the young “Glass looker” (as Mr. Neely's bill calls him) was indeed involved in glass looking for hidden treasure and lost objects, and that he was brought to trial for that crime. . . . Mormons have recently been inclined to grant that Joseph Smith, Jr., was tried in 1826, but they do not believe he was found guilty, and they therefore tend to regard the printed record as a falsification. Mr. Noble's letter, however, now fills in the missing details and confirms the entire incident, so that there is no longer any reason to doubt the authenticity of the printed docket.

Judge Noble says quite unequivocally that “Jo. was condemned” in what he calls Joseph's “first trial.” Then he adds a detail that provides the clue to why no sentencing appears in the docket record even though Joseph was found guilty. Mr. Noble succinctly states that the “whisper came to Jo., ‘Off, Off!’ ” and so Joseph “took Leg Bail,” an early slang expression meaning “to escape from custody.” What is obviously happening is that the justices are privately suggesting to this first offender to “get out of town and don't come back,” and in exchange they will not impose sentence. This is why no sentence was recorded in the docket record of Mr. Neeley.

In reporting the court's method of clemency, Judge Noble's statement agrees precisely with an early account of this 1826 trial published just five years after the trial had taken place. It was written by . . . Dr. Abram Willard Benton, who like Mr. Noble mentions that Joseph had been involved in glass looking, and that he had been “tried and condemned.” Dr. Benton adds that because Joseph was a minor at the time, being 20 years old, “and thinking he might reform his conduct, he was designedly allowed to escape.” Therefore, the court, though it found him guilty of being in violation of the law, had intentionally not imposed sentence as a way of showing mercy on this youthful offender. . . . Thus it is quite clear from all sides that Joseph wove occult religious material into his money digging practices, and this led the communities where he dug for treasure to associate him with divination, necromancy, and wizardry. . . . once he had determined to give up money digging after his close brush with the law in 1826, this occult religious interest made it easy for him to think in terms of producing a religious book from the gold plates he claimed to have discovered through the same stone he had used for his treasure hunting. (The Journal of Pastoral Practice, Summer 1977, pp. 121-123, 127-128)

Wesley P. Walters has photographically reproduced Justice Noble's letter, and we have now included it in the pamphlet Joseph Smith's Bainbridge, N.Y., Court Trials. According to Justice Noble, when Joseph Smith was tried in his court in 1830 there was a discussion of his money-digging and use of magical practices. In the History of the Church, vol. 1, pages 91-93, Joseph Smith himself admitted that money digging was discussed during the trial:

Next day I was brought before the magistrate's court at Colesville, Broome county, and put upon trial. . . .

Mr. Seymour . . . brought up the story of my having been a money-digger; and in this manner proceeded, hoping evidently to influence the court and the people against me.

More on Rod of Nature

On pages 46-47 we deal with the changes in Joseph Smith's revelation dealing with the practice of “working with the rod.” Marvin S. Hill, of the Church's Brigham Young University, has admitted that “when Oliver Cowdery took up his duties as a scribe for Joseph Smith in 1829 he had a rod in his possession which Joseph Smith sanctioned . . .” (Dialogue: A Journal of Mormon Thought, Winter 1972, p. 78). Marvin Hill goes on to state: “Some of the rodsmen or money diggers who moved into Mormonism were Oliver Cowdery, Martin Harris, Orrin P. Rockwell, Joseph and Newel Knight, and Josiah Stowell.” It is interesting to note that Marvin Hill includes two of the three witnesses to the Book of Mormon in his list of “rodsmen or money diggers.”

Recently the Mormon writer D. Michael Quinn has admitted that “Oliver Cowdery was by revelation given the gift of working with a ‘rod of nature . . .’” (Brigham Young University Studies, Fall 1978, p. 82). Dr. Quinn further informs that “during the Nauvoo period Apostle Heber C. Kimball ‘inquired by the rod’ in prayer.” In a footnote in the same article the following is cited from the Anthony H. Lund Journal for July 5, 1901:

In the revelation to Oliver Cowdery in May 1829, Bro [B. H.] Roberts said that the gift which the Lord says he has in his hand meant a stick which was like Aaron's Rod. It is said Bro. Phineas Young [brother-in-law of Oliver Cowdery and brother of Brigham Young] got it from him [Cowdery] and gave it to President Young who had it with him when he arrived in this [Salt Lake] valley and that it was with that stick that he pointed out where the Temple should be built.

In his book on Heber C. Kimball, the Mormon scholar Stanley B. Kimball provides this information:

Heber also told of an unusual rod he had received from Joseph Smith. En route to his first mission to England in 1837, he had dreamed “that the Prophet Joseph came to me while I was standing upon the forecastle of the ship, and said, ‘Brother Heber, here is a rod (putting it into my hands), with which you are to guide the ship. While you hold this rod you shall prosper, and there shall be no obstacles thrown before you but what you shall have power to overcome, and the hand of God shall be with you. . . .’ This rod which Joseph gave me was about three and a half feet in length.”

Later Joseph did give him and Brigham Young real rods, because “they were the only ones of the original twelve who had not lifted up their hearts against the Prophet.” When Heber wanted to find out anything that was his right to know, “all he had to do was to kneel down with the rod in his hand, and . . . sometimes the Lord would answer his questions before he had time to ask them.” At least twice in Nauvoo, for example, he had used this special rod. In September, 1844, he “went home and used the rod” to find out if Willard Richards would recover from an illness and if the church would overcome its enemies. In January, 1845, he inquired of the Lord “by the rod” whether the Nauvoo temple would be finished and if his sins were forgiven. All the answers were affirmative. (Heber C. Kimball: Mormon Patriarch and Pioneer, University of Illinois Press, 1981, p. 248)

Joseph Smith’s Magic Talisman

In 1974 Dr. Reed Durham, who was director of the LDS Institute of Religion at the University of Utah and president of the Mormon History Association, made a discovery that was so startling that it caused great consternation among Mormon scholars and officials. Dr. Durham found that what had previously been identified as the “Masonic jewel of the Prophet Joseph Smith” was in reality a “Jupiter talisman.” This is a medallion which contains material relating to astrology and magic. Dr. Durham, apparently not realizing the devastating implications of his discovery, announced this important find in his presidential address before the Mormon History Association on April 20, 1974:

. . . I should like to initiate all of you into what is perhaps the strangest, the most mysterious, occult-like esoteric, and yet Masonically oriented practice ever adopted by Joseph Smith. . . . All available evidence suggests that Joseph Smith the Prophet possessed a magical Masonic medallion, or talisman, which he worked during his lifetime and which was evidently on his person when he was martyred. His talisman is in the shape of a silver dollar and is probably made of silver or tin. It is exactly one and nine-sixteenths in diameter, . . . the talisman, . . . originally purchased from the Emma Smith Bidamon family, fully notarized by that family to be authentic and to have belonged to Joseph Smith, can now be identified as a Jupiter talisman. It carries the sign and image of Jupiter and should more appropriately be referred to as the Table of Jupiter. And in some very real and quite mysterious sense, this particular Table of Jupiter was the most appropriate talisman for Joseph Smith to possess. Indeed, it seemed meant for him, because on all levels of interpretation: planetary, mythological, numerological, astrological, mystical cabalism, and talismatic magic, the Prophet was, in every case, appropriately described.

The characters on the talisman are primarily in Hebrew, but there is one inscription in Latin. Every letter in the Hebrew alphabet has a numerical equivalent and those numerical equivalent make up a magic square. By adding the numbers in this Jupiter Table in any direction . . . the total will be the same. In this case, on the Jupiter Table, 34. . .

There is the one side of the talisman belonging to the Prophet Joseph Smith. You can see the Hebrew characters . . . you see on the margins, at the bottom is the Jupiter sign. . . . The cross at the top represents the spirit of Jupiter, and you will see the path of Jupiter in the orbit of the heavens, and then again the Jupiter sign.

I wasn’t able to find what this was, for—as I said—two months; and finally, in a magic book printed in England in 1801, published in America in 1804, and I traced it to Manchester, and to New York. It was a magic book by Francis Barrett and, lo and behold, how thrilled I was when I saw in his list of magic seals the very talisman which Joseph Smith had in his possession at the time of his martyrdom. . . . To the

BOTH SIDES OF JOSEPH SMITH’S TALISMAN

Egyptians, Jupiter was known as Ammon, but to the Greeks he was Zeus: the ancient sky Father, or Father of the Gods. . . .

In astrology, Jupiter is always associated with high positions, getting one's own way, and all forms of status. And I quote:

Typically a person born under Jupiter will have the dignity of a natural ruler. . . . He will probably have an impressive manner. . . . In physical appearance, the highly developed Jupiterian is strong, personable, and often handsome. . . . the Jupiterian influence produces a cheerful winning personality, capable of great development. . . .

So closely is magic bound up with the stars and astrology that the term astrologer and magician were in ancient times almost synonymous. The purpose of the Table of Jupiter in talismanic magis [magic?] was to be able to call upon the celestial intelligences, assigned to the particular talisman, to assist one in all endeavors. The names of the deities which we gave to you, who could be invoked by the Table were always written on the talisman or represented by various numbers. Three such names were written on Joseph Smith's talisman: Abbah, Father; El Ob, Father is God or God the Father; and Josiphiel, Jehovah speaks for God, the Intelligence of Jupiter.

When properly invoked with Jupiter being very powerful and ruling in the heavens, these intelligences—by the power of ancient magic—guaranteed to the possessor of this talisman the gain of riches, and favor, and power, and love and peace; and to confirm honors, and dignities, and councils. Talismatic magic further declared that any one who worked skillfully with this Jupiter Table would obtain the power of stimulating anyone to offer his love to the possessor of the talisman, whether from a friend, brother, relative, or even any female. (Mormon Miscellaneous, published by David C. Martin, vol. 1, no. 1, October 1975, pp. 14-15)

In this same speech Reed Durham told of the close relationship of Mormonism to Masonry. Because of his frank method of dealing with these matters he was severely criticized by Mormon scholars and officials. He was even called in by Mormon President Spencer W. Kimball, and finally found it necessary to issue a letter in which he reaffirmed his faith in Joseph Smith and said that he was sorry for the “concerns, and misunderstandings” that the speech had caused. We feel that Dr. Durham's identification of Joseph Smith's talisman is one of the most significant discoveries in Mormon history and that he should be commended for his research.

That Joseph Smith would own such a magic talisman fits very well with the evidence from his 1826 trial. W. D. Purple, who was an eyewitness to the trial, claimed it was reported that Smith said certain talismanic influences were needed to recover a box of treasure:

Mr. Thompson, an employee of Mr. Stowel, was the next witness. . . . Smith had told the Deacon that very many years before a band of robbers had buried on his flat a box of treasure, and as it was very valuable they had by a sacrifice placed a charm over it to protect it, so that it could not be obtained except by faith, accompanied by certain talismanic influences. . . . the box of treasure was struck by the shovel, on which they redoubled their energies, but it gradually receded from their grasp. One of the men placed his hand upon the box, but it gradually sunk from his reach. . . . Mr. Stowell went to his flock and selected a fine vigorous lamb, and resolved to sacrifice it to the demon spirit who guarded the coveted treasure . . . but the treasure still receded from their grasp, and it was never obtained. (The Chenango Union, Norwich, N.Y., May 3, 1877, as cited in A New Witness For Christ In America, vol. 2, pp. 366-67)

Dr. Durham was unable to determine just when Joseph Smith obtained his talisman, but the fact that he was recommending “certain talismanic influences” around the time of the 1826 trial is certainly interesting. The Jupiter talisman is probably the type of talisman a money digger would be interested in because it was supposed to bring its possessor “the gain of riches, and favor, and power.” Regardless of when Joseph Smith obtained his talisman, we do know that he possessed it up to the time of his death. He must have felt that it was very important because the Mormon scholar LaMar C. Berrett reveals that “This piece was in Joseph Smith's pocket when he was martyred at Carthage Jail” (The Wilford C. Wood Collection, 1972, vol. 1, p. 173). Wesley P. Walters says that

Charles E. Bidamon, who sold the talisman to the Wood collection, stated in his accompanying affidavit: “Emma Smith Bidamon the prophet's widow was my foster mother. She prized this piece very highly on account of its being one of the prophet's intimate possessions.” (Charles E. Bidamon Affidavit. Wood Coll. #7-J-b-21)

The discovery of evidence to prove Joseph Smith's 1826 trial was certainly a devastating blow to Mormonism, for it proved that Joseph Smith was a believer in magical practices. Reed Durham's new find that Joseph Smith possessed a magic talisman is also very significant because it shows that Smith continued to hold these ideas until the time of his death.

5. The Book of Mormon

As we have already shown, Joseph Smith claimed that on the night of September 21, 1823, when he was seventeen years old, an angel appeared to him and stated that gold plates were buried in the Hill Cumorah. The angel stated that the plates contained “an account of the former inhabitants of this continent,” and that they also contained “the fullness of the everlasting Gospel.” Four years later, on September 22, 1827, he received the plates, and sometime later he began to translate them. The translation was published in 1830 under the title of The Book of Mormon.

The Mormon Apostle Orson Pratt made this statement concerning the Book of Mormon:

The Book of Mormon claims to be a divinely inspired record, . . . It professes to be revealed to the present generation for the salvation of all who will receive it, and for the overthrow and damnation of all nations who reject it.

This book must be either true or false. If true, it is one of the most important messages ever sent from God . . . If false, it is one of the most cunning, wicked, bold, deep-laid impositions ever palmed upon the world, calculated to deceive and ruin millions . . .

The nature of the message in the Book of Mormon is such, that if true, no one can possibly be saved and reject it; if false, no one can possibly be saved and receive it . . .

If, after a rigid examination, it be found an imposition, it should be extensively published to the world as such; the evidences and arguments on which the imposture was detected, should be clearly and logically stated, that those who have been sincerely yet unfortunately deceived, may perceive the nature of the deception, and be reclaimed, and that those who continue to publish the delusion, may be exposed and silenced, not by physical force, neither by persecutions, bare assertions, nor ridicule, but by strong and powerful arguments—by evidences adduced from scripture and reason. . . .

But on the other hand, if investigation should prove the Book of Mormon true . . . the American and English nations . . . should utterly reject both the Popish and Protestant ministry, together with all the churches which have been built up by them or that have sprung from them, as being entirely destitute of authority: . . . (Orson Pratt's Works, “Divine Authenticity of the Book of Mormon,” Liverpool, 1851, pp. 1-2)

Our study has led us to the conclusion that the Book of Mormon is not an ancient or divinely inspired record, but rather a product of the 19th century. In this chapter we hope to state “clearly and logically” the “evidences and arguments on which the imposture was detected.”

The Witnesses

Joseph Smith claimed that after the Book of Mormon was translated he returned the gold plates to the angel. Therefore, there is no way for us to know if there really were any gold plates or whether the translation was correct.

Joseph Smith did, however, have eleven men sign statements in which they claimed that they had seen the plates. The testimonies of these eleven men are recorded in the forepart of the Book of Mormon in two separate statements. In the first statement Oliver Cowdery, David Whitmer, and Martin Harris claimed that an angel of God showed the plates to them.

THE TESTIMONY OF THREE WITNESSES

BE IT KNOWN unto all nations, kindreds, tongues, and people, unto whom this work shall come: That we, through the grace of God the Father, and our Lord Jesus Christ, have seen the plates which contain this record, which is a record of the people of Nephi, and also of the Lamanites, their brethren, and also of the people of Jared, who came from the tower of which hath been spoken. And we also know that they have been translated by the gift and power of God, for his voice hath declared it unto us; wherefore we know of a surety that the work is true. And we also testify that we have seen the engravings which are upon the plates; and they have been shown unto us by the power of God, and not of man. And we declare with words of soberness, that an angel of God came down from heaven, and he brought and laid before our eyes, that we beheld and saw the plates, and the engravings thereon; and we know that it is by the grace of God the Father, and our Lord Jesus Christ, that we beheld and bear record that these things are true. And it is marvelous in our eyes. Nevertheless, the voice of the Lord commanded us that we should bear record of it; wherefore, to be obedient unto the commandments of God, we bear testimony of these things. And we know that if we are faithful in Christ, we shall rid our garments of the blood of all men, and be found spotless before the judgment-seat of Christ, and shall dwell with him eternally in the heavens. And the honor be to the Father, and to the Son, and to the Holy Ghost, which is one God. Amen.

OLIVER COWDERY
DAVID WHITMER
MARTIN HARRIS

The second statement is signed by eight men who claimed to see the plates, although they did not claim that an angel showed the plates to them.

AND ALSO

THE TESTIMONY OF EIGHT WITNESSES

BE IT KNOWN unto all nations, kindreds, tongues, and people, unto whom this work shall come: That Joseph Smith, Jun., the translator of this work, has shown unto us the plates of which hath been spoken, which have the appearance of gold; and as many of the leaves as the said Smith has translated we did handle with our hands; and we also saw the engravings thereon, all of which has the appearance of ancient work, and of curious workmanship. And this we bear record with words of soberness, that the said Smith has shown unto us, for we have seen and hefted, and know of a surety that the said Smith has got the plates of which we have spoken. And we give our names unto the world, to witness unto the world that which we have seen. And we lie not, God bearing witness of it.

The Mormon Church claims that the witnesses to the Book of Mormon never denied their testimony. There are, however, at least two statements in Mormon publications which would seem to indicate that the witnesses had some doubts. Brigham Young, the second President of the Mormon Church, stated:

Some of the witnesses of the Book of Mormon, who handled the plates and conversed with the angels of God, were afterwards left to doubt and to disbelieve that they had ever seen an angel. (Journal of Discourses, vol. 7, p. 164)

There is some evidence to indicate that Oliver Cowdery, one of the three witnesses, may have had doubts about his

Amazed with wonder! I look round
 To see most people of our day,
 Reject the glorious gospel sound,
 Because the simple turn away.
 Or does it prove there is no time,
 Because some watches will not go?
 But does it prove there is no crime
 Because not punished here below?
 Or can it prove no gems remain,
 Because some fools, throw their's away?
 Or can it prove no king can reign
 Because some subjects wont obey?
 Or prove the gospel was not true
 Because old Paul the Saints could kill?
 Because the Jews its author slew,
 And now reject their Saviour still?
 Or prove that Christ was not the Lord
 Because that Peter cursed and swore?
 Or Book of Mormon not his word
 Because denied, by Oliver?
 Or prove, that Joseph Smith is false
 Because apostates say tis so?
 Or prove that God, no man exalts
 Because from priests such doctrines flow?
 O, no! the wise will surely say;
 No proof unto the man that's wise,
 Then O! dig deep ye wise to-day;
 And soon the truth will be your prize.
 Not like the fool who chane'd to see,
 The Saint forsake his heavenly course,
 And turn to sin and vanity—
 Then cries your "scheme is all a farce."

BY

MISS E. R. SNOW.

Praise the Lord O my soul: Praise him all ye sons and daughters of Zion.

Let us sing unto him a new song: let us sing of his marvellous doings in the last days.

He is the same yesterday, to-day and forever;
 therefore I will praise him for what my eyes have seen, and my ears have heard.

He hath opened the fountain of knowledge:
 he hath unlock'd the treasures of wisdom and understanding.

He hath brought to pass that which he spake by the mouth of his ancient prophets: yea, he hath caused truth to "spring up out of the earth, and righteousness to look down from heaven."

In ancient time he call'd his servant David from the sheep-fold to preside over the nation of Israel; yea, from a tender of flocks did he raise him to the sovereignty of his covenant people.

He call'd Elijah from the occupation of husbandry, even when "ploughing in the field with twelve yoke of oxen;" to be a prophet in Israel:

Yea by the hand of Elijah, was he anointed to the office of his calling, even to proclaim the word of the Lord—to declare the counsels of the Most High to the people.

In these last days the Lord hath call'd his servant Joseph—the son of an husbandman; to be a prophet and a teacher: yea, to be a mighty instrument in rolling forward and establishing that kingdom which "shall fill the whole earth."

The Lord hath spoken to him from the heavens—he hath instructed him thro' the ministration of angels—he hath taught him by the power of the holy spirit.

He hath opened the heavens, he hath rent the veil thereof, before his face—he hath spread the visions of eternity in his presence—he hath drawn aside the curtain of futurity and showed unto his servant things to come.

He hath anointed him with the oil of understanding, and instructed him in the great mysteries of the kingdom of heaven; even those "mysteries which have been hid from ages and from generations."

Rejoice all ye Saints of the Lord and listen to the instructions of his prophet—be careful to depart from evil—let your hearts be pure for the great day of the Lord approaches.

He will perform a speedy work upon the earth—he will cut it short in righteousness—he will not suffer his word to perish.

Therefore, let the nations be wise—let the great ones of the earth receive counsel; let the honest in heart prepare and gather even unto Zion:

For "the earth shall reel to and fro like a drunken man," yea, she shall groan because of iniquity which is already increasing heavily upon her.

But "Zion shall be redeem'd with judgment, and her converts with righteousness"—the nations of the earth will honor her—the glory of the Lord will encompass her round about; and his praises will be heard in her midst.

COMMUNICATIONS.

Manchester, April 17th 1841.

DEAR BRO. JOSEPH:—

Once more I take my pen to write a few lines to you; most gladly would I embrace the opportunity of a personal interview with you, did it offer; but vain is the indulgence of such thoughts

between the two, liable continually to be operated upon by the power of the enemy; and it is through that power that the children of men are made to doubt the evidences of their own senses, when, at the same time, if they would reflect for a moment and listen to the intelligence which God has placed within them, they would know, when they saw what is termed a miracle, the power by which it is wrought: they would know when they have seen with their eyes and felt with their hands, or when they have had a heavenly vision.

Some of the witnesses of the Book of Mormon, who handled the plates and conversed with the angels of God, were afterwards left to doubt and to disbelieve that they had ever seen an angel. One of the Quorum of the Twelve—a young man full of faith and good works, prayed, and the vision of his mind was opened, and the angel of God came and laid the plates before him, and he saw and handled them, and saw the angel, and conversed with him as he would with one of his friends; but after all this, he was left to doubt, and plunged into apostacy, and has continued to contend against this work. There are hundreds in a similar condition.

In comparison, there is but a hair's breadth between the depths of infidelity and the heights of the faith of the Saints; and the organization of man is perfectly independent in its sphere. Life and death, truth and falsehood, light and darkness, good and evil, the power of the Devil and the influence of God, the things of God and the things of the Devil, all these inducements and powers are interspersed among the children of men; and they of necessity must undergo this ordeal to prove themselves; and in the absence of the Spirit of revelation, let their sound judgments arise and declare, "Though he slay me, I will not forsake him."

Some of the brethren come to me and say, "Brother Brigham, is it my duty to pray when I have not one particle of the spirit of prayer in me?" True, at times men are perplexed and full of care and trouble, their ploughs and other implements are out of order, their animals have strayed, and a thousand things perplex them; yet our judgment teaches us that it is our duty to pray, whether we are particularly in the spirit of praying or not. My doctrine is, it is duty to pray; and when the time for prayer comes, John should say, "This is the place and this is the time to pray: knees bend down upon that floor, and do so at once." But John says, "I do not want to pray; I do not feel like it." Knees, get down, I say; and down bend the knees, and he begins to think and reflect. Can you say anything? Can you not say, God have mercy on me a sinner? Yes, he can do this, if he can rise up and curse his neighbour for some ill deeds. Now, John, open your mouth and say, Lord, have mercy upon me. "But I do not feel the spirit of prayer." That does not excuse you, for you know what your duty is. You have a passion, a will, a temper to overcome. You are subject to temptation as other men; and when you are tempted, let the judgment which God has placed within you and the intelligence he has given you by the light of the Spirit be the master in this case.

If I could not master my mouth; I would my knees, and make them bend until my mouth would speak. "But the cattle are in the corn." Let them eat; you can attend to them when you have finished praying. Let the will of the man be brought into subjection to the law of Christ—to all the ordinances of the house of God. What, in his darkness and depression? Yes; for that is the time to prove whether one is a

Because denied, by Oliver?

This poem is speaking of Oliver Cowdery who had apostatized from the Mormon Church.

Character of Witnesses

The Mormon Apostle John A. Widtsoe made this statement concerning the Book of Mormon witnesses:

The Book of Mormon plates were seen and handled, at different times, by eleven competent men, of independent minds and spotless reputations, who published a formal statement of their experience.

Oliver Cowdery, whose reputation for honesty has never been questioned, was with Joseph Smith when John the Baptist came to restore the authority of the Aaronic Priesthood. . . .

All these witnesses, of unchallenged honesty in the affairs of life, remained true to their testimonies throughout their lives without deviation or variation. (Joseph Smith—Seeker After Truth, by John A. Widtsoe, Salt Lake City, 1951, pp. 338-339)

Non-Mormons, on the other hand, have made many charges against the witnesses (see our Case, vol. 2, pp. 2-4). Some of the most damaging statements against the Book of Mormon witnesses, however, came from the pen of Joseph Smith and other Mormon leaders. In fact, Joseph Smith gave a revelation in July of 1828 in which Martin Harris (one of the three witnesses to the Book of Mormon) was called a wicked man:

And when thou deliveredst up that which God had given thee sight and power to translate, thou deliveredst up that which was sacred into the hands of a wicked man.

Who has set at naught the counsels of God, and has broken the most sacred promises which were made before God, and has depended upon his own judgment and boasted in his own wisdom. (Doctrine and Covenants 3:12-13)

In another revelation given sometime later, Harris is again called a “wicked man”:

Behold, they have sought to destroy you; yea, even the man in whom you have trusted has sought to destroy you.

And for this cause I said that he is a wicked man, for he has sought to take away the things wherewith you have been entrusted; and he has also sought to destroy your gift. (Doctrine and Covenants 10:6-7)

There is little doubt that the Book of Mormon witnesses were very credulous. The Mormon Apostle John A. Widtsoe made this statement concerning Hiram Page, one of the eight witnesses:

Hiram Page (1800-1852), appears to have been somewhat fanatical. He found a stone through which he claimed to receive revelations, often contrary to those received by Joseph Smith. For this he was reprimanded. (Joseph Smith—Seeker After Truth, p. 58)

George Q. Cannon, who was a member of the First Presidency, made this statement:

In the early days there was a man that was a witness to the Book of Mormon, who had been selected by the Lord to handle the plates, to heft them, and then to write his testimony concerning that which he had seen and felt. He obtained possession of a seer stone—or as it is called sometimes, a peep-stone. Through this peep-stone he professed to obtain revelations, which he wrote. (Journal of Discourses, vol. 24, p. 364)

Joseph Smith himself admitted that Hiram Page gave false revelations through his stone and that the other witnesses were influenced by his revelations:

To our great grief, however, we soon found that Satan had been lying in wait to deceive, and seeking whom he might devour. Brother Hiram Page had in his possession a certain stone, by which he had obtained certain “revelations” concerning the upbuilding of Zion, the order of the Church, etc., all of which were entirely at variance with the order of God’s house, . . . the Whitmer family and Oliver Cowdery, were believing much in the things set forth by this stone, we thought best to inquire of the Lord concerning so important a matter; . . . (History of the Church, by Joseph Smith, vol. 1, pp. 109-110)

The revelation that Joseph Smith received concerning this matter is found in Section 28 of the Doctrine and Covenants. In verse 11 we read:

And again, thou shalt take thy brother, Hiram Page, between him and thee alone, and tell him that those things which he hath written from that stone are not of me, and that Satan deceiveth him;

For additional information concerning Hiram Page’s stone see our Case Against Mormonism, vol. 2, pages 5-6.

Martin Harris, one of the three witnesses, constantly found himself in trouble with the church. On one occasion Joseph Smith wrote:

The council proceeded to investigate certain charges presented by Elder Rigdon against Martin Harris; one was, that he told A. C. Russell, Esq., that Joseph drank too much liquor when he was translating the Book of Mormon; and that he wrestled with many men and threw them; and that he (Harris) exalted himself above Joseph, in that he said, “Brother Joseph knew not the contents of the Book of Mormon, until it was translated, but that he himself knew all about it before it was translated.”

Brother Harris did not tell Esq. Russell that Brother Joseph drank too much liquor while translating the Book of Mormon, but this thing occurred previous to the translating of the Book; he confessed that his mind was darkened, and that he had said many things inadvertently, calculated to wound the feelings of his brethren, and promised to do better. (History of the Church, vol. 2, p. 26)

Under the date of June 16, 1834, this statement is recorded in the History of the Church:

Martin Harris having boasted to the brethren that he could handle snakes with perfect safety, while fooling with a black snake with his bare feet, he received a bite on his left foot. The fact was communicated to me, and I took occasion to reprove him, and exhort the brethren never to trifle with the promises of God. (History of the Church, vol. 2, p. 95)

Oliver Cowdery, one of the three witnesses, also found himself in trouble with the church on many occasions. Joseph Smith made this statement concerning an incident which occurred in 1830:

. . . I received a letter from Oliver Cowdery, . . . He wrote to inform me that he had discovered an error in one of the commandments . . .

The above quotation, he said, was erroneous, and added: “I command you in the name of God to erase those words, that no priestcraft be amongst us!”

I immediately wrote to him in reply, in which I asked him by what authority he took upon him to command me to alter or erase, to add to or diminish from, a revelation or commandment from Almighty God.

A few days afterwards I visited him and Mr. Whitmer’s family, when I found the family in general of his opinion concerning the words above quoted, and it was not without both labor and perseverance that I could prevail with any of them to reason calmly on the subject. (History of the Church, vol. 1, pp. 104- 105)

Apostasy

The Mormon Apostle George A. Smith related the following:

After the organization of the Twelve Apostles, and the so far finishing of the Kirtland Temple as to hold a solemn assembly and confer the Kirtland endowment therein, the spirit of apostacy became more general, and the shock that was given to the Church became more severe than on any previous occasion. . . . One of the First Presidency, several of the Twelve Apostles, High Council, Presidents of Seventies, the witnesses of the Book of Mormon, Presidents of Far West, and a number of others standing high in the Church were all carried away in this apostacy; and they thought there was enough of them to establish a pure religion that would become universal.

This attempted organization was under the direction of Warren Parrish, . . . (Journal of Discourses, vol. 7, pp. 114-115)

The three witnesses were finally excommunicated from the Church. Martin Harris accused Joseph Smith of “lying and licentiousness.” The Mormon leaders in turn published an attack on the character of Martin Harris. The following appeared in the Elders’ Journal—a Mormon publication which was edited by Joseph Smith:

One thing we have learned, that there are negroes who were [sic] white skins, as well as those who wear black ones.

Granny [Warren] Parrish had a few others who acted as lackies, such as Martin Harris, Joseph Coe, Cyrus P Smalling, etc. but they are so far beneath contempt that a notice of them would be too great a sacrifice for a gentleman to make.

Having said so much, we leave this hopefull company, in the new bond of union which they have formed with the priests. While they were held under restraints by the church, and had to behave with a degree of propriety, at least, the priests manifested the greatest opposition to them. But no sooner were they excluded from the fellowship of the church and gave loose, to all kinds of abominations, swearing, lying, cheating, swindling, drinking, with every species of debauchery, . . . (Elders’ Journal, August, 1838, p. 59)

In 1838 Oliver Cowdery had serious trouble with Joseph Smith. Cowdery accused Smith of adultery, lying and teaching false doctrines.

Finally, in Far West the division became so great that the Mormons drove out the dissenters. John Whitmer, one of the eight witnesses, related the following:

Joseph Smith, Jr., S. Rigdon, and Hyrum Smith moved their families to this place, Far West in the spring of 1838. As soon as they came here, they began to enforce their new organized plan, which caused dissensions and difficulties, threatenings and even murders. Smith called a council of the leaders together, in which council he stated that any person who said a word against the heads of the Church, should be driven over these prairies as a chased deer by a pack of hounds, having illusion to the Gideonites, as they were termed, to justify themselves in their wicked designs. Thus on the 19th of June, 1838, they preached a sermon called the Salt Sermon, in which these Gideonites understood that they should drive the dissenters, as they termed those who believed not in their secret bands, in fornication, adultery or midnight machinations. . . . They had threatened us, to kill us, if we did not make restitution to them, by upholding them in their wicked purposes and designs. . . .

But to our great astonishment, when we were on our way home from Liberty, Clay County, we met the families of Oliver Cowdery and L. E. Johnson, whom they had driven from their homes, and robbed them of all their goods, save clothing, bedding, etc.

While we were gone Jo. and Rigdon and their band of Gadiatons kept up a guard, and watched our houses, and abused our families, and threatened them, if they were not gone by morning, they would be drove out, and threatened our lives, if they ever saw us in Far West. (John Whitmer’s History, p. 22)

David Whitmer, one of the three witnesses to the Book of Mormon, made this statement:

If you believe my testimony to the Book of Mormon; if you believe that God spake to us three witnesses by his own voice, then I tell you that in June, 1838, God spake to me again by his own voice from the heavens, and told me to “separate myself from among the Latter Day Saints, for as they sought to do unto me, so should it be done unto them.” In the spring of 1838, the heads of the church and many of the members had gone deep into error and blindness. . . . About the same time that I came out, the Spirit of God moved upon quite a number of the brethren who came out, with their families, all of the eight witnesses who were then living (except the three Smiths) came out; Peter and Christian Whitmer were dead. Oliver Cowdery came out also. Martin Harris was then in Ohio. The church went deeper and deeper into wickedness. (An Address to All Believers in Christ, by David Whitmer, 1887, pp. 27-28)

In a letter dated December 16, 1838, Joseph Smith made this statement concerning some of the witnesses to the Book of Mormon:

Such characters as McLellin, John Whitmer, David Whitmer, Oliver Cowdery, and Martin Harris are too mean to mention; and we had liked to have forgotten them. (History of the Church, vol. 3, p. 232)

Joseph Smith became very upset with David Whitmer, one of the three witnesses:

God suffered such kind of beings to afflict Job—but it never entered into their hearts that Job would get out of it all. This poor man who professes to be much of a prophet, has no other dumb ass to ride but David Whitmer, to forbid his madness when he goes up to curse Israel; and this ass not being of the same kind as Balaam’s, therefore, the angel notwithstanding appeared unto him, yet he could not penetrate his understanding sufficiently, but that he brays out cursings instead of blessings. Poor ass! Whoever lives to see it, will see him and his rider perish like those who perished in the gainsaying of Korah, or after the same condemnation. (History of the Church, vol. 3, p. 228)

Before driving the dissenters from Far West, the Mormons wrote them a very threatening letter in which they accused them of stealing, lying and counterfeiting:

“Far West, June, 1838.

“To Oliver Cowdery, David Whitmer, John Whitmer, William W. Phelps, and Lyman E. Johnson, greeting:

“Whereas the citizens of Caldwell county have borne with the abuse received from you at different times, and on different occasions, until it is no longer to be endured; . . . out of the county you shall go, and no power shall save you. . . . there is but one decree for you, which is depart, depart, or a more fatal calamity shall befall you.

“After Oliver Cowdery had been taken by a State warrant for stealing, and the stolen property found in the house of William W. Phelps; in which nefarious transaction John Whitmer had also participated. Oliver Cowdery stole the property, conveyed it to John Whitmer, . . . As we design this paper to be published to the world, we will give an epitome of your scandalous conduct and treachery for the last two years. We wish to remind you that Oliver Cowdery and David Whitmer were among the principal of those who were the means of gathering us to this place by their testimony which they gave concerning the plates of the Book of Mormon; that they were shown to them by an angel; which testimony we believe now, as much as before you had so scandalously disgraced it. . . . Oliver Cowdery, David Whitmer, and Lyman E. Johnson, united with a gang of counterfeiters, thieves, liars, and blacklegs of the deepest dye, to deceive, cheat, and defraud the saints out of their property, . . . During the full career of Oliver Cowdery and David Whitmer’s bogus money business, it got abroad into the world that they were engaged in it, and several gentlemen were preparing to commence a prosecution against Cowdery; he finding it out, took with him Lyman E. Johnson, and fled to Far West with their families; Cowdery stealing property, . . . he was saved from the penitentiary by the influence of two influential men of the place. . . . you kept up continual correspondence with your gang of marauders in Kirtland, encouraging them to go on with their iniquity; which they did to perfection, by swearing falsely to injure the characters and property of innocent men, stealing, cheating, lying, instituting vexatious lawsuits, selling bogus money, and also stones and sand for bogus; in which nefarious business Oliver Cowdery, David Whitmer, and Lyman E. Johnson were engaged. . . . We have evidence of a very strong character that you are at this very time engaged with a gang of counterfeiters, coiners, and blacklegs, . . . we will put you from the county of Caldwell: so help us God.” (Letter quoted in Senate Document 189, February 15, 1841, pp. 6-9)

The Mormon historian B. H. Roberts made this statement concerning this letter:

This unfortunately, was followed shortly afterwards by a communication drawn up by Elder Rigdon, it is said, and addressed to the leading dissenters, . . . commanding them to leave Caldwell county within three days under penalty of a “more fatal calamity” befalling them if they refused to depart. The document was signed by eighty-four men, more or less prominent in the church, but neither the Prophet’s nor Sidney Rigdon’s name is included among the signatures. (Comprehensive History of the Church, vol. 1, pp. 438-439)

According to Ebenezer Robinson, Joseph Smith’s own brother, Hyrum Smith, who was a member of the First Presidency also signed the letter.

The “Far West Record” contains some very important information concerning Oliver Cowdery and the bogus money business. The “Far West Record” is an unpublished “record book containing minutes of meetings in Kirtland and Far West, Missouri.” The original is in the L.D.S. Church Historian’s Office. For years the Mormon leaders have suppressed this record. (This is one of the documents that they would not copy for us.) Recently, however, Leland Gentry, a Mormon who was working on his thesis at the Brigham Young University, was permitted access to it. On page 117 of the “Far West Record,” Leland Gentry found testimony given by Joseph Smith and Fredrick G. Williams that tended to link Oliver Cowdery with the bogus money business. Leland Gentry states:

[Fredrick G.] Williams, . . . testified that Oliver had personally informed him of a man in the church by the name of Davis who would compound metal and make dies which could print money that could not be detected from the real thing. Oliver allegedly told Williams that there was no harm in accepting and passing around such money, provided it could not be determined to be unsound.

Joseph Smith’s testimony was similar. He claimed that a non-member of the Church by the name of Sapham had told him in Kirtland that a warrant had been issued against Oliver “for being engaged in making a purchase of bogus money and dies to make counterfeit money with.” According to the Prophet, he and Sidney Rigdon went to visit Oliver concerning the matter and told him that if he were guilty, he had better leave town; but if he was innocent, he should stand trial and thus be acquitted. “That night or next,” the Prophet said, Oliver “left the country.” (A History of the Latter-day Saints in Northern Missouri From 1836 to 1839, p. 146)

From this information it would appear that Joseph Smith was almost an accessory after the fact, since he warned Oliver Cowdery to flee from the law if he was guilty.

Joseph Smith’s testimony was given at the time Oliver Cowdery was being tried for his membership in the church. The 8th charge against Oliver Cowdery read as follows: “Eighth—For disgracing the Church by being connected in the bogus business, as common report says” (History of the Church, vol. 3, p. 16). According to Joseph Smith, the eighth charge against Cowdery was “sustained” (History of the Church, vol. 3, p. 17).

The ninth charge against Cowdery read as follows: “Ninth—For dishonestly retaining notes after they had been paid; and finally, for leaving and forsaking the cause of God, and returning to the beggarly elements of the world, and neglecting his high and holy calling, according to his profession” (History of the Church, vol. 3, p. 16). According to Leland Gentry, Joseph Smith testified against Oliver Cowdery on this charge:

Evidence to support the final charge, namely, that Oliver was guilty of retaining bank notes after they had been paid and had forsaken the cause of God to seek after “the beggarly elements of the world,” was also abundant. Joseph Smith, for example, testified that Cowdery had informed him that he had “come to the conclusion to get property, and that if he could not get it one way, he would get it another, God or no God, Devil or no Devil, property he must and would have.” Joseph Smith also claimed that Oliver told him that since he had been dishonestly dealt with by others, it was his intention in the future to deal dishonestly.

Sidney Rigdon gave similar testimony. (A History of the Latter-day Saints in Northern Missouri From 1836 to 1839, p. 147)

The ninth charge was also “sustained,” and since six of the nine charges were sustained, Cowdery was “considered no longer a member of the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints” (History of the Church, vol. 3, p. 17). David Whitmer was also excommunicated from the church.

After separating himself from the Mormons, Oliver Cowdery became a member of the “Methodist Protestant Church of Tiffin, Seneca County, Ohio.” G. J. Keen gave this affidavit in 1885:

State of Ohio,
County of Seneca.

Personally appeared before me, the undersigned, a Notary Public within and for said county, G. J. Keen, a resident of said county, to me well known, and being sworn according to law makes oath and says:

I was well acquainted with Oliver Cowdery . . . Some time after Mr. Cowdery’s arrival in Tiffin, we became acquainted with his (Cowdery’s) connection with Mormonism. . . .

Mr. Cowdery opened a law office in Tiffin, and soon effected a partnership with Joel W. Wilson.

In a few years Mr. Cowdery expressed a desire to associate himself with a Methodist Protestant Church of this city.

Rev. John Souder and myself were appointed a committee to wait on Mr. Cowdery and confer with him respecting his connection with Mormonism and the Book of Mormon.

We accordingly waited on Mr. Cowdery at his residence in Tiffin, and there learned his connection, from him, with that order, and his full and final renunciation thereof.

We then inquired of him if he had any objection to making a public recantation.

He replied that he had objections; that, in the first place, it could do no good; that he had known several to do so and they always regretted it. And, in the second place, it would have a tendency to draw public attention, invite criticism, and bring him into contempt.

“But,” said he, “nevertheless, if the church require it, I will submit to it, but I authorize and desire you and the church to publish and make known my recantation.”

We did not demand it, but submitted his name to the church, and he was unanimously admitted a member thereof.

At that time he arose and addressed the audience present, admitted his error and implored forgiveness, and said he was sorry and ashamed of his connection with Mormonism.

He continued his membership while he resided in Tiffin, and became Superintendent of the Sabbath School, and led an exemplary life while he resided with us.

I have lived in this city upwards of fifty-three years, was auditor of this county, was elected to that office in 1840.

I am now in my eighty-third year, and well remember the facts above related.

(Signed) G. J. Keen.

Sworn to before me and subscribed in my presence, this 14th day of April, A.D. 1885.

(Affidavit quoted in The True Origin of the Book of Mormon, by Charles A. Shook, Cincinnati, Ohio, 1914, pp. 58-59)

In our Case, vol. 2, page 16, we give photographic proof that Oliver Cowdery did join the Methodists. The Mormon writer Richard L. Anderson admits that Cowdery joined the Methodists, but he claims that he did not deny his testimony to the Book of Mormon:

The cessation of his activity in the Church meant a suspension of his role as a witness of the Book of Mormon. Not that his conviction ceased, but he discontinued public testimony as he worked out a successful legal and political career in non-Mormon society and avoided its prejudiced antagonism by creating as little conflict as possible. Since faith in Jesus Christ was the foundation of his religion, he logically affiliated himself with a Christian congregation for a time, the Methodist Protestant Church at Tiffin, Ohio. There is no more inconsistency in this than Paul, worshiping in the Jewish synagogue, or Joseph Smith, becoming a Mason in order to stem prejudice. A late recollection of Oliver's Methodist affiliation alleged that he was willing to renounce Mormonism, but what this meant to him is much too vague to imply a denial of his testimony . . . (Improvement Era, January 1969, p. 56)

The Mormon historian B. H. Roberts claimed that Oliver Cowdery never denied his testimony to the Book of Mormon, yet he admits that even some of the Mormons believed that he did:

It is evident that the reports about Oliver Cowdery denying his testimony obtained some credence even among the Saints at Nauvoo; for in the "Times and Seasons," published by the Church at Nauvoo, one J. H. Johnson in some verses written by him maintaining the fact that the truth stands fast though men may be untrue to it, says:

Or prove that Christ was not the Lord
Because that Peter cursed and swore,
Or Book of Mormon not His word
Because denied by Oliver.

(As quoted in Oliver Cowdery—The Man Outstanding, by Joseph Hyrum Greenhalgh, Phoenix, Ariz., 1965, p. 28)

There are a number of things that Oliver Cowdery was supposed to have written or said which seem to be spurious (see our Case, vol. 2, p. 17, and our pamphlet A Critical Look—A Study of the Overstreet "Confession" and the Cowdery "Defence"). Cowdery's "Defence" was accepted by both Mormon and anti-Mormon writers until a few years ago. A careful examination of the evidence, however, has led us to the conclusion that "the 'Defence' is probably a spurious work, written sometime after 1887—i.e., after David Whitmer's pamphlet appeared" (A Critical Look, p. 31).

Strang and McLellin

James Jesse Strang, like Joseph Smith, claimed that he found some plates which he translated with the Urim and Thummim. He had witnesses who claimed they saw the plates, and their testimony is recorded in almost the same way that the testimony of the eleven witnesses is recorded in the Book of Mormon.

In the Gospel Herald—a Strangite publication—for May 4th, 1848, James J. Strang published a revelation which was supposed to have been given to him in September, 1845:

Revelation Given September, 1845:

The Angel of the Lord came unto me James, on the first day of September, in the year eighteen hundred and forty-five, and the light shined about him above the brightness of the sun, and he shewed unto me the plates of the sealed record and he gave into my hands the Urim and Thummim. And out of the light came the voice of the Lord saying: My Servant James, in blessing I will bless thee, . . . Behold the record which was sealed from my servant Joseph. Unto thee it is reserved. . . . Yea as my servants serve me, so shalt thou translate unto them. . . . Go to the place which the Angel of the presence shall show thee and dig for the record of my people . . . Take with thee faithful witnesses, . . . And while I was yet in the Spirit the Angel of the Lord took me away to the hill in the East of Walworth against White River in Voree, and there he shewed unto me the record buried under an oak tree as large as the body of a large man, it was inclosed in an earthen casement and buried in the ground as deep as to a man's waist, and I beheld it as a man can see a light stone in clear water, for I saw it by Urim and Thummim, and I returned the Urim and Thummim to the Angel of the Lord and he departed out of sight. (The Gospel Herald, May 4, 1848, p. 27)

The Mormons felt that Strang was a very wicked man. Nevertheless, some of the Book of Mormon witnesses were so credulous that they were influenced by Strang. On January 20th, 1848, James J. Strang wrote the following:

. . . early in 1846 the tract reprint of the first number of the Voree Herald, containing the evidence of my calling and authority, strayed into upper Missouri. Immediately I received a letter from Hiram Page, one of the witnesses of the Book of Mormon, and a neighbor and friend to the Whitmers' who lived near him, and that they rejoiced with exceeding joy that God had raised up one to stand in place of Joseph, and was so much overjoyed that they could not rest till they had gone and communicated the glad news to their brother who lived at some distance. He goes on to say that all the witnesses of the Book of Mormon living in that region received the news with gladness, and finally that they held a council in which David and John Whitmer and this Hiram Page were the principle actors; and being at a loss what they ought to do about coming to Voree, sent up to me as a prophet of God to tell them what to do. This letter I answered shortly after receiving it, and last April (1847) I received another letter from the same Hiram Page, acknowledging the receipt of mine and of many papers from me, and giving me the acts of another council of himself at the Whitmers', in which, among other things, they invite me to come to their residence in Missouri and receive from them, David and John Whitmer, church records, and manuscript revelations, which they had kept in their possession from the time that they were active members of the church. These documents they speak of as great importance to the church, and offer them to me as the true shepherd who has a right to them, and were anxious that I should come and receive them in person, because they were of too much importance to be trusted in the mails. It is very true that these letters were not written by David Whitmer, but they were written by Hiram Page as the common epistle of himself and the Whitmers'. [I] have just as much reason to believe Hiram Page is an honorable and an honest man as that Whitmer is, and do not think he would write those things unless they are true; and if they are true how can I believe that Whitmer professes to be prophet instead [of] Joseph? No, I think him too honest for that. (Gospel Herald, January 20, 1848)

In a letter to David Whitmer, dated December 2nd, 1846, William E. McLellin stated:

I was visited by James J. Strang of Voree, Wisconsin. He laid siege to me in order to have me unite with him in his organization. . . . The brethren here generally received him as the Successor of Jos. Smith, according to his profession—He told me that all the witnesses to the book of Mormon yet alive were with him, except Oliver. I think he told me he had a letter from Hiram Page. He said he expected you all at Voree soon . . .

I received a letter from Oliver a few weeks since. They were all well. He thinks Strang is a wicked man. (The Ensign of Liberty, Kirtland, Ohio, April, 1847, pp. 17, 19)

Strang was probably telling the truth when he stated that the Book of Mormon witnesses—except Cowdery—believed his claims, for John Whitmer, one of the eight witnesses, wrote the following in his history of the church—later, however, it was crossed out:

God knowing all things prepared a man whom he visited by an angel of God and showed him where there were some ancient record hid, and also put in his heart to desire of Smith to grant him power to establish a stake to Zion in Wisconsin Territory, whose name is James J. Strang. Now first Smith was unfavorably disposed to grant him this request but being troubled in spirit and knowing from the things that were staring him in his face that his days must soon be closed therefore he enquired of the Lord and behold the Lord said (three words indecipherable) James J. Strang a Prophet Seer & Revelator to my church, for this stake. Shortly in a meeting they got a letter &c. Shortly after this appointment of Strang the mob gathered and took by Strategy Joseph & Hyrum Smith conveyed them to Carthage the Seat of Justice in & for the Co. of Hancock (“Caldwell” has been stricken out in favor of “Hancock”) as if to try them by the law of the land, but instead of trying them by the law of the land for their crimes they murdered them & thus the Lord’s anointed fell by the brutal hand of man, & they are gone the way of all the earth and Strang Reigns in the place of Smith the author and proprietor of the Book of Mormon. (John Whitmer’s History, p. 23)

Martin Harris, one of the three witnesses to the Book of Mormon, joined the Strangite movement and even went on a mission to England for them. President Joseph Fielding Smith admits that Martin Harris was “out of harmony with the Church” and that he went to England, but he does not tell that he was on a mission for the Strangites (Doctrines of Salvation, vol. 1, p. 226). Andrew Jenson (who was Assistant Church Historian), however, frankly admitted that Martin Harris went on a mission for the Strangites. Under the date of October 1, 1846, he wrote the following in the book Church Chronology: “—Martin Harris and others, followers of the apostate James J. Strang preached among the Saints in England, but could get no influence” (Church Chronology, Salt Lake City, 1899, p. 31).

The Mormon Church’s own publication Latter-Day Saints’ Millennial Star had a great deal to say about Martin Harris when he arrived in England. (It should be remembered that the Millennial Star was published in England at the very time Martin Harris went on his mission for the Strangites.) The following statements appeared in that publication:

One of the witnesses to the Book of Mormon, yielded to the spirit and temptation of the devil a number of years ago—turned against Joseph Smith and became his bitter enemy. He was filled with the rage and madness of a demon. One day he would be one thing, and another day another thing. He soon became partially deranged or shattered, as many believed, flying from one thing to another, as if reason and common sense were thrown off their balance. In one of his fits of monomania, he went and joined the “Shakers” or followers of Anne Lee. He tarried with them a year or two, or perhaps longer, having had some flare ups while among them; but since Strang has made his entry into the apostate ranks, and hoisted his standard for the rebellious to flock too, Martin leaves the “Shakers,” whom he knows to be right, and has known it for many years, as he said, and joins Strang in gathering out the tares of the field. We understand that he is appointed a mission to this country, but we do not feel to warn the Saints against him, for his own unbridled tongue will soon show out specimens of folly enough to give any person a true index to the character of the man; but if the Saints wish to know what the Lord hath said of him, they may turn to the 178th page of the Book of Doctrine and Covenants, and the person there called a “wicked man” is no other than Martin Harris, and he owned to it then, but probably might not now. It is not the first time the Lord chose a wicked man as a witness. Also on page 193, read the whole revelation given to him, and ask yourselves if the Lord ever talked in that way to a good man. . . . We also learn, from Elder Wheelock’s letter of Birmingham, that Martin Harris and his escort have paid them a visit. He introduced himself to their conference meeting and wished to speak, but on being politely informed by Elder Banks that the season of the year had come when Martins sought a more genial climate than England, he had better follow. On being rejected by the united voice of the conference, he went out into the street, and began to proclaim the corruption of the Twelve; but here the officers of government honoured him with their presence—two policemen came and very gently took hold of each arm and led Martin away to the Lock-up. We would insert brother Wheelock’s letter entire if he had room. Elder Wheelock will remember that evil men, like Harris, out of the evil treasure of their hearts bring forth evil things.

Just as our paper was going to press, we learned that Martin Harris, about whom we had written in another article, had landed in Liverpool, and being afraid or ashamed of his profession as a Strangite, and we presume both, for we are confident we should be, he tells some of our brethren on whom he called, that he was of the same profession with themselves—that he had just come from America and wished to get acquainted with the Saints. But there was a strangeness about him, and about one or two who came with him, that gave them plainly to see that the frankness and honest simplicity of true hearted brethren were not with them. A lying deceptive spirit attends them, and has from the beginning. They said they were of the same profession with our brethren, when they knew they lied. If they were of our profession, why not call at our office and get their papers endorsed? Because they know that they are of their father, the devil, who was a liar from the beginning, and abode not in the truth. The very countenance of Harris will show to every spiritual-minded person who sees him, that the wrath of God is upon him. (Latter-Day Saints’ Millennial Star, vol. 8, November 15, 1846, pp. 124-128)

Although the Book of Mormon witnesses were attracted to Strang for a short time, they soon became interested in a movement William E. McLellin was trying to start. Five of the Book of Mormon witnesses definitely supported McLellin’s movement and another gave some encouragement to it. According to William E. McLellin, Martin Harris, one of the three witnesses, was baptized into his group on February 13th, 1847:

On Saturday 13th, of February, Martin Harris, William E. McLellin, Leonard Rich and Aaron Smith, were immersed, confirmed, and reordained to the same authority which we had held in the Church before Latter Day Saintism was known. (The Ensign of Liberty, January, 1848, p. 56)

Martin Harris even joined with Leonard Rich and Calvin Beebe in a “Testimony of Three Witnesses” that Joseph Smith ordained David Whitmer as his “Successor in office”:

Testimony of Three Witnesses.

We cheerfully certify, . . . we attended a general conference, . . . in Clay county, Mo., on the 8th day of July, 1834, . . . Joseph Smith . . . arose and said that the time had come when he must appoint his Successor in office. Some have supposed that it would be Oliver Cowdery; but, said he, Oliver has lost that privilege in consequence of transgression. The Lord has made it known to me that David Whitmer is the man. David was then called forward, and Joseph and his counsellors laid hands upon him, and ordained him to his station, to succeed him. Joseph . . . said, now brethren, if any thing should befall me, the work of God will roll on with more power than it has hitherto done. Then, brethren, you will have a man who can lead you as well as I can. He will be Prophet, Seer, Revelator, and Translator before God.

Martin Harris,

Leonard Rich,

Calvin Beebe.

(The Ensign of Liberty, December, 1847, pp. 43-44)

The Mormons who went to Utah, of course, felt that

Brigham Young was to be the leader of the church.

On July 28, 1847, Oliver Cowdery wrote a letter to David Whitmer in which he gave some support to McLellin's ideas and told Whitmer that "our right gives us the head." In a letter dated September 8, 1847, David Whitmer wrote to Oliver Cowdery and told him that it was "the will of God that you be one of my counsellors in the presidency of the church":

Dear brother Oliver: . . . we have established, or commenced to establish the church of Christ again, by laying aside our dead works, and being re-ordained to our former offices of President and Counsellor, as formerly—and it is the will of God that you be one of my counsellors in the Presidency of the Church. Jacob and Hiram have been ordained High Priests, and W. E. McLellin President, to stand in relation to me as you stood to Joseph, &c. &c. Now you behold that the time has come, to clear away the old rubbish, and build again those principles which constitute the church of Christ. . . .

I am you[r] brother in the new Covenant,

David Whitmer.

(Letter by David Whitmer, printed in The Ensign of Liberty, May, 1848, p. 93)

The Mormons were very disturbed by the endorsement the witnesses gave to William E. McLellin's movement. Hosea Stout made this entry in his journal on December 3, 1848:

Oliver Cowdery, David Whitmore & W. E. McLelland were trying to raise up the kingdom again. also William Smith. But the "Sound of their grinding is low." They are all waiting for the Twelve & Presidency to fall. (On The Mormon Frontier, The Diary of Hosea Stout, edited by Juanita Brooks, vol. 2, p. 336)

In the Ensign of Liberty for August, 1849, William E. McLellin gave this information concerning a conference held in September, 1847:

When I published the third number . . . I did not deem it wisdom to publish the particulars of the conference held in Far West, on the 7th and 8th days of Sept., with some of the original "witnesses" of the book of Mormon. . . . It will be remembered that in Dec. 1848, I wrote a long letter to President David Whitmer. . . . When I parted with O. Cowdery the last of July, in Wisconsin, he immediately wrote to David and acquainted him with the fact that I was on my way to make him a visit. . . .

On the 6th, David and Jacob Whitmer, and Hiram Page, accompanied me to Far West, to visit their brother John Whitmer. On the 7th, in the morning, we bowed in family prayer—David being mouth. . . . We conversed freely, and particularly about the re-organization of the same church by us in Kirtland, in Feb. 1847. . . . Verily I the Lord say unto those who are now present . . . as you desire to know my will and how you shall go forward . . . it will be pleasing unto me that you should also take upon you mine ordinances of baptism and confirmation, and then re-ordination . . .

And now concerning the authority of my servant David, I would say unto you that no man being directed by my spirit will ever condemn what my spirit now teaches you. . . . amen.

Every part and principle of the above was scanned, and as I supposed well understood by all those present. (The Ensign of Liberty, pp. 99-101)

William E. McLellin goes on to relate how David Whitmer, one of the three witnesses to the Book of Mormon, gave revelations supporting his organization and condemning the Mormon Church:

We then agreed to call upon the Lord . . . David [Whitmer] took his seat near me, . . . after a few moments of solemn secret prayer, the following was delivered solely through and by David Whitmer, as the revelator, and written by me as scribe, viz:

Verily, verily thus saith the Lord unto my servants David, and John, and William, and Jacob, and Hiram, . . . Behold I have looked upon you from the beginning, and have seen that in your hearts dwelt truth, and righteousness. And now I reveal unto you my friends, through my beloved son, your Savior. And for the cause of my church it must needs have been that ye were cast out from among those who had polluted themselves and the holy authority of their priesthood, that I the Lord could preserve my holy priesthood on earth, even on this land on which I the Lord have said Zion should dwell.

Now marvel not that I have preserved you and kept you on this land. It was for my purpose, yea even for a wise purpose, . . . For verily, verily saith the Lord, even Jesus, your Redeemer, they have polluted my name, and have done continually wickedness in my sight, therefore shall they be led whithersoever I will and but few shall remain to receive their inheritances. Therefore I say unto you my son David, fear not, for I am your Lord and your God; and I have held you in my own hands. . . . Now I say unto you that my church may again arise, she must acknowledge before me that they all have turned away from me and built up themselves. Even in the pride of their own hearts have they done wickedness in my name, even all manner of abominations, even such that the people of the world never was guilty of.

Therefore I the Lord have dealt so marvelously with my servant William. Therefore I have poured out my spirit upon him from time to time, that the "man of sin" might be revealed through him. . . . build up my church even in the land of Kirtland, and set forth all things pertaining to my kingdom. Thou shalt write concerning the downfall of those who once composed my church, . . .

But here David [Whitmer] said a vision opened before him, and the spirit which was upon him bid him stop and talk to me concerning it. He said that in the bright light before him he saw a small chest or box of very curious and fine workmanship, which seemed to be locked, but he was told that it contained precious things, and that if I remained faithful to God, I should obtain the chest and its contents. . . . I saw the same or a similar promise from the Spirit . . . I was told that it contained "the treasures of wisdom, and knowledge from God."

At this point we counselled particularly relative to the authority by which the church was reorganized in Kirtland, and the reasons why the Lord required us to be rebaptized, confirmed, ordained. . . . morning came, . . . on the bank of a beautiful stream, we dedicated ourselves to God in the united solemn prayer of faith. I then led those four men into the water and ministered to them in the name of the Lord Jesus. But as we returned again to our council room, brother David and I turned aside, and called upon the Lord, and received direct instruction how we should further proceed. And we all partook of bread and wine in remembrance of the Lord Jesus. I then confirmed those who were now born into the church of Christ, anew.—And then (as directed) I ordained H. Page to the office of High Priest, in the holy priesthood which is after the order of the Son of God. And we two ordained Jacob Whitmer to the same office. Then we all laid hands on John Whitmer and re-ordained him to the priesthood, and to be counsellor to David in the first presidency of the church. And then with the most solemn feelings which I ever experienced, we stepped forward and all laid hands upon David and re-ordained him to all the gifts and callings to which he had been appointed through Joseph Smith, in the general assembly of the inhabitants of Zion, in July 1834. (The Ensign of Liberty, August, 1849, pp. 101-104)

McLellin's movement never really got off the ground. Later in his life, David Whitmer was somewhat reluctant to talk about his association with McLellin:

. . . Brother Joseph ordained me his successor—. . . many of the brethren came to me after Brother Joseph was killed, and importuned me to come out and lead the church. I refused to do so. Christ is the only leader and head of his church. (An Address to All Believers in Christ, by David Whitmer, Richmond, Mo., 1887, p. 55)

Unreliable Witnesses

Since a person who is investigating the Book of Mormon has only the testimony of eleven men to rely on, he should be certain that they were honorable men. If the Book of Mormon witnesses were honest, stable and not easily influenced by men, we would be impressed by their testimony. Unfortunately, however, we find that this is not the case. The evidence shows that they were gullible, credulous, and their word cannot always be relied upon.

Since the testimony of the three witnesses who claimed to see the angel is especially important, we want to summarize the information we have on their character.

Martin Harris

Martin Harris seems to have been very unstable in his religious life. G. W. Stodard, a resident of Palmyra, made this statement in an affidavit dated November 28, 1833:

I have been acquainted with Martin Harris, about thirty years. As a farmer, he was industrious and enterprising, so much so, that he had, . . . accumulated, in real estate, some eight or ten thousand dollars. Although he possessed wealth, his moral and religious character was such, as not to entitle him to respect among his neighbors. . . . He was first an orthodox Quaker, then a Universalist, next a Restorationer, then a Baptist, next a Presbyterian, and then a Mormon. By his willingness to become all things unto all men, he has attained a high standing among his Mormon brethren. (Mormonism Unveiled, by E. D. Howe, 1834, pp. 260-261)

Martin Harris' instability certainly did not cease when he joined the Mormon Church. The Mormons themselves admitted that Harris "became partially deranged or shattered, as many believed, flying from one thing to another, as if reason and common sense were thrown off their balance" (Millennial Star, vol. 8, p. 124). The Mormon writer Richard L. Anderson admits that Martin Harris "changed his religious position eight times" during the period when he was in Kirtland, Ohio:

He and other prominent dissenters in the Church were formally excommunicated in the last week of December 1837. . . . Martin Harris remained at Kirtland for the next 30 years . . .

Martin Harris also felt strong resentment against Church leaders, in large part stemming from the blow to his ego in never being given a major office. If such thinking is obviously immature, it was nevertheless real to the man who had sacrificed domestic peace, fortune, and reputation to bring about the printing of the Book of Mormon and the founding of the Church. Real or supposed rejection breeds hostility and, at its worst, retaliation. . . .

The foregoing tendencies explain the spiritual wanderlust that afflicted the solitary witness at Kirtland. In this period of his life he changed his religious position eight times, including a rebaptism by a Nauvoo missionary in 1842. Every affiliation of Martin Harris was with some Mormon group, except when he was affiliated with the Shaker belief, a position not basically contrary to his Book of Mormon testimony because the foundation of that movement was acceptance of personal revelation from heavenly beings. (Improvement Era, March 1969, p. 63)

If we add the "eight times" that Martin Harris changed his religious position in Kirtland to the five changes he made before, we find that he changed his mind thirteen times! Richard Anderson is forced to admit that Martin Harris' life shows evidence of "religious instability" (Ibid.) The Mormon writer E. Cecil McGavin stated that

Martin Harris was an unaggressive, vacillating, easily influenced person who was no more pugnacious than a rabbit. . . . His conviction of one day might vanish and be replaced by doubt and fear before the setting of the sun. He was changeable, fickle, and puerile in his judgment and conduct. (The Historical Background for the Doctrine and Covenants, p. 23, as quoted in an unpublished manuscript by LaMar Petersen)

After changing his mind about religion many times, Martin Harris returned to the Mormon Church. According to A. Metcalf, however, he was still not satisfied. Metcalf claims that Harris told him that he "never believed that the Brighamite branch of the Mormon church, nor the Josephite church, was right, because in his opinion, God had rejected them," and he took his endowments in Salt Lake City, only to find out "what was going on in there" (Ten Years Before The Mast, as quoted in A New Witness For Christ In America, vol. 2, pp. 348-349).

According to a revelation given by Joseph Smith, Martin Harris was "a wicked man." When he was on his mission for "the apostate James J. Strang," the Mormons in England said that he was "filled with the rage and madness of a demon." They also said that it was "not the first time the Lord chose a wicked man as a witness," and that "evil men, like Harris, out of the evil treasures of their hearts bring forth evil things." Speaking of Martin Harris and "one or two" who came with him, the Mormons stated that "a lying deceptive spirit attends them," and that "they are of their father, the devil." They also said: "The very countenance of Harris will show to every spiritual-minded person who sees him, that the wrath of God is upon him" (Millennial Star, vol. 8, pp. 124-128).

Dr. Storm Rosa made this statement concerning Martin Harris:

"As to Martin Harris, of late I have heard but little of him. My acquaintance with him induces me to believe him a monomaniac; he is a man of great loquacity and very unmeaning, ready at all times to dispute the ground of his doctrines with any one." (Letter quoted in Early Days of Mormonism, by J. H. Kennedy, New York, 1888, p. 172)

This seems like a serious charge, but the reader will remember that the Mormons themselves admitted that Harris had "fits of monomania."

Martin Harris' wife made some very serious charges against his character (see our Case, vol. 2, pages 2-4). These charges, however, are not actually much worse than those made by the Mormons. Mrs. Harris stated that Martin had "mad-fits." The Mormons said that when he left the church he "was filled with the rage and madness of a demon." She stated that Martin was a liar. The Mormons admitted that when he came to England "a lying deceptive spirit" attended him. She stated that Mormonism had made him "more cross, turbulent and abusive to me." Joseph Smith himself later classified Martin Harris as one of those who were "too mean to mention."

Oliver Cowdery

Oliver Cowdery was apparently rather credulous. According to Joseph Smith, Cowdery was led astray by Hiram Page's "peep-stone." He was excommunicated from the Mormon Church and united with the "Methodist Protestant Church" at Tiffin, Ohio. In 1841 the Mormons published a poem which stated that the Book of Mormon was "denied" by Oliver. He accused Joseph Smith of adultery. The Mormons, on the other hand, claimed that Oliver "committed adultery." Joseph Smith listed Oliver Cowdery among those who were "too mean to mention." The Mormons claimed that he joined "a gang of counterfeiters, thieves, liars, and blacklegs." Joseph Smith testified that when a warrant was issued against Cowdery for "being engaged in making a purchase of bogus money and dies," he "left the country." Joseph Smith also testified that Cowdery intended to get property "and that if he could not get it one way, he would get it another, God or no God, Devil or no Devil, property he must and would have." According to Leland Gentry, Joseph Smith claimed that Oliver Cowdery told him that he intended to deal dishonestly in the future.

Oliver Cowdery seems to have returned to the Mormon Church before his death (see our pamphlet A Critical Look—A Study of the Overstreet "Confession" and the Cowdery "Defence"), but David Whitmer claimed that Cowdery died believing Joseph Smith was a fallen prophet and that his revelations in the Doctrine and Covenants must be rejected:

I did not say that Oliver Cowdery and John Whitmer had not endorsed the Doctrine and Covenants in 1836. They did endorse it in 1836; I stated that they "came out of their errors (discarded the Doctrine and Covenants), repented of them, and died believing as I do to-day," and I have the proof to verify my statement. If any one chooses to doubt my word, let them come to my home in Richmond and be satisfied. In the winter of 1848, after Oliver Cowdery had been baptized at Council Bluffs, he came back to Richmond to live, . . . Now, in 1849 the Lord saw fit to manifest unto John Whitmer, Oliver Cowdery and myself nearly all the errors in doctrine into which we had been led by the heads of the old church. We were shown that the Book of Doctrine and Covenants contained many doctrines of error, and that it must be laid aside; . . . They were led out of their errors, and are upon record to this effect, rejecting the Book of Doctrine and Covenants. (An Address to Believers in The Book of Mormon, 1887, pp. 1 and 2)

David Whitmer

David Whitmer was also very credulous. He was influenced by Hiram Page's "peep-stone," and possibly by a woman with a "black stone," in Kirtland, Ohio. Joseph Smith identified David Whitmer with those who were "too mean to mention," and also called him a "dumb ass." The Mormons accused Whitmer of joining with a "gang of counterfeiters, thieves, liars, and blacklegs." David Whitmer evidently supported James J. Strang for awhile, then changed his mind and supported the McLellin group. Whitmer was to be the prophet and head of the McLellin church. He gave a revelation in which the Lord was supposed to have told him the Mormons "polluted my name, and have done continually wickedness in my sight." The revelation also stated that "in the pride of their own hearts have they done wickedness in my name, even all manner of abominations, even such that the people of the world never was guilty of." David Whitmer also claimed that "in the bright light before him he saw a small chest or box of very curious and fine workmanship."

David Whitmer never returned to the Mormon Church. Toward the end of his life he was a member of the "Church of Christ"—another small group which believed in the Book of Mormon. Just before his death, Whitmer published An Address to All Believers in Christ in which he stated:

If you believe my testimony to the Book of Mormon; if you believe that God spake to us three witnesses by his own voice, then I tell you that in June, 1838, God spake to me again by his own voice from the heavens, and told me to "separate myself from among the Latter Day Saints, for as they sought to do unto me, so should it be done unto them." In the spring of 1838, the heads of the church and many of the members had gone deep into error and blindness. (An Address to All Believers in Christ, by David Whitmer, 1887, p. 27)

We have quoted the Mormon Apostle John A. Widtsoe as saying that the Book of Mormon plates were seen and handled "by eleven competent men, of independent minds and spotless reputations." We feel, however, that we have demonstrated that these witnesses were easily influenced by men and therefore were not competent witnesses. Contrary to John A. Widtsoe's statement, these witnesses were not men of "spotless reputation," but rather men whose word could not always be relied upon. Some of them even gave false revelations in the name of the Lord. Mr. Widtsoe stated that Oliver Cowdery's "reputation for honesty has never been questioned." We have shown, however, that the Mormons themselves—including Joseph Smith—testified that Oliver was dishonest and even involved in the bogus money business. We feel, therefore, that the Book of Mormon witnesses have been "weighed in the balances" and found wanting.

Angels and Gold Plates

As we have shown, eleven men besides Joseph Smith stated that they had seen the plates—three of these eleven witnesses claimed that they were shown the plates by an angel of God. Brigham Young claimed that there was at least one other man who claimed he was shown the plates:

One of the Quorum of the Twelve—a young man full of faith and good works, prayed, and the vision of his mind was opened, and the angel of God came and laid the plates before him, and he saw and handled them, and saw the angel, and conversed with him as he would with one of his friends; but after all this, he was left to doubt, and plunged into apostacy, and has continued to contend against this work. (Journal of Discourses, vol. 7, p. 164)

Thomas Ford, who had been Governor of Illinois, related a story which throws doubt upon the existence of the plates. Fawn Brodie quotes this story and then makes this statement:

Yet it is difficult to reconcile this explanation with the fact that these witnesses, and later Emma and William Smith, emphasized the size, weight, and metallic texture of the plates. Perhaps Joseph built some kind of makeshift deception. (No Man Knows My History, p. 80)

It is very possible that Joseph Smith did have some type of metal plates. There have been several reports of metal plates being found which later turned out to be forgeries. One of the latest cases was reported in a newsletter published by the Brigham Young University Department of Archaeology on January 17, 1962:

GOLD PLATES FROM MEXICO. News of a set of small gold plates, purportedly found in an ancient grave in southern Mexico, and inscribed with characters resembling the Demotic Egyptian-like characters in the Anthon Transcript from the plates of the Book of Mormon(!), has come from several sources. Photographs of these plates and drawings of their inscriptions have also been received. . . . All five are inscribed on each side with five lines of mixed Anthon Transcript and Maya-like characters, with the exception of one of the larger plates, which bears only a few such characters, distributed around a complex of symbols which Dr. M. Wells Jakeman of the BYU archaeology department has identified as definitely Aztec—four purely Aztec day-name symbols, a tree pictograph, and a cross-shaped symbol.

Dr. Jakeman, as well as Dr. Ross T. Christensen also of the archaeology department, feel that these plates are not of ancient origin, because of the mixing, in the inscriptions, of symbols from at least two different writing systems widely separated in time. . . . even stronger indication that the plates are not of ancient origin or authentic, is the near certainty that the Aztec symbols were copied from one of the two surviving Aztec hieroglyphic manuscripts. . . .

From a preliminary investigation, then, it would appear that these gold plates from Mexico are forgeries, and that a serious fraud has been committed, since the plates are reported to have been sold for a large sum of money, on the testimony of the "discoverer" that they are of ancient origin. (University Archaeological Society Newsletter, B.Y.U., January 17, 1962, p. 4)

If Joseph Smith was not capable of making a set of gold plates, he probably had friends that were. The Mormon historian B. H. Roberts stated that Oliver Cowdery followed "blacksmithing" when he was a youth (Comprehensive History of the Church, vol. 1, pp. 119-120).

If Oliver Cowdery had spent time blacksmithing before he met Joseph Smith, it would have been possible for him to have made a set of metal plates. As we have shown, the Mormons themselves later accused him of joining a gang of counterfeiters.

Too Much Excitement

While the testimony of the eight witnesses could be explained simply by admitting that Joseph Smith had some type of plates, the testimony of the three witnesses is more difficult to explain. They claim that "an angel of God came down from heaven, and he brought and laid before our eyes, that we beheld and saw the plates, and the engravings thereon; . . ."

Besides the angel that appeared to the three witnesses to the Book of Mormon, there were many other occasions in the history of Mormonism when angels were supposed to have appeared, Joseph Smith declared that on March 27, 1836, the Kirtland Temple was filled with angels:

Brother George A. Smith arose and began to prophesy, when a noise was heard like the sound of a rushing mighty wind, which filled the Temple, and all the congregation simultaneously arose, being moved upon by an invisible power; many began to speak in tongues and prophesy; others saw glorious visions; and I beheld the Temple was filled with angels, which fact I declared to the congregation. The people of the neighborhood came running together (hearing an unusual sound within, and seeing a bright light like a pillar of fire resting upon the Temple), and were astonished at what was taking place. (History of the Church, vol. 2, p. 428)

Under the date of March 30, 1836, the following appears in Joseph Smith's History:

The Savior made his appearance to some, while angels ministered to others, . . . the occurrences of this day shall be handed down upon the pages of sacred history, to all generations; as the day of Pentecost, so shall this day be numbered and celebrated as a year of jubilee, and time of rejoicing to the Saints of the Most High God. (Ibid., p. 433)

Joseph Smith claimed that he and Oliver Cowdery saw Moses, Elias, Elijah and the Lord in the Kirtland Temple (see Doctrine and Covenants, Section 110). If a person reads only Joseph Smith's account of this "endowment" he is apt to be very impressed. William E. McLellin, however, gives an entirely different story. He claims that there was "no endowment." In March, 1848, he said: ". . . we boldly affirm that no endowment from God has as yet been given in Kirtland" (Ensign of Liberty, Kirtland, Ohio, March, 1848, p. 69). It should be remembered that McLellin was one of the twelve Apostles at the time the endowment was supposed to have been given. On pages 6-7 of the same publication William E. McLellin joined with five others in stating:

And, during the winter of thirty-five and six, hundreds upon hundreds of the Ministers of the Church collected . . . to receive their "endowment from on high." . . . Finally, the 6th of April, the time, the long looked for time arrived . . . most of them expecting to wait on the Lord there, until he visibly displayed himself, by shedding upon them, as it were, "cloven tongues of fire," so that they might go to all the world, and preach to them in their own languages, . . .

But we are sorry to have to record, that the light of the next morning's sun found disappointed hundreds wending their way from that noble edifice, to their homes and their firesides, to reflect upon, and brood over their sad disappointment. The least we can say relative to the anticipated endowment is, it was a failure!!

While speaking of the dedication at Kirtland the Mormon Apostle George A. Smith stated:

That evening there was a collection . . . amounting to four hundred and sixteen, gathered in the house; . . . David Whitmer bore testimony he saw three angels passing up the south aisle, and there came a shock on the house like the sound of a mighty rushing wind, . . . and hundreds of them were speaking in tongues, . . . or declaring visions, . . . (Journal of Discourses, vol. 11, p. 10)

It is interesting to note that David Whitmer, one of the three witnesses to the Book of Mormon, called the story of the endowment "a trumped up yarn." In fact, a reporter for the Des Moines Daily News stated that Whitmer absolutely denied the manifestations in the temple (in the article it reads "temple at Nauvoo," but it must refer to the Kirtland temple since Whitmer left the church before the Nauvoo temple was built):

Many of the declarations of the prophet, after he lost the spirit of revelation, which were called prophecies, signally failed to come to pass. The great heavenly "visitation," which was alleged to have taken place in the temple at Nauvoo, was a grand fizzle. The elders were assembled on the appointed day, which was promised would be a veritable day of Pentecost, but there was no visitation. No Peter, James and John; no Moses and Elias, put in an appearance. "I was in my seat on that occasion," says Mr. Whitmer, "and I know that the story sensationally circulated, and which is now on the records of the Utah Mormons as an actual happening, was nothing but a trumped up yarn. I saw a great many of these things which I know were not right, but I clung on in patience, trusting everything would eventually be but [sic] right." (The Des Moines Daily News, October 16, 1886)

David Whitmer's charge that the endowment was a "trumped up yarn" becomes very interesting when we compare the report of the proceeding of March 27, 1836, which was published at the time with that published about sixteen years later in Joseph Smith's History. In the Messenger and Advocate for March, 1836, we read:

President F. G. Williams bore record that a Holy Angel of God, came and set between him and J. Smith sen. while the house was being dedicated.

President Hyrum Smith, (one of the building committee) made some appropriate remarks. . . . (Messenger and Advocate, vol. 2, p. 281)

In Joseph Smith's History—first published in Utah about sixteen years later—a statement that David Whitmer saw angels has been added:

President Frederick G. Williams arose and testified that . . . an angel entered the window and took his seat between Father Smith and himself, and remained there during the prayer.

President David Whitmer also saw angels in the house.

President Hyrum Smith made some appropriate remarks . . . (History of the Church, vol. 2, p. 427)

Apparently some of the Mormons saw the angels and others did not. At the funeral of Myron Tanner, President David John made this statement about the angels in Kirtland:

Bishop Tanner told me that he saw angels ascending and descending during those days, and that he called his mother out to see them, but his mother could not see them, although he saw them plainly. (Biography of Myron Tanner, published by authority of the family, Salt Lake City, 1907, pp. 28-29)

Ebenezer Robinson made this statement concerning the angel that was supposed to have sat between F. G. Williams and Joseph Smith's father:

"President F. G. Williams bore record that a Holy Angel of God came and sat between him and J. Smith sen. while the house was being dedicated."

We did not see the angel, but the impression has evidently obtained with some, that we did see the angel, from the fact that different persons, strangers from abroad, have called upon us and expressed gratification at meeting with a person who had seen an angel, referring to the above circumstance. We told them they were mistaken, that we did not see the angel, but that President F. G. Williams testified as above stated. We believed his testimony, and have often spoke of it both publicly and privately. (The Return, vol. 1, no. 6, June 1889, typed copy)

When we look at the testimony of the three witnesses to the Book of Mormon or the report of happenings in the Kirtland temple we must remember that some of the early Mormons were very credulous and could be worked up into a state of excitement in which they actually believed that they saw visions. The Mormon Apostle George A. Smith made this statement concerning an incident in the Kirtland temple:

Sylvester Smith bore testimony of seeing the hosts of heaven and the horsemen. In his exertion and excitement it seemed as though he would jump through the ceiling. (Journal of Discourses, vol. 11, p. 10)

John Whitmer, who was Church Historian in Joseph Smith's time, related the following concerning some of the visions that members of the church had:

For a perpetual memory, to the shame and confusion of the Devil, permit me to say a few things respecting the proceedings of some of those who were disciples, and some remain among us, and will, and have come from under the error and enthusiasm which they had fallen.

Some had visions and could not tell what they saw. Some would fancy to themselves that they had the sword of Laban, and would wield it as expert as a light dragon; some would act like an Indian in the act of scalping; some would slide or scoot on the floor with the rapidity of a serpent, which they termed sailing in the boat to the Lamanites, preaching the gospel. And many other vain and foolish maneuvers that are unseemingly and unprofitable to mention. Thus the Devil blinded the eyes of some good and honest disciples. (John Whitmer's History, chapter 6)

The Mormon publication Times and Seasons admitted that “false spirits” had sometimes been in the church:

The church of Jesus Christ of Latter-Day Saints have also had their false spirits; . . .

Soon after the gospel was established in Kirtland, and during the absence of the authorities of the church, many false spirits were introduced, many strange visions were seen, and wild enthusiastic notions were entertained; men ran out of doors under the influence of this spirit, and some of them got upon the stumps of trees and shouted, and all kinds of extravagances were entered into by them; one man pursued a ball that he said he saw flying in the air, until he came to a precipice when he jumped into the top of a tree which saved his life, and many ridiculous things were entered into, calculated to bring disgrace upon the church of God; . . . At a subsequent period a Shaker spirit was on the point of being introduced, . . . We have also had brethren and sisters who have had the gift of tongues falsely; they would speak in a muttering, unnatural voice, and their bodies be distorted like the Irvingites before alluded to; whereas there is nothing unnatural in the spirit of God. . . .

There have also been ministering angels in the church which were of Satan appearing as an angel of light: — A sister in the State of New York had a vision who said it was told her that if she would go to a certain place in the woods an angel would appear to her,—she went at the appointed time and saw a glorious personage descending arrayed in white, with sandy coloured hair; . . . Many true things were spoken by this personage and many things that were false.—How it may be asked was this known to be a bad angel? by the color of his hair; that is one of the signs that he can be known by, and by his contradicting a former revelation. (Times and Seasons, edited by Joseph Smith, April 1, 1842, vol. 3, p. 747)

The Mormon Apostle George A. Smith related the following concerning a Mormon known as “Black Pete”:

They had a meeting at the farm, and among them was a negro known generally as Black Pete, who became a revelator. Others also manifested wonderful developments; they could see angels, and letters would come down from heaven, they said, and they would be put through wonderful unnatural distortions. Finally on one occasion, Black Pete got sight of one of those revelations carried by a black angel, he started after it, and ran off a steep wash bank twenty-five feet high, passed through a tree top into the Chagrin river beneath. He came out with a few scratches, and his ardor somewhat cooled. (Journal of Discourses, vol. 11, p. 4)

On at least one occasion even Joseph Smith had a hard time deciding whether a manifestation was from God or the Devil. Ezra Booth related the following:

As the 4th of June last, was appointed for the sessions of the conference, it was ascertained that that was the time specified, when the great and mighty work was to be commenced, . . . Smith, the day before the conference, professing to be filled with the spirit of Prophecy, declared, that “not three days should pass away, before some should see their Savior, face to face.” Soon after the session commenced, . . . He reminded those present of the Prophecy, which he said “was given by the spirit yesterday.” . . . by long speaking, himself and some others became much excited. He then laid his hands on the head of Elder White, who had participated largely in the warm feeling of his leader, and ordained him to the High Priesthood. . . . White arose, and presented a pale countenance, a fierce look, with his arms extended, and his hands cramped back, the whole system agitated, and a very unpleasant object to look upon. He exhibited himself as an instance of the great power of God, and called upon those around him, “If you want to see a sign, look at me.” He then stepped upon a bench, and declared, with a loud voice, he saw the Savior; and thereby, for the time being rescued Smith’s prophecy from merited contempt.—It, however, procured White the authority to ordain the rest. So said the spirit, and so said Smith. The spirit in Smith selected those to be ordained, and the spirit in White ordained them. But the spirit in White proved an erring dictator; so much so, that some of the candidates felt the weight of hands thrice, before the work was rightly done. Another Elder, who had been ordained to the same office as White, . . . moved upon the floor, his legs inclining to a bend; one shoulder elevated above the other, upon which the head seemed disposed to recline, his arms partly extended; his hands partly clenched; his mouth partly open, and contracted in the shape of an italic O; his eyes assumed a wild ferocious case, and his whole appearance presented a frightful object to the view of the beholder.—“Speak, brother Harvey” said Smith. But Harvey intimated by signs, that his power of articulation was in a state of suspense, and of the Devil, but Smith said, “the Lord binds in order to set at liberty.” After different opinions had been given, and there had been much confusion, Smith learnt by the spirit, that Harvey was under a diabolical influence, and that Satan had bound him; and he commanded the unclean spirit to come out of him. (Mormonism Unveiled, 1834, pp. 188-189)

The Mormon writer Max H. Parkin gives this information concerning the same incident:

During the latter part of February, 1831, the Prophet recorded a revelation instructing him to gather the missionaries . . . to Kirtland . . . Levi Hancock, a witness to the strange events said that while Joseph was ordaining Harvey Whitlock a high priest, “He turned as black as Lyman [Wight] was white. His fingers were set like claws. He went around the room and showed his hands and tried to speak, his eyes were in the shape of oval O’s.” Hyrum Smith was not willing to accept this behavior as being from God, and told his brother, the Prophet, so. Joseph retorted, “Do not speak against this.” “I will not believe, unless you inquire of God and he owns it,” demanded Hyrum. “Joseph bowed his head, and in a short time got up and commanded Satan to leave Harvey [sic],” concluded Levi Hancock, “laying his hands upon his head at the same time.” . . .

Leman Copley, a very large man of two hundred and fourteen pounds, from his sitting position in the window turned a complete summersault in the house and settled back across a bench where he lay helplessly. The Prophet instructed Lyman Wight to “chase” Satan out of Copley, after which the evil spirit immediately left him. Then another, Harvey Green, was bound and began screaming like a panther. These operations continued all day and into the night intermixed with the instructions from their Prophet. Levi Hancock reflected upon the scenes of the day by writing, “I was so scared I would not stir without his [Joseph’s] liberty for all the world. I knew the things I had seen were not made [up].” (Conflict at Kirtland, by Max H. Parkin, pp. 79-80)

David Whitmer, one of the three witnesses to the Book of Mormon, made this statement:

In Brother John’s history he speaks of the Spirit of God being poured out in abundance upon that occasion, some seeing visions, etc., but brethren, you will learn in the next world, if you do not know it already, that the devil can give visions, appearing as an Angel of Light. Brother John gives an account of a prophecy uttered by Lyman Wight just after Brother Joseph ordained him a High Priest, which prophecy will prove to be a false prophecy. Brother John’s history of the church says as follows: “He (Joseph) laid his hands upon Lyman Wight and ordained him to the high priesthood after the holy order of God. And the spirit fell upon Lyman, and he prophesied concerning the coming of Christ. He said that there were some in this congregation that should live until the Savior should descend from Heaven with a shout, with all the holy angels with him, etc.” The early future will determine as to whether this prophecy was true or false. (An Address to All Believers in Christ, p. 65)

On February 9, 1843, Joseph Smith gave a revelation which was supposed to give “three grand keys by which good or bad spirits may be distinguished.” It is now published as Section 129 of the Doctrine and Covenants and reads as follows:

1. There are two kinds of beings in heaven, namely: Angels, who are resurrected personages, having bodies of flesh and bones—
2. For instance, Jesus said: Handle me and see, for a spirit hath not flesh and bones, as ye see me have.
3. Secondly: The spirits of just men made perfect, they who are not resurrected, but inherit the same glory.
4. When a messenger comes saying he has a message from God, offer him your hand and request him to shake hands with you.
5. If he be an angel he will do so, and you will feel his hand.
6. If he be the spirit of a just man made perfect he will come in his glory; for that is the only way he can appear—
7. Ask him to shake hands with you, but he will not move, because it is contrary to the order of heaven for a just man to deceive; but he will still deliver his message.
8. If it be the Devil as an angel of light, when you ask him to shake hands he will offer you his hand, and you will not feel anything; you may therefore detect him.
9. These are three grand keys whereby you may know whether any administration is from God. (Doctrine and Covenants, Section 129)

It would seem, according to this revelation, that if the Devil ever found out that a person cannot feel his hand, he could greatly deceive Joseph Smith’s followers by refusing to shake hands so that they would think he was “a just man made perfect.”

Heber C. Kimball, who was a member of the First Presidency, claimed that he could scare the Devil away with a weapon of death:

Now, I will tell you, I have about a hundred shots on hand all the time—three or four fifteen-shooters, and three or four revolvers, right in the room where I sleep; and the Devil does not like to sleep there, for he is afraid they will go off half-cocked.

If you will lay a bowie knife or a loaded revolver under your pillow every night, you will not have many unpleasant dreams, nor be troubled with the nightmare; for there is nothing that the Devil is so much afraid of as a weapon of death. (Journal of Discourses, vol. 5, p. 164)

It seems that the early Mormons could see almost anything in vision. John Pulsipher recorded the following in his journal:

“One pleasant day in March, while I was at work in the woods, about one mile from the Temple, . . . there was a steamboat past over Kirtland in the air! It was a clear, sunshine day. When we first heard the distant noise, we all stopt [sic] work. We listened and wondered what it could be. As it drew nearer, we heard the puffing of a steamboat, intermingled with the sound of many wagons rattling over a rough stony road. We all listened with wonder—but could not see what it was. It seemed to pass right over our heads—we all heard the sound of a steamboat as plain as we ever did in our lives. It passed right along and soon went out of our hearing. When it got down to the city it was seen by a number of persons. It was a large fine and beautiful boat, painted in the finest style. It was filled with people. All seemed full of joy. Old Elder Beamon, who had died a few months before was seen standing in the bow of the Boat swinging his hat and singing a well known hymn, The boat went steady along over the city passed right over the Temple and went out of sight to the west! This wonderful sight, encouraged the Saints because they knew the Lord had not forgotten them.

“The people of Kirtland that saw the steamboat in the air said it arrived over the Temple, a part of it broke off and turned black and went north and was soon out of sight. While the boat, all in perfect shape went to the W[est] more beautiful and pure than before.” (“John Pulsipher Journal,” as quoted in Conflict at Kirtland, p. 331)

Levi Hancock related the following in his journal:

“When night came . . . we walked heavily, some said that they felt as if they would be ceased [sic] by Satan. Others that they felt as the Devil and his angels were hanging about them. . . . I said, ‘let us pray.’ So we all kneeled down and prayed around the circle, as soon as the last one got through about nine o’clock at night and the moon shown brightly. A sudden bray of a jackass was heard about twenty feet behind us we looked and could see nothing in the way. It started toward the pond braying all the time. . . . This braying continued across the pond and ascended the high hills on the other side until it grew less and less distant until it got out of hearing. ‘There,’ said Brother Baldwin, ‘this proves to me that this work is true, for when we prayed for assistance the Devil ran away.’ We all felt that it must have been Satan, . . . God knows that I lie not.” (“Levi Hancock Journal,” pp. 50-51, as quoted in Conflict at Kirtland, p. 81)

But, the reader may ask, were the Book of Mormon witnesses that credulous? Anti-Mormon writers claim that they were. E. D. Howe, for instance, made this statement concerning Martin Harris:

He was naturally of a very visionary turn of mind on the subject of religion, holding one sentiment but a short time. . . . He frequently declares that he has conversed with Jesus Christ, Angels and the Devil. Christ he says is the handsomest man he ever saw; and the Devil looks very much like a jack-ass, with very short, smooth hair, similar to that of a mouse. . . . He has frequent fits of prophesying, . . . he frequently prophesies of the coming of Christ, the destruction of the world, and the damnation of certain individuals. At one time he declared that Christ would be on earth within fifteen years, and all who did not believe the book of Mormon would be destroyed. . . . Martin is generally believed by intelligent people, to be laboring under a partial derangement; and that any respectable jury would receive his testimony, in any case, of ever so trifling a nature, we do not believe; yet the subjects of the delusion think him a competent witness to establish miracles of the most unreasonable kind. (Mormonism Unveiled, Painesville, Ohio, 1834, pp. 13-15)

J. J. Moss gave this testimony in the Braden and Kelly Debate, page 387:

Q. You may state Mr. Moss, what Martin Harris said to you about seeing the Devil?

A. He said he saw the Devil and he looked like a jackass, and he had hair like a mouse. . . .

Stephen H. Hart made this statement concerning Martin Harris:

Martin Harris, . . . worked off and on for fifteen or twenty years for me. His judgment about farming was good. . . . One night he went upstairs to bed without a light, but soon came down and said the devil had stirred his bed. My wife went upstairs with the light and found that the bed was all right; Martin said the devil had made it all right. There was a pile of bedding we supposed he had felt of instead of the bed. One night he fell downstairs; he said the devil came to his bed and he had a tussel with him and the devil threw him down-stairs. Every wrong he attributed to the devil. Martin claimed he would renew his age and be translated like Enoch. . . . Martin, when closely questioned about the plates from which the “Book of Mormon” purports to have been taken, would say he saw the plates by the eye of faith. (Statement of Stephen H. Hart, as cited in Naked Truths About Mormonism, Oakland, Calif., April 1888, p. 3)

Fawn Brodie feels that Joseph Smith was capable of convincing the Book of Mormon witnesses that they had seen a vision. Perhaps Mrs. Brodie is correct. Mary Rollins Lightner (a devout Mormon) wrote this interesting information in her journal:

A few evenings after . . . Mother and I went over to the Smith home. . . . After prayer and singing, Joseph began talking. Suddenly he stopped and seemed almost transfixed. He was looking ahead and his face outshone the candle which was on a shelf just behind him. . . . he looked at us very solemnly and said, “Brothers and Sisters, do you know who has been in our midst this night?” One of the Smith family said, “An angel of the Lord.” Joseph did not answer. Martin Harris was sitting at the Prophet’s feet on a box. He slid to his knees, clasped his arms around the Prophet’s knees and said, “I know, it was our Lord and Savior, Jesus Christ.” Joseph put his hand on Martin’s head and answered, “Martin, God revealed that to you. Brothers and Sisters, the Savior has been in your midst. I want you to remember it. He cast a veil over your eyes for you could not endure to look upon Him.” (“Mary Elizabeth Rollins Lightner Journal,” as quoted in Conflict at Kirtland, by Max Parkin, pp. 82-83)

Harris’ Shaker Book

As we have already shown, in the Millennial Star, vol. 8, pages 124-128, the Mormons admitted that Martin Harris joined the Shakers: “In one of his fits of monomania, he went and joined the ‘Shakers’ or followers of Anne Lee.” The Mormon writer Richard L. Anderson states that Martin Harris “affiliated with the Shaker belief,” but he feels that this was “not basically contrary to his Book of Mormon testimony because the foundation of that movement was acceptance of personal revelation from heavenly beings” (Improvement Era, March 1969, p. 63).

Now, while it is true that the Shakers believed in revelation, a Mormon could not accept these revelations without repudiating the teachings of Joseph Smith. The Shakers, for instance, felt that “Christ has made his second appearance on earth, in a chosen female known by the name of Ann Lee, and acknowledged by us as our Blessed Mother in the work of redemption” (Sacred Roll and Book, page 358). If Martin Harris accepted this teaching, he was certainly out of harmony with Joseph Smith’s revelations, for in one of the revelations we read that “the Son of Man cometh not in the form of a woman, . . .” (Doctrine and Covenants, 49:22). The Shakers, of course, did not believe the Book of Mormon, but they had a book entitled A Holy, Sacred and Divine Roll and Book; From the Lord God of Heaven, to the Inhabitants of Earth. More than sixty individuals gave testimony to the “Sacred Roll and Book.” Although not all of them mention angels appearing, some of them tell of many angels visiting them—one woman told of eight different visions. On page 304 of this book we find the testimony of eight witnesses. They claim that they saw an angel and the “Roll and Book”:

We, the undersigned, hereby testify, that we saw the holy Angel standing upon the house-top, as mentioned in the foregoing declaration, holding the Roll and Book.

Betsey Boothe.	Sarah Maria Lewis.
Louisa Chamberlain.	Sarah Ann Spencer.
Caty De Witt.	Lucinda McDoniels.
Laura Ann Jacobs.	Maria Hedrick.

(A Holy, Sacred and Divine Roll and Book; From the Lord God of Heaven, to the Inhabitants of Earth, 1843, p. 304)

Joseph Smith only had three witnesses who claimed to see an angel. The Shakers, however, had a large number of witnesses who claimed they saw angels and the Roll and Book. There are over a hundred pages of testimony from “Living Witnesses.” (For a great deal more information on the Sacred Roll and Book see our Case, vol. 2, pp. 50-58.)

The evidence seems to show that Martin Harris accepted the Sacred Roll and Book as a divine revelation. In our Case, vol. 2, page 50, we cited a very revealing statement by Clark Braden:

Harris declared repeatedly that he had as much evidence for a Shaker book he had as for the Book of Mormon. (The Braden and Kelly Debate, p. 173)

Since we published this statement, evidence has been brought to our attention from a Mormon source which shows that Harris claimed to have a greater testimony to the Shakers than to the Book of Mormon. In a thesis written at Brigham Young University, Wayne Cutler Gunnell stated that on December 31, 1844, “Phineas H. Young [Brigham Young’s brother] and other leaders of the Kirtland organization” wrote a letter to Brigham Young in which they stated:

There are in this place all kinds of teaching; Martin Harris is a firm believer in Shakerism, says his testimony is greater than it was of the Book of Mormon. (“Martin Harris—Witness and Benefactor to the Book of Mormon,” 1955, p. 52)

The fact that Martin Harris would even join with such a group shows that he was unstable and easily influenced by men. Therefore, we feel that his testimony that the Book of Mormon was of divine origin cannot be relied upon. How can we put our trust in a man who was constantly following after movements like the Shakers?

We have a great deal more information concerning the Book of Mormon witnesses, angels and gold plates in our Case, vol. 2, pp. 1-62.

Ancient or Modern?

Dr. Hugh Nibley, of the Brigham Young University, has made this statement concerning the Book of Mormon: “The Book of Mormon must be read as an ancient, not as a modern book. Its mission, as described by the book itself, depends in great measure for its efficacy on its genuine antiquity” (An Approach to the Book of Mormon, by Hugh Nibley, 1957, p. 1). On page 13 of the same book, Dr. Nibley states: “The Book of Mormon can and should be tested. It invites criticism, . . .” Many members of the Mormon Church feel that Dr. Nibley is the church’s greatest scholar and that his work in behalf of the Book of Mormon is “unanswerable.” Richard Anderson made this statement:

A student of the nineteenth century may indeed find parallels in this period and the Book of Mormon, but without a knowledge of the world of antiquity, he simply is not equipped to make a judgment whether the Book of Mormon resembles more Joseph Smith’s environment or the ancient culture it claims to represent. Professor Nibley is the only person now publishing on this question who is equipped to make valid observations. (Since Cumorah, Forward, p. xii)

Hugh Nibley has spent a great deal of time trying to prove that the Book of Mormon is an authentic “record of ancient religious history.” He has published many books and articles in which he has attempted to show that there are parallels between the Book of Mormon and “the ancient culture it claims to represent.” While Dr. Nibley has found a number of parallels, we feel that they are of little importance, especially when we consider the vast number of books and ancient records which he has had access to. If Dr. Nibley had spent half the time searching for parallels to the nineteenth century, we feel that he would have found an impressive list.

Fits Smith’s Environment

In 1831 Alexander Campbell made this statement concerning the Book of Mormon:

This prophet Smith, through his stone spectacles, wrote on the plates of Nephi, in his book of Mormon, every error and almost every truth discussed in New York for the last ten years. He decides all the great controversies;—infant baptism, ordination, the trinity, regeneration, repentance, justification, the fall of man, the atonement, transubstantiation, fasting, penance, church government, religious experience, the call to the ministry, the general resurrection, eternal punishment, who may baptize, and even the question of free masonry, republican government, and the rights of man. (Millennial Harbinger, February, 1831, p. 93)

The Mormon writers George Reynolds and Janne M. Sjodahl made these comments concerning Campbell's statement:

Alexander Campbell, who came in contact with the first missionaries of our Church, urged as an objection against the Book of Mormon that it deals with a number of modern theological controversies. And so it does. But that is not a valid ground for rejection. Truth is eternal. . . . Religious controversies must have been, to a large extent, the same anciently as they are today. (Commentary on the Book of Mormon, vol. 1, Salt Lake City, 1955, p. 419)

There is, of course, some truth in this statement, but we feel that there are too many things in the Book of Mormon that are similar to Joseph Smith's environment to be explained away in this manner.

Revivals

Although the Mormon Church now frowns on revivals, Joseph Smith attended revival meetings, and the Book of Mormon is filled with scenes similar to those which he would have witnessed at these meetings. Although Wesley P. Walters was unable to find any evidence of the revival which was supposed to have occurred in 1820 at Palmyra, he did find that revivals occurred in the years 1817, 1824 and 1829. Benjamin F. Johnson claimed that Joseph Smith not only attended revival meetings, but that he was "in the anxious circles honestly seeking religion and to learn, which was the right church; . . ." (Letter by Benjamin F. Johnson, dated 1903, as cited in "An Analysis of the Accounts Relating Joseph Smith's Early Visions," Master's Thesis, Brigham Young University, 1965, p. 29).

Western New York was known as the "Burned-Over District" because of the revivals which swept over it in the 19th century. The revivals sometimes produced a great deal of excitement, and many people claimed to have visions or revelations. Alexander Campbell wrote the following on March 1, 1824:

I read, . . . of a revival in the state of New York, in which the Spirit of God was represented as being abundantly poured out . . . This man was regenerated when asleep, by a vision of the night. That man heard a voice in the woods, saying, "Thy sins be forgiven thee." (The Christian Baptist, vol. 1, 1955 reprint, pp. 148-149)

In the Book of Mormon we read that Enos went out into the "forests" and "cried unto" God in "mighty prayer and supplication." Finally, he heard "a voice" which said: "Enos, thy sins are forgiven thee, . . ." (Book of Mormon, p. 125, verse 5).

Many times the participants in the revival would fall to the ground. Charles G. Finney, a famous revival preacher, relates the following: ". . . in the midst of my discourse I saw a powerful man, . . . fall from his seat. As he sunk down he groaned, and then cried or shrieked out, that he was sinking to hell" (Charles G. Finney, An Autobiography, p. 69). On page 136 of the same book, Finney stated: "I had not preached long, before, . . . I observed a man fall from his seat near the door; . . . I was satisfied that it was a case of falling under the power of God, as the Methodists would express it. . . ." On page 150, Finney tells of another woman who "groaned aloud, and fell prostrate on the floor. She was unable to rise; . . ." On pages 162-163, Charles Finney states: "At this moment a young man . . . fell upon some young men that stood near him; and they all of them partially swooned away, and fell together. . . . Convictions were so deep and universal, that we would sometimes go into a house, and find some in a kneeling posture, and some prostrate on the floor." On page 172, he tells of a woman who "sunk down upon the floor," and on page 196 we read of a man who sunk "helpless" to the floor. Charles Finney claimed that "the word of the Lord would cut the strongest men down, and render them entirely helpless. I could name many case of this kind" (Ibid., p. 229).

George A. Smith, a Mormon Apostle, made this comment concerning the revivals:

. . . just at the time that God was revealing unto his servant Joseph to raise up men . . . Satan was at work . . . There were in many parts of the country strange manifestations, great camp and other protracted meetings were assembled together to worship under the various orders denominated Methodists, Campbelites, Presbyterians, Baptists, Unitarians, etc., among whom were manifested the development of a spirit which deprived men of their strength; they would faint away, or, they would manifest a variety of contortions of countenance. (Journal of Discourses, vol. 11, p. 2)

The Book of Mormon contains a number of accounts of people falling to the ground. In Jacob 7:124 we read: ". . . the power of God came down upon them, and they were overcome that they fell to the earth." Mosiah 4:1 tells of a "multitude" that fell "to the earth." Alma 18:24 relates how another man "fell unto the earth," and Alma 19:6 says he was "under the power of God; . . ." This wording is very interesting, for Charles Finney told of people "falling under the power of God, as the Methodists would express it, . . ." (Charles G. Finney, p. 136).

I had not spoken to them in this strain of direct application, I should think, more than a quarter of an hour when all at once an awful solemnity seemed to settle down upon them; the congregation began to fall from their seats in every direction, and cried for mercy. If I had had a sword in each hand, I could not have cut them off their seats as fast as they fell. Indeed nearly the whole congregation were either on their knees or prostrate, . . .

In the Book of Mormon we read:

. . . when king Benjamin had made an end of speaking . . . he cast his eyes round about on the multitude, and behold they had fallen to the earth, for the fear of the Lord had come upon them. . . . they all cried aloud with one voice, saying: O have mercy, and apply the atoning blood of Christ that we may receive forgiveness of our sins, . . . (Mosiah 4:1-2)

In the revivals which occurred in Joseph Smith's time some of those who fell to the ground became as though they were dead. Benjamin Seth Youngs related the following:

In the year eighteen hundred and five, I was sent . . . to the people of the Revival in Kentucky, and the adjacent states. . . . I have seen the bodies of men and women, shaken as trees with a tempest; and others cast down prostrate to the earth, and lying sometimes for hours, cold and stiff, like corpses! (Sacred Roll and Book, pp. 378-379)

James B. Finley told of a man who tried to break up a revival by riding his horse into the crowd:

Suddenly, as if smitten by lightning, he fell from his horse. . . . I trembled, for I feared God had killed the bold and daring blasphemer. He exhibited no sign whatever of life; his limbs were rigid, his wrists pulseless, and his breath gone. Several of his comrades came to see him, but they fell like men slain in battle. . . . for thirty hours he lay, to all human appearance, dead. During this time the people kept up singing and praying. At last he exhibited signs of life, . . . and springing to his feet, his groans were converted into loud and joyous shouts of praise. (The Rise and Progress of an American State, as quoted in Conflict at Kirtland, pp. 13-14)

One witness to a revival wrote:

"A more tremendous sight never struck the eyes of mortal man. . . . hundreds of people lay prostrate on the ground crying for mercy. Oh! My dear brother, had you been there to have seen the convulsed limbs, the apparently lifeless bodies, . . ." (The Stammering Century, by Gilbert Seldes, p. 60)

Brigham Young, the second President of the Mormon Church, related the following:

I have seen persons lie on the benches, on the floor of the meeting houses, or on the ground at their camp meetings, for ten, twenty, and thirty minutes, and I do not know but an hour, and not a particle of pulse about them. (Journal of Discourses, vol. 14, p. 113)

The king who fell "unto the earth" in the Book of Mormon,

Alma 18:42, lay upon the earth “as if he were dead.” His servants carried him to his bed, and “for two days and two nights” they were unable to determine if he was dead or alive. Finally, he was found to be “under the power of God” (Alma 19:6). In Alma 19:18 we read that when a multitude came they found “the king, and the queen, and their servants prostrate upon the earth, and they all lay there as though they were dead; . . .” In Alma 22:18 we read of another king that “was struck as if he were dead.”

In the revivals which took place in Joseph Smith’s time the people who fell “under the power of God” usually awoke praising God. In The Stammering Century, page 59, we find the following statement:

Speech and motion return in the same gradual manner; the features become more full than before. Pleasure paints the countenance as peace comes to the soul, and when faith is obtained the person rises up, and with most heavenly countenance shouts—“Glory to God.”

Charles Finney related the following:

After lying in a speechless state about sixteen hours, Miss G—’s mouth was opened, and a new song was given her. She was taken from the horrible pit of miry clay, and her feet were set upon a rock; and it was true that many saw it and feared. (Charles G. Finney, p. 66)

In the Book of Mormon, Alma 19:29-30, we read the following concerning a woman who had been laying prostrate on the ground:

. . . she arose and stood upon her feet, and cried with a loud voice, saying: O blessed Jesus, who has saved me from an awful hell! O blessed God, have mercy on this people!

And when she had said this, she clasped her hands, being filled with joy, speaking many words which were not understood: . . .

Such scenes must have been very common in the revivals of the 19th century. Charles Finney relates the following:

. . . the young man . . . exclaimed as he came, “Squire W— is converted!” . . . “I went up into the woods to pray, . . . I saw Squire W— pacing to and fro, and singing as loud as he could sing; and every few moments he would stop and clap his hands with his full strength, and shout, ‘I will rejoice in the God of my salvation!’ Then he would march and sing again; and then stop, and shout, and clap his hands.” While the young man was telling us this, behold, Squire W— appeared in sight, . . . he cried out, “I’ve got it! I’ve got it!” clapped his hands with all his might, and fell upon his knees and began to give thanks to God. (Charles G. Finney, pp. 32-33)

The story of king Benjamin in the Book of Mormon certainly sounds like a “camp-meeting.” Mosiah 2:5 tells that the people “pitched their tents round about.” Then a “tower” was erected from which king Benjamin spoke. The king delivered a sermon which would have fit very well in a revival meeting of the 19th century. Finally, the people fell down upon the earth, for they “had viewed themselves in their own carnal state, even less than the dust of the earth” (Mosiah 4:2). They repented and “the Spirit of the Lord came upon them, and they were filled with joy, having received a remission of their sins, . . .” (Mosiah 4:3).

Notice how similar this is to a report of a “camp-meeting” reported by Captain Frederick Marryat:

“The camp was raised upon . . . a piece of table-land comprising many acres. . . . At one end, . . . was a raised stand, which served as a pulpit for the preachers, . . .

“Outside of the area, which may be designated as the church, were hundreds of tents pitched. . . . In front of the pulpit was a space railed off, and strewn with straw, which I was told was the anxious seat, and on which sat those who were touched by their conscience or the discourse of the preacher. . . . girl after girl dropped down upon the straw on one side, and men on the other. . . .

“Every minute the excitement increased; some wrung their hands and called for mercy; some tore their hair; boys lay down crying bitterly, . . . some fell on their backs with their eyes closed, waving their heads in a slow motion, and crying out—‘Glory, glory, glory!’” (Diary in America, as cited in Uncommon Americans, by Don C. Seitz, pp. 74-77)

M. T. Lamb made these comments concerning the Book of Mormon and revivals:

It is well known that in Western New York, sixty or seventy years ago, during the boyhood and youth of Joseph Smith, strangely exciting revival scenes were frequent, notably among the Methodists of that day, and in connection with camp meetings, and that in just such exciting revival scenes, Mr. Smith himself received his first and his strongest religious convictions. Many a time he had witnessed men and women fall down under the influence of the truth, and remain apparently unconscious for hours, sometimes for a day, and in rare instances for three days together—and they suddenly reviving, rise up and break forth into the most extravagant expressions of joy and praise to the Saviour who had redeemed them.

Hence when it became desirable to describe in the Book of Mormon a genuine revival or an individual conversion, nothing would be more natural than for him to draw upon his own observations and experience for the model. . . . the religious experiences of the Book of Mormon were borrowed from the modern camp meeting. The book abounds in modern camp-meeting expressions. (The Golden Bible, New York, 1887, pp. 222, 223 and 227)

Infant Baptism

In Joseph Smith’s day there was a great deal of controversy about the baptism of infants. Alexander Campbell published this statement on January 7, 1828: “The question of infant baptism is now generally discussed all over the land, and immense has been the result” (The Christian Baptist, vol. 5, p. 138). On December 3, 1827, this statement appeared in The Christian Baptist: “Now, a disciple who holds infant baptism is, in this respect weak, . . .” (Ibid., p. 109). On page 116 of the same volume, “infant sprinkling” is called “a corruption” in the church. On April 3, 1826, Campbell spoke of “the popish rite of baby baptism or sprinkling” (Ibid., vol. 3, p. 181).

According to his son, Sidney Rigdon—who later became a member of the First Presidency in the Mormon Church—resigned his position in a church because of the fact that he would not teach the doctrine of “infant damnation” (Dialogue: A Journal of Mormon Thought, Winter 1966, pp. 21-22).

John Taylor, who became the third President of the Mormon Church, made this comment concerning the controversy over infant baptism:

We used to quarrel with one another, when we were among the sectarians, about our peculiar doctrines. . . . There was also much wrangling as to whether infants that died went to hell or not. (Journal of Discourses, vol. 5, p. 240)

This controversy over baptism of infants is reflected in the Book of Mormon. About 400 years after the coming of Christ, Mormon was supposed to have written an epistle to his son. In this epistle he stated that those who believed in infant baptism were in danger of “death, hell, and an endless torment”:

For, if I have learned the truth, there have been disputations among you concerning the baptism of your little children. . . . I know that it is solemn mockery before God, that ye should baptize little children. . . . little children are alive in Christ, . . . if little children could not be saved without baptism, these must have gone to an endless hell.

Behold I say unto you, that he that supposeth that little children need baptism is in the gall of bitterness and in the bonds of iniquity, for he hath neither faith, hope, nor charity; wherefore, should he be cut off while in the thought, he must go down to hell.

For awful is the wickedness to suppose that God saveth one child because of baptism, and the other must perish because he hath no baptism. . . . he that saith that little children need baptism denieth the mercies of Christ, and setteth at naught the atonement of him and the power of his redemption.

Wo unto such, for they are in danger of death, hell, and an endless torment. I speak it boldly; God hath commanded me. . . . all little children are alive in Christ, and also all they that are without the law. (Moroni 8:5, 9, 12, 13, 14, 15, 20, 21, 22)

The teachings of the Book of Mormon concerning infant baptism are very similar to those of Alexander Campbell. On May 5, 1828, Campbell wrote:

If baptism be connected with the remission of sins, infants require it not; for they have no sins to be remitted—at least the Calvinists and Arminians teach this doctrine; for they say that “original sin” is all that is chargeable upon infants. . . . infants, on the Calvinistic and Arminian hypothesis, need not be baptized: and in this I am both a Calvinist and an Arminian. (The Christian Baptist, vol. 5, pp. 231-32)

In the Book of Mormon, Moroni 8:8 we read: “. . . little children are whole, for they are not capable of committing sin; wherefore the curse of Adam is taken from them . . .”

On April 5, 1824, Alexander Campbell wrote:

Can the rite of sprinkling an infant with consecrated water, O! Calvinist! alter the decree of heaven? . . . can the neglect of a parent to bring to you their infant offspring, seal the destruction of that infant? Who gave you the right of thus consigning to endless woe unsprinkled infants, and of opening heaven by a few drops of water to those impaled in your fold? (The Christian Baptist, vol. 1, p. 183)

On February 6, 1826, Campbell wrote that he believed that “all infants dying shall be saved.” (Ibid., vol. 3, p. 141)

M. T. Lamb made these interesting comments concerning the Book of Mormon and infant baptism:

In his old age he [Mormon] is alleged to have written some fatherly letters to his son, Moroni, . . . Among other things he bitterly and fiercely assails . . . those who claimed that infants should be baptized. A careful examination of the previous history of the Nephites and of the doctrines taught in the Book of Mormon will make so clear the modern complexion of the whole matter as to give it almost the appearance of burlesque, rather than a sober discussion. . . . It is true that the practice of baptizing infants prevailed from a very early period upon the Eastern continent. But here in this Western world during olden time, the Latter Day Saints [i.e., the Nephites] had things their own way from the very beginning. The instructions upon the mode and the subjects of baptism were plain and unmistakable from Nephi down to Mormon. It is impossible to suppose after a thousand years of the clearest possible revelations, that any professing Christian could, for one moment, have seriously entertained the notion that infants must be baptized.

The whole thing is modern. The arguments used against the practice are the arguments of to-day, and not such as would have been presented in any other age of the world. (The Golden Bible, pp. 231, 232 and 234)

Church of Christ

The following information is found in Joseph Smith’s History as it was published in the Times and Seasons, May 15, 1843:

. . . a gentleman of the name of Alexander Campbell, . . . resided in Bethany, Brook county, Virginia, where he published a monthly periodical, called the “Christian Baptist.” (Times and Seasons, vol. 4, p. 193)

After examining a reprint of The Christian Baptist, a seven volume work by Campbell, we feel that there may be some relationship between Alexander Campbell’s teachings and the Book of Mormon. Campbell began publishing The Christian Baptist in 1823 and continued this work until 1830—the same year the Book of Mormon was published. Campbell had another publication, The Millennial Harbinger, which he continued to print after The Christian Baptist had ceased publication.

By the year 1829, Campbell had become well known as a defender of the Christian religion. In fact, his debate with Robert Owen, “the infidel philosopher,” made the front page three times in the newspaper published in Joseph Smith’s own neighborhood (see The Wayne Sentinel, May 29, 1829; June 19, 1829, and June 26, 1829).

While Alexander Campbell rejected modern revelation and accepted only the Bible as a guide for his faith (The Christian Baptist, vol. 1, p. 54), he believed that the “greatest moral calamity that has befallen the Protestants is this, that they imagined the Reformation was finished when Luther and Calvin died” (Ibid., vol. 5, p. 89).

The Mormon Apostle LeGrand Richards claims that the Mormons and a few “apostate groups that have broken away from this Church” are the only ones who believe that the Church of Jesus Christ “fell into an apostate condition as predicted by the Apostles, and that the Church could not be reestablished upon the earth merely through a reformation but only through a restoration” (A Marvelous Work and a Wonder, p. 3).

It is interesting to note, however, that Alexander Campbell was using the term “restoration” years before the Book of Mormon was printed. On September 11, 1824, he wrote:

In a word we have had reformations enough . . .

A restoration of the ancient order of things is all that is necessary to the happiness and usefulness of christians. . . . Celebrated as the era of Reformation is, we doubt not but that the era of restoration will as far transcend it . . . as the New Testament transcends . . . the creed of Westminster and the canons of the Assembly’s Digest. (The Christian Baptist, vol. 2, p. 136)

On June 6, 1825, Campbell published an article entitled “A Restoration of the Ancient Order of Things.” In this article he stated: “The constitution and law of the primitive church shall be the constitution and law of the restored church” (Ibid., p. 221).

On November 6, 1826, Campbell wrote:

We contend that all christian sects are more or less apostatized from the institutions of the Saviour, and that by all the obligations of the christian religion they that fear and love the Lord are bound to return to the ancient order of things in spirit and in truth. (Ibid., vol. 4, p. 89)

The Mormon writer Ivan J. Barrett recognizes that there is some relationship between the work of Alexander Campbell and that of Joseph Smith:

It is interesting to note that some years before the Lord revealed himself to man in our latter day that people both in America and England were hoping, longing and even expecting light to burst from the heavens. “The state of expectancy in the religious world was such that many thousands were yearning for the primitive gospel; the words restoration, revelation, reformation, and the ancient order of things were in the air.” . . .

In the area where the Lord was to give his “preface unto the book of commandments, which I have given to publish unto you, O inhabitants of the earth,” had previously experienced a work of preparation nothing short of miraculous. . . . This work of preparation had been accomplished by a new religious movement known as the Disciples of Christ. “No Church in the world taught so many doctrines of the restoration as the ‘Campbellites’ had been teaching for a few years.”

Thomas Campbell and his son Alexander became weary of the strife which existed in modern-day Christianity. They fervently hoped to promote unity among the Christian sects by restoring the primitive Church of the New Testament. They . . . did not start out to organize a new church, but to restore the ancient order of things which they hoped all Christian sects could be united into. Since they practiced baptism by immersion, the Baptist Association invited them to join them. . . .

Campbell claimed the Christian world was in need of a restoration of the gospel. . . . they taught of an apostasy, that the Christian Church must be restored, that the practice of “laying on hands” must be restored. The most popular belief of the Campbellites was their first five principles, which were: faith, repentance, baptism, remission of sins, and the gift of the Holy Ghost. . . .

With such “unorthodox” teachings it is no wonder that friction should soon cause the separation of the Campbellites and Baptist, but not without having thousands of erstwhile Baptists willing to follow the “restoration” movement of the Campbells. Among the Baptist preachers to join the Campbellite movement was Sidney Rigdon. . . . the Campbells organized a new denomination called The Disciples of Christ. . . .

This new movement has never been given its full credit as a forerunner, preparing the way for the glorious restoration.

... The teachings of the “Disciples” had certainly opened the way for the divine truths that were soon to be taught in every village and town on the frontier. . . . In no other region but in northern Ohio could the Church of Christ gotten such a foothold. The doctrines revealed through Joseph Smith were so new, disturbing and revolutionary to those of orthodox Christianity that a wave of persecution would have engulfed the new Church before it made very marked inroads. But here on the Western Reserve thousands had been prepared for such a divine message. (Supplement to the Remarkable Story of How We Got the Revelations in the Doctrine and Covenants, by Ivan J. Barrett, pp. 1-5)

There were many others besides the Campbellites who believed in the idea of a restoration. The Mormon scholar Marvin S. Hill gives us this very interesting information:

That early Mormonism had a “primitive gospel” orientation has long been recognized. This fact was first discerned by Alexander Campbell, who saw the emergence of Mormonism as a gross, satanic imitation of his restorationist movement. . . . In truth, the primitivist movement was of national scope, spilling well beyond the limits of its institutionalization by the Disciples of Christ, including among its advocates those who formed other sects, and also many who became Mormons. . . . the movement which greatly influenced the character of Mormon thought got underway between the end of the American Revolution and the beginning of the Jacksonian period. . . .

The primitive gospel movement emerged independently in New England, the South, and the West among a variety of groups. Usually each group was led by a layman or a man with limited clerical training who was influenced by a strong, anticlerical bias and who sought to break down any distinction between clergy and laity in the church. These groups took flight from the existing old-line churches. They saw them as corrupt and apostate in nature and affirmed the necessity of a restoration of the primitive faith and order. . . . Lucy Mack Smith, the Prophet’s mother, details in her history how she affiliated in New England with several religious groups, including the Presbyterians and Methodists, but found this experience frustrating and concluded that no existing church would give her life and salvation. . . .

Lucy indicates that her husband shared this primitivist outlook, and in 1811, after becoming excited on the subject of religion, he vowed that he would join no church but contend for “the ancient order, as established by our Lord and Savior Jesus Christ and His Apostles.” . . .

With such a background it was quite natural for young Joseph Smith to acquire a primitivist attitude. (Brigham Young University Studies, Spring 1969, pp. 352-355)

The Mormon Apostle LeGrand Richards states: “Does it not seem incredible that of all the churches in the world, there was not one that bore his name when the Lord restored his Church in this dispensation?” (A Marvelous Work and a Wonder, p. 136).

Actually, sometime before the Book of Mormon was published, a controversy had developed concerning the Lord’s church. In The Gospel Luminary for July, 1827, we find this statement: “The name Christian should be taken to the exclusion of all sectarian names, as the most proper appellation to designate the body and its members” (The Gospel Luminary, vol. 3, no. 7, p. 163). This article was published in West-Bloomfield, N.Y., about 15 miles from Joseph Smith’s home.

Alexander Campbell was one of those who wanted the church to be called after the name of Christ. The following statements concerning the name of the church were published in The Christian Baptist on July 4, 1825:

Look into the New Testament. There the church is the Church of Christ, and his disciples are Christians. Look out of the New Testament, and look into the creeds and confessions. Here we see a Baptist church, a Methodist church, and a Presbyterian church, &c.

. . . The New Testament names, which all must approve of, are thrown aside to give place to sectarian names, . . .

When we give a name and a creed to a church, other than the name of Christ, or Christian, and the New Testament, or the Gospel, that church acquires immediately in our imaginations and feelings, and in fact, a character altogether different from what the Church of Christ really possesses in the light of the New Testament. (The Christian Baptist, vol. 2, p. 237)

The following appeared in The Christian Baptist on August 1, 1825:

Sectarianism, . . . robs the saint of the name of his Saviour; and of his authority too, by giving him the name of a sect. . . . Paul was greater than John the Baptist, (Matth. xi. 11.) yet he would not permit any of Christ’s disciples to call themselves by his name, or by the name of Apollos, or of Peter. . . . God makes it the duty of every christian to oppose every sectarian name and creed, . . . (Ibid., vol. 3, pp. 9-10)

Thus we see that a controversy concerning the name of the church was going on in the 1820’s. Joseph Smith, however, would have us believe that this same controversy was going on almost 2,000 years ago and that it was settled by Jesus himself. In the Book of Mormon we read:

And they said unto him: Lord, we will that thou wouldst tell us the name whereby we shall call this church, for there are disputations among the people concerning this matter.

And the Lord said unto them: . . . why is it that the people should murmur and dispute because of this thing? . . . ye shall call the church in my name; . . . how be it my church save it be called in my name? For if a church be called in Moses’ name then it be Moses’ church; or if it be called in the name of a man then it be the church of a man; but if it be called in my name then it is my church, if it so be that they are built upon my gospel. (Book of Mormon, 3 Nephi 27:3, 4, 7, 8)

In 3 Nephi 26:21 we read that those who “were baptized in the name of Jesus were called the Church of Christ,” and in 4 Nephi 1:1 we are told that “the disciples of Jesus had formed a Church of Christ in all the lands round about.”

When Joseph Smith first established the Mormon Church, it was known as “the Church of Christ” (Doctrine and Covenants 20:1). By 1834, however, the name of the church was changed to “The Church of the Latter-day Saints.” David Whitmer, one of the three witnesses to the Book of Mormon, stated:

In June, 1829, the Lord gave us the name by which we must call the church, being the same as he gave the Nephites. We obeyed His commandment, and called it The Church of Christ until 1834, when, through the influence of Sydney Rigdon, the name of the church was changed to “The Church of the Latter Day Saints,” dropping out the name of Christ entirely, that name which we were strictly commanded to call the church by, and which Christ by His own lips makes so plain. (Address to All Believers in Christ, p. 73)

The name of the church was changed on May 3, 1834. This is recorded in the History of the Church as follows:

After prayer, the conference proceeded to discuss the subject of names and appellations, when a motion was made by Sidney Rigdon, and seconded by Newel K. Whitney, that this Church be known hereafter by the name of “The Church of the Latter-day Saints.” Remarks were made by the members, after which the motion passed by unanimous vote. (History of the Church, by Joseph Smith, vol. 2, p. 63)

Sidney Rigdon, who had previously been associated with the Campbellites, became very bitter against them and may have decided to change the name of the church so that the Mormons would not appear to have any connection with them. Some of the Mormons, however, objected to the new name of the church because Christ’s name had been left out. Due to contention over the name of the church, in 1838 Joseph Smith gave a revelation in which Christ’s name was reinserted into the name of the church. Since that time the church has been called “The Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints.” (See Section 115 of the Doctrine and Covenants.)

Ministers and Money

Before the Book of Mormon was published there was a great deal of contention concerning the idea of a paid ministry. The following statement appeared in a publication called Plain Truth and was reprinted in the Palmyra Herald on October 30, 1822:

The clergy are guilty of begging money of the people under pretence of saving souls; which instead of applying to the wants of the needy, they spend in luxurious living! Their hands are too delicate to work, but they are not ashamed to beg a living for the cause of the Lord.

Alexander Campbell’s publication is filled with material against the idea of a paid ministry. On December 1, 1823, Campbell said:

Give money to make poor pious youths learned clergy, or vain pretenders to erudition; and they pray that they may preach to you; yes, and pay them too. Was there ever such a craft as priestcraft? No, it is the craftiest of all crafts! It is so crafty that it obtains by its craft the means to make craftsmen, and then it makes the deluded support them! (The Christian Baptist, vol. 1, p. 91)

On Feb. 2, 1824, Campbell wrote that “money is of vital consequence in the kingdom of the clergy. Without it a clergyman could not be made, nor a congregation supplied with a ‘faithful pastor.’ O Mammon, thou wonder-working god!” (Ibid., p. 124). This statement appeared in the same issue (p. 140):

“Will you,” said an honest inquirer, “allow the clergy no salary at all? Will you not allow the poorer class of the clergy a decent little competence?” I replied I have no allowances to make. Let them have what the Lord has allowed them. “How much is that?” said he. Just nothing at all, said I. A church constituted upon New Testament principles, having its own bishop or bishops, or, as sometimes called, elders, will not, and ought not, to suffer them to be in want of any thing necessary, provided they labor in word and doctrine, and provided also, they are ensamples to the flock in industry, disinterestedness, humility, hospitality, and charity to the poor. Such bishops will be esteemed very highly in love for their work’s sake; but especially those who, by their own hands, minister not only to their own wants, but also to the wants of their brethren.

On April 3, 1826, Campbell wrote:

That any man is to be paid at all for preaching, i.e. making sermons and pronouncing them; or that any man is to be hired for a stipulated sum to preach and pray, and expound scripture, by the day, month, or year, I believe to be a relic of popery. (Ibid., vol. 3, p. 185)

The Book of Mormon is very much against the idea of a paid ministry. In Mosiah 18:24 and 26 we read:

And he also commanded them that the priests whom he had ordained should labor with their own hands for their support. . . .

And the priests were not to depend upon the people for their support; but for their labor they were to receive the grace of God, that they might wax strong in the Spirit, having the knowledge of God, that they might teach with power and authority from God.

The Book of Mormon certainly seems to reflect the controversy over a paid ministry which was going on in Joseph Smith’s time.

On November 5, 1827, Alexander Campbell published a letter from a church in New York, and on February 5, 1828, he published one from a church in Manchester, England, to “the Church of Christ at New York.” Below is a comparison of extracts from these two letters with a verse from the Book of Mormon.

The Christian Baptist

Our Elder labors with his own hands, that he [he?] may live honestly, . . . (vol. 5, p. 163)

. . . our elders labor . . . for their support, and are not in burdensome to the church; but in case of need, . . . (vol. 5, p. 95)

Book of Mormon

Yea, and all their priests and teachers should labor with their own hands for their support, in all cases save it were in sickness, or in much want; . . . (Mosiah 27:5)

In the Wayne Sentinel (published in Joseph Smith’s neighborhood) for September 7, 1827, we find a copy of an “Epistle” from the “Yearly Meeting of Friends in London.” In this “Epistle” we find an attack on the paid ministry, stating that “the ministry of the Gospel is to be “without money and without price.” In the Book of Mormon, Alma 1:20, we read: “. . . they did impart the word of God, one with another, without money and without price.” The words “without money and without price” also appear in Isaiah 55:1. Nevertheless, it is interesting that both the “Epistle” published in the Wayne Sentinel and the Book of Mormon use these words to attack a paid ministry.

Westminster Confession

In the Constitution of the United Presbyterian Church in the United States of America, 1964-65, page 7, we read the following:

The Westminster Confession of Faith and Catechisms were adopted, in 1729, by the General Synod of the Presbyterian Church, as the “confession of their faith,” excepting certain clauses relating to the civil magistrate.

The Westminster Confession and Catechisms were a vital part of the Presbyterian faith in the nineteenth century. Alexander Campbell stated that the “Westminster Catechism, is the ‘text-book’ for the religious instruction of the offspring and households of Presbyterians” (The Christian Baptist, vol. 3, p. 42).

According to Joseph Smith, his “father’s family was proselyted to the Presbyterian faith” before the angel told him about the gold plates (see Pearl of Great Price Joseph Smith 2:7). Since the Westminster Confession and Catechisms were sold at the Wayne Bookstore in Palmyra (see Wayne Sentinel, January 26, 1825), it is likely that the Smith family possessed them. Although Joseph Smith was not converted to the Presbyterian Church, he may have been familiar with the Westminster Confession. In fact, he may have heard his brothers learning the Catechisms at various times.

Although the Book of Mormon theology is not Calvinistic, certain portions of it resemble the Westminster Confession and Catechisms. For instance, the Westminster Confession, Chapter 32, is probably the source for Alma, Chapter 40. Below is a comparison of the two.

1. Both claim to give information concerning the state of man after death.

. . . the state of the soul . . . between death and the resurrection . . . (Book of Mormon, Alma 40:11)

. . . the state of Men after death, and of the resurrection . . . (The Westminster Confession, Chapter 32, as printed in The Confession of Faith the Larger and Shorter Catechisms, Philadelphia, 1813)

2. Both state that the souls of men return to God after death.

. . . the spirits . . . are taken home to that God who gave them life. (Alma 40:11)

. . . their souls . . . return to God who gave them. (Westminster Confession, Chapter 32:1)

3. Both claim that the righteous are received into a state of peace.

. . . the spirits of those who are righteous are received into a state of happiness, . . . (Alma 40:12)

The souls of the righteous, are received into the highest heavens, . . . (Westminster Confession, Chapter 32:1)

4. Both state that the wicked are cast out into darkness.
 . . . the spirits of the wicked shall be cast out into outer darkness;
 . . . (Alma 40:13)
 . . . the souls of the wicked, are cast into hell, . . . and utter darkness, . . . (Westminster Confession 32:1)
5. Both state that the souls of the wicked remain in darkness until the judgment.
 . . . the souls of the wicked, yea, in darkness . . . remain in this state, until the time of their resurrection. (Alma 40:14)
 . . . the souls of the wicked remain in darkness, reserved to the judgment of the great day. (Westminster Confession 32:1)
6. Both state that the soul will be united again with the body at the time of the resurrection.
 . . . the souls and the bodies are re-united, . . . (Alma 40:20)
 . . . bodies . . . shall be united again to their souls. (Westminster Confession 32:2)

Masonic Influence

The reader will remember that Alexander Campbell charged that the “question of free masonry” is discussed in the Book of Mormon. Masonry was a very important issue in Joseph Smith’s time. Whitney R. Cross states:

William Morgan became a Mason in Rochester in 1823, but found himself excluded from the Batavia chapter. . . he wrote the Illustrations of Masonry . . . the unfortunate author suffered a series of mysterious persecutions. First the authorities held him briefly on a debt claim, so that his lodgings could be searched for the manuscript. On September 8, 1826, parties of strangers, . . . began appearing in town. Their attempt at arson on the print shop failed. . . he was kidnapped on the evening of September 12. . . He may after a time have been released across the Canadian border. More probably he was tied in a weighted cable, rowed to the center of the Niagara River . . . and dropped overboard. In any case, it cannot be proved that he was ever seen again. . . The event implicated Masons all the way from the Finger Lakes to the Niagara Frontier . . . Thus by 1827 village committees from Rochester westward had begun to organize politically against the accused society. . . The major issue seemed to be one of morality: Masonry was believed to have committed a crime. Its members had put their fraternal obligations ahead of their duty to state and society, sanctioning both a lawless violation of personal security and a corrupt plot to frustrate the normal constitutional guarantees of justice . . . Its titles and rituals smacked of monarchy as well as infidelity. The secrecy which required such reckless guarding suggested ignoble and dangerous designs. Whence, for instance, came the skulls, reputed to be used for drinking vessels in the ceremony of the Royal Arch degree? Curiosity, fancy, and rumor thus multiplied the apparent threats of Masonry to the peace, order, and spirituality of society.

Such reactions grew as expert propagandists played upon the fears and wonderment of the multitude. . . the Antimasonic excitement . . . may well have been the most comprehensive single force to strike the “infected district” during an entire generation. Charles Finney latter estimated that two thousand lodges and forty-five thousand members in the United States suspended fraternal activity. Most of the groups in western New York must have done so. (The Burned-Over District, by Whitney R. Cross, New York, 1965, pp. 114, 115, 117, 120)

Walter Franklin Prince made this statement concerning the relationship between the Book of Mormon and the excitement over Masonry:

Now in at least twenty-one chapters in seven out of the sixteen “books” of the Book of Mormon are to be found passages, varying from several to sixty-three lines in length, plainly referring to Masonry under the guise of pretended similar organizations in ancient America. (The American Journal of Psychology, vol. 28, 1917, p. 376)

After studying copies of the Wayne Sentinel and the Palmyra Freeman (these are newspapers that were printed in Joseph Smith’s neighborhood), we have become convinced that the controversy over Masonry is reflected in the Book of Mormon. To understand the relationship it is necessary to know how excited the people in New York became after Morgan’s disappearance. In the Wayne Sentinel for March 23, 1827, we find the following quoted from the Rochester Daily Advertiser:

The excitement respecting Morgan, instead of decreasing, spreads its influence and acquires new vigour daily. Scarcely a paper do we open without having our eye greeted by accounts of meetings, together with preambles and resolutions, some of them of a cast still more decided and proscriptive than any we have yet published. . . .

The Freemason, too—not only those who took off Morgan, but every one who bears the masonic name—are proscribed, as unworthy of “any office in town, county, state, or United States!” and the institution of masonry, . . . is held up as dangerous and detrimental to the interests of the country!

The controversy over Masonry soon became political. The Wayne Sentinel carried the following statement on November 16, 1827: “The election in this county (says the Ontario Messenger) has resulted in the choice of the entire anti-Masonic ticket.”

On November 9, 1827, Eliphalet Murdock claimed that some years before his father was found with his throat cut. He implied that the Masons had murdered him because they felt he had revealed their secrets:

. . . I believe the Lodge was thus induced to suppose that he had revealed those secrets, and dealt with him accordingly! Thus, I believe my father fell a victim to masonic vengeance, and that without a cause! (Wayne Sentinel, November 9, 1827)

The feeling against Masonry became so strong that many Masons left the fraternity to actively work against it. The following appeared in the Wayne Sentinel on July 18, 1828:

. . . the masonic society has been silently growing among us, whose principles and operations are calculated to subvert and destroy the great and important principles of the commonwealth. . . . It requires the concealment of crime and protects the guilty from punishment.

It encourages the commission of crime by affording the guilty facilities of escape.

It affords opportunities for the corrupt and designing to form plans against the government and the lives and characters of individuals. . . .

An institution, thus fraught with so many and great evils, is dangerous to our government and the safety of our citizens, and it is unfit to exist among a free people.

We, therefore, . . . solemnly absolve ourselves from all allegiance to the masonic institution. . . . and in support of these resolutions, . . . and the safety of individuals against the usurpations of all secret societies and open force, and against the “vengeance” of the masonic institution, . . .

Resolved, That however beneficial secret societies and combinations may have been considered in the dark ages . . . yet in this enlightened age and country, they become not only useless to their members, but dangerous to the government.

On September 26, 1828, the Wayne Sentinel carried an article in which the following appeared:

If you listen to the party which lately welcomed Don Miguel as their “tutelar angel,” . . . the Freemasons have been the cause of all the “seditions, privy cons[p]iracies, and rebellions,” which, for the last thirty years, have afflicted Europe. . . . The Free-masons are, therefore, radically and essentially, demagogues, jacobins, conspirators, assassins, infidels, traitors, and atheists. Their band of union is formed of the broken cement of existing order—their secret is the watch-word of sedition and rebellion—their object is anarchy and plunder— . . . unless they are suppressed, there will soon be neither religion, morals, literature, nor civilized society left! (Wayne Sentinel, September 26, 1828)

The Morgan Investigator, published in Batavia, New York, carried these statements:

“Beware of Secret Combinations.”

These are the dying words of General George Washington . . . there is something in the principles of masonry that tends to distract the mind and lead to the perpetration of crimes . . . (The Morgan Investigator, March 29, 1827, p. 1)

In another article published in the same paper we find the following statement: “I believe the institution of masonry dangerous to our liberties, and I think they have gone far enough in the march towards supreme power to receive a check.” The same paper called the Masons “an organized band of desperadoes” and spoke of the “dark and treasonable plot, formed against the lives of our citizens and the laws of our country.” The following appeared in a book printed in Utica, New York, in 1829:

4. Masonry is a murderous institution . . . the very principles, spirit, and essence, of this ancient fraternity, are murderous!

5. Those who join the institution, solemnly swear that, if they violate “any part” of their oaths, they will submit to be executed in the manner the oaths prescribe. . . . What a disgrace . . . a society should exist which claims the prerogative of sacrificing human beings, . . .

6. The masonic society is inconsistent with our free institutions. . . .

7 . . . If a murderer or any other criminal who is a master mason is brought before the bar of justice to be tried, and gives this signal [signal] of distress; if the judge or prosecutor or any of the jurors are master masons, and see him give this sign, they are under the solemnities of an oath, to risk their lives to save his. (An Inquiry into the Nature and Tendency of Speculative Free-Masonry, by John G. Stearns, pp. 76, 77 and 79)

In an address delivered September 11, 1829, we find the following:

This day has been set apart, as an occasion for assaulting the proud institution simultaneously throughout the state; for lifting against it the voices of freemen in all our borders. . . . He [Morgan] laid down his life for his country; his widow and his orphans, are alive to bear witness. He fell by the hands of masonic violence, . . . the midnight foe of our liberties. . . . The horrors of the Revolution in France are, however, clearly traced to the hand of this midnight Order, and the present convulsed state of Mexico is principally owing to the secret operations of two masonic parties, . . . (The Anti-Masonic Review and Monthly Magazine, vol. 1, no. 10, pp. 296-297)

On March 14, 1828, the Wayne Sentinel reported that an “anti-Masonic” newspaper was to begin publication in Joseph Smith’s neighborhood. It was to be known as The Palmyra Freeman. We have only had access to photographs of a few pages from this paper, but these pages have led us to the conclusion that it was extremely anti-Masonic. On December 2, 1828, this statement appeared in the Palmyra Freeman: “Our Government and Country will be destroyed, unless the people put down Masonry root and branch.” In the same issue we find the following: “And what will the people of this country think of themselves ten or twenty years hence, if they should suffer themselves to be duped, and do not unite hand and heart, to put down a secret society, which, if again suffered to get fairly the ascendancy will crush them and their liberties together.” On November 10, 1829, this statement appeared in the Palmyra Freeman: “Masonry, thank God, is now before the wor[l]d in all her naked deformity! — a secret combination to destroy liberty and religion, . . .” (Palmyra Freeman, November 10, 1829).

Now, when we look at the Book of Mormon we see that it is filled with references to secret societies. The Jaredites “formed a secret combination” (Ether 8:18), and the Nephites and Lamanites had a “secret band” known as the Gadianton robbers (Helaman 8:28). Furthermore, the Book of Mormon warns the American people that a “secret combination” (Ether 9:24) would be among them.

In the Book of Mormon, Ether 8:14, we read:

And it came to pass that they all swear unto him, by the God of heaven, and also by the heavens, and also by the earth, and by their heads, that whoso should vary from the assistance which Akish desired should lose his head; and whoso should divulge whatsoever thing Akish made known unto them, the same should lose his life.

According to an expose of Masonry published in the Wayne Sentinel on March 14, 1828, the “Obligation of the Seventh, or Royal Arch degree” contained these words:

. . . I promise and swear, that I will aid and assist a companion Royal Arch mason wherever I shall see him engaged in any difficulty so far as to extricate him from the same, whether he be right or wrong.— Furthermore do I promise and swear, that a companion Royal Arch mason’s secrets given me . . . shall remain as secure and inviolable in my breast as in his own, when he communicated it to me, Murder and Treason not excepted. . . . binding myself under the no less penalty than to have my skull struck off, and my brains exposed . . .

Another oath contained the words, “. . . binding myself under no less penalty than to have my head struck off . . .” The same issue of the Wayne Sentinel also stated that “the candidate is . . . presented with a human skull and told he must submit to the degradation of drinking his 5th libation from the skull.” In the Book of Mormon we read:

But behold, Satan did stir up the hearts of the more part of the Nephites, insomuch that they did unite with those bands of robbers, and did enter into their covenants and their oaths, that they would protect and preserve one another in whatsoever difficult circumstances they should be placed, that they should not suffer for their murders, and their plunderings, and their stealings.

And it came to pass that they did have their signs, yea, their secret signs, and their secret words; and this that they might distinguish a brother who had entered into the covenant, that whatsoever wickedness his brother should do he should not be injured by his brother, nor by those who did belong to his band, who had taken this covenant. (Book of Mormon, Helaman 6:21-22)

The Masons, of course, had secret signs and words. In fact, William Morgan’s expose stated that “the signs, due-guards, grips, words, passwords, and their several names comprise pretty much all the secrets of Masonry . . .” (Freemasonry Exposed, p. 55). On page 68 we find this statement concerning the word “Shibboleth”: “This word was also used by our ancient brethren to distinguish a friend from foe, . . .”

As we have shown, the Masons were accused of being “dangerous to our government,” and some people felt that unless they were “suppressed, there will soon be neither religion, morals, literature, nor civilized society left!” (Wayne Sentinel, September 26, 1828). The Book of Mormon paints a similar picture concerning secret societies:

And they did set at defiance the law and the rights of their country; and they did covenant one with another to destroy the governor, and to establish a king over the land, that the land should no more be at liberty but should be subject unto kings. (3 Nephi 6:30)

In Ether 8:22 we read that “whatsoever nation shall uphold such secret combinations, . . . shall be destroyed.” In verse 25 of the same chapter we read that “whosoever buildeth it up seeketh to overthrow the freedom of all lands, nations, and countries, . . .”

Because of the Morgan affair the Masons were accused of murder and shielding the guilty. John G. Stearns called Masonry “a murderous institution.” The Book of Mormon speaks of “murderous combinations” (Ether

8:23), “secret murders” (3 Nephi 9:9), and in 3 Nephi 6:29 we read that the wicked entered “into a covenant to destroy them, and to deliver those who were guilty of murder from the grasp of justice, . . .” Moroni, who was supposed to have lived about 400 A.D., claimed that the Lord revealed to him the condition of the Gentiles in the last days:

And it shall come in a day when the blood of saints shall cry unto the Lord, because of secret combinations and the works of darkness.

Yea, why do ye build up your secret abominations to get gain, and cause that widows should mourn before the Lord, and also orphans to mourn before the Lord, and also the blood of their fathers and their husbands to cry unto the Lord from the ground, for vengeance upon your heads? (Book of Mormon, Mormon 8:27 and 40)

These verses must have been referring to Freemasonry. Ether 8:23-25 also seems to be warning against Masonry:

Wherefore, O ye Gentiles, . . . suffer not that these murderous combinations shall get above you, which are built up to get power and gain—and the work, yea, even the work of destruction come upon you . . . to your overthrow and destruction if ye shall suffer these things to be.

Wherefore, the Lord commandeth you, when ye shall see these things come among you that ye shall awake to a sense of your awful situation, because of this secret combinations which shall be among you; or wo be unto it, because of the blood of them who have been slain; for they cry from the dust for vengeance upon it, and also upon those who built it up.

For it cometh to pass that whoso buildeth it up seeketh to overthrow the freedom of all lands, nations, and countries; and it bringeth to pass the destruction of all people, . . . (Ether 8:23-25)

This warning reminds us of the words attributed to George Washington: “Beware of secret combinations” (The Morgan Investigator, March 29, 1827). The words “secret combinations” are found in the Book of Mormon in the following places: 2 Nephi 9:9, 26:22; Alma 37:30-31; Helaman 3:23; 3 Nephi 4:29; Mormon 8:27; Ether 8:19, 22, 9:1, 13:18, 14:8, 10. These words were frequently used with regard to Masonry. In fact, newspapers published in Joseph Smith’s neighborhood speak of “secret combinations” (see Wayne Sentinel, July 18, 1828, and Palmyra Freeman, November 10, 1829). The Wayne Sentinel for July 18, 1828, uses the words “secret societies,” and the Palmyra Freeman, December 2, 1828, calls the Masons a “secret society.” The Book of Mormon uses the words “secret society” in the following places: 3 Nephi 3:9; Ether 9:6, 11:22.

The Masons were sometimes accused of being a “band,” and it was claimed that one of their objects was to “plunder” (Wayne Sentinel, September 26, 1828). The Book of Mormon speaks of the “band of Gadianton” (Helaman 11:10), who “did commit murder and plunder” (Helaman 11:25).

The word “craft” was frequently used with regard to Masonry. The Book of Mormon tells us that Gadianton was “expert in many words, and also in his craft” (Helaman 2:4).

The Masons claimed that their ceremonies went back to “ancient” times (Mormonism Exposed, p. 68). The Book of Mormon quotes Giddianhi—an evil man—as saying:

And behold, I am Giddianhi; and I am the governor of this the secret society of Gadianton; which society and the works thereof I know to be good; and they are of ancient date and they have been handed down unto us. (3 Nephi 3:9)

In the Masonic ritual the candidate has “a rope called a Cable-tow round his neck” (Freemasonry Exposed, p. 18). In the Book of Mormon, 2 Nephi 26:22, we read: “And there are also secret combinations, . . . according to the combinations of the devil, . . . and he leadeth them by the neck with a flaxen cord, . . .”

In their ceremonies the Masons wore “a lambskin or white apron” (Freemasonry Exposed, p. 24). According to 3 Nephi 3:7, the Gadianton robbers wore “a lambskin about their loins” (3 Nephi 4:7).

Joseph Smith’s Book of Moses—as published in modern editions of the Pearl of Great Price—also contains material which reflects the controversy over Masonry:

And Satan said unto Cain: Swear unto me by thy throat, and if thou tell it thou shalt die; and swear thy brethren by their heads, . . .

And Cain said: Truly I am Mahan, the master of this great secret, that I may murder and get gain. Wherefore Cain was called Master Mahan, . . .

For Lamech having entered into a covenant with Satan, after the manner of Cain, wherein he became Master Mahan, master of that great secret which was administered unto Cain by Satan; . . .

For, from the days of Cain, there was a secret combination, and their works were in the dark, and they knew every man his brother. (Pearl of Great Price, Book of Moses, 5:29, 31, 49, 51)

The statement, “Swear unto me by thy throat,” is very interesting, for according to an expose of Masonry published in the Wayne Sentinel, November 10, 1826, the candidate had to swear by his throat: “To all of which I do most solemnly and sincerely promise and swear, . . . binding myself under no less penalty, than to have my throat cut across; . . .”

Even more interesting, however, are the words “Master Mahan.” They are so similar to the words “Master Mason” (Freemasonry Exposed, p. 70) that we are almost forced to the conclusion that Joseph Smith had these words in mind.

S. H. Goodwin, a prominent Mason, made these statements concerning the relationship of the Book of Mormon to Masonry:

. . . the present writer is convinced that the years which saw the preparation and publication of the “Golden Bible” of this new faith, also witnesses the very material prenatal influence of Masonry upon Mormonism, proof of which lies thickly sprinkled over the pages of the Book of Mormon. . . . the evidence of the Mormon prophet’s reaction to the anti-Masonic disturbance is as clear and conclusive in the Book of Mormon, as is that which points out, beyond controversy, the region in which that book was produced, and establishes the character of the religious, educational and social conditions which constituted the environment of Joseph Smith. (Mormonism and Masonry, Salt Lake City, 1961, pp. 8-9)

Anthony W. Ivins, who was a member of the First Presidency of the Mormon Church, made this statement in rebuttal to this charge:

It is true that during the period of the translation and publication of the Book of Mormon Morgan disappeared. It is also true that the author of “Mormonism and Masonry” does not show that Joseph Smith, or any one of those who were directly associated with him in the translation and publication of the book ever attended an anti-Masonic meeting, had any knowledge whatever of the ritual of the Masonic fraternity, or participated in the most remote manner in the crusade which followed the disappearance of Morgan and consequently could not have made Masonry the basis upon which the book was written. (The Relationship of “Mormonism” and Freemasonry, pp. 175-176)

Actually, any one who could read a newspaper at the time the Book of Mormon was written could have known a great deal about “the ritual of the Masonic fraternity.” As to Ivins’ statement that there is no proof that any one connected with the Book of Mormon was involved in the anti-Masonic movement, it can now be shown that Martin Harris (a witness to the Book of Mormon who provided money for its publication) was deeply involved. The Mormon writer Richard L. Anderson made this statement concerning Martin Harris:

The same point is made by his appointment in 1827 on the Palmyra “committee of vigilance” by the Wayne County anti-Masonic convention, a cause long since discredited but which then attracted many public-spirited individuals. (Improvement Era, February 1969, p. 20)

As a reference for this statement Dr. Anderson cites the Wayne Sentinel for October 5, 1827. In the “anti-Masonic convention” which Dr. Anderson speaks of the following resolution was passed:

Resolved. That we conceive it a dereliction of our duty to give our suffrages for any office within the gift of the people to a freemason who has not publicly renounced the institution and principles of freemasonry, or to any person who approbates the institution or treats with levity, or attempts to palliate or screen the hor[r]id transaction relative to the abduction of William Morgan. (Wayne Sentinel, October 5, 1827)

Thus we see that at least one of the witnesses to the Book of Mormon was deeply involved in the anti-Masonic excitement which followed Morgan's disappearance.

Bible Influence

The King James Version of the Bible probably had more influence on the Book of Mormon than any other book. The Mormon Apostle Orson Pratt, however, stated that Joseph Smith "was unacquainted with the contents of the Bible; he was brought up to work" (Journal of Discourses, vol. 2, p. 288).

After a careful examination of the matter, we have come to the conclusion that the Apostle Pratt's statement is not true. In fact, the evidence seems to show that Joseph Smith was very familiar with the Bible. In a manuscript which the Mormon Church suppressed for about 130 years Joseph Smith himself stated:

At about the age of twelve years my mind became Seriously impress with regard to the all important concerns for the welfare of my immortal Soul which led me to Searching the Scriptures believing as I was taught, that they contained the word of God . . . thus from the age twelve years to fifteen I pondered many things . . . and by Searching the Scriptures I found that . . . there was no society or denomination that built upon the gospel of Jesus Christ as recorded in the new testament . . . ("An Analysis of the Accounts Relating Joseph Smith's Early Visions," by Paul R. Cheesman, Master's thesis, Brigham Young University, 1965, pp. 127-128)

Joseph Smith's own mother quoted him as saying:

. . . but Joseph, from the first, utterly refused even to attend their meetings, saying, "Mother, . . . I can take my Bible, and go into the woods, and learn more in two hours, than you can learn at meeting in two years, if you should go all the time." (Biographical Sketches of Joseph Smith, 1853, p. 90)

Unlike the Mormon Apostle Orson Pratt, the Mormon writer J. N. Washburn freely admits that "Joseph knew his Bible." (The Contents, Structure and Authorship of the Book of Mormon, 1954, p. 4)

The Apocrypha

The Mormon writer Bruce R. McConkie gives this information concerning the Apocrypha:

Scholars and Biblical students have grouped certain apparently scriptural Old Testament writings, which they deem to be of doubtful authenticity or of a spurious nature, under the title of the Apocrypha. . . . The Apocrypha was included in the King James Version of 1611, but by 1629 some English Bibles began to appear without it, and since the early part of the 19th century it has been excluded from almost all protestant Bibles. . . . the British and Foreign Bible Society has excluded it from all but some pulpit Bibles since 1827.

From these dates it is apparent that controversy was still raging as to the value of the Apocrypha at the time the Prophet began his ministry. (Mormon Doctrine, 1966, p. 41)

Although the Apocrypha was not generally accepted among the Protestants, Joseph Smith was interested in it, and when he purchased a Bible in the late 1820's he picked one which contained the Apocrypha. Reed Durham gives this interesting information:

The Bible used for Joseph Smith's Revision was purchased in E. B. Grandin's Bookstore in Palmyra, New York; . . . It was an edition of the Authorized Version "together with the Apocrypha," which was located between the two testaments, and was an 1828 edition, printed in Cooperstown, New York, by H. and E. Phinney Company.

("A History of Joseph Smith's Revision of the Bible," by Reed C. Durham, Jr., Ph.D. dissertation, Brigham Young University, 1965, p. 25)

Edward Stevenson tells of Joseph Smith's interest in the Apocrypha:

Opening the Bible to the Apocrypha, he said, "There are many precious truths in these books,—just as true as any of the Bible—but it requires much of the Spirit of God to divide the truths from the errors which have crept into them." . . . (The Juvenile Instructor, September 15, 1894, p. 570)

Since we know that Joseph Smith purchased a Bible with the Apocrypha and was somewhat familiar with its contents, it should come of no surprise to find that the Book of Mormon contains some parallels to it.

The Apocrypha seems to solve the mystery of the origin of the name "Nephi." While the name "Nephi" is not found in either the Old or New Testament of the Bible, it is one of the most important names in the Book of Mormon. At least four men in the Book of Mormon are named "Nephi." It is also the name of several books in the Book of Mormon, a city, a land, and a people. Mormon scholars have never been able to find the source of this name. Dr. Wells Jakeman admitted that "there does not seem to be any acceptable Hebrew meaning or derivation for this name." He states, however, that Nephi's name might have been derived from "the name of the young Egyptian grain god Nepri or Nepi . . ." Dr. Hugh Nibley, on the other hand, feels that the name was derived from another Egyptian source. Other Mormon writers suggest entirely different sources for this name. While Mormon writers seem to be in a state of confusion with regard to this name, the Apocrypha seems to settle the matter. In 2 Maccabees 1:36 we read:

And Neemias called this thing Naphthar, which is as much as to say, a cleansing; but many men call it Nephi.

It is obvious, then, that Joseph Smith must have borrowed the name "Nephi" from the Apocrypha.

The name "Ezias," found in the Book of Mormon, Helaman 8:20, is another name that does not appear in the Old or New Testaments of the Bible. It is interesting to note, however, that this same name is found in the Apocrypha, 1 Esdras 8:2.

The story of Judith in the Apocrypha seems to be reflected in the story of the decapitation of Laban in the Book of Mormon. Below is a list of four parallels between the two stories.

1. In both stories the wicked man was drunk with wine.

. . . he was drunken with wine. (1 Nephi 4:7)

. . . he was filled with wine. (Judith 13:2)

2. In both cases the servant of the Lord took the wicked man's weapon.

. . . I beheld his sword, and I drew it forth . . . (1 Nephi 4:9)

. . . she . . . took down his fauchion from thence, . . . (Judith 13:6)

3. In both cases the servant of the Lord took hold of the wicked man's hair.

. . . took Laban by the hair of his head, . . . (1 Nephi 4:18)

. . . took hold of the hair of the head, . . . (Judith 13:7)

4. In both cases the wicked man's head was cut off with his own weapon.

. . . and I smote off his head with his own sword. (1 Nephi 4:18)

And she smote twice upon his neck with all her might, and she took away his head from him, . . . (Judith 13:8)

In our Case Against Mormonism, vol. 2, pages 74-76 we showed 16 parallels between these two stories as well as parallels between other books of the Apocrypha and the Book of Mormon. Since the apocryphal books were written hundreds of years after the Nephites were supposed to have left Jerusalem, the parallels between the Book of Mormon and the Apocrypha tend to demonstrate that the Book of Mormon is not the ancient record it claims to be.

Old Testament

There can be no doubt that the first books of the Bible furnished a great deal of source material for the writing of the Book of Mormon. The book of Genesis seems to have had a real influence upon the first few chapters of the Book of Mormon. Two of Nephi's brothers, Joseph and Jacob, have names taken from the book of Genesis. His mother's name is Sariah, which reminds us of Abraham's wife Sarah—also called Sarai (Genesis 17:15). Ishmael—a friend of the family—is also a name taken from Genesis (see chapter 17, verse 18). The name Laban is likewise found in Genesis (see chapter 24, verse 29).

The story of Nephi in some ways parallels the story of Joseph found in Genesis, and the story of Moses leading the children of Israel out of bondage seems to have been the source for a good deal of the material found in the First Book of Nephi and the book of Ether. For a list of parallels see our Case, vol. 2, pages 76-81.

The Mormon leaders claim that the Nephites had the Old Testament books which were written prior to the time they left Jerusalem—i.e., about 600 B.C. Large portions of Isaiah are quoted in the Book of Mormon. In fact, more than eighteen chapters of Isaiah are found in the Book of Mormon. The Ten Commandments and many other portions of the Old Testament are also found in the Book of Mormon. In this book we cannot even begin to list all of the verses that are taken from the Old Testament.

Since it is claimed that the Nephites had the books written before 600 B.C., we are not too concerned about quotations taken from them. The Book of Mormon, however, borrows from books written after 600 B.C. For instance, the Book of Daniel seems to have had some influence on the Book of Mormon (see parallels in our Case, vol. 2, p. 81).

One of the most serious mistakes the author of the Book of Mormon made was that of quoting from the book of Malachi many years before it was written. Below is a comparison of some verses which were supposed to have been written by Nephi sometime between B.C. 588 and 545, and some verses which were written by Malachi about 400 B.C. In Malachi 4:1 we read:

For behold, the day cometh, that shall burn as an oven; and all the proud, yea, and all that do wickedly, shall be stubble: and the day that cometh shall burn them up, . . .

In the Book of Mormon, 1 Nephi 22:15, Malachi's words have been borrowed:

For behold, saith the prophet, . . . the day soon cometh that all the proud and they who do wickedly shall be as stubble; and the day cometh that they must be burned.

In Malachi 4:2 we read: ". . . the Sun of righteousness arise with healing in his wings; . . ." In the Book of Mormon we read: ". . . he shall rise from the dead with healing in his wings; . . ." (2 Nephi 25:13)

In our Case, vol. 2, page 81, we show that 2 Nephi 26:4, 6 and 9 were also taken from Malachi 4:1-2.

About 600 years after Nephi was supposed to have written these words, Jesus appeared to the Nephites and said: ". . . Behold other scriptures I would that ye should write, that ye have not." (Book of Mormon, 3 Nephi 23:6) Jesus then told the Nephites to write the words which the Father had given unto Malachi, which he should tell unto them. . . . And these are the words which he did tell unto them, saying: Thus said the Father unto Malachi—Behold, I will send my messenger, and he shall prepare the way before me, . . .

For behold, the day cometh that shall burn as an oven; and all the proud, yea, and all that do wickedly, shall be stubble; and the day that cometh shall burn them up, saith the Lord of Hosts, that it shall leave them neither root nor branch.

But unto you that fear my name, shall the Son of Righteousness arise with healing in his wings; and ye shall go forth and grow up as calves in the stall. (3 Nephi 24:1; 25:1-2)

These words, attributed to Jesus, very plainly show that the Nephites could not have the words of Malachi until Christ came among them. The Mormon writer George Reynolds stated: "As Malachi lived between two and three hundred years after Lehi left Jerusalem, the Nephites knew nothing of the glorious things that the Father had revealed to him until Jesus repeated them" (Complete Concordance of the Book of Mormon, Salt Lake City, 1957, p. 442). Now, if the Nephites knew nothing concerning these words until the coming of Christ, how did Nephi quote them 600 years before?

New Testament

Mark Twain said that the Book of Mormon "seems to be merely a prosy detail of imaginary history, with the Old Testament for a model; followed by a tedious plagiarism of the New Testament. The author labored to give his words and phrases the quaint, old-fashioned sound and structure of our King James's translation of the Scriptures; and the result is a mongrel—half modern glibness, and half ancient simplicity and gravity" (Roughing It, by Mark Twain, p. 110).

Hugh Nibley made this statement concerning Mark Twain's criticism of the Book of Mormon:

Mark Twain accuses Joseph Smith of having in composing the Book of Mormon "smouched from the New Testament, and no credit given." But since the Book of Mormon was written to be read by people who knew and believed the Bible—indeed one cannot possibly believe the Book of Mormon without believing the Bible—it is hard to see why a deceiver would strew the broadest clues to his pilfering all through a record he claimed was his own. (Since Cumorah, p. 127)

We agree with Dr. Nibley that "it is hard to see why a deceiver would strew the broadest clues to his pilfering all through a record he claimed was his own." Nevertheless, the clues are there. Wesley M. Jones says that the New Testament was one of Joseph Smith's most important sources. He used . . . St. Matthew with a sprinkle here and there from the other Gospels and, of course, from St. Paul. Whatever he used, though, he enlarged "to make it more plain." In short, St. Matthew was the clay and Joseph the potter. (A Critical Study of Book of Mormon Sources, by Wesley M. Jones, Detroit, Michigan, 1964, p. 65)

The ministry of Christ seems to have been the source for a good deal of the Book of Mormon. For instance, the story of Christ raising Lazarus from the dead seems to have had a definite influence upon the story of Ammon in the Book of Mormon. Below are a few parallels between the two stories.

1. In both stories a man seems to die and a period of time passes.

And it came to pass that after two days and two nights they were about to take his body and lay it on a sepulchre, . . . (Alma 19:5)

Then when Jesus came, he found that he had lain in the grave four days already. (John 11:17)

2. Both Martha and the queen use the word "stinketh."

. . . others say that he is dead and that he stinketh, . . . (Alma 19:5)
. . . by this time he stinketh: . . . (John 11:39)

3. Both Ammon and Jesus use the word "sleepeth" with regard to the man.

. . . he sleepeth . . . (Alma 19:8)
. . . Lazarus sleepeth; . . . (John 11:11)

4. Both Ammon and Jesus say that the man will rise again.

. . . he shall rise again; . . . (Alma 19:8)
. . . Thy brother shall rise again. (John 11:23)

5. The conversation between Ammon and the queen contains other phrases that are similar to those used by Jesus and Martha.

And Ammon said unto her: Believest thou this? And she said unto him: . . . I believe . . . (Alma 19:9)

Jesus said unto her, believest thou this? She saith unto him, Yea, Lord I believe . . . (John 11:25-27)

6. In both cases the man arose.

. . . he arose, . . . (Alma 19:12)

. . . he that was dead came forth, . . . (John 11:44)

In the Book of Mormon we read the story of a great storm which the Nephites encountered on their way to the “promised land” (see 1 Nephi 18:6-21). In our Case, vol. 2, pages 67-69, we pointed out 12 parallels between this story and a story published in the Wayne Sentinel, March 30, 1827. While these parallels seem rather convincing, we pointed out that there is another source for this story which cannot be easily dismissed, for the evidence of plagiarism is all too apparent. This is the story concerning Jesus found in Mark 4:37-39. Below is a comparison of the two stories.

1. The two stories use identical language when speaking of the storm.

. . . there arose a great storm, . . . (1 Nephi 18:13)

. . . there arose a great storm, . . . (Mark 4:37)

2. In both stories the storm becomes so severe that the people are about to “perish,” and they seek help from their spiritual leader.

. . . my brethren began to see .they must perish . . . wherefore, they came unto me, and loosed the bands . . . (1 Nephi 18:15)

. . . they awake him, and say that . . . unto him, Master, carest thou not that we perish? (Mark 4:38)

3. In both cases after the leader comes forth the storm ceases. Almost identical wording appears in both accounts concerning the calming of the sea.

. . . the winds did cease and there was a great calm. (1 Nephi 18:21)

. . . the wind ceased, and there was a great calm. (Mark 4:39)

It is very obvious that the author of the Book of Mormon has borrowed from Mark, yet the book of Nephi is supposed to be about 600 years older than the book of Mark. Therefore, the appearance of this story in the Book of Mormon proves beyond all doubt that it is not an ancient document. Dr. Hugh Nibley states that “A forgery is defined by specialists in ancient documents as ‘any document which was not produced in the time, place, and manner claimed by it or its publishers.’” (Since Cumorah, p. 160). The Book of Mormon certainly falls into this class.

One of the most striking parallels is the beheading of John the Baptist in the New Testament and the attempted beheading of Omer in the Book of Mormon. In the Bible we read:

But when Herod’s birthday was kept, the daughter of Herodias danced before them, and pleased Herod.

Whereupon he promised with an oath to give her whatsoever she would ask.

And she, being before instructed of her mother, said, Give me here John Baptist’s head in a charger.

And the king was sorry: nevertheless for the oath’s sake, and them which sat with him at meat, he commanded it to be given her.

And he sent, and beheaded John in the prison.

And his head was brought in a charger, and given to the damsel: and she brought it to her mother. (Matthew 14:6-11)

Now, in the Book of Mormon we read the following:

And now, therefore, let my father send for Akish, the son of Kimnor; and behold, I am fair, and I will dance before him, and I will please him, that he will desire me to wife; wherefore if he shall desire of thee that ye shall give unto him me to wife, then shall ye say: I will give her if ye will bring unto me the head of my father, the king.

. . . the daughter of Jared danced before him that she pleased him, insomuch that he desired her to wife. . . .

And Jared said unto him: I will give her unto you, if ye will bring unto me the head of my father, the king. (Ether 8:10-12)

While the incident in the Bible happened during Christ’s lifetime, the incident in the Book of Mormon was supposed to have occurred many hundreds of years before Christ.

Wesley M. Jones make this statement concerning the Book of Mormon:

Joseph’s chief source of material by all odds, was the Bible, in which he was exceptionally versed (as were many people of his day). . . . St. Paul, too, was most helpful to Joseph; his unique phrases became a part of Joseph’s literary vocabulary and shine out on most any page in Joseph’s work—though Paul was not yet born when the “Nephite Record” was allegedly written. And more, the ministry of St. Paul is duplicated almost exactly in the ministry of Alma, one of Joseph’s characters—even in manner of speech and travels. (A Critical Study of Book of Mormon Sources by Wesley M. Jones, pp. 14-15)

The reader will no doubt remember that when Paul was on the way to Damascus to persecute the church, the Lord appeared to him and said: “. . . Saul, why persecutest thou me?” (Acts 9:4).

In the Book of Mormon, Alma also persecuted the church, and like Paul he received a vision. The “angel of the Lord” spoke to him and said: “. . . Alma, . . . why persecutest thou the church of God?” (Mosiah 27:13).

In our Case, vol. 2, pp. 86-87, we listed 17 parallels between Alma and the Apostle Paul.

List of Parallels

As we have already shown, the Nephites were not supposed to have had the books of the New Testament because they were written hundreds of years after they left Jerusalem. Nevertheless, we find many New Testament verses and parts of verses throughout the Book of Mormon. In the following list of parallels between the Book of Mormon and the New Testament we have tried to eliminate verses that also appear in the Old Testament. All of the verses from the Book of Mormon were supposed to have been written between 600 B.C. and 33 A.D. In this list we will use the letters “BM” as an abbreviation for the Book of Mormon and “KJV” as an abbreviation for the King James Version of the Bible.

The verses or parts of verses from the Book of Mormon which we have presented above were all supposed to have been written between 600 B.C. and 33 A.D. Those which follow were supposed to have been written between 34 A.D. and 421 A.D. In 34 A.D. Jesus was supposed to have appeared to the Nephites and given them the Sermon on the Mount (see 3 Nephi, chapters 12-14). Since it is possible that Jesus could have given the same sermon to the Nephites we will not bother to list any of these verses. There are many other verses which Jesus was supposed to have given to the Nephites which are parallel to verses found in the four Gospels. We will not deal with any of these quotations in this study.

In our Case, vol. 2, pages 87-102, we listed 400 parallels between the New Testament and the Book of Mormon, and even at that we certainly did not use all of the parallels that could be listed.

The Mormon historian B. H. Roberts once made this statement:

1. The Unknown states the fact that Nephi wrote between 600 and 500 B.C. and then presents what he calls the first difficulty that I am to overcome. "How can a writer," he asks, "claiming to live at that time make repeated quotations from the writings of Christ's Apostles who were not born until 600 years after the time Nephi wrote?" He then charges that Nephi quotes "passage after passage" from the writings of Christ's apostles, Matthew, John, Paul, Luke, Peter, etc.; and gives what he calls just "two or three examples" of such quotations. The gentleman very much overstates the difficulty he presents, by making it appear that the alleged quotations are very numerous, when the fact is that the two or three cases he cites virtually exhaust the alleged quoted passages so far as the New Testament is concerned. (Defense of the Faith and the Saints, by B. H. Roberts, Salt Lake City, 1907, p. 329)

The list of parallels which we presented in our Case proves that B. H. Roberts has misrepresented the facts. We have found well over a hundred quotations from the New Testament in the first two books of Nephi alone, and these two books were supposed to have been written between 600 and 545 B.C.

A Real Dilemma

According to the Book of Mormon, Christ appeared to the Nephites after his crucifixion and told them he was going to quote the words of Moses. The words which he should have quoted are found in Deuteronomy 18:15, 18 and 19:

The Lord thy God will raise up unto thee a Prophet from the midst of thee, of thy brethren, like unto me; unto him ye shall hearken; . . .

I will raise them up a Prophet from among their brethren, like unto thee, and will put my words in his mouth; and he shall speak unto them all that I shall command him.

And it shall come to pass, that whosoever will not hearken unto my words which he shall speak in my name, I will require it of him.

Instead of quoting these words from Deuteronomy, however, Jesus quoted from Peter's paraphrase of Moses' words found in Acts 3:22-26. This is very obvious when we compare Peter's paraphrase of Moses' words and the words Christ was supposed to have quoted to the Nephites. Below is Peter's paraphrase as found in the Book of Acts:

22 For Moses truly said unto the fathers, A prophet shall the Lord your God raise up unto you of your brethren, like unto me; him shall ye hear in all things whatsoever he shall say unto you.

23 And it shall come to pass, that every soul, which will not hear that prophet, shall be destroyed from among the people.

24 Yea, and all the prophets from Samuel and those that follow after, as many as have spoken, have likewise foretold of these days.

25 Ye are the children of the prophets, and of the covenant which God made with our fathers, saying unto Abraham, And in thy seed shall all the kindreds of the earth be blessed.

26 Unto you first God, having raised up his Son Jesus, sent him to bless you, in turning away every one of you from his iniquities." (Acts 3:22-26)

In the Book of Mormon we read:

Behold, I am he of whom Moses spake, saying: A prophet shall the Lord your God raise up unto you of your brethren, like unto me; him shall ye hear in all things whatsoever he shall say unto you. And it shall come to pass that every soul who will not hear that prophet shall be cut off from among the people.

Verily I say unto you, yea, and all the prophets from Samuel and those that follow after, as many as have spoken, have testified of me.

And behold, ye are the children of the prophets; and ye are of the house of Israel; and ye are of the covenant which the Father made with your fathers, saying unto Abraham: And in thy seed shall all the kindreds of the earth be blessed.

The Father having raised me up unto you first, and sent me to bless you in turning away every one of you from his iniquities; . . . (3 Nephi 20:23-26)

It is obvious, then, that the Book of Mormon follows Peter's paraphrase rather than the actual words of Moses recorded in Deuteronomy. Notice that verses 24 through 26 of the third chapter of Acts, though slightly rewritten, are quoted in the Book of Mormon. These words have nothing to do with Moses, but are in reality the words of Peter. Peter spoke these words in the temple at Jerusalem some time after the day of Pentecost. While it is possible that these words could have been recorded at the time, the Book of Acts was probably not written until twenty or thirty years later. George B. Arbaugh made the following statement concerning this:

"Christ" in Book of Mormon Quotes Material Not Yet Written

Christ quotes to the Indians the following statement supposedly made by Moses. Actually, these are not Moses' words, but a paraphrase of them made by Peter. . . .

Simon Peter here paraphrases and condenses Moses' lengthy statement in Deuteronomy 18:15-19. The wording is quite different from that in Deuteronomy, but the writers of the Book of Mormon failed to check on the original statement and assumed that Peter's report of it was a verbatim quotation. Therefore the Book of Mormon quotes Acts. (Gods, Sex, and Saints, by George Arbaugh, p. 36)

It is interesting to note that Nephi—who was supposed to have written between 600 and 545 B.C.—also quoted this portion of the Book of Acts (see 1 Nephi 22:20).

The book of Moroni, in the Book of Mormon, is filled with quotations from Paul's epistles to the Corinthians. Wesley M. Jones stated:

Joseph with all his cunning overlooked something most damaging of all. Here is Joseph plagiarizing a sermon of Paul. His puppet, Moroni, lives on a distant continent, 4000 miles from Paul with no communication, yet they use the same words! (Joseph Smith: Scripture-Maker, by Wesley M. Jones, Oakland, California, 1966, p. 4)

Mormon writers find it difficult to answer this problem. Sidney B. Sperry, of the Brigham Young University, makes this statement:

Critics will say that Mormon's words were simply hijacked by Joseph Smith from Paul's words in the New Testament. It is true that the text in verse 45 is almost word for word the same as its parallel in 1 Corinthians. Now I am going to speak as a higher critic. I do not believe that Paul was the original author of the words in question. I think that the original author was the Savior. Paul had access to them and used our Lord's words to suit himself when writing to the Corinthians. In his time he would not be accused of plagiarism. When our Lord came to this continent as a resurrected, glorified person, he gave the same sermon on faith, hope, and charity. Mormon had access to that sermon just as Paul did and used it as he pleased. He was unaware that Paul had used the sermon on the other continent at an earlier time. We cannot accuse the Prophet Joseph Smith of being stupid, whatever else we may accuse him of. He told the truth and made an interesting contribution to our knowledge of Paul and his famous sermon. (Book of Mormon Institute, December 5, 1959, Extension Publications, B.Y.U., 1964 ed., p. 8)

Dr. Sperry also states:

Chapters seven and ten of the Book of Moroni contain teachings which so closely parallel passages in 1 Corinthians 12, 13 that they constitute a literary problem. . . .

That there is more than a casual connection between these two scriptures is apparent to everyone. . . .

That there is a problem we grant readily enough, and we shall attempt a reasonable explanation of it. . . . We cannot, of course, force men to believe anything, whether fact or fancy. But we can point to the strong possibility that Paul was not the exclusive author of the ideas contained in 1 Corinthians 12:4-11 concerning spiritual gifts. Isn't it reasonable to believe that the great apostle adapted an important body of teachings common to the early Christian Church to suit his needs in dealing with the Corinthians? It would seem to the writer that Jesus was far more likely to have been the original author of the doctrines concerning spiritual gifts than was Paul. . . . It should be emphasized that we are attempting here to give only a reasonable answer to the problem raised; absolute proof is wanting. We cannot prove beyond doubt that Jesus preached a sermon on spiritual gifts either to the Nephites or to His Palestinian followers, records of which could be drawn on by Moroni and Paul. However, it is a very attractive and reasonable presumption that he did. . . .

Now let us turn to the literary problem raised by the presence of extracts from 1 Corinthians 13 in Moroni 7:45-47. Nearly all of Chapter 7 in the Book of Moroni is presented as a sermon by Moroni's father, Moroni, as he taught in a synagogue. The sermon deals with faith, hope, and charity. Most persons, we are sure, would be willing to admit that the bulk of it is as original as one could reasonably expect of a preacher dealing with a familiar subject. However, verses 45 and 46 parallel 1 Corinthians 13:4-8 so closely in some respects that they must be accounted for . . . many phrases are word for word the same as in the King James version. Here the author frankly admits the possibility that Joseph Smith used the familiar version as he translated Moroni's words; . . . In considering the Book of Mormon we have to take the translator into account. When the prophet Joseph Smith came to a passage which contained statements which reminded him of similar ones in the New Testament, he was doubtless influenced by their wording and used them whenever it was possible to do so. (The Problems of the Book of Mormon, Salt Lake City, 1964, pp. 113-118, 120-121)

On pages 206-207 of the same book, Dr. Sperry states:

It is true that the Book of Mormon does contain many verses of scripture, other than those in Isaiah, which agree verbatim with their parallels in the King James Version. . . .

Budvarson claims that “at least twenty-seven thousand words from the King James translation of the Bible are contained in the Book of Mormon.” Our own estimate is about seventeen thousand words, an estimate we think is much more accurate.

The Mormon writer J. N. Washburn made these statements concerning this problem:

One thing appears to be beyond doubt: Joseph knew his Bible. All the way through the Book of Mormon (true seemingly less in the Book of Ether than elsewhere) are words and expressions that could hardly have come from any other source. (This has no reference at all to the hundreds of quotations from Isaiah, Malachi, Matthew, and other writers of Holy Writ. It means rather that the language of the Book of Mormon is frequently Bible language, sometimes almost word for word, and often exactly the same.) One explanation for this is that in the process of translation Joseph used such terms as he could command for what he desired to say, and Bible language appears to have come readily to him.

There seems only one other explanation for this phenomenon. It is that the Nephite prophets in their own teaching and preaching and writing employed the very same terms used by Bible leaders, for whatever reason, and quite independently of them. The likeness of the two texts in many places is too striking, it seems to me, to be accidental, whatever the real reason is. (The Contents, Structure and Authorship of the Book of Mormon, Salt Lake City, 1954, pp. 4-5)

We feel that neither Dr. Sperry nor Mr. Washburn have given a satisfactory explanation as to why so much of the New Testament appears in the Book of Mormon. Dr. Sperry’s explanation seems to be wishful thinking, for he admits that “absolute proof is wanting.” The only reasonable explanation, we feel, is that the author of the Book of Mormon had the King James Version of the Bible. And since this version did not appear until 1611 A.D., the Book of Mormon could not have been written prior to that time. The Book of Mormon, therefore, is a modern composition, and not a “record of ancient religious history.”

Alpha and Omega

Perhaps one of the most serious mistakes made by the author of the Book of Mormon was that of having Jesus quote part of Revelation 21:6 to the Nephites. Below is a comparison of the way the words appear in the book of Revelation and the way they are found in the Book of Mormon.

3 Nephi 9:18 - I am the light and the life of the world. I am Alpha and Omega, the beginning and the end.

Revelation 21:6 - And he said unto me, It is done. I am Alpha and Omega, the beginning and the end.

The words “Alpha” and “Omega” are the first and last letters of the Greek alphabet. The Mormon writer Bruce R. McConkie states:

These words, the first and last letters of the Greek alphabet, are used figuratively to teach the timelessness and eternal nature of our Lord’s existence, . . . (Mormon Doctrine, 1966, p. 31)

The Greek language was used throughout the Roman Empire at the time of Christ; therefore, the New Testament was written in Greek and the words “Alpha” and “Omega” were well understood. The Nephites, however, were supposed to have left Jerusalem 600 years before the time of Christ, and therefore they would not have been familiar with these words. If Jesus had told the Nephites that he was “Alpha and Omega,” it would have had absolutely no meaning to them. When the author of the Book of Mormon took these words from the book of Revelation he evidently did not realize that they were from the Greek language. On May 15, 1843, Joseph Smith wrote a letter in answer to the charge that he had used a Greek word in the Book of Mormon. In this letter he made the following statement:

The error I speak of, is the definition of the word “Mormon.” It has been stated that this word was derived from the Greek word mormo. This is not the case. There was no Greek or Latin upon the plates from which I, through the grace of God, translated the Book of Mormon. (Times and Seasons, vol. 4, p. 194)

J. N. Washburn makes this statement concerning the findings of another Mormon writer:

The Book of Mormon, he finds, does not contain any of the numerous words in the New Testament that are of Greek origin. (Contents, Structure, And Authorship of the Book of Mormon, p. 161)

This statement is certainly incorrect. As we have already shown, the words Alpha and Omega are definitely of Greek origin. The Book of Mormon also contains the name Timothy (3 Nephi 19:4). Timothy is a Greek name and never appears in the Old Testament. In the same verse that we find the name Timothy we also find the name Jonas. Jonas is the New Testament name for Jonah and is found in Matthew 12:39.

The appearance of Greek words in the Book of Mormon—especially the words Alpha and Omega—is another evidence that it is not an ancient record, but rather a modern composition.

Origin of Indians

The fact that Joseph Smith had a great interest in the ancient inhabitants of the land prior to his “translation” of the Book of Mormon is no secret to those who have read the History of Joseph Smith by His Mother. Mrs. Smith said:

I presume our family presented an aspect as singular as any that ever lived upon the face of the earth—all seated in a circle, father, mother, sons and daughters, and giving the most profound attention to a boy, eighteen years of age, . . .

During our evening conversations, Joseph would occasionally give us some of the most amusing recitals that could be imagined. He would describe the ancient inhabitants of this continent, their dress, mode of traveling, and the animals upon which they rode; their cities, their buildings, with every particular; their mode of warfare; and also their religious worship. This he would do with ease, seemingly, as if he had spent his whole life among them. (History of Joseph Smith by His Mother, 1954 edition, pp. 82-83)

It is not surprising that Joseph Smith would take an interest in the ancient inhabitants of this continent, for many people were discussing the question at that time. We find this statement in the Palmyra Herald for October 30, 1822:

In the year 1810, I opened, . . . one of the flat mounds, . . . in Ohio, . . . we found the skeletons of a number of bodies, . . . all deposited directly due east and west, the heads to the west; precisely as is the practice in Christian burials.

The Palmyra Register for May 26, 1819, reported that one writer “believes (and we think with good reason) that this country was once inhabited by a race of people, at least, partially civilized, & that this race has been exterminated by the forefathers of the present and late tribes of Indians in this country.”

The Wayne Sentinel, published at Palmyra, contained these statements on July 24, 1829:

The Aborigines . . . are fast dwindling away, and will soon be buried in the depths of that oblivion which conceals the history and fate of a people who (judging from the traces discovered of the progress which they had made in civilization, and the arts and sciences, as developed by the western antiquities) must have been but a little behind the present generation in many respects. When we look at the straggling Indians who . . . reveal the ravages of intemperance and almost every other loathsome vice, we can hardly persuade ourselves that they are remnants of the powerful race of people who, as it were but yesterday, stretched from the Atlantic to the Pacific . . . we may picture them in our minds as a flourishing and mighty nation . . . powerful in wealth and natural resources; combining moral and political excellence . . . and we may suppose that some dreadful plague, some national calamity swept them from the face of the earth; or perhaps that like Sodom and Gomorrah of old, their national sins became so heinous, that the Almighty in his wrath utterly annihilated them . . .

It is interesting to note that the Book of Mormon states that the Nephites were a civilized people who were destroyed by the Lamanites—a wicked people—for their sins.

On February 19, 1823, an article appeared in the Palmyra Herald which could have had some influence on the story found in the Book of Mormon. In this article we find the following:

The Indians are reported the aborigines of North America;—but I doubt the truth of this proposition. The fortifications and the remains of antiquity in Ohio and elsewhere prove them to be the work of some other people than the Indians. Many of these fortifications were not forts, but religious temples, or places of public worship. . . .

The first settlers of North America were probably the Asiatics, the descendants of Shem—Europe was settled by the children of Japheth. The Asiatics, at an early period, might easily have crossed the Pacific Ocean, and made settlements in North America. The South American Indians probably were the first inhabitants of North America.—The descendants of Japheth might afterwards cross the Atlantic, and subjugate the Asiatics, or drive them to South America. . . . several facts tend to corroborate the conjecture. The language, customs, and religious ceremonies of the South American Indians, resemble those of the Asiatics. The manners, language, and even size of the N. American Indians, especially the Esquimaux, have a great resemblance to the northern nations of Europe. What wonderful catastrophe destroyed at once the first inhabitants, with the species of the mammoth, is beyond the researches of the best scholar and greatest antiquarian. (Palmyra Herald, February 19, 1823)

It is interesting to note that the Book of Mormon tells that America was inhabited by two different races of people—the Nephites and Lamanites were originally one people. Joseph Smith said that the Book of Mormon teaches that America in ancient times has been inhabited by two distinct races of people. The first were called Jaredites, and came directly from the Tower of Babel. The second race came directly from the city of Jerusalem. . . . The Jaredites were destroyed about the time that the Israelites came from Jerusalem, who succeeded them in the inheritance of the country. (A Comprehensive History of the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints, vol. 1, p. 167)

Like the article in the Palmyra Herald, the Book of Mormon claims that the first inhabitants of North America came from Asia. The Palmyra Herald states that the Asiatics may have crossed the Pacific Ocean. A footnote on page 572 of the 1888 edition of the Book of Mormon states that the Jaredites landed on “the Western coast of North America,” so we would assume that they also came across the Pacific Ocean. The article in the Palmyra Herald states: “What wonderful catastrophe destroyed at once the first inhabitants, with the species of the mammoth, is beyond the researches of the best scholar and greatest antiquarian.” The Book of Mormon, however, attempts to answer this question: “And now I, Moroni, proceed to give an account of those ancient inhabitants who were destroyed by the hand of the Lord upon the face of this north country” (Book of Mormon, Ether 1:1).

The Book of Mormon claims to have been written in “the language of the Egyptians” (1 Nephi 1:3). This is rather strange since the Nephites were supposed to have come from Jerusalem. This unusual idea, however, may have been suggested by an article which appeared in the Wayne Sentinel on June 1, 1827:

Decyphering of Hieroglyphics.—Professor Seyffarth of Leipsig, who has been employed in decyphering the Egyptian Antiquities at Rome, states, . . . that he has found . . . a Mexican manuscript in hieroglyphics, from which he infers, that the Mexicans and the Egyptians had intercourse with each other from the remotest antiquity, and that they had the same system of mythology.

During, and even before, Joseph Smith’s time it was believed by many people that the Indians were the Lost Ten Tribes of Israel.

Although the Book of Mormon does not claim that the Indians are the Lost Ten Tribes, it does claim that they are descendants of Joseph, thus making them Israelites. Because of this similarity anti-Mormon writers have suggested that Joseph Smith borrowed his idea concerning the origin of the Indians from the thinking of his time. Several books had been published prior to the coming forth of the Book of Mormon which contained the idea that the Indians were of Israelite origin. The Bureau of American Ethnology printed the following statement concerning this matter in 1907:

Father Duran in 1585 was one of the first to state explicitly that “these natives are of the ten tribes of Israel”. . . Antonio de Montezinos, . . . while journeying in South America in 1641 claimed that he met savages who followed Jewish practices. This story he repeated in Holland, in 1644, to Manasseh ben Israel, who printed it in his work, Hope of Israel. . . . Thomas Thorowgood, in 1652, . . . sought to prove that the Indians were the Jews . . . From this work many subsequent writers obtained their chief arguments. . . . The identification of the American aborigines with the ‘lost ten tribes’ was based on alleged identities in religions, practices, customs and habits, traditions, and languages. Adair’s History of the American Indians, published in 1775, was based on this theory. . . .” (Handbook of American Indians North of Mexico, vol. 1, p. 775, as photographically reproduced in Mormon Claims Examined, p. 20)

In 1816, at Trenton, New Jersey, Elias Boudinot published a book entitled, A Star in the West; or, a Humble Attempt to Discover the Long Lost Tribes of Israel, Preparatory to Their Return to Their Beloved City, Jerusalem. On pages 279-280 of this book we find the following statement:

What could possibly bring greater declarative glory to God, or tend more essentially to affect and rouse the nations of the earth, . . . and thus call their attention to the truth of divine revelation, than a full discovery, that these wandering nations of Indians are the long lost tribes of Israel; . . .

The following was published in the Wayne Sentinel (the paper to which the family of Joseph Smith apparently subscribed) on October 11, 1825:

Those who are most conversant with the public and private economy of the Indians, are strongly of opinion that they are the lineal descendants of the Israelites, and my own researches go far to confirm me in the same belief. (Wayne Sentinel, October 11, 1825, as photographically reprinted in Mormon Claims Examined, p. 45)

One of the most interesting books on this subject which was published prior to the Book of Mormon was Ethan Smith’s View of the Hebrews. The first edition was printed in 1823; it was soon sold out and an enlarged edition appeared in 1825.

The Mormon historian B. H. Roberts evidently read the View of the Hebrews and became concerned because of the many parallels between it and the Book of Mormon. He prepared a manuscript in which these parallels are listed. Dr. Hugh Nibley, of the Brigham Young University, stated:

But the most publicized list of parallels of the Book of Mormon and another work is B. H. Roberts’ comparison of that book with Ethan Smith’s View of the Hebrews. Commenting on this, Mrs. Brodie wrote: “The scholarly Mormon historian, B. H. Roberts once made a careful and impressive list of parallels between the View of the Hebrews and the Book of Mormon, but for obvious reasons it was never published.” (Improvement Era, October 1959, p. 744)

In a letter to Ariel L. Crowley, Ben E. Roberts (B. H. Roberts’ son) admitted that his father had prepared a manuscript dealing with the View of the Hebrews and the Book of Mormon:

I hasten to correct any impression that you may have in regard to Fathers’ manuscript dealing with the Book of Mormon and Ethan Smith’s View of the Hebrews.

During the last years of his life, he had been working on an outline of comparison. This work was never finished, and of course, was not in shape for publication. You may rest assured, however, that he found nothing in his study which reflected upon the integrity of Joseph Smith’s account of the Book of Mormon. (Letter by Ben E. Roberts, printed in About the Book of Mormon, by Ariel L. Crowley, p. 132)

Mimeographed copies of B. H. Roberts' list of parallels were "privately distributed among a restricted group of Mormon scholars," and in January, 1956, Mervin B. Hogan had them published in The Rocky Mountain Mason. Although Ben E. Roberts claims that his father's manuscript does not cast doubt upon the divine authenticity of the Book of Mormon, a careful reading of it would seem to indicate that B. H. Roberts had lost faith in the Book of Mormon. Sterling M. McMurrin stated that Roberts' "study of Ethan Smith's View of the Hebrews and the Book of Mormon attests his determination to keep the case for Mormonism open and honest" (Dialogue: A Journal of Mormon Thought, Winter 1967, p. 144). Davis Bitton states that B. H. Roberts wrote the parallels "towards the end of his life." Mr. Bitton also states: "This document, which has been known about for many years, is published by at least one group as a means of embarrassing the Church" (Ibid., p. 122).

However this may be, Roberts' parallels were certainly not written as a faith promoting work. Notice some of the comments made by B. H. Roberts:

Query: Could all this have supplied structural work for the Book of Mormon? (The Rocky Mountain Mason, Jan. 1956, p. 20)

Was this sufficient to suggest the strange manner of writing the book of Mormon in the learning of the Jews, and the language of the Egyptian, but in an altered Egyptian? (Ibid., p. 22)

Query: Would this treatise of the destruction of Jerusalem suggest the theme to the Book of Mormon author, is the legitimate query, since the View of the Hebrews was published seven to five years before the Book of Mormon. (Ibid., pp. 24-25)

Query: Did the author of the Book of Mormon follow too closely the course of Ethan Smith in this use of Isaiah, would be a legitimate query. The View of the Hebrews was published seven to five years before the Book of Mormon. (Ibid., p. 25)

B. H. Roberts lists 18 parallels between View of the Hebrews and the Book of Mormon. In Parallel No. 4 Roberts states:

(4) Origin of American Indians: It is often represented by Mormon speakers and writers, that the Book of Mormon was the first to represent the American Indians as the descendants of the Hebrews; holding that the Book of Mormon is unique in this. The claim is sometimes still ignorantly made. (The Rocky Mountain Mason, January 1956, p. 18)

Roberts goes on to point out that the idea the Indians were originally Hebrews was popular even before 1830:

... In his index to the View of the Hebrews (Second Edition) (p. 1x) Ethan Smith informs us that from page 114 to page 225 (111 pages) will be devoted to "promiscuous testimonies," to the main fact for which his book stands, viz., the Hebrew origin of the American Indian. He brings together a very long list of writers and published books to show that this view very generally obtained throughout New England. One hundred and eleven pages devoted to evidence alone of the fact of such Hebrew origin gives space for much proof. Referring to Adair's testimonies on the subject, the View of the Hebrews lists twenty-three arguments to prove such origin (pp. 147-8). (Ibid., pp. 18-19)

In parallel No. 5, B. H. Roberts points out that the idea of the Indians having a lost book may have been suggested by Ethan Smith's book:

(5) The Lost Book: "Dr. West of Stockbridge gave the following information. An old Indian informed him that his fathers in this country had not long since had a book which they had for a long time preserved. But having lost the knowledge of reading it, they concluded it would be of no further use to them; and they buried it with an Indian chief." It was spoken of "as a matter of fact." (View of the Hebrews, second edition, p. 223).

"Some readers have said: If the Indians are of the tribes of Israel, some decisive evidence of the fact will ere long be exhibited. This may be the case. . . . Would evidence like the following be deemed as verging toward what would be satisfactory? Suppose a leading character in Israel—wherever they are—should be found to have in his possession some biblical fragment of ancient Hebrew writing. This man dies, and it is buried with him in such a manner as to be long preserved. Some people afterward removing that earth, discover this fragment, and ascertain what it is,—an article of ancient Israel. Would such an incident . . . be esteemed of some weight? Something like this may possibly have occurred in favour of our Indians being of Israel." (p. 217)

Finding the Pittsfield Parchment (Hebrew): "Mr. Merrick gave the following account: That in 1815, he was levelling some ground under and near an old wood-shed standing on a place of his, situated on Indian Hill (a place in Pittsfield so called, and lying, as the writer was afterwards informed, at some distance from the middle of the town where Mr. Merrick is now living.) He ploughed and conveyed away old chips and earth. . . . After the work was done, he discovered, near where the earth had been dug the deepest, a kind of black strap, . . . in the fold it contained four folded leaves of old parchment. These leaves were of a dark yellow (suggesting gold color?) and contained some kind of writing. (They turned out to be Bible quotations.) They were written in Hebrew with a pen, in plain and intelligible writing." (pp. 219-220.) Query: Could all this have supplied structural work for the Book of Mormon? (Ibid., pp. 19-20)

In parallel No. 9, B. H. Roberts points out that the Book of Mormon claims the descendants of Lehi became divided into two groups. There was a "civilized branch" who were called Nephites and a wicked people called Lamanites. The Lamanites were "an idle people, full of mischief and subtlety, and did seek in the wilderness for beasts of prey" (2 Nephi 5:24). The Nephites and Lamanites fought many wars, until finally the Nephites—the civilized people—were annihilated. Roberts' parallel No. 9 seems to show that Ethan Smith had suggested such an idea some years before the Book of Mormon was published:

(9) Accounting for an Overthrown Civilization in America as Witnessed by the Ruined Monuments of It; and the Existence of Barbarous Peoples Occupying America at the Advent of the Europeans:

Two classes, barbarous and civilized were found.

Ethan Smith found opposition to his views growing out of the supposition that if the American Indians were descendants of the lost tribes of Israel, then they would have been a civilized rather than a barbarous people when discovered. Of this he says:

Some have felt a difficulty arising against the Indians being the ten tribes, from their ignorance of the mechanic arts, of writing, and of navigation. Ancient Israel knew something of these; and some imagine that these arts being once known, could never be lost. But no objection is hence furnished against our scheme. The knowledge of mechanic arts possessed in early times has been lost by many nations. . . . And Israel in an outcast state, might as well have lost it. It seems a fact that Israel have lost it, let them be who or where they may. Otherwise, they must have been known in the civilized world.

But that the people who first migrated to this western world did possess some knowledge of the mechanic arts . . . appears from incontestable facts, which are furnished in Baron Humboldt, and in American Archaeology, such as the finding of brick, earthen ware, sculptures, some implements of iron, as well as other metals, and other tokens of considerable improvement; which furnish an argument in favour of the Indians having descended from the ten tribes. . . .

The probability then is this; that the ten tribes arriving in this continent with some knowledge of the arts of civilized life; finding themselves in a vast wilderness filled with the best of game, inviting them to the chase; most of them fell into a wandering idle hunt-life. Different clans parted from each other, lost each other, and formed separate tribes. Most of them formed a habit of this idle mode of living and were pleased with it. More sensible parts of this people associated together, to improve their knowledge of the arts; and probably continued thus for ages. From these the noted relics of civilization discovered in the west and south were furnished. But the savage tribes prevailed; and in process of time their savage jealousies and rage annihilated their more civilized brethren. And thus, as a wholly vindictive Providence would have it, and according to ancient denunciations, all were left in an “outcast” savage state. This accounts for their loss of the knowledge of letters, of the art of navigation, and of the use of iron. . . .

It is highly probable that the more civilized part of the tribes of Israel, after they settled in America, became wholly separated from the hunting and savage tribes of their brethren; that the latter lost the knowledge of their having descended from the same family with themselves; that the more civilized part continued for many centuries; that tremendous wars were frequent between them and their savage brethren, till the former became extinct.

This hypothesis accounts for the ancient works, forts, mounds, and vast enclosures, as well as tokens of a good degree of civil government, which are manifestly very ancient, and from centuries before Columbus discovered America. . . .

These partially civilized people became extinct. What account can be given of this, but that the savages extirpated them, after long and dismal wars? And nothing appears more probable than that they were the better part of the Israelites who came to this continent, who for a long time retained their knowledge of the mechanic and civil arts; while the greater part of their brethren became savage and wild. . . .

Then he adds this in conclusion of the theme:

But however vindictive the savages must have been;—however cruel and horrid in extirpating their more civilized brethren; yet it is a fact that there are many excellent traits in their original character. (pp. 171-174.)

Query: Let it be remembered that the work from which this is quoted existed from five to seven years before the publication of the Book of Mormon, and the two editions of the work flooded the New England states and New York. (Ibid., pp. 22-24)

We cannot take the space here to reprint all of B. H. Roberts’ parallels, but Hal Hougey of Pacific Publishing Company, Concord, California, has reprinted them in a pamphlet entitled “A Parallel”—The Basis of the Book of Mormon. He has also included some material of his own which tends to strengthen Roberts’ original work.

Like the Book of Mormon, the View of the Hebrews has statements concerning the color of the Indians:

Mr. Adair expresses the same opinion; and the Indians have their tradition, that in the nation from which they originally came, all were of one colour. (View of the Hebrews, 1825, p. 88)

Under the last argument he [Mr. Adair] says; “The Indian tradition says that their forefathers in very remote ages came from a far distant country, where all the people were of one colour; and that in process of time they removed eastward to their present settlements.” (Ibid., p. 152)

The Indians in other regions have brought down a tradition, that their former ancestors, away in a distant region from which they came, were white. (Ibid., p. 206)

The Book of Mormon states that the descendants of Lehi were originally white, but that the Lamanites were cursed with a dark skin:

And he had caused the cursing to come upon them, yea, even a sore cursing, because of their iniquity. . . . as they were white, and exceeding fair and delightsome, that they might not be enticing unto my people the Lord God did cause a skin of blackness to come upon them. (Book of Mormon, 2 Nephi 5:21) [1978 edition]

The Mormon writer Sidney B. Sperry makes these comments concerning View of the Hebrews:

It is true that there are some obvious parallels between Ethan Smith’s book and the Book of Mormon, but parallels can be drawn between the Nephite record and many other early American books. . . . We submit that the style and purpose of View of the Hebrews is so different from that of the Book of Mormon that any fair-minded person who examines the two must have grave doubts that Joseph Smith was any more dependent upon Ethan Smith’s book than upon a dozen other early American publications dealing with the American Indians. (The Problems of the Book of Mormon, pp. 178-179)

“Wonders of Nature”

Another book which Joseph Smith may have read before “translating” the Book of Mormon was written by Josiah Priest. It was entitled The Wonders of Nature and Providence Displayed, and was published in 1825 at Albany, New York. Josiah Priest became a well known author. In fact, the “Fifth Edition” of his work American Antiquities, printed in 1835, contained the statement that “22,000 volumes of this work have been published within thirty months. . . .” We know that Joseph Smith was familiar with Priest’s later work, American Antiquities, because he quotes from it in the Times and Seasons, vol. 3, pages 813-814.

Priest’s earlier work, The Wonders of Nature and Providence Displayed, was available in Joseph Smith’s neighborhood prior to the time the Book of Mormon was “translated.” Wesley P. Walters has sent us a photograph of an original copy of this book containing a sticker showing that it belonged to the “Manchester Library.” Walters also found that library records show that this book was checked out by a number of people during the year 1827. Therefore, it must have been well known in the area of Palmyra and Manchester where Joseph Smith lived.

The Wonders of Nature and Providence Displayed quotes extensively from Ethan Smith’s View of the Hebrews. Over thirty pages are devoted to “Proofs that the Indians of North America are lineally descended from the ancient Hebrews” (The Wonders of Nature and Providence Displayed, Albany, New York, 1825, p. 297).

Josiah Priest’s book contains a great deal of information about the Indians. It is interesting to note that his book speaks of the “isthmus of Darien” and uses the words “narrow neck of land”: “. . . a narrow neck of land is interposed betwixt two vast oceans” (The Wonders of Nature, p. 598). These same words are found in the Book of Mormon: “. . . the narrow neck of land, by the place where the sea divides the land” (Ether 10:20).

“No Traveller Returns”

The book by Josiah Priest throws new light upon a controversy regarding a quotation from William Shakespeare which is found in the Book of Mormon. Since Shakespeare was not born until 1564, we would not expect the Book of Mormon to quote from his words. Anti-Mormon writers, however, feel that they have identified a quotation from his works. This is a statement made by Lehi almost 600 years before Christ: “. . . from whence no traveler can return; . . .” (2 Nephi 1:14). Notice how similar this is to the words of Shakespeare: “. . . from whose bourn no traveller returns . . .” (Hamlet, Act 3, Scene 1, as quoted in Commentary on the Book of Mormon, vol. 1, p. 237).

The Mormon apologist Sidney B. Sperry made this statement:

Joseph Smith has been charged by many of his critics as being an impostor . . . some of them, . . . claim that he quotes words of Shakespeare in a passage of the Book of Mormon . . . And, indeed, it would seem a bit strange to learn that Lehi could quote Will Shakespeare about 2140 years before the Bard of Avon was born! . . . The Mormon people have no objection to scholars finding parallels to Shakespeare . . . We hold that Joseph Smith translated the Nephite text of the Book of Mormon and that he used the best vocabulary at his command. If such a vocabulary demonstrated a knowledge of works of Shakespeare, so much the better. But we suggest that it would be very difficult to prove that Joseph Smith was familiar with the works of Shakespeare; . . .

In fairness to critics, and in anticipation of future discussions of the problem, we wish to call attention to a particular word used in the quotations by both Lehi and Shakespeare . . .

The word we have in mind is “traveller.” It stands out like a sore thumb as far as Lehi is concerned. . . .

We are led to the conclusion that the only word that Joseph Smith might have put into Lehi’s mouth from Shakespeare, assuming he was exposed to the lines from Hamlet, is “traveller.” (The Problems of the Book of Mormon, pp. 123, 124, 128, 129)

The reader will notice that although Dr. Sperry admits that the word “traveller” might have been “put into Lehi’s mouth from Shakespeare,” he states that it “would be very difficult to prove that Joseph Smith was familiar with the works of Shakespeare; . . .” Although we have shown that “Shakespeare’s works, 10 vols.” were sold at the Wayne Bookstore in Joseph Smith’s neighborhood (Wayne Sentinel, January 26, 1825), we now have a much better idea of where Joseph Smith might have found these words. In examining Josiah Priest’s The Wonders of Nature and Providence Displayed, we found a story which quotes the words of Shakespeare. In quoting these words, however, they are in the wrong order, and this makes the end of the quotation almost identical to that in the Book of Mormon.

. . . from whence no traveler can return; . . . (Book of Mormon, 2 Nephi 1:14)

. . . from whence no traveller returns. (The Wonders of Nature, 1825, p. 464)

The reader will notice how similar the two quotations are. While it is possible that this could be a coincidence, there is additional evidence which seems to show that Joseph Smith used Priest’s work in writing the Book of Mormon.

Vapor of Darkness

On page 524 of Priest’s Wonders of Nature, we find material concerning the plague of darkness which came upon the Egyptians (see Exodus 10:21-23). This was reprinted from Clarke’s Commentary, vol. 1, pages 343-344. We find the following parallels between this material and a story found in the Book of Mormon.

1. Both Priest’s book and the Book of Mormon mention that there was darkness which could be felt.

. . . the inhabitants . . . could feel the vapor of darkness; (Book of Mormon, 3 Nephi 8:20)

Darkness which may be felt. (The Wonders of Nature, p. 524)

2. Both accounts speak of a vapor or vapors, and this is very interesting since the book of Exodus says nothing about a vapor being involved.

. . . vapor of darkness; . . . (Book of Mormon, 3 Nephi 8:20)

Probably this was occasioned by a superabundance of aqueous vapours . . . (The Wonders of Nature, p. 524)

3. Both accounts speak of a mist. The Bible story says nothing about a mist.

. . . there was thick darkness And there was not any light seen, . . . so great were the mists of darkness. (Book of Mormon, 3 Nephi 8:20, 22)

. . . aqueous vapours . . . were so thick as to prevent the rays of the sun from penetrating through them: an extraordinary thick mist, . . . (The Wonders of Nature, p. 524)

4. In both cases artificial light could not be used.

And there could be no light, because of the darkness, neither candles, neither torches; neither could there be fire kindled with their fine and exceedingly dry wood, so there could not be any light at all; (Book of Mormon, 3 Nephi 8:21)

. . . no artificial light could be procured, as the thick clammy vapours would prevent lamps, &c. from burning; . . . (The Wonders of Nature, p. 524)

5. In both cases the darkness lasted three days.

. . . it did last for the space of three days . . . (Book of Mormon, 3 Nephi 8:23)

. . . the darkness with its attendant horrors, lasted for three days. (The Wonders of Nature, p. 524)

In our Case, vol. 3, pages 91-93, we present additional evidence to show that the author of the Book of Mormon was familiar with Josiah Priest’s book.

Not Unique

We have seen that in Joseph Smith’s time many people believed that the Indians were “lineally descended from the ancient Hebrews.” A number of books were printed which endorsed this view. Thus it is plain to see that the Book of Mormon is not unique with regard to this matter.

Today, however, the idea that the Indians are Israelites has been almost abandoned. Most scientists feel that the Indian is “basically Mongoloid.” The Smithsonian Institution has issued a statement concerning the origin of the Indians and the Book of Mormon. The following is taken from that statement: “2. The physical type of the American Indian is basically Mongoloid, being most clearly related to that of the peoples of eastern, central, and northeastern Asia.”

The reaction of Mormon scholars to scientific statements that the Indians are “basically Mongoloid” has been very interesting. Franklin S. Harris, Jr., stated: “The usual view then is that the Indians are of Mongoloid origin, which means straight hair, broad cheek bones, etc. We cannot deny that many American peoples are of Mongoloid type” (The Book of Mormon Message and Evidences, by Franklin S. Harris, Jr., p. 69).

The Mormon writer Ariel L. Crowley stated:

It is beyond any question true that some of the tribes of American Indians have a wholly or partially Mongolian ancestry. Any position to the contrary would be directly in the teeth of overwhelming evidence . . . no missionary of the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints should say that all American Indians are descended from Israel. Neither is it proper to say that no American Indians are descended from Mongolian sources. . . .

It does the Church little credit for any of its members to quarrel with facts. (About the Book of Mormon, pp. 142, 145)

The following is found in a paper presented to the Thirteenth Annual Symposium on the Archaeology of the Scriptures, April 1, 1961, by Joseph E. Vincent:

There is evidence of many times as many men having entered America by means of the Bering land bridge than came with Lehi and his family. But does the average Mormon credit the present day Indian as having come from any ancestor other than Lehi and his son Laman? No, most of them do not. . . . Why do our people believe or want to believe that all Indians are descendants of Laman when there is so much evidence to show that many more people came to our shores from Northern Asia than ever came with Lehi?

“An Ignominious Death”

In our Case, vol. 2, pages 63-69, we show that the Wayne Sentinel, published in Joseph Smith’s neighborhood, may have furnished structural material for the author of the Book of Mormon. While we do not have room to present all of the information here, we will mention one interesting item. In 1827 a man by the name of Jesse Strang was hung for a murder which he had committed in Albany, N.Y. The people in New York were very upset over the murder, and a crowd estimated at “thirty thousand persons” witnessed the hanging. At least five articles were printed concerning this affair in the Wayne Sentinel. We know that the Smith family was familiar with this newspaper, for on August 11, 1826, Joseph Smith’s father was listed as a delinquent subscriber. Almost two years before Joseph Smith’s father had run an advertisement in this paper (see A New Witness For Christ in America, vol. 1, p. 16).

In the Book of Mormon we find a story concerning a wicked man named Nehor (see Alma 1:2-15). This story is very similar to the story of Jesse Strang. Below is a list of parallels:

1. Both Strang and Nehor committed a murder.
2. In both cases the victim was a righteous man.
3. Neither Strang nor Nehor held to orthodox religious beliefs nor seemed to fear eternal punishment.
4. Both appeared before a very religious judge.
5. Both Strang and Nehor were found guilty and were sentenced to death.
6. Both were taken to the place of execution and acknowledged their sin.
7. Both accounts use the expression “ignominious death.”

In the Wayne Sentinel we read:

... he was about to suffer a painful and ignominious death. (Wayne Sentinel, August 31, 1827)

In the Book of Mormon we read:

... he suffered an ignominious death. (Alma 1:15)

Although the word “ignominy” is found in Proverbs 18:3, the word “ignominious” is not found in the King James version of the Bible. It is interesting to note that the only place it appears in the Book of Mormon is in connection with the execution of Nehor. Because of the similarity of the two accounts, we feel that the story of Strang’s execution could have been the source for the story of Nehor in the Book of Mormon. (For a photograph of the Wayne Sentinel and more information concerning this matter see our Case, vol. 2, pp. 63-67.)

Joseph Smith’s Father’s Dream

Both Joseph Smith’s father and Nephi’s father (in the Book of Mormon) are reported to have had many dreams. Lucy Smith, Joseph Smith’s mother, tells several dreams that her husband had in her book Biographical Sketches of Joseph Smith the Prophet and His Progenitors for Many Generations. This book was first published in 1853. One of Joseph Smith’s father’s dreams is recorded on pages 58-59 of this book. Lucy Smith stated that her husband had this dream in 1811:

In 1811, we moved . . . to the town of Lebanon, New Hampshire. Soon after arriving here, my husband received another very singular vision, which I will relate: . . . (Biographical Sketches of Joseph Smith, p. 58)

Upon reading this dream one is struck by the similarity between it and Lehi’s dream in the Book of Mormon. Lehi’s dream is recorded in chapter 8 of 1 Nephi, and in chapter 21 of 1 Nephi his son, Nephi, has the same dream but expounds it in more detail. The following is a list of parallels between Joseph Smith’s father’s dream, as related in Biographical Sketches, and Lehi’s dream as related and further expounded by his son Nephi.

1. Both Joseph Smith’s father and Lehi state they were traveling.

And after I had traveled for the space of many hours . . . (1 Nephi 8:8)
“I thought,” said he, “I was travelling . . .” (Biographical Sketches, p. 58)
2. Both mention a field.

. . . I saw in my dream, a dark and dreary wilderness I beheld a large and spacious field. (1 Nephi 8:4, 9)
“ . . . I was traveling in an . . . open, desolate field, which appeared to be very barren.” (Biographical Sketches, p. 58)
3. Both dreams compare the field to a world.

And I also beheld . . . a large and spacious field, as if it had been a world. (1 Nephi 8:20)
 . . . an open, desolate field, . . . My guide . . . said, “This is the desolate world; . . .” (Biographical Sketches, p. 58)
4. Both Joseph Smith’s father and Lehi have a guide.

And it came to pass that I saw a man, and he bade me follow him. (1 Nephi 8:5-6)
“My guide, who was by my side, . . .” (Biographical Sketches, p. 58)
5. Both mention a broad road or roads.

. . . leadeth them away into broad roads, that they perish and are lost. (1 Nephi 12:17)
“The road was so broad and barren . . . Broad is the road, and wide is the gate that leads to death . . .” (Biographical Sketches, p. 58)
6. Both mention a narrow path.

And I also beheld a, straight and narrow path, . . . (1 Nephi 8:20)
“Traveling a short distance further, I came to a narrow path. This path I entered, . . .” (Biographical Sketches, p. 58)
7. Both mention a stream of water.

. . . I beheld a river of water; . . .” (1 Nephi 8:13)
“ . . . I beheld a beautiful stream of water . . .” (B.S. p. 58)
8. Both mention something extending along the bank of the stream.

And I beheld a rod of iron, and it extended along the bank of the river . . . (1 Nephi 8:19)
“ . . . but as far as my eyes could extend I could see a rope, running along the bank of it, . . .” (B.S., p. 58)
9. Both mention a tree.

And it came to pass that I beheld a tree, . . . (1 Nephi 8:10)
“ . . . a tree, such as I had never seen before.” (B.S., p. 58)
10. Both mention the beauty of the tree.

And I looked and beheld a tree; and it was like unto the tree which my father had seen; and the beauty thereof was far beyond, yea, exceeding of all beauty; . . . (1 Nephi 11:8)
“It was exceedingly handsome, insomuch that I looked upon it with wonder and admiration. Its beautiful branches . . .” (B.S., p. 58)
11. Both trees bore fruit.

. . . whose fruit was desirable to make one happy. (1 Nephi 8:10)
“ . . . it bore a kind of fruit, . . .” (B.S., p. 58)
12. Both compared the whiteness of the fruit to snow.

. . . the whiteness thereof did exceed the whiteness of the driven snow. (1 Nephi 11:8) . . . the fruit thereof was white, to exceed all the whiteness that I had ever seen. (1 Nephi 8:11)
“ . . . as white as snow, or, if possible, whiter. . . the fruit which they contained, which was of dazzling whiteness.” (B.S., p. 58)
13. Both Joseph Smith’s father and Lehi ate of the fruit.

. . . I did go forth and partake of the fruit . . . (1 Nephi 8:11)
“I drew near, and began to eat of it, . . .” (B.S., p. 58)

14. Both found the fruit to be very delicious.

... it was most sweet, above all that I ever before tasted. (1 Nephi 8:11)
 "... and I found it delicious beyond description." (B.S., p. 58)

15. Both wanted their families to partake of the fruit.

... I began to be desirous that my family should partake of it also;
 ... (1 Nephi 8:12)
 "As I was eating," I said in my heart, "I cannot eat this alone, I must bring my wife and children, that they may partake with me."
 (B.S., p. 58)

16. Both families came and partook of the fruit.

... they did come unto me partake of the fruit also. (1 Nephi 8:16)
 "... I went and brought my family, ... and we all commenced eating ... " (B.S., p. 58)

17. After eating the fruit both experienced great joy.

And as I partook of the fruit thereof it filled my soul with exceeding great joy; ... (1 Nephi 8:12)
 "We were exceedingly happy, insomuch that our joy could not easily be expressed." (B.S., pp. 58-59)

18. Both mention a spacious building.

And I also cast my eyes round about, and beheld, on the other side of the river of water, a great and spacious building; ... (1 Nephi 8:26)
 "... I beheld a spacious building standing opposite the valley which we were in, ..." (B.S., p. 59)

19. Both indicate the building reached high into the air.

... it stood as it were in the air, high above the earth. (1 Nephi 8:26)
 "... it appeared to reach to the very heavens." (B.S., p. 59)

20. Both buildings were filled with people.

And it was filled with people, ... (1 Nephi 8:27)
 "It was full of doors and windows, and they were all filled with people ..." (B.S., p. 59)

21. In both buildings the people were finely dressed.

... their manner of dress was exceeding fine; ... (1 Nephi 8:27)
 "... who were finely dressed." (B.S., p. 59)

22. In both cases the people in the building pointed the finger of scorn at those partaking of the fruit.

... they did point the finger of scorn at me and those that were partaking of the fruit also; ... (1 Nephi 8:33)
 "When these people observed us ... under the tree, they pointed the finger of scorn at us, ..." (B.S., p. 59)

23. Both state that they ignored the people in the building.

... but we heeded them not. (1 Nephi 8:33)
 "But their contumely we utterly disregarded." (B.S., p. 59)

24. Both state the meaning of the fruit is the pure love of God.

Knowest thou the meaning of the tree which thy father saw?
 And I answered him, saying Yea, it is the love of God, which sheddeth itself abroad in the hearts of the children of men; ... (1 Nephi 11:21-22)
 "I ... inquired ... the meaning of the fruit that was so delicious. He told me it was the pure love of God, shed abroad in the hearts of all those who love him ..." (B.S., p. 59)

25. Both state two members of the family aren't present.

... I was desirous that Laman and Lemuel should come and partake of the fruit also; ... (1 Nephi 8:17)
 "... look yonder, you have two more, and you must them also."
 (B.S., p. 59)

26. Both mention the fall of the building.

... the great and spacious building ... fell, and the fall thereof was exceeding great. (1 Nephi 11:36)
 "... I asked my guide what was the meaning of the spacious building which I saw. He replied, 'It is Babylon, it is Babylon, and it must fall.'" (B.S., p. 59)

27. Both imply that pride was connected with the building or its inhabitants.

... the great and spacious building was the pride of the world;
 ... (1 Nephi 11:36)
 "The people in the doors and building windows are the inhabitants thereof, who scorn and despise the Saints of God because of their humility." (B.S., p. 59)

Dr. Hugh Nibley, of the Brigham Young University, admits that the two dreams are similar:

It is interesting that Joseph Smith, Sr., had almost the same dream, according to his wife, who took comfort in comparing the wanderings of her own family with those of "Father Lehi." (Lehi in the Desert and The World of the Jaredites, p. 49)

In a footnote on the same page, Dr. Nibley states: "The dream is not to be minutely examined, since it is only Mother Smith's memory of a dream reported to her 34 years before."

The non-Mormon writer Hal Hougey stated:

It is here proposed that Lehi's vision ... is not original at all, but had an earlier source. This source is a dream or vision which Joseph Smith, Sr., ... experienced ... in 1811, ... Having heard the dream recounted during his youth, Joseph simply incorporated it with a couple of minor changes into the Book of Mormon as a vision of Lehi. (The Truth About the "Lehi Tree-of-Life" Stone, by Hal Hougey, Concord, California, 1963, p. 19)

M. Wells Jakeman, a Mormon writer, made this statement in rebuttal to Mr. Hougey:

Now I agree with Mr. Hougey that the similarities between Joseph Smith, Sr.'s, dream and Lehi's dream of the tree of life found in the Book of Mormon are too many of an undisputed and arbitrary nature—as he points out in his booklet, p. 24—to allow for any other explanation than that they are connected. But that Joseph Smith, Sr.'s, dream is necessarily, in view of this connection, the origin of Lehi's vision, is only an assumption that Hougey makes ... it is just as logical to assume the reverse of his postulate, namely that Lehi's vision in the Book of Mormon is the origin of Joseph Smith, Sr.'s, dream; that is (as one possible explanation), that Joseph Smith, Sr., actually did not have his dream until after the publication of the Book of Mormon in 1830 and his reading therein the vivid account of Lehi's vision of the tree of life, and that his wife Lucy misdated his dream in her book. ... Dr. Christensen of the BYU ... gives his reaction to Hougey's theory ... as follows:

I have not had the opportunity to check on Mr. Hougey's assertions with regard to this matter, but even so, what he has done is not to explain the Stela 5 Book of Mormon parallels but merely to divert the attention of the reader. I suppose it is possible for the Lord to give Tree of Life visions to as many different persons as he might wish, including the father of the Prophet Joseph Smith.

(The Society For Early Historic Archaeology, Brigham Young University, Newsletter No. 104, p. 9)

In the same article Dr. Jakeman states that Lucy Smith "did not publish her book until 1853 ... " While it is true it was not actually printed until 1853, it was written before October 8, 1845 (see History of the Church, vol. 7, p. 471).

Since we know that a great deal of the Book of Mormon is plagiarized from the Bible, it should not surprise us to find that Joseph Smith would borrow from his father's dream. Fawn Brodie made this statement:

In his first chapters Joseph borrowed from his own family traditions. His mother for many years had cherished the details of her husband's dreams, and one of these the youth incorporated wholesale into his narrative. Lehi, father of the hero Nephi, was made to have a vision that paralleled the dream of Joseph's father in minute detail. (No Man Knows My History, p. 58)

On page 43 of the same book, Mrs. Brodie made this interesting observation: "Like Joseph himself, Nephi had two elder brothers, Laman and Lemuel, and three younger, Sam, Jacob, and Joseph."

It is also interesting to note that Joseph Smith's grandfather wrote a book which may have had some influence upon the Book of Mormon (see our Case, vol. 2, pp. 111-112).

Smith Probably Qualified

Dr. Hugh Nibley made this statement: "The fundamental rule of the comparative method is, that if things resemble each other there must be some connection between them, and the closer the resemblance the closer the connection." (Improvement Era, October 1959, p. 744)

In this chapter we have used the "comparative method" to show that the Book of Mormon is a product of the nineteenth century. We have shown that there are parallels to the Book of Mormon in a dream which Joseph Smith's father had and to the newspaper to which he subscribed. We have demonstrated that the Book of Mormon contains parallels to the Westminster Confession, which was not written until 1646 A.D. We have shown that the Apocrypha contains the word "Nephi" and other important parallels. We have shown that the Book of Mormon contains hundreds of parallels to the New Testament. It also seems to quote from Shakespeare, who was not born until 1564 A.D. The anti-Masonic controversy of the 1820's is reflected in the pages of the Book of Mormon. The religious controversies which were raging in Joseph Smith's time are found in the Book of Mormon. The idea that the Indians were "the lineal descendants of the Israelites" certainly came from the thinking of Joseph Smith's time. In addition to all this we have shown that there are important parallels between the Book of Mormon and Josiah Priest's book The Wonders of Nature and Providence Displayed, which was first published in 1825 and available in Joseph Smith's own neighborhood.

Dr. Hugh Nibley states: "To the trained eye every document of considerable length is bound to betray the real setting in which it was produced" (Since Cumorah, p. 261). We feel that a careful examination of the Book of Mormon has revealed the true setting in which it was produced. That setting was not the ancient world, as Dr. Nibley has maintained, but rather the nineteenth century.

Some people have claimed that Joseph Smith could not have written the Book of Mormon because he did not have a good education. While it is true that Joseph Smith did not have a great deal of education, he was a very intelligent man and certainly had the ability to write a book.

Now that Wesley P. Walters has proven that the 1826 court record is authentic, we know that Joseph Smith was still working on his education when he was about twenty years old. On March 20, 1826, Joseph Smith testified that he "had been employed by said Stowel on his farm, and going to school" (Fraser's Magazine, February 1873, pp. 229-230). While this does not mean that Joseph Smith had advanced very far with his education, it does show that he had an interest in school. The Mormon historian B. H. Roberts said that the "affairs of the family in the early years of its residence at Palmyra, required the services of even the lad Joseph . . . so that he was largely deprived even of the small opportunities afforded by the school system of the state; . . ." (Comprehensive History of the Church, vol. 1, p. 36). Joseph Smith was probably trying to make up for his lost opportunities at Bainbridge.

In the past many Mormon writers have played down the idea that Joseph Smith could have learned much about the world or that he had access to many books. J. N. Washburn, for instance, made these statements:

Of absolutely first importance to this study, and to the Book of Mormon, is the matter of his education, his acquaintance with books, his knowledge of the world and its learning in his time.

The educational facilities of the backwoods a hundred some odd years ago were strictly limited when not actually non-existent.

What books did he know and read?

I have in my files a letter, dated April 1, 1944, from the New York State Library Board, which lists sixty-eight libraries "established in New York State during or prior to 1829." The list contains no mention of any library or library catalogue either in Palmyra or Manchester. I have been told, however, that there was a collection of a few dozen volumes in the latter community. (The Contents, Structure and Authorship of the Book of Mormon, pp. 3-4)

The Mormon writer Milton V. Backman, Jr., has done a great deal of research with regard to this matter. His research shows just the opposite of what many Mormon writers have maintained in the past:

. . . on January 14, 1817, the inhabitants of Manchester organized a library which contained histories, biographies, geographies, religious treatises, and other popular works of that age. (Joseph Smith's First Vision, Salt Lake City, 1971, p. 32)

The early Genesee settlers' zeal for knowledge is not only reflected by the appearance of a growth of newspapers but also by their establishment of libraries and bookstores throughout western New York. A library was organized in the village of Palmyra during the winter of 1822-1823. In January, 1817, also, settlers of Manchester village established a public library.

While the Smith family resided in Palmyra, many works were available in the T. C. Strong bookstore. During the month of October, 1818, for example, approximately three hundred volumes were advertised in The Palmyra Register, . . .

While many works were available in Palmyra village, countless other books and pamphlets were being sold in Canandaigua, Geneva, West Bloomfield, and other surrounding communities. As early as 1815, a proprietor in West Bloomfield advertised that he had for sale more than one thousand volumes. Therefore, while the Smith family resided in western New York, many of the publications of that age were being circulated in the area, and the ideas of many eastern intellectuals and theologians were being disseminated among the settlers of the Finger Lake country. . . .

As the population increased, new schools were established throughout the towns of Palmyra and Farmington. . . . Within the thirty-four towns of Ontario County there were at that time [1820] 434 schools with 23,439 children being taught. . . .

In the summer of 1820 an academy was opened in Palmyra village where students studied Latin and Greek. . . .

Even though young Joseph was probably not an avid reader and received a meager formal education, he was a humble, inquisitive youth who sought knowledge concerning the world in which he lived and God's plan of salvation. (Ibid., pp. 48-51)

From this it is apparent that Joseph Smith had access to a great deal of source material from which he could have written the Book of Mormon.

A document by Joseph Smith which was suppressed by the Mormon leaders for over 130 years throws important light on the question of the authorship of the Book of Mormon. This document was brought to light in a thesis by Paul Cheesman at Brigham Young University and published in our Case, vol. 1, pages 100-104. When we first saw this document we were impressed by the similarity of its style to that found in the Book of Mormon. For instance, Joseph Smith commenced his story by stating:

. . . I was born in the town of Sharon in the state of Vermont North America on the twenty third day of December AD 1805 of goodly parents . . . ("An Analysis of the Accounts Relating Joseph Smith's Early Visions," M.A. Thesis, Brigham Young University, May 1965, p. 127, line 15)

This sentence has a familiar ring to those who have read the Book of Mormon. The Book of Mormon begins as follows: "I, Nephi, having been born of goodly parents, . . ." (1 Nephi 1:1).

On line 24 of page 127, Joseph Smith uses the words "Suffice it to Say"; these words are similar to the words "For it sufficeth me to say," which are found in 1 Nephi 6:2. Joseph Smith uses the words "immortal Soul" on pages 127 and 128; these words are also found in the Book of Mormon, Mosiah 2:38. On line 6 of page 128 of the thesis Joseph Smith uses the phrase "grief to my soul." This is very similar to the phrase "grieveth my soul" found in the Book of Mormon, 2 Nephi 26:11. On the next line Joseph Smith uses the phrase "pondered many things in my heart." This is similar to the phrase "ponder somewhat in your hearts" found in the Book of Mormon, 2 Nephi 32:1.

Other examples could be cited, but this should be sufficient to convince the reader that the style found in this document is similar to that found in the Book of Mormon. One thing that is very interesting to note is that small portions of scripture are woven into this document in the same manner that we find in the Book of Mormon (see our Case, vol. 1, pp. 101-104). This document certainly shows that Joseph Smith was capable of writing the Book of Mormon.

Changes in the Book of Mormon

In 1965 we published a photographic reproduction of the first edition of the Book of Mormon showing that thousands of changes were made in the text since it was first published. We published this study under the title 3,913 Changes in the Book of Mormon. While most of the changes are related to the correction of grammatical and spelling errors, there are some that change the meaning of the text.

The Mormon Apostle John A. Widtsoe once stated: "The Book of Mormon, . . . has been published in large editions. It would not be possible to change any part of it without being discovered" (Joseph Smith—Seeker After Truth, p. 251). The Mormon leaders seem to have a difficult time facing the truth with regard to the changes in the Book of Mormon. Joseph Fielding Smith, who recently became the tenth President of the Mormon Church, made these statements at a conference held in 1961:

During the past week or two I have received a number of letters from different parts of the United States written by people, some of whom at least are a little concerned because they have been approached by enemies of the Church and enemies of the Book of Mormon, who had made the statement that there have been one or two or more thousand changes in the Book of Mormon since the first edition was published. Well, of course, there is no truth in that statement.

It is true that when the Book of Mormon was printed the printer was a man who was unfriendly. The publication of the book was done under adverse circumstances, and there were a few errors, mostly typographical—conditions that arise in most any book that is being published—but there was not one thing in the Book of Mormon or in the second edition or any other edition since that in any way contradicts the first edition, and such changes as were made were made by the Prophet Joseph Smith because under those adverse conditions the Book of Mormon was published. But there was no change of doctrine.

Now, these sons of Belial who circulate these reports evidently know better. I will not use the word that is in my mind. (The Improvement Era, December 1961, pp. 924-925)

Joseph Fielding Smith's statement is certainly far from the truth (see our publication 3,913 Changes in the Book of Mormon). As to his statement that the man who printed the first edition was unfriendly and allowed errors to creep into the book, the famous Mormon Historian B. H. Roberts has already stated that the first edition of the Book of Mormon was "singularly free from typographical errors" and that the printer could not be blamed for the many mistakes that are found in the Book of Mormon:

That errors of grammar and faults in dictation do exist in the Book of Mormon (and more especially and abundantly in the first edition) must be conceded; and what is more, while some of the errors may be referred to inefficient proof-reading, such as is to be expected in a country printing establishment, yet such is the nature of the errors in question, and so interwoven are they throughout the diction of the Book, that they may not be disposed of by saying they result from inefficient proof-reading or referring them to the mischievous disposition of the "typos" or the unfriendliness of the publishing house. The errors are constitutional in their character; they are of the web and woof of the style, and not such errors as may be classed as typographical. Indeed, the first edition of the Book of Mormon is singularly free from typographical errors. (Defense of the Faith, by B. H. Roberts, pp. 280-281; reprinted in A New Witness For Christ in America, by Francis W. Kirkham, v. 1, pp. 200-201)

John H. Gilbert, the man who helped to print the Book of Mormon, claimed that the Mormons did not want him to correct the grammatical errors which were in the manuscript (see 3,913 Changes in the Book of Mormon, Introduction, p. 2). A photograph of the original manuscript of the Book of Mormon which is published in the book A New Witness For Christ in America, vol. 1, page 216, proves that the printer was not responsible for the grammatical errors which appeared in the first edition. A comparison reveals that the 1964 edition differs from the 1830 edition in four places, and that in all four places the manuscript agrees with the 1830 edition and not the 1964 edition.

According to Joseph Smith's testimony there should not have been any reason to make changes in the Book of Mormon. He stated that when he and the witnesses went out to pray concerning it we heard a voice from out of the bright light above us, saying, "These plates have been revealed by the power of God, and they have been translated by the power of God. The translation of them which you have seen is correct, and I command you to bear record of what you now see and hear." (History of the Church, vol. 1, pp. 54-55)

On another occasion Joseph Smith stated that he "told the brethren that the Book of Mormon was the most correct of any book on earth, . . ." (Ibid., vol. 4, p. 461).

For many years the Mormons taught that the Lord had given Joseph Smith a perfect translation of the Book of Mormon, and that all of the errors were errors which were made by the Nephites on the original plates. David Whitmer, one of the three witnesses to the Book of Mormon, made this statement:

I will now give you a description of the manner in which the Book of Mormon was translated. Joseph Smith would put the seer stone into a hat, drawing it closely around his face to exclude the light; and in the darkness the spiritual light would shine. A piece of something resembling parchment would appear, and on that appeared the writing. One character at a time would appear, and under it was the interpretation in English. (An Address To All Believers In Christ, by David Whitmer, p. 12)

Martin Harris (another of the three witnesses) claimed that Joseph Smith received the translation directly from God, and that it was a perfect translation. George Reynolds quotes the following from a letter written to the Deseret News by Edward Stevenson:

"Martin explained the translation as follows: By aid of the seer stone, sentences would appear and were read by the prophet and written by Martin, and when finished he would say, 'Written,' and if correctly written, that sentence would disappear and another appear in its place but if not written correctly it remained until corrected, so that the translation was just as it was engraven on the plates, precisely in the language then used." (Myth of the Manuscript Found, 1883, p. 91)

Oliver B. Huntington recorded in his journal that in 1881 Joseph F. Smith, who became the sixth President of the Mormon Church, taught that the Lord gave Joseph Smith the exact English wording and spelling that he should use in the Book of Mormon:

Saturday Feb. 25, 1881, I went to Provo to a quarterly Stake Conference. Heard Joseph F. Smith describe the manner of translating the Book of Mormon by Joseph Smith the Prophet and Seer, which was as follows as near as I can recollect the substance of his description. Joseph did not render the writing on the gold plates into the English language in his own style of language as many people believe, but every word and every letter was given to him by the gift and power of God. So it is the work of God and not of Joseph Smith, and it was done in this way. . . . The Lord caused each word spelled as it is in the book to appear on the stones in short sentences or words, and when Joseph had uttered the sentence or word before him and the scribe had written it properly, that sentence would disappear and another appear. And if there was a word wrongly written or even a letter incorrect the writing on the stones would remain there. Then Joseph would require the scribe to spell the reading of the last spoken and thus find the mistake and when corrected the sentence would disappear as usual. (Journal of Oliver B. Huntington, typed copy at Utah State Historical Society; photo of original in authors' files)

The anti-Mormon writers criticized the grammar of the Book of Mormon stating that God could not make the many grammatical mistakes found in the Book of Mormon. Finally, the Mormon Church leaders became so embarrassed about the grammar that they decided to abandon the idea that God gave Joseph Smith the English that is found in the Book of Mormon; their new idea was that God just gave Joseph Smith the idea and that he expressed it in his own words. The Mormon Historian B. H. Roberts made this statement:

If . . . it is insisted that the divine instrument, Urim and Thummim, did all, and the prophet nothing—at least nothing more than to read off the translation made by Urim and Thummim—then the divine instrument is responsible for such errors in grammar and diction as did occur. But this is to assign responsibility for errors in language to a divine instrumentality, which amounts to assigning such errors to God. But that is unthinkable, not to say blasphemous. Also, if it be contended that the language of the Book of Mormon, word for word, and letter for letter, was given to the prophet by direct inspiration of God, acting upon his mind, then again God is made responsible for the language errors in the Book of Mormon—a thing unthinkable.

Rather than ascribe these errors to Deity, either through direct or indirect means, men will reject the claims of the Book of Mormon; and, since the verbal errors in the Book of Mormon are such as one ignorant of the English language would make, the temptation is strong, in the minds of those not yet converted to its truth, to assign to the Book of Mormon an altogether human origin. . . .

Are these flagrant errors in grammar chargeable to the Lord? To say so is to invite ridicule. The thoughts, the doctrines, are well enough; but the awkward, ungrammatical expression of the thoughts is doubtless, the result of the translator's imperfect knowledge of the English language, . . . that old theory cannot be successfully maintained; that is, the Urim and Thummim did the translating, the Prophet, nothing beyond repeating what he saw reflected in that instrument; that God directly or indirectly is responsible for the verbal and grammatical errors of translation. To advance such a theory before intelligent and educated people is to unnecessarily invite ridicule, and make of those who advocate it candidates for contempt. . . .

It is no use resisting the matter, the old theory must be abandoned. It could only come into existence and remain so long and now be clung to by some so tenaciously because our fathers and our people in the past and now were and are uncritical. (Defense of the Faith, by B. H. Roberts, vol. 1, pp. 278, 279, 295, 306-308)

B. H. Roberts claimed that since God did not give the English found in the Book of Mormon, the church leaders had a right to make changes in it:

Many errors, verbal and grammatical, have already been eliminated in the later English editions, and there is no valid reason why every-one of those that remain should not be eliminated, . . . There is no good reason why we should not have just as good a Book of Mormon in the English language as they now have in the French, the German, the Swedish and the Danish, . . . for in these translations, it has not been thought necessary to perpetuate the English errors; nor do I believe it necessary to perpetuate them in our English editions . . . the present writer hopes that he will live to see those verbal and grammatical changes authorized. (Defense of the Faith, vol. 1, pp. 300-301)

As we have already shown, President Joseph Fielding Smith claims that “such changes as were made were made by the Prophet Joseph Smith.” While it is true that Joseph Smith made most of the changes, many changes were made after his death. Dr. Sidney B. Sperry, of the Brigham Young University, admits that Dr. Talmage made many of the changes in 1920:

The writer happens to know that Dr. Talmage was a stickler for good English and a close student of the text of the Book of Mormon. He knew as well as anyone the imperfections of the literary dress of the First Edition of the Nephite record and took a prominent part in correcting many of them in a later edition of the work (1920). (The Problems of the Book of Mormon, p. 190)

The four most important changes in the Book of Mormon are related to the doctrine of a plurality of Gods, and therefore we will deal with them in Chapter 9.

Another important change was made in Mosiah 21:28. In this verse the name of the king has been changed from Benjamin to Mosiah. In the 1830 edition of the Book of Mormon we read as follows:

. . . king Benjamin had a gift from God, whereby he could interpret such engravings; . . . (Book of Mormon, 1830 edition, p. 200)

In modern editions of the Book of Mormon this verse has been changed to read:

. . . king Mosiah had a gift from God, whereby he could interpret such engravings; . . . (Book of Mormon, 1964 edition, Mosiah 21:28)

It would appear from chronology found in the Book of Mormon (see Mosiah 6:3-7 and 7:1), king Benjamin should have been dead at this time, and therefore the Mormon Church leaders evidently felt that it was best to change the king's name to Mosiah. Dr. Sidney B. Sperry, of the Brigham Young University, made this comment concerning this change:

In Mr. Budvarson's photo reproduction (p. 21) of page 200 of the First Edition he takes pains to underline “king Benjamin” and points out that in later editions it was changed to read “king Mosiah.” (Cf. Mos. 21:28) Budvarson is correct in this; the prophet Joseph Smith did change the reading in the Second (1837) Edition despite the fact that the original manuscript reads “king Benjamin.” . . . The change raises an interesting question, Who was responsible for the reading, “king Benjamin,” in the first place? Was it an inadvertent slip of the tongue on the part of Joseph Smith as he dictated his translation to Oliver Cowdery, or did he translate correctly enough an original error on the part of Mormon, the abridger of the Book of Mormon? The last of these suggestions is probably the correct one, for the fact remains that the reading “king Benjamin” is an out-and-out error, because the king had been dead for some time, and his son Mosiah was his successor with a “gift from God.” (See Mos. 6:4-5; 8:13.) What we have here, Mr. Budvarson, is an example of another human error that Joseph Smith was glad to correct. (The Problems of the Book of Mormon, p. 203)

Five things should be noted concerning Dr. Sperry's statement. First, he admits that the king's name was changed from Benjamin to Mosiah. Second, Dr. Sperry admits that the "original manuscript reads 'king Benjamin.'" Third, he states that it "probably" read Benjamin on the original gold plates. Fourth, Dr. Sperry admits that the reading "king Benjamin" would have made a contradiction in the Book of Mormon because king Benjamin "had been dead for some time." Fifth, Dr. Sperry states that Joseph Smith deliberately altered this to eliminate the contradiction. It is very strange that Dr. Sperry would make such an admission. In other words, Dr. Sperry is admitting that the Mormon Church leaders deliberately falsified this verse to eliminate a contradiction. Dr. Sperry is not only admitting this, but he is also trying to justify their action. On page 191 of his book, Dr. Sperry states:

Our leaders are generally well justified in making the changes that have appeared in later editions of the Nephite sacred record. (The Problems of the Book of Mormon, p. 191)

Another change involving the names of Benjamin and Mosiah is found in the book of Ether. On page 546 of the first edition of the Book of Mormon we read: "... for this cause did king Benjamin keep them, ..." In the 1964 edition (Ether 4:1) this has been changed to read: "... for this cause did king Mosiah keep them, ..."

A change has been made in the First Book of Nephi, evidently in an attempt to strengthen the Mormon claim that baptism was practiced by the people in the Old Testament. This verse is taken from Isaiah 48, and appears as follows in the 1830 edition of the Book of Mormon (p. 52):

Hearken and hear this, O house of Jacob, which are called by the name of Israel, and are come forth out of the waters of Judah, which swear by the name of the Lord, ...

In modern editions it has been changed to read:

Hearken and hear this, O house of Jacob, who are called by the name of Israel, and are come forth out of the waters of Judah, or out of the waters of baptism, who swear by the name of the Lord, ... (Book of Mormon, 1964 Ed., 1 Nephi 20:1)

Notice that the clause, "or out of the waters of baptism," has been added. Richard P. Howard's new book, Restoration Scriptures, page 117, plainly shows that these words did not appear in the original handwritten manuscript. Even Dr. Hugh Nibley admits that the clause did not originally appear in the Book of Mormon:

... the second edition of the Book of Mormon contains an addition not found in the first: "... out of the waters of Judah, or out of the waters of baptism." It is said that Parley P. Pratt suggested the phrase, and certainly Joseph Smith approved it, for it stands in all the early editions after the first. Those added words are not only permissible—they are necessary. ... Isaiah did not have to tell his ancient hearers that he had the waters of baptism in mind, but it is necessary to tell it to the modern reader who without such an explanation would miss the point—for him the translation would be a misleading one without that specification. (Since Cumorah, p. 151)

While this clause concerning baptism was apparently added to the second edition of the Book of Mormon, the Mormon leaders must have been confused about it, for it does not appear in the 1888 printing of the Book of Mormon:

Hearken and hear this, O house of Jacob, who are called by the name of Israel, and are come forth out of the waters of Judah, who swear by the name of the Lord, ... (Book of Mormon, 1888, p. 50)

Thus we see that the clause concerning baptism was not in the original handwritten manuscript of the Book of Mormon, nor was it in the first edition. Even as late as 1888 the Mormon leaders were still uncertain about it, for it was not included in the edition printed that year.

Although Dr. Nibley tries to justify this change, he does not attempt to defend some of the changes. He states:

Sometimes the editors of later editions of the Book of Mormon have made "corrections" that were better left unmade. Thus one officious editor in his attempt to visualize and rationalize a practical system of ventilation for the Jaredite barges omitted a number of significant words from the first edition which if carefully analyzed seem to give a far better plan for air-conditioning than that found in Ether 2:17-20 of our present editions. And was it necessary to change the name of Benjamin (in the first edition) to Mosiah in later editions of Ether 4:1? Probably not, for though it is certain that Mosiah kept the records in question, it is by no means certain that his father, Benjamin, did not also have a share in keeping them. (Since Cumorah, p. 7)

The reader will notice that Dr. Nibley accuses some "officious editor" of deleting words from the Book of Mormon. It is hard for us to believe that anyone could change the text of the Book of Mormon without the full approval of the Mormon leaders.

It is interesting to note that even the signed statement by the eight witnesses to the Book of Mormon has been altered. In the 1830 edition (last page) it read:

... Joseph Smith, Jr. the author and proprietor of this work, has shewn unto us the plates ...

In modern editions it has been changed to read:

... Joseph Smith, Jun., the translator of this work, has shown unto us the plates ...

In the first edition of the Book of Mormon, page 87, this statement appears:

... the mean man boweth down, ...

In modern editions (2 Nephi 12:9) this has been changed to read:

... the mean man boweth not down, ...

In the first edition, page 303, this statement is made concerning God:

... yea, I know that he alloteth unto men, yea, decreeth unto them decrees which are unalterable, according to their wills; ...

In modern editions (Alma 29:4) eight words have been deleted:

... yea, I know that he alloteth unto men according to their wills, ...

The deletion of the words stating that God's decrees are "unalterable" makes this portion of the Book of Mormon more in harmony with Mormon theology, for in a revelations given in 1831 the Lord was supposed to have told Joseph Smith the following:

Wherefore I, the Lord, command and revoke, as it seemeth me good; and all this to be answered upon the heads of the rebellious, saith the Lord.

Wherefore, I revoke the commandment which was given unto my servants Thomas B. Marsh and Ezra Thayre, and give a new commandment unto my servant Thomas, ... (Doctrine and Covenants 56:4-5)

In the first edition of the Book of Mormon (page 328) the following appears:

... preserve these directors. ... these directors were prepared, that the word of God might be fulfilled, ...

In modern editions (Alma 37:21, 24) this has been changed to read:

... preserve these interpreters. ... these interpreters were prepared that the word of God might be fulfilled, ...

The "interpreters" in the Book of Mormon were used for interpreting languages, whereas the "director" was a ball which was used as a compass—the Lord was supposed to make a spindle in the ball point in the direction the people should go. It is very interesting to note that the 1888 edition of the Book of Mormon reads the same as the first edition.

The first edition of the Book of Mormon plainly shows that it was written by a man who did not have a great deal of education, although we must admit that the writer had ability and imagination. On page 31 of the first edition we read: “. . . neither will the Lord God suffer that the Gentiles shall forever remain in that state of awful woundedness . . .” In modern editions (1 Nephi 13:32) this was changed to read: “Neither will the Lord God suffer that the Gentiles shall forever remain in that awful state of blindness, . . .”

On page 214 of the first edition we read: “My soul was wrecked with eternal torment; . . .” This has been changed to read as follows in modern editions (Mosiah 27:29): “My soul was racked with eternal torment; . . .”

On page 342 of the first edition we find: “. . . took the remainder part of his army and marched . . .” In modern reprints, Alma 43:25, this was changed to read: “. . . took the remaining part of his army and marched . . .” One of the most frequent mistakes in the first edition of the Book of Mormon is the use of the word “was” instead of the word “were.” The following are extracts from the first edition of the Book of Mormon in which the word “was” has been changed in later editions to “were”:

- . . . Adam and Eve, which was our first parents; . . . (p. 15)
- . . . and loosed the bands which was upon my wrists. . . . (p. 49)
- And great was the covenants of the Lord, . . . (p. 66)
- . . . and they were surrounded by the king’s guard, and was taken, and was bound, and was committed to prison. (p. 169)
- . . . and these interpreters was doubtless prepared . . . (p. 173)
- . . . and the seats which was set apart for the high priests, which was above all the other seats, . . . (p. 178)
- . . . the arms of mercy was extended towards them: for the arms of mercy was extended . . . (p. 189)
- . . . both Alma and Helam was buried in the water; . . . (p. 192)
- . . . the priests was not to depend . . . (p. 193)
- . . . those that was with him. (p. 195)
- . . . there was seven Churches . . . (p. 209)
- . . . there was many . . . (p. 209)
- . . . the sons of Mosiah was numbered . . . (p. 212)
- . . . I had much desire that ye was not in the state of dilemma . . . (p. 241)
- . . . they was angry with me, . . . (p. 248)
- . . . there was no wild beasts. . . (p. 460)

There are also many places where the word “were” has been changed to “was.” The following are extracts from the first edition:

- . . . but it all were vain: . . . (p. 142)
- . . . the promise of the Lord were, . . . (p. 359)
- . . . it were easy to guard them . . . (p. 375)
- . . . there were continual rejoicing . . . (p. 414)
- Behold I were about to write them . . . (p. 506)
- . . . and I were forbidden that I should preach unto them: . . . (p. 519)

Another common mistake in the first edition of the Book of Mormon is the use of the word “is” when it should read “are.” The following are extracts from the first edition in which the word “is” has been changed to “are” in later editions:

- . . . the tender mercies of the Lord is over all . . . (p. 7)
- . . . there is save it be, two churches: . . . (p. 33)
- . . . the words which is expedient . . . (p. 67)
- But great is the promises of the Lord . . . (p. 85)
- And whoredoms is an abomination . . . (p. 127)
- . . . his judgments, which is just; . . . (p. 150)
- Behold, here is the waters of Mormon; . . . (p. 192)
- . . . things which is not seen, . . . (p. 315)
- . . . here is our weapons of war; . . . (p. 346)

In the following extracts from the first edition of the Book of Mormon the word “much” has been changed to “many” in later editions:

- . . . and wild goats, and also much horses. (p. 145)
- . . . and destroy the souls of much people. (p. 217)

In the following extracts from the first edition of the Book of Mormon the word “had” has been deleted and the words “not ought” have been rearranged to “ought not” in later editions:

- . . . lest he should look for that he had not ought and he should perish. (p. 173)
- And he told them that these things had not ought to be; . . . (p. 220)
- . . . and that they had not ought to murder, . . . (p. 289)
- I had not ought to harrow up in my desires, . . . (p. 303)

Another common mistake in the first edition is the use of the word “a” where it was not necessary. In the following extracts from the first edition the word “a” has been deleted in later editions:

- As I was a journeying . . . (p. 249)
- And as I was a going thither, . . . (p. 249)
- . . . as Ammon and Lamoni was a journeying thither, . . . (p. 280)
- . . . he found Muloki a preaching . . . (p. 284)
- . . . a begging for his food. (p. 309)
- . . . had been a preparing the minds . . . (p. 358)
- . . . had obtained a possession of the city . . . (p. 373)
- . . . Moroni was a coming against them, . . . (p. 403)
- . . . the Lamanites a marching . . . (p. 529)

In the following extracts from the first edition of the Book of Mormon the word “for” has been deleted in later editions:

- . . . did gather themselves together for to sing, . . . (p. 196)
- . . . they did prepare for to meet them; . . . (p. 225)
- . . . their many struggles for to destroy them, . . . (p. 299)
- . . . for to buy and to sell, . . . (p. 422)
- . . . we depend upon them for to teach us the word; . . . (p. 451)
- . . . they did cast up mighty heaps of earth for to get ore, . . . (p. 560)

On page 260 of the first edition the following statement appears: “Behold, the Scriptures are before you; if ye will arrest them, it shall be to your own destruction.” In modern editions (Alma 13:20) this has been changed to read: “Behold, the scriptures are before you; if ye will wrest them it shall be to your own destruction.

A similar mistake is found on page 336 of the first edition: “. . . some have arrested the Scriptures, . . .” In modern printings (Alma 41:1) this has been changed to read: “. . . some have wrested the scriptures, . . .”

The following are extracts from the first edition of the Book of Mormon. The word “arriven” has been changed to “arrived” in later editions:

- . . . when they had arriven in the borders of the land . . . (p. 270)
- . . . wo unto this people, because of this time which has arriven, . . . (p. 443)

In the following extracts from the first edition the word “respects” has been changed to “respect” in later editions:

- . . . having no respects to persons . . . (p. 224)
- . . . without any respects of persons . . . (p. 268)

The following extracts are from the first edition of the Book of Mormon. The word “wrote” has been changed to “written” in later editions:

- And thus ended the record of Alma, which was wrote upon the plates of Nephi. (p. 347)
- . . . I have wrote unto you somewhat . . . (p. 377)
- . . . therefore I have wrote this epistle, . . . (p. 457)
- . . . I have wrote them to the intent . . . (p. 506)

The following are extracts from the first edition. The expression “exceeding afraid” has been changed to “exceedingly afraid” in later editions:

... they were exceeding fraid; . . . (p. 354)
 ... they were exceeding fraid, lest there was a plan laid . . . (p. 392)
 ... the Lamanites were exceeding fraid, . . . (p. 415)

On page 74 of the first edition this statement appears: “. . . my brother hath desired me that I should speak unto you.” In modern printings (2 Nephi 6:4) this has been changed to read: “. . . my brother has desired that I should speak unto you.”

The following are extracts from the first edition of the Book of Mormon. The word “began” has been changed to “begun” in later editions:

... it had sprang forth, and began to bear fruit. (p. 132)
 ... they had began to possess the land of Amulon, and had began to till the ground. (p. 204)
 ... they had began to settle the affairs . . . (p. 368)
 ... had began his march . . . (p. 372)
 ... the church had began to dwindle; . . . (p. 417)

On page 568 of the first edition this statement appears: “. . . the people upon all the face of the land were a shedding blood, and there was none to constrain them.” In modern printings (Ether 13:31) this has been changed to read: “. . . the people upon the face of the land were shedding blood, and there was none to restrain them.”

The following are extracts from the first edition. The word “done” has been changed to “did” in later editions:

... this he done that he might overthrow . . . (p. 140)
 ... all this he done, . . . (p. 170)
 ... this they done throughout all the land. (p. 220)
 ... this he done that he might subject them . . . (p. 225)

On page 138 of the first edition this statement appears: “. . . and the fruit were equal; . . .” In modern printings (Jacob 5:74) this has been changed to read: “. . . and the fruits were equal; . . .”

The extracts that follow are from the first edition; the word “took” has been changed to “taken” in later editions:

... we have took of their wine, . . . (p. 379)
 ... they had took them . . . (p. 402)
 ... the people of Nephi, which had some years before gone over unto the Lamanites, and took upon themselves the name of Lamanites; . . . (p. 438)

The extracts that follow are from the first edition; the word “gave” has been changed to “given” in later editions:

... and had gave them power . . . (p. 380)
 ... even as I have broken bread, and blessed it, and gave it unto you. (p. 490)

On page 141 of the first edition we read: “. . . neither hath been, nor never will be.” In the modern edition (Jacob 7:9) this has been changed to read: “. . . neither has been, nor ever will be.”

The extracts that follow are from the first edition; the word “no” has been changed to “any” in later editions:

... have not sought gold nor silver, nor no manner of riches of you; . . . (p. 157)
 ... there shall be no other name given, nor no other way nor means . . . (p. 161)
 ... they did not fight against God no more, . . . (p. 290)
 ... nor murders, nor no manner of lasciviousness: . . . (p. 515)
 ... neither were there Lamanites, nor no manner of Ites; . . . (p. 515)

On page 289 of the first edition this statement appears: “. . . or Omner, or Himni, nor neither of their brethren . . .” In the modern edition (Alma 23:1) this has been changed to read: “. . . or Omner, or Himni, nor either of their brethren . . .”

The two extracts that follow are from the first edition of the Book of Mormon; the word “an” has been deleted in later editions.

And behold, they would have carried this plan into an effect, . . . (p. 365)

... we were desirous to bring a stratagem into an effect upon them; . . . (p. 384)

On the title page of the first edition (which was supposed to have been translated from the gold plates) this statement appears: “. . . now if there be fault, it be the mistake of men; . . .” In the current printing this has been changed to read: “. . . now, if there are faults they are the mistakes of men; . . .”

Lost Book of Lehi

The first edition of the Book of Mormon, published in 1830, contains a “Preface” by “The Author.” This “Preface” has been completely removed from later editions. It was apparently embarrassing to the Mormon leaders, for it told how Joseph Smith had lost the “Book of Lehi”:

PREFACE.

To the Reader—

As many false reports have been circulated respecting the following work, and also many unlawful measures taken by evil designing persons to destroy me, and also the work, I would inform you that I translated, by the gift and power of God, and caused to be written, one hundred and sixteen pages, the which I took from the Book of Lehi, which was an account abridged from the plates of Lehi, by the hand of Mormon; which said account, some person or persons have stolen and kept from me, notwithstanding my utmost exertions to recover it again—and being commanded of the Lord that I should not translate the same over again, for Satan had put it into their hearts to tempt the Lord their God, by altering the words, that they did read contrary from that which I translated and caused to be written: and if I should bring forth the same words again, or, in other words, if I should translate the same over again, they would publish that which they had stolen, and Satan would stir up the hearts of this generation, that they might not receive this work: but behold the Lord said unto me, I will not suffer that Satan shall accomplish his evil design in this thing: therefore thou shalt translate from the plates of Nephi, until ye come to that which ye have translated, which ye have; and behold ye shall publish it as the record of Nephi; and thus I will confound those who have altered my words. I will not suffer that they shall destroy my work; yea, I will shew unto them that my wisdom is greater than the cunning of the Devil. Wherefore, to be obedient unto the commandments of God, I have, through his grace and mercy, accomplished that which he hath commanded me respecting this thing. I would also inform you that the plates of which hath been spoken, were found in the township of Manchester, Ontario county, New-York.

The Author.

Joseph Smith’s mother gave this information concerning the lost “Book of Lehi”:

Martin Harris, having written some one hundred and sixteen pages for Joseph, asked permission of my son to carry the manuscript home with him, in order to let his wife read it, . . .

Joseph . . . inquired of the Lord to know if he might do as Martin Harris had requested, but was refused. . . . Joseph inquired again, but received a second refusal. Still, Martin Harris persisted as before, and Joseph applied again, but the last answer was not like the two former ones. In this the Lord permitted Martin Harris to take the manuscript home with him, on condition that he would exhibit it to none, save five individuals . . . Mr. Harris had been absent nearly three weeks, and Joseph had received no intelligence whatever from him, which was altogether aside of the arrangement when they separated. . . . we saw him [Harris] walking with a slow and measured tread towards the house, . . . we sat down to the table, Mr. Harris with the rest. . . . Mr. Harris pressed his hands upon his temples, and cried out, in a tone of deep anguish, “Oh, I have lost my soul! I have lost my soul!”

Joseph, who had not expressed his fears till now, sprang from the table, exclaiming, “Martin, have you lost that manuscript? . . .

“Yes, it is gone,” replied Martin, “and I know not where.”

“Oh, my God!” said Joseph, clinching his hands. “All is lost! all is lost! What shall I do? I have sinned—it is I who tempted the wrath of God. . . .” He wept and groaned, and walked the floor continually. . . . sobs and groans, and the most bitter lamentations filled the house. . . . Joseph . . . continued, pacing back and forth, meantime weeping and grieving, until about sunset, . . .

The manuscript has never been found; and there is no doubt but Mrs. Harris took it from the drawer, with the view of retaining it, until another translation should be given, then, to alter the original translation, for the purpose of showing a discrepancy between them, and thus make the whole appear to be a deception. (Biographical Sketches of Joseph Smith the Prophet, pp. 117, 118, 120-123)

Arthur Budvarson makes these interesting comments concerning the removal of the “Preface” which told of the loss of the “Book of Lehi”:

This “Preface” of the 1830 Edition (omitted in later editions) explains how, “one hundred and sixteen pages” of the original translation were stolen by “designing persons.”

This afforded a remarkable opportunity for Joseph Smith to have proven to the world that the work was true. All he needed to do was to reproduce an exact copy of the stolen pages, then perhaps even the thieves would have been converted! (The stolen pages were written in longhand and any alterations could have been easily detected.)

But Joseph had failed to make a copy of his writings, so it was not possible for him to make an exact duplicate. In order to get around this, he says that God commanded him that he “should not translate the same over again . . .”

This one incident alone (the above “Preface” by the “Author”) furnishes positive proof that the Book of Mormon is not a God-given, angel protected book! (The Book of Mormon Examined, La Mesa, Calif., 1959, pp. 13-14)

Sidney B. Sperry, of Brigham Young University, has attempted to reply to Mr. Budvarson’s charges:

Now, there might be some logic to Mr. Budvarson’s allegations if Joseph Smith had translated the Book of Mormon in the mechanical fashion suggested by David Whitmer and dealt with in our previous chapter. But Joseph Smith did not simply read off a word-for-word translation dictated by a divine source. If the translation had been effected in that manner, he doubtless could have reproduced an “exact copy of the stolen pages” for the thieves who had purloined the manuscript. Since he did not make a mechanical translation, he was in the position of any translator who would find it impossible to reproduce exactly his original translation, amounting to one hundred and sixteen pages in longhand. Another translation could reproduce the sense of the original but would not duplicate it word for word. The Lord knew this, and therefore instructed the prophet to translate other plates that gave a somewhat parallel but more spiritual account than that contained in the hundred and sixteen pages of stolen material. Thus we see again how Mr. Budvarson’s case breaks down . . . he is making woefully extravagant claims. He is whistling in the dark—in the dark cemetery of his alleged “proofs.” (The Problems of the Book of Mormon, p. 196)

From Dr. Sperry’s statement it would appear that he has missed the whole point of Joseph Smith’s “Preface” to the first edition of the Book of Mormon. The “Preface” indicates that Joseph Smith could “bring forth the same words again,” but that if he did his enemies would alter the words in the stolen manuscript so that they would “read contrary from that which I translated . . .”

Although the “Preface” concerning the lost “Book of Lehi” has been deleted, the Doctrine and Covenants still contains a revelation which plainly shows that Dr. Sperry is wrong concerning this matter:

Now, behold, I say unto you, that because you delivered up those writings . . . into the hands of a wicked man, you have lost them.

And you also lost your gift at the same time, and your mind became darkened. . . .

And, behold, Satan hath put it into their hearts to alter the words which you have caused to be written, or which you have translated, which have gone out of your hands. . . .

Behold, I say unto you, that you shall not translate again those words which have gone forth out of your hands;

For, behold, they shall not accomplish their evil designs in lying against those words. For, behold, if you should bring forth the same words they will say that you have lied and that you have pretended to translate, but that you have contradicted yourself.

And, behold, they will publish this, and Satan will harden the hearts of the people to stir them up to anger against you, that they will not believe my words. (Doctrine and Covenants 10:1, 2, 10, 30-32)

The revelation published in the Doctrine and Covenants and the “Preface” found in the first edition of the Book of Mormon both seem to teach exactly the opposite of what Dr. Sperry would have us believe.

M. T. Lamb devotes a great deal of space to this matter in The Golden Bible, pages 118-126. We do not have room to quote all of this material, but on page 119 this interesting comment appears:

The general belief was that she [Mrs. Harris] burned it. But the prophet Joseph evidently was afraid she had not, but had secretly hid it, for the purpose of entrapping him, should he ever attempt to reproduce the pages. If the work was really of God, the manuscript could be reproduced word for word without a mistake. If, however, Joseph inspired it himself, his memory would hardly be adequate to such a task, without numberless changes or verbal differences—and thus “give himself away,” since he loudly professed to be all the time aided “by the gift and power of God.”

Making Up Names

In their attempt to show that the Book of Mormon is of divine origin some Mormon writers have claimed that it would have been impossible for Joseph Smith to have made up all the names in it. Jack H. West stated:

Another supporting evidence of our defense was that we find that of over 300 proper names in the Book of Mormon, 180 had never been heard of before this book came off the press. Supposedly, they were brand new names. The scientists tell us, first of all, that it is impossible for one individual to make up 180 brand new names. They say that if you tried to do all the research work necessary, and so forth, you would go stark crazy. . . . Did a whole group of men make up these 180 supposedly new names? Now we know that they didn’t because we have since run across tribe after tribe after tribe of Indians whose whereabouts we did not know in the year 1830 . . . And we say to some of these Indians, “How long have you called that mountain over there Nephiah?” And they say, “As long as we can remember . . .” And we thought it was a new name. . . . so it is with most of these 180 supposedly new names which came off the press in English print for the first time in 1830, with the publication of the Book of Mormon—they were names ages old, now generally known for the first time. (Trial of the Stick of Joseph, Brigham Young University Lecture Series, p. 45)

The claim that “most of these 180 supposedly new names” have been found among the Indians is certainly fantastic, but even more fantastic is the statement that “it is impossible for one individual to make up 180 new names.”

Most of the names appearing in the Book of Mormon are either derived directly from the Bible or are made by slightly changing or combining names found in the Bible. While we do not have room to make a complete study of the names found in the Book of Mormon, we will examine the names given to the various books found in the Book of Mormon. They are listed as follows: First Book of Nephi, Second Book of Nephi, Book of Jacob, Book of Enos, Book of Jarom, Book of Omni, The Words of Mormon, Book of Mosiah, Book of Alma, Book of Helaman, Third Nephi, Fourth Nephi, Book of Mormon, Book of Ether, and the Book of Moroni. When we eliminate duplicates we arrive at the following list of names: Nephi, Jacob, Enos, Jarom, Omni, Mormon, Mosiah, Alma, Helaman, Ether and Moroni.

As we have already shown, the name Nephi is derived from the Apocrypha, 2 Maccabees 1:36, and Joseph Smith purchased a Bible which contained the Apocrypha.

The name Jacob is of course taken from the Bible (see Genesis 25:26).

The name Enos is also taken directly from the Bible (see Genesis 4:26).

Although the name Jarom does not appear in the Bible, we do find the name Joram (2 Samuel 8:10), and if the letters o and a were reversed we would have Jarom. Another simple way to obtain this name is to combine the first three letters of the name Jared (Jared) found in Genesis 5:15 with the last two letters of Edom (Edom) found in Gen. 25:30, and this would give us Jarom.

The name Omni is not found in the Bible, but if the letter r in Omri (1 Kings 16:16) is changed to n we have Omni. Another way to derive this name is to use only the first four letters from the word omnipotent (omnipotent) which is found in Revelation 19:6.

The word Mormon is not found in the Bible, but it can be made by adding the first three letters of Moriah (Moriah), found in Genesis 22:2, with the last three letters of Solomon (Solomon), found in 2 Samuel 5:14. Thus we would obtain Mormon.

Another source for the word Mormon has been suggested by Fawn Brodie. She feels that it might have come out of the anti-Masonic controversy. On page 64 of her book No Man Knows My History, she says that Joseph Smith might have “combined the first syllables of Morgan and Monroe” to make the name Mormon. We feel that this is a good suggestion and have dealt with this matter in our book The Mormon Kingdom, vol. 1, p. 155.

It is interesting to note that Joseph Smith claimed that the name “Mormon” was composed from two words. He stated that the last part of the word—i.e., “mon”—is an “Egyptian” word which means “good,” and “with the addition of more, or the contraction, mor, we have the word Mormon; which means, literally, more good” (Times and Seasons, vol. 4, p. 194). One man who read our book, Changes in Joseph Smith’s History, made the following comments concerning this matter:

Smith claimed that the word “Mormon” was formed from the Egyptian word “mon” (which he said meant “good”) and the English word “more,” contracted to “mor” (together meaning “more good”). How can this be when there is no Egyptian word “mon” which means good. Even if there were such an Egyptian word, how could it get combined with an English word here on the American continent sometime before 400 A.D.? The English language did not develop until the middle ages and was totally unknown in the ancient middle east.

In a letter dated April 1, 1965, the same man wrote:

I might add a few words about Smith’s definition of the word “Mormon”. . . . the part I had reference to has been omitted from the present Church History, so I understand. While in the graduate department at John Hopkins University I made it a point to ask Dr. William F. Albright if there were any Egyptian word “mon” meaning “good,” or anything resembling it with such a meaning. Dr. Albright is one of the world’s leading authorities on the ancient near east and understood and offered courses in Egyptian. He assured me there was no such word. I wrote Dr. Sperry about this problem and he assured me he had “no off-the-cuff answer” for this problem. (see letter enclosed). At the time Smith gave his definition Champollion was just working out the system of Egyptian hieroglyphics, so as far as Smith knew no one could contradict him. However, it should have been obvious, even without a knowledge of Egyptian, that an Egyptian word could not be combined with an English word and appear here in America (since it’s used in the Bk of Mormon) before 400 A.D., when there was no English language until centuries later.

The name Mosiah is not found in the Bible, but the name Josiah is found in 1 Kings 13:2. If we were to change the letter J to M we would obtain Mosiah. Another simple way to obtain this name would be to combine the first three letters of the name Moses (Moses), found in Exodus 2:10, with the last three letters of the name Isaiah (Isaiah), found in 2 Kings 19:2, and we would obtain the name Mosiah.

The name Alma is not found in the Bible, but it may have been derived by deleting some of the letters from the name Shalmaneser (Shalmaneser) found in 2 Kings 17:3.

Actually, the name Alma is well known in America. The newspaper published in Joseph Smith’s own neighborhood (The Wayne Sentinel, June 5, 1829, p. 2) tells of the marriage of “Miss Alma Parker.” (In the Book of Mormon, of course, the name Alma is given to a man.) There are a number of cities in America today that are named Alma (see the National Zip Code Directory).

Although the name Helaman is not found in the Bible, 2 Samuel 10:17 speaks of the river Helam. The name Helaman could easily be made by combining the name Helam with the last two letters in Haran (Haran), found in Genesis 11:26.

The name Ether is taken directly from the Bible (see Joshua 15:42)

The name Moroni is not found in the Bible, but it could be obtained by combining the first three letters of Moriah (Moriah), found in Genesis 22:2, with the last three letters from the name Benoni (Benoni), found in Genesis 35:18. Thus we would obtain Moroni.

It is interesting to note that there was an Italian artist named Moroni. In a letter to Ralph L. Foster, Rosalind Lawrence, of the Museum of Fine Arts in Boston, Massachusetts, stated that the “1829 exhibition of the Sarti Collection” at the Boston Atheneum contained “one painting by Moroni, his portrait of Galileo.” (Letter dated August 20, 1963; photographically reproduced in the Book of Mormon on Trial, by Ralph Leonard Foster)

From this brief study of the names in the Book of Mormon the reader can see that it would be easy to make hundreds of “new names” by simply changing a few letters on names that are already known or by making different combinations with parts of names.

Joseph Smith certainly had the ability to make up “new names.” George Reynolds gives this interesting information:

“While residing in Kirtland, Elder Reynolds Cahoon had a son born to him. One day when President Joseph Smith was passing his door he called the Prophet in and asked him to bless and name the baby. Joseph did so and gave the boy the name of Mahonri Moriancumer. . . .” (Juvenile Instructor, vol. 27, p. 282, as cited in Mormon Doctrine, by Bruce R. McConkie, 1966, p. 463)

It is interesting to note that when Joseph Smith purchased a Bible in the late 1820’s, he picked one that contained “An alphabetical table of all the names of the Old and New Testaments with their significations; . . .” (“A History of Joseph Smith’s Revision of the Bible,” by Reed C. Durham, Jr., p. 27).

If he used a list of Bible names and a little imagination, it would have been very easy for Joseph Smith to have produced the “new names” found in the Book of Mormon.

Bible Prophecy

It is claimed that the coming forth of the Book of Mormon fulfills several prophecies that are contained in the Bible. One of these prophecies is found in the 29th chapter of Isaiah. This prophecy is concerning a “sealed book.” Mormons claim that the sealed book mentioned by Isaiah is the original plates from which the Book of Mormon was translated. However, the interpretation given by Larry Jonas, in Mormon Claims Examined, seems to prove that this prophecy was fulfilled at the time of Christ:

The chapter indicates that the book (which is a figure of speech standing for the message of the book) would not be understood by the learned but would be understood by the unlearned (see Isa. 29:18). This was the condition at the time of giving the New Covenant or Testament. In fact, Jesus speaks of the conditions where the leaders of the Jews who were the learned rejected him while we know that it was the unlearned who swelled the church (see Mark 7:9). To verify this interpretation of the learned and unlearned read Isaiah 29:13 where it speaks of those who draw near with their lips but have their hearts far from the Lord and would rather follow the precepts of men. Jesus makes this same statement in Matthew 15:8-9 and Mark 7:6-7 where he even says he is quoting Isaiah concerning that generation. As to the marvelous work which the Lord will do at which men will wonder (29:14), which will be accepted by the unlearned and rejected by the learned, see Matthew 21:42 where Jesus speaks of his own mission as being that marvelous work of God. The New Testament would have us understand that the gospel or New Covenant was the message to come forth which those “learned” hypocrites rejected and the unlearned received. Many New Testament passages quote Isaiah 29 in this connection as shown above. The Mormons would have us believe that the book is the Book of Mormon which the unlearned Joseph Smith gave the world but which the learned Professor Anthon of New York could not read when Martin Harris told him it was sealed. (Mormon Claims Examined, p. 72)

Another prophecy which the Book of Mormon claims to fulfill is found in John 10:16:

And other sheep I have, which are not of this fold: them also I must bring, and they shall hear my voice; and there shall be one fold, and one shepherd.

The Book of Mormon claims that these “other sheep” are the Nephites, as well as the lost tribes of Israel. In 3 Nephi 16:22 of the Book of Mormon it is stated that this prophecy does not apply to the Gentiles. A careful examination of the Bible and other passages in the Book of Mormon, however, reveals that this prophecy could certainly apply to the Gentiles. The Bible teaches that those who will follow the Lord are his sheep; this includes both Jews and Gentiles. In John 10:15 Jesus says, “. . . I lay down my life for the sheep.” Therefore, anyone who receives Christ as his Saviour must be one of his sheep. The Book of Mormon also teaches that the righteous are the sheep of the good shepherd. In Alma 5:39 we read:

And now if ye are not the sheep of the good shepherd, of what fold are ye? Behold, I say unto you, that the devil is your shepherd, and ye are of his fold: and now, who can deny this? Behold, I say unto you, whosoever denieth this is a liar and a child of the devil.

It would appear, therefore, that the Gentiles that receive Christ must be the sheep of the good shepherd. Now, if the Gentiles are the sheep of the good shepherd, what prevents them from being the “other sheep I have, which are not of this fold”?

In Ephesians 2:11-14 Paul seems to teach that the Gentiles were of a different fold, with “the middle wall of partition” between them and Israel:

Wherefore remember, that ye being in time past Gentiles in the flesh, who are called Uncircumcision by that which is called the Circumcision in the flesh made by hands;

That at that time ye were without Christ, being aliens from the commonwealth of Israel, and strangers from the covenants of promise, having no hope, and without God in the world:

But now in Christ Jesus ye who sometimes were far off are made nigh by the blood of Christ.

For he is our peace, who hath made both one and hath broken down the middle wall of partition between us;

Another prophecy which the Mormons claim the Book of Mormon fulfills (although the Book of Mormon itself makes no such claim) is found in Ezekiel 37:16-17:

Moreover, thou son of man, take thee one stick, and write upon it, For Judah, and for the children of Israel his companions: then take another stick, and write upon it, For Joseph, the stick of Ephraim, and for all the house of Israel his companions:

And join them one to another into one stick; and they shall become one in thine hand.

The Mormons claim that the Bible is the stick of Judah and that the Book of Mormon is the stick of Ephraim, or the stick of Joseph which is in the hand of Ephraim. The Mormon Apostle LeGrand Richards states:

In ancient times it was the custom to write on parchment and roll it on a stick. Therefore, when this command was given, it was the equivalent of directing that two books or records should be kept. (A Marvelous Work And A Wonder, p. 67)

Larry Jonas made this interesting observation concerning this matter:

The first objection is that the Hebrew has a word for scroll and a separate word for stick. The word in Ezekiel 37 is the Hebrew for stick which can be translated gallows, helve, plank, staff, stalk, stick, stock, timber, tree, and wood, but never scroll! This can be seen in Young's Analytical Concordance by any who read English. (Mormon Claims Examined, p. 37)

Everett Landon, who at one time accepted the idea that the sticks represented the Bible and Book of Mormon, now feels that this teaching must be repudiated:

Those readers of this treatise who are aware of the belief that the two sticks discussed in Ezekiel 37 point to the Bible and Book of Mormon will find in our comments a departure from that viewpoint. . . . Having once believed the sticks did symbolize the said Scriptures, we differ in a spirit of considerable charity toward those who still so believe. . . . The words Ezekiel was to write were dictated to him by the Lord. We emphasize, he was to write upon two sticks, (or staves as stated in the Septuagint Bible). Not upon scrolls, plates, rolls, papyri, or in books or records. The traditional view of the sticks as books or records has been a stumbling block to many. Ezekiel understood fully what a “roll of a book” was, (Ez. 2:9) and did not need to mince words in saying “stick” if he actually meant “book,” or “record”. . . . Let Book of Mormon believers be not dismayed. In the Bible and the Holy Spirit we have ample proof of the Book of Mormon. (The Book of Mormon Foundation, January, February, March 1971, pp. 7- 8)

Now, even if we were to accept the Mormon idea that the sticks referred to by Ezekiel are books, still the Book of Mormon could not fulfill this prophecy. In order to fulfill this prophecy the Nephites (who were supposed to have written the Book of Mormon) would have to be descendants of Joseph through his son Ephraim. The Book of Mormon, however, makes no such claim, but on the contrary it says that the Nephites were descendants of Joseph through his other son, Manasseh. In Alma 10:3 we read as follows:

And Aminadi was a descendant of Nephi, who was the son of Lehi, who came out of the land of Jerusalem who was a descendant of Manasseh, who was the son of Joseph who was sold into Egypt by the hands of his brethren.

With regard to the “sticks” mentioned by Ezekiel it is also interesting to note that the Book of Mormon was supposed to have been written on gold plates and not on “parchment” rolled up on a stick.

Beyond the Book of Mormon

Joseph Smith once stated that “the Book of Mormon was the most correct of any book on earth, and a man would get nearer to God by abiding its precepts, than by any other book” (History of the Church, vol. 4, p. 461).

Although the Book of Mormon is still the primary tool used to bring converts into the church, the Doctrine and Covenants and Pearl of Great Price have taken its place as far as doctrine is concerned. Joseph Fielding Smith says that “the book of Doctrine and Covenants to us stands in a peculiar position above them all” (Doctrines of Salvation, vol. 3, p. 198). In the chapters which follow we will show that many of the doctrines the Mormon leaders now teach are in direct contradiction to the Book of Mormon.

Change in Book of Mormon to Cover Up Embarrassing Teaching About Skin Color

In a later chapter in this book (page 262), we point out that since its beginning the Mormon Church has taught that a dark skin is a sign of God's displeasure. This teaching comes directly from Joseph Smith's Book of Mormon. The Book of Mormon teaches that about 600 B.C. a prophet named Lehi brought his family to America. Those who were righteous (the Nephites) had a white skin, but those who rebelled against God (the Lamanites) were cursed with a dark skin. The Lamanites eventually destroyed the Nephites; therefore, the Indians living today are referred to as Lamanites. The following verses are found in the Book of Mormon and explain the curse on the Lamanites:

And it came to pass that I beheld, after they had dwindled in unbelief they became a dark, and loathsome, and a filthy people, full of idleness and all manner of abominations. (Book of Mormon, 1 Nephi 12:23)

And he had caused the cursing to come upon them, yea, even a sore cursing, because of their iniquity . . . wherefore, as they were white, and exceeding fair and delightsome, that they might not be enticing unto my people the Lord God did cause a skin of blackness to come upon them. (2 Nephi 5:21)

And the skins of the Lamanites were dark, according to the mark which was set upon their fathers, which was a curse upon them because of their transgression . . . (Alma 3:6)

The Book of Mormon stated that when the Lamanites repented of their sins "their curse was taken from them, and their skin became white like unto the Nephites" (3 Nephi 2:15). The Book of Mormon also promised that in the last days the Lamanites—i.e., the Indians—will repent and "many generations shall not pass away among them, save they shall be a white and delightsome people." (2 Nephi 30:6)

One of the most embarrassing things about the doctrine concerning the Indians is that they are not becoming "white" as the Book of Mormon prophesied. The anti-Mormon writer Gordon H. Fraser claims that the "skin color" of the Indians converted to Mormonism "has not altered in the least because of their adherence to the Mormon doctrines" (What Does the Book of Mormon Teach? p. 46).

It now appears that the Mormon leaders are trying to "dissolve" the doctrine that the Indians will turn white after turning to Mormonism. The church has just released its 1981 printing of the "triple combination" which contains the Book of Mormon, Doctrine and Covenants and Pearl of Great Price. This new publication contains a very important change. Previous editions of the Book of Mormon had said that in the last days the Indians "shall be a white and delightsome people" (2 Nephi 30:6). In the new edition this has been altered to read that the Indians "shall be a pure and delightsome people."

The official church magazine, The Ensign, tries to justify this change by stating:

Most students of latter-day scriptures are aware that from the very first printing typographical errors have crept into the Book of Mormon. . . .

The Prophet himself attempted to correct some of these kinds of errors, but his many duties prevented him from completing the project; and even so, some of his corrections seem to have disappeared again in later editions. For example, the 1830 and 1837 printings of the Book of Mormon contained a prophecy that the Lamanites would one day become "a white and delightsome people" (2 Ne. 30:6). In the 1840 printing, which the Prophet edited, this passage was changed to read "a pure and delightsome people," but for some reason later printings reverted to the original wording. (The Ensign, October 1981, pp. 17-18)

It should be noted that church leaders are unable to produce any documentary evidence to support their claim that this was merely a correction by Joseph Smith of a typographical error. There were originally two handwritten manuscripts for the Book of Mormon—a copy which was written by Joseph Smith's scribes as he dictated it and a second "emended" copy that was prepared for the printer. Unfortunately, most of the first manuscript was destroyed through water damage. The Mormon scholar Stanley R. Larson informs us that this manuscript "does not exist for this section of the text . . ." ("A Study of Some Textual Variations in the Book of Mormon Comparing the Original and the Printer's Manuscripts and the 1830, the 1837, and the 1840 Editions," unpublished M.A. thesis, Brigham Young University, April 1974, p. 283).

Fortunately, the second handwritten manuscript—the copy given to the printer to use to set the type for the first printing of the Book of Mormon—was preserved by Book of Mormon witness David Whitmer and is still in excellent shape. This handwritten manuscript does contain the portion printed as 2 Nephi 30:6. It uses the word "white," and therefore does not support the claim that Joseph Smith was only correcting a typographical error (see Restoration Scriptures, by Richard P. Howard, Independence, Missouri, 1969, p. 49). It should be remembered that both the first two editions of the Book of Mormon (1830 and 1837) used the word "white." It is especially significant that the 1837 edition retained this reading because the preface to this edition stated that "the whole has been carefully reexamined and compared with the original manuscripts, by elder Joseph Smith, Jr., the translator of the Book of Mormon, assisted by the present printer, brother O. Cowdery, . . ." (Book of Mormon, 1837 edition, Preface, as cited in The Ensign, September 1976, p. 79).

Besides all the evidence from the original Book of Mormon manuscript and the first two printed editions, there is another passage in the Book of Mormon which makes it very clear that Joseph Smith believed that the Lamanites' skins could be turned "white" through repentance:

And their curse was taken from them, and their skin became white like unto the Nephites; (3 Nephi 2:15)

We have taken this quotation directly from the new "triple combination" to show that the Mormon Church is still bound by the belief that righteousness affects skin color even though church leaders have changed the verse appearing as 2 Nephi 30:6.

The fact that Joseph Smith believed that the Indians' skins would actually become white seems to also be verified by a revelation he gave in 1831. In the updated material for the chapter on polygamy we discuss this revelation and show that it was suppressed until 1974 when we printed it in Mormonism Like Watergate? Since that time the Mormon Church Historian Leonard J. Arrington and his assistant Davis Bitton published the important portion of it in their book, The Mormon Experience, page 195:

"For it is my will, that in time, ye should take unto you wives of the Lamanites and Nephites that their posterity may become white, delightsome and just, for even now their females are more virtuous than the gentiles."

Like Joseph Smith, President Brigham Young taught that the Indians would "become 'a white and delightsome people'" (Journal of Discourses, vol. 2, p. 143). Mormon leaders from

Joseph Smith to the present time have continually used the Book of Mormon to prove that the Indians would become white if they turned to Mormonism. Spencer W. Kimball, who became the twelfth President of the Church on December 30, 1973, strongly endorsed that teaching. In the LDS General Conference, October 1960, Mr. Kimball stated:

I saw a striking contrast in the progress of the Indian people today . . . they are fast becoming a white and delightful people. . . . For years they have been growing delightful, and they are now becoming white and delightful, as they were promised. . . . The children in the home placement program in Utah are often lighter than their brothers and sisters in the hogans on the reservation.

At one meeting a father and mother and their sixteen-year-old daughter were present, the little member girl—sixteen—sitting between the dark father and mother, and it was evident she was several shades lighter than her parents—on the same reservation, in the same hogan, subject to the same sun and wind and weather. . . . These young members of the Church are changing to whiteness and to delightfulness. One white elder jokingly said that he and his companion were donating blood regularly to the hospital in the hope that the process might be accelerated. (Improvement Era, December 1960, pp. 922-23)

The reader will notice that Spencer W. Kimball used the Book of Mormon phrase, “a white and delightful people.” This, of course, is the very phrase that has now been changed to read, “a pure and delightful people.” After using the word “white” to prove his point in a conference address, one would think that President Kimball would be opposed to changing it to “pure.” The Ensign, however, seems to indicate that he approved of the change. It states that “every correction” in the triple combination “was approved by the First Presidency and the Quorum of the Twelve, and the Brethren felt good about each of them” (October 1981, p. 18). We find it very difficult to find any evidence of inspiration in the whole matter.

In any event, the church now wants to suppress the Book of Mormon’s teaching concerning skin color. Ron Barker, of the Associated Press, questioned church spokesman Jerry P. Cahill concerning the matter:

Asked whether church members should assume that faithful Mormon Indians would one day become light complexioned, Cahill said they should assume that they will become a “pure and delightful people.” (Salt Lake Tribune, September 30, 1981)

We can probably expect more revisions in Mormon books to cover up this embarrassing doctrine. Apostle Bruce R. McConkie, who has recently had to revise his book Mormon Doctrine to conform to the change on the anti-black doctrine, will undoubtedly have to revise his section on the “Lamanite Curse.” On pages 428-29 of the 1979 printing of Mormon Doctrine we find the following:

. . . a twofold curse came upon the Lamanites: . . . “they became a dark, and loathsome, and a filthy people, full of idleness and all manner of abominations.” (1 Ne. 12:23.) So that they “might not be enticing” unto the Nephites, “the Lord God did cause a skin of blackness to come upon them.” (2 Nephi 5:20-25; Alma 3:14-16.) . . .

During periods of great righteousness, when groups of Lamanites accepted the gospel and turned to the Lord, the curse was removed from them. . . . the curse was removed from a group of Lamanites converts and they became white like the Nephites. (3 Nephi 2:15-16.) . . .

When the gospel is taken to the Lamanites in our day and they come to a knowledge of Christ and of their fathers, then the “scales of darkness” shall fall from their eyes; “and many generations shall not pass away among them, save they shall be a white and delightful people.” (2 Ne. 30:6.) Finally, before the judgment bar of God, all who have been righteous, Lamanites and Nephites alike, will be free from the curse of spiritual death and the skin of darkness. (Jacob 3:5-9)

We believe, of course, that Apostle McConkie has the right to alter his book in any way he desires. His changes concerning the anti-black doctrine are certainly a step in the right direction. When it comes to the Book of Mormon, however, we wonder how the Mormon leaders can justify altering words that were supposed to have been translated by the power of God.

Restoring God’s Unalterable Decrees

On page 91 of this book, we pointed out that in the first edition of the Book of Mormon this statement is made concerning God:

. . . yea, I know that he allotteth unto men, yea, decreeth unto them decrees which are unalterable, according to their wills; . . . (p. 303)

In modern editions eight words have been deleted from Alma 29:4:

. . . yea, I know that he allotteth unto men according to their wills, . . .

Critics have pointed out this problem for a number of years. Finally, in the new printing of the Book of Mormon in the “triple combination” the Mormon leaders have fixed up this portion to agree with the 1830 edition of the Book of Mormon:

. . . yea, I know that he allotteth unto men, yea, decreeth unto them decrees which are unalterable, according to their wills, . . .

The Ensign, October 1981, page 18, reports that “about two hundred” changes were made in the printing in the “triple combination.” It is claimed that “By far the majority of the changes involve minute matters of grammar or style, such as changing a singular noun or verb to the plural form.” With regard to these recent changes, it is interesting to note that in 1977 Stan Larson pointed out “the most extensive omission made anywhere in the text of the Book of Mormon” (Dialogue: A Journal of Mormon Thought, Autumn, 1977, p. 23). Thirty-five words which appeared in the original manuscripts of the Book of Mormon had been accidentally omitted in all the editions printed by the church. This mistake has finally been corrected in the printing in the “triple combination.” Alma 32:30 formerly had only thirty-two words, but in the new printing it contains sixty-seven.

One other thing that should be noted concerning this new printing of the Book of Mormon is that the addition of many footnotes has in most cases changed the page numbers on which most verses appear. This will make it very hard for those who have the new printing to find references which use the old system of page numbering. For example, on page 91 of this book we quote a verse and give the reference as follows, “page 74, verse 9.” In the new printing this verse appears on page 81. In both printings, however, the book and chapter identification remains the same—i.e., 2 Nephi 12:9.

Gold Plates

On page 59 of this book we discussed the question as to whether the Book of Mormon witnesses actually saw the gold plates. Marvin S. Hill, of the church’s Brigham Young University, examined this same problem in an article published in Dialogue: A Journal of Mormon Thought:

... there is a possibility that the witnesses saw the plates in vision only. . . . There is testimony from several independent interviewers, all non-Mormon, that Martin Harris and David Whitmer said they saw the plates with their "spiritual eyes" only. . . . This is contradicted, however, by statements like that of David Whitmer in the Saints Herald in 1882, "these hands handled the plates, these eyes saw the angel." But Z. H. Gurley elicited from Whitmer a not so positive response to the question, "did you touch them?" His answer was, "We did not touch nor handle the plates." . . .

So far as the eight witnesses go, . . . Stephen Burnett quotes Martin Harris that "the eight witnesses never saw them. . . ." Yet John Whitmer told Wilhelm Poulson . . . that he saw the plates when they were not covered, and he turned the leaves. (Dialogue: A Journal of Mormon Thought, Winter, 1972, pp. 83-84)

Marvin Hill refers to a letter written by Stephen Burnett. This document has been suppressed by the Mormon Church until just recently. In this letter we find the following:

... when I came to hear Martin Harris state in public that he never saw the plates with his natural eyes only in vision or imagination, neither Oliver nor David & also that the eight witnesses never saw them & hesitated to sign that instrument for that reason, but were persuaded to do it, the last pedestal gave way, in my view our foundation was sapped & the entire superstructure fell in heap of ruins, I therefore three week since in the Stone Chapel . . . renounced the Book of Mormon . . . after we were done speaking M Harris arose & said he was sorry for any man who rejected the Book of Mormon for he knew it was true, he said he had hefted the plates repeatedly in a box with only a tablecloth or a handkerchief over them, but he never saw them only as he saw a city through [sic] a mountain. And said that he never should have told that the testimony of the eight was false, if it had not been picked out of ___ [him/me?] but should have let it passed as it was . . . (Letter from Stephen Burnett to "Br Johnson," dated April 15, 1838, Joseph Smith papers, Letter book, April 20, 1837—February 9, 1843, pp. 64-66, typed copy).

Mormon apologist Richard Anderson dismisses Burnett's letter and says that "both Hyrum Smith and John Whitmer published direct personal statements that they had 'handled' the plates. That should settle Burnett's barb at the Eight Witnesses, for evidence is obviously better firsthand than thirdhand" (Investigating The Book of Mormon Witnesses, Salt Lake City, 1981, p. 159).

Question of Visions in Kirtland Temple

On page 60 we indicated that a statement in Joseph Smith's History concerning David Whitmer seeing angels was conspicuously absent in a report of the meeting published in the church's Messenger and Advocate in 1836. Since the 1972 edition of this book, we have found this entry in Joseph Smith's diary for March 27, 1836: "Presdt David Whitmer also saw angels in the house" (Joseph Smith's 1835-36 Diary, published by Modern Microfilm Company, p. 44). This entry was also copied into the original manuscript of Joseph Smith's History (see Manuscript History, Book B-1, p. 723). It is certainly strange that this incident appears in Joseph Smith's diary but is not mentioned in the report printed in the Messenger and Advocate. In any case, David Whitmer later claimed no angels appeared and that "the story sensationally circulated, and which is now on the records of the Utah Mormons as an actual happening, was nothing but a trumped up yarn."

In doing research on the problem of whether David Whitmer claimed to see "angels in the house," we ran across something that calls into question the authorship of an important statement attributed to Joseph Smith under the date of March 27, 1836. On page 60 of this book, we quoted the following from the History of the Church:

Brother George A. Smith arose and began to prophesy, when a noise was heard like the sound of a rushing mighty wind, which filled the Temple, and all the congregation simultaneously arose, being moved upon by an invisible power; many began to speak in tongues and prophesy; others saw glorious visions; and I beheld the Temple was filled with angels, which fact I declared to the congregation. The people of the neighborhood came running together (hearing an unusual sound within, and seeing a bright light like a pillar of fire resting upon the Temple), and were astonished at what was taking place. (History of the Church, vol. 2, p. 428)

An examination of the original manuscript of Joseph Smith's History (Manuscript History, Book B-1, p. 723) reveals that this material is not included. It is found, however, in the Addenda, pp. 3-4, Note J. This seems to show that it was not written by Joseph Smith, but was probably added after his death (see the chapter "Changes in Joseph Smith's History," pp. 127-133 of this book, for evidence that a large part of Joseph Smith's History was not written until after his death). It is also interesting to note that no mention of this is found in Joseph Smith's diary under this date, and it was not included in the Messenger and Advocate account (vol. 2, p. 281). It could be possible that "Oliver Cowdery's Sketch Book" is the source for the entry in the History of the Church. According to Leonard J. Arrington, this is "a Cowdery diary covering three months in 1836." Dr. Arrington has published this document in its entirety in BYU Studies. The very last entry in this "Sketch Book" reads as follows:

Sunday, the 27th attended on the dedication of the Lord's house. For the particulars of this great event see my account written by myself, and printed in the March No. of The Messenger and Advocate, signed C. In the evening I met with the officers of the church in the Lord's house. The Spirit was poured out—I saw the glory of God, like a great cloud, come down and rest upon the house, and fill the same like a mighty rushing wind. I also saw cloven tongues, like as of fire rest upon many, (for there were 316 present.) while they spake with other tongues and prophesied. ("Oliver Cowdery's Sketch Book," as printed in Brigham Young University Studies, Summer 1972, p. 426)

If this is the source for the entry in the History of the Church, it raises some interesting questions. To begin with, it does not mention that Joseph Smith declared to the congregation that "the Temple was filled with angels" as we find in the statement attributed to the Mormon Prophet in the History of the Church, and also lacks the statement that "The people of the neighborhood came running together (hearing an unusual sound within, and seeing a bright light like a pillar of fire resting upon the Temple), and were astonished at what was taking place." Also, because it is the last entry in the "Sketch Book," it is very difficult to determine just how long after the event it was recorded. Since the first part of the entry says "see my account written by myself, and printed in the March No. of The Messenger and Advocate, signed C.," we would assume that at least some time had elapsed between the "dedication" and the recording of the event. It is interesting to also note that the article in the Messenger and Advocate is not “signed C.,” as the entry indicates. Perhaps the most puzzling thing about the matter, however, is that the account in the Messenger and Advocate contains nothing about the important meeting in the evening where the “glory of God” filled the house “like a mighty rushing wind.” As we have already indicated, Joseph Smith’s diary does not mention the event; it merely states: “met in the evening and instructed the quorums respecting the ordinance of washing of feet which we were to attend to on wednesday following” (Joseph Smith’s 1835-36 Diary, p. 44).

It is possible, of course, that the Church Archives contains some other document mentioning this great spiritual event, but it seems very unlikely that anything will be found to prove that Joseph Smith wrote the entry in the History of the Church.

Martin Harris’ “Instability”

On page 58 of this book we quote an affidavit by G. W. Stodard which claims Book of Mormon witness Martin Harris was “first an orthodox Quaker, then a Universalist, next a Restorationer, then a Baptist, next a Presbyterian, and then a Mormon.” The Mormon writer Richard Anderson questions the accuracy of Stodard’s statement:

Palmyra sources do not yet prove that Martin was a Quaker, though his wife probably was. And no evidence yet associates Martin with the Baptist or Presbyterian churches. Note that the other two names are religious positions, not necessarily churches—philosophical Universalists dissent from traditional churches in believing that God will save all, and Restorationists obviously take literally the many Bible prophecies of God’s reestablished work in modern times. An early Episcopal minister in Palmyra interviewed Martin and reduced his five positions to two: “He had been, if I mistake not, at one period a member of the Methodist Church, and subsequently had identified himself with the Universalists.” Of course Martin could have been a Universalist and Restorationer simultaneously. (Investigating The Book of Mormon Witnesses, p. 169)

Although Richard Anderson questions that there were “five religious changes before Mormonism,” he is still willing to admit that Harris made eight changes after his 1838 excommunication: except for Shakerism, “every affiliation of Martin Harris was with some Mormon group.” . . . His specific Ohio stages include the following:

(1) the Parrish-Boynton party (which he condemned for denying the Book of Mormon at the time he met with them); (2) an 1842 rebaptism by a Nauvoo missionary; (3) an 1846 English mission with a Strangite companion (where documents suggest that the Book of Mormon was really Martin’s message); (4) participation in McLellan’s attempts to set up Midwest leaders for the Church in 1847-48; (5) concurrent with one or more stages, sympathy for Shakerism without full participation; (6) support of Gladden Bishop in his program of further revelations based on the Book of Mormon; (7) continuation of his original “dissenter” status of stressing the Book of Mormon and early revelations of Joseph Smith—even when occasionally meeting with William Smith and others, he maintained this position for fifteen years after his 1855 conversations with Thomas Colburn; (8) his 1870 return to the Church in Salt Lake. (Ibid., pp. 168-169)

On page 167 of the same book, Dr. Anderson admits that Martin Harris “displays a certain instability,” and on page 111 he refers to his “religious instability.”

Borrowing From the Bible

On pages 73-79 we demonstrated that the New Testament provided a great deal of material for the Book of Mormon. Most Mormons are still not aware of this fact. For instance, in the April 1980 issue of The Ensign, page 71, Grace Jorgensen tells how she became converted to the Book of Mormon: “When I found a passage about charity (Moroni 7:44-47), I thought, Joseph Smith couldn’t have written that—these words were from God! . . . I am now a convert.” We certainly agree with Grace Jorgensen; Joseph Smith couldn’t have written these words. They are plagiarized from the writings of Paul in the New Testament, 1 Corinthians, chapter 13 (see p. 79, column 1, of this book for parallels).

Roberts’ Secret Manuscripts Revealed

On pages 82-84 of this book we published evidence showing that B. H. Roberts, the famous Mormon historian and General Authority, prepared a list of parallels between the Book of Mormon and Ethan Smith’s View of the Hebrews. Some new evidence concerning B. H. Roberts’ interest in View of the Hebrews has recently come to light. It has been discovered that Roberts wrote a manuscript of 291 pages entitled, “A Book of Mormon Study.” In this manuscript 176 pages were devoted to the relationship of View of the Hebrews to the Book of Mormon. The manuscript was never published and remained in the family after his death. We were finally able to obtain a copy of this manuscript, and in 1980 we published it together with another manuscript by Roberts, “Book of Mormon Difficulties,” in a book entitled, Roberts’ Manuscripts Revealed.

Before our publication came out, a false rumor concerning Roberts’ “Book of Mormon Studies” was circulated—i.e., that B. H. Roberts tried to answer the objections which he himself had raised against the Book of Mormon in his shorter work of eighteen parallels. This idea is certainly far from the truth. After a careful examination of Roberts’ work we concluded that it not only fails to answer the objections to the Book of Mormon mentioned in the shorter work, but that it raises many new problems as well.

Truman G. Madsen, professor of philosophy at Brigham Young University, concedes that B. H. Roberts did prepare a manuscript entitled, “Book of Mormon Study,” but he maintains that Roberts was merely using “the ‘Devil’s Advocate’ approach to stimulate thought”:

Later, in March of 1922, Roberts prepared a draft of a written report to the First Presidency and the Quorum of the Twelve. It included a further discussion of the linguistic problems and other points as well. The study of such books as those of Josiah Priest, Ethan Smith, and others led him to examine such questions as: What literary and historical speculations were abroad in the nineteenth century? Could Joseph Smith have absorbed them in his youth and could these influences have provided the ground plan for such a work as the Book of Mormon? Did Joseph Smith have a mind “sufficiently creative” to have written it? And what internal problems and parallels within the Book of Mormon called for explanation? In confronting such questions Roberts prepared a series of “parallels” with Ethan Smith’s View of the Hebrews; a summary of this analysis excerpted passages from Ethan Smith’s work and lined them up in columns with comparable ideas in the Book of Mormon. Examination of such questions was contained in a typewritten manuscript entitled “Book of Mormon Study.”

About this particular study, certain points must be kept in mind if it is not to be gravely misunderstood. First, it was not intended for general dissemination but was to be presented to the General Authorities to identify for them certain criticisms that might be made against the Book of Mormon. . . .

Second, the report was not intended to be balanced. A kind of lawyer's brief of one side of a case written to stimulate discussion in preparation of the defense of a work, already accepted as true, the manuscript was anything but a careful presentation of Roberts' thoughts about the Book of Mormon or of his own convictions. . . .

Teachers who have used the "Devil's Advocate" approach to stimulate thought among their students, lawyers who in preparation of their cases have brought up what they consider the points likely to be made by their worthy opponents—all such people will recognize the unfairness of taking such statements out of context and offering them as their own mature, balanced conclusions. For ill-wishers to resurrect Roberts's similar "Devil's Advocate" probings is not a service to scholarship, for they are manifestly dated. And it is a travesty to take such working papers as a fair statement of B. H. Roberts's own appraisal of the Book of Mormon, for, as this paper abundantly demonstrates, his conviction of its truth was unshaken and frequently expressed down to the time of his death. (Brigham Young University Studies, Summer 1979, pp. 440-442)

While there is no evidence that B. H. Roberts publicly repudiated the Book of Mormon, a careful reading of his manuscript, "A Book of Mormon Study," leads one to believe that he was in the process of losing faith in its divine origin. Although he may have started out merely playing the part of the "Devil's Advocate," we feel that he played the role so well that he developed grave doubts about the authenticity of the Book of Mormon. The following quotations from Roberts' manuscript should be of interest to the reader. In Part I, chapter 14, of his study B. H. Roberts summarized:

. . . was Joseph Smith possessed of a sufficiently vivid and creative imagination as to produce such a work as the Book of Mormon from such materials as have been indicated in the preceding chapters—from such common knowledge as was extant in the communities where he lived in his boyhood and young manhood; from the Bible, and more especially from the "View of the Hebrews," by Ethan Smith? That such power of imagination would have to be of a high order is conceded; that Joseph Smith possessed such a gift of mind there can be no question. . . .

A superabundance of evidence of Joseph Smith's power of imagination exists outside of the Book of Mormon. If the Book of Mormon be regarded as of merely human origin, then, of course, to those so regarding it, the rest of Joseph Smith's work falls to the same plane. . . .

In the light of this evidence, there can be no doubt as to the possession of a vividly strong, creative imagination by Joseph Smith, the Prophet, an imagination, it could with reason be urged, which, given the suggestions that are to be found in the "common knowledge" of accepted American Antiquities of the times, supplimented by such a work as Ethan Smith's "View of the Hebrews," would make it possible for him to create a book such as the Book of Mormon is.

In Part II, chapter 1, of B. H. Roberts' manuscript, we find this surprising observation:

If from all that has gone before in part I, the view be taken that the Book of Mormon is merely of human origin; that a person of Joseph Smith's limitations in experience and in education; who was of the vicinage and of the period that produced the book—if it be assumed that he is the author of it, then it could be said that there is much internal evidence in the book itself to sustain such a view.

In the first place there is a certain lack of perspective in the things the book relates as history that points quite clearly to an undeveloped mind as their origin. The narrative proceeds in characteristic disregard of conditions necessary to its reasonableness, as if it were a tale told by a child, with utter disregard for consistency.

These are not the words of an "anti-Mormon" writer, but the words of the Mormon historian B. H. Roberts—one of the greatest scholars the church has ever known. Roberts not only prepared the "Introduction And Notes" for Joseph Smith's History of the Church, but he also wrote the six-volume work, A Comprehensive History of The Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints. He is also noted for his many works defending the Book of Mormon.

The following is found in Part II, chapter 2, of Roberts' manuscript:

The same lack of perspective and of consistency is also manifest in the early movements of both Jaredite and Nephite colonies after arriving "to the promised land." Also the same tendency to parallel incidents and characteristics as we have noted in the formation of the two colonies, and the incidents of their wilderness journey and sea voyage. It may be asked, what of this parallelism? What does it amount to? If such a question should be asked the opponent of the Book of Mormon would answer with emphasize— "This of it. It supplies the evidence that the Book of Mormon is the product of one mind, and that, a very limited mind, unconsciously reproducing with only slight variation its visions." And the answer will be accepted as significant at least, if not conclusive.

In Part II, chapter 3, Roberts wrote:

There were other anti-Christ's among the Nephites, but they were more military leaders than religious innovators, yet much of the same character in spirit with these dissenters here passed in review; but I shall hold that what is here presented illustrates sufficiently the matter taken in hand by referring to them, namely that they are all of one breed and brand; so nearly alike that one mind is the author of them, and that a young and undeveloped, but piously inclined mind. The evidence, I sorrowfully submit, points some will contend to Joseph Smith as their creator. It is difficult to believe that they are the product of history, that they come upon the scene separated by long periods of time, and among a race which was the ancestral race of the red man of America.

In the next chapter B. H. Roberts maintains that

The allusions here to absurdities of expressions and incidents in the Book of Mormon, are not made for the purpose of ridiculing the book, or casting any aspersions upon it; but they are made to indicate what may be fairly regarded as just objects of criticism under the assumption that the Book of Mormon is of human origin, and that Joseph Smith is its author. For these absurdities in expression; these miraculous incidents in warfare; these almost mock—and certainly extravagant—heroics; . . . are certainly just such absurdities and lapses as would be looked for if a person of such limitations as bounded Joseph Smith undertook to put forth a book dealing with the history and civilization of ancient and unknown peoples.

On pages 84-85 of this book, we have shown that "Another book which Joseph Smith may have read before 'Translating' the Book of Mormon was written by Josiah Priest. It was entitled The Wonders of Nature and Providence Displayed, and was published in 1825 at Albany, New York."

It is interesting to note that B. H. Roberts also felt that this book could have furnished structural material for the Book of Mormon:

A number of years ago in my treaties on the Book of Mormon under the general title "A New Witness for God," I discussed the subject "Did the Book of Mormon antedate works in English on American antiquities, accessible to Joseph Smith and his associates.” . . . it was insisted upon that books sufficient for a ground plan of the Book of Mormon, and accessible to Joseph Smith, did not exist. . . .

The writer at the time being considered did not take sufficiently into account the work of Josiah Priest’s . . . Priest himself, indeed, published a book . . . The Wonders of Nature and Providence, copyrighted by him June 2nd, 1824, and printed soon afterwards in Rochester, New York, only some twenty miles distant from Palmyra, near which place the Smith family then began to reside. It will be observed that this book preceded the publication of the Book of Mormon by about six years. At the time I made for my New Witnesses the survey of the literature on American Antiquities, traditions, origins, etc., available to Joseph Smith and his associates, this work of Priest’s was unknown to me; as was also the work by Ethan Smith, View of the Hebrews—except by report of it, and as being in my hands but a few minutes.

In this book The Wonders of Nature and Providence, . . . Mr. Priest begins to argue at length that the Indians may be descendants of the Israelites . . . he quotes in all about forty writers, . . . who advocated in one way or another, that the American Indians are Israelites. . . . It is altogether probable that these two books, Priest’s Wonders of Nature and Providence, 1824; and Ethan Smith’s View of the Hebrews . . . were either possessed by Joseph Smith or certainly known by him, for they were surely available to him, and of course, with all the collection of quoted matter. . . . some forty or fifty earlier authors in all being quoted. . . .

Moreover, on subjects widely discussed, . . . there is built up in course of years, a community knowledge of such subjects, usually referred to as “matters of common knowledge”. . . . Such “common knowledge” existed throughout New England and New York . . . the prevailing ideas respecting the American Indians throughout the regions named, were favorable to the notion that they were of Hebrew origin, . . . And with the existence of such a body of knowledge, or that which was accepted as “knowledge,” and a person of vivid and constructive imaginative power in contact with it, there is little room for doubt but that it might be possible for Joseph Smith to construct a theory of origin for his Book of Mormon, in harmony with these prevailing notions; and more especially since this “common knowledge” is set forth in almost hand-book form in the little work of Ethan Smith, . . . It will appear in what is to follow that such “common knowledge” did exist in New England; that Joseph Smith was in contact with it; that one book, at least, with which he was most likely acquainted, could well have furnished structural outlines for the Book of Mormon; and that Joseph Smith was possessed of such creative imaginative powers as would make it quite within the lines of possibility that the Book of Mormon could have been produced in that way. (“A Book of Mormon Study,” Part I, chapter 1)

In Part I, chapter 7, of the same manuscript, B. H. Roberts asked this question:

Could an investigator of the Book of Mormon be much blamed if he were to decide that Ethan Smith’s book with its suggestion as to the division of his Israelites into two peoples; with its suggestion of “tremendous wars” between them; and of the savages overcoming the civilized division—led to the fashioning of these same chief things in the Book of Mormon?

B. H. Roberts made this comment in Part I, chapter 13:

As to the first consideration, in this case, priority of production of Ethan Smith’s book, and priority of sufficient duration for it to become generally known in the vicinity where both books were produced—there is absolute certainty. For Ethan Smith’s book ran through two editions in New England before the Book of Mormon was published. As to the second consideration, in this case, the likelihood of Joseph Smith coming in contact with Ethan Smith’s book is not only very great, but amounts to a very close certainty. For being published in an adjoining county to the one in which their home had been for so long, and the interest in the subject being very general, not only in New England but in New York also, it would be little short of miraculous if they did not know of Ethan Smith’s book.

Further on in the same chapter, Roberts made these observations:

But now to return from this momentary divergence to the main theme of this writing—viz. did Ethan Smith’s “View of the Hebrews” furnish structural material for Joseph Smith’s Book of Mormon? It has been pointed out in these pages that there are many things in the former book that might well have suggested many major things in the other. Not a few things merely, one or two, or a half dozen, but many; and it is this fact of many things of similarity and the cumulative force of them, that makes them so serious a menace to Joseph Smith’s story of the Book of Mormon origin. . . .

The material in Ethan Smith’s book is of a character and quantity to make a ground plan for the Book of Mormon: . . .

Can such numerous and startling points of resemblance and suggestive contact, be merely coincidence?

B. H. Roberts also felt that the Bible could have provided seeds for Joseph Smith’s fruitful imagination:

Matthew and Zechariah, then, could well be thought of as furnishing material for the Book of Mormon signs of the Birth of Messiah.

So also as the Book of Mormon signs of Messiah’s death and resurrection. . . . The three hours darkness, expanded to three days of darkness; the evidently momentary earthquake of Matthew, to three hours of earth quaking; the local rending of rocks in Matthew, to the rending of a continent; and the fear of a Roman Centurion and those that were with him, to the terror of a whole people.

With these things as suggestions as to signs for Messiah’s birth and death and resurrection, and one of conceded vivid, and strong and constructive imaginative powers to work them all out, need not be regarded as an unthinkable procedure and achievement. (Ibid.)

On pages 64-65 of this book, we demonstrated that the great revivals which swept New York in the 1820’s are reflected in the Book of Mormon. B. H. Roberts also considered this to be a possibility:

It is clearly established now that these scenes of religion frenzy, were common in the vicinage where Joseph Smith resided in his youth and early manhood. . . . Joseph Smith himself came in contact with these emotional phenomena in his own experience after their rebirth in the early decades of the 19th century. The Question is, did his knowledge of these things, lead to the introduction of similar ones into the Book of Mormon narrative? I think it cannot be questioned but what there is sufficient resemblance . . . to justify the thought that the latter might well have suggested, and indeed become the source of the former. (Ibid., Part II, chapter 5)

In Part II, Chapter 6, of his manuscript, B. H. Roberts observed:

There can be no doubt but what the style of preaching, exhortation, warning, praying, admonition together with the things emphasized and the ends aimed at in such work of the Christian ministry as came to the attention of Joseph Smith, was all largely and deeply influenced by those first and greatest evangelical popular preachers of Protestant Christianity, John Wesley, George Whitefield, Jonathan Edwards, and Dr. Thomas Coke, et al.

Roberts gives lengthy extracts from some of the religious writings that would have been available to Joseph Smith. One quotation from the “Eighteen Sermons” by George Whitefield, published in 1808, contains this statement: “. . . Methinks I see . . . the Judge sitting on his throne, . . .” This reminds us of Alma’s statement in the Book of Mormon, Alma 36:22: “. . . methought I saw . . . God sitting upon his throne, . . .”

After a careful examination of B. H. Roberts’ manuscript, “A Book of Mormon Study,” we have come to the conclusion that he has done an excellent job of compiling the evidence to show that Joseph Smith could have written the Book of Mormon from the material available to him. In an article published in The Journal of Pastoral Practice, vol. III, no. 3, pp. 123-24, Wesley P. Walters commented concerning the uncovering of Roberts’ manuscripts:

Two unpublished manuscripts surfaced recently in Salt Lake City, Utah, written by the noted Mormon historian, Brigham H. Roberts, and surprisingly proposing that Joseph Smith, Jr., could have composed the Book of Mormon himself. Written between 1922 and the time of Roberts’ death in 1933, they are undoubtedly the most objective look at the origins of the Book of Mormon ever made by a General Authority of the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints. Mr. Roberts admits that the Book of Mormon is in conflict with what is now known about the early inhabitants of America from twentieth-century archeological investigation. He argues that Joseph Smith, Jr., could have produced the book himself, given his highly imaginative mind and the “common knowledge” about the American aborigines current in his day, and he sets forth an abundance of evidence that the book is a product of the early nineteenth-century intellectual climate.

Whether Mr. Roberts wrote these works to summarize some of the main objections to the Book of Mormon’s divine origin, or whether he himself had come to doubt the book’s divinity seems difficult to determine. The letters that accompany the manuscripts suggest the former, but the manuscripts themselves give the decided impression that Mr. Roberts had come to doubt the book’s divine origin. One Mormon professor, after reading the manuscripts, remarked, “B. H. Roberts came about as near calling Joseph Smith, Jr. a fraud and deceit as the polite language of a religious man would permit.” Whatever the motive, the manuscripts deserve consideration on their own merit and present one of the strongest statements ever set forth by a recognized Mormon authority questioning the divine origin of the Book of Mormon.

Hebraisms and Computers

On page 88 of this book we summarize the evidence showing that the Book of Mormon is a 19th century production. Since the publication of this book, Mormon scholars have tried desperately to find some evidence that the Book of Mormon is really a translation of an ancient document. Much has been made of supposed Hebraisms and chiasms in the text of the Book of Mormon. Edward Ashment, an Egyptologist who works for the Translation Department of the Mormon Church, does not seem to be very enthused about the results of this type of research. While he is unwilling to concede that the Book of Mormon is a forgery, he makes some very interesting admissions in an article published in Sunstone:

It is understandable, therefore, that to a large extent the Book of Mormon reflects the literary language of Joseph Smith and that it does not closely reflect Egyptian and/or Hebrew. It has been instructive to compare the Book of Mormon with ancient Egyptian and Hebrew texts in an effort to ascertain if their syntax and style match the very distinctive syntax and style of the Book of Mormon: incomplete sentences, an abnormally frequent use of circumstantial gerund phrases, numerous digressions which often develop into a chain of digressions before returning to the main text, and an extensive use of adverbs and conjunctions which frequently incorrectly function to draw relationships where none are possible according to context.

Ancient Egyptian or Semitic texts known to this writer do not display those characteristics. Instead, they tend to be “tightly” structured and concise (a necessary prerequisite for a period of time in which writing materials were scarce and very expensive). Incomplete sentences are not characteristic (except in lacunae) nor is a high frequency of circumstantials. Numerous digressions of the type in the Book of Mormon do not occur, and the adverbs and conjunctions are used with a specific syntactic pattern intended. On the other hand, the salient characteristics of the syntax and style of the Book of Mormon also tend to be the prominent features of the other literary efforts of the prophet—viz., the 1832 history which he wrote and dictated, the Doctrine and Covenants, and the Pearl of Great Price. That fact tends to illustrate that the Book of Mormon, Doctrine and Covenants, Pearl of Great Price, and the 1832 manuscript history of the Church were all filtered through the same mind. . . .

Certainly one of the best ways to account for the hundreds of New Testament phrases which occur in the Old Testament portions of the Book of Mormon lies in a realization of the prophet’s intimate familiarity with biblical terminology from his early home environment. (Sunstone, March-April 1980, p. 13)

In footnote 32 in the same article, Ashment observes:

Unfortunately the most critical studies on the Book of Mormon text have emphasized possible “Hebraisms,” while there has been a dearth of research which adequately treats the influence of the King James Version on the prophet’s literary language; it is suggested that this alternative be more thoroughly explored because if [of?] its promising nature.

Some Mormon researchers have turned to a computer in an attempt to prove that the Book of Mormon is genuine. According to the Provo Herald for October 7, 1979, two BYU scholars made “wordprint comparisons” between the Book of Mormon and 19th century writings:

Wordprint comparisons between the Book of Mormon and the known 19th century writings of Joseph Smith and Mr. Spalding show conclusively that neither of these persons, authored the book, the scientists say.

In fact, their research indicates that the book was authored by at least 24 different writers, and possibly more, whose styles bear no resemblance to that of Joseph Smith, Mr. Spalding or other 19th century writers whom they examined . . .

One of the tests went so far as to indicate that “odds against a single author exceeded 100 billion to one,” the statisticians noted in the report.

In the Salt Lake City Messenger for December 1979 we made some preliminary comments about this study (a free copy of this issue can be obtained from Utah Lighthouse Ministry, P.O. Box 1884, Salt Lake City, Utah 84110). We observed that the list of “24 Major Book of Mormon Authors Used in the Study,” seems to be somewhat padded (see The New Era, November 1979, p. 11). For instance, we find Isaiah listed as one of the authors. Since Isaiah is a book in the Bible and since the Book of Mormon itself acknowledges that it is quoting from Isaiah, we do not feel that it should be included in this study. If we are going to include Bible authors as part of the list of “Book of Mormon Authors,” we might as well add Moses, Matthew and Malachi (see Book of Mormon, pp. 161, 423-429, 446-448).

The BYU researchers stretch the matter even further by including the “Lord” as “quoted by Isaiah” as part of the “24 Major Book of Mormon Authors.” Also included in this list are the “Lord,” “Jesus” and the “Father.” It would appear, then, that the BYU researchers have created four “Book of Mormon Authors” out of the Father and the Son! On page 11 of their study in The New Era, the researchers admit: “Since the term Lord can refer either to the Father or the Son, we separated the words attributed to the Lord from those attributed to the Father or to Christ.” From this it would appear that the list of “24 Major Book of Mormon Authors,” is a preconceived listing of authors rather than the results actually obtained from a computer.

Actually, we are very much in favor of computer studies with regard to the Book of Mormon. We would especially like to see a study showing the parallels between the King James Version and the Book of Mormon. If a computer could actually be programmed to sort out writing styles, it would, no doubt, show more than 24 different authors in the Book of Mormon. We would probably find Moses, Isaiah, Jeremiah, Job, David, Solomon, Ezekiel, Daniel, Jonah, Micah, Malachi, Matthew, Mark, Luke, John, Paul, James, Peter, Jude, etc. We feel, however, that it will be very difficult to make an accurate stylistic analysis of a book which plagiarizes from so many different sources.

In the Messenger we pointed out other weaknesses in the BYU computer study. One, for instance, is that a modern edition of the Book of Mormon was used instead of the original 1830 edition. Since there have been thousands of changes in the Book of Mormon, this could make a real difference. Dr. D. James Croft, Professor of Management Science, Graduate School of Business, University of Utah, has written an interesting critique of the methods used by the BYU researchers. In his article, which appeared in Sunstone, we find the following comments:

Unfortunately, close scrutiny of the study indicates that the encouraging conclusions of its authors may be premature and that several areas of the study seem vulnerable to criticism: . . . some authorities in the field of statistical stylistics have serious reservations about these notions concerning the stability, or even the existence, of measurable style. One of the foremost experts in the field of computer and statistical analysis of style is Richard W. Bailey at the University of Michigan. He has said:

The term “wordprint” is an unfortunate one since it reminds people of fingerprints. We know that fingerprints are valid; voiceprints are somewhat dubious; and we’re not sure if “wordprints” even exist.

The reason for Bailey’s pessimism is that there are several studies which show an author’s style is not statistically stable across time, subject matter, and literary form. . . . There are numerous studies which have shown there are distinct style differences between written and spoken works by the same author. This finding is particularly relevant for the Larsen study since some Book of Mormon authors are primarily historians (Mormon and Moroni) and use the written form, whereas others are orators (King Benjamin and Samuel the Lamanite) and use the spoken form of communication. Therefore, the possibility exists that some of the statistical differences the Larsen group found might be due to the contrast between written and spoken literary forms.

The major stylistics authority cited in the Larsen article, A. Q. Morton, also pointed out that spoken and written styles differ: . . . Morton demonstrated this point by showing that the rate of use of the definite article varied among the nine books of history by Herodotus despite an undisputed single author. Morton emphasized that the cases in which commonly used words provide valid tests of authorship are “Exceptional situations.” . . .

Thus, the very existence of measurable, unique author styles is questioned by people in the field of stylistics. The stability of these styles (if they exist) across time, subject matter, and literary form is a matter of intense debate. Since the Larsen study of the Book of Mormon authors used common words as measures of wordprints and did not allow for style differences between the historians and the orators, its results are subject to the same uncertainty and debate. . . .

The fact that Larsen and his associates used edited manuscripts as raw data makes their study vulnerable to still another kind of potentially damaging criticism. It is understandable that the researchers used the current edition of the Book of Mormon since it is stored on computer-readable magnetic tapes . . .

While using the computer tapes to assign words in this fashion avoided some potentially subtle statistical problems, it introduced others. The major problem with using these tapes as the source for the words (and thus the wordprints) of Book of Mormon authors is that the current edition of the Book of Mormon is an edited version of the original 1830 edition. The critical question of whether any of the potential nineteenth-century authors actually wrote the Book of Mormon cannot be answered adequately unless unedited passages from the Book of Mormon are compared with unedited passages from the writings of candidate authors. . . .

There are enough editorial changes between the current edition of the Book of Mormon and the 1830 edition to make this a significant consideration. . . . The significant point for the Larsen study is the fact that most of these minor changes involve the commonly used, noncontextual words which the researchers used to establish their wordprints.

For instance, the word that was listed by the Larsen group as the fourth most commonly used word in the Book of Mormon. It occurs 5717 times and was used in most of the tests and results reported in the Larsen study. However there are over 250 places where that occurs in the 1830 edition but not in the present edition. . . .

An even bigger problem arises with the word which. This word is the eleventh most commonly used word in the present edition. It occurs 1716 times. But in the 1830 edition of the Book of Mormon, which was often used in places where who or whom should have been used. There are over nine hundred changes of this type where which no longer appears. That is, the frequency of using which is underestimated by more than one-third when we use the present edition of the Book of Mormon rather than the 1830 edition. While this word was not used in all the tests reported in the Larsen study, those in which it was used cannot be considered valid. . . . Only tests using the 1830 edition will meet generally-accepted experimental design standards.

The data used to establish the word patterns of nineteenth-century authors had similar difficulties. Some of the passages of these authors were taken from the Evening and Morning Star, the Messenger and Advocate, and the Times and Seasons, all of which are edited sources. Only part of the passages used to determine Joseph Smith’s wordprints were taken from unedited works like his journal or personal letters. . . .

The problems of comparing one set of edited words (from the Book of Mormon) to another set of largely edited words (from dissimilar works of the nineteenth-century authors) with the expectation that statistically subtle (and arguably nonexistent) wordprints remain intact are substantial, at best. Larsen and his colleagues need to do significant work in addressing these issues. . . .

A number of experimental design problems which seriously weakened the study were left unresolved by the Larsen research group. In some cases, the Larsen group also overstated the possible conclusions pointed to by their statistical test results.

The first experimental design problem concerns the often-used Book of Mormon phrase “And it came to pass that. . . .” . . . the incidence of the six words in the phrase “And it came to pass that” is highly dependent on the literary form. An occurrence of any one of those six words in a passage of Book of Mormon material is correlated with an occurrence of the other five words and gives an immediate indication that the author is likely to be a historian. Thus the words in that phrase should not be labeled as “noncontextual.” . . .

The magnitude of the bias that was introduced by the phrase “And it came to pass that” can be noted by examining the words which the researchers used in the Larsen study. The chart . . . shows the 38 words used for most of the test reported in the Larsen study. These words are arranged in the order of frequency with which they appear in the Book of Mormon. The researchers used only the first ten words from this list in many of their statistical tests; these top ten include four of the words in the “And it came to pass that” phrase. In other tests involving the entire set of 38 words, the fact that all six words from this phrase are among the 15 most frequently-used words means that some indeterminate portion of the difference in wordprints of authors found by the researchers is solely attributable to this phrase.

A sound research design must overcome this deficiency. Narrative passages and oratorical passages must be treated separately if the “And it came to pass that” phrase is not to bias the results. . . . Most past work in statistical analysis of style has been done with much less sophisticated statistical tools. Little work has been done with MANOVA and discriminant analysis. Thus we do not know very much about how these tools react when applied to word patterns of the same author and to word patterns of different authors. It may be that due to their sensitivity they can “find” statistically significant differences in the styles of a single author. Even the simple statistical techniques have found these kinds of differences in some works. Thus a statistical difference in the styles of two passages does not necessarily mean they were written by different authors . . .

The considerable problems in experimental design and in the way results were expressed raise questions about the validity of the conclusions drawn from the Larsen study. We do not know, of course, whether tightening the assumptions made about the notion of wordprints, using unedited materials, strengthening experimental design, and more carefully and cautiously drawing conclusions will alter the results. It may not. But as long as even one type of weakness remains, meaningful conclusions cannot be drawn. . . . any study of Book of Mormon authorship styles should deal with unedited materials. The 1830 edition of the Book of Mormon must be used . . . Original passages of writing, unedited for grammar or awkwardness, must be used to represent the work of any nineteenth-century authors to which Book of Mormon passages are compared. . . .

Results based on the next generation of wordprint studies may yet provide the encouraging support sought by faithful Church members. . . . At the present time, however, given the tentative nature of “Wordprints” and given the data and experimental design problems inherent in the Larsen study, it would be best to reserve judgment concerning whether or not it is possible to prove the existence of multiple authors of the Book of Mormon. (Sunstone, March-April 1981, pp. 16-18, 20-21)

In response to Croft’s critique, Wayne A. Larsen and Alvin C. Rencher state:

Many of Professor Croft’s points seem to invalidate, or at least blunt, the findings and implications of our study. But we feel that a closer examination of his arguments shows our major conclusions are still valid. (Ibid., p. 22)

In the conclusion to their article, the BYU researchers say:

We do not believe our work, or any work in this area, will be unassailable. This is to ask for more than this science can give. Perhaps editorial pressures and our own enthusiasm caused us to make a few statements that upon closer examination may need some revision. Like any beginning work, it is subject to revisions and reinterpretations as additional data emerge. Yet we believe our study is strong evidence in favor of multiple authorship in the Book of Mormon. (Ibid., p. 26)

Edward H. Ashment, of the Translation Department of the Mormon Church, has voiced some serious reservations concerning the fantastic claims of the BYU researchers. In a letter to the editor of Sunstone, November-December 1980, page 6, Ashment observes:

The word-print analysis of the text of the Book of Mormon no more solves the problem of authorship than an earlier study in which Rencher was involved solves the authorship of the Isaiah text. . . . However exciting it may be, at best this study must be regarded as preliminary and as representing only one approach. The only conclusions that ultimately can be valid will result from holistic research.

We believe that computers may eventually prove to be very helpful in sorting out writing styles. At the present time, however, we are skeptical about this method. We feel that there are many factors that could affect such a study. Just as in the analysis of handwriting, we are concerned that the interpretation of the data can be affected by the person who studies it. We remember that many years ago a computer expert declared that all of the letters of Paul in the Bible were forgeries except for the book of Romans! We were, of course, not willing to accept such a startling claim just on the basis of a computer study, and we doubt that a Mormon would receive it without additional evidence. A recent article in the Washington Post speaks of “a credibility problem” with regard to the use of computers to determine authorship:

LONDON—A computer struck a blow for religious fundamentalism in a study of the Book of Genesis reported here by the Guardian newspaper the other day. But skepticism dies hard.

Vexing questions have been posed by the kind of people who write letters to newspapers. The upshot, as the reader will have already imagined, is that the computer has a credibility problem.

The original study was conducted in Israel by a team that included a biblical scholar, a statistician and a mathematician. They sought to resolve by high-tech methods a bitter dispute as to whether Genesis was written by many hands, as most modern scholars claim or, as the fundamentalists assert, by a single person, namely Moses.

The 20,000 Hebrew words of Genesis were fed into a computer, then tested against 54 different criteria on the issue of the one and the many. . . . The result was an overwhelming win for Moses. According to one of the team of scholars, it is 82 percent probable that Genesis was the work of a single author.

The Rev. Roger Tomes . . . was not satisfied. . . . He ran the exact same tests on two passages of Genesis generally considered to have been written by different authors.

The tests of the definite article, of the length of words and of the use of the conjunction “and” showed a high degree of common authorship. But Tomes ascribes that result not to single authorship but to the character of the Hebrew language. “There are,” he wrote, “some similarities in the more formal kinds of language behavior.”

But one test, richness of vocabulary, goes beyond the structure of the language to the character of the author. There, wide divergencies cropped up. One passage of 469 words used only 98 different bits of vocabulary. The second passage contained 112 different bits in a total of 287 words. Quite a difference, and Tomes could not resist a little crowing. “The case for single authorship,” he wrote, “has a formidable obstacle to overcome here.” . . . I saw Eric Silver, the author of the original Guardian article, here in London. I mentioned the letter from Tomes.

Silver, it developed, had harbored doubts about the computer all along. In preparing his story there had emerged a telling point that he had not included. The research team had also done an analysis on Immanuel Kant. The same tests that disclosed that Genesis was 82 percent likely to have been composed by a single author were applied to the works of Kant. The probability that the works of Kant were written by a single person was, the analysis disclosed, only 7 percent.

In other words, just as there are some things in modern life beyond the reach of Genesis, so there are other matters to which computers are poor guides. But alas, just as there is religious fundamentalism, so there is computer fundamentalism. (The Washington Post, November 15, 1981)

6. Archaeology and the Book of Mormon

Some members of the Mormon Church have made fantastic claims about archaeologists using the Book of Mormon. For instance, we are informed that a letter which was written to Ernest L. English on May 3, 1936, was duplicated and "distributed to LDS church members by leaders (local) in Cleveland, Ohio in 1959." We quote the following from that letter:

The inquiry you made regarding the Book of Mormon is a commendable one and I will be pleased to mention the part which it has played in helping the government to unravel the problem of the aborigines.

The Book of Mormon was first brought to the attention of the Smithsonian Institution by James H. Fairchild, a New York editor. At first the account was not taken seriously, . . . It was recognized because it contained many excellent philosophical assertions, but apparently was not regarded as having any historical value until about 1884. . . . it was 1920 before the Smithsonian Institution officially recognized the Book of Mormon as a record of any value. All discoveries up to this time were found to fit the Book of Mormon accounts and so the heads of the Archaeological Department decided to make an effort to discover some of the larger cities described in the Book of Mormon records.

All members of the department were required to study the account and make rough-maps of the various populated centers. When I visited the Smithsonian Institute Library in 1933 I noticed that there were over thirty copies of the Book of Mormon on file. During the past fifteen years the Institute has made remarkable study of its investigations of the Mexican Indians and it is true that the Book of Mormon has been the guide to almost all of the major discoveries.

When Col. Lindbergh flew to South America five years ago, he was able to sight heretofore undiscovered cities which the archaeologists at the Institute had mapped out according to the locations described in the Book of Mormon. This record is now quoted by the members of the Institute as an authority and is recognized by all advanced students in the field.

Because of many false statements, such as the one cited above, the Smithsonian Institution has been forced to publish a statement concerning these matters (see photograph of this statement below). In this statement we find the following:

1. The Smithsonian Institution has never used the Book of Mormon in any way as a scientific guide. Smithsonian archeologists see no connection between the archeology of the New World and the subject matter of the Book.

STATEMENT REGARDING THE BOOK OF MORMON

The Smithsonian Institution has received hundreds of inquiries in recent years regarding the use of the Book of Mormon as a guide to archeological researches. Answers to questions most commonly asked are as follows:

1. The Smithsonian Institution has never used the Book of Mormon in any way as a scientific guide. Smithsonian archeologists see no connection between the archeology of the New World and the subject matter of the Book.
2. The physical type of the American Indian is basically Mongoloid, being most closely related to that of the peoples of eastern, central, and northeastern Asia. Archeological evidence indicates that the ancestors of the present Indians came into the New World--probably over a land bridge known to have existed in the Bering Strait region during the last Ice Age--in a continuing series of small migrations beginning about 30,000 years ago.
3. Present evidence indicates that the first people to reach this continent from the East were the Norsemen who arrived in the northeastern part of North America around A.D. 1000. There is nothing to show that they reached Mexico or Central America.
4. There is increasing evidence of the spread of cultural traits to MesoAmerica and the northwestern coast of South America across the Pacific, beginning several thousand years before the Christian era. However, these appear to be the result of accidental voyages originating in eastern and southern Asia and show no relationship to ancient Egyptian or Hebrew cultures.
5. We know of no authentic cases of ancient Egyptian or Hebrew writing having been found in the New World. Reports of findings of Egyptian influence in the Mexican and Central American areas have been published in newspapers and magazines from time to time, but thus far no reputable Egyptologist has been able to discover any relationship between Mexican remains and those in Egypt.
6. There are two copies of the Book of Mormon (and part of a third copy) in the United States National Museum, and another copy was sent by the Smithsonian library to the Library of Congress for deposit. Two of these were gift copies, and one was received by transfer from another government agency. One or two members of the staff have personal copies that were presented to them by Mormons.

Frank H. H. Roberts, Jr., of the Smithsonian Institution, made this statement in a letter dated February 16, 1951:

In reply to your letter of February 11, 1951, permit me to say that the mistaken idea that the Book of Mormon has been used by scientific organizations in conducting archeological explorations has become quite current in recent years. It can be stated definitely that there is no connection between the archeology of the New World and the subject matter of the Book of Mormon.

There is no correspondence whatever between archeological sites and cultures as revealed by scientific investigations and as recorded in the Book of Mormon, hence the book cannot be regarded as having any historical value from the standpoint of the aboriginal peoples of the New World.

The Smithsonian Institution has never officially recognized the Book of Mormon as a record of value on scientific matters, and the Book has never been used as a guide or source of information for discovering ruined cities. (Letter dated February 16, 1951, photographically reproduced in The Book of Mormon Examined, by Arthur Budvarson, La Mesa, California, 1959, p. 37)

In a letter to Marvin Cowan, Frank H. H. Roberts stated:

There is no evidence whatever of any migration from Israel to America, and likewise no evidence that pre-Columbian Indians had any knowledge of Christianity or the Bible. (Letter dated January 24, 1963)

The University Archaeological Society at Brigham Young University published these comments concerning the statement from the Smithsonian Institution:

For as long as we can remember, and perhaps for a good while before that, the claim has been circulated among uniformed Latter-day Saints that some important non-LDS research organization “back east” has been using the Book of Mormon as a guide in its archaeological field work. However, when the question comes up as to just which institution is involved, no one seems able to identify it, although the Smithsonian Institution of Washington is sometimes mentioned as a possibility. A brief examination of this extraordinary claim will bring to light some of the difficulties it entails. In the first place the Book is not, in its present form, a suitable “guide” for archaeological field work: The ancient authors seem not to have had in mind the problems of geographical identification which face the modern archaeologist. . . . he approximate location of its principal cities, has yet been published. If Latter-day Saints themselves have not yet accomplished this task, how can Smithsonian or any other non-LDS archaeologists be expected to use the Book of Mormon as a guide for field work?

In a word, we believe this claim to be false. . . .

So many inquiries have nevertheless been sent to the Smithsonian Institution on this subject that the following printed statement has been used . . . to save time in answering letters: . . . [a copy of the statement follows]

. . . our reasons for urging Latter-day Saints to refrain from writing Smithsonian on this subject may be different from those of the Institution itself. It is simply that that organization, . . . is not set up to handle problems of this kind. Their scholars appear to have no special knowledge of the actual contents of the Book of Mormon, nor in fact any special competence in the methodology of historical archaeology, . . . they appear to have no interest in examining the claims of such a peculiar writing as the Book of Mormon, . . . it is unlikely that they could give suitable answers to inquiries on this subject.

We should rather like to suggest that questions . . . be addressed to the University Archaeological Society, an organization which was created to assist Latter-day Saints in this very field. (University Archaeological Society Newsletter, Brigham Young University, April 16, 1965, pp. 5-7)

George Crossette, of National Geographic Magazine, has made this statement concerning the idea that the Book of Mormon is used by archaeologists:

The National Geographic Society has been asked several times whether the Book of Mormon has been substantiated by archeological findings. We referred this question to Dr. Neil M. Judd, a noted archeologist at the Smithsonian Institution. His reply follows:

Neither representatives of the National Geographic Society nor, to my knowledge, archeologists connected with any other institution of equal prestige have ever used the Book of Mormon in locating historic ruins in Middle America or elsewhere.

(Letter dated October 21, 1965)

In his pamphlet Archeology and the Book of Mormon, Hal Hougey gives us the following information:

The numerous books and articles by Latter-day Saints over the years have shown that Mormons believe that the fruits of archeological research may properly be applied to verify the Book of Mormon. Dr. Ross T. Christensen, a Mormon anthropologist, agrees with this in the following quotations from the Newsletter of the University Archaeological Society which has its headquarters at Brigham Young University in Provo, Utah:

. . . the Book of Mormon is in such a key position in relation to the Latter-day Saint religion as a whole that the entire structure of the latter must stand or fall with the verification or refutation of the former; and finally, that the Book of Mormon is of such a nature that its validity can be submitted to a thorough and objective scientific test. (U.A.S. Newsletter, no. 64, January 30, 1960, pp. 5-6)

Latter-day Saints have only recently entered seriously into the field of anthropology, . . . It was not until 1938 that the first Latter-day Saint earned a doctorate in anthropology (M. Wells Jakeman, at the University of California). In 1946 a Department of Archaeology was established at Brigham Young University. This department “was particularly dedicated to researchers bearing on the Scriptures upon which Latter-day Saints base their faith” (Ibid., pp. 1, 2).

While there are today fewer Latter-day Saints with doctor’s degrees in anthropology than there are fingers on one’s right hand, these few have served to curtail the extravagant claims which Mormon missionaries have made. . . .

When Mormon missionaries make their extravagant claims about American archeology proving the Book of Mormon, we need only to refer them to the following statements by their own anthropologists:

The statement that the Book of Mormon has already been proved by archaeology is misleading. The truth of the matter is that we are only now beginning to see even the outlines of the archaeological time-periods which could compare with those of the Book of Mormon. How, then, can the matter have been settled once and for all? That such an idea could exist indicates the ignorance of many of our people with regard to what is going on in the historical and anthropological sciences. (Christensen in U.A.S. Newsletter, no. 64, January 30, 1960, p. 3)

Many times, Mormon missionaries have told their investigators that such late-period ruins as Monte Alban (periods 3-5), Yagul, and Mitla were built by the Nephites and that the archaeologists would confirm this. Both claims are untrue. However, the earliest periods of the area, Monte Alban 1 and 2, although as yet little known, are of Preclassic (i.e. Book of Mormon period) date. One may think of these earlier peoples as Jaredites or Nephites, but if so it must be on the basis of faith, not archaeology, for so far there is no explicit evidence that Book of Mormon peoples occupied this area [Oaxaca, in the Isthmus of Tehuantepec area of Mexico]. (Joseph E. Vincent in U.A.S. Newsletter, no. 66, May 7, 1960, p. 2)

Christensen chides his brethren with the following comment:

As for the notion that the Book of Mormon has already been proved by archaeology, I must say with Shakespeare, "Lay not that flattering unktion to your soul!" (Hamlet 3:4). (U.A.S. Newsletter, no. 64, January 30, 1960, p. 3)

What about the Mormon claim that non-Mormons have found the Book of Mormon helpful as a guide in locating ruins of cities in Central America? M. Wells Jakeman, Mormon anthropologist, answers this question:

It must be confessed that some members of the "Mormon" or Latter-day Saint Church are prone, in their enthusiasm for the Book of Mormon, to make claims for it that cannot be supported. So far as is known to the writer, no non-Mormon archaeologist at the present time is using the Book of Mormon as a guide in archaeological research. Nor does he know of any non-Mormon archaeologist who holds that the American Indians are descendants of the Jews, or that Christianity was known in America in the first century of our era. This in itself, of course, does not disprove the Book of Mormon; for not enough is yet known of the actual period of that record in ancient America, or of the origin of the American Indians, for a final judgment at this time, scientifically speaking. (Ibid., no. 57, March 25, 1959, p. 4)

With the exception of Latter-day Saint archaeologists, members of the archaeological profession do not, and never have, espoused the Book of Mormon in any sense of which I am aware. Non-Mormon archaeologists do not allow the Book of Mormon any place whatever in their reconstruction of the early history of the New World. (Christensen in U.A.S. Newsletter, no. 64, January 30, 1960, p. 3)

We conclude, therefore, that the Book of Mormon remains completely unverified by archeology. The claims Mormon missionaries have made are fallacious and misleading. Many honest and sincere people who have no background or training in the field of archeology have been converted to Mormonism at least in part because of their false conviction that American archeology has verified the Book of Mormon record. (Archeology and the Book of Mormon, by Hal Hougey, Concord, Calif., pp. 3-7)

John L. Sorenson, a Mormon archaeologist who was assistant Professor of Anthropology and Sociology at BYU, made these comments concerning some of the Mormon books on archaeology and the Book of Mormon:

Various individuals unconnected with these institutionalized activities have also wrestled with the archaeological problem. Few of the writings they have produced are of genuine consequence in archaeological terms. Some are clearly on the oddball fringe; others have credible qualifications. Two of the most prolific are Professor Hugh Nibley and Milton R. Hunter; however, they are not qualified to handle the archaeological materials their works often involve.

... As long as Mormons generally are willing to be fooled by (and pay for) the uninformed, uncritical drivel about archaeology and the scriptures which predominates, the few L.D.S. experts are reluctant even to be identified with the topic. (Dialogue: A Journal of Mormon Thought, Spring 1966, pp. 145, 149)

In a paper presented at the "Thirteenth Annual Symposium on the Archaeology of the Scriptures," April 1, 1961, at the Brigham Young University, Clark S. Knowlton made the following observations:

Unfortunately many of our Mormon researchers have lacked the necessary training in archaeological techniques and data analysis to properly evaluate the archaeological materials that they were using. Others who were not well read in the literature of archaeology made rather serious errors in interpretation and analysis that might have been avoided if the writers had a greater familiarity with the writings of modern American archaeologists. This ignorance of the history, theory, techniques, and basic conclusions of American archaeology has caused many of our writers to fall into intellectual pitfalls. The several examples that follow are indicative of the many that exist.

Several writers have gone to great lengths to assemble lists of words taken from many different Indian languages. They have compared these word lists to similar lists in the Hebrew language. Through a comparison of these word lists they have hoped to prove a definite relationship between Hebrew and the Indian languages. Indian languages, however, differ enormously in matters of grammatical structure and sound system as well as in vocabulary. The matter of the relationships between them is still a subject of considerable debate and disagreement. By careful word selection from a group of Indian languages taken at random it is possible to compare word lists that might resemble similar lists from almost any European or Asiatic language. Such word lists have little value and prove nothing unless a thoroughgoing linguistic comparison is made of the grammatical structure, sound system, vocabulary, and the possibilities of historical contact of the two languages involved in the comparison.

The publication of magnificent volumes of photographs of the ruins of buildings and cities located in the area of high civilizations in the Americas is another example. These lavishly illustrated books are frequently written and published in an endeavor to prove that complex civilizations existed in the Book of Mormon period. Unfortunately, their photographs for the most part are of cities that were built after the Book of Mormon period had ended. They can thus have little bearing on the problem of the cultural characteristics of the Book of Mormon peoples.

There is also the human tendency to erect out of zeal for one's beliefs complex theories about the origin, the cultural relationships, the migratory routes, the areas of entry into the Americas, and the location of the civilizations mentioned in the Book of Mormon. There is not yet enough evidence from past or present archaeological work to firmly support many theories in this area. Before much along this line can be done there must be sent into the areas of possible Book of Mormon occupancy many properly equipped and staffed archeological expeditions.

And finally, there is the tendency to utilize only those writers or authors whose points of view support our own and to ignore completely those who differ from us. As many scholars in the nineteenth century speculated on the possible connections between the Ten Tribes of Israel and the American Indians and sought out evidence to support such relationships, their writings are abundantly used by some of our own writers. The writings of the majority of modern archaeologists who do not accept the present possibility of such connections are ignored. In several recent books by Mormon writers, the archaeologists and authorities quoted all lived before 1920. None who have worked in recent years are mentioned. It is as though archaeology came to an end before 1930.

Because of these factors, books and articles written by Mormons on the archaeology of the Americas or on the relationship of archaeological discoveries to the problems of the Book of Mormon find it difficult to receive a non-biased analysis by non-Mormon scholars. There is unfortunately prejudice in the field against publications in archaeology by members of our Church as all too often such works have contained unsupported speculations, wishful thinking, and theories resting on little evidence.

The problems created by the lack of knowledge among our people of the basic theories, techniques, conclusions, and practices of American archaeology can be remedied only by the development of a group of men who are both trained archaeologists and faithful members of the Church. . . .

Another weakness that has handicapped the formation of a genuine field of study of Book of Mormon archaeology is the tendency among many Mormon scholars and students in the area of Book of Mormon archaeology to divide into conflicting schools of thought. These competitive schools among us have been characterized by professional feuding, academic jealousies, personality conflicts, and maneuvering for control of publication outlets. ### A Pagan People

M. T. Lamb once made this interesting observation concerning archaeology and the Book of Mormon:

The presentation in the previous chapter is only one point. We shall find a great many other representations of the Book of Mormon equally at fault, squarely and flatly contradicted by the facts of ancient American history.

For instance, what can be more clearly stated than the religious condition of this country, especially Central America, for a period of over two hundred years after Christ? A Christian civilization prevailed all over both continents.

... nothing could be wider from the truth, unless all ancient American history is a lie, and its ten thousand relics tell false tales.

It may be stated in a general way that there never has been a time upon this western hemisphere within the historic period, or within three thousand years past, when a uniform civilization of any kind prevailed over both continents.

But this will be considered hereafter. We are to learn now—

1st. That a Christian civilization has never existed in Central America, not even for a day.

2d. The people of Central America, as far back as their record has been traced (and that is centuries earlier than the alleged beginning of Nephite history), have always been an idolatrous people, as thoroughly heathen as any which the history of the world has described, worshipping idols the most hideous in form and feature that have ever been found upon earth, and accompanying that worship by human sacrifices as barbarous as the annals of history have recorded.

... A sad fatality, is it not, dear reader, that in the very region of country where the Book of Mormon fixes magnificent temples and sanctuaries erected by a Christian people for the worship of the true God, there should be dug up out of the ruins of old temples and palaces such relics of the real religion of these ancient peoples? All the records that have come down to us make it certain that these horrid idols instead of the Lord Jesus were worshipped throughout Central America 2000 years ago. It would indeed be a bright page in Central American history if the assertions of the Book of Mormon were true. But no such bright spot can be discovered either in the Nahuatl or the Mayan records. For more than three thousand years it was one unbroken record of superstition and human slaughter. . . . The entire civilization of the Book of Mormon, its whole record from beginning to end is flatly contradicted by the civilization and the history of Central America. (The Golden Bible; or, The Book of Mormon. Is It From God?, by Rev. M. T. Lamb, New York, 1887, pp. 284-289)

A Lost Civilization

Dr. Hugh Nibley, of the BYU, tries to explain away the fact that archaeologists have not found any evidence that the Nephites or Jaredites ever existed:

Book of Mormon archaeologists have often been disappointed in the past because they have consistently looked for the wrong things. We should not be surprised at the lack of ruins in America in general. . . . In view of the nature of their civilization one should not be puzzled if the Nephites had left us no ruins at all. People underestimate the capacity of things to disappear, and do not realize that the ancients almost never built of stone. Many a great civilization which has left a notable mark in history and literature has left behind not a single recognizable trace of itself. We must stop looking for the wrong things. . . .

Proceed with Caution!: There is certainly no shortage of ruins on this continent, but until some one object has been definitely identified as either Nephite or Jaredite it is dangerous to start drawing any conclusions. . . . The search must go on, but conclusions should wait. We are asking for trouble when we describe any object as Nephite or Jaredite, since, as Woolley says, “no record is ever exhaustive,” and at any moment something might turn up (and often does!) to require a complete reversal of established views. Aside from the danger of building faith on the “highly ambiguous materials” of archaeology and the “unavoidable subjective” and personal interpretations of the same, we should remember that archaeology at its best is a game of surprises.

A Disappointing Picture: People often ask, if the Book of Mormon is true, why do we not find this continent littered with mighty ruins? In the popular view the normal legacy of any great civilization is at least some majestic piles in the moonlight. Where are your Jaredite and Nephite splendors of the past? A reading of previous lessons should answer that question. In the Nephites we have a small and mobile population dispersed over a great land area, living in quickly-built wooden cities, their most ambitious structures being fortifications of earth and timbers occasionally reinforced with stones. This small nation lasted less than a thousand years. Their far more numerous and enduring contemporaries, the Lamanites and their associates including Jaredite remnants (which we believe were quite extensive) had a type of culture that leaves little if anything behind it.

. . . We have no description of any Book of Mormon city to compare with Homer’s description of Troy. How shall we recognize a Nephite city when we find it? (An Approach to the Book of Mormon, by Hugh Nibley, Salt Lake City, 1957, pp. 366, 370, 373)

M. Wells Jakeman, Professor of Archaeology at the BYU, differed sharply with Dr. Nibley and accused him of misrepresentation:

Unfortunately, the author’s discussion of the archaeological approach to the Book of Mormon is vitiated by an apparent attempt to implant an emotional judgment in the mind of his reader against this approach or the way it is being developed. Thus he refers disparagingly to those investigating this field as “people calling themselves archaeologists” (p. 366) and “these self-appointed archaeologists” (p. 363). He then—although not an archaeologist himself—proceeds to instruct the reader as to what archaeology is, and as to its true value for the Book of Mormon. . . .

The misrepresentations and misconceptions comprising the “instructions” on archaeology given in this appendix are too numerous to deal with completely here. . . .

Turning to the author’s “instructions” with respect to the special field of Book of Mormon archaeology . . . we find that his main “teaching” here is that Book of Mormon archaeologists “have consistently looked for the wrong things”; i.e., they have been looking for the cities of the Nephites as marked by the ruins of great stone buildings (pp. 366, 370-375). . . .

Unfortunately, in these “instructions” the author, instead of providing advice of real value to Book of Mormon archaeologists, merely reveals his own complete unawareness of the actual situation in this field. . . . the Nephite people . . . usually built their dwellings, temples, and palaces of timber or wood, and their fortifications of earth, rather than of stone (although stone appears to have been used occasionally, as also cement and probably brick). . . . Apparently the author did little reading in the actual field of Book of Mormon archaeology before penning his “Advice to Book of Mormon Archaeologists.” . . . that “the ancients almost never built of stone” must surely be an intentional exaggeration. . . .

Finally, we cannot pass by the author’s reference to “the lack of ruins in America in general.” This is truly an astonishing statement from one presuming to give instructions involving American archaeology! . . . That the Book of Mormon civilizations, thus being mainly nomadic, could have flourished in the New World and yet not left behind any archaeological or material evidence of their existence, is supported, according to the author, by the fact that “many a great civilization which has left a notable mark in [Old World] history and literature has left behind not a single recognizable [archaeological] trace of itself” (p. 366; “that they existed there is not the slightest doubt, yet some of the greatest have left not so much as a bead or a button that can be definitely identified”—p. 371).

Two serious misconceptions are apparent in the above argument. First of all, the idea that the Book of Mormon peoples were mainly nomadic simply ignores the numerous indications in the Record to the contrary. . . . the Book of Mormon refers time and again to permanent settlements of its peoples—“cities,” “towns,” or “villages,” with grain fields round about—and only rarely to temporary settlements (tent encampments). . . . the Book of Mormon peoples, instead of having a “type of culture [namely nomadic] that leaves little if anything behind it,” as claimed by the author, in reality had cultures of mainly sedentary type, which—as proved by the results of archaeological excavation throughout the world—invariably leave behind extensive material remains!

The other serious misconception of the author . . . is his belief that nomadic hunting or herding cultures, . . . in his view, leave “little if anything” behind them . . . Now all students of archaeology will know that this claim is directly opposite to the fact. Even though ruins, or the remains of buildings, are not ordinarily left behind by nomadic cultures, the literature of archaeology is full of excavation reports and other descriptions of material remains marking the camp or cave sites of such cultures—in fact, remains often of kinds that last almost indefinitely, and therefore may easily survive from the time of the Book of Mormon cultures: stone and bone implements, food-refuse heaps . . . Consequently, even if the Book of Mormon peoples had been mainly nomadic—which we have seen they were not—a great deal in the way of material remains or archaeological traces of their existence would have had to be expected. . . . Archaeology also most surely has the final word with respect to the existence of an entire ancient culture itself. At least this is so in the case of an urban culture of many-centuries’ duration, featured by numerous permanent settlements, such as the civilizations of the Book of Mormon; it is inconceivable—and contrary to world-wide archaeological experience—that such civilizations could ever have existed without leaving some identifiable remains.

Indeed, a serious misrepresentation of the value of archaeological materials as sources of historical information must be charged to the author. (The University Archaeological Society Newsletter, BYU, March 30, 1957, pp. 1-7)

Dr. Hugh Nibley seems to realize that archaeology has not provided any real support for the story found in the Book of Mormon, and therefore in his most recent book he still maintains that archaeologists are looking “for the wrong things in the wrong places”:

Recently a Protestant journal of wide circulation reported with obvious satisfaction that there is “no non-Mormon archaeologist who holds that the Indians descended from the Jews, or that Christianity was known in the New World before Columbus.” That is hardly surprising. For years we have pointed out that such results are only to be expected as long as people insist on looking for the wrong things in the wrong places. How could an archaeologist, of all people, hope to prove “that the Indians descended from the Jews, or that Christianity was known in the New World before Columbus”? (Since Cumorah, Salt Lake City, 1967, p. 162)

On pages 243-244 of the same book, Dr. Nibley admits that there is no real archaeological evidence to prove that the Nephites ever existed:

From the first both Mormons and their opponents recognized the possibility of testing the Book of Mormon in a scientific way. The book described certain aspects of civilizations purporting to have existed in the New World in ancient times. Very well, where were the remains? A vast amount of time, energy, and patience has been expended in arguing about the interpretations of the scanty evidence that is available, but very little has been devoted to the systematic search for more. Of course, almost any object could conceivably have some connection with the Book of Mormon, but nothing short of an inscription which could be read and roughly dated could bridge the gap between what might be called a pre-actualistic archaeology and contact with the realities of Nephite civilization.

The possibility that a great nation or empire that once dominated vast areas of land and flourished for centuries could actually get lost and stay lost in spite of every effort of men to discover its traces, has been demonstrated many times since Schliemann found the real world of the Mycenaeans. . . .

So it is with the Nephites. All that we have to go on to date is a written history. That does not mean that our Nephites are necessarily mythical, since the case of those Old World civilizations has taught us by now that the existence of written records which no one claims the credit of having invented, is in itself good if not the best evidence that a people really did exist. But as things stand we are still in the pre-archaeological and pre-anthropological stages of Book of Mormon study. Which means that there is nothing whatever that an anthropologist or archaeologist as such can say about the Book of Mormon. Nephite civilization was urban in nature, like the civilizations of Athens or Babylon, and was far more confined in space and time than either of them. It could just as easily and completely vanish from sight as did the worlds of Ugarit, Ur, or Cnossos; and until some physical remnant of it, no matter how trivial, has been identified beyond question, what can any student of physical remains possibly have to say about it? Everything written so far by anthropologists or archaeologists—even real archaeologists—about the Book of Mormon must be discounted, for the same reason that we must discount studies of the lost Atlantis: not because it did not exist, but because it has not yet been found. (Since Cumorah, 1967, pp. 243-244)

In an address to the Brigham Young University Archaeological Society, March 25, 1964, Fletcher B. Hammond frankly stated that there does not yet appear any artifact that we Latter-day Saints can present to the world—and prove by any scientific rule—that such artifact is conclusive proof of any part of the Book of Mormon. The lack of certainty in Book of Mormon land marks justifies the conclusion that there must have been extensive land-changes in Mesoamerica during the last 1500 years; and such appears to be factual. (Geography of the Book of Mormon, by Fletcher B. Hammond, an address given March 25, 1964, BYU, p. 5)

The Mormon writer J. N. Washburn remarked that he was “strongly of the opinion that at the present time there are not many external evidences to the divinity of the Book of Mormon. Much that is often cited as evidence is, in my mind, wishful thinking” (Contents, Structure, and Authorship of the Book of Mormon, 1954, p. 203).

Joseph Fielding Smith, the tenth President of the Mormon Church, admits that archaeology does not prove the Book of Mormon:

We have no authentic evidence that archaeologists have depended on what is written in the Book of Mormon to aid them in their scientific research. . . .

It is the personal opinion of the writer that the Lord does not intend that the Book of Mormon, at least at the present time, shall be proved true by any archaeological findings. (Answers to Gospel Questions, vol. 2, Salt Lake City, 1958, pp. 95-96)

Mormon Scholars Face the Truth

Dee Green, Assistant Professor of Anthropology at Weber State College, has written an article for Dialogue. This article is very critical of “Book of Mormon archaeologists.” This is very significant because Mr. Green was at one time deeply involved in archaeological work at Brigham Young University. In 1953-54 he served as Assistant Editor of the University Archaeological Society Newsletter, and in 1958-61 he served as Editor. In his article for Dialogue: A Journal of Mormon Thought, Dee F. Green said:

Those volumes which most flagrantly ignore time and space and most radically distort, misinterpret, or ignore portions of the archaeological evidence are the popular Farnsworth volumes. Also inadequate, from a professional archaeologist’s point of view, are the well intentioned volumes by Milton R. Hunter and a number of smaller pamphlets and works by various authors. . . .

New World-Old World comparisons have been less popular but equally fraught with problems. The best known examples are the two volumes by Nibley which suffer from an overdose of “Old Worlditis.” In Near Eastern philology and history, Nibley has no peers in the Church—and probably few outside it—but he does not know New World culture history well, and his writing ignores the considerable indigenous elements in favor of exclusively Old World patterns. . . . Having spent a considerable portion of the past ten years functioning as a scientist dealing with New World archaeology, I find that nothing in so-called Book of Mormon archaeology materially affects my religious commitment one way or the other, and I do not see that the archaeological myths so common in our proselytizing program enhance the process of true conversion. . . .

The first myth we need to eliminate is that Book of Mormon archaeology exists. Titles on books full of archaeological half-truths, dilettanti on the peripheries of American archaeology calling themselves Book of Mormon archaeologists regardless of their education, and a Department of Archaeology at BYU devoted to the production of Book of Mormon archaeologists do not insure that Book of Mormon archaeology really exists. If one is to study Book of Mormon archaeology, then one must have a corpus of data with which to deal. We do not. The Book of Mormon is really there so one can have Book of Mormon studies, and archaeology is really there so one can study archaeology, but the two are not wed. At least they are not wed in reality since no Book of Mormon location is known with reference to modern topography. Biblical archaeology can be studied because we do know where Jerusalem and Jericho were and are, but we do not know where Zarahemla and Bountiful (nor any location for that matter) were or are. It would seem then that a concentration on geography should be the first order of business, but we have already seen that twenty years of such an approach has left us empty-handed. (Dialogue: A Journal of Mormon Thought, Summer 1969, pp. 74, 76, 77, 78)

In a footnote on page 77 of the same article, Dee Green stated:

With the single exception of Ross T. Christensen, no individual ever educated in the former BYU Archaeology Department considers himself a Book of Mormon Archae[o]logist. In fact, most of those who graduated have not pursued careers in anth[r]opology nor its sub-discipline archaeology, and those few of us who have become professionals have consistently found our early, BYU training highly inadequate and the points of view expressed there largely uninformed and sterile.

While we found Dee F. Green’s admissions rather startling, they cannot begin to compare with the surprise we received on December 2, 1970, when we received a visit from Thomas Stuart Ferguson.

Mr. Ferguson has devoted a great deal of his life trying to prove the Book of Mormon by archaeology and is recognized by the Mormon people as a great defender of the faith. He has written at least three books on the subject—one of them in collaboration with Milton R. Hunter of the First Council of the Seventy. On the jacket to his book, One Fold and One Shepherd, 1962, we find the following:

Thomas Stuart Ferguson, 47, President of the New World Archaeological Foundation, is a distinguished student of the earliest high civilizations of the New World. He, with Dr. A. V. Kidder, dean of Central American archaeologists, first planned the New World Archaeological Foundation in 1952. . . . He raised $225,000 for the field work, incorporated the Foundation (being an attorney), assisted in the initial explorations in Central America and Mexico and has actively directed the affairs of the Foundation since its inception.

John L. Sorenson gives this information:

... M. Wells Jakeman and Thomas Ferguson (and to some extent Milton Hunter), ... emphasized the documentary traditions and certain archaeological and geographical features of Mexico and Central America, placed in alignment with the Book of Mormon account. ... Ferguson produced a sort of landmark book, with Hunter's collaboration, and then went on to organize the New World Archaeological Foundation. His rationale, unlike that of Jakeman, was that work in archaeology necessary to clarify the place of the Book of Mormon account would have to be done in collaboration with non-Mormon experts, not in isolation from them. Thirteen years of changes in the NWAFF have seen it become converted into an element in the BYU structure and gain a respected position as a research agency in Mesoamerican archaeology, ... (Dialogue: A Journal of Mormon Thought, Spring, 1966, p. 145)

Thomas Stuart Ferguson really believed that archaeology would prove the Book of Mormon. In his book One Fold And One Shepherd, page 263, he stated:

The important thing now is to continue the digging at an accelerated pace in order to find more inscriptions dating to Book-of-Mormon times. Eventually we should find decipherable inscriptions in modified (reformed) Egyptian, in a modified or pure Hebrew or in cuneiform, referring to some unique person, place or event in the Book of Mormon.

In 1962 Mr. Ferguson wrote this statement concerning the Book of Mormon: "Powerful evidences sustaining the book are accumulating, not the least of which are the gold plates found in Iran" (Improvement Era, April 1962, p. 271).

The first indication we had that Mr. Ferguson was losing his faith in Mormonism was just after Joseph Smith's Egyptian Papyri were rediscovered. In 1968 he wrote us a letter saying that we were "doing a great thing—getting out some truth on the Book of Abraham."

Later we heard a rumor that he had given up Joseph Smith's Book of Abraham, but this hardly prepared us for his visit on December 2, 1970. At that time, Thomas Stuart Ferguson told us frankly that he had not only given up the Book of Abraham, but that he had come to the conclusion that Joseph Smith was not a prophet and that Mormonism was not true. He told us that he had spent 25 years trying to prove Mormonism, but had finally come to the conclusion that his work had been in vain. He said that his training in law had taught him how to weigh evidence and that the case against Joseph Smith was absolutely devastating and could not be explained away.

Mr. Ferguson was faced with a dilemma, for the Mormon Church had just given him a large grant ($100,000 or more) to carry on the archaeological research of the New World Archaeological Foundation. He felt, however, that the New World Archaeological Foundation was doing legitimate archaeological work, and therefore he intended to continue this work. Dee F. Green also feels that the New World Archaeological Foundation does honest work:

What I have chosen to call the Back-Door Approach is characteristic of the Brigham Young University New World Archaeological Foundation, an organization begun in the middle 1950's by Thomas S. Ferguson. It was eventually taken over by the Church and based at BYU, with a special Church committee under the direction of Elder Howard W. Hunter given jurisdiction over its direction and finances. ... It was made quite plain to me in 1963 when I was first employed by the BYU-NWAFF that my opinions with regard to Book of Mormon archaeology were to be kept to myself, and my field report was to be kept entirely from any such references. I welcomed the instruction as refreshing after my earlier days at BYU when everything the archaeology department did had to be "scripturally" related. ...

Just how much the foundation is doing to advance the cause of Book of Mormon archaeology depends on one's point of view about Book of Mormon archaeology. There have been no spectacular finds (from the Book of Mormon point of view), no Zarahemlas discovered, no gold plates brought to light, no horses uncovered, and King Benjamin's tomb remains unexcavated. But the rewards to the Church of the foundation's work, while a little elusive to the layman and the "seekers after a sign," will prove to be considerable in the perspective of history. (Dialogue: A Journal of Mormon Thought, Summer 1969, pp. 76-77)

From 1948 to 1961 the Department of Archaeology at Brigham Young University sent "five archaeological expeditions to Middle America," but no evidence for the Nephites was discovered. Since 1961 the church leaders apparently decided that it was better to give the money for field research in Mesoamerica to Thomas Stuart Ferguson's New World Archaeological Foundation. This seems to have been a real blow to the Department of Archaeology. Ross T. Christensen, of Brigham Young University, accuses the New World Archaeological Foundation of having "no apparent interest in the archaeology of the Scriptures" (Newsletter and Proceedings of the Society For Early Historic Archaeology, Brigham Young University, June, 1970, p. 9). In the same article Dr. Christensen said:

In 1961, the New World Archaeological Foundation was attached to Brigham Young University as an agency for field research in Mesoamerica. This organization had been a creation of Thomas Stuart Ferguson ... the Foundation has served BYU as its exclusive agent for archaeological excavations in Mesoamerica using LDS Church funds, and large appropriations have been spent in field research characterized by "strict scientific objectivity" and in the printing of a publication series which is "free from any scriptural interpretations" ...

(1) Since the attachment of the New World Archaeological Foundation to BYU in 1961 there has existed no departmental program of field research in Mesoamerica. While individual faculty members may obtain their own grants and make their own arrangements—as individuals—no field program organized by the Department as such and directed to the solution of specific Book of Mormon problems has been possible.

(2) The archaeology of the Scriptures, which once occupied the center of the picture, indeed was the very purpose for which the Department was created in the first place, now seems to be only a peripheral field. This great study, for which Elder Widtsoe and President McDonald had such high hopes and which from 1946 to 1959 occupied first place in the hearts of faculty and students alike and elicited such enthusiasm from them, has now been relegated to the position of simply a private research interest on the part of two of the Department's five faculty members. ... it cannot be said that BYU now officially supports through its archaeology department any kind of research program in the archaeology of the Scriptures. In other words, even though the Department's original assignment in this field has never been explicitly annulled, still no genuine official support is now forthcoming. (Ibid., pp. 7-8)

It would appear, then, that the Mormon Church is in an embarrassing position with regard to archaeology and the Book of Mormon. After the Archaeology Department at Brigham Young University failed to find any real evidence for the Book of Mormon in Mesoamerica, the church leaders gave "large appropriations" to support Thomas Stuart Ferguson's New World Archaeological Foundation. This organization also failed to find evidence to prove the Book of Mormon, and the man who organized it, hoping that it would prove Mormonism, ended up losing his faith in the church. It will be interesting to see if the Mormon Church will continue to support the New World Archaeological Foundation under these circumstances.

Nephite Coins and Chariots

Although the text of the Book of Mormon never uses the word "coin," it does speak of the Nephites having a money system. In Alma 11:4 we read: "Now these are the names of the different pieces of their gold, and of their silver, according to their value." The chapter heading for Alma 11 calls these "pieces" of gold and silver "Nephite coins." It seems logical, therefore, that some of these coins should be found by archaeologists if the story in the Book of Mormon is true. Welby W. Ricks stated:

I have here the Nephite money system, . . . since this was the Nephite money system . . . it will be possible in some future time that some of these may be found, since these were their pieces of gold and silver. . . . It is likely, . . . that they had something stamped on them or written on them. If there were something written on them, it is likely they would have used some of their ancient writing system, hence, possibly, some Hebrew or Egyptian. . . .

It is possible, archaeologically, to find some of these, since they had such a system. It seems reasonable to me that some day they will be found. (Book of Mormon Institute, BYU, December 5, 1959, pp. 54-55)

Dr. James R. Clark, of the Brigham Young University, related the following:

. . . we must realize that for some of these things we must rely on testimony alone. I did have the opportunity of taking the testimony of two persons . . . who brought what was reported to be a Nephite coin to the offices of the First Presidency around the turn of the century. He had served in the Southern States as a missionary. He came back from the Southern States with what he believed to be a Nephite coin. His mission president, Ben E. Rich, had so identified it. . . . He was told also by his mission president to take it to the First Presidency when he returned home. He did so. I took the testimony from him and from his wife, had it recorded and then read it to them and had them sign it. They testify that such a coin was delivered to the Church. I was also told in that interview that they were shown a bag of coins of similar nature, by members of the First Presidency. (Book of Mormon Institute, BYU, December 5, 1959, p. 55)

We feel that if the Mormon leaders really had a bag of Nephite coins they would have made them available so that archaeologists could have examined them to determine their authenticity. The fact that they have not done this throws a shadow of doubt upon the whole story.

Actually, archaeologists claim that the “inhabitants of North and South America did not use coins before the time of Columbus.” (Letter from Carl F. Miller, Smithsonian Institution, dated February 5, 1962)

John L. Sorenson, who was Assistant Professor of Anthropology at Brigham Young University, made this observation concerning Nephite coins:

For example, can we expect to locate Nephite coins as “proof” of their presence? The answer is no. In the first place the Book of Mormon, thank goodness, never mentions coins—only money. (“Coins of the Nephites” occurs only in a chapter heading inserted in the course of publishing the scripture.) . . . No authentic “coin” has ever been found in America under convincing circumstances, and some reported finds can be shown to be either fakes or otherwise unbelievable. (Book of Mormon Institute, BYU, December 5, 1959, p. 26)

The Book of Mormon also claims that the Nephites had “chariots” (3 Nephi 3:22), but so far archaeologists have not found any in the New World. The Mormon writer Paul R. Cheesman stated:

In the New World, many miniature models of wheeled vehicles have been found, but no counterparts in the larger, more practical design have been discovered as yet. The absence of these larger artifacts has caused some archaeologists to think that the practical use of the wheel was not known. Their assumption demands a stone or metallic wheel. However, there may have been large, wooden wheels in use. If there were large, wooden-wheeled vehicles, they probably would have decomposed by now. (Brigham Young University Studies, Winter 1969, p. 188)

In our book Archaeology and the Book of Mormon, page 68, we have some information concerning some gigantic stones which some Mormon writers claim were used as wheels. Jack H. West would have us believe that these stones, which were “nine feet in diameter,” were used on ancient “wagons,” and that these wagons carried up to “300 tons” (600,000 pounds) with “apparent ease.” He also claimed that they traveled great distances and over “rugged mountains” with these wagons.

Dr. Paul R. Cheesman, of Brigham Young University, does not seem to accept the idea of such gigantic wheels for he states:

No large utilitarian wheels have been found to date in pre-Columbian America. However, many wheeled toys have been found; and usually toys are made to resemble the real thing. (The Instructor, November 1968, p. 430)

Anthion Transcript

In the Book of Mormon, Mormon 9:32-33, we read:

And now, behold, we have written this record according to our knowledge, in the characters which are called among us the reformed Egyptian, being handed down and altered by us, according to our manner of speech.

And if our plates had been sufficiently large we should have written in Hebrew; but the Hebrew hath been altered by us also; and if we could have written in Hebrew, behold, ye would have had no imperfection in our record.

The anti-Mormon writer M. T. Lamb makes these observations concerning the idea of Hebrews writing in Egyptian:

The Book of Mormon sets out with four very improbable and really absurd statements.

I. The first is that Lehi and his family used the Egyptian language. . . .

There are a multitude of reasons that make such a statement altogether improbable. In the first place, Lehi had lived all his lifetime, . . . in the city of Jerusalem, surrounded constantly by those who spoke only the Hebrew language. Had he been an Egyptian by birth, and with loving tenderness clung to his native tongue, the above statement would have a very different look. But Lehi was a Hebrew, a pure Hebrew, was born and reared in the city of Jerusalem, with family relationships and social surroundings all Hebraistic. In the second place, the Jews hated the Egyptians with a bitter hatred, and it is therefore inconceivable that a trueborn Jew a real lover of his own people, loyal and patriotic as he professes to have been willing thus to insult his people, or that the Jews around him would have endured the insult. In the third place, the ancient Jew had an unusual veneration for his mother tongue, the sacred Hebrew. . . . the language in which God himself had spoken from Sinai; the language in which all their sacred books had been written . . . the language in which the daily services at the temple were conducted. . . . Now that such a man with such a venerated language could have accepted instead the Egyptian tongue, which was associated only with ignominy and dishonor, [is] the height of absurdity. . . .

2. The second statement is still more objectionable—that there were found in the possession of a man by the name of Laban, a relative of Lehi’s, and also a resident of the city of Jerusalem, certain brass plates upon which were engraven, in the Egyptian language, the five books of Moses, containing the law, the entire history of the Jews from the first down to Laban’s time, including the Psalms, and all the prophets who had written down to the same date, . . . In other words, these brass plates contained all of the Old Testament as we have it, that had been written up to that time, six hundred years before Christ. . . . All this engraven in the Egyptian language . . . This is more improbable and absurd than the first statement. (The Golden Bible, pp. 89-91)

The Mormon writer J. N. Washburn admits that this is a real problem:

The point at issue is not that Father Lehi, the Jew, could read and understand Egyptian, though this is surprising enough . . .

No, the big question is how the scripture of the Jews (official or otherwise) came to be written in Egyptian. It is hardly enough to say that the Jews had a long and intimate association with Egypt. That was long before the days of most Hebrew scriptures. Nor does it help very much to remind ourselves that probably the Egyptian characters require less space than the Hebrew, since we have little knowledge of other Hebrew sacred writings preserved in that language. . . .

If I were to suggest what I think to be the most insistent problem for Book-of-Mormon scholarship, I should unquestionably name this one: account for the Egyptian language on the Plates of Brass, and the Brass Plates themselves! (The Contents, Structure and Authorship of the Book of Mormon, p. 81)

It is interesting to note that Dr. Hugh Nibley feels that “reformed Egyptian” came from the Egyptian script known as demotic, and he states that demotic was “the most awkward, difficult, and impractical system of writing ever devised by man!” (Lehi in the Desert and the World of the Jaredites, Salt Lake City, 1952, p. 16). On page 15 of the same book Dr. Nibley says that “the Persian conquerors of Egypt learned Aramaic instead of Egyptian because the Egyptian script was too clumsy and hard to learn.”

However this may be, Joseph Smith claimed that he made a copy of some of the characters on the gold plates and that Martin Harris showed them to Professor Charles Anthon, in New York. Joseph Smith quoted Martin Harris as saying:

I went to the city of New York, and presented the characters which had been translated, with the translation thereof, to Professor Charles Anthon, a gentleman celebrated for his literary attainments. Professor Anthon stated that the translation was correct, more so than any he had before seen translated from the Egyptian. I then showed him those which were not yet translated, and he said that they were Egyptian, Chaldaic, Assyric, and Arabic; and he said they were true characters. He gave me a certificate, certifying to the people of Palmyra that they were true characters, and that the translation of such of them as had been translated was also correct. I took the certificate and put it into my pocket, and was just leaving the house, when Mr. Anthon called me back, and asked me how the young man found out that there were gold plates in the place where he found them. I answered that an angel of God had revealed it unto him.

He then said to me, “Let me see that certificate.” I accordingly took it out of my pocket and gave it to him, when he took it and tore it to pieces, saying, that there was no such thing now as ministering of angels, and that if I would bring the plates to him, he would translate them. I informed him that part of the plates were sealed, and that I was forbidden to bring them. He replied, “I cannot read a sealed book.” I left him and went to Dr. Mitchell, who sanctioned what Professor Anthon had said respecting both the characters and the translation. (History of the Church, vol. 1, p. 20)

We do not think that Professor Anthon could have made the statement attributed to him in Joseph Smith’s history. Even Mormon writers question the accuracy of some of the statements in this report. Dr. Sidney B. Sperry, of the BYU, states:

In relation to the last point, when Professor Anthon is reported to have said that the characters “were Egyptian, Chaldaic, Assyric, and Arabic,” we can readily believe that he might have said “Egyptian” and “Arabic,” but if he said “Chaldaic” and “Assyric,” what did he mean by those terms? Did he mean “Hebrew” and “cuneiform” or “cuneiform” and “Syriac” characters? Or, if he actually said the two words, was he only attempting in a general way to indicate a conglomerate of characters? The answers are not too important, but they illustrate our point that some minor matters relating to Martin Harris’ interview with Professor Anthon might not have been correctly reported. We must also keep in mind that Martin Harris was no linguist, and in his report to the prophet he might have unwittingly misinterpreted some of Professor Anthon’s statements concerning translation. (The Problems of the Book of Mormon, by Sidney B. Sperry, Salt Lake City, 1964, pp. 55-56)

The most important question concerning Martin Harris’ visit to Charles Anthon, however, is whether Prof. Anthon said that the characters were “true characters” and that “the translation was correct.” In a letter dated February 17, 1834, Professor Anthon claimed that the “whole story” was false:

“The whole story about my pronouncing the Mormon inscription to be reformed Egyptian hieroglyphics is perfectly false. Some years ago, a plain, apparently simple-hearted farmer called on me with a note from Dr. Mitchell, of our city, now dead, requesting me to decipher, if possible, the paper which the farmer would hand me. Upon examining the paper in question, I soon came to the conclusion that it was all a trick—perhaps a hoax. . . . I have frequently conversed with friends on the subject since the Mormon excitement began, and well remember that the paper contained anything else but Egyptian hieroglyphics.” (Letter by Professor Charles Anthon, as quoted in A Comprehensive History of the Church, vol. 1, p. 103)

B. H. Roberts admitted that the “statements of Professor Anthon and Martin Harris are very contradictory,” but he states that Professor Anthon wrote another letter in 1841 which contains a few statements that are not in harmony with the earlier letter (see Comprehensive History of the Church, vol. 1, pp. 100-109). However this may be, in both letters Anthon stated that the characters were not genuine. Some Mormon writers are willing to admit that Anthon could not have claimed that the characters were correctly translated. Dr. Ross T. Christensen, of the B.Y.U., stated:

During this same year, Martin Harris took the “Anthon transcript” to Professor Charles Anthon of Columbia University. (Pearl of Great Price, Joseph Smith 2:63-65.) Professor Anthon, by the answer that he gave to Martin Harris (as told by Harris to Joseph Smith; and I assume that it was correctly told), demonstrated that he was willing to claim knowledge in the field of philology which I do not believe existed on the earth at that time. “. . . The translation was correct, more so than any he had before seen translated from the Egyptian,” he told Harris. (verse 64.) I do not believe he knew what he was talking about; he could not have known whether it was a correct translation. For one thing, Egyptian writing had not yet been deciphered in 1828. For another thing, it was not Egyptian that he was dealing with—that is, not any of the forms of Egyptian now known to scholars. (Book of Mormon Institute, BYU, December 5, 1959, p. 10)

The Mormon scholar Stanley B. Kimball frankly admits that “Whatever they [Anthon and Mitchell] said respecting the correctness of the translations cannot be taken too seriously” (Brigham Young University Studies, Spring 1970, p. 335). Dr. Kimball also made these comments concerning this matter:

It is entirely possible, of course, that they said nothing at all about the translation, but only remarked that the transcription was correct, for in 1828 neither Anthon, Mitchill (nor anyone else in the world for that matter) had seen much translated from the Egyptian. It is not difficult to understand how a man of Harris’ background could have mistaken transcription for translation. Perhaps Harris was so intent on fulfilling a scriptural prophecy that he heard only what he wanted to hear. . . .

In the case of Dr. Mitchill, aside from the above mentioned facts that he was in his youth a student of the classics and had at least a reading ability of several languages, no other possible evidence of a competence in Egyptian studies has come to light. . . . a ten-page bibliography of his writings indicates he never published anything regarding any language. It appears then that Mitchill could have given Harris only a very superficial opinion regarding the transcript. . . . (Ibid., pp. 335-336)

According to Mormon historians “a fragment of the transcript of the Book of Mormon characters” which was submitted to Professor Anthon is still in existence (see A Comprehensive History of the Church, vol. 1, p. 100). On the next page the reader will find a photograph of the Anthon Transcript.

We know of three Egyptologists who have recently examined the Anthon Transcript. One felt that the characters resembled demotic. Another thought they looked like abbreviated hieratic, and the third stated that they were nothing but “doodlings.” It is possible, of course, that Joseph Smith copied the characters from some book containing material about Egypt. It should be remembered over ruined doorways and arches, upon the sides and backs of hideous looking idols carved in stone, upon marble slabs, on the sides of immense pillars, here and there through the ruins of magnificent palaces and monster heathen temples. . . .

We present the reader some very good specimens of these hieroglyphics copied from actual photographs.

Tablet of the Cross

Hieroglyphics on the Copan Statue

These same hieroglyphics have been preserved in other forms—for the ancient Mayas had books, real books, a large number of which were found in Central America upon its occupation by the Spaniards 300 years ago—but ruthlessly destroyed by the superstitious Catholic priests. An examination of the three that are now known to be preserved, shows the same characters that are found upon the stone tablets, idols, etc., as seen in the cuts—and represent the actual written language of the ancient Mayas—a people who are known to have occupied Central America, and been the sole occupants of a portion of that country at the very time, and covering the whole period, when, according to the Book of Mormon, the Nephites lived and flourished there.

We ask the candid reader carefully to examine these characters, and then look back again to page 261. [See page 106 of this book] Those are the characters Joseph Smith tells us were universally used in Central America 1,500 and 2,000 years ago—while the ruins, the engraved stones, the chiselled marble, tell us that these were the characters actually used in that locality, and at that time. Look at the two attentively—see if you can discover any likeness whatever between them. A woeful fatality, is it not? that there should not happen to be even one of Mr. Smith's characters that bears a family likeness, or the least particle of resemblance to the characters actually used by the ancient inhabitants of Central America!

. . . the Book of Mormon tells us of a civilization extending generally over both continents. In fact, of a period covering nearly 200 years, when the entire population of both continents were converted and actually enrolled as members of the churches everywhere organized. During all this happy time the arts of war were forgotten and the highest possible christian civilization was enjoyed. During all this period the people were not only rapidly increasing in numbers, but also in wealth, in the general prevalence of education. . . .

We should, therefore, certainly expect to find, in every portion of both continents, the same evidences of an ancient civilization as are found in Central America. We ought to find not only the remains of great cities, filled with the ruins of magnificent temples and palaces all through these “valleys of the mountains,” through the various states and territories and all over South America as well—but especially among these ruined temples and over the doorways of palatial residences we should find, in thousands of places, these reformed Egyptian characters engraved upon marble blocks and granite pillars, brass plates by the thousand, inscribed tablets of gold and silver, remnants of old parchment leaves with passages of scripture, histories of wars, lives of sages and philosophers, textbooks for schools, poetic effusions from many a Homer and Virgil, eloquent sermons, and prophecies by the cart load, scattered here and there amid the rubbish of ten thousand deserted and ruined cities all over both these broad continents.

But need we say that just the contrary of all this is found to be true. . . . It would therefore be sheer nonsense to imagine that the assertions of the Book of Mormon may after all have been true, but that through the lapse of time all traces of such a written language may have disappeared. Stone and marble, and gold and silver, and copper and brass are not liable to disappear in the brief period of 1500 years. (The Golden Bible, by M. T. Lamb, pp. 259-272)

In 1959 the Mormon archaeologist Ross T. Christensen frankly admitted that Joseph Smith's “reformed Egyptian” had not been found:

It was “reformed” Egyptian (cf. Mormon 9:32.), a form of writing which we have not yet identified in the archaeological material available to us. (Book of Mormon Institute, December 5, 1959, BYU, 1964 ed., p. 10)

Dr. John L. Sorenson, who was Assistant Professor of Anthropology at BYU, made this statement:

I do not believe that any neutral-but-interested jury would be convinced today by any evidence that is at hand that Zarahemla has been found, that any Egyptian writing has been found in the New World, that any Semitic language has been found in the New World, or any other of these specific kinds of proof. I do not believe that we have sufficiently convincing evidence—that is, convincing to those who do not already want to believe—of this nature. (Book of Mormon Institute, December 5, 1959, pp. 26-27)

As we have already shown, a set of gold plates inscribed with “mixed Anthon Transcript and Maya-like characters” was reported to have been found a few years ago. Archaeologists at the Brigham Young University, however, denounced these plates as forgeries:

Dr. Jakeman, as well as Dr. Ross T. Christensen also of the archaeology department, feel that these plates are not of ancient origin, because of the mixing, in the inscriptions, of symbols from at least two different writing systems widely separated in time. . . .

But even stronger indication that the plates are not of ancient origin or authentic, is the near-certainty that the Aztec symbols were copied from one of the two surviving Aztec hieroglyphic manuscripts. . . .

From a preliminary investigation, then, it would appear that these gold plates from Mexico are forgeries, and that a serious fraud has been committed. . . . (University Archaeological Society Newsletter, BYU, January 17, 1962, p. 4)

For more information on this matter see our Case Against Mormonism, vol. 2, pp. 37-38.

According to the Mormons, many books and records were kept by the Nephites:

And now there are many records kept of the proceedings of this people, by many of this people, which are particular and very large, concerning them. . . . there are many books and many records of every kind; and they have been kept chiefly by the Nephites. (Book of Mormon, Helaman 3:13, 15)

The Book of Mormon also states that the Nephites wrote in Hebrew as well as in “reformed Egyptian” (Mormon 9:33). Therefore, we should expect to find a great deal of Hebrew as well as Egyptian writing in the New World. The statement issued by the Smithsonian Institution, however, contains this comment concerning Egyptian and Hebrew writing in the New World:

5. We know of no authentic cases of ancient Egyptian or Hebrew writing having been found in the New World. Reports of findings of Egyptian influence in the Mexican and Central American areas have been published in newspapers and magazines from time to time, but thus far no reputable Egyptologist has been able to discover any relationship between Mexican remains and those in Egypt.

John A. Wilson, Professor of Egyptology at the University of Chicago, made this statement in a letter to Marvin Cowan:

From time to time there are allegations that picture writing has been found in America. For example, carved on the sides of rock canyons. In no case has a professional Egyptologist been able to recognize these characters as Egyptian hieroglyphs. From our standpoint there is no such language as “reformed Egyptian.” (Letter from John A. Wilson, dated March 16, 1966)

Richard A. Parker, Dept. of Egyptology at Brown University, made this statement: “No Egyptian writing has been found in this hemisphere to my knowledge” (Letter from Richard A. Parker to Marvin Cowan, dated March 22, 1966). In the same letter Richard A. Parker stated: “I do not know of any language such as Reformed Egyptian.”

Frank H. H. Roberts, of the Smithsonian Institution, made this statement in a letter dated Oct. 10, 1958:

To the best of my knowledge no authentic Hebrew or Egyptian writings have ever been found in the New World. A number of years ago the existence of an extensive Hebrew inscription was reported from New Mexico. It had been cut in the face of a cliff. Careful examination by linguists familiar with Hebrew writings indicated that the inscription was not genuine and probably was quite recent in age. I knew the late Dr. Breasted of the Oriental Institute of the University of Chicago very well and on several occasions heard him specifically state that he had never seen anything Egyptian in the New World. He was a recognized authority on Egypt and an outstanding scholar in Egyptian hieroglyphics. I was at the Maya city of Chichen Itza in Yucatan in 1932 when Dr. Breasted spent two weeks studying the ruins and inscriptions at that location as well as at several other cities in the area, and at the end of the period he was very emphatic about the total lack of evidence for any Egyptian influence. (Letter from Frank H. H. Roberts, as quoted in True Archeological Data Versus Book of Mormon, Utah Christian Tract Society, Calif., pp. 6, 7)

Bat Creek Stone

On October 19, 1970, the Salt Lake Tribune published the following:

NEW YORK—A Brandeis University professor said Sunday evidence has been discovered that Jews fleeing Romans in the Middle East came west and discovered America 1,000 years before Columbus.

Cyrus H. Gordon, professor of Mediterranean Studies at Brandeis, said the evidence is an inscription found in a burial mound in Tennessee in 1885.

The inscriptions [sic], he said, was found on a stone under one of nine skeletons in the mound, but when the inscription was photographed and published by the Smithsonian Institution in 1894, it was printed upside down and its significance went unnoticed. The stone is at the Smithsonian Museum in Washington. . . .

Upon studying the inscription, Gordon said, he discovered that its five letters are in the writing style of Canaan, the “promised land” of the Israelites somewhere between the Jordan River and the Mediterranean.

The fifth letter of the inscription, Gordon said, corresponds to the style of writing found on Hebrew coins of the Roman period. He translates the inscription to read “or the land of Judah.”

“The archeological circumstances of the discovery,” Gordon said, “rule out any chance of fraud or forgery and the inscription attests to a migration of Jews . . . probably to escape the long hand of Rome after the disastrous Jewish defeats in 70 and 135 A.D.” . . .

Gordon said the inscription was found in a burial mound at Bat Creek, Tenn., in 1885 by Cyrus Thomas, who worked with the Smithsonian.

“Various pieces of evidence point in the direction of migrations from the Mediterranean in Roman times,” Gordon said. “The cornerstone of the historic reconstruction is at present the Bat Creek inscription because it was found in an unimpeachable archeological context under the direction of professional archeologists working for the prestigious Smithsonian Institution.” (Salt Lake Tribune, October 19, 1970)

Since Dr. Gordon claimed that Hebrew characters were inscribed on this stone, we felt that we should do some research with regard to its authenticity. In a letter dated Oct. 18, 1970, Dr. Gordon stated:

Cyrus Thomas published the inscription upside down and presumed it to be Cherokee, although the writing bears no resemblance to the Cherokee syllabary. It remained for Dr. Mahan to turn the published photograph of the inscription upside down and see that the characters were in the ancient script of Canaan.

We submitted a photograph of this stone to a noted Semitist. He claimed that there is “no stage of script in Hebrew or Aramaic to which these letters can belong as far as they are preserved.” Unfortunately, we feel that this answer was dictated more by a prejudice against Dr. Gordon’s work than by a careful examination of the stone in question. Our research seems to show that the characters are Semitic. In our work Archaeology and the Book of Mormon, pages 84-91, we devote a great deal of space to this stone and the translation of the characters. We demonstrate that the inscription is written in ancient “Canaanite” characters, but we stated that this “does not necessarily mean that the inscription is genuine or that the stone was inscribed in ancient times.”

Cyrus Gordon’s suggestion that the inscription resembles characters on Jewish coins is very tempting, but we must also consider the fact that similar characters were used by other people such as the Phoenicians and Moabites.

It is interesting to note that Joseph Corey Ayoob knew of this stone long before Dr. Gordon made it famous. He feels that it is a Phoenician inscription and translates it as follows: “The Voice of Death” (Ancient Inscriptions in the New World, vol. 1, p. 14, 1964, Aliquippa, Pa.).

Because of the many forgeries committed in the past, scholars are very cautious with regard to the Bat Creek inscription. Newsweek Magazine, October 26, 1970, page 65, stated that Gordon’s endorsement of the inscription did not “immediately overcome the skepticism of many prominent archeologists, for there have been too many similar stones and artifacts uncovered and later proved to be fraudulent not to make other scientists suspicious.”

We consulted Frank Moore Cross, Jr., of the Department of Near Eastern Languages and Literatures at Harvard University. His brief reply seems to indicate that he considers the inscription a forgery, although he is willing to admit that it is an imitation of Canaanite script: "I have examined this. Add it to the list of pseudo-Canaanite."

Joseph A. Fitzmyer, of the Department of Near Eastern Languages and Civilizations at the University of Chicago, said that the characters on the Bat Creek Stone looked like "very ancient Hebrew forms," but he was "very skeptical about the genuinity of the inscription" (see Archaeology and the Book of Mormon, p. 86).

In Appendix 2 to our book Archaeology and the Book of Mormon, we wrote the following concerning the Bat Creek Stone:

Now, even if we were to assume that the Bat Creek Stone is authentic, it does not necessarily prove that the person who owned it was a Jew or that there was a migration of Jews to America in ancient times. In this regard it is interesting to note that Joseph Smith owned some genuine Egyptian papyri, and it has been suggested that he may have given some fragments of this papyri to the Indians. Jay M. Todd, a Mormon writer, states:

During the Indians' stay, . . . the Prophet may have given them either pages from the Times and Seasons, which featured Book of Abraham facsimiles, or perhaps some actual papyrus fragments or both. . . . the Prophet may have wished to give the Indians a personal token, something of value or of antiquity to demonstrate his affection and bond with them. (The Saga of the Book of Abraham, p. 280)

Now, if some of the papyrus was discovered in a grave with an Indian, a person might assume that the Indian was really an Egyptian. Such a conclusion, however, would be entirely incorrect.

From his article in Argosy, it appears that Dr. Gordon is not certain whether the Bat Creek Stone originally came from America or from the Old World: "Then the geologists will tell us the geographical spread of the actual stone on which the inscription was carved. I would like to know whether it was made here or in the old country." (Argosy, January 1971, p. 27) If the stone was inscribed in the Old World it could have been brought here and obtained by the Indians after the time of Columbus, or the Indians could have found it in some ancient shipwreck. A great deal depends on when the stone was actually deposited in the mound. The archaeologist Cyrus Thomas felt that the burial was made sometime after 1821, but Dr. Gordon maintains that "the tomb could not have been of a recent time. (How long does it take for a tree's roots to penetrate five feet and grow thick enough to create an obstacle?) I would say that Thomas's interpretation of the text came about simply because he was brainwashed by the theories of the day, . . . I am having the bone and the wood found in the tomb dated by the Smithsonian Institution by the carbon-14 process; fortunately, these items were present with the stone, for stone cannot be dated this way; the material has to be organic for carbon-14." (Argosy, January 1971, p. 27) We have written to Smithsonian Institution for the results of the carbon-14 tests; but, unfortunately, they have decided not to make these tests. Nevertheless, they indicate they are doing some research with regard to the artifacts. In a letter dated January 15, 1971, George E. Phebus, Supervisor, Processing Lab., Department of Anthropology, made these comments:

Current research on the "Bat Creek Stone" is continuing. To date, the brass bracelets have been analyzed and the results are not favorable to Dr. Gordon's interpretation. The statement in Argosy that certain associated artifacts will be C-14 dated is in error. To do so it would require the complete destruction of these specimens and that is not desirable. Besides, a C-14 date would relate only to the burial and not necessarily date the stone. (Letter from George E. Phebus, Smithsonian Institution, dated January 15, 1971)

(Archaeology and the Book of Mormon, p. 90)

Since writing the above, the Smithsonian Institution has issued a statement which seems to invalidate Cyrus Gordon's work with regard to the Bat Creek Stone. This statement shows that the burial was not made until sometime in the 18th or 19th century:

THE BAT CREEK STONE

The Bat Creek Stone was excavated in 1885 from the Bat Creek burial mound in Loudon County, Tennessee. . . . The specimen and associated material continue to be analyzed and two definite opinions now exist regarding the inscriptions. One, that they are not Cherokee and the other that they are not genuine Semitic writing, although some characters appear as if someone were copying a few Hebraic letters from the alphabet.

Recent tests by our Conservation Laboratory on the brass bracelets found in the same grave definitely established that they are 18-19th century trade goods and not [do?] not have the chemical composition of brass of the Roman or early Semitic periods. (Statement by the Smithsonian Institution, mailed November 24, 1971)

The fact that the bracelets "are 18-19th century trade goods" proves that the burial could not have been made prior to that time. Dr. Gordon has already admitted that the brass bracelets were found with the same skeleton with which the inscribed stone was found:

. . . he was the one who carried the message chiseled into the little stone under his head when he was buried here. He also had a number of objects, including two brass bracelets, . . . (Argosy, January, 1971, p. 24)

Thus even if the inscription were authentic, there is no evidence to show that it was brought to America before the time of Columbus.

In support of his ideas Dr. Gordon appeals to the fact that Roman and Hebrew coins have been found in America:

In the 1820's, John Haywood, . . . gathered material for his book . . . Haywood describes Roman coins found in Tennessee and the adjacent states. Moreover, on 17 April 1967, the New York Yiddish newspaper The Day-Jewish Journal ran an article on Hebrew coins of the Bar Kokhba Rebellion (the second Jewish rebellion in 132-135 A.D.) found by farmers around Louisville, Hopkinsville and Clay City, Kentucky.

We do not feel that the presence of Hebrew coins in America provides a great deal of evidence that the Jews were in America in ancient times. Those who have read our book Archaeology and the Book of Mormon, will remember that Josiah Priest reported that an Indian found "a Roman coin" in Missouri and that "a Persian coin" was discovered "near a spring on the Ohio, some feet under ground; . . ." (American Antiquities, p. 52). Since people save ancient coins, they could have come to America in recent times. The Jewish coins were, of course, struck in the Old World by the Jews, but when the Romans destroyed Jerusalem the "soldiers ran through the streets plundering, burning and killing" (The Coins of the Jewish War of 66-73 C.E., p. 38). On page 80 of the same book we find the following: "What was left of the Shekels and the other money fell into the hands of the Roman soldiers. . . . the Shekels were melted down or hacked into pieces to be sold to the traders by weight. . . . On the other hand, the Roman soldiers were not interested at all in the bronze Prutot, which were entirely worthless to them. So they left them on the spot or took a few as souvenirs to their future garrisons." On page 43 of the same book, we find this statement: "Specimens of Shekels were also brought from Palestine by Christian pilgrims of the Middle Ages and given to the treasuries of churches and monasteries; . . ." Thus we see that ancient Hebrew coins might be found in almost any part of the world.

Dr. Gordon had to admit that "Neither the Latin nor the Hebrew coins from our Southeast made any impression on archaeologists or historians, partly because the coins were not excavated by professionals" (Before Columbus, New York, 1971, p. 179). The reader will remember that the Mormon archaeologist John L. Sorenson made this statement in 1959: "No authentic 'coin' has ever been found in America under convincing circumstances, and some reported finds can be shown to be either fakes or otherwise unbelievable."

At any rate, Dr. Gordon's conclusions with regard to the Bat Creek inscription and Hebrew coins found in America cannot be used to support the claims of the Book of Mormon. The Book of Mormon states that the Nephites and Mulekites came over to America about 600 B.C., and it never mentions anyone coming from Jerusalem after that time. Dr. Gordon, however, would have us believe that the Bat Creek inscription is related to script found on Jewish coins dated “between 70 A.D. and 135 A.D.” He also states that “coins of the Bar Kokhba Rebellion, 132-135 A.D., have been found” in America. Now, since these coins were originally made in Palestine during the Bar Kokhba Rebellion, this would plainly show that they could not have been brought to the New World prior to 132-135 A.D. Therefore, if a person accepts Gordon’s ideas concerning the coins, he is forced to the conclusion that the “Near Eastern visitors in Tennessee” were not Nephites.

If the Mormons were to accept Cyrus Gordon’s claim that there were “Near Eastern visitors in Tennessee almost 2,000 years ago,” it could actually weaken their case for the Nephites. For instance, if there is any relationship between the language or customs of the Hebrews and the Indians (as the Mormons claim), Dr. Gordon’s theory could explain this, and there would be no need for the Nephites. The Mormons claim that a “White and Bearded God”—i.e., Quetzalcoatl—appeared to the Nephites, and that this was in reality “the appearance of the resurrected Lord to the Ancient Americans” (Christ in Ancient America, p. 48). If Gordon’s theories were to be accepted, however, Quetzalcoatl might be nothing more than a Jew who fled from the Romans after the death of Christ.

The Book of Mormon states that “there shall none come into this land save they shall be brought by the hand of the Lord” (2 Nephi 1:6). Dr. Gordon, however, feels that there were many visitors:

It isn’t only the Phoenicians, or Canaanites, or Minoans, or Greeks, or Romans—there have been many, many people who have been visiting America since the earliest times. In fact, our earliest visitors apparently were the Japanese from the Island of Kyushu. Pottery of a very early type has been discovered on the coast of Ecuador, associated with a carbon-14 date of about 3,000 B.C. (Argosy, January 1971, p. 27)

Cyrus Gordon feels that the “Near Eastern visitors in Tennessee” were only a “small, but I think an influential, minority, . . .” (Ibid., p. 26). He states that the Bat Creek inscription is the “cornerstone” of his theory, because “it was found in an unimpeachable archaeological context under the direction of professional archaeologists working for the prestigious Smithsonian Institution” (Letter dated October 18, 1970). He admits, however, that “Dr. Mahan ransacked the scientific literature from beginning to end in order to find such an inscription” (Argosy, January 1971, p. 27).

Now, if the Book of Mormon were a true history we would expect to find hundreds, if not thousands, of inscriptions written in Hebrew or reformed Egyptian. Dr. Gordon stated that the Bat Creek Stone was the only such inscription found in an “unimpeachable archaeological context.” It would appear now, however, that even this inscription is of no real value as evidence since it was not buried until the 18th or 19th century.

From statements published in the Deseret News it would appear that Dr. Gordon is trying to gain favor with Mormon scholars:

In archaeology, if two points of mutual interest tie in from different parts of the world, then that’s a fact establishing the relationship of the two areas or periods.

That’s what Dr. Cyrus H. Gordon, . . . told the 20th annual symposium on the Archaeology of the Scriptures at Brigham Young University Oct. 10.

Dr. Gordon was emphasizing that if it takes only one point of contact to make a fact, then the Book of Mormon has a thousand points in its favor.

“I am speaking academically and am not qualified to speak on the Book of Mormon itself. If I were to do that I would study it for three years before commenting. But there are many points in archaeology in its favor,” he said. (Deseret News, Church Section, October 17, 1970)

This is certainly a strange statement to be coming from a non-Mormon scholar. We feel that if Dr. Gordon really believed that the Book of Mormon might be true he would immediately begin a serious study of it. If the Book of Mormon were true, it would be the very key to understanding the ancient ruins in the New World—the very ruins Dr. Gordon is so interested in.

Although Dr. Gordon is a well known scholar, some scholars feel that he has become overzealous in his attempt to establish contacts between the Old and New World. We wrote to William F. Albright, who was one of the world’s most noted archaeologists, concerning the Bat Creek Stone. In his reply he stated:

Cyrus Gordon has been involved in several such discoveries and attempted rehabilitation of well-known old forgeries. . . .

The Paraibo find on which Cyrus Gordon gained so much publicity has been shown by Johannes Friedrich of West Berlin and Frank Cross of Harvard, writing in the scholarly review Orientalia (Rome, 1968), to be an unqualified forgery from the time of Dom Pedro, Emperor of Brazil, when Oriental studies gained a brief popularity in Brazil, owing to the Emperor’s great interest in them. (Letter from William F. Albright to Jerald Tanner, dated December 7, 1970)

The Paraiba text, mentioned by Dr. Albright is a purported inscription telling that the Phoenicians came to America about 500 years before the time of Christ. In Appendix 2 of our book Archaeology and the Book of Mormon, pages 80-83, we give evidence which indicates that this text is a forgery, and that Dr. Gordon made a mistake when he endorsed it.

Fraudulent Inscriptions

Some Mormon archaeologists seem to be using caution with regard to purported discoveries. Welby W. Ricks, who was President of the University Archaeological Society at BYU, related the following:

Many requests have come to me from time to time for information about a certain inscription on stone found near Los Lunas, New Mexico, which contains extracts from the Ten Commandments in a Phoenician script, which type of writing was in existence in Palestine during Lehi’s day around 600 B.C. To find such a script on stone in the New World is indeed interesting, but upon translation for it to contain the Ten Commandments seems almost incredible.

To Latter-day Saints such a discovery would appear to agree with the Book of Mormon. But to accept such evidence at face value, i.e., without investigation, could be embarrassing to this Society as well as to the Latter-day Saint Church, especially if it were later shown to be fraudulent. Because of the position of the Church, we must exercise every caution, even greater-than-objective scholarship, if possible, to make sure any purported Hebrew (or Phoenician) writing found in the New World is genuine. . . .

It was in October, 1953, that a group of us—Dr. Milton R. Hunter, Dr. Sidney B. Sperry, Dr. Hugh Nibley, Mr. (now Dr.) John L. Sorenson and myself—got together and made a trip to New Mexico to investigate the inscription. (Fifteenth Annual Symposium on the Archaeology of the Scriptures, BYU, 1964, p. 94)

Welby W. Ricks goes on to tell of their investigation of the purported inscription (see Archaeology and the Book of Mormon, pp. 19-20), and concludes by stating:

To conclude, I should like to list the evidences which make me believe the inscription is fraudulent:

(1) The characters in the stone were too fresh. They did not have any patination. If they had been of ancient date there would have been some patination, and certainly there would have been some in those inscriptions on top of the mesa. One might argue that the Ten Commandments stone could have been covered up for centuries by sand, but the Phoenician inscriptions on top must surely be related to the one below. They also were without patination.

(2) The finding of the words, “Eva and Hobie, 3-13-30,” nearby, cut in the same size, depth, and freshness, is sufficient to create suspicion as to the origin of the Phoenician inscription.

(3) The finding of the dust of freshly cut stone still in the grooving suggests very recent origin.

(4) The making by the McCartys of an inscription in Phoenician characters on each of two stones to test for patination seems strange, indeed.

(5) The obvious lying about finding another inscription, “Temple of Toni”; the finding of the entrance at one time and not another; the finding of gold in the temple and not taking any out to prove it; and, above all, not being able to find it again—all this is fantastic beyond human limits of comprehension.

(6) The admission by Bill McCart that they were doing this to get money to sponsor a search for treasure in the malpais (lava remains) area, where there was supposedly the possibility of finding Spanish gold.

For these reasons and others I am fully convinced that the Ten Commandments stone found near Los Lunas, New Mexico, is a fraud. Its age does not go back into ancient times. It is probably from thirty to fifty years old, perhaps even dating to as late as March 13, 1930. (Fifteenth Annual Symposium on the Archaeology of the Scriptures, pp. 99-100)

Denis Brogan gives this interesting information concerning some “records” which were reported to have been found in Arizona:

My favourite story of the mythology of American discovery was the discovery in 1927 in Arizona, . . . of the records of a Roman-Jewish colony near Tucson. The colonists were Jews who had fled from Jerusalem in AD 70, and had, for some obscure reason, kept their records in the language of their conquerors. Arizona tourist agencies and chambers of commerce welcomed this discovery. After a couple of months, someone wrote in to the New York World, pointing out that all the Latin quotations in the inscriptions came from the pink section of Le Petit Larousse. (Antiquity, Cambridge, England, March 1968, pp. 17-18)

For more information on this matter see our book Archaeology and the Book of Mormon, pp. 20-21).

The Mormon archaeologist Ross T. Christensen claims that the “amount of evidence which points in the direction of authentication” of the Book of Mormon is “impressive,” but he seems to be puzzled by the lack of evidence for “reformed Egyptian” and Hebrew writing:

. . . the spirit of caution is urged, for the reason that there are a number of points where correspondence [between the Book of Mormon and the Old World] should have been found but to this date has not been. There seems to be no fully adequate explanation for the lack of such traits in the New World, required by the Book of Mormon, as Old World plants, smelted iron, and Near Eastern forms of writing. (Progress in Archaeology, BYU, 1963, p. 147)

Welby W. Ricks tries to explain away the absence of Hebrew writing in the following manner:

The Book of Mormon informs us that one of its peoples (the Nephites) had a knowledge of Hebrew script, which by the close of the Record had been somewhat modified. It naturally follows that evidence of Hebrew-like writing should be found in ancient America.

It has been well over a hundred years since the Book of Mormon was published, yet rather few finds of supposed Hebrew writings have been reported. This may be due, in part, to the hatred of the Lamanites for the Nephites. The Lamanites may have confiscated and destroyed many valuable Nephite records. Or, perhaps only the priests and a small educated class kept records. (Progress in Archaeology, p. 210)

We do not feel that this is an adequate explanation for the lack of either Hebrew or reformed Egyptian, and we must agree with M. T. Lamb when he states:

We have found that the entire ancient history of this western world is flatly against the claims of the Book of Mormon. Mr. Smith has preserved a specimen of the characters found by him, as he professes, in the hill Cumorah, and which he would have us believe were the ancient characters in common use upon this continent 1500 years ago—but a large number of the real characters in use in Central America at that time have fortunately been preserved in imperishable marble, proving Mr. Smith’s characters a fraud. (The Golden Bible, p. 319)

While there is no archaeological evidence to support the idea that Nephites lived here, this does not completely close the door between the Old and New World. It is possible that some ships may have arrived in the New World before Columbus. Ross T. Christensen claims that there is a current in the Atlantic Ocean which might cause a ship to drift “from the Old World across the Atlantic to the West Indies.” Thor Heyerdahl recently drifted to the New World with a papyrus raft which was named after the Egyptian god Ra.

William F. Albright, a noted archaeologist, made this statement in a letter dated January 4, 1971:

Now, I would not for a moment doubt that there were involuntary visitors to the New World long before Columbus. I am perfectly willing to accept the certain movements across the Behring Strait and the Aleutian Islands and the recently demonstrated probability of derivation of a unique Ecuadorian pottery type from Japan very early. It is very likely that there were other visitors to Middle and South America from Pacific islands and highly probable that there were visitors from Europe and North Africa at many different periods. In such matters, one swallow does not make a summer, and there is certainly no evidence for any wholesale migration. (Letter from William F. Albright, dated January 4, 1971)

The Mormon scholar Carl Hugh Jones states that the Japanese pottery may create a “new problem” for Mormon archaeologists:

. . . there is ample evidence to support the statement that there was contact between Japan and Ecuador about 3000 BC. . . . If the professional archaeologist is now willing to let a boatload of Japanese reach the New World around the time of the rise of the ancient American civilizations, he may also be willing to accept boatloads of Mesopotamians and Israelites.

However, if the Jomon and the Book of Mormon peoples survived a voyage to the New World, so possibly did others. So now there is a new problem to contend with: we must identify and separate the landings made by Book of Mormon peoples from those of others. We can no longer state that any sudden appearance of traits of advanced culture, such as pottery, can be attributed entirely to the arrival of the Jaredites or Lehites. Thus the picture of the New World origins long held by Latter-day Saint students of archaeology—i.e., that the early hunters and gatherers came from Siberia by way of Bering Strait but the ancient civilizations developed entirely from the Book of Mormon colonies that came from the Near East in transoceanic migrations—must now be modified. We must now accept the probability that there were other transoceanic voyagers to the New World bringing with them ideas and artifacts from other advanced cultures of the Old World. . . .

To a Latter-day Saint, the Valdivia-Jomon transpacific-contact theory makes the problem of the origin of the ancient civilizations of the Americas more complex, but at the same time offers a validity test which can be used to confirm Book of Mormon connections, once they become apparent. (Newsletter and Proceedings of the S.E.H.A., BYU, September 8, 1969, pp. 5-6)

Kinderhook Plates

On May 1, 1843, the Mormon publication Times and Seasons reprinted the following from the Quincy Whig:

It appeared that a young man by the name of Wiley, a resident in Kinderhook, dreamed three nights in succession, that in a certain mound in the vicinity, there was treasures concealed . . . he came to the conclusion, to satisfy his mind by digging into the mound. . . . a company of ten or twelve repaired to the mound, . . . After penetrating the mound about 11 feet, they came to a bed of limestone, that had apparently been subjected to the action of fire, they removed the stone, which were small and easy to handle, to the depth of two feet more, when they found six brass plates, secured and fastened together by two iron wires, but which were so decayed, that they readily crumbled to dust upon being handled. The plates were so completely covered with rust as almost to obliterate the characters inscribed upon them; but after undergoing a chemical process, the inscriptions were brought out plain and distinct.

By whom these plates were deposited there must ever remain a secret, unless some one skilled in deciphering hieroglyphics, may be found to unravel the mystery. Some pretend to say, that Smith the Mormon leader, has the ability to read them. If he has, he will confer a great favor on the public by removing the mystery which hangs over them. We learn there was a Mormon present when the plates were found, who it is said, leaped for joy at the discovery, and remarked that it would go to prove the authenticity of the Book of Mormon—which it undoubtedly will. . . .

The plates above alluded to, were exhibited in this city last week, and are now, we understand, in Nauvoo, subject to the inspection of the Mormon Prophet. The public curiosity is greatly excited, and if Smith can decipher the hieroglyphics on the plates, he will do more towards throwing light on the early history of this continent, than any man now living. (Times and Seasons, vol. 4, pp. 186-187)

At the top of the next column is a photograph of drawings which the Mormons made of the Kinderhook plates. We are showing only one side of each plate (see History of the Church, vol. 5, pp. 374-376).

In a letter written from Nauvoo, dated May 2, 1843, Charlotte Haven stated:

. . . Mr. Joshua Moore, . . . brought with him half a dozen thin pieces of brass, . . . in the form of a bell . . . They were recently found, he said, in a mound . . . When he showed them to Joseph, the latter said that the figures or writing on them was similar to that in which the Book of Mormon was written, and if Mr. Moore could leave them, he thought that by the help of revelation he would be able to translate them. So a sequel to that holy book may soon be expected. (Overland Monthly, December 1890, p. 630)

If Joseph Smith had not been murdered in June of 1844 it is very possible that he might have published a “translation” of the Kinderhook plates. On May 22, 1844, just a month before his death, the Warsaw Signal published the following statement:

Jo. had a facsimile taken, and engraved on wood, and it now appears from the statement of a writer in the St. Louis Gazette, that he is busy in translating them. The new work which Jo. is about to issue as a translation of these plates will be nothing more nor less than a sequel to the Book of Mormon; . . .

It is certainly possible that the Church Historian’s office has Joseph Smith’s unpublished work on the Kinderhook plates.

According to the History of the Church, Joseph Smith did accept these plates as authentic and even claimed that he had translated a portion of them:

Monday, May, 1.—. . . I insert fac-similes of the six brass plates found near Kinderhook, . . .

I have translated a portion of them, and find they contain the history of the person with whom they were found. He was a descendant of Ham, through the loins of Pharaoh, king of Egypt, and that he received his kingdom from the Ruler of heaven and earth. (History of the Church, vol. 5, p. 372)

On January 15, 1844, this statement appeared in the Mormon publication Times and Seasons:

Why does the circumstance of the plates recently found in a mound in Pike county, Ill., by Mr. Wiley, together with ethnology and a thousand other things, go to prove the Book of Mormon true?—Ans. Because it is true! (Times and Seasons, vol. 5, p. 406)

A number of the citizens of Kinderhook certified that the plates were taken from the mound by R. Wiley:

We the citizens of Kinderhook, . . . certify and declare that . . . while excavating a large mound, in this vicinity, Mr. R. Wiley took from said mound, six brass plates of a bell shape, covered with ancient characters. Said plates were very much oxidated—the bands and rings on said plates mouldered into dust on a slight pressure. The above described plates we have handed to Mr. Sharp for the purpose of taking them to Nauvoo.

G.W.F. WARD,	W. LONGNECKER,
FAYETTE GRUBB,	IRA S. CURTIS,
GEO. DECKENSON,	W. FUGATE.

(Times and Seasons, vol. 4, p. 186)

Unfortunately for the Mormon position, it was later discovered that the plates were forgeries, made for the purpose of tricking Joseph Smith. W. Fugate, one of those who signed the certificate, wrote the following in a letter to James T. Cobb:

Mound Station, Ill.
June 30, 1879

Mr. Cobb:

I received your letter in regard to those plates, and will say in answer that they are a humbug, gotten up by Robert Wiley, Bridge Whitton and myself. . . . None of the nine persons who signed the certificate knew the secret, except Wiley and I.

We read in Pratt’s prophecy that “Truth is yet to spring out of the earth.” We concluded to prove the prophecy by way of a joke. We soon made our plans and executed them. Bridge Whitton cut them out of some pieces of copper; Wiley and I made the hieroglyphics by making impressions on beeswax and filling them with acid and putting it on the plates. When they were finished we put them together with rust made of nitric acid, old iron and lead, and bound them with a piece of hoop iron, covering them completely with the rust.

Our plans worked admirably. A certain Sunday was appointed for the digging. The night before, Wiley went to the Mound where he had previously dug to the depth of about eight feet, there being a flat rock that sounded hollow beneath, and put them under it. On the following morning quite a number of citizens were there to assist in the search, there being two Mormon elders present (Marsh and Sharp). The rock was soon removed but some time elapsed before the plates were discovered. I finally picked them up and exclaimed, "A piece of pot metal!" Fayette Grubb snatched them from me and struck them against the rock and they fell to pieces. Dr. Harris examined them and said they had hieroglyphics on them. He took acid and removed the rust and they were soon out on exhibition. . . . Sharp, the Mormon Elder, leaped and shouted for joy and said, Satan had appeared to him and told him not to go (to the diggings), it was a hoax of Fugate and Wiley's, but at a later hour the Lord appeared and told him to go, the treasure was there. . . . a man assuming the name of Savage, . . . took them to Joe Smith. The same identical plates were returned to Wiley, who gave them to Professor McDowell, of St. Louis, for his Museum.

W. Fugate

(The Kinderhook Plates, by Welby W. Ricks, reprinted from the Improvement Era, September 1962)

At the time of the Civil War the Kinderhook plates were lost. M. Wilford Poulson, a former teacher at the BYU and a student of Mormon history, told us that he found one of the original Kinderhook plates in the Chicago Historical Society Museum, but it was mislabeled as one of the original gold plates of the Book of Mormon. The plate which he found has been identified as number 5 in the facsimiles found in the History of the Church. Except for an acid blotch on one side, the plate is in excellent condition. Mr. Poulson did a great deal of research concerning the Kinderhook plates and was convinced that they were made in the 1840's as W. Fugate claimed.

Welby W. Ricks, who was President of the BYU Archaeological Society, had another opinion concerning these plates. In September, 1962, he announced:

A recent rediscovery of one of the Kinderhook plates which was examined by Joseph Smith, Jun., reaffirms his prophetic calling and reveals the false statements made by one of the finders. . . .

The plates are now back in their original category of genuine.

What scholars may learn from this ancient record in future years or what may be translated by divine power is an exciting thought to contemplate.

This much remains. Joseph Smith, Jun., stands as a true prophet and translator of ancient records by divine means and all the world is invited to investigate the truth which has sprung out of the earth not only of the Kinderhook plates, but of the Book of Mormon as well. (The Kinderhook Plates, by Welby W. Ricks, reprinted from the Improvement Era, September 1962)

Mr. Ricks based his conclusion on the fact that "two non-LDS professional engravers" examined the plate and made an affidavit in which they stated that the plate "was engraved with a pointed instrument and not etched with acid." The reader will remember that W. Fugate claimed that the hieroglyphics were formed "by making impressions on beeswax and filling them with acid and putting it on the plates." Mr. Ricks feels that this contradiction is of such a nature that it invalidates Fugate's entire story. We cannot agree with Mr. Ricks concerning this matter for there is additional evidence which proves that the plates were forgeries.

During the summer of 1965 George M. Lawrence, a Mormon physicist, was given permission to examine and make "some non-destructive physical studies of the surviving plate." Mr. Lawrence has kindly allowed us to quote from his study, which he has recently revised. In the Summary he states:

The plate is not pure copper. It may be a low zinc brass or a bronze. The dimensions, tolerances, composition and workmanship are consistent with the facilities of an 1843 blacksmith shop and with the fraud stories of the original participants. The characteristics of the inscription grooves can be reproduced in great detail using the simple acid-wax technique, contrary to the judgement of the engravers. ("Report of a Physical Study of the Kinderhook Plate Number 5," by George M. Lawrence)

Mr. Lawrence originally submitted his study to the Brigham Young University Archaeological Society, but since they seemed reluctant to print it he allowed us to make public some of his research (see our book Archaeology and the Book of Mormon, pp. 28-29).

Mormon scholars will eventually have to come to grips with this problem, and John A. Wittorf has made a move in this direction. Although he still wants to maintain Joseph Smith's reputation as a translator, he cites George Lawrence's study and discusses the implications if the plates "are ultimately demonstrated to be fraudulent":

. . . a report of a physical examination of the plate in 1965 by George M. Lawrence, a Mormon physicist, contained the conclusion that:

The plate is neither pure copper nor ordinary brass. It may be a low zinc brass or a bronze. The dimensions, tolerances, composition and workmanship are consistent with the facilities of an 1843 blacksmith shop and with the fraud stories of the original participants. . . .

In view of present archaeological evidence, neither brass nor bronze appears to have been known in North America until European times. It is thought that the first bronze in the New World was probably made in Bolivia about AD 700. . . . In light of the known use of metal in North America, brass or bronze plates in an Illinois mound, bound together with what was reported to be a rusted iron ring, should be regarded with suspicion. However, this would not preclude the possibility of their having been brought into North America from elsewhere. . . .

Joseph Smith's behavior with regard to the Kinderhook plates is quite interesting when viewed in perspective. He made no attempt to purchase these artifacts on behalf of the Church, as he did in the case of the papyri from which the Book of Abraham was translated; he forwarded no specific claims for the plates with respect to the Book of Mormon, although he evidently approved of John Taylor's Times and Seasons editorial on the plates as evidence for the authenticity of the Book; and he left no indication that he was planning to utilize them for the production of another work of scripture as the Quincy Whig, with its headline "Material for Another Mormon Book," apparently expected him to do.

Accepting the find as genuine, Joseph had facsimile drawings of the plates made, presumably for future study. The brevery of his translation of "a portion of the plates" precludes the possibility that—if the plates are ultimately demonstrated to be fraudulent—his abilities as a translator of ancient scripts and languages can be called into question. His interpretation may have resulted from the recognition of resemblances between several characters on the plates and those on the Egyptian papyri, with which he had been laboring. (Newsletter and Proceedings of the Society for Early Historic Archaeology, BYU, October 1970, p. 7)

Although we are happy to see John A. Wittorf's honesty with regard to the Kinderhook plates, we cannot agree with him when he states that Joseph Smith's reputation as a translator will not be affected. We feel that Joseph Smith's work on the plates casts serious doubt upon his ability as a translator of "ancient scripts and languages." He definitely stated that he "translated a portion of them, and find they contain the history of the person with whom they were found. He was a descendant of Ham through the loins of Pharaoh, king of Egypt, and that he received his kingdom from the Ruler of heaven and earth" (History of the Church, vol. 5, p. 372). Now, in order to obtain this much information from the plates it would have been necessary to have translated quite a number of the characters, and a man who could make such a serious mistake with regard to the Kinderhook plates is just the type of man who would pretend to translate the Book of Abraham from Egyptian papyri which he knew nothing about. Since Joseph Smith's "translations" of both the Book of Abraham and the Kinderhook plates are concerned with descendants of Ham, it is obvious that he had the Negro question in mind.

Bruce Owens, another Mormon scholar, has been able to shed some additional light on the Kinderhook plates. Mr. Owens wrote to the Smithsonian Institution concerning these plates, and on Nov. 14, 1968, he received a letter in which the following appeared:

In speaking of the Kinderhook plates, Mallery says (p. 760), speaking about them, that they were “. . . reported to bear a close resemblance to Chinese. This resemblance seemed not to be extraordinary when it was ascertained that the plate had been engraved by the village blacksmith, copied from the lid of a Chinese tea-chest.” (Letter from George Metcalf of the Smithsonian Institution, dated November 14, 1968)

Mr. Owens became interested in the idea that the characters might have been “copied from the lid of a Chinese tea-chest,” and submitted the facsimiles of the Kinderhook plates to scholars. On January 10, 1969, he received a letter from Charles T. Sylvester, of the Embassy of the United States of America, Taipei, Taiwan, which contained this information:

According to Professor Li Hsueh-chih of Academia Sinica and National Taiwan University the language on the inscriptions which you sent is that of the Lo tribe that lives in Yunnan Province in the southwest of mainland China. Unfortunately, Professor Li said that he could identify the writing but could not read the inscription . . .

On March 19, 1969, Bruce Owens received a letter from Kun Chang, Department of Oriental Languages, University of California, Berkeley. In this letter we find this statement: “The inscriptions enclosed seem to be the ideographs used by the Lolo tribes in Yunnan.”

It is very likely that the men who made the Kinderhook plates had access to a tea-chest. According to Joseph Smith’s mother, her husband received a tea-chest before they moved to Palmyra:

. . . the only thing which had been brought for Mr. Smith from China was a small chest of tea, which had been delivered into his care, for my husband. (Biographical Sketches of Joseph Smith, Liverpool, 1853, p. 50)

From the research done by Bruce Owens and George Lawrence it is plain to see that the Kinderhook plates are fraudulent, and that they were made for the purpose of deceiving Joseph Smith, just as W. Fugate claimed.

The Mormon historian B. H. Roberts claimed that the fact that Mr. Fugate waited 36 years to tell that the plates were made as a joke invalidates his story:

The fact that Fugate’s story was not told until thirty-six years after the event, and that he alone of all those who were connected with the event gives that version of it, is rather strong evidence that his story is the hoax, not the discovery of the plates, nor the engravings upon them. (History of the Church, vol. 5, p. 379, footnote)

Welby W. Ricks uses the same argument in his article printed in the Improvement Era in an attempt to undermine the story.

Actually, there is evidence that the hoax was exposed many years before Fugate made his affidavit and that at least one other witness to the plates declared them a fraud. Dr. Wyl gives this information:

Now just hear what was told me by a Mormon elder, an eye and ear witness:

A “class of elders,” eleven or twelve, of whom I was one, was assembled in the Endowment House in 1858. Apostle Orson Pratt told us that he had been reading a work in which an account was given of the Kinderhook Plates. An archaeological society had heard of the plates and they wanted to get a reliable account of them. They sent down to Kinderhook, Ill., two men to investigate the matter. These men had been there for two or three weeks without result. At last they learnt the names of the parties concerned, and that the plates were made by a blacksmith; they were told so by the artist himself. Pratt told the “class” that he was well convinced that the plates were a fraud.

(Mormon Portraits, 1886, p. 211)

W. P. Harris was one of the nine witnesses to the plates, and he also made a separate statement telling how he cleaned them, etc. (see History of the Church, vol. 5, pp. 374-377). In 1855 (24 years before Fugate’s affidavit) Harris wrote a letter in which he stated that the plates were not genuine and that Bridge Whitten had already acknowledged his part in the hoax:

Barry, Pike Co., Ill.
April 25, 1855.

Mr. Flagg,

Dear Sir: . . . I was present with a number at or near Kinderhook, and helped to dig at the time the plates were found that I think you allude to. Robert Wiley, then a merchant of that place, said that he had had a number of strange dreams . . . on Sunday the discovery was made. . . . I washed and cleaned the plates and subsequently made an honest affidavit to the same.

But since that time, Bridge Whitten said to me that he cut and prepared the plates and he (B. Whitten) and R. Wiley engraved them themselves, and that there was nitric acid put upon them the night before that they were found to rust the iron ring and band. And that they were carried to the mound, rubbed in the dirt and carefully dropped into the pit where they were found.

Wilbourn Fugit appeared to be the chief, with R. Wiley and B. Whitten. Fugit lives at Kinderhook and B. Whitten at Alton, Illinois, to both of which you can refer. (Letter from the Journal of the Illinois State Historical Society, 1912, vol. 5, no. 2, pp. 271-273, as quoted in The Book of Mormon? by James D. Bales, pp. 95-96)

Thus we see that Mr. Fugate was not the only one who exposed the hoax. At least 24 years before Fugate made his affidavit one of the witnesses had stated that it was a hoax.

B. H. Roberts asks why they did not disclose the hoax during Joseph Smith’s lifetime. The reasonable answer is that they were waiting for Joseph Smith to translate the plates, but he was murdered about one year after the plates were found and never published a translation. The statement that he had “translated a portion of them” and found them to contain a history of a “descendant of Ham” was not published until after the Mormons came to Utah.

Even B. H. Roberts had to admit that Joseph Smith’s statement that “the find was genuine, and that he had translated some of the characters” may “not have been known at the time to the alleged conspirators to deceive him . . .” (History of the Church, vol. 5, p. 379). They were obviously waiting for Joseph Smith to produce another book of “scripture” from these plates.

Falsification of History

In order to support the story of the Kinderhook plates Mormon historians have made at least two serious changes in Joseph Smith’s History of the Church.

In his affidavit Mr. Fugate claimed that there were “two Mormon elders present (Marsh and Sharp)” at the time the plates were found, and that “Sharp, the Mormon Elder, leaped and shouted for joy . . .” The fact that at least one Mormon was present and that he leaped for joy was printed in the Times and Seasons—a Mormon publication:

We learn there was a Mormon present when the plates were found, who it is said, leaped for joy at the discovery, and remarked that it would go to prove the authenticity of the Book of Mormon—which it undoubtedly will. (Times and Seasons, vol. 4, p. 187)

Evidently the Mormon historians could see that the fact that a Mormon was present would cast doubt upon the authenticity of the discovery; therefore, when they reprinted this statement in Joseph Smith’s History they falsified it so that no one would know that a Mormon was present or that he leaped for joy. In the History of the Church the statement has been changed to read: “A person present when the plates were found remarked that it would go to prove that authenticity of the Book of Mormon, which it undoubtedly will” (History of the Church, vol. 5, p. 378).

The original certificate by the witnesses included a statement about Mr. Sharp taking the plates to Nauvoo. Fugate says the Mormon elder who leaped and shouted for joy was named Sharp. In the Times and Seasons the end of the certificate reads: “The above described plates we have handed to Mr. Sharp for the purpose of taking them to Nauvoo” (Times and Seasons, vol. 4, p. 186). In the History of the Church this statement concerning Mr. Sharp taking the plates to Nauvoo has been entirely deleted without any indication (see History of the Church, vol. 5, p. 377). The fact that Mormon historians had to falsify Joseph Smith’s History to remove references to Nauvoo and Mormonism from the original accounts throws another shadow of doubt upon the authenticity of the story of the Kinderhook plates.

“Childish Forgeries”

We feel that the work George M. Lawrence has done on the Kinderhook plate proves it to be a modern production. Although the ancient inhabitants of the New World were very skilled in working with metals (see Scientific American, April 1966, pp. 72-81), we do not feel that they could meet the close tolerances which Mr. Lawrence has found on the Kinderhook plate:

The plate is about 2-7/8” high, weighs 0.621 oz. and has an area of 4.66 sq. inches. The diameter of the hole in the top is 0.126” and is round within 0.001”. The metal around the hole bulges, suggesting that the hole was punched.

Perhaps the most striking characteristic of the plate upon visual examination is its good thickness uniformity and local surface flatness. The thickness of the plate was measured at about 50 points on the surface to an accuracy of 0.0002”. The plate has a slight taper, thinning slightly toward the bottom. One may describe the thickness as 0.030”±0.001 except for the last 1/4” of taper at the bottom, where the plate thins approximately 0.002”.

The metal of the plate is fine grained and homogeneous as are modern metals. It has no spring when flexed, like annealed copper. Except for scratches, the surface is smooth as if the plate had been rolled or ground rather than hammered or cast. There is no evidence of corrosion except for the nickel-sized etch blotch on the “reverse” side. This region is quite irregular, is about 0.01” deep, and cuts into the surface along a sharply defined boundary. The sharp edge is characteristic of acid attacking a greasy or waxy surface, whereas acid on a clean metal surface produces feathered edges.

I conclude from the local flatness, the small thickness variation, the basic surface smoothness, and the taper, that the plate was cut from sheet which had been rolled, probably in a direction perpendicular to the length of the plate. The nominal size of the hole and thickness were perhaps 1/8” and 1/32,” respectively. (“Report of a Physical Study of the Kinderhook Plate Number 5,” p. 2)

We do not feel that it would have been possible for an ancient inhabitant of America to have made a plate that is so flat, and we agree with Mr. Lawrence that the plate must have been cut from a rolled sheet of metal. Mr. Lawrence informs us that “Brass was first rolled in the U.S. in Connecticut in 1832.” Notice that Mr. Lawrence finds the plate to be approximately .030 of an inch thick. This is only a thousandth or two off from 1/32.” From this we conclude that the Kinderhook plates were cut from a standard sheet measuring 1/32 of an inch thick. Notice also the hole through the top of the plate measures .126 of an inch. This is only one thousandth over 1/8 of an inch.

The reader will remember that George M. Lawrence’s study led him to conclude that “The dimensions, tolerances, composition and workmanship are consistent with the facilities of an 1843 blacksmith shop and with the fraud stories of the original participants.” The evidence from the Kinderhook plate itself, then, indicates that it is a fraud.

James D. Bales gives this information concerning the Kinderhook plates:

The plates are referred to in the Fourth Report of the Bureau of American Ethnology, p. 247 as the work of a village blacksmith. . . .

James H. Breasted, Orientalist, Historian, Egyptologist, and Professor of Egyptology in the University of Chicago—from 1905 and a number of years thereafter—stated in a letter to R. B. Neal, on April 20, 1914 that the “Kinderhook Plates are, of course, childish forgeries, as the scientific world has known for years.” . . .

What does this all add up to? Does it merely mean that one of the “finds” which the Latter Day Saints believed supported the Book of Mormon does not support it, and that there is no real blow dealt to the prophethood of Joseph Smith? Not at all, for as Charles A. Shook well observed . . . “Only a bogus prophet translates bogus plates.” Where we can check up on Smith as a translator of plates, he is found guilty of deception. How can we trust him with reference to his claims about the Book of Mormon? If we cannot trust him where we can check him, we cannot trust him where we cannot check his translations. . . . Smith tried to deceive people into thinking that he had translated some of the plates. The plates had no such message as Smith claimed that they had. Smith is thus shown to be willing to deceive people into thinking that he had the power to do something that could not be done. (The Book of Mormon? by James D. Bales, 1958, pp. 95, 97-99)

Newark Stones

On April 10, 1870, the Mormon Apostle Orson Pratt made these statements:

Thirty years after the Book of Mormon was put in print, . . . one of the great mounds south of the great lakes near Newark, in Ohio, was opened. . . . they found a large stone that appeared to be hollow; . . . another stone was found inside of it, . . . On the stone taken from the inside was carved the figure of a man . . . over the head of this man were the Hebrew characters for . . . the ancient name of Moses; while on each side of this likeness, and on different sides of the stone, above, beneath, and around about were the Ten Commandments that were received on Mount Sinai, written in the ancient Hebrew characters. . . . And what does this discovery prove? It proves that the builders of these mounds, . . . must have understood the Hebrew characters; . . .

I have seen that sacred stone. It is not a hatched up story. . . . This, then, is external proof, independent of the Scriptural proofs to which I have alluded, in testimony of the divine authenticity of the Book of Mormon. . . . several other mounds in the same vicinity of Newark were opened, in several of which Hebrew characters were found. Among them was this beautiful expression, buried with one of their ancient dead, “May the Lord have mercy on me a Nephite.” It was translated a little different—“Nephel.” . . . The Nephites . . . when they were burying one of their brethren in these ancient mounds, they introduced the Hebrew characters signifying “May the Lord have mercy on me a Nephite.” This is another direct evidence of the divine authenticity of the Book of Mormon, which was brought forth and translated by inspiration some thirty-five years before this inscription was found. (Journal of Discourses, vol. 13, pp. 130-131)

At first, many people felt that the Newark Stones were authentic, but now they are regarded as forgeries. In the Ohio Archaeological and Historical Publications, April 1908, we find the following:

Professor Warren K. Moorehead . . . has this to say concerning the Newark discovery:

Some writers have misrepresented and distorted field testimony to uphold theories previously formed. . . . we need but call the attention of our readers to the famous “Holy Stone” of Newark. An enthusiastic archaeologist resided many years ago at Newark, Ohio. . . . believed the lost ten tribes of Israel to be the ancestors of the mound-building tribes. After opening mound after mound and finding no evidence whatever in support of his hypothesis, he became desperate. He purchased a Hebrew Bible and primer, and shortly afterwards there was discovered . . . a slab, on one side of which was a likeness of Moses, and on the reverse an abridged form of the ten commandments. . . . No one doubted the genuineness of the affair until after the man’s death. In cleaning up his office the administrator found in a small rear room bits of slate with attempts at carving Hebrew characters upon them. They also found a fair copy of the wood-cut of Moses used as a frontispiece in the testament.

The influence of this over-zealous deceiver has gone throughout the length and breadth of our land, and one may still hear at lectures upon American archaeology statements concerning the Indian's descent from the Jew, basing such assertions upon the testimony of the supposed "Holy Stone of Newark," which, as is above shown, was simply a counterfeit. . . .

The testimony thus produced we believe is sufficient to convince any reader that these alleged religious relics of a prehistoric people were frauds. . . . It might be added in closing that many other stones have been found in various mounds bearing alleged inscriptions which the respective finders claim are evidences that the Mound Builders, whoever they were, had a written language. But in almost every instance these so-called findings are proven to have been unauthentic or of such a dubious environment as to have no value as proof. . . . (Ohio Archaeological and Historical Publications, vol. 17, no. 2, April 1908, pp. 214, 215, 218)

Even though the evidence is overwhelmingly against the authenticity of these artifacts, the Mormon Apostle John A. Widtsoe and Franklin S. Harris, Jr., used these purported discoveries as proof for the Book of Mormon. In fact, they even used Orson Pratt's translation which contains the word "Nephite":

Near Newark, Ohio, about 1860, an abstract of the Ten Commandments was found. . . .

About 1865 a number of Hebrew characters were found buried in mounds near Newark, Ohio, one of which was this expression, buried with one of their ancient dead, "May the Lord have mercy on me a Nephite." (Translated Nephel.) (Roberts 3:56.) (Seven Claims of the Book of Mormon, 1937, pp. 111-112)

In our book Archaeology and the Book of Mormon, pages 32-33, we give additional evidence to show that the Newark Stones are forgeries and that the translation "Nephite" cannot be accepted. Actually, the word "nephel" appears as word No. 5309 in the "Hebrew and Chaldee Dictionary" found in Strong's Exhaustive Concordance of the Bible, and it is defined as follows: "something fallen, i.e. an abortion:—untimely birth." This word is used in Job 3:16: "Or as an hidden untimely birth I had not been; as infants which never saw light." From this it is apparent that the inscription should be translated, "May the Lord have mercy on me, an untimely birth." There is nothing to support the false translation, "May the Lord have mercy on me a Nephite." As in the case of the Kinderhook plates, the Mormon leaders gave a false translation of a bogus artifact.

Most Mormon scholars no longer believe in the authenticity of David Wyrick's "Holy Stones." Stanley B. Kimball, in fact, completely repudiates them:

One of my correspondents advised me regarding the "Wyrick Holy Stones" . . . currently at the Johnson-Humrickhouse Museum, Coshocton, Ohio, and stating that "These fraudulent artifacts are believed to be authentic by the Mormons." These interesting stones are indeed on view in this museum. It seems, however, that they are fakes planted around 1860 in a desperate effort by someone to prove that the mound-building Indians of Ohio were in some way connected with the lost ten tribes of Israel. The allegation that Mormons believe them to be authentic is gratuitous. (Brigham Young University Studies, Summer 1971, p. 539)

Tree Of Life Stone

In 1965 the Mormon-owned Deseret News announced that the El Paso Times had published an article which seemed to show that the Book of Mormon had been proven by archaeologists. We obtained the article from the El Paso Times. It was entitled, "Chiapas Find of Relevance to Document," and read as follows:

The Book of Mormon, a companion volume of scripture to the Bible in the Latter-Day Saints Church, is purported to be an ecclesiastical and historical record of the American continent translated from gold plates.

Archaeologists have conceded the possible existence of such a record, and a recent archaeological find in Mexico has been interpreted of relevance to its authenticity.

A large carving unearthed in Chiapas, Mexico, has been interpreted and offers the first sound evidence of the near-eastern origin of its carvers—an origin set in the Book of Mormon.

In the evaluation of the carving strict adherence was made to a rule laid down by Dr. Alfred L. Kroeber, a non-Mormon authority on the Anthropological Theory and formerly of the University of California. The procedure requires five to ten complex similarities between questioned archaeological sites to prove a historical connection.

The carving is a portrayal of an ancient event concerning the Tree of Life. Six persons are seated by and discussing the tree. The near-east clothing style is clear, as well as are other evidences of Old World origin.

Three name glyphs on the carving have been translated as "Lehi," "Sariah," and "Nephi," prominent names in the Book of Mormon, and the study shows a detailed symbolization of a crucial scene in the book termed "Lehi's Vision of the Tree of Life." It may be one of the most important finds in the history of archeology, some think. (El Paso Times, July 4, 1965)

At first sight this article appears to be very impressive. Careful research, however, shows that this article cannot be used as evidence for the Book of Mormon. To begin with, this seems to be nothing but old Mormon propaganda rewritten. Long before the El Paso Times published this article we were given a sheet, which was printed at the Gila Printing & Publishing Co., Safford Arizona, which told that "Maurice W. Connell, of the University Archaeological Society" was lecturing "to individuals and groups" in the Bisbee area. This sheet contains too many parallels to the article in the El Paso Times to be explained away. For instance, this sheet states:

The three name glyphs on Stela 5 have been translated as "Lehi," "Sariah," and "Nephi," which are three names prominent in the Book of Mormon. . . . study of this carving. . . . shows a very detailed and accurate symbolization of a particularly crucial scene in the Book of Mormon, termed "Lehi's Vision of the Tree of Life." This . . . ranks as one of the most important and astounding finds in the history of archaeology.

The article in the El Paso Times uses almost identical wording:

Three name glyphs on the carving have been translated as "Lehi," "Sariah," and "Nephi," prominent names in the Book of Mormon, and the study shows a detailed symbolization of a crucial scene in the book termed "Lehi's Vision of the Tree of Life." It may be one of the most important finds in the history of archeology, some think. (El Paso Times, July 4, 1965)

From this it is plain to see that the article from the El Paso Times was nothing but a rehash of old Mormon propaganda (for additional parallels see Archaeology and the Book of Mormon, pp. 34-35).

When we wrote to The El Paso Times for information regarding this article, we were informed that it was submitted to the newspaper by missionaries of the Mormon Church and that one of the missionaries said that his sources were articles from the Brigham Young University:

The article "Chiapas Find of Relevance To Document," was published in the July 4, 1965 edition of The El Paso Times.

The material, in somewhat elongated form, was submitted to our religion desk by Robert Elder and Vaughn Byington, missionaries of the Church of Christ of Latter-Day Saints assigned to El Paso wards.

The information was written by Mr. Byington, who said his sources were articles obtained at the Department of Archaeology, Brigham Young University, Provo, Utah. (Letter from Joseph Rice, Religion Editor, The El Paso Times, dated November 3, 1965; a photograph of this letter is found in Archaeology and the Book of Mormon, p. 36)

While some Mormon archaeologists have felt that this stone can be used as evidence to prove the Book of Mormon, non-Mormon archaeologists seem to see no connection. In a letter to Marvin Cowan, George Crossette, of National Geographic Magazine, stated:

The National Geographic Society along with the Smithsonian Institution sponsored archeological work in Mexico where “Stela 5, Izapa” was found. Information on Stela 5 has not appeared in the National Geographic. No one associated with our expedition connected this stela in any way with the Book of Mormon. (Letter from George Crossette, Chief, Geographical Research, National Geographic Magazine, dated April 27, 1965, to Marvin W. Cowan)

M. Wells Jakeman, of the Department of Archaeology at BYU, has been chiefly responsible for the idea that the carving is connected with the Book of Mormon.

Lehi, Sariah and Nephi?

Notice that the article in The El Paso Times stated that “Three name glyphs on the carving have been translated as ‘Lehi,’ ‘Sariah,’ and ‘Nephi,’ prominent names in the Book of Mormon, . . .” We feel that this claim is not based on facts. The idea that Book of Mormon names have been translated from the carving probably stems from some of M. Wells Jakeman’s statements concerning this carving. On December 5, 1959, Dr. Jakeman said:

Incidentally we have here in the Izapa carving, in view of this conclusion, the first actual portrayal of a Book of Mormon event, and the first actual recording of Book of Mormon names, yet discovered on an ancient monument of the New World. (Book of Mormon Institute, December 5, 1959, p. 53)

As we examine Dr. Jakeman’s work, we find that he has not actually translated any Book of Mormon name from “Stela 5,” but has only symbolically interpreted some elements on the stone. Below is a photograph of Jakeman’s drawing of the stone.

Some prominent Mormon scholars do not accept Jakeman’s work. Dr. John L. Sorenson, for instance, does not agree with Dr. Jakeman. Dr. Sorenson has served as Assistant Professor of Anthropology at Brigham Young University and was Editor of the University Archaeological Society Newsletter from August 15, 1951 to July 1, 1952. Writing in Dialogue: A Journal of Mormon Thought, Dr. Sorenson stated:

Jakeman’s paper carries trait-list comparison to its logical conclusion . . . Obviously comparison remains a key methodological

STELA 5,
Izapa, Chiapas, Mexico

device in the conduct of research in history and the sciences, but the uncontrolled use of trait comparison leads to absurd conclusions. Particularly, it leads to overambitious interpretations of shared meaning and historical relationship, as in Jakeman’s previous pseudo-identifications of “Lehi” (and other characters from the Book of Mormon) on an Izapan monument. (Dialogue: A Journal of Mormon Thought, Spring 1966, p. 148)

From a statement made on December 5, 1959, it was plain that Dr. Sorenson rejected Jakeman’s work on the “Lehi Tree-of-Life Stone”:

We have wanted to find Nephi’s name or some Egyptian writer or something of this very specific kind. We have wanted to find when Zarahemla burned; we have wanted to find the ashes; we have wanted to find the very roads that Nephi walked over. The point that I would like to make is that it is extremely unlikely that we will find any of this so that we can convincingly lead others to believe that it is what we think it is. (Book of Mormon Institute, December 5, 1959, p. 25)

Dr. Jakeman once stated that a “prominent member of the faculty of Brigham Young University” had privately distributed a leaflet in which “he ridicules my interpretation” of “Stela 5.” A recent issue of Dialogue: A Journal of Mormon Thought makes it clear that Dr. Hugh Nibley was the one who attacked Jakeman’s work. Dee F. Green quotes Dr. Nibley as saying:

Science does not arrive at its conclusions by syllogisms, and no people on earth deplore proof demonstration by syllogism more loudly than real archaeologists do. Yet Mr. Jakeman’s study is nothing but an elaborate syllogistic stew. The only clear and positive thing about the whole study is the objective the author is determined to reach. With naive exuberance, he repeatedly announces that he has found “exactly what we would expect to find.” Inevitably there emerges from this dim and jumbled relief exactly what Mr. Jakeman is looking for. (Dr. Nibley’s review of Jakeman’s publication on Stela 5, as quoted in Dialogue: A Journal of Mormon Thought, Summer 1969, p. 75)

These statements by Mr. Nibley are very significant, since most Mormons regard him as the greatest scholar in the Mormon Church.

Dee F. Green, who was deeply involved with the BYU Archaeological Society, has also come out against Dr. Jakeman’s work:

A final warning should be issued against Jakeman’s Lehi Tree of Life Stone, which has received wide publicity in the Church and an over-enthusiastic response from the layman due to the publication’s pseudo-scholarship. The question which should really be asked about Izapa Stela 5 is “Did the artist or artists have Lehi’s vision in their minds when the stone was sculptured?” a question which, I submit, cannot be answered short of talking with the artist. The next question, then, is what are the probabilities that the artist had Lehi's vision in mind when he carved the stone. I don't know the answer to that one either, but then, neither does Jakeman, and his publication is more of a testimony as to what is not known than [than?] to what is known about Stela 5. As Nibley pointed out in his own inimitable style, Jakeman errs at every turn in the publication. The basis of Jakeman's evidence is his own hand-drawn version from a photograph of the stone. He makes unsupported assumptions about the canons of ancient art; he fumbles over elements of the dream which are not included and items on the stone which have no place in the dream; he displays ignorance of his linguistic data and most unfortunately reverses the scholarly method by presenting his data with a rash of "evidentlys," "probablys," "appears," and "apparentlys"—but offers his conclusions as unarguable facts. (Dialogue: A Journal of Mormon Thought, Summer 1969, pp. 74-75)

It appears, then, that some of the most prominent Mormon scholars cannot accept Dr. Jakeman's work on "Stela 5."

For a great deal of additional information which proves that "Stela 5" is nothing but a pagan object which could not possibly have had anything to do with the Book of Mormon see our book Archaeology and the Book of Mormon, pages 34-52. We also recommend Hal Hougey's study The Truth About the "Lehi Tree-of-Life" Stone.

Geography

M. T. Lamb made these statements concerning the Book of Mormon:

We read in the Old Testament far back, three and four thousand years ago, the names of cities—such as Damascus, Jerusalem, Babylon, Nineveh, Samaria, Sycar, Gaza, Tyre and Sidon—we read the names Persia, Egypt, Ethiopia. In the New Testament we find such names as Ephesus, Smyrna, Antioch, Athens, Corinth, Rome—we read of the island of Cyprus and Malta, of the countries of Syria, Italy and Spain—and we pick up our modern school geographies to find all these names more or less fully preserved.

In fact this is one of the plain evidences of the authenticity and truthfulness of the Bible record. . . .

The very opposite of this proves true of the Book of Mormon, for although we read from it all this list of cities and countries professedly in existence in this country only 1500 years ago, a date at least 300 years later than the latest date in the New Testament, and though we learn, farther, from the same book that the people inhabiting this country have not changed—that the Lamanites of old who remained sole masters of both continents 1500 years ago are the Indians of to-day, yet our readers will examine their geographies in vain to find even one of these old names preserved among the Indian names of today, or the names found upon this continent three hundred years ago when first occupied by Europeans. (The Golden Bible, pp. 276-277)

M. T. Lamb gives us a list of "Names of Ancient Cities and Countries" in the New World. They are: Carchah, Champoton, Chichen Itza, Chimalhuacan, Chiquimula, Cholula, Culouacan, Hapallanconco, Huehuetan, Hueyxalan, Guatulco, Itzalane, Izamal, Mazatepec, Mayapan, Metlaltoyuca, Mazapan, Nachan, Nimxab, Ococingo, Olman, Quiyahuyztlan, Quemedá, Quauhnauc, Quauhatochco, Tamoancan, Tepeu, Tlaachicatzin, Tlapallanconco, Tlaxicoluican, Tepetla, Tonacatepetl, Totzapan, Teotihuacan, Tlacopan, Toxpan, Tulan, Tulancingo, Txintzurtzan, Tzequil, Xalisco, Xibalba, Xlcalanco, Xochicalco, Xumiltepec, Yobaa, Zacatlan, and Zihcohuatl. M. T. Lamb also gives a list of "names of the cities and lands or countries mentioned in the Book of Mormon as existing in this country." After asking the reader to compare the two lists, Mr. Lamb stated:

Is it not strange, dear reader, that not even one solitary name from the Book of Mormon has been unearthed by all the researches of the past, and that we are left without a solitary evidence of the truthfulness of this Book—on the contrary are brought face to face with the most incontestable and unanswerable evidences of its fraud. For this is not simply a negative testimony to the effect that the names given in the Book of Mormon have not yet been found, after the most careful research by scholars. The testimony is vastly stronger than this: it is that this Mormon list of names never had an existence, in fact—that they are absolutely a myth; and therefore the Book that contains them a fraudulent fiction. . . .

Still stronger, if possible, is the testimony from the names of men. Look among the Jews all over the world to-day, and you find perpetuated in their families the old Bible names Isaac, Jacob, Joseph, Judah, Simeon, Benjamin, Samuel, David, Solomon, Daniel, and such like. And so, if the Indians are the real descendants of the ancient Lamanites, we should certainly find the greater portion of those old Book of Mormon names of men everywhere perpetuated among the Indian races of to-day. How could it be otherwise? There is no change possible or conceivable by which those old honored names could be entirely obliterated from the race. During the one thousand years of their recorded history as given in the Book of Mormon, the old familiar names of Lehi, Nephi, Laman, Lemuel and others are constantly recurring; they held on to them with reverential pertinacity. If the Book of Mormon were a true record, we should find these names in abundance among various Indian races scattered over both continents. Has any one ever discovered or even heard of, by tradition or otherwise, one Book of Mormon name among the Indians, unless that name were borrowed from the vocabulary of the modern Gentile nations? . . . the conclusion is inevitable: Either, the statements of all the scholars who have during the past three hundred years been patiently investigating ancient American history—the entire traditionary history of the various native races in Central America, the testimony of the preserved writings of the ancient Mayas, and the testimony of the Indian names of today—are all wrong—or the Book of Mormon is a fable and its list of names a myth. There is no other possible conclusion; no middle ground. Both cannot be true. Either the Book of Mormon or the entire testimony drawn from American antiquities is false. If the one is true, the other cannot be. (The Golden Bible, pp. 278-280, 283)

The Mormon historian B. H. Roberts seemed to be unable to explain the absence of Book of Mormon names among the American Indians:

It is objected to the Book of Mormon that there nowhere appears in native American languages Book of Mormon names. . . . The absence of Book of Mormon names in the native language, is held to be fatal testimony against the claims of the Book of Mormon by this writer.

One recognizes here a real difficulty, and one for which it is quite hard to account. It must be remembered, however, that from the close of the Nephite period, 420 A.D., to the coming of the Spaniards in the sixteenth century, we have a period of over one thousand years; and we have the triumph also of the Lamanites over the Nephites bent on the destruction of every vestige of Nephite traditions and institutions. May it not be that they recognized as one of the means of achieving such destruction the abrogation of the old familiar names of things and persons? (New Witnesses For God, Salt Lake City, 1951, vol. 3, p. 518)

B. H. Roberts suggests that "the name 'Nahaus' and the adjective derived from it, 'Nahuatl,' are probably variations of the names 'Nephi' and 'Nephite,' . . ." He then gives a few other weak parallels, and finally concludes by stating:

But after all this is said it is still a matter of regret that more of the Nephite names, both of men and countries, have not survived in the native American languages. Still the field of knowledge of American antiquities has not yet been thoroughly explored, and when its buried cities and monuments shall be more thoroughly known all the evidences that can be demanded along these lines will doubtless be produced. (New Witness For God, vol. 3, p. 521)

Mormon writers are not only faced with the problem of trying to explain the absence of Book of Mormon names, but they have the additional problem of not being able to identify sites mentioned in the Book of Mormon. The Mormon writer Joseph E. Vincent admitted that the exact location of Book of Mormon sites is unknown:

At one time when I was a member of a ward bishopric, one of the counselors said to me: "Why is it we have accurate maps of Palestine and not of the Book of Mormon Lands? Why do we know so well where Jerusalem, Bethlehem, and Nazareth are and do not know where Zarahemla, Bountiful, and Cumorah are? Does that mean that actually those places are fictitious as the non-Mormons say they are?" My answer was: "No, they are certainly not fictitious, . . ."

First let us look and see what we do not know about the Holy Land. We do know where Jerusalem was. We know where Herod's palace and the Temple were. . . . But do we know for sure where Nazareth was? We do not. . . . we do not know where Calvary was, nor where the Holy Sepulchre was. Actually two different sites have been identified as Calvary or Golgotha, and two distinct tombs have been identified as the tomb of Joseph.

Although we have been in continuous contact with the Holy Land, we do not know these very important locations. Is it not easy to understand then, why we do not know the exact location of the Book of Mormon sites when we have actually been out of contact with the Book of Mormon people since Lehi left Palestine in 600 B.C.? We have actually been out of contact with them for 2600 years. You can lose track of a lot of things in 2600 years. (Fourteenth Annual Symposium on the Archaeology of the Scriptures, Brigham Young University, April 13, 1963, p. 61)

The Mormon writer J. N. Washburn made these comments regarding the Book of Mormon:

Culminating about 1888, with the publication of the large octavo volume, there was a practice of locating, in footnotes, all the major features of the Book-of-Mormon setting. From that time, fortunately, the number of such notes has steadily dropped off until the present edition contains none at all. This shows how careful we in our time are to approach this whole problem, and it is a commendable caution. . . .

A yet more deplorable practice has been to attempt to label present-day locations with Book-of-Mormon names. To the best of my knowledge there is not a single place—ruin, city, or land—to which we can point and say with certainty and say that it is such-and-such a one in the record. (The Contents, Structure and Authorship of the Book of Mormon, by J. N. Washburn, pp. 209-210)

In 1954 Dr. M. Wells Jakeman made the startling announcement that the Book of Mormon city of Bountiful had "very probably been found" (U.A.S. Newsletter, August 23, 1954, pp. 4-6). In the U.A.S. Newsletter, Number 46, December 17, 1957, we find this statement: "Aguacatal has been identified by Dr. Jakeman, . . . as almost certainly the city Bountiful of the Book of Mormon. . . ." The June 4, 1958, issue of the "Newsletter" reported that Dr. Ross T. Christensen was going to lecture "on 'Uncovering the Ancient Walled City of Bountiful.'" In the July 16, 1958, issue of the "Newsletter" we find this statement: "Dr. Jakeman is presently preparing a special window display featuring the excavations being conducted by BYU at the ancient walled city of Aguacatal, Campeche, Mexico (identified as Bountiful of the Book-of-Mormon)." On July 1, 1959, the "Newsletter" contained this statement:

Digging the Ruins of Bountiful. The city Bountiful of the Book of Mormon, . . . is a location of key importance in Book of Mormon geography. To discover its exact location should make it possible in turn to identify the river Sidon, locate the Nephite capital Zarahemla, and eventually work out the entire scheme of Book of Mormon geography. . . .

In 1948 Dr. M. Wells Jakeman, chairman of the BYU Department of Archaeology, located a ruined city now called Aguacatal in western Campeche, in the southern Gulf Coast region of Mexico, which exactly met the qualifications for identification as this city Bountiful of the Book of Mormon. . . . (U.A.S. Newsletter, July 1, 1959, pp. 4-5)

Mormon archaeologists have done a great deal of work at Aguacatal, but they have been unable to prove that it is the city Bountiful. In fact, Dee F. Green states that their own work proves that it is not Bountiful:

After excavating at Aguacatal in 1961 and conducting the only study yet made of the artifacts and data recovery Ray Matheny, then a graduate student at BYU, privately demonstrated that Aguacatal is not Bountiful. The UAS Newsletter has never recognized Matheny's contribution. Jakeman has also identified the site of El Cayo on the Usumacinta River in Southern Mexico as Zarahemla. Others who have visited the site find it too small, and some preliminary archaeological testing shows its main occupation to be too late in time for such an interpretation. (Dialogue: A Journal of Mormon Thought, Summer 1969, p. 73, n. 4)

On the same page Dee F. Green refers to the "one abortive attempt to identify the Book of Mormon city Bountiful, . . ." On December 1, 1969, Dr. Jakeman responded to Green, but his statement plainly shows that he does not have evidence to prove that Bountiful has been discovered:

Another failure of the writer in the field of Book of Mormon archaeology, according to our critic, is an "abortive attempt to identify the Book of Mormon city Bountiful." This is a premature judgment. The project of archaeological identification referred to has never been terminated; for a number of ancient sites in the district fixed upon (on the basis of references in the Book of Mormon itself and confirmatory and supplementary data in the early historical accounts from Mesoamerica) are still good candidates for this identification. (Newsletter and Proceedings of the S.E.H.A., BYU, December 1, 1969, p. 5)

Most members of the Mormon Church probably have no idea of the dilemma a person is faced with if he tries to make a serious study of the geography of the Book of Mormon. The Mormon Apostle John A. Widtsoe has admitted, however, that those who have studied this subject are not in agreement, and that often "thousands of miles" separate suggested locations for the same site:

The actual geographical locations of Book of Mormon events and places have always intrigued students of the book. Several volumes and many articles on the subject have been published. The various writers so far have failed to agree. Often the suggested locations vary, with different authors, thousands of miles. An earnest, honest search is being continued by enthusiastic Book of Mormon students. (Statement by John A. Widtsoe, as quoted in Ancient America and the Book of Mormon, by Milton R. Hunter & Thomas S. Ferguson, 1950, Calif., p. 143)

John A. Widtsoe once stated that the Lord might have to give a revelation to settle the disputes among Mormon scholars concerning the geography of the Book of Mormon:

Students are not agreed on the main facts that must form the basis of a Book of Mormon geography. One group believes, as do most of the Church, that the great events recorded towards the end of the Book occurred in or near New York State. Another group, somewhat smaller, believes that the evidence at hand places these events in Middle America. Both views are held to tenaciously by the respective groups. . . . Out of the studies of faithful Latter-day Saints may yet come a unity of opinion concerning Book of Mormon geography; or, the Lord may give a revelation that will end all differences of opinion. (Cumorah-Where? by Thomas Stuart Ferguson, Missouri, 1947, Forward by John A. Widtsoe)

Hill Cumorah

According to the Book of Mormon, two great civilizations—i.e., the Nephites and the Jaredites—were destroyed in battles which took place at the "hill Cumorah." This is the same hill where Joseph Smith was supposed to have found the gold plates.

The question, of course, arises as to why such an insignificant little hill would be chosen for these two great battles. M. T. Lamb made these comments:

Mormon is recording the rapid destruction of his people, the Nephites. They have been driven out of all their strong-holds in Central America: one after another their principal cities have been taken and destroyed by the victorious Lamanites. Beaten everywhere and rapidly driven northward, Mormon finally writes a letter to the king of the Lamanites, making the following strange request:

And I, Mormon wrote an epistle unto the King of the Lamanites, and desired of him that he would grant unto us that we might gather together our people unto the land of Cumorah, and there we could give them battle. And it came to pass that the King of the Lamanites did grant unto me the thing which I desired. And it came to pass that we did march forth to the land of Cumorah; and it was in a land of many waters, rivers and fountains; and here we had hope to gain advantage over the Lamanites.

Now, reader, do you think any sane general of an army would write such a letter as the above to his deadly foe? And if such a letter had been written, do you think such a deadly foe, if in his senses would have consented? Please bear in mind that the Lamanites' home was in South America, and that the principal possessions of the Nephites, their largest cities, nearly everything desirable as plunder, are found in Central America, while this hill, Cumorah, is located in western New York, from two to three thousand miles distant. Would the Lamanite king be willing to transport an army of several hundred thousand, at least two thousand miles away from his base of supplies, into a sparsely settled country, where provisions were necessarily scarce, for no other reason than to allow his enemy to secure a good position where they "had hope to gain advantage over the Lamanites"?

But again, why do you suppose the good prophet Mormon was so anxious to reach that particular hill Cumorah, so far away from the homes and possessions of his people? Was it really because said hill was a natural fortification, a famous strategic point? Not at all; it is only a little hill, while in reaching that hill he had climbed over hundreds of mountain fastnesses, had marched by scores of magnificent canons or river gorges and other of nature's hiding places or of Thermopylae passes—a thousand places had been presented that were a hundred times better adapted to the object he had in view: "to gain some advantage over the Lamanites."

Why then does he ignore all these strong places and march his army a thousand miles away from the mountains to a little hill in western New York that was utterly valueless as a natural barrier against an enemy? Reader, we will whisper the reason. Joseph Smith found his golden plates in this hill Cumorah, and he must needs get Mormon and Moroni up there with their sacred records before these worthies are swept out of existence, or his ancient history will not tally with the modern facts!! (The Golden Bible, pp. 204-206)

The traditional view concerning the hill Cumorah was clearly presented by the Mormon Apostle Orson Pratt:

The Lamanites at that time dwelt in South America, and the Nephites in North America.

A great and terrible war commenced between them, which lasted for many years, and resulted in the complete overthrow and destruction of the Nephites. This was commenced at the Isthmus of Darien, and was very destructive to both nations for many years. At length, the Nephites were driven before their enemies, a great distance to the north and north-east; and having gathered their whole nation together, both men, women, and children, they encamped on and round about the hill Cumorah, where the records were found, which is in the State of New York about two hundred miles west of the city of Albany. . . . the nation of the Nephites were destroyed, . . . (Remarkable Visions, p. 10, as reprinted in Orson Pratt's Works)

The criticism of M. T. Lamb has probably had a great effect upon Mormon scholars. In fact, in the last few years a number of prominent Mormon scholars have decided that the traditional view—i.e., that the hill Cumorah is in New York—must be repudiated. They claim that the Nephites and Lamanites did not inhabit both North and South America as was previously taught, but that they lived in Mesoamerica and that the hill Cumorah must be located near by. Thomas Stuart Ferguson, one of the most prominent writers on the subject of archaeology and the Book of Mormon, was one of the first to promote this new theory:

The Valley of Mexico would seem to meet all the requirements to qualify as the Land of Many Waters. Mexico City is located in the Valley of Mexico. Mountains at the southeastern corner of the Valley would seem to meet all factors required of the "hill," Shim and Ramah-Cumorah. They are the best known mountains in all Mexico. . . .

Popocatepetl and Ixtaccihuatl are magnificent landmarks, known by name for hundreds of miles. As such they would seem to meet the magnitude requirements of Ramah-Cumorah and Shim. Both were landmarks from Jaredite times, even prior to the arrival of the Nephites in the region. . . . The fact that they are referred to as "hills" in the Book of Mormon should not of itself lead us to conclude that they were minor elevations. All mounts, regardless of size, referred to by name in the Book of Mormon are termed "hills." . . .

A further indication that Ramah-Cumorah may have been a great mountain is the fact that "Ramah" means "high" or "the height." It is an ancient Semite term. Popocatepetl is 17,887 feet and Ixtaccihuatl is 16,883 feet.

These great mountains, which can be viewed from the present city of Mexico and the nearby lakes, are of such magnitude that the great Jaredite and Nephite armies could easily have been accommodated on their slopes. (Cumorah-Where? 1947, pp. 42, 46, 47)

The gathering of the Nephites at Ramah-Cumorah . . . was the idea of their leader, Mormon. . . . Apparently the location was also well-known to the Lamanite leader for Mormon wrote a letter to the king of the Lamanites and in reply, received express permission to gather the Nephites "by a hill which was called Cumorah, and there give them battle." We must ask ourselves, was Mormon asking permission to gather his people to a part of the Valley of Mexico in the northern portion of the ancient Nephite domain, or was he asking permission of the enemy to let him gather his forces at a point in what is now western New York? The latter is approximately 3,000 miles from Tehautepec. (Consider what 3,000 miles was to Old and New Testament people.) It seems reasonable that the Lamanite king might have consented to a battle site as near his ancestral home, to the south of the Narrow Neck of Land, as was the Valley of Mexico. And it would seem reasonable that Mormon would choose the Ramah-Cumorah and hill-Shim area for the battle if the Nephite population centers were near and not insurmountable. These practical and strategic considerations lend much support to the view that Ramah-Cumorah may not have been farther north than the Valley of Mexico. (Ibid., p. 54)

. . . it is hardly possible that Ramah-Cumorah could have been 3,000 miles to the north. . . . the hill in New York . . . is too small to have played such a great role as was played by Ramah-Cumorah. . . . It was not large enough to have accommodated the great armies which camped around Ramah-Cumorah. (Ibid., p. 65)

The Mormon writer Fletcher B. Hammond stated:

Many Book of Mormon scholars assert that the hill Cumorah is in what is now New York state. To justify that assertion disrupts and confuses the entire concept of Book of Mormon geography. To correctly correlate that hill with other countries and places named in the sacred record it must be placed on a map so as to show consistency and harmony in the travels of the Book of Mormon peoples. All of the places and countries named in the record may be consistently assembled on a map which may cover some of the countries now known as Mexico and Central America. This cannot be done if the hill Cumorah is placed on a map in the vicinity of what is now Palmyra, New York. . . . since about 1830 there have been two Hills Cumorah in Mormon literature; but it was not so during the times of the Book of Mormon peoples. It is my aim to show that the Book of Mormon peoples knew but one hill Cumorah, and that it was not in what is now New York state. (Geography of the Book of Mormon, Salt Lake City, 1959, pp. 72-73)

Isn't it bordering on the ridiculous to allege that this great nation, near the end of its existence, migrated in a body to what is now New York just so as to annihilate themselves at and around the hill Cumorah? . . .

No amount of juggling of the Book of Mormon text can place the hill Ramah-Cumorah in what is now New York state. It was somewhere in what is now Central America. Hunter and Ferguson appear to be right in their conclusions on this matter. (Ibid., pp. 88, 90)

How can one be so naive as to try to establish the Book of Mormon hill Cumorah in what is now New York state? . . . after all the evidence is in and weighed with reason, the only proper conclusion to be reached is: the Book of Mormon hill Cumorah was somewhere in what is now Central America or southern Mexico. (Ibid., pp. 118-119)

This new idea concerning the location of the hill Cumorah was accepted by so many Mormon scholars that the Mormon Historian Joseph Fielding Smith, who recently became the tenth President of the Church, had to write an article against it. In this article we find the following:

Within recent years there has arisen among certain students of the Book of Mormon a theory to the effect that within the period covered by the Book of Mormon, the Nephites and Lamanites were confined almost within the borders of the territory comprising Central America and the southern portion of Mexico; the isthmus of Tehuantepec probably being the "narrow neck" of land spoken of in the Book of Mormon rather than the Isthmus of Panama.

This theory is founded upon the assumption that it was impossible for the colony of Lehi's to multiply and fill the hemisphere within the limits of one thousand years, or from the coming of Lehi from Jerusalem to the time of the destruction of the Nephites at the Hill Cumorah. Moreover, that the story of the migrations, building of cities, the wars and contentions, preclude the possibility of the people's spreading over great distances such as we find within the borders of North and South America. . . .

This modernistic theory of necessity, in order to be consistent, must place the waters of Ripliancum and the Hill Cumorah some place within the restricted territory of Central America, notwithstanding the teachings of the Church to the contrary for upwards of 100 years. Because of this theory some members of the Church have become confused and greatly disturbed in their faith in the Book of Mormon. It is for this reason that evidence is here presented to show that it is not only possible that these places could be located as the Church has held during the past century, but that in very deed such is the case. . . . In the light of revelation it is absurd for anyone to maintain that the Nephites and Lamanites did not possess this northern land. . . .

In the face of this evidence coming from the Prophet Joseph Smith, Oliver Cowdery and David Whitmer, we cannot say that the Nephites and Lamanites did not possess the territory of the United States and that the Hill Cumorah is in Central America. Neither can we say that the great struggle which resulted in the destruction of the Nephites took place in Central America. (The Deseret News, Church Section, February 27, 1954, pp. 2-3)

Joseph Fielding Smith's statement has not ended the matter, and the battle still rages (see Archaeology and the Book of Mormon, pp. 57-61). Hal Hougey makes this interesting observation concerning the division among Mormon archaeologists:

Today, Latter-day Saints are divided over this matter of Book of Mormon geography. Among those adhering to the classic interpretation are McGavin and Bean, and Dewey Farnsworth in his Book of Mormon Evidences in Ancient America.

The new view called the "Tehuantepec" theory, is favored by Mormon anthropologists at Brigham Young University, and is finding some favor in the church leadership. As informed Latter-day Saints have become aware that the classic view is untenable in the light of modern archeological knowledge, they have had to search for a new explanation of Book of Mormon geography. Actually, B. H. Roberts had some misgivings about the classic view as early as 1909 (New Witnesses for God, 3:502-503), and suggested that the events of the Book of Mormon might be restricted to Mesoamerica, with the Isthmus of Tehuantepec in southern Mexico as the "narrow neck of land." This explanation makes it less difficult to harmonize the descriptions of the terrain and the Jaredite and Nephite civilizations in the Book of Mormon with the archeological data, and has therefore been accepted by the Mormon anthropologists at BYU in recent years. (Archeology and the Book of Mormon, p. 12)

Dr. M. Wells Jakeman, Professor of Archaeology at BYU, has repudiated the idea that the Nephites and Lamanites filled both North and South America:

I am sure most of you are already aware that we have an abundance of information within the text itself for defining rather closely the area of the Book of Mormon civilizations. It is now no longer in question that this area was the comparatively small part of the New World which is now referred to as Mesoamerica—central and southern Mexico and northern Central America. There are, in fact, over 600 statements in the record of geographic significance, which pin its area down rather definitely to this relatively small part of the New World. It is possible even to go so far as to indicate the approximate location of some of the main cities, on the basis of their placement in the record in relation to certain coast lines and topographic features. (Book of Mormon Institute, December 5, 1959, p. 47)

Joseph E. Vincent, a Mormon archaeologist, claims that if a person sincerely studies the Book of Mormon he will find all the Book of Mormon lands within a small area:

Now in conclusion, what can we do about the Book of Mormon geography? Should we sit still and listen to the traditional views of all Indians being Lamanites and of the Book of Mormon peoples roaming back and forth between northern United States and South America?

Or are we going to read the Book of Mormon and come to our own conclusions? . . .

In conclusion, let me reiterate that if a sincere student of the Book of Mormon will conscientiously read and study the Book itself and will plot out all the locations mentioned, disregarding "off-the-cuff" remarks of the early Church leaders, he will find that all Book of Mormon lands lie within a five or six-hundred mile radius and that this area could not possibly extend from Chile to New York. (Fourteenth Annual Symposium On The Archaeology Of The Scriptures, BYU, 1963, pp. 67-68)

The Book of Mormon itself certainly gives the impression that the Nephites and Lamanites occupied both North and South America. In Helaman 3:8 we read:

And it came to pass that they did multiply and spread, and did go forth from the land southward to the land northward, and did spread insomuch that they began to cover the face of the whole earth, from the sea south to the sea north, from the sea west to the sea east.

The 1888 Edition of the Book of Mormon contained footnotes which explained that the "sea south" was the "Atlantic, south of Cape Horn." The "sea north" was explained to be the "Arctic, north of North America." The "sea west" was supposed to be the "Pacific," and the "sea east" was the "Atlantic" (Book of Mormon, 1888 ed., p. 434). In modern editions of the Book of Mormon these footnotes have been deleted.

Dr. M. Wells Jakeman states that there are several theories concerning the geography of the Book of Mormon but that the “Tehuantepec” theory has been accepted by almost all those who have studied the geography of the Book of Mormon:

When we attempt to identify this internal relative geography with some actual part of the New World, we find several theories advocated. The long-popular view among readers of the Book of Mormon as to its area has been what may be termed the “general New World identification,” in which the entire American continent is considered the area of development of the Book of Mormon civilizations, with the main land-northward division of the Book of Mormon area all North America, the main land-southward division all South America, and the connecting isthmus or “small neck of land” the Isthmus of Panama. . . . two more recent theories restrict the area to some middle part only of the New World. One of these, which may be called the “limited Panama identification,” retains the Isthmus of Panama as the “small neck of land,” and identifies Central America (rather than the whole continent of North America) as the “land northward” and northwesternmost South America (Colombia and Ecuador, rather than all that continent) as the “land southward.” . . .

The other of these more restricted interpretations, which may be called the “limited Tehuantepec identification,” abandons Panama as the “small neck of land” or central isthmus feature of the Book of Mormon area and instead identifies as this feature the Isthmus of Tehuantepec in southern Mexico. . . . This “Tehuantepec” area is therefore now accepted by nearly all students of the geography of the Book of Mormon as the area of that account, at least on the basis of agreements in physical geography. (Progress in Archaeology, pp. 82-84)

The Mormon writer Walter M. Stout seems to agree that the geography of the Book of Mormon must be limited to a small area, but he feels that Costa Rica is the correct area:

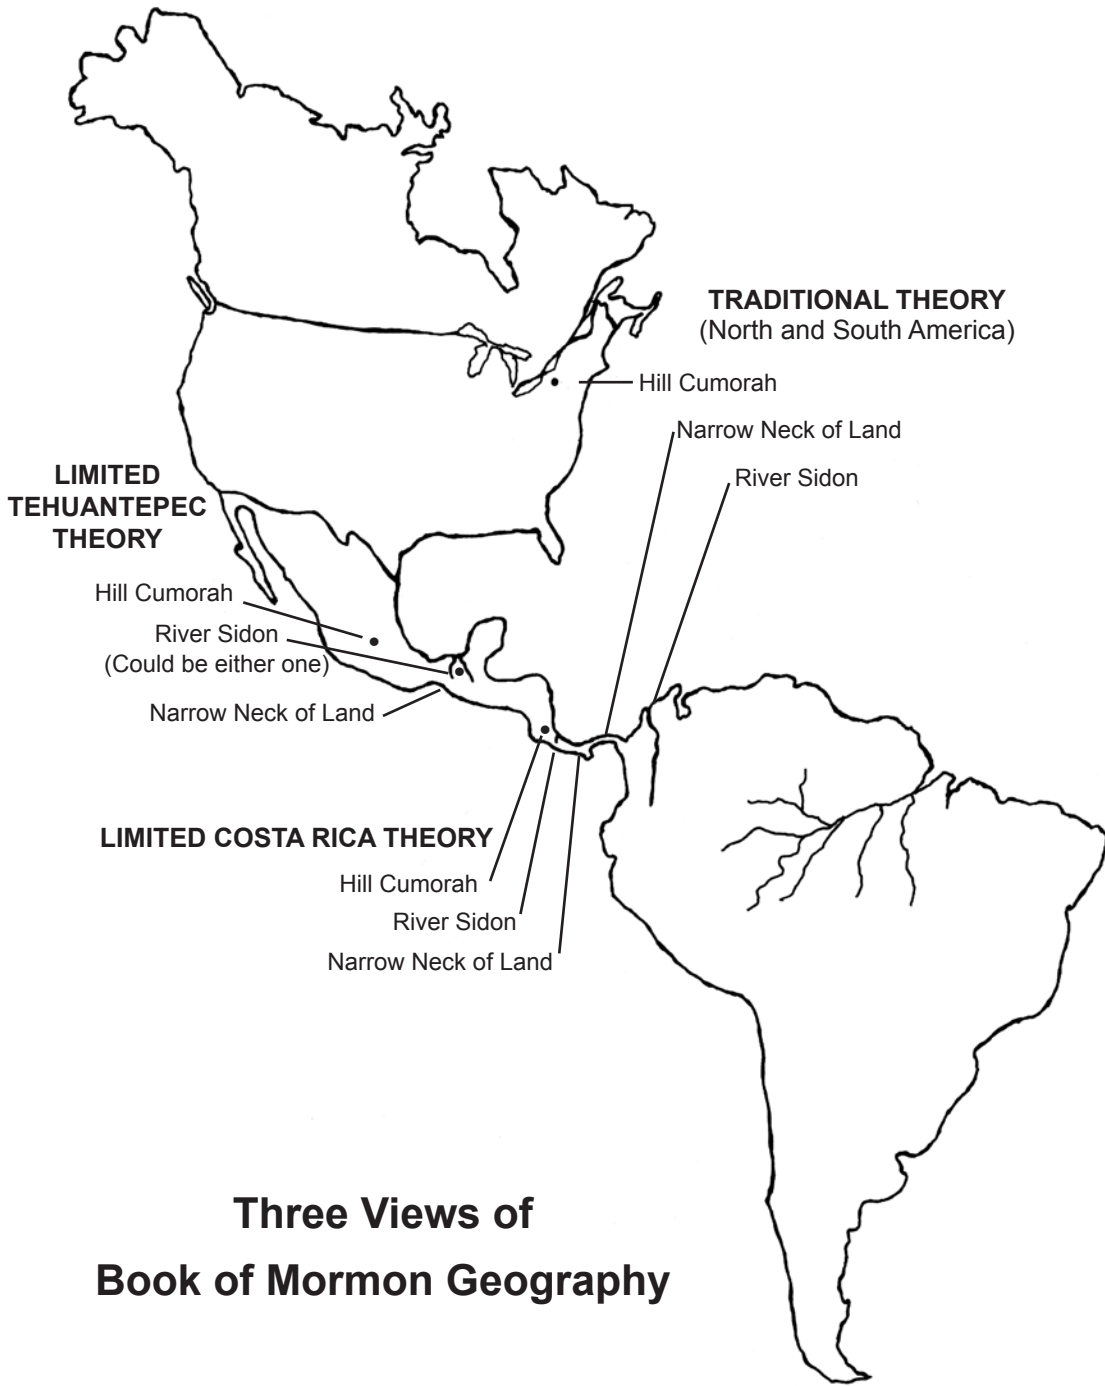

How I settled on Costa Rica is a long story. I had drawn an imaginary map, harmonizing fifty or more points, and spent many weeks trying to fit it into some country. I tried Colombia, on the Magdalena River, Panama, Spanish Honduras, on the Uluá River, Guatemala, and Southern Mexico, on the Rio Usumacinta River, and tried to fit the Isthmus of Tehuantepec into it, but this country is all backwards. The Book of Mormon does not describe it. The narrow places are North and South, when according to the Book of Mormon, they should be East and West. I tried Florida, New York and Lower California. I skipped over Costa Rica. Nothing caught my eye. I was discouraged and about to give up. Then one night I went to a show where the March of Time had something to do with Central America, and I was attracted to Costa Rica and Nicaragua. They resembled my imaginary map. I went to work on it, and right away it began to fit. . . .

Geography of the Book of Mormon will some day become one of the strongest outside evidences of the Book of Mormon. (Harmony in Book of Mormon Geography, Las Vegas, Nevada, 1950, pp. 2-3)

Mr. Stout does not accept the Isthmus of Panama or the Isthmus of Tehuantepec as the small neck of land mentioned in the Book of Mormon:

Other points to consider are: The isthmus of Panama is a long neck of land. It does not seem to answer this description. It doesn't have an east and west sea, neither does the isthmus of Tehuantepec.

The only one answering all the descriptions is in Costa Rica. (Harmony in Book of Mormon Geography, p. 22)

Mr. Stout claimed that he "tried to fit the land of Cumorah into New York," but it would not work. According to his maps (pages 4-7), Mr. Stout has decided to locate the hill Cumorah in Costa Rica!

Dr. Nibley has contested the idea that the Isthmus of Tehuantepec is the small neck of land mentioned in the Book of Mormon: "To call the Isthmus of Tehuantepec, one hundred and thirty miles wide, a 'narrow passage' is of course out of the question" (An Approach to the Book of Mormon, p. 360).

In rebuttal to Dr. Nibley's statement, Dr. M. Wells Jakeman stated:

... this is not out of the question at all. Although the Isthmus of Tehuantepec, in its present width of 130 miles, may be considered too wide to be described as a "small neck of land" or "narrow passage" in the absolute sense, in the relative sense—i.e. in comparison with the land areas on either side—it does fit these terms (and probably did even more in ancient Book of Mormon times, as there is evidence of a considerable regression of the sea on each side since those times)—else why do geographers designate it as an isthmus? (U.A.S. Newsletter, Number 40, March 30, 1957, pp. 10-11)

The Mormon writer J. N. Washburn states that "there is but one river mentioned in the Book of Mormon, but it is mentioned many, many times, nearly thirty" (The Contents, Structure & Authorship of the Book of Mormon, p. 240). George Reynolds and Janne M. Sjodahl state:

RIVER SIDON: One of the most important places in Nephite history for four or five hundred years was the River Sidon. It was their great highway, more to them than the Mississippi is to this country or the Thames is to England. (Book of Mormon Geography, The Lands of the Nephites-The Jaredites, by George Reynolds & Janne M. Sjodahl, Salt Lake City, 1957, p. 51)

C. Stewart Bagley states, "Identification of the Sidon river is necessarily one of the most important phases of our research" (Fourteenth Annual Symposium on the Archaeology of the Scriptures, p. 77). Even though Mormon writers have spent a great deal of time on this subject, they are not united concerning the location of this river. George Reynolds stated that the river Sidon is "known to-day as the Magdalena" (A Complete Concordance of the Book of Mormon, p. 633). Fletcher B. Hammond wrote:

Many Book of Mormon scholars think Us umacinta could have been Sidon of the Book of Mormon. There is no evidence that it is not. Its general course argues in its favor. That entire country for the last 1500 years has been subject to much geological change, as we shall see later, and Unumacinta, of today, may not in all respects fit Sidon of 400 A.D., yet it could be a modification of that river. (Geography of the Book of Mormon, Fletcher B. Hammond, p. 12)

Ross T. Christensen stated:

... Dr. M. Wells Jakeman, has identified—and you may find this discussed in various issues of the Newsletter (22.03, 34.01, 40.0)—the Usumacinta River as the Sidon of the Book of Mormon. Others have proposed the Grijalva, but this seems unsatisfactory to me. (Newsletter & Proceedings of the S.E.H.A., BYU, January 13, 1969, p. 5)

Joseph E. Vincent tells of the problem he faced with the river Sidon when he tried to make a map of Book of Mormon lands:

The way I set up my map was this—and I agree that this method is definitely not above reproach. The archaeology department of B.Y.U. has thought that the Rio Usumacinta was the River Sidon, while members of the New World Archaeological Foundation have felt that it was the Rio Grijalva. Since the two rivers are actually close together, I chose a line between the two and set it up as the River Sidon. (Fourteenth Annual Symposium on the Archaeology of the Scriptures, p. 65)

It would appear, then, that there is serious division among those who study the geography of the Book of Mormon. Dr. Daniel H. Ludlow made this interesting observation:

I think that as Latter-day Saints we have asked for some of the criticisms that we have received concerning some of the claims that we have made for the Book of Mormon. All of our claims cannot be right. When you get three different claims concerning something related to the Book of Mormon, and these claims do not agree, then all of them cannot be right. That does not mean that even any of them are right. The possibility is—at least it exists—that all of them are wrong. At least, if you have three different and separate claims, two of them have to be wrong, and only one of them can be right; and there is the possibility that all three of them could be wrong.

Yesterday afternoon I was preparing some material for my Book of Mormon sections for next quarter, when we go into the books of Mosiah and Alma. I was interested in the geography of the Book of Mormon. I pulled down three commentaries and books on the Book of Mormon and read three theories of Book of Mormon geography. In the books, they were even stated as more than theories. Two of the three books even had maps. One of them showed the Book of Mormon lands entirely in South America. One of them showed the Book of Mormon lands entirely in Central America. One of them showed the Book of Mormon lands in Central America and the rest in North America. Now, not all three of these can be right. Therefore, it seems to me that in these areas where we are not one hundred per cent sure, it would be best not to make the claim, rather than later on have to retract that claim. (Book of Mormon Institute, Dec. 5, 1959, p. 22)

The Mormon writer Paul R. Cheesman made these statements:

The geography of a country always helps us to understand its people better. Evidently it was not considered of prime importance to the writers of the Book of Mormon, however, since sufficient detailed information is not provided for us to determine with certainty the location of the areas or cities of the history. This should not discourage continuous study in this field, since future findings may help to establish the geography and thus clarify some aspects of the Book of Mormon.

There are those who believe that there are two Hill Cumorahs. Their theory is that the hill on which Mormon fought the last battle with the Lamanites is not the same hill in which Joseph Smith found the gold plates. Advocates of this theory establish their analysis primarily from the internal evidences of the Book of Mormon. Others conclude that there is only one Hill Cumorah, and that the place where Joseph Smith and Moroni met was the same place Mormon and Moroni visited in the fifth century. There is no official Church view.

Some say the "narrow neck of land" is Panama, and others the Isthmus of Tehuantepec in Mexico. (The Instructor, November 1968, p. 429)

In an address delivered March 25, 1964, Fletcher B. Hammond stated:

... it is practically impossible to point to any Book of Mormon land and say, unequivocally, here is that land. ... the Gentiles have not yet received the Book of Mormon by faith—or for any other reason—and until they do accept that book as scripture, it appears that empiracle facts will not be allowed to come forth as evidence of the truthfulness of the Book of Mormon. ... it is next to impossible to make the geography of the Book of Mormon fit modern maps. (Geography of the Book of Mormon—'Where is the Hill Cumorah?' p. 7)

In his larger book, Fletcher B. Hammond stated:

Where in Central America is there a country that well resembles the countries, the cities, and the places mentioned in the Book of Mormon? The answer must be: There is no present country in Central America, or elsewhere, patterned after the Book of Mormon lands. The only conclusion that can be drawn from all of this discussion is that the entire face of the land of Central America has been changed since the destruction of the Nephites about 400 years after the crucifixion of Christ. . . . It appears that most, if not all, of the landmarks and monuments named in the Book of Mormon have been obliterated for a good and wise purpose. . . .

In the 109th Annual Conference Report at pages 128 and 129 Antoine R. Ivins is reported to have said:

Now if we go into Mexico and Central America, and into our own United States, and, by scraping aside the earth which has accumulated over the centuries, expose to view a consecutive and true story of this people which bear out in all its major details the story of the Book of Mormon, what a simple thing it would be. But it would lose in my mind, one of its greatest values. . . . I believe that God purposely covered up these things that when the Book of Mormon should come to light in this generation it would have to be accepted on faith. . . . Faith to me is the greatest thing in life, and God purposely, I believe, covered up in antiquity the history of this people and the story of the Book of Mormon so that when it should come to light it would have to rest upon faith, a faith that could be given to us only by God Himself. . . .

It seems that the Lord has changed the Book of Mormon lands since the extinction of the Nephites so that no one can say: Here is the “narrow neck of land”; here is the narrow strip of wilderness; here is the river Sidon; here is the hill Cumorah in Central America; here is the hill Shim in the land of Antum; etc., etc. If such places could be ascertained with certainty, knowledge of the truthfulness of the Book of Mormon would come without faith; and that kind of knowledge is static. . . . He is keeping from this generation all facts possible that would produce knowledge of the truthfulness of the Book of Mormon without the exercise of faith. Knowledge that comes after the exercise of faith always produces happiness; knowledge that is thrust upon us may not. (Geography of the Book of Mormon, pp. 122-126)

In this chapter we have shown that Mormon writers have made some fantastic claims about archaeology supporting the Book of Mormon. When these claims are put to the test, however, they are found to be very weak. Charles A. Shook made these comments concerning this matter:

In the Old World the archaeologist has little difficulty in arriving at a conclusion as to the general character of the ancient religions. The idols, the altars, the temples, the religious paintings and the hieroglyphical inscriptions of Egypt and Assyria leave him with no doubts as to the idolatrous character of the ancient religions of those countries. It requires but a passing glance for him to see that they did not partake of the distinctive features of Judaism and Christianity. But the evidences in Egypt and Assyria show no more conclusively that the old religions were not Judaism and Christianity than do those of America. Here, too, the idols, the temples, the altars, the religious paintings and the hieroglyphical inscriptions all testify to the idolatrous character of the ancient worship. There is not a figment of evidence to sustain the theory that the builders of Copan and Quirigua were monotheists, or that the builders of Chimú, in Peru, and Cholula and Teotihuacan, in Mexico, were Jews and Christians. I shall now put before the reader a number of reasons based upon the archaeology of the country, for believing that the ancient Americans were all pagans and idolaters.

1. We infer the heathen character of the ancient religions of America from the utter absence on this continent of both Jewish and Christian antiquities.

Although the Book of Mormon declares that as soon as the Nephites had become fully settled in Peru they built a temple “like unto Solomon’s,” and that afterwards they erected “temples,” “sanctuaries” and “synagogues,” “after the manner of the Jews,” the Mormon archaeologist has never been able to point out the remains of a single Jewish religious edifice on the continent. Neither has he been able to point out a single religious structure that bears evidence of ever having been used in Christian worship. . . . No archaeologist that I have ever heard of, whose writings are considered authoritative, mentions the finding of a single Jewish or Christian temple, altar, painting or inscription. With one accord they all declare that the ancient inhabitants of those countries were pagans and idolaters. It will not do to claim that the ravages of time and of the warlike Lamanites have completely obliterated every trace of these structures, for, considering the widespread extent of these faiths and the length of time in which they were held, this would be next to impossible. Egypt and Assyria, too, have had their wars, and time and the elements have affected their ruins, but, nevertheless, enough data remain for the archaeologist to determine without difficulty the character of their worship, the names of their gods and many of their religious ceremonies and beliefs. If the ancient Americans were Jews and Christians, will the Mormon Church kindly tell us where the archaeological proof of it is to be found? (Cumorah Revisited or ‘The Book of Mormon’ and the Claims of the Mormons Reexamined from the Viewpoint of American Archaeology and Ethnology, Cincinnati, Ohio, 1910, pp. 444-446)

Although Mr. Shook asked this question in 1910, Mormon archaeologists are still unable to furnish any real proof that the Nephites ever existed.

Compared With Bible Archaeology

The Mormon Apostle Orson Pratt once stated:

This generation have more that one thousand times the amount of evidence to demonstrate and forever establish the Divine Authenticity of the Book of Mormon than they have in favor of the Bible! (Orson Pratt’s Works, “Evidences of the Book of Mormon and Bible Compared,” p. 64)

We feel that this statement is far from the truth. As we examine the evidence for the Book of Mormon we find that it is very weak. The only evidence for the existence of the gold plates is the testimony of 11 witnesses, and as we have already shown, this testimony can not be relied upon. A comparison of the archaeological evidence for the Book of Mormon with the evidence for the Bible clearly shows the weakness of the Mormon position. This, of course, is not to imply that there are no problems connected with Biblical archaeology, or that archaeological evidence alone can prove the Bible to be divinely inspired. Frank H. H. Roberts, Jr., of the Smithsonian Institution, made this statement in a letter to Marvin Cowan:

Archaeological discoveries in the Near East have verified some statements in the Bible referring to certain tribes, places, etc. On the other hand there is no way in which they could verify the narrative parts of the Bible such as the actions, words, deeds, etc. of particular individuals. (Letter by Frank H. H. Roberts, Jr., dated January 24, 1963)

In the same letter we find the statement that “There is no evidence whatever of any migration from Israel to America, and likewise no evidence that pre-Columbian Indians had any knowledge of Christianity or the Bible.”

The reader will remember that Dr. Nibley frankly admitted that no ancient inscription mentioning the Nephites has ever been found, and that “nothing short of an inscription which could be read and roughly dated would bridge the gap between what might be called a pre-actualistic archaeology and contact with the realities of Nephite civilization” (Since Cumorah, p. 243).

While the Nephites are never mentioned in any ancient inscription, the existence of the Israelites is verified by many inscriptions dating back hundreds of years before the time of Christ. The “earliest archaeological reference to the people of Israel” is a stele of the Egyptian ruler Merneptah which is now in the Egyptian Museum in Cairo. In The Biblical World we find this information concerning this stele:

Merneptah, son and successor of Ramesses 2, ruled Egypt from ca. 1224 to ca. 1214 B.C. . . . His campaign in Palestine, waged during the fifth year of his reign (ca. 1220 B.C.) is commemorated on a large black granite stele which was found in Merneptah’s mortuary temple in Thebes. At the top is a representation of Merneptah and the god Amun, . . . Merneptah states:

Israel is laid waste, his seed is not;
Hurru (i.e. Syria) is become a widow for Egypt.

The stele provides the first mention of Israel on ancient monuments, and provides proof that Israel was in western Palestine by 1220 B.C. (The Biblical World, edited by Charles F. Pfeiffer, Michigan, 1966, pp. 380-381)

John A. Wilson, a noted Egyptologist from the Oriental Institute of the University of Chicago, made this comment concerning this stele:

This is the customary magniloquent claim that the god-king was victorious over all opponents, whether he had met them in battle or not. The appearance of Israel in an Asiatic context is interesting, but has no meaning in terms of armed conflict against Egypt. It merely shows that an Egyptian scribe was conscious of a people known as Israel somewhere in Palestine or Transjordan. (The Culture of Ancient Egypt, University of Chicago Press, 1965, p. 255)

Many ancient inscriptions mentioning the Israelites have been found, and some inscriptions even give the names of kings mentioned in the Bible. For instance, in 2 Kings 10:36 we read that “Jehu reigned over Israel in Samaria” for twenty-eight years. Although king Jehu lived more than 800 years before the time of Christ, his name has been located on an Assyrian obelisk known as the “Black Obelisk of Shalmaneser.” In The Biblical World, page 150, we find this information:

In his campaign at Calah (Nimrud) in 1846, A. H. Layard discovered a four-sided black limestone pillar 6 1/2 feet high, with five rows of roughly executed bas reliefs extending around the pillar. . . . The inscription reads, Tribute of Jehu, son of Omri. I received from him silver, gold, a golden bowl, a golden vase with pointed bottom, golden tumblers, golden buckets, tin, a staff for a king. . . .

This obelisk not only contains the name of the king but a picture of him as well. J. A. Thompson gives the following information in his book, The Bible and Archaeology, page 128:

Jehu is best known to us as the one king in either Israel or Judah whose picture we have today. The great Shalmaneser 3 was still reigning at the time of Jehu’s accession. He evidently had some dealings with Jehu in the year 842 B.C., for the large black obelisk found by the early excavator Sir Henry Layard at Nimrud in 1840 has a picture of Jehu bowing before Shalmaneser . . .

In 2 Kings 18:13-16 we read an account of how Sennacherib “king of Assyria” came up against “Hezekiah king of Judah.” Some remarkable parallels to the account in the Bible are found in the annals of Sennacherib. From a “hexagonal clay prism, found at Nineveh, and dating from 686 B.C.”, J. B. Pritchard translated the following: “. . . Hezekiah did send me later to Nineveh . . . thirty talents of gold, eight hundred talents of silver . . .” (The Bible and Archaeology, p. 144). It is very interesting to compare this with 2 Kings 18:14: “. . . the king of Assyria appointed unto Hezekiah king of Judah three hundred talents of silver and thirty talents of gold.” For other parallels see our book, A Look at Christianity, pages 86-87.

The New Testament mentions a number of rulers that are known to have lived around the time of Christ. For instance, the Bible tells us that Jesus was crucified under Pontius Pilate. That Pilate was an actual historical person was proved beyond all doubt in 1961 when “an inscription with the name of Pontius Pilate was found in the theater excavations” at Caesarea (The Biblical Archaeologist, September 1964, p. 71). Below is a photo of the stone inscription.

In The Biblical World we find the following:

An Italian expedition, . . . excavated the theater at Caesarea from 1959 to 1961. During the latter year the archaeologists discovered a stone inscription from the theater bearing the name of Pontius Pilate. The left side of the stone has been destroyed. The top line of the right side reads “Tiberieum,” which is understood to be a dedication to Tiberius, the Roman emperor of the period. The second line reads, “. . . tius Pilatus,” with the letters “Pon” missing, as well as the governor’s first name. The third line is badly damaged, but the letters visible may represent the title, “Military Procurator.” Pilate is known from references to him in the New Testament, Josephus, and Pliny. This is the first mention of him on inscriptions. (The Biblical World, p. 156)

For more information on the subject of archaeology and the Bible see our book A Look at Christianity.

The fact that the Jews were in Palestine at the time the Bible indicates is proven by hundreds of ancient Hebrew inscriptions that have been found on rocks, pieces of pottery and coins. Portions of every book of the Old Testament, except for the book of Esther, have also been found. These manuscripts are known as the Dead Sea Scrolls and date back to the time of Christ (see A Look at Christianity, pp. 89-91). In addition many inscriptions from other countries verify the fact that the Jews were present in Palestine.

When we turn to the Book of Mormon, however, we are unable to find any evidence at all that the Nephites ever existed. We must agree with the Mormon archaeologist Dee F. Green when he states:

The first myth we need to eliminate is that Book of Mormon archaeology exists. . . . Biblical archaeology can be studied because we do know where Jerusalem and Jericho were and are, but we do not know where Zarahemla and Bountiful (nor any other location for that matter) were or are. (Dialogue: A Journal of Mormon Thought, Summer 1969, pp. 77-78)

Document Forging Scheme Uncovered

On pages 104-108 of this book, we discuss the Anthon Transcript—a sheet of paper which is supposed to contain characters copied from the gold plates of the Book of Mormon. In 1980 it was announced that a man by the name of Mark Hofmann had discovered another copy of the transcript which was undoubtedly the very original transcript made by Joseph Smith. In light of this discovery, it was proclaimed that the transcript preserved by David Whitmer (see photograph on page 106 of this book) was only a very poor copy of the document found by Mark Hofmann. On May 3, 1980, the Church Section of the Mormon newspaper, The Deseret News, reported the following concerning Mr. Hofmann's find:

A hand-written sheet of paper with characters supposedly copied directly from the gold plates in 1828, and also bearing other writing and the signature of Joseph Smith, has been found in an old Bible by a Utah State University student.

This would make it the oldest known Mormon document as well as the earliest sample of the Prophet's handwriting. . . .

Experts believe the paper may be the original one copied by Joseph Smith from the plates and given to Martin Harris in February 1828 to take to New York City for examination by linguistic experts. . . .

The paper, written in faded brown ink, was discovered by Mark William Hofmann, . . . Written on the back, apparently after Harris brought the paper back from his encounter with Professor Anthon, are the following words (and spellings):

These caractors were diligently copied by my own hand from the plates of gold and given to Martin Harris who took them to New York Citty but the learned could not translate it because the Lord would not open it to them in fulfilment of the prophecy of Isaih written in the 29th chapter and 11th verse. [signed] Joseph Smith Jr.

"In my judgment, this writing is that of Joseph Smith," said Dean C. Jessee, senior historical associate in the Church Historical Department. He is a recognized authority on the handwriting of the Prophet. . . . Brother Jessee said that after a preliminary examination, the paper and ink also give every appearance of being authentic materials of the 1828 period. . . .

The discovery of the historic paper by Brother Hofmann was quite accidental.

In March he purchased . . . a Bible once owned by members of Joseph Smith's family. . . .

Handwriting in the Bible is signed by Samuel Smith, either the great-grandfather or great-great-grandfather of Joseph Smith. . . .

while leafing through the book, he noticed two pages stuck together. He carefully pulled them apart and saw a folded paper.

"I couldn't tell what it was, but I saw the signature of Joseph Smith. I wasn't sure it was genuine, but I got rather excited," he said.

The Mormon Church published color photographs of the Anthon Transcript and an article containing "compelling reasons for accepting it as genuine" in the July 1980 issue of The Ensign. The Mormon leaders were completely sold on the document. According to sworn testimony given by former Church Archivist Donald Schmidt, Hofmann was eventually given "roughly $20,000" worth of items from the Church Archives in exchange for the old Bible and the sheet of paper found within its pages.

In 1980 Mormon scholars were rejoicing that Mark Hofmann had made such an outstanding discovery. Professor Richard L. Anderson, of Brigham Young University, was quoted by the Provo Herald, May 1, 1980, as saying the following:

"Joseph Smith's story is really vindicated by the finding of the document because he mentioned that he sent Harris to the East to show the characters on the gold plates to 'the learned.'

"We have Anthon's story in letters explaining exactly what Harris showed to him. What Anthon describes is quite remarkably like what is on the new transcript."

Dr. Anderson also commented:

"This new discovery is sort of a Dead Sea School [Scroll?] Equivalent of the Book of Mormon," . . . (Ibid.)

At first we could see no reason for doubting the "compelling" evidence Mormon scholars mounted in defence of the Hofmann document and included it in the 1982 edition of Mormonism—Shadow or Reality? In 1983, however, we encountered some evidence which made us wonder about the authenticity of the important documents Mark Hofmann had been selling the Mormon Church and other collectors. The erosion of our faith in Mr. Hofmann began just after we obtained extracts from an important document he was selling which is known as the Salamander letter—a letter purportedly written by Book of Mormon witness Martin Harris to W. W. Phelps in 1830. We had just completed a book entitled, Mormonism, Magic and Masonry, in which we presented evidence linking early Mormonism to magic. We felt that the Salamander letter would provide additional evidence to support our case. As we read the extracts from the Salamander letter, however, we were shocked to find that there were important parallels to E. D. Howe's Mormonism Unveiled, which was first published in 1834—some four years after the Salamander letter was supposed to have been penned. In the Salt Lake City Messenger for March 1984 we wrote that we had “some reservations concerning the authenticity of the letter, and at the present time we are not prepared to say that it was actually penned by Martin Harris.”

In the same issue of the Messenger, we pointed out the “disturbing” parallels to Howe’s book and said that although “the average person would have a difficult time forging these things, there are probably a number of people who could do the job. . . . While we would really like to believe that the letter attributed to Harris is authentic, we do not feel that we can endorse it until further evidence comes forth.”

On August 25, 1984, John Dart wrote the following in the Los Angeles Times: “. . . unusual caution . . . has been expressed by Jerald and Sandra Tanner, . . . The Tanners’ suggestion of forgery has surprised some Mormons, who note that the parallels in wording could be taken as evidence for authenticity.” The Deseret News for September 1, 1984, reported:

. . . outspoken Mormon Church critics Jerald and Sandra Tanner suspect the document is a forgery, they told the Deseret News.

Jerald Tanner . . . says similarities between it and other documents make its veracity doubtful. . . .

Another disturbing aspect, Tanner said, was the letter seemed out of character for Harris. “In the entire text of the letter, there is no mention of religion . . . if it’s a forgery, then it’s important because there’s a document forger out there.”

By August 1984 it was clear that the evidence we had found against the Salamander letter cast doubt on all the important discoveries Mark Hofmann had made since 1980. On August 22, 1984, Utah Lighthouse Ministry published the first part of a pamphlet called The Money-Digging Letters. On page 9 of that publication the following statement appeared:

. . . a number of important documents have come to light during the 1980’s. The questions raised by the Salamander letter have forced us to take a closer look at some of these documents.

On July 10, 1985, we published a study of the Anthon Transcript which suggested that there may be spelling problems in the material written on the back of the document which is supposed to be in the handwriting of Joseph Smith (see Mr. Boren and the White Salamander, pp. 9-10).

While doing research with regard to the Salamander letter, we discovered something about Hofmann’s copy of the Anthon Transcript which caused some concern. This was Charles Anthon’s letter, printed in Mormonism Unveiled, describing the sheet of paper which contained the characters copied from the Book of Mormon. Anthon stated that the “letters . . . were arranged in perpendicular columns, and the whole ended in a rude delineation of a circle divided into various compartments, decked with various strange marks, . . .” This description exactly matched the document which Mark Hofmann found in 1980. The transcript which was preserved by David Whitmer, however, is quite different. Instead of having the characters running in vertical columns, this paper has them going horizontally. Furthermore, it does not have a circular object. When Hofmann made his remarkable discovery, Anthon’s letter was appealed to as evidence that the real “Anthon Transcript” had been found. At the time, this seemed to be a good argument for the document’s authenticity, but when we later examined E. D. Howe’s Mormonism Unveiled in the light of its possible relationship to the Salamander letter, we discovered that Anthon’s letter is printed on page 272 of that book. This could be rather significant because the important parallels to the Salamander letter begin on the very next page (page 273). We could not help but wonder if Howe’s book had provided the creative impulse for both the Anthon Transcript and the Salamander letter.

Although no one seemed to think about it at the time, Mark Hofmann did not reveal from whom he had obtained the Bible in which the Anthon Transcript was discovered. In an affidavit Hofmann made he speaks of him as a “gentleman friend of mine.” In The Ensign, July 1980, page 73, he referred to him as “a collector friend.” The Church Section of the Deseret News called him “the unnamed Salt Lake Collector” (May 3, 1980). At one time Mark Hofmann told a scholar that the name of the man was confidential but some people knew him as Mr. “White.” As far as we can learn, no one has ever found out the identity of this mysterious individual. Since collectors sometimes have a policy of checking out every page of a rare book, we felt that it would be important to be able to talk to the man and see if he remembered anything between the pages of the Bible. In this regard it is interesting to note that Mark Hofmann claimed the transcript was “folded in fourths” within the Bible (The Ensign, July 1980, p. 73). After we became suspicious of his story, we did an experiment with a Bible and a single sheet of paper. We found that when the paper is “folded in fourths,” it becomes four times as thick and this makes it rather obvious that something is in the book.

In spite of the warnings which we printed, Mormon Church leaders continued to deal with and help Mark Hofmann until the middle of October 1985. On the 15th of that month Salt Lake City was rocked with the news that bombs had killed two people. One was the Mormon bishop Steven F. Christensen. It was later discovered that Mr. Christensen had been working secretly with the Mormon Church and Mark Hofmann to obtain some documents that were embarrassing to the church. These documents were to be purchased by an anonymous buyer who would eventually donate them to the church. On October 16, a bomb exploded in Mark Hofmann's car and he was critically injured. At first the police thought Mr. Hofmann was the victim of a cruel bomber. Within a short time, however, they came to believe that Hofmann himself was the bomber and that he was transporting a bomb which accidentally exploded. Mr. Hofmann was eventually charged with murdering Steven Christensen and Kathleen Sheets, the wife of another Mormon bishop. On January 23, 1987, Mark Hofmann pled guilty to the murder charges and also confessed that the Salamander letter was a forgery. Document experts carefully examined many of Mr. Hofmann's other documents and found that they were forgeries. The Anthon Transcript is included on the list of spurious documents that came through his hands. In sentencing Mr. Hofmann, Judge Rigrtrup recommended that "you spend the rest of your natural life at the Utah State Prison" (Salt Lake Tribune, January 24, 1987).

In an article published in the New York Times, February 16, 1986, Robert Lindsey wrote the following:

SALT LAKE CITY, Feb. 13 — Court documents indicate that prosecutors will try to prove that a murder suspect here set out to extort hundreds of thousands of dollars from the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints by forging embarrassing historical documents and then offering to sell them secretly to church leaders. . . .

Prosecutors say that Mr. Hofmann, perhaps with the help of an unknown accomplice to help make the forgeries, set out in the early 1980's to defraud the church by selling it forged documents that cast doubt on the validity of the Book of Mormon and other aspects of church teachings. . . . Prosecutors speculate that the church officials may have placed most of the documents in their vault without authenticating them because they were regarded as potentially embarrassing to the church.

Court documents indicate that some prosecutors in the Salt Lake County Attorney's office believe Mr. Hofmann's goal was not only to obtain money from the church through the sale of the documents but also to establish enough credibility that he could shape the world's perception of Mormonism.

This view is shared by a man here who was the first to suggest that Mr. Hofmann was forging his documents. He is Jerald Tanner, a former Mormon who heads the Utah Lighthouse Ministry, which for decades has been challenging the truth of much of Mormon doctrine.

In an interview, Mr. Tanner said he decided . . . that the Hofmann documents might be forgeries, even though some of them . . . supported his own iconoclastic views of Mormonism.

In a newsletter that he publishes with his wife, Sandra, Mr. Tanner began raising questions about their authenticity, in some cases comparing the texts with known Mormon writings.

But if senior Mormon officials were aware of his warnings, they apparently paid little attention. Several of the church's highest officials have acknowledged negotiating to acquire documents from Mr. Hofmann until the day of the first two bombings.

Mr. Tanner said it appeared that Mr. Hofmann's growing credibility as a source of documents was putting him in a position where the documents he presented were considered unassailable. If that continued, Mr. Tanner said, Mr. Hofmann "could control the direction of Mormon history."

At Mark Hofmann's preliminary hearing [April, 1986], his close friend, Lyn Jacobs, confessed that he did not find the Salamander letter in New York as he and Mark Hofmann had previously maintained. He admitted, in fact, that he had decided "to fabricate a story" concerning the origin of the letter:

Q— . . . did you have occasion to tell people that it was—that you were the one who located the item and purchased the item and that Mr. Hofmann was brought in to help you market the item?

A—Unfortunately, that is correct.

Q—And you're doing this under Mr. Hofmann's instruction?

A—Not instructions, under his request. Not his request that I fabricate a story, but that his request that I take full responsibility for the document. That was my decision, to fabricate a story several months later.

At the preliminary hearing the evidence against Mark Hofmann's documents was finally revealed to the public. We had always felt that the best way to examine Hofmann's documents would be to get them all together and see if there was something they shared in common that could not be found in other 19th century documents. For instance, if it could be shown that the paper or ink was exactly the same in many of Hofmann's documents, this would certainly cast a shadow of doubt on their authenticity. At the preliminary hearing we learned that experts did, in fact, examine the documents as a group and concluded that there were features that many of the Hofmann documents exhibited which indicated they were forgeries. William Flynn, a noted forensic document expert, testified concerning the research that revealed the documents were forgeries. Mr. Flynn is the Chief Questioned Documents Examiner for the State of Arizona.

William Flynn claimed he examined “about 461 documents.” In his testimony he disclosed that it was the contents of the ink used on the documents and the attempt to artificially age it that produced a flaky or cracked appearance which gave the whole scam away:

Q—With respect to the ink, did you find any peculiar or abnormal characteristics associated with any of the documents?

A—Yes.

Q—Can you tell us . . . what that would be?

A—Yes. On many of the documents, . . . there appeared a microscopic cracking on the surface of the ink. These appeared on the questioned . . . documents that we were examining.

Q—Besides the cracking, was there any other characteristics?

A—Yes. Under ultraviolet examination, on several of the questioned documents, there was a one-directional running of the inks or a constituent part of the inks, as if they had been wet.

Q—Were you able to determine if there had been any additions on any of the documents—any additional applications of ink?

A—Yes. On several of the documents, there were inks that were not consistent with the body of the document. That is to say that data had been added to the document with a different ink.

Q—Now, . . . besides these characteristics, was there anything common about the documents that you found these characteristics on?

A—Yes.

Q—What was that?

A—These anomalies that I spoke of all occurred on documents that had been dealt by the defendant in the case, Mark Hofmann.

Q—Can you tell us which documents these were?

A—Yes. The documents, in particular, that we found problems with were . . . the Anthon transcript, the Joseph Smith 3 Blessing, four different white notes, the Lucy Mack Smith document . . . the Josiah Stowell letter of June 18th, 1825, the document we call the E. B. Grandin contract, the Martin Harris–W. W. Phelps document called the Salamander letter, . . . the General Smith, General Dunham (I’m sorry)—Joseph Smith letter, the David Whitmer to Walter Conrad document, the document later called the Betsy Ross letter, the Solomon Spalding–Sidney Rigdon land deed, the letter to Brigham Young from Thomas Bullock, dated June 27, 1865, a promissory note to Isaac Galland from Joseph Smith, a letter called the Maria and Sarah Lawrence letter, the Samuel Smith Bible, the Nathan Harris prayer book, the Bithel Todd–Peter and David Whitmer document, and then later there were several types of currency that were also examined.

Q—Let me ask you this. Besides these particular ones that you’ve mentioned, associated with Mr. Mark Hofmann, were there any other documents out of the 461 or so that you have examined that exhibit these characteristics?

A—No.

Q—And were there any documents that were not associated with Mark Hofmann that exhibit those characteristics?

A—No.

Mr. Flynn went on to testify that he read in “one of the old texts” concerning the “artificial aging of iron gallotannic ink by exposing it to ammonia. . . . After I read that, I made iron gallotannic inks of various types myself and exposed them to . . . both ammonia and sodium hydroxide, and found that . . . it did, indeed, artificially age the inks. . . . The sodium hydroxide, in particular, will immediately take the iron gallotannic inks and turn them a deep rust color on the paper. It won’t crack the inks, however. It was not until I began adding some of the additives that were typically added to the inks of that time period, in particular, the sugars and the gums and probably the most . . . commonly used additive in that time period would have been gum arabic, . . .” Flynn explained that gum arabic was commonly added to the ink to give it body, as a viscosity adjuster to adjust the thickness of the ink, and also as a preservative. . . . When I mixed the iron gallotannic inks and added either the sugars or the gum arabic and then artificially aged them with the sodium hydroxide, I got exactly the same phenomenon that I described in the examination of the questioned documents. The ink both artificially aged and cracked.

It appears from William Flynn’s testimony that the forger was tripped up by the use of gum arabic or sugars in the ink. Although we do not know that the ink found in the Hofmann documents was composed from the exact ingredients mentioned in a formula in a book found in Hofmann’s home, it is interesting to note that this formula “To Make Black Ink” calls for “one Ounce Gum Arabic” (Great Forgers and Famous Fakes, by Charles Hamilton, p. 267).

At the preliminary hearing document expert George Throckmorton testified that he examined the purported Joseph Smith writing on the back of the Anthon Transcript. He reported that he was unable to reach “a positive identification” on the handwriting. He noted, however, that Joseph Smith “was not very neat. In fact, in my own terms I would say he is quite a sloppy writer.” His opinion concerning the writing on the Anthon Transcript was that the “quality of the writing is too neat for the writing that I saw from Joseph Smith. It’s not consistent with how he normally wrote. In fact, the writing appears to be a higher quality than he was ever capable of doing.”

Mr. Throckmorton observed that the Hofmann document had “a characteristic glowing effect” under ultraviolet light. Kenneth Rendell, a noted document dealer, said that the “color of the ink” did not seem right in the Anthon Transcript.

Document experts did not find evidence of cracking in the ink on the Anthon Transcript itself, but they were convinced that heat had been used to artificially age the ink. William Flynn noted: “What was unusual about the heating pattern on the document was that . . . it was not uniform throughout the document, but there was an area that was more highly scorched . . .” George Throckmorton seemed to feel that a common household iron could have been used on the transcript:

Q—What did you do to duplicate, or at least in your opinion, duplicate what’s exhibited on the Anthon Transcript—this scorching?

A—I, first of all, used modern-day papers to experiment with and by placing an iron at different temperatures for varying lengths of time to see how long it would take before that scorching effect occurred. Later on, I progressed backwards and eventually was able to use some of the cover letters that we were able to obtain for experimentation purposes.

Q—You say cover letters from the time period of the 19th century, . . . ?

A—That’s correct. And the same experiments were conducted then. I also dipped some of those in an ammonium hydroxide solution and other types of solutions and after drying, heated them or during the process of drying I also heated them and was able to come up with this same characteristic feature.

The most devastating evidence against the Anthon transcript came when the Bible in which it was supposed to have been discovered was examined. The Mormon writer Daniel W. Bachman gave this information about the Bible:

. . . inserted in the center of the Bible is a handwritten copy of the entire book of Amos with the signature of Samuel Smith at the end . . . Hofmann’s supposition was that this Samuel was either the great-grandfather or the great-great-grandfather of the Prophet Joseph Smith. (Brigham Young University Studies, Spring 1980, p. 327)

William Flynn noted that the purported Samuel Smith addition to the Bible “bears the dated watermark of 1819, showing that the paper was manufactured in 1819.” Mr. Flynn testified that the signature Samuel Smith did not agree with the handwriting found in the text of the document and that it was written in a different ink:

Q— . . . Did you have an occasion to compare the handwriting of the body of the writing with the signature itself?

A—Yes.

Q—And what was the results of the comparison?

A—The writer of the text, which comprises the book of Amos, is not the same writer that signed the name Samuel Smith at the end of that writing.

Q—How about the ink itself on the signature. Is there a difference in that and the body of the text?

A—Yes. The ink comprising Samuel Smith appears nowhere in the text of the writings of the book of Amos.

Flynn went on to testify that he believed another name had been written where “Samuel Smith” now appears and that this had been “bleached out”:

. . . there was an area around the signature Samuel Smith that had been bleached out. What it appears is that there had been a different signature at that location which had been—old writing—that had been bleached out and the name Samuel Smith written on top.

That the name Samuel Smith was a fraudulent addition to the document was clearly revealed when William Flynn observed it under a microscope: “The Samuel Smith signature in the Bible was indeed one of the cracked inks.” Mr Flynn also testified: “The writing in the text itself exhibited no cracking. The writing of the signature Samuel Smith did.”

William Flynn’s research also revealed that the Anthon Transcript could not have been in the Bible for any great length of time:

If the document had been in intimate contact with the pages of this Bible over a prolonged period of time, I would have expected the characters themselves which were made of the iron gallotanic ink to transfer onto the pages themselves. The highly acidic ink would have burned the pages in the form of the letters themselves—the characters which comprise the ink. In fact that did not happen. There is a uniform browning across the page rather than the ink itself, the characters of the ink, burning the pages in the shapes of the . . . letters and the characters on the page.

When Mr. Flynn was asked his opinion concerning the authenticity of the Anthon Transcript, he replied: “My opinion [is] it is not a document from that period.”

The fall of the Hofmann document will have no real effect on those who are critical of the Mormon Church. To our knowledge, none of the critics have published any special claims concerning it. Some people felt the transcript might contain magic characters. We tried very hard to find evidence to support this idea but were finally forced to conclude that the “similarities” were not “sufficient to prove the case” (Mormonism, Magic and Masonry, p. 42). We compared the Hofmann manuscript with many documents and samples of ancient writing, but in the end we found ourselves feeling frustrated with the transcript. Instead of containing anything related to any language, Hofmann’s document appeared to be composed of meaningless doodlings.

Mormons, on the other hand, have much to be embarrassed about. Spencer W. Kimball, the “Prophet, Seer and Revelator” of the church, examined the transcript with a magnifying glass and could detect nothing wrong with it. The Church Section of the Deseret News, May 3, 1980, reported: “President Spencer W. Kimball expressed gratitude to Brother Hofmann for his discovery and ‘for bringing it to our attention and for leaving it in the custody of the Historical Department.’” Since the Prophet and the other leaders of the church could not find anything wrong with the document, Mr. Hofmann was given “roughly $20,000” worth of items from the Mormon Archives.

It is interesting to note that the Mormon Church’s most noted apologist, Dr. Hugh Nibley, not only felt that the transcript was genuine but went so far as to proclaim that it contained Egyptian characters which could be translated! In the Provo Herald, May 1, 1980, Dr. Nibley was quoted as saying:

“This offers as good a test as we’ll ever get as to the authenticity of the Book of Mormon.” . . .

In the same paper, Nibley triumphantly announced:

“Of course it’s translatable.”

According to The Herald,

Nibley also said he counted at least two dozen out of 47 characters in the Demotic alphabet that could be given phonetic value.

This offers as good a test as we’ll ever get. Nobody could have faked those characters. It would take 10 minutes to see that this is fake.

On May 12, 1980, the Provo Herald reported:

The Herald called Hugh Nibley to see if he was still confident about his earlier assessment.

“I still say just what I said before. It can be translated.”

As time passed it became evident that neither Dr. Nibley nor any other scholar was able to produce an acceptable translation of Hofmann’s transcript and all talk about a translation eventually ceased. The fact that Hugh Nibley could see so many Egyptian characters in this forgery certainly casts a shadow of doubt on the other work he has done in defence of the church.

While Mormon scholars could not produce a translation of the Hofmann document, an opportunist by the name of Barry Fell seized upon the situation and claimed that he could read the document. He declared, in fact, that the first line should be translated: “. . . I, Nefi, a son born of sagacious parents, . . .” This, of course, sounds like the first eight words of the Book of Mormon: “I, Nephi, having been born of goodly parents, . . .” (1 Nephi 1:1) In line three Fell claimed to find these words: “My father, Lehi, was of Salem, . . .” This is similar to 1 Nephi 1:4: “. . . my father, Lehi, having dwelt at Jerusalem . . .” Mr. Fell claimed that line two contained the words “Zedekiah” and “Judah.” These two names are also found in 1 Nephi 1:4.

Dr. Fell submitted his manuscript on the transcript to Brigham Young University Studies, but those in charge felt that it should not be published. In a letter Fell received from BYU Studies, dated June 19, 1980, we find the following:

. . . BYU Studies has been very interested in the Hofmann Document find and at first hoped to print a photographic copy and a translation of it; but after some consideration we thought it too early for the kind of serious study and translation the document needs. Then friends of Herm Olsen told us you could translate the document . . . Our reaction was an immediate yes, we are interested. We even held space in the Summer 1980 issue anticipating your article.

We have had six independent referees read your article and study the accompanying translations. . . . the sections we can understand were found to have significant problems. . . .

As is the case with all the refereed journals, when the referees are unanimous in their decision not to publish, we cannot publish; therefore I have returned your article to Prof. Paul Cheesman. . . . the present effort appears too preliminary for us to use.

One interesting result of the discussion of the Hofmann document was that it brought forth a statement by the Mormon Egyptologist Edward H. Ashment concerning his attempt to decipher the Whitmer copy of the transcript—i.e., the authentic transcript which appears on page 106 of this book. Ashment wrote the following in Sunstone, May–June 1980, page 30:

Nephi clearly had to learn the same type of Egyptian as did his father . . . that type of Egyptian presumably would be recognizable as a known form of ancient Egyptian.

The characters on the Anthon Transcript are not thus recognizable. The author studied them with one of the world’s foremost Demoticists. They have resisted decipherment as Demotic and stand just as little chance of representing earlier forms of ancient Egyptian.

The improbability that the characters of the Anthon Transcript are related to any known form of Egyptian does not rule out comparative studies, . . .

A proper interim conclusion is: Moroni’s statement that “none other people knoweth our language” must still be seriously considered.”

We will have more material concerning Mark

Hofmann's forgeries and the serious implications they present to the Mormon leaders in chapter 13 of this book. For those who are interested in the subject we recommend our book, Tracking the White Salamander: The Story of Mark Hofmann, Murder and Forged Mormon Documents.

Mormon Church Admits That The Kinderhook Plates Are Fraudulent

On pages 111-115 of this book we discuss the Kinderhook plates. Joseph Smith accepted these plates as authentic and began to translate them. Later, however, it was discovered they were nothing but "a joke" prepared by his enemies. We pointed out that in September 1962, the church's Improvement Era reported that one of the original Kinderhook plates had been rediscovered (facsimiles, of course, had always been available) and that this plate proved Joseph Smith's "prophetic calling." Subsequent examination of the plate, however, revealed that it was of modern origin. As we pointed out on page 113, George M. Lawrence, a Mormon physicist, was given permission to examine and make "some non-destructive physical studies of the surviving plate." He found that "The dimensions, tolerances, composition and workmanship are consistent with the facilities of an 1843 blacksmith shop and with the fraud stories of the original participants."

Since Mr. Lawrence was only allowed to make non-destructive tests, some Mormon scholars would not accept his work as conclusive.

In 1980 the Mormon scholar Stanley P. Kimball was able "to secure permission from the Chicago Historical Society for the recommended destructive tests. These tests, involving some very sophisticated analytical techniques, were performed by Professor D. Lynn Johnson of the Department of Materials Science and Engineering at Northwestern University" (The Ensign, August 1981, p. 69).

Professor Kimball describes the results of the tests in the official church publication, The Ensign, August 1981:

A recent electronic and chemical analysis of a metal plate (one of six original plates) brought in 1843 to the Prophet Joseph Smith in Nauvoo, Illinois, appears to solve a previously unanswered question in Church history, helping to further evidence that the plate is what its producers later said it was—a nineteenth-century attempt to lure Joseph Smith into making a translation of ancient-looking characters that had been etched into the plates. . . .

As a result of these tests, we concluded that the plate owned by the Chicago Historical Society is not of ancient origin. We concluded that the plate was etched with acid; and as Paul Cheesman and other scholars have pointed out, ancient inhabitants would probably have engraved the plates rather than etched them with acid. Secondly, we concluded that the plate was made from a true brass alloy (copper and zinc) typical of the mid-nineteenth century; whereas the "brass" of ancient times was actually bronze, an alloy of copper and tin. (The Ensign, August 1981, pp. 66, 70)

As we pointed out on page 113 of this book, back in 1970 the Mormon scholar John A. Wittorf tried to come to grips with what would happen if the Kinderhook plates were proven to be forgeries:

Accepting the find as genuine, Joseph had facsimile drawings of the plates made, presumably for future study. The brevity of his translation of "a portion of the plates" precludes the possibility that—if the plates are ultimately demonstrated to be fraudulent—his abilities as a translator of ancient scripts and languages can be called into question.

In rebuttal to this statement we wrote that we cannot agree with him when he states that Joseph Smith's reputation as a translator will not be affected. We feel that Joseph Smith's work on the plates casts serious doubt upon his ability as a translator of "ancient scripts and languages." He definitely stated that he "translated a portion of them, and find they contain the history of the person with whom they were found. He was a descendant of Ham through the loins of Pharaoh, king of Egypt, and that he received his kingdom from the Ruler of heaven and earth." (History of the Church, vol. 5, p. 372) Now, in order to obtain this much information from the plates it would have been necessary to have translated quite a number of the characters, and a man who could make such a serious mistake with regard to the Kinderhook plates is just the type of man who would pretend to translate the Book of Abraham from Egyptian papyri which he knew nothing about.

A photograph of one of the Kinderhook plates. Joseph Smith "translated" a portion of these plates and claimed they contained the history of a descendant of Ham. Recent tests, however, show they are forgeries.

The Mormon scholar Paul R. Cheesman opened the door for an entirely different approach to the problem in an article written in March, 1970. He suggested that Joseph Smith was not really the author of the statement about the translation which appeared in the History of the Church:

As of now, the original source of Joseph Smith's statement, under the date of May 1, 1843, concerning the Kinderhook Plate, cannot be found. Much of Volume V of the Documentary History of the Church was recorded by Leo Hawkins in 1853, after the saints were in Utah, and was collected by Willard Richards from journals. . . . Liberty was taken by historians of those days to put the narrative in the first person, even though the source was not as such. Verification of the authenticity of Joseph Smith's statement is still under study. In examining the diary of Willard Richards, the compiler of Volume V, the Kinderhook story is not found there. Our research has taken us through numerous diaries and letters written at this particular time, and the Kinderhook story is not mentioned. ("An Analysis of the Kinderhook Plates," an unpublished paper by Paul R. Cheesman, p. 2)

Some of our readers will remember that as early as 1965 we charged that Joseph Smith was not really the author of a large portion of the material attributed to him in the History of the Church. As we shall point out in the next chapter, this was finally confirmed by Dean C. Jessee of the Church Historical Department in an article published in Brigham Young University Studies, Summer 1971. According to Jessee's research over 60% of Joseph Smith's History was compiled after his death. In any case, the idea with regard to the Kinderhook plates seemed to be that if they turned out to be forgeries, a person could get the church off the hook by arguing that the statement attributed to Joseph Smith concerning the translation was also spurious. This is certainly a strange way of looking at the matter—almost as if “two wrongs” would make “a right.” Since the History of the Church was prepared by the highest officials of the Mormon Church and printed by the church itself, to admit falsification in it is to undermine the entire foundation of Mormonism.

Since the recent tests on the Kinderhook plate, Mormon apologists find themselves facing a real dilemma, and there is no way out without doing serious injury to the church. Stanley B. Kimball chose to discredit the accuracy of the History of the Church rather than admit that Joseph Smith “translated” bogus plates:

It has been well known that the serialized “History of Joseph Smith” consists largely of items from other persons’ personal journals and other sources, collected during Joseph Smith’s lifetime and continued after the Saints were in Utah, then edited and pieced together to form a history of the Prophet’s life “in his own words.” (The Ensign, August 1981, p. 67)

Professor Kimball was apparently planning to advance the argument that since the part in Joseph Smith's History concerning the Kinderhook plate was not recorded until after his death and since there seems to be nothing written in any journal during his lifetime, it must have been made up by later historians. Before Kimball printed his article, however, he was informed that the church was suppressing a journal written by William Clayton which contained evidence that Joseph Smith did “translate” a portion of the plates. This journal was hidden in the First Presidency's vault, but Kimball was able to obtain a copy of the important portion:

President J. has translated a portion and says they contain the history of the person with whom they were found, and he was a descendant of Ham through the loins of Pharaoh, king of Egypt, and that he received his kingdom from the Ruler of heaven and earth. (Ibid., p. 73)

Professor Kimball maintains that this is the original source for the entry in Joseph Smith's History. Speaking of this History, Kimball writes:

Although this account appears to be the writing of Joseph Smith, it is actually an excerpt from a journal of William Clayton. . . . the words “I have translated a portion” originally read “President J. has translated a portion. . . .” . . . this altered version of the extract from William Clayton's journal was reprinted in the Millennial Star of 15 January 1859, and, unfortunately, was finally carried over into official Church history when the “History of Joseph Smith” was edited into book form as the History of the Church in 1909. (Ibid., pp. 67-68)

Stanley Kimball is undoubtedly correct in assuming that Clayton's journal is the source for the entry in Joseph Smith's History. The two writings appear to be too similar to be coincidental. While this shows evidence of falsification on the part of church leaders as far as the History of the Church goes, Clayton's journal proves that Joseph Smith claimed he had “translated a portion” of the plates. This testimony by Clayton cannot be easily set aside. For one thing, Clayton's account is contemporary with the event. According to Kimball, “in his journal entry of Monday, May 1, he included a tracing of one of the plates” (Ibid., p. 71).

Furthermore, Clayton was Joseph Smith's scribe and was in constant contact with him. James B. Allen wrote:

Beginning in early 1842, then, William Clayton became involved in nearly every important activity in Nauvoo, including the private concerns of the Prophet. . . . He became an intimate friend and confidant of Joseph Smith, writing letters for him, recording revelations, and performing important errands. As a scribe he kept the sacred “Book of the Law of the Lord”; was officially designated to write the history of the Nauvoo Temple; helped prepare the official history of Joseph Smith (indeed, his personal journals become the source for many entries in that history); and kept various other books . . . for almost two and a half years, until Joseph's death in 1844, they were in each other's presence almost daily. (Journal of Mormon History, vol. 6, 1979, pp. 42-43)

If anyone would be in a position to know what Joseph Smith really believed about the Kinderhook plates, it would be William Clayton.

Since Clayton's journal was apparently used for the statement about the Kinderhook plate in the History of the Church, it shows that the highest leaders of the Church at the time the History was compiled also believed that Joseph Smith “translated a portion” of the plates. Wilford Woodruff (who became the fourth President of the Church) and George A. Smith said that the History was “carefully revised under the strict inspection of President Brigham Young, and approved by him” (History of the Church, vol. 1, Preface, p. VI).

Besides the Clayton journal, there is other contemporary evidence that Joseph Smith “translated a portion” of the plates. On May 7, 1843, just six days after the entry appears in Clayton's journal, the Apostle Parley P. Pratt wrote a letter containing the following:

“Six plates having the appearance of Brass have lately been dug out of a mound by a gentleman in Pike Co. Illinois. They are small and filled with engravings in Egyptian language and contain the genealogy of one of the ancient Jaredites back to Ham the son of Noah.” (The Ensign, August 1981, p. 73)

The reader will notice that both Pratt's and Clayton's accounts agree that the Kinderhook plates contain information about a descendant of “Ham.” As we have already pointed out, if Joseph Smith had not been murdered in June 1844, it is very possible he might have published a complete “translation” of the Kinderhook plates. Just a month before his death it was reported that he was “busy in translating them. The new work which Jo. is about to issue as a translation of these plates will be nothing more nor less than a sequel to the Book of Mormon; . . .” (Warsaw Signal, May 22, 1844).

The fact that Joseph Smith was actually preparing a translation of the plates is verified by a broadside published by the Mormon newspaper, The Nauvoo Neighbor, in June 1843. On this broadside, containing facsimiles of the plates, we find the following: “The contents of the Plates, together with a Fac-Simile of the same, will be published in the ‘Times and Seasons,’ as soon as the translation is completed.” It is certainly possible that the church still has Joseph Smith's unpublished work on the Kinderhook plates.

On page 114 of this book, we reported that some scholars felt the inscriptions on the Kinderhook plates were copied from the writing of the Lo tribe in China. Dr. Edward Hope of the United Bible Societies questions this identification. In a letter to us, dated August 26, 1976, he wrote:

1. The language of the “texts” is not Lo or Lolo. This language has topic and sentence-end markers which occur in virtually every sentence. If the language were Lolo one would expect at least two symbols to recur quite regularly. . . .
2. A few of the symbols look like Lolo symbols. . . . Most, if not all, Lolo symbols bear resemblance to Chinese. Since the Lolo were completely illiterate, and Chinese was the only writing system in the area, this is not surprising. If the Kinderhook plates were copied from a Chinese tea chest the similarity to certain Lolo symbols would be explained.

3. It is highly unlikely that the Kinderhook plates represent the written form of any human language. If one examines the symbols, and the sequence of symbols, it becomes very plain that many of them are “variations” on other nearby symbols. When taken with the surprising lack of repetition, it certainly looks as if someone were making the symbols up, and avoiding repetitions. The middle plate in the bottom row is especially suspect. Most of this plate is simply variations on two “symbols.” It was either done by someone with less imagination than the others, or was done in a hurry. There is no way this plate could represent a human language.

However this may be, in 1970 Paul R. Cheesman could see that scientific study of the Kinderhook plate was not coming up with the results the church had hoped for. In an attempt to side-step the serious implications of the matter, he came up with a new theory—i.e., the plates that Joseph Smith had were genuine but since that time, “It is quite possible that someone duplicated a fake set of plates and took the original” (“An Analysis of the Kinderhook Plates,” p. 16). Cheesman noted there was a discrepancy between the size of the plate which was rediscovered and a description given by “J. Roberts” which was first published in the Quincy Whig. The Mormon scholar Stanley B. Kimball has now completely closed the door to this avenue of escape. He says that the figures J. Roberts “gave the Whig appear to be estimates only. For in contrast to those estimates, which come to us second-hand, the tracings in the Clayton and Brigham Young journals, as well as the broadside facsimiles, all match the Chicago plate in size” (The Ensign, August 1981, p. 74, n. 10). On page 70 of the same article, Professor Kimball presents additional evidence that “the Chicago plate is indeed one of the original Kinderhook plates, . . .”

In the Mormon History Association Newsletter, for June 1981, Stanley B. Kimball was quoted as saying:

The time has come to admit that the Kinderhook Plate incident of 1843 was a light-hearted, heavy-handed, frontier-style prank, or “joke” as the perpetrators themselves called it. That from the beginning anti-Mormons seized upon the incident to discredit Joseph Smith should not deter us from consigning the episode to the limbo of faked antiquities and to place forever the Kinderhook Plates on the bosom of the Cardiff Giant.

Archaeologists Still Unconvinced About the Book of Mormon

On pages 97-98 of this book, we show that both the Smithsonian Institution and the National Geographic Society have rejected the archaeological claims made concerning the Book of Mormon. This situation has not changed. The Smithsonian Institution is still sending out a statement that reads:

1. The Smithsonian Institution has never used the Book of Mormon in any way as a scientific guide. Smithsonian archeologists see no direct connection between the archeology of the New World and the subject matter of the book. (“Statement Regarding the Book of Mormon,” Rev.-1978)

The reader can obtain a copy of this statement by writing the Smithsonian Institution, Washington, D.C. 20560.

The National Geographic Society’s position on the Book of Mormon was reaffirmed in a letter dated August 7, 1979, and in a letter written May 29, 1978, we find the following:

With regard to the cities mentioned in the Book of Mormon, neither representatives of the National Geographic Society nor archeologists connected with any other institution of equal prestige have ever used the Book of Mormon in locating historic ruins in middle America or elsewhere.

Christianity was not practiced on this continent prior to the Spanish conquest. The major civilizations of North and South America were practicing their own forms of religion.

Michael Coe, who is one of the most well-known authorities on the New World, admonished the Mormons to give up their fantastic claims about the Book of Mormon being supported by archaeology:

Mormon archaeologists over the years have almost unanimously accepted the Book of Mormon as an accurate, historical account of the New World peoples between about 2,000 B.C. and A.D. 421. They believe that Smith could translate hieroglyphs, whether “Reformed Egyptian” or ancient American, and that his translation of the Book of Abraham is authentic. Likewise, they accept the Kinderhook Plates as a bona fide archaeological discovery, and the reading of them as correct. Let me now state unconditionally that as far as I know there is not one professionally trained archaeologist, who is not a Mormon, who sees any scientific justification for believing the foregoing to be true, and I would like to state that there are quite a few Mormon archaeologists who join this group. . . . The picture of this hemisphere between 2,000 B.C. and A.D. 421 presented in the book has little to do with the early Indian cultures as we know them, in spite of much wishful thinking . . .

The bare facts of the matter are that nothing, absolutely nothing, has ever shown up in any New World excavation which would suggest to a dispassionate observer that the Book of Mormon, as claimed by Joseph Smith, is a historical document relating to the history of early migrants to our hemisphere. (Dialogue: A Journal of Mormon Thought, Summer 1973, pp. 41, 42, 46)

Ferguson Questions Book of Mormon

On pages 102-103 of this book we relate that Thomas Stuart Ferguson, one of the church’s great defenders of the Book of Mormon, visited us on December 2, 1970, and told us that he had spent 25 years trying to prove Mormonism, but had finally come to the conclusion that his work had been in vain. Mr. Ferguson had organized the New World Archaeological Foundation in 1952, and firmly believed he would be able to prove the Book of Mormon through archaeological research. Michael Coe related:

Of far greater import were the events that culminated in the program of the New World Archaeological Foundation. While the guiding light of this endeavor, Ferguson, was also an Iron Rod, from the beginning everything was put on what non-Mormons would consider a scholarly underpinning. . . . Unlike Jakeman, however, with his rival Zarahemla on the Usumacinta, Ferguson set up his program as an undertaking in modern anthropological archaeology, and created a committee that included not only Mormons like Milton Hunter and himself, but also non-Mormon experts in New World archaeology, such as A. V. Kidder, Gordon R. Willey, and Gordon F. Ekholm. The first field directors of the New World Archaeological Foundation were non-Mormons. By 1952, funds were made available by the Church, and the largest and most ambitious archaeological project ever funded by a religious institution (including the Vatican) got under way. (Dialogue: A Journal of Mormon Thought, Summer 1973, p. 45)

In the book, The Changing World of Mormonism, page 141, we wrote:

. . . The church leaders gave “large appropriations” to support Mr. Ferguson’s New World Archaeological Foundation. This organization also failed to find evidence to prove the Book of Mormon, and the man who organized it, hoping that it would prove Mormonism, ended up losing his faith in the church.

The Mormon apologist Robert L. Brown tried to discredit our book, The Changing World of Mormonism, so that Moody Press would discontinue publishing it. In a letter to Moody Press, Mr. Brown claimed our statement about Ferguson was “not so!” Mr. Brown based his accusation on a letter written by Thomas Stuart Ferguson on October 23, 1980, in which Ferguson stated: “My relationship and membership with the Church has never been terminated.” Mr. Brown has apparently misunderstood our statement. We did not say that Ferguson has left the church, but that he “ended up losing his faith in the church.” Mr. Ferguson makes this very plain in a letter dated December 3, 1979:

I lost faith in Joseph Smith as one having a pipeline to deity—and have decided that there has never been a pipeline to deity—with any man. . . . I give Joseph Smith credit as an innovator and as a smart fellow. I attend, sing in the choir and enjoy my friendships in the Church. In my opinion it is the best fraternity that has come to my attention . . .

I think that Joseph Smith may have had Ixtlilxochtl and View of the Hebrews from which to work. . . . Oliver Cowdery was in Ethan Smith’s congregation before he went from Vermont to New York to join Joseph Smith. . . .

Thomas Stuart Ferguson has been privately circulating a 28-page response “to the Norman & Sorenson Papers” on the Book of Mormon. In the conclusion to this paper, Ferguson declared:

The evidence supporting the geographical views of Norman and Sorenson, under the exacting tests laid down by the text of the Book of Mormon, is indeed very meagre. We have the cylinder seal from Chiapa de Corzo, the cylinder seal from Tlatilco and the toys with wheels. That’s about all. This paucity of specific support presents, at least to me, a dilemma. One way out of the dilemma is to say that everything was scrambled and lost because of the upheavals described in 3 Nephi for the time of the crucifixion. In my personal opinion, this is not a satisfactory escape hatch. Virtually all of the data in the Book of Mormon must be credited to Mormon and his abridgment of the “larger plates.” He and Moroni, writing in the 4th century (over 300 years after the crucifixion), were responsible for the last 400 pages of the text. And it is in those 400 pages that most of the geographical data appear. Mormon doesn’t say that his references to geography are useless and hopeless.

Further, innumerable excavations made in the area we are dealing with, and in the time span (3000 B.C. – 400 A.D.) with which we are involved, reveal great undisturbed architectural structures, extensive relatively undisturbed ancient strata etc., etc. . . . right through the time of the crucifixion.

I don’t have the answer to the dilemma. I just call it up.

I’m afraid that up to this point, I must agree with Dee Green, who has told us that to date there is no Book-of-Mormon geography. I, for one, would be happy if Dee were wrong.

Nibley Attacks Interpretation of Stela 5

On pages 116-118 of this book, we show that Dr. M. Wells Jakeman maintains that “Stela 5” proves the Book of Mormon. We have also shown, however, that some of the Church’s best scholars reject Jakeman’s work. In an article published in Dialogue: A Journal of Mormon Thought, Autumn 1977, page 122, Dr. Hugh Nibley mocked Jakeman’s work:

I would now like to show you Dr. W. H. Sterling’s reproduction of the so-called Izapastella number five, of which he was the discover. This reproduction is remarkable for its almost total lack of resemblance to the local reproduction familiar to students of the Book of Mormon. Apparently Dr. Sterling does not have access to such refined technical aids as a magnifying glass. The remarkable thing about this document is that even in Dr. Sterling’s reproduction, we have the signature of Moroni clearly and unmistakably before our eyes. I call your attention to the two fishes in the upper right hand corner. Now, as G. B. Shaw has shown, a possible phonetic writing for “fish” in English is “gh” as in enough, rough; “o” as in women, “i” and “sh”(ti) as in nation, ration and so forth. So “ghoti” spells fish. Be that as it may, even a layman will recognize that a goatee is a beard; he may also recall that Aaron’s beard reached the hem of his garment. Now “hem” in Egyptian also means warrior, and who will doubt that Moroni was a great warrior? Beyond the shadow of a doubt, Moroni has signed his name on this remarkable stela.

The three pyramids, at the bottom—plainly of Egyptian origin—indicate that the writing is Egyptian. We should notice here that the figure identified locally as Lemuel has a long tail and has been called a monkey, and this confirms the identification since this is the Egyptian scribe’s way of indicating that Lemuel aped his brother Laman, behind whom he is standing. Moreover, the resemblance between a small spider monkey and a lemur is remarkable, as is also the obvious affinity between the names lemur and Lemuel, the “r” and “l” being interchangeable in Semitic languages.

The object held by the figure in front of Laman has been identified as a flute. What the layman is liable to overlook is that there is no indication that the iron rod of Lehi’s dream was not hollow. It survives in early American tradition as the flute of the spider lady (note the significant allusion to the spider monkey), which was ritually filled with sugar-coated pimientos, symbolic of the earth mother’s power of turning herself into the sacred drum, the beating of which made a sound which to the primitive ear must have resembled that of the snapping of a crocodile’s jaws, such a sound as “Lehi, Lehi, Lehi.”

Church Discourages Research on Book of Mormon Geography

On pages 118-124 of this book, we show how completely confused Mormon scholars have become because they cannot agree on the geography of the Book of Mormon. On July 29, 1978, the church leaders became so upset by the differing views that an article was published in the Church Section of the Deseret News which discourages the study of Book of Mormon geography:

The geography of the Book of Mormon has intrigued some readers of that volume ever since its publication. But why worry about it?

Efforts to pinpoint certain places from what is written in the book are fruitless because the record does not give evidence of such locations in terms of our modern geography.

Attempts to designate certain areas as the Land Bountiful or the site of Zarahemla or the place where the Nephite city of Jerusalem sank into the sea “and waters have I caused to come up in the stead thereof” can bring no definitive results. So why speculate?

To guess where Zarahemla stood can in no wise add to anyone’s faith. But to raise doubts in people’s minds about the location of the Hill Cumorah, and thus challenge the words of the prophets concerning the place where Moroni buried the records, is most certainly harmful. And who has the right to raise doubts in anyone’s mind?

Our position is to build faith, not to weaken it, and theories concerning the geography of the Book of Mormon can most certainly undermine faith if allowed to run rampant.

Why not leave hidden the things that the Lord has hidden? If He wants the geography of the Book of Mormon revealed, He will do so through His prophet, and not through some writer who wishes to enlighten the world despite his utter lack of inspiration on the point.

Some authors have felt “called upon” to inform the world about Book of Mormon geography and have published writings giving their views. These books, however, are strictly private works and represent only their personal speculations.

7. Changes in Joseph Smith's History

In 1838 Joseph Smith began writing the account of his life which is now published by the church. Joseph Smith began publishing this history in the Times and Seasons in 1842. It was published in installments, and therefore only part of the history appeared in print before Joseph Smith's death. The church continued to publish the history in the Times and Seasons after his death until the Mormons were driven from Nauvoo. The remainder of the history was published in the Millennial Star and also in the Deseret News. In 1902 the History of the Church was reprinted in seven volumes, and it has been republished several times since then.

Mormon leaders claim that Joseph Smith's History of the Church is the most accurate history in the world and that it has never been changed or falsified in any way. Joseph Fielding Smith, the tenth President of the Mormon Church and former Church Historian, stated: "The most important history in the world is the history of our Church, and it is the most accurate history in all the world, it must be so" (Doctrines of Salvation, vol. 2, p. 199). The Mormon Apostle John A. Widtsoe made these statements:

Joseph was sincere or he would have permitted some events to be hidden and only major concerns of the Church to come before the public. There was no undercover planning in his work—there was nothing to hide. . . . The use of the modern printing press ensured the continued existence of the correct history of the Church. (Joseph Smith—Seeker After Truth, Salt Lake City, 1951, p. 250)

The History of the Church and the utterances therein contain, if read properly, a continued evidence that Joseph Smith told the truth . . . Throughout all his writings runs the simple spirit of truth. . . . There is in them no attempt to "cover up" any act of his life. . . . Mormon history and doctrine have been carefully preserved in the published records of the Church—and all has been published. (Ibid., pp. 256-257)

The History of Joseph Smith, published by the Church, as to events and dates, may be accepted as an unusually accurate historical document. It will increase in importance with the years and become more and more a proof of the honest sincerity of the founders of the Church in this dispensation.

The history is trustworthy. No flaws have been found in it. (Ibid., p. 297)

The Mormon Apostle LeGrand Richards also claimed that no changes have been made in the History of the Church. In a letter to Morris L. Reynolds he stated: "Your second question: 'Has Joseph Smith's History been changed from the original history?' No. No changes have been made in meaning in any way" (Letter by LeGrand Richards, dated May 11, 1966). Dr. Hugh Nibley also stated that "There have been no changes in Joseph Smith's history" (Letter dated May 12, 1966).

In the Preface to volume 1 of Joseph Smith's History of the Church, we find the statement that "no historical or doctrinal statement has been changed" (History of the Church, vol. 1, Preface, p. vi).

The material which follows will prove beyond all doubt that the statements quoted above are completely false. Actually, the Mormon historians have broken almost all the rules of honesty in their publication of Joseph Smith's History of the Church. It is a well known fact that when an omission is made in a document it must be indicated by ellipses signs. The Mormon historians have almost completely ignored this rule; in many cases they have deleted thousands of words without any indication. They have also added thousands of words without any indication. They have changed spelling, grammar, punctuation and rearranged the words. There can be no doubt that the changes were deliberate, although there may have been a few typographical errors. We have already shown that three important changes were made to cover up the fact that Joseph Smith broke the "Word of Wisdom." Certainly, no one would argue that these changes happened by accident, for they bear unmistakable evidence of falsification. Some of Joseph Smith's prophecies that did not come to pass have been changed. Many exaggerated and contradictory statements were either changed or deleted without indication. Crude or indecent statements were also deleted. Joseph Smith quoted the enemies of the church as using the name of the Lord in vain many times in the history, but much of this profanity has been removed by the Mormon leaders. In the first printed version of Joseph Smith's History he cursed his enemies, condemned other churches and beliefs, and called the President of the United States a fool. Many of these extreme statements were deleted or changed. The Mormon leaders did not dare let their people see the real Joseph Smith. They would rather falsify the History of the Church than allow Joseph Smith's true character to be known. The Mormon leaders have not only changed the History of the Church, but they have further deceived the people by making the claim that no historical or doctrinal statement has been changed.

Not only has the History of the Church been changed since it was first printed, but there is also evidence to prove that changes were made before it was first published. In other words, there is evidence that even the first printed version of the history is inaccurate.

When the history was first printed the Church Historians George A. Smith and Wilford Woodruff (who later became President of the Church) stated that "a history more correct in its details than this was never published," and that it was "one of the most authentic histories ever written" (History of the Church, vol. 1, Preface v-vi). There is an abundance of evidence to show that this statement is absolutely false. Charles Wesley Wandell, who worked in the Church Historian's Office after the death of Joseph Smith, accused the leaders of the Mormon Church of falsifying the history. When he saw the way that they were printing it in 1855, he made this comment in his journal:

I notice the interpolations because having been employed (myself) in the Historian's office at Nauvoo by Doctor Richards, and employed, too, in 1845, in compiling this very autobiography, I know that after Joseph's death his memoir was "doctored" to suit the new order of things, and this, too, by the direct order of Brigham Young to Doctor Richards and systematically by Richards. (Statement from the journal of Charles Wesley Wandell, as printed in the Journal of History, vol. 8, p. 76)

According to Dean C. Jessee, of the Church Historian's Office, Charles Wesley Wandell was one of the scribes who helped make a "duplicate handwritten copy of the History, . . ." (Brigham Young University Studies, Summer, 1971, p. 469).

Although the early Mormon leaders claimed that Joseph Smith's History was "one of the most authentic histories ever written," they admitted that there had been some revisions made under Brigham Young's leadership. In the History of the Church, vol. 7, page 243, we read: "Moreover, since the death of the Prophet Joseph, the history has been carefully revised under the strict inspection of President Brigham Young and approved of by him." The word "revised," of course, might be understood in several different ways and would not necessarily mean that Joseph Smith's History was falsified. Perhaps we can gain insight into Brigham Young's methods from a statement he made in a sermon delivered on August 2, 1857:

Brother Heber says that the music is taken out of his sermons when brother Carrington clips out a word here and there: and I have taken out the music from mine, . . .

I know that I have seen the day when, let men use language like brother Heber has to day, and many would apostatize from the true faith. In printing my remarks, I often omit the sharp words, . . ." (Journal of Discourses, vol. 5, p. 99)

We must remember also that after Brigham Young suppressed the book written by Joseph Smith's mother, it was "revised" and then republished. Over 2,000 words were added, deleted or changed without any indication. Brigham Young seems to have been a very dishonest historian, and therefore when the Mormon Historians speak of Joseph Smith's History being "revised" we can only conclude that this meant falsification. That the Mormon Historians did a great deal of tampering with Joseph Smith's History before publishing it is obvious from the following statements in Brigham Young's History:

Tuesday, April 1, 1845.—I commenced revising the History of Joseph Smith at Brother Richard's office: Elder Heber C. Kimball and George A. Smith were with me. (History of the Church, vol. 7, p. 389)

Wednesday, 2.—Engaged at Elder Richard's office with Elders Kimball and Smith revising Church History. (Ibid., pp. 389-390)

Tuesday, 13.—With Elders Heber C. Kimball, W. Richards and George A. Smith reading and revising Church History . . . (Ibid., p. 408)

Wednesday, 14,— . . . we read and revised history all day. (Ibid., p. 411)

Friday, 16.—I spent the day at Brother Hunter's in company with Brothers Heber C. Kimball, Willard Richards, George A. Smith and N. K. Whitney revising history: . . .

Saturday, 17.—revising history as yesterday, . . . (Ibid., p. 411)

Tuesday, 20.— . . . We read and revised fifty-seven pages of History of Joseph Smith from Book "B": . . . (Ibid., p. 414)

Wednesday, 18.—I met with Elders Heber C. Kimball, John Taylor and George A. Smith at Brother Taylor's; we revised a portion of the History of Joseph Smith. . . .

Thursday, 19.—I spent the day with Brothers H. C. Kimball and George A. Smith revising history. . . .

Friday, 20.—Elders H. C. Kimball, Orson Pratt, George A. Smith, and myself engaged revising Church History. (Ibid., pp. 427-428)

For other references concerning the revision of Joseph Smith's History see History of the Church, vol. 7, pp. 514, 519, 520, 532, 533, 556)

We now have definite proof that Joseph Smith's History was "doctored" before it was first published by the church. It is very hard to understand how men who claimed to be historians and religious leaders could put forth such a fraudulent history and then claim that it is "one of the most authentic histories ever written."

Written By Joseph Smith?

In 1965 we published a book entitled Changes in Joseph Smith's History. In this book we showed that thousands of words were added, deleted, or changed since Joseph Smith's History was first published. On pages 7-9 of this book we made these observations:

On the title page to Vol. 1 of the History of the Church, this statement appears: "History of Joseph Smith, the Prophet by Himself"; this study, however, reveals that much of the history was not written by Joseph Smith. Only a small part of the history was printed during Joseph Smith's lifetime, and we are very suspicious that Joseph Smith did not finish writing the history before his death. Joseph Smith probably kept a journal which the historians used to write part of the history. The entries in the History of the Church for 1835 sound very much like a day-to-day journal. The Church Historians, no doubt, used Joseph Smith's journals, but they also interpolated material of their own and tried to make it appear that Joseph Smith had written it. An example is found in the Millennial Star, v. 19, p. 7:

. . . on this evening Joseph the Seer commenced giving instructions to the scribe concerning writing the proclamation to the kings of the earth, . . .

It is very obvious that Joseph Smith did not write this; when this was reprinted in the History of the Church, the words "Joseph the Seer" were changed to the word "I." In the Millennial Star, v. 19, p. 630, Joseph Smith was referred to in the third person four different times, but when this was reprinted in the History of the Church it has been changed to the first person to make it appear that Joseph Smith was writing the history. We will say more about this change at its proper place in the study. The account of the "Kirtland Camp" was probably not written by Joseph Smith, but rather by someone who was with the camp. Under the date of September 26, 1838, Joseph Smith records in the history: 'I was about home until ten or eleven o'clock when I rode out, but returned home and spent the evening. (Millennial Star, v. 16, p. 296)

This reference shows that Joseph Smith was not with the camp. Under the same date in the history, Joseph Smith tells of the "Kirtland Camp." Part of the reference reads as it should; the writer (which is supposed to be Joseph Smith) referring to the camp in the third person:

The camp passed on, and crossing Chariton tents.

Here they found seven of the nine wagons of the Florence Camp, . . . (Millennial Star, vol. 16, p. 296)

In the middle of this reference, however, the writer strangely becomes part of the camp:

Elder McArthur said, in a low tone, that it was his impression that we might go on . . . Here our faith was tried, and here the Lord looked down and beheld us, and lo, a gentleman . . . came among us although we were a good distance from the road, and he told us that there was no trouble in Far West . . . but that we might go right along . . . A vote of the camp was called for, whether, we should proceed, . . .

We pursued our journey, and in crossing a seven mile prairie we stopped . . .

The Mormon Historians could, no doubt, see that the word "we" should read "they," "our" should read "their" and “us” should read “them,” but instead of changing these words they deleted the entire reference.

In the Millennial Star, v. 23, pp. 737-739, the Mormon Historians included an article which was found in the Times and Seasons. Joseph Smith could not have included this article in the history as it was not published in the Times and Seasons until after his death. Later Mormon Historians evidently became aware of this and deleted it from the history.

In the History of the Church, v. 6, p. 426, this statement appears:

A conference was held in Glasgow, Scotland, representing 1,018 members, including 1 High Priest, 30 Elders, 46 Priests, 36 Teachers and 20 Deacons.

It is very unlikely that Joseph Smith could have written this statement. The date of the history is June 2, 1844. Joseph Smith stopped writing the history on June 22, 1844 and was killed on June 27. It would have been almost impossible for the news of this conference to have reached Nauvoo in 20 days. In the History of the Church, v. 6, p. 424, Joseph Smith received a letter which took 23 days to come from Boston. A letter from Scotland would take much longer to arrive than a letter from Boston.

It is interesting to note that in 1844 Joseph Smith said: “For the last three years I have a record of all my acts and proceedings, for I have kept several good, faithful, and efficient clerks in constant employ: they have accompanied me everywhere, and carefully kept my history” (History of the Church, v. 6, p. 409). The last few years of Joseph Smith’s life in the History of the Church are filled with personal incidents, however, in the year 1840 there seems to be a vacuum. There seems to be an abundance of information concerning England but very little concerning incidents that were happening in Nauvoo (where Joseph Smith was). The interesting thing about this is that Brigham Young, George A. Smith and Heber C. Kimball (the men who ‘revised’ Joseph Smith’s history after his death) were in England at this time. Could it be that they wrote this part of the history after Joseph Smith’s death? See especially the History of the Church, v. 6, pp. 233-239. . . .

The Mormon Historians evidently feel that more converts can be won to the church with a bogus history than with a true factual one. It is apparently felt that the truth will not bear its own weight and that a little forgery here and there is not wrong as long as it helps win converts to the Church. Men go to prison for the crime of forgery, however, the Mormon Church leaders seem to be immune from punishment because it is a religious document they have falsified. Perhaps some day the members of the Church will demand an honest history and that the “secret manuscripts” be made available. (Changes in Joseph Smith’s History, pp. 7-9)

New Discoveries

Since we published our book, Changes in Joseph Smith’s History, a great deal of information has come to light which tends to confirm our conclusions concerning the falsification of Joseph Smith’s History. For instance, a microfilm copy of the original handwritten manuscript of Joseph Smith’s History, “Book A-1,” was recently given to us. This manuscript is the basis for the History of the Church up to the year 1836. It will, no doubt, deal a devastating blow to the Mormon Church. In 1961 the Mormon leaders denied us access to this handwritten manuscript of the History of the Church. After we published Changes in Joseph Smith’s History, a young man from California, who had recently been converted to the Mormon Church, read the book and decided to go to the Historian’s Office to see if they would allow him to examine the original handwritten manuscript of Joseph Smith’s History. He stated to us later that they told him at the Historian’s Office that they were going to make a microfilm copy of the handwritten manuscript of Joseph Smith’s History. They assured him that as soon as the microfilm was completed it would be made available, but that they could not let him examine the handwritten manuscript until it was on microfilm. After this young man had this conversation at the Church Historian’s Office, he came to our house and told us all about it. He was certain that they had told the truth. He assured us of their sincerity, but we informed him that the handwritten manuscript of Joseph Smith’s History had already been filmed. We brought out a copy of the thesis “An Analysis of the Accounts Relating Joseph Smith’s Early Visions,” written by Paul R. Cheesman for the Degree of Master of Religious Education at the Brigham Young University. On page 77 of this thesis Paul R. Cheesman states:

Joseph Smith started officially to write the History of the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints sometime near May 2, 1838. . . . This handwritten copy of the history is in possession of the Church Historian’s office. A microfilm has been made from the original and from this film the following copy was made.

After reading this statement this young man got up from the chair in which he was sitting and stated that the church leaders had lied to him. He went out of the house thoroughly disillusioned with the Mormon leaders. Wallace Turner, a correspondent for the New York Times, witnessed part of this incident and wrote the following concerning it:

That day an apostasy was in the making. A young man visiting Tanner was reading one of the Tanner books. In an agitated voice he exclaimed: “That does it! That’s all! I can still get out of it and I will!”

Something in the book had convinced him that one of the minor church officials had mislead him about existence of a microfilm copy of a document. When his emotions had quieted, he explained that he had been converted to Mormonism in order to marry a devout Mormon girl. She had insisted that he become a Saint, and that he promise to work in the church as a condition of marriage. . . .

But for this young convert standing in Jerald Tanner’s house, it seemed to be all finished. He explained his way out of the marriage. “I can get out of it still because it wasn’t consummated,” he said as he left the house. (The Mormon Establishment, by Wallace Turner, 1966, pp. 155-156)

This young man seems to have remained with the girl, but he was visibly shaken as Wallace Turner indicates. Now that we have a copy of Joseph Smith’s “Manuscript History,” Book A-1, we can see that it was originally microfilmed by the church’s Genealogical Society on January 27, 1942. This was over twenty years prior to the time that they told the young man mentioned above that they had not completed microfilming it.

A few years after the incident mentioned above, another Mormon, who was doing research in the Church Historian’s Office, became very disturbed with the church’s policy of changing and suppressing the records. In some way he gained access to the microfilm copy of “Book A-1,” and a number of duplicate copies were made from this film. The Mormon leaders were, of course, very disturbed over this matter, and we understand that this man is now denied access to all material in the Church Historian’s Office. At any rate, we were given a copy of this film. Although we have not had the time to make a thorough study of the manuscript, a preliminary examination clearly reveals the duplicity of the Mormon Historians. Thousands of words—sometimes entire pages—have been crossed out so that they could be deleted from Joseph Smith’s History. On the other hand, the film shows many pages of material which were interpolated after Joseph Smith’s death. The pages which follow contain actual photographs from the “Manuscript History,” Book A-1. The reader will see that the evidence of falsification is overwhelming.

Although we now have a film of the handwritten manuscript of Joseph Smith’s History up to 1836, the remaining portion is still suppressed. Fortunately, we have another film which sheds a great deal of light on this period. This is a copy of a film in the Church Historian’s Office of the newspaper published in Nauvoo by the Mormons. This newspaper was originally called The Wasp, but the name was later changed to The Nauvoo Neighbor. A woman

Nov 11 about the 17th of November I received a visit from Elders Joseph Young, Brigham Young and Peter C. Hunt from Newbern, Newbern County, New York, they spent four or five days at Hillstead, during which we had many interesting conversations. At one of our interviews, Brother Brigham Young, and John Sprague spoke in Tongues, which was the first time I had heard this gift among the brethren, others also spoke, and I received the gift myself.
 Brother Joseph speaks a great man, but Brigham is a greater, and the time will come when he will preside over the whole church. (see page 260) was the first instance of excitement in our numbers. He was followed by brother Aaron Hyde who perceived by the scriptures that baptism was for the remission of sins. I next called upon brother Stephen Johnson, who at first at some small degree in necessity of men being upright in their work, and keeping the truth in story intact. I then called upon brother Lewis Platt, who delivered an excellent discourse on the necessity of the same redemptions of all things. The services of the day were concluded by a powerful exhortation from George Miller.

The voice was such as to be heard a mile and a half. Page 442

While we were reflecting ourselves upon these, about the would deliver a prophecy. After giving the brethren much good advice, exhorting them to faithfulness and humility; I said the in consequence of the profane and unruly spirits that appeared among them, and they should die like sheep with the rest: and if they would repent and humble themselves before the Lord, the scourge, in a great measure, might be turned away; but, as in word said, this camp will suffer for giving way to their unlawful desires.

that came over the river. The next morning I told them that I would descend to the spirit that was manifested by some of the brethren, to let them see the folly of their wickedness. I ran up and commenced speaking by saying, "if any man invented me, or abuses me, I will stand in my own defence at the expense of my life; and if a dog growls at me, I will let him know that I am his master." At this moment who lived outside of Utah told us that she could borrow a copy which had previously been made of the film in the Church Historian's Office and wondered if we could get a firm in Salt Lake City to make duplicate copies. Although there were no copyright restrictions on the film, the company refused to make copies because the Church Historian's Office would be opposed to it. Finally, it was duplicated outside the State of Utah and a copy was sent to us.

We wondered why the Church Historian's Office had suppressed this film, and with this question in mind we began our research on it. At first we found nothing of importance, but then one day we noticed that some words had been crossed out with a pen or pencil and some other words written in their place. Naturally, we wondered why the words had been changed in this newspaper. The answer soon became apparent. We found that the article which contained these words was reprinted in Joseph Smith's History of the Church. The words which were crossed out on the newspaper were also left out in Joseph Smith's History, and the words which were written in by hand on the newspaper appeared in Joseph Smith's History. We found this same pattern in many other articles reprinted in History of the Church. Where words were crossed out on the newspaper, they were deleted from Joseph Smith's History, and where words were added in by hand on the newspaper they were also found in the History. From this only one possible conclusion could be reached: we had a film of the very pages which the Mormon Church Historians used when they compiled Joseph Smith's History, and the handwriting clearly revealed the falsifications which they made in composing the History. This conclusion is strengthened by the fact that the name "W. Richards" is written on the top of many of the pages, and the reader will remember that Brigham Young claimed that "Willard Richards" helped in "revising" Joseph Smith's History after his death (History of the Church, vol. 7, p. 411).

For photographic proof that this paper is marked for falsifications in Joseph Smith's History see our publication Falsification of Joseph Smith's History, page 8.

When Joseph Smith's History was first printed, some important testimony by Joseph Smith against Dr. Foster was included. This testimony was taken from the Nauvoo Neighbor for April 15, 1844. In the Nauvoo Neighbor Joseph Smith was quoted as saying:

"I did say that Dr. Foster did steal a raw hide, I have seen him steal a number of times: these are the things that they now want to ruin me for; for telling the truth. When riding in the stage, I have seen him put his hand in a woman's bosom, and he also lifted up her clothing. I know that they are wicked, malicious, adulterous, bad characters; I say it under oath; I can tell all the particulars from first to last." (Nauvoo Neighbor, May 15, 1844)

The fact that Joseph Smith was able to tell "all the particulars" almost makes him an accessory to the crimes. If he had seen Foster steal "a number of times" why hadn't he reported this? Why did Foster feel so free to carry on in the manner he did in the stage in front of the Prophet Joseph Smith? The Mormon leaders could apparently see that these statements by Joseph Smith cast a shadow of doubt upon his character. The film of the Nauvoo Neighbor from the Historian's Office reveals that even in Brigham Young's time the Mormon Historians realized that Joseph Smith's testimony could not stand as originally published. The words "I have seen him steal a number of times" were crossed out in their copy of the Nauvoo Neighbor and were deleted without indication when Joseph Smith's History was first published in the Millennial Star: "I did say that Dr. Foster stole a raw hide. These are the things that they now want to ruin me for—for telling the truth" (Millennial Star, vol. 23, p. 454).

Although this change made Joseph Smith look better, the Mormon leaders were still not satisfied. They probably felt that this whole proceeding threw too much light on Joseph Smith's system of plural marriage. In modern editions of the History of the Church, they have deleted 3,742 words without any indication. This deletion, of course, includes the part concerning the carriage ride as well as the portion concerning Foster's stealing (compare History of the Church, vol. 6, p. 360, with Millennial Star, vol. 23, pp. 439, 440, 454, 455, 456).

Film Supplies New Evidence

The film of The Wasp and The Nauvoo Neighbor not only proves that the changes made in Joseph Smith's History were deliberate falsifications, but it also seems to show that Joseph Smith did not finish the History of the Church and that it was actually written after his death. Many of the articles from the newspaper used in Joseph Smith's History are introduced with a statement like the one found in the History of the Church, vol. 6, page 171: "I insert the following from the Neighbor, . . ." This, of course, is what we would expect to find if Joseph Smith actually wrote the History of the Church. In our study of the film, however, we found articles marked to be included in Joseph Smith's History, but inserted in the History of the Church as if they were the very words of Joseph Smith himself. Many cases could be cited to show that the Mormon Historians borrowed heavily from the newspaper published in Nauvoo when they composed Joseph Smith's History.

The film of The Wasp and The Nauvoo Neighbor has helped us solve a problem which we mentioned in our book, Changes in Joseph Smith's History. On page 60 of that book we stated:

CHANGE 311.

In the Millennial Star, v. 19, p. 630, Joseph Smith supposedly said:

. . . they left them in the care of the Marshall, without the original writ by which they were arrested, and by which only they could be retained, and returned back to Governor Carlin for further instructions, and Messrs. Smith and Rockwell went about their business.

In the History of the Church, v. 5, p. 87, this has been changed to read:

. . . they left us in the care of the marshal, without the original writ by which we were arrested, and by which only we could be retained, and returned to Governor Carlin for further instructions, and myself and Rockwell went about our business.

It would appear that Joseph Smith did not write this part of the history, and that the Mormon Historians forgot to change these words when they first printed them. Later the "mistake" was "corrected."

It is interesting to note that Joseph Smith's prophecy that the "Saints" would "be driven to the Rocky Mountains" appears only two paragraphs before this. Could it be that this was not written by Joseph Smith, but by someone after the Mormons were driven to Utah? (Changes in Joseph Smith's History, p. 60)

Now that we have examined the film of the newspaper published at Nauvoo, we know the exact source for the portion of Joseph Smith's History which deals with his arrest. This is an article published in The Wasp on August 13, 1842. At the bottom of the next page is a comparison of the article from The Wasp and the material which was purported to have been written by Joseph Smith in his History of the Church.

The discovery of the source of the material concerning Joseph Smith's arrest certainly casts a shadow of doubt upon the authorship of the prophecy that the Saints would "become a mighty people in the midst of the Rocky Mountains"

(History of the Church, vol. 5, p. 85). The material concerning his arrest from The Wasp is inserted in the History of the Church only twelve words after Joseph Smith’s famous prophecy, and the top of the paragraph containing the prophecy may have been taken from another article on the same page of The Wasp. In this article we find the following: “We attended the installation of Rising Sun Lodge of Ancient York Masons, at Montrose, . . . The deputy Grand Master of Illinois, Gen. Adams, installed the officers . . .” (The Wasp, August 13, 1842). Joseph Smith’s History contains almost the same words, although they are in a slightly different order. It states that he witnessed “the installation of the officers of the Rising Sun Lodge Ancient York Masons, at Montrose, by General James Adams, Deputy Grand-Master of Illinois” (History of the Church, vol. 5, p. 85).

It is also interesting to note that the same issue of The Wasp contains a poem which speaks of “the Rocky Mountains,” and a lengthy quotation from an unpublished work entitled, “Life in The Rocky Mountains.”

We could go on to show many cases where the Mormon Historians borrowed from The Wasp and The Nauvoo Neighbor to make it appear that Joseph Smith actually finished his History of the Church, but this should be sufficient to convince the reader. Our discoveries with regard to The Wasp and Nauvoo Neighbor led us to an investigation of the Times and Seasons to see if the Mormon Historians had borrowed from it in making up Joseph Smith’s History. Considering the limited amount of time we had to spend on this project, we have had a great deal of success in uncovering the sources. For instance, in the Times and Seasons, vol. 2, p. 447, we read: “. . . it was plainly evident that the design . . . was to excite the public mind still more on the subject, and inflame the passions of the people against the defendant and his religion.” This material was incorporated into Joseph Smith’s History, but it was changed slightly to make it appear that Joseph Smith was the author: “. . . it was plainly evident that the design . . . was to excite the public mind still more on the subject and inflame the passions of the people against me and my religion” (History of the Church, vol. 4, p. 367). Many other examples could be cited.

The examples we have presented seem to show that Joseph Smith never finished his History of the Church, and that the Mormon leaders actually completed it after his death. All evidence seems to point to this unmistakable conclusion.

In our book, Falsification of Joseph Smith’s History, page 11, we stated:

The Church has published six volumes which they attribute to Joseph Smith, but only 241 pages of the first volume were published before his death. Since the Mormon leaders have suppressed the original manuscripts, it has been very difficult to determine whether Joseph Smith had written much more than this before his death. Dean C. Jessee, a member of the staff at the Church Historian’s Office, says that Joseph Smith’s History amounted to more than 2,000 handwritten pages, but he admits that only 157 pages had been written by December 1841:

By the time Willard Richards was appointed private secretary to the Prophet and General Church Clerk in December 1841, a mere 157 pages of a history that eventually numbered more than two thousand, had been written. (Brigham Young University Studies, Spring 1969, p. 276)

Since Joseph Smith started the History of the Church in 1838, he had been working on it for about three and a half years by December 1841. If he had completed only 157 pages by that time, he would have needed to move much faster to complete more than 1,800 pages in the next two and a half years before his death in June of 1844. We must remember, however, that Joseph Smith was a very busy man during this period, and this would have made it very difficult for him to have finished the History of the Church. Evidence shows that the Mormon Apostle Willard Richards had a great deal to do with finishing Joseph Smith's History after Smith's death. On December 11, 1844, Brigham Young stated: "Elder Willard Richards recommenced to gather materials for the Church History assisted by W. W. Phelps." (History of the Church, Vol. 7, page 325) The Mormon writer Claire Noall gives this interesting information:

In Salt Lake City, after Richards' death, George A. Smith said something to this effect: "It is too bad Willard did not live to write the history of the martyrdom. He knew more about it than any other man alive. He stopped writing the History in 1843," meaning that Willard brought the official History to that date only. (This story was given to me by Preston Nibley.) (Intimate Disciple—A Portrait of Willard Richards, University of Utah Press, 1957, page 617)

This reference would seem to indicate that Willard Richards had not finished Joseph Smith's History at the time of his death in 1854.

The idea that Willard Richards helped produce Joseph Smith's History after Smith's death is strengthened by the fact that articles from the issues of the Nauvoo Neighbor which belonged to Richards are marked to be inserted in the History of the Church. We once asked a very prominent Mormon historian—a man who frequently writes for the church's Improvement Era—concerning this matter. Instead of dodging the issue, he frankly stated that he also believed that Joseph Smith did not finish the History of the Church and that Willard Richards helped complete it after Smith's death. David Whitmer, one of the three witnesses to the Book of Mormon, once stated: "There were some things published after Brother Joseph's death, claiming to have been written by him, which I do not believe Brother Joseph wrote; . . ." (An Address to Believers in the Book of Mormon, p. 6)

While we now know that Joseph Smith did not finish the work which the Mormon leaders attributed to him, and that serious changes have been made in it, the History of the Church is still of value since some of it is apparently based on Joseph Smith's private journals. (Falsification of Joseph Smith's History, p. 11)

Over 60% After Smith's Death

Just as we were preparing to print the book, Falsification of Joseph Smith's History, Dean C. Jessee, a member of the staff at the LDS Church Historian's Office, published an article in the Brigham Young University Studies which contains some very startling admissions. His work verifies our contention that Joseph Smith did not finish his History of the Church and that it was actually completed after his death. He states:

Not until Willard Richards was appointed secretary to Joseph Smith in December 1842 was any significant progress made on the History. At the time he began writing, not more than 157 pages had been completed, covering events up to November 1, 1831. By May 8, 1843, he had written 114 pages beyond W. W. Phelps' last entry. At the time of Joseph Smith's death, the narrative was written to August 5, 1838. . . .

By February 4, 1846, the day the books were packed for the journey west, the History had been completed to March 1, 1843. . . .

The rigors of establishing a new commonwealth in the mountains precluded even the unboxing of the historical records of the Church until June 7, 1853. . . . resumption of work on the History occurred on "Dec. 1, 1853 [when] Dr. Willard Richards wrote one line of History being sick at the time—and was never able to do any more." . . .

The remainder of Joseph Smith's History of the Church from March 1, 1843 to August 8, 1844, was completed under the direction of George A. Smith. . . .

The Joseph Smith History was finished in August 1856, seventeen years after it was begun. (Brigham Young University Studies, Summer 1971, pp. 466, 469, 470, 472)

Dean C. Jessee frankly admits that the manuscript was only completed to page 812 at the time of Joseph Smith's death (Ibid., p. 457). Since there were almost 2,200 pages, this would mean that over 60% of Joseph Smith's History was not compiled during his lifetime!

As we had suspected, Willard Richards played a prominent part in making up this bogus history after Joseph Smith's death in 1844. Dean C. Jessee stated: "Bullock became the chief scribe under Willard Richards when work resumed on the Joseph Smith History in 1845" (Brigham Young University Studies, Summer 1971, p. 456).

In his diary Thomas Bullock frankly admitted that he helped Dr. Willard Richards write Joseph Smith's History after Joseph's death:

Jan. 14, 1845 . . . recording Church History
16 . . . Dr [Dr. Willard Richards] & I preparing for history all day.
17 . . . Dr. & I preparing Church History
18 . . . G. A. Smith called in the afternoon about the history of the Church, staid some time. . . . Dr. & I on the Church History. . . .
March 15. . . . finished the year 1839—wrote 56 pages last week.
May 3 Saturday Office—writing history finished July 1842 being the end of Vol. 3.

(Thomas Bullock, "Diary," February 11, 1844–August 5, 1845, as cited in Brigham Young University Studies, Summer 1971, p. 467)

Dean C. Jessee cites a letter from the Mormon Historian George A. Smith which shows that he was still writing the last part of Joseph Smith's History many years after Smith's death:

On the 10th April 1854, I commenced to perform the duties of Historian by taking up the History of Joseph Smith where Dr. Willard Richards had left it when driven from Nauvoo on the 4th day of February 1846. I had to revise and compare two years of back history which he had compiled, filling up numerous spaces which had been marked as omissions on memoranda by Dr. Richards.

I commenced compiling the History of Joseph Smith from April 1st 1840 to his death on June 27th 1844. I have filled up all the reports of sermons by Prest. Joseph Smith and others from minutes of sketches taken at the time in long hand . . . which was an immense labor, requiring the deepest thought and the closest application, as there were mostly only two or three words (about half written) to a sentence. . . .

. . . The severe application of thought to the principles of the History, the exercise of memory &c., have caused me to suffer much from a nervous headache or inflammation of the brain; and my application of mind being in exercise both day and night, deprived me of a great portion of necessary sleep. (Letter from George A. Smith to Woodruff, April 21, 1856, as cited in Brigham Young University Studies, Summer 1971, pp. 470, 472)

This letter certainly provides devastating evidence against the authenticity of "Joseph Smith's History."

Rocky Mountain Prophecy

Important evidence concerning Joseph Smith's prophecy that the Mormons would come to the Rocky Mountains has recently come to light. This prophecy was reported to have been given in 1842 in Illinois. Joseph Smith himself was supposed to have said:

While the Deputy Grand-Master was engaged in giving the

The arrow at the bottom points to the prophecy concerning the Mormons becoming "a mighty people in the midst of the Rocky Mountains." Notice that it has been crammed in at the bottom in a smaller handwriting. Although the Mormon leaders claim that Joseph Smith dictated these words, new evidence shows that they could not have been written in the "Manuscript History" until after his death.

(History of the Church, vol. 5, p. 85)

The reader will remember that we said that the discovery of the source of the material concerning Joseph Smith's arrest—taken from The Wasp and inserted in the History of the Church as if Joseph Smith had written it—certainly casts a shadow of doubt upon the authorship of this famous prophecy. We pointed out that the material from The Wasp is inserted in Joseph Smith's History only twelve words after Joseph Smith's prophecy. In our book Falsification of Joseph Smith's History, page 10, we made this statement concerning this prophecy:

There is some evidence that Joseph Smith considered going west to build his kingdom, but since we now know that the Mormon Historians actually compiled Joseph Smith's History after his death and that they drew from many sources, we cannot help being suspicious of the authorship of this prophecy. An examination of the original handwritten manuscript would probably help solve this problem, but the Mormon leaders are still suppressing this portion of the manuscript.

We are now happy to announce that a photograph of the portion of the original handwritten manuscript containing this "prophecy" has been located at the Visitor Center in Nauvoo, Illinois. Wesley P. Walters of Marissa, Illinois, has sent us a photograph of this page which we reproduce on page 134. This photograph is taken from "Joseph Smith's Manuscript History," Book D-1, page 1362.

The reader will notice that the part concerning the Mormons becoming "a mighty people in the midst of the Rocky Mountains" has been crammed in at the bottom in a smaller handwriting. This would seem to indicate that it was added sometime after the page had originally been written.

It is interesting to note that the Mormon writer Nephi Morris wrote a book on the "Prophecies of Joseph Smith" in 1920. The church leaders allowed him to publish a photograph of the prophecy as printed in the Deseret News for November 7, 1855, but he apparently had no access to the original manuscript. He stated:

It was published in its regular order as the History of the Church appeared in that paper. We have not had access to the original record as kept by the Prophet, containing this remarkable prophecy. (Prophecies of Joseph Smith and Their Fulfillment, p. 63)

Now that we have a photograph of the page containing this "prophecy," we can see why it was suppressed for all these years.

The exact time the prophecy concerning the Rocky Mountains was added would be hard to determine since the handwriting of the interpolation appears to be that of Thomas Bullock—the same man who wrote the rest of the page. Bullock served as "the chief scribe under Willard Richards when work resumed on the Joseph Smith History in 1845" (Brigham Young University Studies, Summer 1971, p. 456), and worked in the "Historian Office in Salt Lake City under Willard Richards and George A. Smith (Ibid., p. 458). Two "marginal notes" by Bullock were added to page 1486 of the "Manuscript History" after the Mormons came to Utah (see photograph in BYU Studies, Summer 1971, p. 459). We know also that Bullock was working for George A. Smith when Smith was tampering with this part of the History in 1854. The reader will remember that George A. Smith stated that on April 10, 1854, he began to perform the duties of Historian by taking up the History of Joseph Smith. . . . I had to revise and compare two years of back history . . . filling up numerous spaces which had been marked as omissions on memoranda by Dr. Richards.

I commenced compiling the History of Joseph Smith from April 1st 1840 to his death on June 27th 1844. (BYU Studies, Summer 1971, p. 470)

Dean C. Jessee made this comment concerning this matter:

The reference to April, 1840, appears to contradict the beginning date of March 1, 1843, given above. However, the early date represents the point from which George A. "revised and compared." His actual compilation of the text started with the latter entry. (Ibid., n. 103)

From this it is evident that the prophecy concerning the Rocky Mountains could have been added years after the Mormons were in Utah. At any rate, Dean C. Jessee's study proves that this prophecy could not have been written in "Joseph Smith's Manuscript History" until at least a year after Joseph Smith's death. He shows that page 1362 of the Manuscript History—the page containing the prophecy—was not even written until July 4, 1845!

Unless the Mormon leaders can establish that the entry in the Manuscript History was taken from another source written during Joseph Smith's lifetime, the prophecy as found in the History of the Church becomes of no historical value. Although some Mormons would like us to believe that Brigham Young knew all along that he was going to lead the Mormons to "the midst of the Rocky Mountains," there is evidence to show that he was somewhat confused about the matter. In a letter dated Dec. 17, 1845, he said:

. . . we expect to emigrate West of the mountains next season. If we should eventually settle on Vancouver's Island, according to our calculation we shall greatly desire to have a mail route, . . . if Oregon should be annexed to the United States, . . . and Vancouver's Island incorporated in the same by our promptly paying the national revenue, and taxes, we can live in peace with all men. (Photograph of letter in Prologue, Spring 1972, p. 29)

There is an important change in the History of the Church that seems to be related to this matter. In Joseph Smith's History as it was first published in the Millennial Star, vol. 23, page 280, the following words were attributed to Joseph Smith:

The Lord has an established law in relation to the matter: there must be a particular spot for the salvation of our dead. I verily believe this will be the place; . . .

In the History of the Church, vol. 6, page 319, this has been changed to read:

The Lord has an established law in relation to the matter: there must be a particular spot for the salvation of our dead. I verily believe there will be a place, . . .

The reason for this change is obvious; the Mormons were driven from Nauvoo in 1846, just two years after Joseph Smith had said "this will be the place." It is reported that when Brigham Young looked over the valley where Salt Lake City now stands he stated: "This is the place." A temple has been built at Salt Lake City, and work for the dead is performed in this temple. The change in the location of the headquarters of the church seemed to make it necessary to change Joseph Smith's statement.

Selected Changes

Although we will deal with some of the most important changes in Joseph Smith's History in later chapters, we will mention some of the changes at this point. In Joseph Smith's History as it was first published in the Times and Seasons we read the following:

. . . I was left to all kinds of temptations, and mingling with all kinds of society, I frequently fell into many foolish errors and displayed the weakness of youth and the corruption of human nature, which I am sorry to say led me into divers temptations, to the gratification of many appetites, offensive in the sight of God. (Times and Seasons, vol. 3, p. 749)

In modern printings of the History of the Church this has been changed to read:

. . . I was left to all kinds of temptations; and mingling with all kinds of society, I frequently fell into many foolish errors, and displayed the weakness of youth, and the foibles of human nature, which, I am sorry to say led me into divers temptations, offensive in the sight of God. (History of the Church, vol. 1, p. 9)

Charles Marshall, who had been in Utah “sometime before June, 1871,” was allowed the privilege of examining the page in the original handwritten manuscript which relates to this change. Speaking of Joseph Smith’s behavior after the First Vision, he stated:

During this interval he appears from his own confession to have abandoned himself freely to a variety of youthful vices. “I was led to all kinds of temptations,” he writes; “and mingling with all kinds of society, I frequently fell into many foolish errors, and displayed the weakness of youth, and the corruption of human nature; which, I am sorry to say, led me into divers temptations, to the gratification of many appetites offensive in the sight of God.”

I have italicised some of the expressions in this confessions for a special reason. In the copy of the Autobiography in the Historian’s Office, Salt Lake, from which I made these extracts, the words I have thus marked are crossed through with ink. It will be perceived that if the passage be reprinted as thus trimmed, the sense will be much modified. This is but a trivial example of the way in which piety will lend itself to fraud for the honor of religion, and is scarcely perhaps worth mentioning. If Mormonism lives, as it promises to do, the process of purifying and exalting the prophet’s character will no doubt be carried to great lengths. (The Eclectic Magazine, April 1873, p. 482, reprinted from Fraser’s Magazine for February 1873)

Notice that Mr. Marshall states that the words “all kinds of” were crossed out in two places in the text. The film of the handwritten manuscript confirms this, but they have never been removed from the printed version. The words “to the gratification of many appetites,” which have now been deleted from the printed version, were crossed out in the handwritten manuscript as Mr. Marshall indicated. The word “corruption” is also crossed out and the word “foibles” is found written above it. Charles Marshall speaks of the word “corruption” as being crossed out in the manuscript, however, he does not state that the word “foibles” is written above it as we find on the microfilm made on January 27, 1942. This may indicate that the word “foibles” was not written in the manuscript until after 1871, or, on the other hand, it may simply be an oversight on the part of Mr. Marshall. Mr. Marshall also indicates that the word “the” just before “corruption” has been crossed out. We cannot determine this from our film, but it seems reasonable since the removal of these two words would make good sense without adding the word “foibles”: “I . . . displayed the weakness of youth and of human nature, . . .”

Just following these changes there is an apology of 82 words which has been added to the text. It seems to have been written to soften down the confession which Joseph had made (see Falsification of Joseph Smith’s History, p. 12). In his thesis, “Textual Changes in the Pearl of Great Price,” written at Brigham Young University, Walter L. Whipple informs us that in the original manuscript the 82 words are not found in their proper place at the beginning of the manuscript, but are found on page 133 of the manuscript. At the place where they should appear the following words are found: ‘See note C, p. 133.’ We have checked the film of the original and have found Mr. Whipple’s statements to be correct. If the interpolation is in the handwriting of Willard Richards (as Dean C. Jessee maintains), it must have been added to the manuscript sometime after the Times and Seasons printed this part of the History in 1842 but before 1854 when Richards died. This 82 word interpolation is one of three notes found on pp. 131-133 of Joseph Smith’s “Manuscript History,” vol. A-1. These notes were obviously added to the manuscript at a later date. In our book, Falsification of Joseph Smith’s History, page 12, we maintained that they could “not possibly have been added to the manuscript before April 1, 1842 and that they might have been added as late as 1854. Dean C. Jessee, however, maintains that he has found evidence that they were dictated by Joseph Smith and were added to the manuscript in December 1842:

. . . their location on pages 131-134 of Volume A-1 of Joseph’s History manuscript, in the handwriting of Willard Richards, and a note of reference to them in Richards’ Diary, clearly date them as having been written in December 1842. (Dialogue: A Journal of Mormon Thought, Spring 1971, pp. 87-88)

Since Mr. Jessee does not tell us exactly what Willard Richards records in his journal it is hard to evaluate his statement. At any rate, even if the church leaders were able to establish the fact that Joseph Smith dictated the notes, they would find themselves faced with another problem. While Notes B and C have been added into the printed History of the Church, Note A has never been added. Notes B and C only amount to about 200 words, but Note A is over 600 words. If Joseph Smith really dictated these notes, why was Note A never added to his History? This note deals with Joseph Smith’s leg operation and other troubles and persecutions he was supposed to have suffered in his youth.

One of the most important changes in the History is concerning the name of the Angel who was supposed to have appeared in Joseph Smith’s room. In the History as it was first published by Joseph Smith, we learn that the Angel’s name was “Nephi”:

He called me by name, and said . . . that his name was Nephi. (Times and Seasons, vol. 3, p. 753)

In modern printings of the History of the Church, this has been changed to read “Moroni”:

He called me by name, and said . . . that his name was Moroni; . . . (History of the Church, vol. 1, p. 11)

The original handwritten manuscript shows that the name was originally written as “Nephi,” but that someone at a later date has written the word “Moroni” above the line. Below is a photograph of the original manuscript.

The room was exceedingly light, but not so very bright as . . . When I first looked upon him I was afraid, but the fear name and said unto me that he was a messenger sent of God and that his name was Nephi. That God had a work he had for good and evil among all nations kindreds and

In our book, Falsification of Joseph Smith’s History, page 13, we show that this change was made after Joseph Smith’s death.

The Mormon writer Richard L. Anderson argues that the name “Nephi” had to be changed because it contradicted other statements made by Joseph Smith:

This wording in the present Pearl of Great Price is modified from the first printing, in which the messenger was identified as “Nephi,” a fact that has generated its share of superficial comment. A textual critic or a court of law reserves the right to use common sense in the face of obvious documentary errors. The “Nephi” reading contradicts all that the Prophet published on the subject during his lifetime. (Improvement Era, September 1970, pp. 6-7)

Actually, it would appear that the early Mormon leaders were somewhat confused concerning the identification of the angel who appeared in Joseph Smith’s room. In Joseph Smith’s earliest attempt to write the history of his life—which has only recently come to light—he merely states that it was “an angel of the Lord” who appeared. The “angel” tells him that the plates were “engraved by Moroni” in “ancient days,” but the “angel” does not give his own name. Joseph Smith stated:

. . . behold an angel of the Lord came and stood before me and it was by night and he called me by name and He the Lord had forgiven me my sins and he revealed unto me that in the Town of Manchester, Ontario County N.Y. there was plates of gold upon which there was engravings which was engraved by Moroni and his father the servant of the living God in ancient days . . . (“An Analysis of the Accounts Relating Joseph Smith’s Early Visions,” by Paul R. Cheesman, Master’s thesis, BYU, 1965, p. 130)

When the church began the “first published consecutive account of the origin of the Church” in 1834-35, the “angel” still did not seem to have a name, for in the February 1835 issue of the Latter Day Saints Messenger and Advocate, Oliver Cowdery identified the angel only as “a messenger sent by commandment of the Lord, . . .” (Messenger and Advocate, vol. 1, p. 79). Two months later, however, the angel seems to have acquired the name “Moroni,” for Cowdery speaks of “the angel Moroni, whose words I have been rehearsing, . . .” (Ibid., April 1835, p. 112). In the Elders' Journal for July 1838, page 42, Joseph Smith stated that the angel's name was “Moroni.”

The Doctrine and Covenants 27:5 is sometimes cited to try to prove that the angel was identified as Moroni at a very early date. The revelation purports to have been given in August 1830, but the name “Moroni” was not in the revelation when it was first printed in the Book of Commandments in 1833. It was interpolated into the revelation when it was reprinted in the Doctrine and Covenants in 1835.

It would appear, then, that until 1835 the angel was not identified. From 1835 to 1838 the Mormon leaders were teaching that the angel was “Moroni.” When Joseph Smith published his history in the Times and Seasons in 1842, he had changed his mind. He had decided that the angel was really “Nephi.” The handwritten manuscript plainly reads “Nephi,” and since Joseph Smith was the editor of the Times and Seasons at the time this was published, it is almost impossible to believe this was a “clerical error.” Joseph Smith lived for two years after the name “Nephi” was printed, and he never published a retraction. The Millennial Star, printed in England, also published Joseph Smith's story stating that the angel's name was “Nephi” (see Millennial Star, vol. 3, p. 53). That the Church members in England believed that the angel's name was “Nephi” is obvious from the editorial remarks published in the Millennial Star, vol. 3, page 71:

. . . we read the history of our beloved brother, Joseph Smith, and of the glorious ministry and message of the angel Nephi which has finally opened a new dispensation to man, . . .

Joseph Smith's mother, when writing her history, also quoted Joseph Smith's statement that the angel's name was “Nephi,” but this has been changed in later editions of her book to read “Moroni.” The name was also published in the first edition of the Pearl of Great Price as “Nephi.” Walter L. Whipple states that Orson Pratt “published The Pearl of Great Price in 1878, and removed the name of Nephi from the text entirely and inserted the name Moroni in its place” (“Textual Changes in the Pearl of Great Price,” typed copy, p. 125).

In LaMar Petersen's book, Problems in Mormon Text, he tells that Joseph Smith said the angel's name was “Nephi.” In the July, 1961, issue of the Improvement Era, pp. 492 and 522, Dr. Hugh Nibley attempts to answer this problem by stating:

Some critics, for example, seem to think that if they can show that a friend or enemy of Joseph Smith reports him as saying that he was visited by Nephi, they have caught the Prophet in a fraud.

In footnote 15, page 526 of the same issue, Dr. Nibley stated:

Mr. L. Petersen, Problems in Mormon Text (Salt Lake City, 1957), p. 3, n. 4, labours this point most strangely. He cites as evidence the Millennial Star for August 1842 and the 1851 edition of the Pearl of Great Price—the first printed in England, far away from Joseph Smith, and the second edition years after his death; for them Joseph Smith cannot be held responsible. . . . That Mr. P. should have to search so far among literally thousands of retellings of the story of Moroni to find this inevitable slip is actually a vindication of the original.

Dr. Nibley seems to have missed the whole point; LaMar Petersen was telling how Joseph Smith's story originally read. The original did say it was Nephi, and it was published in Nauvoo, Illinois, and Joseph Smith himself was the editor at that time. Therefore, Joseph Smith must be held responsible for identifying the angel as “Nephi.”

At the bottom of page 120 of volume 1 of the History of the Church, there is nothing to indicate that a deletion has been made, but approximately 3,400 words which were printed in the Times and Seasons have been deleted. These words were very complimentary to Sidney Rigdon. Since Rigdon was excommunicated after Joseph Smith's death, it was apparently felt best to remove Joseph Smith's praise concerning him. An examination of the original handwritten manuscript reveals that these words have been crossed out, which proves that this was a deliberate change. If Rigdon had remained faithful to the church, the Mormon Historians would probably have left these 3,400 words concerning him in the History of the Church.

Speaking of a member of a mob who assaulted him, Joseph Smith stated:

. . . the fellow that I kicked came to me and thrust his hand into my face, all covered with blood, (for I hit him on the nose.) and with an exulting horse laugh, muttered: . . . (Times and Seasons, vol. 5, p. 611)

When this was reprinted in the History of the Church the words “for I hit him on the nose” were deleted without any indication:

. . . the fellow that I kicked came to me and thrust his hand, all covered with blood, into my face and with an exulting hoarse laugh, muttered: . . . (History of the Church, vol. 1, p. 262)

The original handwritten manuscript of Joseph Smith's History bears witness against the modern edition of the History of the Church, since it contains the words “for I hit him on the nose.”

In the History of the Church, vol. 1, page 285, twenty-four words were added which were not in the Times and Seasons (see vol. 5, page 657). They are concerning George A. Smith who became a very prominent man in the Mormon Church. These words read as follows:

On September the 10th, George A. Smith was baptized by Joseph H. Wakefield, at Potsdam, St. Lawrence county, New York; and confirmed by Elder Solomon Humphry.

The original handwritten manuscript plainly reveals that these words were interpolated after this portion of the manuscript was originally written. In fact, they have been squeezed into the manuscript between two lines in a very awkward manner. That this interpolation was made after Joseph Smith's death is obvious from the fact that the issue of the Times and Seasons which printed this portion of Joseph Smith's History is dated October 1, 1844—about three months after Smith's death. It is obvious from this that if the words in question had been in the handwritten manuscript at the time this issue of the Times and Seasons was printed they would have been included. It is also interesting to note that George A. Smith was one of the men who “revised” Joseph Smith's History after his death. He apparently could not resist the temptation to add material concerning himself in Joseph Smith's History.

In the History of the Church, vol. 1, pages 295-297, seventy-four words are added which were not in the Times and Seasons (see vol. 5, p. 673). This interpolation reads as follows:

About the 8th of November I received a visit from Elders Joseph Young, Brigham Young, and Heber C. Kimball of Mendon, Monroe county, New York. They spent four or five days at Kirtland, during which we had many interesting moments. At one of our interviews Brother Brigham Young and John P. Greene spoke in tongues, which was the first time I had heard this gift among the brethren; others also spoke, and I received the gift myself.

This interpolation was certainly made after Joseph Smith's death and is an obvious attempt to glorify Brigham Young. The interpolation was too large to be inserted into the handwritten manuscript at its proper place (“Manuscript History,” Book A-1, p. 240), and therefore it is written in the “Addenda” which follows p. 553. (The Addenda contains a great deal of material which was to be inserted into Joseph Smith's History and was obviously written after his death.)

Below is a photograph from the “Addenda” showing the words concerning Brigham Young which were to be added to the History of the Church.

Note A. about the 8th of November I received a visit from Elders Joseph Young, Brigham Young, and Heber C. Kimball from Mendon, Monroe County, New York. They spent four or five days at Kirtland, during which we had many interesting moments. At one of our interviews, Brother Brigham spoke, and John Stephens spoke in Tongues, which was the first time I have heard this gift among the brethren, others also spoke, and I received the gift myself. Brother Joseph Young is a great man, but Brigham is a greater, and the time will come when he will preside over the whole church. (see page 240)

Note B. May the 25, 1833. My uncle John Smith and family arrived in Kirtland, from Rotterdam New-York, My uncle being an Elder in the Church, and his wife and eldest son George.

The reader will notice that although the Mormon leaders added most of this interpolation into Joseph Smith's History, they omitted two lines (see arrow). These lines contain some very important information:

Brother Joseph Young is a great man but Brigham is a greater, and the time will come when he will preside over the whole church.

Although the Mormon Historians added the part about Brigham Young speaking in tongues, they have never dared to add the prophecy that Brigham Young was to become leader of the church. We must remember that many people questioned the leadership of Brigham Young. In fact, the Apostle William Smith—Joseph Smith's brother—left the church and stated that he once heard Joseph say that if Brigham Young ever led the church “he would certainly lead it to destruction” (Warsaw Signal, October 29, 1845). However this may be, the Mormon historians never dared to add in the “prophecy” found in the “Addenda.” They probably realized that the dissenters would question such a statement in Joseph Smith's History and ask for proof. An examination of the original manuscript, however, would soon reveal that the prophecy is a forgery made after Brigham Young had become the leader of the church.

On page 353 of the History of the Church, vol. 1, thirty-nine words are added that did not appear in the Times and Seasons (vol. 6, p. 785). In this interpolation it is stated that “George A. Smith hauled the first load of stone for the Temple.” The handwritten manuscript clearly shows that this was added at a later time.

On page 388 of the History of the Church, vol. 1, nineteen words were added which were not in the Times and Seasons (vol. 6, p. 818). They are as follows: “Elder Brigham Young having returned from his mission to Canada, accompanied by some twenty or thirty of the brethren, . . .” The original manuscript shows this to be an interpolation.

One of the most important changes in the History of the Church—for it amounts to thousands of words added or rewritten—is concerning “Zion's Camp” and its journey from Kirtland to Missouri. In the History of the Church, vol. 2, p. 65, line 13, to p. 78, line 5, there have been so many changes made and so much new material added that it is almost impossible to determine just what was in the original and what was added.

In the Times and Seasons, vol. 6, pages 1075-1076, the story of “Zion's Camp” from May 11, 1834, to June 1, 1834, takes just a little over a page—863 words; this same period of time in the History of the Church takes almost 13 pages—3,916 words. Therefore, at least 3,053 words have been added.

In the History of the Church, vol. 2, pages 80-82, 751 words have been added which were not in the Times and Seasons (vol. 6, p. 1076). It is very interesting to note that the first paragraph that is added resembles Heber C. Kimball's Journal for June 3, 1834. Below is a comparison.

Kimball's Journal:

. . . while we were refreshing ourselves and teams, about the middle of the day, Brother Joseph got up in a wagon and said, that he would deliver a prophecy. After giving the brethren much good advice, exhorting them to faithfulness and humility. He said, the Lord had told him that there would a scourge come upon the camp, in consequence of the fractious and unruly spirits that appeared among them and they should die like sheep with the rot; still if they would repent and humble themselves before the Lord, the scourge in a great measure might be turned away: but, as the Lord lives, this camp will suffer for giving way to their unruly temper. . . . (Extracts from H. C. Kimball's Journal, published in the Times and Seasons, vol. 6, p. 788)

History of the Church:

. . . while we were refreshing ourselves and teams about the middle of the day (June 3rd), I got up on a wagon wheel, called the people together, and said that I would deliver a prophecy. After giving the brethren much good advice, exhorting them to faithfulness and humility, I said the Lord had revealed to me that a scourge would come upon the camp in consequence of the fractious and unruly spirits that appeared among them, and they should die like sheep with the rot; still, if they would repent and humble themselves before the Lord, the scourge, in a great measure, might be turned away; but, as the Lord lives, the members of this camp will suffer for giving way to their unruly temper. (History of the Church, vol. 2, p. 80)

Since these words were not in the history as it was first published, and since they so closely resemble Heber C. Kimball's Journal, it is almost impossible not to believe that the Mormon Historians were guilty of falsification and deceit. The handwritten manuscript also shows that the words added to Joseph Smith's History were interpolated at a later date. They do not appear in their proper place but are found in “Note I” in the “Addenda.”

We could cite many other cases where words have been taken from Heber C. Kimball's Journal and interpolated into Joseph Smith's History.

The reader will remember that the Mormons were driven from Nauvoo before the Times and Seasons had completed the publication of Joseph Smith's History; therefore, the publication of the History of the Church was continued in the Millennial Star. In the Millennial Star, vol. 15, page 297, this statement appears:

This curse shall be upon them—the hand of the Lord shall be upon them, until they repent . . .

In the History of the Church, vol. 2, page 237, six words have been deleted so that it now reads:

The hand of the Lord shall be upon them, until they repent. . . .

In a letter from Alanson Ripley to Joseph Smith (Millennial Star, vol. 17, page 125) we read:

. . . it is like fire in my bones, and burns against your enemies to the bare hilt; and I never can be satisfied, while there is one of them to piss against a wall, . . .

In the History of the Church, vol. 3, page 313, this has been changed to read:

. . . it is like fire in my bones, and burns against your enemies, and I never can be satisfied, while there is one of them to stand against a wall, . . .

In the Millennial Star, vol. 19, page 38, Joseph Smith stated: “Attended to business in general; . . .” In the History of the Church, vol. 4, page 502, this was changed to read: “Attended to baptism in general; . . .”

In the Millennial Star, vol. 19, page 38, Joseph Smith said:

. . . placed the carpet given by Carlos Granger, on the floor of my office; case lots with the recorder, and spent the evening in general council . . .

In the History of the Church, vol. 4, page 503, five words were deleted: “. . . placed the carpet given by Carlos Granger on the floor of my office; and spent the evening in general council . . .”

In the History of the Church, vol. 5, page 67, 1,179 words have been deleted without any indication. These words are found in the Millennial Star, vol. 19, pages 598-600. The words which have been deleted contain the Phrenological Charts of Brigham Young and Heber C. Kimball. Phrenology is defined as “the theory that one’s mental powers are indicated by the shape of the skull” (The American College Dictionary). A phrenologist had examined the heads of several prominent Mormons in Nauvoo.

In the History of the Church, vol. 5, page 212, nineteen words have been deleted which were printed in the Millennial Star, vol. 20, page 263. These words are concerning Joseph Smith’s cure for the cholera: “Salt, vinegar, and pepper, given internally, and plunging into the river when the paroxysms begin, will cure the cholera.”

Some very important changes concerning the Apostle Orson Pratt have been made in Joseph Smith’s History. The Mormon writer T. Edgar Lyon claims that an incident concerning polygamy destroyed Orson Pratt’s chances of becoming President of the Mormon Church. At first Pratt had opposed Joseph Smith’s doctrine of polygamy, and for this offense he was supposed to have been excommunicated. T. Edgar Lyon states that because of his excommunication, Orson Pratt lost his seniority. Dr. Lyon goes on to explain that “Had he not lost his seniority, at the death of Brigham Young in 1877, he would have been next in line for the presidency of the Church” (“Orson Pratt—Early Mormon Leader,” M.A. Thesis, University of Chicago, June 1932, typed copy, page 30, n. 2). Strange as it may seem, however, Joseph Smith’s History, as it was originally published, seems to show that Orson Pratt was not legally cut off and that he was restored to his “former standing” in the quorum of the Twelve. When Joseph Smith’s History was later reprinted some very important changes were made concerning Orson Pratt’s trial and restoration to the quorum of the Twelve Apostles. At the bottom of the page is a comparison of the text as it appeared in the Millennial Star with the way it has been falsified in modern editions of the History of the Church.

It would appear from the way Joseph Smith’s History was first printed that Orson Pratt did not lose his seniority and that he should have become the third President of the Mormon Church. The changes in Joseph Smith’s History evidently were made to cover up this fact. John Taylor, who became the third President of the Mormon Church, was not ordained to the Apostleship until Dec. 1838. Orson Pratt had been ordained to that office more than three years before; therefore, if he was restored to his “former standing in the quorum of the Twelve Apostles,” he should have been the third President of the Church.

The Mormon writers Reed Durham and Steven H. Heath show that Orson Pratt was not stripped of his seniority until 1875:

Perhaps the most significant of all changes made in the development of seniority and successorship among the apostles during the later years of President Young’s administration occurred in Sanpete County in June, 1875.... President Young ruled...that, according to true principles of seniority, the two Orsons, Hyde and Pratt, were not in proper positions in the Quorum. Both of them had been excommunicated at one time and then, following genuine repentance, had been reinstated and brought back into the Quorum in the same positions they had held upon leaving....at this 1875 meeting these two apostles were removed from their places, their seniority was properly adjusted,... (Succession in the Church, pp. 73-74)

Chad J. Flake, Special Collections Librarian of Brigham Young University, made this statement:

. . . the two people next in succession to Brigham Young were Orson Hyde and Orson Pratt, both of whom Brigham distrusted. Therefore at the General Conference of October 1875, the Quorum was reshuffled so that these men were dropped in seniority. (BYU Studies, Summer 1971, p. 328)

It would appear, then, that Brigham Young deliberately destroyed Orson Pratt’s chance to become President of the Church, and that Joseph Smith’s History was changed to cover up the fact that Joseph Smith had restored Orson Pratt to “his former standing in the quorum of the Twelve Apostles, . . .”

In the Millennial Star, vol. 21, page 23, Joseph Smith made this statement: “Brother George A. Smith, I don’t know how I can help him to a living, but to go and preach, put on a long face, and make them doe over him.” When this was reprinted in the History of the Church, vol. 5, page 367, twelve words were deleted: “Brother George A. Smith, I don’t know how I can help him to a living, but to let him go and preach.”

In the History of the Church, vol. 5, page 416, 547 words have been deleted which were printed in the Millennial Star, vol. 21, page 187. This was an ordinance “to establish a ferry across the Mississippi river at the city of Nauvoo.” In section 1, it was stated:

Be it ordained by the City Council of the city of Nauvoo that Joseph Smith or his successor is authorized and licensed to keep a ferry for the term of perpetual succession across the Mississippi river . . .

In section 3 we read:

And be it further ordained that if any person or persons, except those whose ferry is established and confirmed by this ordinance, shall at any time run any boat or boats, or other craft, for the purpose of conveying passengers or their property across said river as aforesaid, within said boundaries as aforesaid, he, she, or they so offending shall forfeit every such boat or boats, or other craft, to the owner or proprietor of the ferry; . . .

In the Millennial Star, vol. 21, p. 188, Joseph Smith made this statement concerning Brigham Young:

He is, in the language of the Hebrews, Hawra-ang Yeesh Raw-ale—the friend of Israel, and worthy to be received and entertained as a man of God: yea, he has, as had the ancient Apostles, O Logos O Kalos—the good word, even the good word that leadeth unto eternal life. Laus Deus—Praise God!

When this was reprinted in the History of the Church, vol. 5, page 417, nineteen words were deleted:

He is the friend of Israel, and worthy to be received and entertained as a man of God; yea, he has, as had the ancient apostles, the good word, even the good word that leadeth unto eternal life.

In the Millennial Star, vol. 21, page 219, Joseph Smith said: “If any man attempts to refute what I am about to say, after I have made it plain, let him be accursed.” In the History of the Church, vol. 5, page 426, this was changed to read: “If any man attempts to refute what I am about to say, after I have made it plain, let him beware.”

In the report of Charles C. Rich (Millennial Star, vol. 21, p. 667) the following statement is made concerning a Mormon by the name of Jesse B. Nichols:

The son of Vulcan, however, took the dollar, but demanded more; upon which Nichols kicked the priest on his seat of honour, mounted his horse, and left, . . .

In the History of the Church, vol. 5, page 488, seven words were deleted:

The son of Vulcan, however, took the dollar, but demanded more; upon which Nichols mounted his horse and left, . . .

In the Millennial Star, vol. 21, page 762, Joseph Smith quotes this statement from the Illinois State Register: “An indictment was found against Smith for treason five years’ old.” In the History of the Church, vol. 5, page 514, two words have been deleted: “An indictment was found against Smith five years old.”

In the Millennial Star, vol. 22, page 153, Wilford Woodruff (who became the fourth President of the Mormon Church) is quoted as saying the following:

It [the Book of Mormon] also points out the establishing of this our own nation, with its progress, decline and fall, and those predictions . . .

In the History of the Church, vol. 6, p. 24, this was changed to read:

It [the Book of Mormon] also points out the establishing of this our own nation, with the conditions for its progress, and those predictions . . .

In the Millennial Star, vol. 22, page 182, Joseph Smith said: “I have been reduced to the necessity of opening my mansion as a hotel; . . .” In the History of the Church, vol. 6, page 33, this was changed to read: “I have been reduced to the necessity of opening ‘the Mansion’ as a hotel.”

In the Millennial Star, vol. 22, page 455, Joseph Smith said the following concerning the persecutions that the Mormons had received in Missouri: “. . . robbing them of all they possessed on earth, murdering hundreds . . .” In the History of the Church, vol. 6, page 115, this was changed to read: “. . . robbing them of all they possessed on earth, murdering scores . . .”

In the Millennial Star, vol. 22, page 455, Joseph Smith said:

While discussing the petition to Congress, I prophesied, by virtue of the holy Priesthood vested in me, and in the name of the Lord Jesus Christ, that, if Congress will not hear our petition and grant us protection, they shall be broken up as a government, and God shall damn them and there shall nothing be left of them—not even a grease spot.

When this was reprinted in the History of the Church, vol. 6, page 116, eighteen words were omitted:

While discussing the petition to Congress, I prophesied, by virtue of the holy Priesthood vested in me, and in the name of the Lord Jesus Christ, that, if Congress will not hear our petition and grant us protection, they shall be broken up as a government. ****

Notice that the comma after the word “government” was changed to a period to make it appear that the sentence was complete. It is very strange that the Mormon Historians would claim that Joseph Smith was a prophet and yet delete part of his prophecy.

In the Millennial Star, vol. 22, page 518, Joseph Smith made this statement concerning Orrin Porter Rockwell: “The following is his statement of his experience and sufferings by that accursed people: —” In the History of the Church, vol. 6, page 135, this was changed to read as follows: “The following is his statement of his experience and sufferings by that people: —”

Joseph Smith made this statement in a letter to John C. Calhoun (Millennial Star, vol. 22, p. 602): “. . . and rebellious niggers in the slave States, . . .” In the History of the Church, vol. 6, page 158, this was changed to read: “. . . and rebellious negroes in the slave States, . . .”

In the History of the Church, vol. 6, p. 248, 364 words have been deleted which were printed in the Millennial Star, vol. 23, pages 85-86. These words were concerning Joseph Smith’s attempt to repeal the hog law. Joseph Smith said that hogs and dogs should be allowed to run loose in the streets of Nauvoo. In this discussion he said:

Let the hogs run in the streets, and the people make good fences to secure their gardens.

Many physicians have given it as their opinion that a hog mud-hole in the streets is the most healthy of any place.

Hyrum Smith, Joseph Smith’s brother, was quoted as saying the following in the Millennial Star, vol. 23, page 231: “. . . we will get all the big souls out of all the nations, and we shall have the largest city in the world. It works just like a God.” In the History of the Church, vol. 6, page 300, the words “It works just like a God” have been deleted without any indication.

Joseph Smith was quoted as making this statement in the Millennial Star, vol. 23, page 246: “. . . you might just as well take the lives of other false teachers as that of mine, if I am false.” When this was reprinted in the History of the Church, vol. 6, page 304, four words were deleted: “. . . you might just as well take the lives of other false teachers as that of mine.”

In the Millennial Star, vol. 23, page 406, Joseph Smith quotes his brother Hyrum as saying: “There were Prophets before Adam, and Joseph has the spirit and power of all the Prophets.” In the History of the Church, vol. 6, page 346, the word “Adam” has been left out: “There were prophets before, but Joseph has the spirit and power of all the prophets.” It is interesting to note that in 1854 the Mormon Apostle Orson Hyde taught that “the world was peopled before the days of Adam, as much so as it was before the days of Noah . . .” (Journal of Discourses, vol. 2, p. 79). Joseph Fielding Smith, the tenth President of the Mormon Church, however, calls this a “false notion”: “. . . Adam was the first mortal on the earth; . . . Since Adam was the first man on the earth, that does away with the false notion that there were pre-Adamites” (Doctrines of Salvation, vol. 1, p. 78).

In the Millennial Star, vol. 23, page 406, Joseph Smith remarked: “. . . received a visit from L. R. Foster of New York, who gave me a gold pencil case, . . .” In the History of the Church, vol. 6, page 347, this was changed to read: “. . . received a visit from L. R. Foster of New York, who gave me a good pencil case, . . .”

In the order to the Sheriff in the case of Francis M. Higbee vs. Joseph Smith (Millennial Star, vol. 23, page 438) this statement appears:

“The Sheriff is directed to hold the within-named defendant to bail in the sum of five thousand dollars.”

In the History of the Church, vol. 6, page 360, this has been omitted without any indication.

In the Millennial Star, vol. 23, page 560, Joseph Smith said: “I was about home the rest of the day, and read in the Neighbor the report of my trial before the Municipal Court on the 8th inst.” When this was reprinted in the History of the Church, vol. 6, pages 379-380, it was changed to read: “I was about home the rest of the day and read in the Neighbor the report of the trial in the Municipal Court on the 8th inst.”

The last part of vol. 6 of the History of the Church was compiled by the Mormon Historian George A. Smith. This part deals with the “account of the arrest, imprisonment and martyrdom of President Joseph Smith.” In the Millennial Star, vol. 24, page 487, the following story concerning Joseph Smith's death is given:

. . . he fell outward into the hands of his murderers, exclaiming, “O Lord my God!” He fell partly on his right shoulder and back, his neck and head reaching the ground a little before his feet, and he rolled instantly on his face.

From this position he was taken by a man who was barefoot and bareheaded, and having on no coat, his pants rolled up above his knees, and his shirt sleeves above his elbows. He set Joseph against the south side of the well curb, which was situated a few feet from the jail, when Col. Levi Williams ordered four men to shoot him. They stood about eight feet from the curb, and fired simultaneously. A slight cringe of the body was all the indication of pain visible when the balls struck him, and he fell on his face.

The ruffian who set him against the well curb now gathered a bowie-knife for the purpose of severing his head from his body. He raised the knife, and was in the attitude of striking, when a light, so sudden and powerful, burst from the heavens upon the bloody scene (passing its vivid chain between Joseph and his murderers), that they were struck with terror. This light, in its appearance and potency, baffles all powers of description. The arm of the ruffian that held the knife fell powerless, the muskets of the four who fired fell to the ground, and they all stood like marble statues, not having the power to move a single limb of their bodies.

The retreat of the mob was as hurried and disorderly as it possibly could have been. Col. Williams hallooed to some who had just commenced their retreat to come back and help carry off the four men who fired, and who were still paralyzed. They came and carried them away by main strength to the baggage waggons, when they fled towards Warsaw.

Dr. Richards' escape was miraculous; . . . (Millennial Star, vol. 24, p. 487)

When this was reprinted in the History of the Church, vol. 6, pages 618- 619, 307 words were deleted:

. . . he fell outward into the hands of the murderers, exclaiming, “O Lord, my God!”

Dr. Richards' escape was miraculous; . . .

After telling of this change in our book, Changes in Joseph Smith's History, we made this statement: “Apparently the Mormon Historians felt that this story was too unbelievable; therefore it was deleted.” At the time we made this statement we did not realize that the Mormon Historian B. H. Roberts had repudiated this story in his Comprehensive History of the Church. (This is not to be confused with Joseph Smith's History mentioned above, which was edited by B. H. Roberts.) In the Comprehensive History of the Church, B. H. Roberts stated:

It was inevitable, perhaps, that something miraculous should be alleged as connected with the death of Joseph Smith; that both myth and legend, those parasites of truth, should attach themselves to the Prophet's career. . . . Hence we have the legend of the body dragged to a sitting posture by the old well curb by the Missouri ruffian . . . the effort to behead the Prophet by the same person; the flash of heavenly light from the clear sky that paralyzed the arm of the would-be mutilator of the dead; and also paralyzing four other persons detailed by Captain Levi Williams to shoot the Prophet after he was set up by the well curb—paralyzed so that they stood like marble statues having no power to move a single limb and had to be carried away in their helpless condition by their companions! . . . Of course this whole fabric of myth and legend comes from the story of Daniels and Brackenbury, and has, unfortunately, found its way into some of our otherwise acceptable church works, and still more unfortunately has entered into the beliefs of many Latter-day Saints.

. . . Ford says that Daniels was “afterwards expelled from the Mormons, but no doubt they will cling to his evidence in favor of the divine mission of the Prophet.” It was for the refutation of the governor's supposition that this paragraph, in part, is written. . . . the great, determining facts of “Mormonism” rest on no such questionable witnesses as Daniels and Brackenbury to alleged miraculous displays of divine power connected with the Prophet's death; . . .

Fortunately for the church; fortunately for the truth of history, the church placed on record at an early date, following the event an official declaration of the accepted facts and incidents attending upon the martyrdom of her two chiefest men and prophets [Doctrine and Covenants, sec. 135]; and it is with a deep satisfaction that one can note the absence of the myths and legends that ignorance and superstition would all too willingly attach to the tragedy of their martyrdom. (Comprehensive History of the Church, by B. H. Roberts, vol. 2, pp. 332-334)

It is interesting to note that B. H. Roberts called this story a myth in his Comprehensive History, and yet it appeared in the History of the Church as it was first published by the church leaders—it was removed in the 1902 edition. The reason that B. H. Roberts did not mention that this story was once in the history and later deleted is obvious: if he had mentioned this fact, it would have cast a shadow of doubt upon the entire history, for if George A. Smith (who was the Church Historian at the time this story was put in the history) included “myth and legend” in the history at this point, how do we know that other parts of the history are accurate? Perhaps the whole history could be filled with “myths and legends.”

While the Mormon historian B. H. Roberts felt that the fantastic story concerning Joseph Smith's death was only “myth and legend,” the early Mormons certainly believed it. Besides being included in Joseph Smith's History, it was preached from the pulpit in Utah. Speaking in the Tabernacle on January 3, 1858, the Mormon Apostle Orson Hyde stated:

Did Joseph Smith overcome, even unto death? Yes. . . . When they were about to cut off his head, behold, the power of the Almighty came down, and the men stood as it were like marble statues: they could not move, but stood there like Lot's wife—not pillars of salt, but pillars of petrified corruption. The power of the Almighty came down with the vivid glare of lightning's flash, and they had no power to take his head off. Was God with him? Yes. Was his death glorious? Yes. (Journal of Discourses, vol. 6, p. 154)

Conclusion

We do not have room to go into a detailed study of the changes which the Mormon leaders have made in Joseph Smith's History. Some of the more important changes are discussed in other chapters of this book.

In the book, Changes in Joseph Smith's History, we said that "more than 62,000 words" were either added or deleted. A thorough examination of the original handwritten manuscripts would probably reveal that there have been many more words added or deleted. More important than this, however, is the evidence we uncovered that Joseph Smith did not finish his work. This evidence certainly casts a shadow of doubt upon the History of the Church. Only a small part of Joseph Smith's History was published during his lifetime; therefore, the greater part of the History of the Church stands on a very shaky foundation. We have shown that Dean C. Jessee, of the Church Historian's Office, admits that Joseph Smith's History was not completed until after his death. We must commend Mr. Jessee for his article on Joseph Smith's History. It is certainly one of the most honest and scholarly articles that has ever appeared in a Mormon publication. It is deplorable, however, that the Mormon leaders have not allowed such a study to appear before. For years we have maintained that Joseph Smith's History has been changed and that it was not completed until after his death. The Mormon leaders, however, have denied that any changes were made and have continued to suppress the original manuscripts. Now that the truth has become publicly known they have allowed Dean C. Jessee to publish his articles. This is certainly a step in the right direction, but it should be followed by the release of all the documents and journals used in compiling Joseph Smith's History.

The Mormon leaders must face the serious implications of this whole matter. Less than 40% of the history attributed to Joseph Smith was written during his lifetime, and this portion has had serious changes made in it. The remaining portion—more than 60% of the history—was not even compiled until after Joseph Smith's death. Since it was compiled by men who believed in falsification and deceit, it cannot be trusted as a reliable history of Joseph Smith.

The new evidence concerning the changes in Joseph Smith's History is already beginning to have an effect on some of the Mormon scholars. Davis Bitton, who recently became an Assistant Church Historian, made these interesting statements in an article published in Dialogue: A Journal of Mormon Thought:

In discussing his [B. H. Roberts'] use of primary sources we must here say something about his edition of Joseph Smith's documentary History of the Church (the DHC). . . . To be sure, the multi-volume DHC is an immensely useful tool for anyone studying the early history of Mormonism. . . . What, then, is the problem? Why cannot the DHC be put forth proudly as an example of Roberts' historical scholarship?

To answer this question we must recall that Joseph Smith's History had been published, in whole or in part, three times before. . . . the idea of publishing the entire work in a new critical edition was an excellent one. But to achieve its purpose such a work should have been scrupulously accurate. It should have gone back to the original manuscript copy whenever possible, making "corrections" or comments in footnotes, where they would clearly be the responsibility of the editor. Variant readings should have been noted in the same way. Admittedly, such a procedure would have required organization, infinite care, and several years of time, but the results—as witness the monumental edition of Jefferson papers now being published—would have allowed later historians to use the compilation with confidence.

Measured against such a standard the DHC does not come off well. It does contain some editorial annotation, some comparing of different sources. But the basic text itself has not been treated with proper respect. When we compare the DHC with the earlier published versions, in fact, we discover that hundreds of changes have been made. These include deletions, additions, and simple changes of wording. . . .

True, Roberts was not himself the originator of all the changes in the text; some of the "corrections" may well have been the work of Joseph Smith himself, and others were quite clearly the work of clerks and appointed "historians" who began the rewriting of Mormon history long before Roberts appeared on the scene. But whether he was hindered by censorship, by the lack of time, or by lack of familiarity with editorial standards, he did allow his name to be used on the title page. And he would not, I think, be proud of the fact that for researchers in early Mormon history Rule Number One is "Do not rely on the DHC; never use a quotation from it without comparing the earlier versions." (Dialogue: A Journal of Mormon Thought, Winter 1968, pp. 30-32)

The Mormon writer Samuel W. Taylor made these comments concerning Joseph Smith's History:

This work, known as the "Documentary" history, is a rich vein that must be mined with care. The prophet was not so much interested in history as in establishing a church. Vital facts are omitted. . . .

Also, this work has been "corrected" by many hands, making corroboration from original sources necessary. Jerald and Sandra Tanner, in their Changes in Joseph Smith's History, detail "More than 62,000 words added or deleted" in the first six volumes. Even so, the Tanners overlooked some changes, a notable example being alteration of the conference minutes of October, 1843, concerning Sidney Rigdon. A comparison of the minutes as originally published in the Times and Seasons (4:330), and as revised in the DHC (6:47), will reveal exactly opposite accounts of what happened. (Nightfall at Nauvoo, New York, 1971, p. 383)

Original Manuscripts Cast Even More Doubt on Joseph Smith's History

On page 128 of this book we indicated that a microfilm copy of the original handwritten manuscript of Joseph Smith's History of the Church, Book A-1, was given to us (this film also includes part of B-1). Some time after publishing Mormonism—Shadow or Reality? we became aware of the fact that the Reorganized Church of Jesus Christ of Latter Day Saints had traded microfilm copies of documents with the Mormon Church and they had films of all of the original handwritten manuscripts of Joseph Smith's History. Although we live within two miles of the Historical Department of the Mormon Church, its restrictive policy forced us to travel to Independence, Missouri, the location of the headquarters of the RLDS Church, to see the Joseph Smith collection. We had only a few days to examine the documents, but a preliminary examination clearly reveals the duplicity of the early Mormon historians. Now that we have had a brief look at the entire manuscript of Joseph Smith's History—i.e., books A-1 through F-1—we must conclude that the history is in a deplorable state. Thousands of words—sometimes entire pages—have been crossed out so that they could be deleted from the printed version. On the other hand, the films show that many pages of material were interpolated after Joseph Smith's death.

Joseph Smith's Diaries Discredit History

Since we now know that more than sixty percent of Joseph Smith's History of the Church was not compiled until after his death, the question arises as to what sources Mormon historians used to create the purported history. We know that they used newspapers and journals of other Mormon leaders and that much of the material came only from memory. It was, of course, written in the first person to make it appear that Joseph Smith was the author. We have always felt that Joseph Smith's private diaries were used in preparing the history, but we were denied access to them. Finally, in August, 1976, we were able to examine microfilm copies of these diaries; therefore, we are able to make some preliminary observations concerning them.

The first thing we notice is that there are large periods of Joseph Smith's life that are not covered by extant diaries—unless the Mormon leaders are still suppressing some of his diaries. According to the information furnished in the Register of the Joseph Smith Collection in the Church Archives, The Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints, only a small percentage of Joseph Smith's thirty-eight years are covered by his diaries. As we indicated earlier, at the time of Joseph Smith's death, his History of the Church had only been completed to August 5, 1838. Since Smith died in June, 1844, this left a period of almost six years which the Mormon historians had to fill in from Joseph Smith's diaries and other sources. Now, there are a few brief diaries from 1838 and 1839, but for the next three years there are no extant diaries. The last period of Joseph Smith's life, December 21, 1842—June 22, 1844, is covered by four diaries. If there were other diaries they were either lost, destroyed or suppressed. However this may be, only three of the last six years of Joseph Smith's lifetime as it appears in the History of the Church can be checked against his diaries.

Unfortunately, these diaries do not contain the important information that we would expect to find about Joseph Smith's life. Many pages are left blank or only contain information on the weather or other trivial matters. The value of the diaries decreases even more when we learn that a large part of the entries were not written in the first person, but rather by Joseph Smith's scribe Willard Richards. For instance, under the date October 20, 1843, we read this entry in Joseph Smith's diary: "heard that Joseph went to Ramus yesterday has not returned." In the Register of the Joseph Smith Collection, page 4, Jeffery O. Johnson admitted that "Joseph Smith himself kept very little in his own hand. Under Joseph's direction, for example, Willard Richards wrote many of the daily entries in the prophet's journal, relating experiences they both shared in many cases, but this was done in the words as well as in the hand of the clerk."

Our brief examination of the diaries reveals that although they were used as one source for Joseph Smith's history, there was no attempt to follow them faithfully. Mormon leaders chose only the portions of the journals which served their purposes. For instance, in his diary Joseph Smith related a dream and its interpretation which tended to discredit his famous prophecy about the Civil War. This material was simply omitted in Joseph Smith's History. We will have more to say about this matter in the updated material for the chapter on false prophecy.

On pages 6-7 of this book we show that Joseph Smith frequently broke the Word of Wisdom—i.e., a revelation which forbids the use of tea, coffee, tobacco or alcoholic beverages (see Doctrine and Covenants, Section 89). The anonymous Mormon historian, who we refer to as Dr. Clandestine, was unable to refute our evidence and had to admit that Joseph Smith had an "occasional glass of beer or wine" (Jerald and Sandra Tanner's Distorted View of Mormonism, p. 9, n. 2). On page 7 of the same booklet, he speaks of "Joseph Smith's polygamy, smoking and drinking, . . ." He maintains, however, that the Mormon leaders have not tried to suppress the fact that Smith broke the Word of Wisdom. In Answering Dr. Clandestine, pages 28-29, we prove beyond any doubt that there was a deliberate cover-up on this matter. Joseph Smith's diaries provide additional evidence concerning his disregard for the Word of Wisdom and the attempt to cover-up the matter in the History of the Church. Under the date of January 20, 1843, the following was recorded in Joseph Smith's Diary:

Elder Hyde told of the excellent white wine he drank in the east. Joseph prophesied in the name of the Lord—that he would drink wine with him in that country.

These words were completely suppressed in the printed History of the Church.

The Mormon Church forbids the use of tea, but according to Joseph Smith's Diary, March 11, 1843, Smith was fond of strong tea:

...in the office Joseph said he had tea with his breakfast. his wife asked him if [it] was good. he said if it was a little stronger he should like it better, when Mother Granger remarked, "It is so strong, and good, I should think it would answer Both for drink, and food."

This was entirely omitted in the History of the Church (see vol. 5, p. 302).

Another statement which was probably embarrassing to the Mormon leaders appeared in Joseph Smith's Diary under the date of May 19, 1844: "eve I talked a long time in the bar Room . . ." In the History of the Church, vol. 6, page 398, this has been modified to read: "In the evening I talked to the brethren at my house, . . ."

In chapter 18 of this book, we show that on many occasions the Mormon leaders emphatically denied polygamy at the very time they were living in it. Some of Joseph and Hyrum Smith's denials were so embarrassing to later Mormon leaders that they were altered in the History of the Church. Since publishing this book, we have learned that a statement in Joseph Smith's History which sanctions plural marriage was actually a condemnation of the practice before it was falsified. This statement was used by Joseph Fielding Smith, who later became the tenth president of the Mormon Church, in rebuttal to a member of the Reorganized LDS Church who claimed that Joseph Smith never endorsed the doctrine of plurality of wives:

Whether any such statement was ever printed in his lifetime or not I am not prepared to say. But I do know of such evidence being recorded during his lifetime, for I have seen it.

I have copied the following from the Prophet's manuscript record of Oct. 5, 1843, and know it is genuine:

Gave instructions to try those persons who were preaching, teaching or practicing the doctrine of plurality of wives; for according to the law, I hold the keys of this power in the last days; for there is never but one on earth at a time on whom this power and its keys are conferred; and I have constantly said no man shall have but one wife at a time unless the Lord directs otherwise.

(Blood Atonement and the Origin of Plural Marriage, by Joseph Fielding Smith, p. 55)

When Joseph Fielding Smith speaks of "the Prophet's manuscript record" he is, of course, referring to the handwritten manuscript of the History of the Church. The same reference is printed in the History of the Church, vol. 6, page 46.

Now that we know that Joseph Smith's History was not finished until after his death, it is obvious that it could not have been "recorded during his lifetime" as Joseph Fielding Smith claimed. According to a chart in Dean Jessee's article in Brigham Young University Studies, Summer 1971, p. 441, this material was not written until sometime between November 1854 and August 1855, which is about ten years after Smith's death. In our research in Joseph Smith's diaries we found that the entry in the manuscript record and the History of the Church is based on a statement recorded in Joseph Smith's diary. When we compare the two, however, we find that the statement has been falsified so that the meaning is entirely changed. In Joseph Smith's diary the statement flatly condemns polygamy and no exceptions are made for its practice:

. . . gave instructions to try those who were preaching teaching or practicing the doctrine of plurality of wives or this law—Joseph forbids it. and the practice thereof. No man shall have but one wife (Joseph Smith Diary, Oct. 5, 1843, Church Historical Department)

The reader will notice how this has been changed in the History of the Church to make it appear that Joseph Smith has the "keys of power" to perform plural marriages if the Lord "directs otherwise":

Gave instructions to try those persons who were preaching, teaching or practicing the doctrine of plurality of wives; for according to the law, I hold the keys of this power in the last days; for there is never but one on earth at a time on whom this power and its keys are conferred; and I have constantly said no man shall have but one wife at a time unless the Lord directs otherwise. (History of the Church, vol. 6, p. 46)

Our preliminary study of the diaries of Joseph Smith leads us to the conclusion that they were used as a source for the History of the Church. Unfortunately, however, there was no attempt to accurately follow the text of the diaries. Mormon leaders used only the parts that suited their purposes. Where a portion did not say what they wanted, they altered it or ignored it completely, sometimes using an entirely different source. The diaries of Joseph Smith, then, tend only to deal another heavy blow to the credibility of Joseph Smith's History of the Church. No wonder Mormon leaders suppressed these diaries for so long.

Jessee's Statement on ABC Notes Confirmed

On page 136 of this book we quote Dean C. Jessee as saying that the ABC notes were written in 1842 before Joseph Smith's death. Michael Marquardt has recently confirmed the fact that Willard Richards spoke of these notes in his diary. With this information in mind, we again ask the question, "If Joseph Smith really dictated these notes, why was Note A never added to his History?" As we pointed out earlier, this note (containing over 600 words) deals with Joseph Smith's leg operation and other troubles and persecutions he was supposed to have suffered in his youth.

Further Light on Rocky Mountain Prophecy

On pages 133-135 of this book we show that the famous Rocky Mountain Prophecy is an interpolation in Joseph Smith's History. We have recently found new evidence which further undermines the authenticity of this prophecy. Fortunately, in 1845 Brigham Young had ordered the scribes to make a "duplicate handwritten copy of the History" (Brigham Young University Studies, Summer 1971, p. 469). In 1976 we examined this second manuscript, Book D-2, page 2, and found that the "Rocky Mountain Prophecy" was written in very small handwriting between the lines. In other words, it was obviously added at a later time to this manuscript.

The situation, then boils down to the following: we have two handwritten manuscripts, books D-1 and D-2. Neither of these books were even started until after Joseph Smith's death. In both cases the prophecy concerning the Mormons coming to the Rocky Mountains was interpolated in a smaller handwriting. From this evidence we can reach only one conclusion: the famous "Rocky Mountain Prophecy" is not authentic. The Church Historical Department has Joseph Smith's diary for 1842-43, but the first entry does not appear until December 21—some four months after the prophecy was supposed to have been given. Mormon scholars have been unable to come up with anything to support the authenticity of this prophecy. Assistant Church Historian Davis Bitton has written almost five pages concerning this matter. He frankly states that "There is no such prophecy in the handwriting of Joseph Smith or published during the Prophet's lifetime, but it was referred to in general terms in 1846 during the trek west. After the arrival in the Salt Lake Valley the prophecy was frequently cited and became more specific as time went on" ("Joseph Smith in the Mormon Folk Memory," The John Whitmer address, delivered at the Second Annual Meeting of the John Whitmer Historical Association, Lamoni, Iowa, September 28, 1974, unpublished manuscript, p. 16).

Davis Bitton goes on to state that "The manuscript history covering this period was written in 1845. . . ." This is, of course, a year after Joseph Smith's death. Mr. Bitton then admits that the prophecy is an "insertion" which was added into the manuscript as "an afterthought" (p. 18). Although Davis Bitton cannot find any real evidence that Joseph Smith made the famous "Rocky Mountain Prophecy," he does feel that there was "a time when something like this might have been said by Joseph Smith with considerable plausibility. Anytime during the last four years of his life, . . . the Prophet had good reason to consider possibilities for relocation. It can be demonstrated that he considered the possibility of settling in Oregon (or on Vancouver Island). He was attempting to negotiate some kind of colonization venture in Texas. . . ." (p. 17).

Mr. Bitton admits that other changes were made in Joseph Smith's documents to support the idea that he knew the Mormons would come to the Rocky Mountains:

And in February 1844 the Prophet was organizing an exploring expedition to go to the West. There are some interesting changes in the way the description of this expedition was written by Willard Richards, secretary of Joseph Smith at the time, and the later revisions. The original, handwritten version reads: "Met with the Twelve in the assembly room concerning the Oregon Expedition." This has been modified to read "the Oregon and California Exploring Expedition." Continuing, the Richards manuscript reads, "I told them I wanted an exposition of all that country,"—which has been changed to “exploration of all that mountain country.” There are other changes that make one suspect that the later compilers of the history, notably George A. Smith and his assistants in the 1850s, were determined to have Joseph Smith contemplating the precise location where the Saints had by then settled. Oregon would not do; Oregon and California as then defined at least included the Rocky Mountains. If the Prophet could be made to say “mountain country” instead of just “country,” it would appear that he clearly had in mind the future history of his followers (pp. 17-18).

The anonymous Mormon Historian attempted to answer our work on the Rocky Mountain Prophecy, but in Answering Dr. Clandestine: A Response to the Anonymous LDS Historian, pages 29-30, we show that his argument is unsound. It is interesting to note that “Dr. Clandestine” was forced to admit that the source of Joseph Smith’s Rocky Mountain Prophecy “is not clear”:

The Tanners are aware that the History of the Church was compiled from a variety of sources (many of which were only loaned to Church historians, to be returned once they had extracted pertinent information), and that the exact source for the account of Joseph Smith’s prophecy of August 6, 1842 is not clear. (Jerald and Sandra Tanner’s Distorted View of Mormonism: A Response to Mormonism—Shadow or Reality? p. 15)

Prior to the time we published our work on Joseph Smith’s History, Mormon historians claimed that Joseph Smith himself authored the prophecy. Now, however, it is conceded that the source “is not clear.”

More on Nephi–Moroni Change

On pages 136-37 of this book we discussed how the name of the angel who appeared in Joseph Smith’s room was changed from Nephi to Moroni. We indicated that this change must have been made after Smith’s death. In 1976 we were able to examine the duplicate copy of the handwritten manuscript, Book A-2. This manuscript provides additional evidence that the change was not made during Joseph Smith’s lifetime. This manuscript, in fact, was not even started until about a year after Smith’s death. Like the other manuscript (Book A-1), it has the name “Nephi” with the name “Moroni” interpolated above the line.

Mormon Historians Backing Away From Joseph Smith’s History

At one time it would have been almost heresy for a Mormon writer to openly criticize Joseph Smith’s History of the Church. As the evidence against the History has continued to mount, however, some of the top scholars have begun to voice their discontent. We have already quoted Dean C. Jessee of the Church Historical Department, as making some astonishing admissions about the History. In an article published in 1976, Jessee had to admit that there have been “numerous alterations, discrepancies, editorial irregularities, and other variations that appear suspicious in an age of precise literary style and historical method.” (Journal of Mormon History, vol. 3, 1976, p. 23)

On page 37 of the same article, Jessee commented:

The format gives the impression that the history was written personally by Joseph Smith. A study of original documents, however, shows that much of its content was not the actual product of the Prophet’s own mind, even though he was the architect of its form. And while it may appear trivial to distinguish the parts of Joseph Smith’s writings actually authored by himself from those farmed out to his clerks, the biographer whose contact with the mind of his subject is indispensable finds this distinction of paramount importance. One notes a marked difference in style between those entries in the History that reflect Joseph Smith’s own thought and those that are the creation of his scribes. . . .

To further complicate the question of authorship, since Joseph Smith’s diary did not provide an unbroken narrative of his life, gaps were bridged by using other sources, changing indirect discourse to direct as if Joseph had done the writing himself. . . . by transferring other people’s words and thoughts to Joseph Smith, this editorial method produced a distorting effect for those who would study his personality from his personal writings.

Marvin S. Hill, of the church’s Brigham Young University, has now admitted that “large portions” of Joseph Smith’s History were not written by him:

One reason that Brodie concluded that Joseph had veiled his personality behind a “perpetual flow of words” in his history may be that she assumed he had actually dictated most of it. We now know that large portions of that history were not dictated but were written by scribes and later transferred into the first person to read as though the words were Joseph’s. That fact makes what few things Joseph Smith wrote himself of great significance. (Dialogue: A Journal of Mormon Thought, Winter 1972, p. 76)

In 1979 Leland Nelson brought out a publication entitled, The Journal of Joseph: The Personal Diary of a Modern Prophet by Joseph Smith, Jr. While Mr. Nelson claimed that he was publishing excerpts from Joseph Smith’s diary, it soon became apparent to scholars that he had only taken extracts from the published History of the Church. Howard C. Searle, a Mormon scholar from the Salt Lake Institute of Religion, accused Nelson of publishing a “misleading” book:

Leland Nelson has compiled an interesting narrative of first-person passages from the History of the Church in an attempt to expand the familiar “Joseph Smith Story” into an entire volume. In doing this he has included a great deal of material that was not authored by Joseph Smith at all. In spite of this fact, he claims on the dust cover and in the introduction that “this book is exactly what the title says it is—the personal journal or diary of Joseph Smith Junior.” . . . the Journal of Joseph is not taken directly from Joseph Smith’s diaries but from material written by scribes and the Church Historians for the Church annals. . . . what is in the book has been grossly misrepresented in newspaper ads, radio spot commercials, and the introduction to the book. . . .

Anyone familiar with the methodology involved in the compilation of the History of the Church will recognize that one of its main problems is the confused and misleading authorship. To quote reliably from this source, one should first answer two questions: (1) Who wrote the original source? and (2) How has it been edited for publication? Had Mr. Nelson pursued these questions, he would have immediately discovered that many of the first-person passages which he has quoted in Joseph’s personal writings are neither the Prophet’s personal writings nor even his dictations. . . . Many diary entries by the scribes were only brief, incomplete notes—some in the third person—that had to be deciphered and filled out by the later compilers of the Church annals. Much of this editing was done after the original writers and the Prophet were dead. Such material would hardly qualify as verbatim dictation. . . . In terms of pages in the original manuscript history, only thirty-five percent had been written up to the time of the Prophet’s death, and none of this was in his own handwriting. . . .

Although Willard Richards had proceeded with the history after the Prophet’s death, he continued the first-person narrative that characterized the Prophet’s early dictation. . . . Having been called as the Prophet’s “private Sect. and Historian,” Elder Richards apparently felt that he had the necessary investiture of authority to permit him to write for, and as if he were, the Prophet Joseph Smith. Throughout the compilation of the history, Elder Richards, as well as the later writers, stuck devotedly to the first-person style commenced by the Prophet. The notes of Elder Richards and other scribes in the Prophet’s diaries were filled out in accordance with this format, but this was not the only material that was modified for amalgamation into the first-person narrative of the history. . . . Comparison of these sources with the History of the Church reveals that passages from many of them were converted into first-person accounts of Joseph Smith, and although such passages appear to be the direct discourse or writing of the Prophet, they are really the composition of others. . . . Brigham continued the practice of allowing clerks to write in the first person for Joseph until it was finished in 1857. . . .

After the deaths of the original compilers of the history, there was a tendency in the Church to forget or ignore the methodology of the early scribes and Church historians who wrote it and to attribute all of the first-person material in the history to Joseph Smith himself. . . . Whether by ignorance or design, Elder Pratt’s successors in the Historian’s Office apparently said nothing about the methodology involved in compiling the early History of the Church, and by the end of the nineteenth century it was frequently assumed that all the history had been written or dictated by the Prophet.

By the turn of the century the project of publishing the entire history in accessible book form was undertaken by George Q. Cannon, a member of the First Presidency. In an unpublished preface, he asserted that the history “was written by the Prophet himself or under his own direction during his lifetime.” . . . In less than fifty years from the time the history was completed, the methods involved in its compilation were either obscured or ignored to the point that it was commonly assumed the history was the personal writing or dictation of the Prophet. In spite of several recent articles on the subject, nothing has significantly modified this belief as far as the general Church membership is concerned. (Brigham Young University Studies, Winter 1981, pp. 101, 102, 105, 109, 111, 114, 116, 117, 119, 120)

Although it is true that the publication Journal of Joseph is a “misleading” book which has been “grossly misrepresented,” we feel that the main responsibility for the appearance of such a book rests on the shoulders of the General Authorities of the church. As early as 1965 we pointed out that there were serious changes in the History of the Church and that there was reason to believe a large portion of it was not really written by Joseph Smith. In 1971 Dean C. Jessee, the church’s own scholar who worked in the Historical Department, confirmed that over sixty percent of the History was not compiled during Smith’s lifetime! Since that time the church leaders have done nothing to dispel the myth concerning Joseph Smith’s authorship. They have, in fact, continued to perpetuate the false idea that he was the author. The 1978 printing of the History of the Church still has this statement on the title page: “History of Joseph Smith, the Prophet by Himself.” If the Journal of Joseph is “misleading” and “grossly misrepresented,” what can we say about the History of the Church which the Mormon leaders continue to publish in the face of all the evidence? Howard C. Searle seems willing to admit that the root of the problem lies with the church and even suggests that the church publish an honest version of the History of the Church:

The History of the Church in its present form was edited by B. H. Roberts, . . . although Elder Roberts made significant contributions to the history through his editing, he also created many problems. His most serious shortcoming was that he did not come to grips with the question of the history’s authorship nor the methodology associated with its original compilation. He not only perpetuated the myth that the entire narrative was the Prophet’s own writing or words, but he also made additions and deletions right in the text, without any annotation, as if these too were the product of the Prophet’s own mind. In doing this, he corrupted the text as he tried to correct it and actually widened the gap between the real Joseph Smith and what was being published as his personal writing. If Joseph Smith’s declaration that “no man knows my history,” were true in his own lifetime, it was even more true after Roberts’s revisions, for the Prophet’s actual personality, character, and style were further obscured by an often misleading editorial screen. . . . Elder Roberts’s editorial work is at best incomplete and at worst misleading. . . . The great value of this enduring work should justify a painstaking and forthright re-editing, which would identify the history’s authors and sources and would prevent the publication and popularity of such misleading books as the Journal of Joseph. . . . It could be argued that the history is reliable regardless of its authorship, but this in no way justifies representing quotations from its contents as the personal compositions of the Prophet, when they are actually the work of other men. (Ibid., pages 120-122)

It is certainly refreshing to find a scholarly and honest article like Mr. Searle’s in a journal published by the church’s own Brigham Young University. In any case, even though the General Authorities of the church continue to print the falsified edition of Joseph Smith’s History, the church’s top scholars are coming out against it. Even the anonymous Mormon historian (Dr. Clandestine) has had to concede that our charges are true:

They criticize the fact that deletions and additions were introduced into the original texts without acknowledgments in the printed history, that Joseph Smith’s autobiographical “History” was written in large part after his death by clerks and “historians” who transformed third-person accounts by others than Joseph Smith into first-person autobiography of Joseph Smith, and that between the first serialized publication of the history (1840s–1860s) and the seven-volume edition of the History of the Church in the twentieth century, there have been thousands of deletions and additions not noted in the text or footnotes. This is certainly all true, and as an historian I regret the confusion that such editorial practices have caused. (Jerald and Sandra Tanner’s Distorted View of Mormonism: A Response to Mormonism—Shadow or Reality? p. 42)

Dr. Clandestine would try to excuse all this by saying that “until quite recently official LDS history was written by men (often of limited education) who were not trained in methods of editing and history.” Now, while the early Mormons may not have been trained in “methods of editing and history,” they certainly knew enough to criticize their enemies when they broke the rules. We feel, therefore, that Dr. Clandestine’s explanation for the falsification is a very poor excuse. Even if a person could accept this excuse concerning the early Mormon leaders, it would not explain why the present-day leaders of the Church continue to print the work as the “History of Joseph Smith, the Prophet by Himself.”

8. The First Vision

The Mormon Apostle LeGrand Richards made this statement:

On the morning of a beautiful spring day in 1820 there occurred one of the most important and momentous events in this world's history. God, the Eternal Father and His Son, Jesus Christ, appeared to Joseph Smith and gave instructions concerning the establishment of the kingdom of God upon the earth in these latter days. (A Marvelous Work and a Wonder, 1966, p. 7)

Joseph Smith published his story in the Mormon publication Times and Seasons in 1842. The following is the description of the vision as written by Joseph Smith:

So in accordance with my determination, to ask of God, I retired to the woods to make the attempt. It was on the morning of a beautiful clear day, early in the spring of eighteen hundred and twenty. . . . I saw a pillar of light exactly over my head, . . . When the light rested upon me I saw two personages (whose brightness and glory defy all description) standing above me in the air. One of them spoke unto me, calling me by name, and said, (pointing to the other.) "This is my beloved Son, hear him."

. . . I asked the personages who stood above me in the light, which of all the sects was right, . . . I was answered that I must join none of them, for they were all wrong, and the personage who addressed me said that all their creeds were an abomination in his sight; that those professors were all corrupt, . . . He again forbade me to join with any of them: and many other things did he say unto me which I cannot write at this time. (Times and Seasons, vol. 3, pp. 728, 748)

This story is now published in the Pearl of Great Price and is accepted as scripture by the Mormon people. The Mormon Apostle John A. Widtsoe made this comment concerning Joseph Smith's First Vision:

The First Vision of 1820 is of first importance in the history of Joseph Smith. Upon its reality rest the truth and value of his subsequent work.

Professed enemies of Joseph Smith and his work, have felt themselves helpless in their efforts to destroy the reality of the First Vision and have said little about it. (Joseph Smith—Seeker After Truth, p. 19)

James B. Allen, of Brigham Young University, said that "Belief in the vision is one of the fundamentals to which faithful members give assent. Its importance is second only to belief in the divinity of Jesus of Nazareth. The story is an essential part of the first lesson given by Mormon missionaries to prospective converts, and its acceptance is necessary before baptism" (Dialogue: A Journal of Mormon Thought, Autumn, 1966, p. 29).

Vision Criticized

Fawn M. Brodie was one of the first to cast serious doubt upon the authenticity of Joseph Smith's story of the First Vision:

The description of the vision was first published by Orson Pratt in his Remarkable Visions in 1840, twenty years after it was supposed to have occurred. Between 1820 and 1840 Joseph's friends were writing long panegyrics; his enemies were defaming him in an unceasing stream of affidavits and pamphlets, and Joseph himself was dictating several volumes of Bible-flavored prose. But no one in this long period even intimated that he had heard the story of the two gods. At least, no such intimation has survived in print or manuscript. . . . The first published Mormon history, begun with Joseph's collaboration in 1834 by Oliver Cowdery, ignored it altogether, . . . Joseph's own description of the first vision was not published until 1842, twenty-two years after the memorable event. . . .

If something happened that spring morning in 1820, it passed totally unnoticed in Joseph's home town, and apparently did not even fix itself in the minds of members of his own family. The awesome vision he described in later years may have been the elaboration of some half-remembered dream stimulated by the early revival excitement and reinforced by the rich folklore of visions circulating in his neighborhood. Or it may have been sheer invention, created some time after 1834 when the need arose for a magnificent tradition to cancel out the stories of his fortune-telling and money-digging. (No Man Knows My History, New York, 1957, pp. 24-25)

Dr. Hugh Nibley, of Brigham Young University, was very disturbed with Mrs. Brodie's statements, but he admitted that Joseph Smith did not publish the story until 1842:

Joseph Smith's "official" account of his first vision and the visits of the angel Moroni was written in 1838 and first published in the Times and Seasons in 1842. (Improvement Era, July 1961, p. 490)

Dr. Nibley claims that Joseph Smith tried to keep the First Vision a secret. In a letter to us, dated March 8, 1961, he stated:

The Prophet did not like to talk about the first vision and those to whom he told the story kept it to themselves. It was only when inevitable leaks led to all sorts of irresponsible reports that he was "induced" to publish an official version.

In the Improvement Era for July, 1961, page 522, Dr. Nibley stated:

But, one may ask, why should Joseph Smith have waited so long to tell his story officially? From his own explanation it is apparent that he would not have told it publicly at all had he not been "induced" to do so by all the scandal stories that were circulating.

Dr. Nibley's argument that Joseph Smith kept the vision secret is in direct contradiction to Joseph Smith's own story. Smith stated that he was persecuted because he told this story and would not deny it:

I soon found, however, that my telling the story had excited a great deal of prejudice against me among professors of religion, and was the cause of great persecution, which continued to increase; and though I was an obscure boy, only between fourteen and fifteen years of age, and my circumstances in life such as to make a boy of no consequence in the world, yet men of high standing would take notice sufficient to excite the public mind against me, and create a bitter persecution; and this was common among all the sects—all united to persecute me. . . . though I was hated and persecuted for saying that I had seen a vision, yet it was true; and while they were persecuting me, reviling me, and speaking all manner of evil against me falsely for so saying, I was led to say in my heart: Why persecute me for telling the truth? . . . For I had seen a vision; I knew it, and I knew that God knew it, and I could not deny it, neither dared I do it: . . . (Pearl of Great Price, Joseph Smith 2:22, 25)

Before Mormon scholars were forced to claim that Joseph Smith kept the vision a secret, the Mormon Apostle John A. Widtsoe stated:

Whether the story of the first vision existed in written form in the early days of the Church is not known. Many manuscripts of that time have been lost. In some cases, secretaries deliberately carried Church records away from Church possession. But even were they all available, minutes of meetings as they are usually kept might seldom mention the first vision, for familiar and repeated things are often not recorded because they are taken for granted. (Evidence and Reconciliations, 1960, p. 334)

Perhaps one of the most damaging evidences that Joseph Smith did not see the Father and the Son in 1820, to those who believe in the restoration of the Priesthood, is the fact that in the year 1832 Joseph Smith claimed to have a revelation which stated that a man could not see God without the priesthood. This revelation is published as Section 84 of the Doctrine and Covenants. In verses 21-22 we read:

And without the ordinances thereof, and the authority of the priesthood, the power of godliness is not manifest unto men in the flesh;

For without this no man can see the face of God, even the Father, and live.

In 1841 the Mormon Apostle Parley P. Pratt stated:

The truth is this: that without the priesthood of Melchizedek, “no man can see God and live.” (Writings of Parley P. Pratt, p. 306)

It is claimed now that Joseph Smith saw the Father and the Son in 1820, before he was supposed to have received the Melchizedek priesthood. Joseph Fielding Smith said:

The Father and the Son appeared to the Prophet Joseph Smith before the Church was organized and the priesthood restored to the earth. (Doctrines of Salvation, vol. 1, p. 4)

The revelation given in 1832 seems to show that Joseph Smith’s story of the First Vision was made up years after it was supposed to have occurred. Joseph Smith did not even claim to have the priesthood in 1820, and the Doctrine and Covenants clearly states that without the priesthood no man can see God and live. So, according to the Doctrine and Covenants, Joseph Smith could not have seen the Father and the Son in 1820. James B. Allen, who became Assistant Church Historian in 1972, frankly admitted that the story of the First Vision “was not given general circulation in the 1830’s”:

According to Joseph Smith, he told the story of the vision immediately after it happened the early spring of 1820. As a result, he said, he received immediate criticism in the community. There is little if any evidence, however, that by the early 1830’s Joseph Smith was telling the story in public. At least if he were telling it, no one seemed to consider it important enough to have recorded it at the time, and no one was criticizing him for it. . . .

The fact that none of the available contemporary writings about Joseph Smith in the 1830’s, none of the publications of the Church in that decade, and no contemporary journal or correspondence yet discovered mentions the story of the first vision is convincing evidence that at best it received only limited circulation in those early days. . . . as far as non-Mormons were concerned there was little, if any, awareness of it in the 1830’s. . . .

As far as Mormon literature is concerned, there was apparently no reference to Joseph Smith’s first vision in any published material in the 1830’s. . . . From all this it would appear that the general church membership did not receive information about the first vision until the 1840’s and that the story certainly did not hold the prominent place in Mormon thought that it does today. . . .

As far as missionary work is concerned, it is evident that here, too, the story of the first vision had little, if any, importance in the 1830’s. . . . it was not considered necessary for prospective converts to Mormonism to know the story. . . .

To summarize what has been said so far, it is apparent that the story of Joseph Smith’s first vision was not given general circulation in the 1830’s. Neither Mormon nor non-Mormon publications made reference to it, and it is evident that the general membership of the Church knew little, if anything, about it. Belief in the story certainly was not a prerequisite for conversion, and it is obvious that the story was not being used for the purpose of illustrating other points of doctrine. In this respect, at least, Mormon thought of the 1830’s was different from Mormon thought of later years. (Dialogue: A Journal of Mormon Thought, Autumn 1966, pp. 30-34)

Dr. Hugh Nibley claimed that Joseph Smith told his great-grandfather the story of the First Vision. Our curiosity was aroused, and we wrote to Joseph Fielding Smith, who was Church Historian at the time. As we indicated on page 11 of this book, he refused to give us a copy of this journal, and Dr. Nibley admitted that he was also “refused” access to it (see photograph of his letter on page 12).

A great deal of pressure was put on the Church Historian’s Office concerning the journal kept by Alexander Neibaur (Nibley’s great-grandfather), and finally Paul Cheesman, of Brigham Young University, was able to quote a portion of it in his thesis. We immediately printed this excerpt in our book Joseph Smith’s Strange Account of the First Vision. In April, 1970, James B. Allen was allowed to quote a larger portion of the journal in an article published in the Improvement Era. This excerpt reads as follows:

“Br Joseph told us the first call he had a Revival Meeting his Mother, Br & Sister got Religion He wanted to get Religion too wanted to feel & shout like the Rest but could feel nothing, opened his Bible & the first Passage that struck him was if any man lack wisdom let him ask of God who giveth to all men liberally & upbraideth not went into the Wood to pray kneels himself down his tongue was closet cleavet to his roof could utter not a word, felt easier after a while—saw a fire toward heaven came near & nearer saw a personage in the fire light complexion blue eyes a piece of white cloth drawn over his shoulders his right arm bear after a while a other person came to the side of the first Mr. Smith then asked must I join the Methodist Church—No—they are not my People, They have gone astray there is none that doeth good no not one, but this is my Beloved son harken ye him, the fire drew nigher Rested upon the tree enveloped him comforted Indeavoured to arise and felt Uncomen feeble—got into the house told the Methodist priest & said this was not a age for god to Reveal himself in Vision Revelation has ceased with the New Testament.” (Improvement Era, April 1970, p. 12, n. 12)

Paul Cheesman states that the entry was not recorded in the journal until May 24, 1844, and James B. Allen observed that “Neibaur did not become associated with Joseph Smith until the Nauvoo period, in the 1840’s, and that the experience referred to did not take place until well after the other accounts of the vision, including Joseph Smith’s, had been written and published” (Dialogue: A Journal of Mormon Thought, Autumn 1966, pp. 34-35).

Besides being later in date than the Times and Seasons version, the journal of Alexander Neibaur contradicts the official version on at least two points. It says that one personage appeared and that “after a while another person came to the side of the first,” whereas Joseph Smith’s printed account says: “When the light rested upon me I saw two Personages.”

Notice also that Neibaur has the Father give the message and then introduce the Son. This is very interesting since Joseph Fielding Smith, who later became President of the Church, has stated that this type of procedure would have proven the story a fraud:

The Father and the Son appeared unto him, but it was not the Father who answered his question! The father introduced Joseph to his Son, and it was the Son who answered the important question and gave the instruction.

Had Joseph Smith come home from the grove and declared that the Father and the Son appeared to him and that the Father spoke to him and answered his question while the Son stood silently by, then we could have accepted the story as a fraud. (Doctrines of Salvation, vol. 1, p. 28)

The fact that Alexander Neibaur gives the story the other way around—the Father giving the message instead of the Son—may have been one of the reasons that Joseph Fielding Smith suppressed the journal.

The Apostle LeGrand Richards claimed that his grandfather, Joseph Lee Robinson, wrote concerning the First Vision before Joseph Smith published his account in the Times and Seasons. In a letter to William E. Berrett, dated August 29, 1960, Richards stated:

... —my great grandfather's diary ... indicated the Prophet Joseph had seen the Father and the Son and this was written back in 1840.

LeGrand Richards instructed the Genealogical Library not to allow us to see this journal, but some time later, contrary to his instructions, we were permitted to read it. We found that it was not written until 1883, which is some 39 years after Joseph Smith's death and 63 years after the First Vision was supposed to have occurred!

“Strange” Accounts

For years the Mormon leaders publicly maintained that Joseph Smith told only one story concerning the First Vision. Preston Nibley declared:

Joseph Smith lived a little more than twenty-four years after this first vision. During this time he told but one story—... (Joseph Smith the Prophet, 1944, p. 30)

At the very time that Preston Nibley made this statement the Mormon leaders were suppressing at least two accounts of the First Vision which were written prior to the account which Joseph Smith published in the Times and Seasons. Levi Edgar Young, who was the head of the Seven Presidents of Seventies in the Mormon Church, told LaMar Petersen that he had examined a “strange” account of the First Vision and was told not to reveal what it contained. The following is from notes by LaMar Petersen of an interview with Levi Edgar Young which was held on Feb. 3, 1953:

A list of 5 questions was presented. Bro. Young indicated some surprise at the nature of the questions but said he heartily approved of them being asked. Said they were important, fundamental, were being asked more by members of the Church, and should be asked. Said the Church should have a committee available where answers to such questions could be obtained. He has quit going down with his own questions to Brother Joseph Fielding (Smith) because he was laughed at and put off.

His curiosity was excited when reading in Roberts' Doc. History reference to “documents from which these writings were compiled.” Asked to see them. Told to get higher permission. Obtained that permission. Examined the documents. Written, he thought, about 1837 or 1838. Was told not to copy or tell what they contained. Said it was a “strange” account of the First Vision. Was put back in vault. Remains unused, unknown.

We became interested in the “strange” account and wrote to Joseph Fielding Smith, who was the Church Historian, enclosing $1.00 and asking for a photocopy of it. Unfortunately, this letter was never answered, and we had almost given up hope of ever seeing this document. To our great surprise, however, two “strange” accounts of the First Vision have now come to light. The first appeared in the thesis, “An Analysis of the Accounts Relating Joseph Smith's Early Visions,” by Paul R. Cheesman. Mr. Cheesman was a student at the Brigham Young University, and he evidently wrote his thesis as a rebuttal to statements we had made concerning the First Vision in some of our publications. Although he tries to support the First Vision story, he has reproduced a document written by Joseph Smith himself which not only proves that he did not see the Father and the Son in 1820, but also casts a shadow of doubt upon his entire story of the origin of the church. This document was reproduced in Appendix D of Paul R. Cheesman's thesis. Cheesman states that it “appears to be the earliest written account” of the first vision. On page 64 of his thesis, Mr. Cheesman states:

This account was never published or referred to by any of the authorities of the church as far as the writer has been able to determine. . . . Instead of going back over and revising, Joseph Smith evidently dictated the story later as we have it in Appendix A. (“An Analysis of the Accounts Relating Joseph Smith's Early Visions,” M.A. thesis, Brigham Young University, 1965, p. 64)

Below is a photograph of the “earliest written account” of the First Vision. Joseph Smith wrote this in the early 1830's. This picture is taken from the Brigham Young University Studies, Spring 1969, page 281.

In 1965 we published this early account of the First Vision under the title, Joseph Smith's Strange Account of the First Vision. Because the document was so unusual, some members of the Mormon Church doubted its authenticity. Although the Mormon leaders would make no public statement concerning the document, Professor James B. Allen, who later became Assistant Church Historian, admitted that the document was genuine. In an article published in 1966 he commented:

One of the most significant documents of that period yet discovered was brought to light in 1965 by Paul R. Cheesman, a graduate student at Brigham Young University. This is a handwritten manuscript apparently composed about 1833 and either written or dictated by Joseph Smith. It contains an account of the early experiences of the Mormon prophet and includes the story of the first vision. While the story varies in some details from the version presently accepted, enough is there to indicate that at least as early as 1833 Joseph Smith contemplated writing and perhaps publishing it. The manuscript has apparently lain in the L.D.S. Church Historian's office for many years, and yet few if any who saw it realized its profound historical significance. (Dialogue: A Journal of Mormon Thought, Autumn 1966, p. 35)

The Mormon leaders suppressed this account of the First Vision for over 130 years, but after we printed it thousands of copies were distributed throughout the world. Finally, four years after we published the document, the Church Historian's Office made a public statement confirming the authenticity of the manuscript. Dean C. Jessee, "a member of the staff at the LDS Church Historian's Office in Salt Lake City," claims that the document was written in 1831 or 1832:

On at least three occasions prior to 1839 Joseph Smith began writing his history. The earliest of these is a six-page account recorded on three leaves of a ledger book, written between the summer of 1831 and November 1832. . . .

The 1831-32 history transliterated here contains the earliest known account of Joseph Smith's First Vision. (Brigham Young University Studies, Spring 1969, pp. 277-278)

At first Dean Jessee assumed that "the narrative was penned by Frederick G. Williams, scribe to the Prophet," but after a more thorough analysis he became convinced that the document is actually in Joseph Smith's own handwriting:

A closer look at the original document has shown that while Williams wrote the beginning and end of the narrative, Joseph Smith wrote the remainder, including the portion containing the details of his First Vision. This is the only known account of the Vision in his own hand. Most of his writings were dictated, which is not to say that other accounts are less authentic. (Dialogue: A Journal of Mormon Thought, Spring 1971, p. 86)

Writing in Brigham Young University Studies, Summer 1971, page 462, Jessee says that "This six-page account is the only history containing the actual handwriting of Joseph Smith, a fact that was not detected when this account was previously analyzed." It is certainly interesting that the only account of the First Vision in Joseph Smith's own handwriting is the account which mentions only one personage!

Now that Brigham Young University Studies has published a photograph of this document (see page 145 of this book), we no longer have to depend upon Cheesman's typed copy. Below is the important part of this document taken directly from the photograph of the original document:

. . . the Lord heard my cry in the wilderness and while in the attitude of calling upon the Lord in the 16th year of my age a pillar of light above the brightness of the sun at noon day come down from above and rested upon me and I was filled with the spirit of god and the Lord opened the heavens upon me and I saw the Lord and he spake unto me saying Joseph my son thy sins are forgiven thee. go thy way walk in my statutes and keep my commandments behold I am the Lord of glory I was crucified for the world that all those who believe on my name may have Eternal life behold the world lieth in sin at this time and none doeth good no not one they have turned asside from the gospel and keep not my commandments they draw near to me with their lips while their hearts are far from me and mine anger is kindling against the inhabitants of the earth to visit them according to this ungodliness and to bring to pass that which hath been spoken by the mouth of the prophets and Apostles behold and lo I come quickly as it was w[r]itten of me in the cloud clothed in the glory of my Father . . .

A careful examination of this document reveals why the church leaders have "never published or referred" to it. (We have published Cheesman's typescript of the entire document in our Case, vol. 1, pp. 100-104.) To begin with, Joseph Smith said that prior to the time he received his First Vision he knew that all the churches were wrong:

. . . by Searching the Scriptures I found that mankind did not come unto the Lord but that they had apostatised from the true and living faith and there was no society or denomination that built upon the gospel of Jesus Christ as recorded in the new testament . . . ("An Analysis of the Accounts Relating Joseph Smith's Early Visions," Paul R. Cheesman, Master's Thesis, 1965, p. 128, as quoted in Case, vol. 1, p. 104)

In the account Joseph Smith wrote later, however, he claimed that he went to the Lord to find out which church was right:

My object in going to enquire of the Lord was to know which of all the sects was right? that I might know which to join . . . (for at this time it had never entered into my heart that all were wrong.) . . . (Times and Seasons, vol. 3, p. 748)

In the 1972 edition of this book we pointed out that the clause, "for at this time it had never entered into my heart that all were wrong," had been entirely deleted from the story as it appears in modern editions of the Pearl of Great Price. Strange as it may seem, in the new printing of the Pearl of Great Price in the triple combination (Joseph Smith—History 1:18), the clause which was previously suppressed has been reinserted in its proper place.

In the account of the First Vision which is now published in the Pearl of Great Price, Joseph Smith devotes a great deal of space to tell of a religious revival which stirred him to go out into the woods to pray. In the account which has been suppressed (the 1832 account), Smith does not even mention the revival which was supposed to have played such a major role in the First Vision story. In the first account Smith did not mention an evil power trying to overcome him, but in the printed version he says that he "was seized upon by some power which entirely overcame me, and had such an astonishing influence over me as to bind my tongue so that I could not speak. Thick darkness gathered around me, and it seemed to me for a time as if I were doomed to sudden destruction" (Pearl of Great Price, Joseph Smith, verse 15).

In the account which was suppressed, Joseph Smith said that his first vision was "in the 16th year of my age." In the version he wrote later, however, he said that the vision occurred when he was in his "fifteenth year" (Pearl of Great Price, Joseph Smith, verse 7). This is very interesting because the Mormon Apostle John A. Widtsoe argued that the First Vision had to occur in 1820 when Joseph Smith was fourteen years old:

Clearly, knowledge of the first vision was current in the early days of the Church, and was dated as the Prophet says, in 1820, when he was not yet fifteen years old. . . . Whatever opinion may be held as to what he saw on that occasion, it must have occurred in 1820. Any other view would make liars of these witnesses, or make them connivers in untruth with the Prophet. (Gospel Interpretations, p. 119)

On page 132 of the same book John A. Widtsoe stated:

All acceptable evidence within and beyond the Church confirms the Prophet's story that his first vision occurred when he was between fourteen and fifteen years of age in the year 1820 and before the Book of Mormon revelations occurred.

The most serious contradiction between the account which was suppressed and the account published by the church today is the number of personages in the vision. In the first account Joseph Smith only mentions one personage: "... I saw the Lord. ..." In the version which is published in the Pearl of Great Price, Joseph Smith said: "... I saw two personages."

In the first account Joseph Smith related that the Lord said he was "crucified for the world." This, of course, would mean that the personage was Jesus Christ. Therefore, it is plain to see that Joseph Smith did not include God the Father in his first account of the vision. James B. Allen stated: "In this story, only one personage was mentioned, and this was obviously the Son, for he spoke of having been crucified" (Dialogue: A Journal of Mormon Thought, Autumn 1966, p. 40).

Writing in the Improvement Era, April 1970, pages 6-7, James B. Allen observed:

Whenever new historical information is published, a host of questions demand answers, and the disclosure that Joseph Smith told his story more than once has been no exception. . . . When all of the accounts are combined, only two areas appear that may need some explanation: (1) the time of the vision and (2) the fact that the first account appears to make specific reference to only one personage. . . . If in his preliminary effort to record the story in 1831-32 he said he was 15 instead of 14 when the vision occurred, he simply made a slight correction in his more carefully prepared history. . . .

In the earliest narrative Joseph Smith simply said, "I was filled with the spirit of God and the Lord opened the heavens upon me and I saw the Lord and he spake unto me saying Joseph my son thy Sins are forgiven thee. . . ." . . . Remembering that the 1831-32 manuscript is a rough, unpolished effort to record the spiritual impact of the vision on him, that this was probably the first time Joseph Smith had even tried to commit his experience to writing, and that in the other narratives the important message was delivered by the Son, it is probable that in dictating to his scribe the Prophet simply emphasized "the Lord" and his message. (Improvement Era, April 1970, pp. 6-7)

Paul R. Cheesman tries to excuse the fact that the account which was suppressed only mentions one personage by stating: "As he writes briefly of the vision, he does not mention the Father as being present; however, this does not indicate that He was not present" ("An Analysis of the Accounts Relating Joseph Smith's Early Visions," p. 63).

This explanation by Paul Cheesman does not seem reasonable. Actually, in the first account Joseph Smith quotes the Lord as saying more words than in the printed version. James B. Allen comments:

Another impressive fact is that the 1831-32 version, which was the first to be recorded, is actually the most comprehensive of all. This early narrative includes all the essential elements of the more carefully prepared Manuscript History and contains more additional details than any other source. (Improvement Era, April 1970, p. 6)

Speaking of the "account of 1832," the Mormon writer Milton V. Backman says:

It is possible that after dictating the account, Joseph recognized the desirability of modifying certain statements... Often when people record biographical sketches or historical incidents, they write and rewrite until their ideas are clearly expressed. (Joseph Smith's First Vision, Salt Lake City, 1971, p. 124)

While it is true that many people have to "write and rewrite until their ideas are clearly expressed," we do not feel that Joseph Smith could have left out the most important part of the story by accident. If God the Father had really appeared in this vision, Joseph Smith certainly would have included this information in his first account. It is absolutely impossible for us to believe that Joseph Smith would not have mentioned the Father if He had actually appeared.

The only reasonable explanation for the Father not being mentioned is that Joseph Smith did not see God the Father, and that he made up this part of the story after he wrote the first manuscript. This, of course, throws a shadow of doubt upon the whole story.

After this "strange" account came to light, a Mormon Seminary teacher told us that there was still another account of the First Vision which the Mormon leaders were suppressing. To our great surprise, this account was published in an article by James B. Allen in the Autumn 1966 issue of Dialogue: A Journal of Mormon Thought. Professor Allen said that

[the document] has recently been brought to light by a member of the staff of the Church Historian's office. It is located in the back of Book A-1 of the handwritten manuscript of the History of the Church (commonly referred to as the "Manuscript History"). . . . it was apparently written in 1835 by someone other than Joseph Smith, for it records the day-to-day events in the prophet's life in the third person, as if it were a scribe recording them as he observed them... The importance of the manuscript here lies in the fact that the scribe wrote down what Joseph Smith said to his visitor... Again, the details of the story vary somewhat from the accepted version, but the manuscript, if authentic, at least demonstrates that by 1835 the story had been told to someone. (Dialogue: A Journal of Mormon Thought, Autumn 1966, pp. 35-36)

Although this was certainly an important discovery, it was overshadowed in 1971 when Dean C. Jessee, of the Church Historian's Office, reported that this same story (this time written in the first person) had been found in Joseph Smith's own diary. Below is a photograph of the important part of this story as it appears in Joseph Smith's 1835-36 Diary under the date of Nov. 9, 1835.

2<sup>d</sup> and looked around, but saw no person or thing that was calculated to produce the noise of wind. Being, I thrust again my mouth was closed and my tongue liberated, and I called on the Lord in my heart, a pillar of fire appeared above my head, it pointed by itself down upon me, and filled me with joy unspeakable, a personage appeared in the middle of this pillar of flame which was spread all around, and yet nothing consumed, another personage soon appeared like unto the first, he said unto me thy sins are forgiven thee, he testified unto me that Jesus Christ is the son of God, I was about 14 years old when I received this first communication. When I was about 17 years old I saw another vision of angels in the night season after these things had been told to him, but was not a seer, and was not.

The reader will find photographs of three pages of this account of the First Vision and the discovery of the Book of Mormon plates in our publication, Joseph Smith's 1835-36 Diary.

Dean C. Jessee prepared a typescript of this "strange" account of the First Vision for Dialogue: A Journal of Mormon Thought, Spring 1971. It is printed on page 87 and reads as follows:

. . . while setting in my house between the hours of ten & 11 this morning, a man came in, and introduced himself to me, calling himself by the name of Joshua the Jewish minister, his appearance was something singular, having a beard about 3 inches in length which is quite grey, also his hair is long and considerably silvered with age I should think he is about 50 or 55 years old, tall and strait slender built of thin visage blue eyes, and fair complexion, he wears a sea-green frock coat, & pantaloons of the same, black fur hat with narrow brim, and while speaking frequently shuts his eyes with a scowl on his countenance: I made some enquiry after his name but received no definite answer; we soon commenced talking upon the subject of religion and after I had made some remarks concerning the bible I commenced giving him a relation of the circumstances connected with the coming forth of the Book of Mormon, as follows

— being wrought up in mind, respecting the subject of religion and looking at the different systems taught the children of men, I knew not who was right or who was wrong and I considered it of the first importance that I should be right, in matters that involve eternal consequences; being thus perplexed in mind I retired to the silent grove and bow'd down before the Lord, under a realising sense that he had said (if the bible be true) ask and you shall receive knock and it shall be opened seek and you shall find and again, if any man lack wisdom let him ask of God who giveth to all men liberally and upbradeth not; information was what I most desired at this time, in the place above stated or in other words I made a fruitless attempt to pray, my tounge seemed to be swollen in my mouth, so that I could not utter, I heard a noise behind me like some person walking towards me, I strove again to pray, but could not the noise of walking seemed to draw nearer, I sprung upon my feet, and looked around, but saw no person or thing that was calculated to produce the noise of walking, I kneeled again my mouth was opened and my tounge liberated, and I called on the Lord in mighty prayer, a pillar of fire appeared above my head, it presently rested down upon me and filled me with joy unspeakable, a personage appeared in the midst of this pillar of flame which was spread all around, and yet nothing consumed, another personage soon appeared like unto the first, he said unto me thy sins are forgiven thee, he testified unto me that Jesus Christ is the Son of God; and I saw many angels in this vision I was about 14 years old when I received this first communication. . . .

In this account of the First Vision there is absolutely nothing to show that the personages were God and Christ. The statement, “he testified unto me that Jesus Christ is the Son of God,” would seem to show that the personages were not the Father and the Son. If Joseph Smith had intended to show that the personage who spoke was Jesus, he probably would have said something like this: “He testified also unto me that He was the Son of God.” On the other hand, if he intended to show that the personage who spoke was the Father, he would probably have said something like this: “He testified also unto me that Jesus Christ was His son.”

As if this is not bad enough, Joseph Smith states that there were “many angels in this vision.” Neither of the other versions indicate that there were “many angels.”

We now have three different handwritten manuscripts of the First Vision. They were all written by Joseph Smith or his scribes, and yet every one of them is different. The first account says there was only one personage. The second account says there were many, and the third says there were two.

It is interesting to note that the portion of Joseph Smith’s diary which mentions the visit of “Joshua the Jewish minister” was used as the basis for Joseph Smith’s History of the Church, vol. 2, page 304. In the diary we read:

I commenced giving him a relation of the circumstances connected with the coming forth of the book of Mormon, as follows [At this point Joseph Smith gave an account of the First Vision and other visions he received]. . . .

While I was relating this brief history of the establishment of the Church of Christ in these last days, Joshua seemed to be highly entertained.

In the History of the Church, vol. 2, page 304, we find almost exactly the same wording:

. . . I commenced giving him a relation of the circumstances connected with the coming forth of the Book of Mormon, as recorded in the former part of this history.

While I was relating a brief history of the establishment of the Church of Christ in the last days, Joshua seemed to be highly entertained.

From this comparison it is plain to see that Joseph Smith’s diary was the original source for the published History, yet over 800 words were not included in the printed version. In order to make this deletion the words “as follows” were changed to “as recorded in the former part of this history.”

The story that was related in the diary, however, differs from that “recorded in the former part of this history”—the official account which appears in the History of the Church, vol. 1, pages 5-6. Joseph Smith or those who compiled this portion of the History apparently felt that this version of the First Vision had to be suppressed because it differed from the official account.

An Important Change

Joseph Smith’s 1835-36 Diary and the “Manuscript History” of the Church also provide some important evidence concerning another reference to the First Vision which has been changed in the printed version of the History of the Church. Fawn M. Brodie made this statement concerning this reference:

Under the date of November 15, 1835 in the History of the Church appears the following statement by Joseph Smith: “I gave him [Erastus Holmes] a brief relation of my experience while in my juvenile years, say from six years old up to the time I received my first vision, which was when I was about fourteen years old . . .” (vol. 2, p. 312). But Joseph admittedly did not begin writing his history until 1838, and the editors of this history do not state from what manuscript source in the Utah Church library this journal entry came. Access to all these important manuscripts is denied everyone save authorities of the Mormon Church. (No Man Knows My History, p. 24, footnote)

The Mormon Apostle John A. Widtsoe tried to defend this reference from the History of the Church by stating:

In 1835 he told one Erastus Holmes of his “First Vision which was when I was fourteen years old.” Clearly the story of the First Vision was common knowledge among members of the Church. The proponents of the theory that the Prophet invented the First Vision in 1838 doubt the accuracy of the Holmes and similar references, because they hold that the Church History, the journal of Joseph Smith, has been tampered with by later workers. It is sad when a drowning man does not even have a straw to which he may cling! that seemed and seems to be the need of these critics. (Joseph Smith—Seeker After Truth, pp. 24-25)

In spite of John A. Widtsoe’s statement, a woman who was doing research at the Utah State Historical Society searched through a microfilm of the early Deseret News and found information which proves that the Mormon Historians deliberately altered Joseph Smith’s statement. In the 1850’s the Deseret News (the Mormon Church’s newspaper) was publishing Joseph Smith’s History. In the issue for May 29, 1852, the following statement by Joseph Smith appeared:

This afternoon, Erastus Holmes, of Newbury, Ohio, called on me to inquire about the establishment of the church, and to be instructed in doctrine more perfectly. I gave him a brief relation of my experience while in my juvenile years, say from six years old up to the time I received the first visitation of angels, which was when I was about fourteen years old; also the revelations that I received afterwards concerning the Book of Mormon, and a short account of the rise and progress of the church up to this date. (Deseret News, vol. 2, no. 15, May 29, 1852)

Because this statement by Joseph Smith contradicted the teaching that the Father and the Son appeared to him in the First Vision of 1820, the Mormon Church Historians altered the words of Joseph Smith when they reprinted them in recent editions of the History of the Church. They changed the wording so that the word “angels” was completely left out. The following is a comparison of the way this reference was originally published in the Deseret News and the way it has been changed to read in recent printings of the History of the Church. In the Deseret News, May 29, 1852, Joseph Smith’s

The Battle of the Snakes.

AN EPIQUE TO CATHARINE.

DEAR KATE—more dear than I can tell
No matter, though—you know it well—
Dear Kate—in this delicious weather,
I wish, don't you? we were together;
That we might wander, hand in hand,
And those acorns of fairy land,
Which now, to glad thy vision, rise
And fancy pictures to my eyes!
To climb the hill—the woods explore,
Or ramble by the sea-beat shore,
Where ringing waves delight thy ear
With music mine shall never hear;
Or rove where sweetest flowers embower
My pretty Kate, "a sweeter flower"
While balmy zephyrs kiss thy brow
Of beauty—(might I kiss it now?)

'Mid scenes like these, one summer's day,
A lonely serpent wound his way;
From Rattle's line of length he came,
And glared in a fit of fame;
His pointed tongue, his sparkling eyes,
His gorgeous robe of thousand dyes—
All these with rapture swelled his hide,
For snakes, like other fools, have pride.
While winding through a tangled brake,
He chanced to meet another snake,
Who wore a suit of sober black,
Which might become a doctor's back,
And, coiled in many a ring, reclined,
While thoughts as rapid perplexed his mind.
"Good person Black! ah, it is you?"
Quoth Rattle blunt, "How d'ya do?"
"Oh, well, I think you do."

While fond my look upon thee lingers,
Then, while enraptured, I trace
Affection breathing from thy face—
Oh, then I feel in deep delight
"There is a music for this sight!"
Which I would not exchange for all
That ever on the ear may fall.

LIFE OF JOSEPH SMITH.

Saturday morning, 14th. Thus came the word of the Lord unto me, saying, Verily thus saith the Lord unto my servant Joseph, concerning my servant Warren, behold his sins are forgiven him, because of his desire to do the works of righteousness. Therefore, inasmuch as he will continue to hearken unto my voice, he shall be blessed with wisdom, and with a sound mind, even above his fellows. Behold it shall come to pass in his day, that he shall see great things show forth themselves unto my people; he shall see much of my ancient records, and shall know of hidden things, and shall be endowed with a knowledge of hidden languages; and if he desires and shall seek it in my hands, he shall be privileged with writing much of my word, as a scribe unto me for the benefit of my people; therefore this shall be his calling until I shall order it otherwise in my wisdom; and it shall be said of him in time to come, behold Warren, the Lord's scribe, for the Lord's scribe, whom he hath appointed in Israel. Therefore, if he will keep my commandments, he shall be lifted up at the last day; even so, amen.

This afternoon, Erastus Holmes, of Newbury, Ohio, called on me to inquire about the establishment of the church, and to be instructed in doctrine more perfectly. I gave him a brief relation of my experience while in my juvenile years, any from six years old up to the time I received the first visitation of angels, which was when I was about fourteen years old; also the revelations that I received afterwards concerning the Book of Mormon, and a short account of the rise and progress of the church up to this date. He listened very attentively, and seemed highly gratified, and intends to unite with the church.

On Sabbath morning, 15th, he went with me to meeting, which was held in the school house, as the chapel was not finished plastering.—President Rigdon preached on the subject of mon's being called to preach the gospel, their qualifications, &c. We had a fine discourse; it was very interesting indeed. Mr. Holmes was well satisfied, and returned and dined with me. Said Holmes has been a member of the Methodist church, and was excommunicated before receiving the elders of the Latter Day Saints into his house. Went to meeting in the afternoon, before partaking of the sacrament, Isaac Hill's case was agitated again, and settled after much controversy, and he retained in the church, by making a humble acknowledgment before the church, and consenting to have his confession published in the "Messenger and Advocate," after which the ordinance of the Lord's supper was administered, and the meeting closed late. Returned home and spent the evening.

Monday, the 16th, at home. Dictated the following letter for publication in the "Messenger and Advocate."

TO THE ELDERS OF THE CHURCH OF LATTER DAY SAINTS.

I have shewn unto you, in my last, that there are two Jerusaaloms spoken of in holy writ, in a manner I think satisfactorily to your minds; at any rate I have given my views upon the subject, I shall now proceed to make some remarks from the sayings of the Savior, recorded in the 13th chapter of his gospel according to St. Matthew, which, in my mind, afford us an understanding upon the important subject of the gathering; as anything recorded in the Bible. At the time the Savior spoke those parables arise because of the word, by and by, he is offended. He also that receiveth seed among thorns, is he that receiveth the word, and the cares of this world, and the deceitfulness of riches choke the word, and he becometh unfruitful; but he that receiveth seed into the good ground, is he that heareth the word, and understandeth it, which also beareth fruit, and bringeth forth some an hundred fold, some sixty, some thirty. Thus the Savior himself explains unto his disciples the parable, which he put forth, and left no mystery or darkness upon the minds of those who firmly believe on his words.

We draw the conclusion, then, that the very reason why the multitude, or the world, as they were designated by the Savior, did not receive an explanation upon his parables, was because of unbelief. To you he says, (speaking to his disciples) It is given you to know the mysteries of the kingdom of God; and why? Because of the faith and confidence they had in him. This parable was spoken to? Illustrate the efforts that are produced by the preaching of the word; and we believe that it has an allusion directly, to the commencement, or the setting up of the kingdom in that age; therefore we shall continue to trace his sayings concerning this kingdom from that time forth, even unto the end of the world.

Another parable put he forth unto them saying, (which parable has an allusion to the setting up of the kingdom, in that age of the world also). The kingdom of heaven is likened to a mustard seed. Behold, then, is not this the kingdom of heaven that is raising its head in the last days, in the majesty of its God; even the Church of the Latter Day Saints; like an impenetrable, immovable rock in the midst of the mighty deep, exposed to the storms and tempests of Satan, but has, thus far, remained steadfast, and is still braving the mountain waves of opposition, which are driven by the tempestuous winds of sinking crafts, which have and are still dashing with tremendous foam across its triumphant brow; urged onward with redoubled fury by the enemy of righteousness, with his pitchfork of lies, as you will see fairly represented in a cut contained in Mr. Howe's "Mormonism Unveiled?" And we hope that this adversary of truth will continue to stir up the sink of iniquity, that the people may the more readily discern between the righteous and the wicked.

We also would notice one of the modern sons of Seeva, who would fain have made people believe, that he could cast out devils, by a certain pamphlet, (viz, the "Millennium Harbinger") that went the rounds through our country; who felt so fully authorized to brand "Jo" Smith with the appellation of Elymas the sorcerer; and to say with Paul, O full of all subtlety, and all mischief, thou child of the devil, thou enemy of all righteousness, wilt thou not cease to pervert the right ways of the Lord? We would reply to this gentleman, Paul we know, and Christ we know, but who are ye? And with the best of feelings would say to him in the language of Paul to those who said they were John's disciples, but had not so much as heard there was a Holy Ghost, to repent and be baptized for the remission of sins by those who have legal authority, and under their hands you shall receive the Holy Ghost, according to the scriptures.

Then laid they their hands upon them, and they received the Holy Ghost. Acts 8: 17.—And when Paul had laid his hands upon them, the Holy Ghost came on them, and they spake with tongues and prophesied. Acts 19: 6. Of the doctrines of baptisms, and of laying on of hands, and of resurrection of the dead, and of eternal judgment. Hebrews 6: 2. How, then, shall they call on him in whom they have not believed? And how shall they believe in him of whom they have not heard? And how shall they hear without a proscriber? And how shall We again make a remark here, for we find that the very principles upon which the disciples were accounted blessed, was because they were permitted to see with their eyes, and hear with their ears; and the condemnation which rested upon the multitude, which received not his saying, was because they were not willing to see with their eyes, and hear with their ears; not because they could not, and were not privileged to see and hear, but because their hearts were full of iniquity and abominations; as your fathers did, so do ye. The Prophet, foreseeing that they would thus harden their hearts, plainly declared it; and herein is the condemnation of the world; that light hath come into the world, and men choose darkness rather than light, because their deeds are evil. This is so plainly taught by the Savior, that a wayfaring man need not mistake it.

And again; hear ye the parable of the sower. Men are in the habit, when the truth is exhibited by the servants of God, of saying, all is mystery; they are spoken in parables, and, therefore, are not to be understood; it is true they have eyes to see, and see not; but none are so blind as those who will not see; and although the Savior spoke this parable to such characters, yet unto his disciples he expounded it plainly; and we have reason to be truly humble before the God of our fathers, that he hath left these things on record for us, so plain, that notwithstanding the exertions and combined influence of the priests of Baal, they have not power to blind our eyes, and darken our understanding, if we will but open our eyes, and read with candor, for a moment.

But listen to the explanation of the parable; when any one heareth the word of the kingdom, and understandeth it not, then cometh the wicked one, and catcheth away that which was sown in his heart. Now mark the expression; that which was before sown in his heart; this is he which receiveth seed by the way side; men who have no principle of righteousness in themselves, and whose hearts are full of iniquity, and have no desire for the principles of truth, do not understand the word of truth when they hear it. The devil taketh away the word of truth out of their hearts, because there is no desire for righteousness in them. But he that receiveth seed in stony places, the same is he that heareth the word, and anew, with joy receiveth it, yet hath he no root in himself, but endureth for a while, for when tribulation or persecution ariseth because of the word, by and by, he is offended. He also that receiveth seed among thorns, is he that receiveth the word, and the cares of this world, and the deceitfulness of riches choke the word, and he becometh unfruitful; but he that receiveth seed into the good ground, is he that heareth the word, and understandeth it, which also beareth fruit, and bringeth forth some an hundred fold, some sixty, some thirty. Thus the Savior himself explains unto his disciples the parable, which he put forth, and left no mystery or darkness upon the minds of those who firmly believe on his words.

We also would notice one of the modern sons of Seeva, who would fain have made people believe, that he could cast out devils, by a certain pamphlet, (viz, the "Millennium Harbinger") that went the rounds through our country; who felt so fully authorized to brand "Jo" Smith with the appellation of Elymas the sorcerer; and to say with Paul, O full of all subtlety, and all mischief, thou child of the devil, thou enemy of all righteousness, wilt thou not cease to pervert the right ways of the Lord? We would reply to this gentleman, Paul we know, and Christ we know, but who are ye? And with the best of feelings would say to him in the language of Paul to those who said they were John's disciples, but had not so much as heard there was a Holy Ghost, to repent and be baptized for the remission of sins by those who have legal authority, and under their hands you shall receive the Holy Ghost, according to the scriptures.

Then laid they their hands upon them, and they received the Holy Ghost. Acts 8: 17.—And when Paul had laid his hands upon them, the Holy Ghost came on them, and they spake with tongues and prophesied. Acts 19: 6. kingdom, but the tares are the children of the wicked one. Now let our readers mark the expression, the field is the world; the tares are the children of the wicked one; the enemy that sowed them is the devil; the harvest is the end of the world. Let them carefully mark this expression, the end of the world, and the reapers are the angels.

Now men cannot have any possible grounds to say that this is figurative, or that it does not mean what it says; for he is now explaining what he had previously spoken in parables; and according to this language, the end of the world is the destruction of the wicked, the harvest and the end of the world have an allusion directly to the human family in the last days, instead of the earth, as many have imagined; and that which shall precede the coming of the Son of Man, and the restitution of all things spoken of by the mouth of all the holy prophets since the world began; and the angels are to have something to do in this great work, for they are the reapers. As, therefore, the tares are gathered and burned in the fire, so shall it be in the end of the world; that is, as the servants of God go forth warning the nations, both priests and people, and as they harden their hearts and reject the light of truth, these first being delivered over to the buffetings of Satan, and the law and the testimony being closed up, as it was in the Jews, they are left in darkness, and delivered over unto the day of burning; thus being bound up by their creeds, and their hands being made strong by their priests, are prepared for the fulfillment of the saying of the Savior, The Son of Man shall send forth his angels, and gather out of his kingdom all things that offend, and them which do iniquity, and shall cast them into a furnace of fire, there shall be weeping and gnashing of teeth. We understand that the work of the gathering together of the wheat into barns, or garners, is to take place while the tares are being bound over, and reaping for the day of burning; that after the day of burnings, the righteous shall shine forth like the sun, in the kingdom of their Father;—Who hath ears to hear, let him hear.

But to illustrate more clearly upon this gathering. We have another parable: Against the kingdom of heaven is like a treasure hidden in a field, the which, when a man hath found, he hideth, and for joy thereof, he hath sold all that he hath, and bought that field, for he may work after this pattern. See the church of the

A photograph of the Deseret News, May 29, 1852. Notice that Joseph Smith stated that it was angels that appeared to him when he was fourteen years of age. This reference has been changed in recent editions of the History of the Church. The word angels has been removed.

statement read:

... I received the first visitation of angels, which was when I was about fourteen years old; . . .

In the History of the Church, vol. 2, page 312, this has been changed to read:

... I received my first vision, which was when I was about fourteen years old; . . .

Dr. Hugh Nibley states that even God Himself, when he visits the earth, could be called an angel; however, he admits that Joseph Smith was being “evasive” about the matter:

Not to labor the point, it is perfectly correct usage to refer to any heavenly visitor as an angel. So when Joseph Smith, reviewing the past in “a brief relation” to a stranger, passes over the first vision as his “first visitation of angels” he is being both correct and evasive. Remember that this was some years before he was finally “induced” to come out with a public statement about the first vision; . . . (Improvement Era, November 1961, p. 868)

On page 866 of the same article, Dr. Nibley admits that Joseph Smith’s use of the word “angels” was “ambiguous,” and that the editors of the Deseret News ran the “risk of a misunderstanding” by using this term. He does not, however, tell the reader that this “ambiguous” term has been deleted in modern editions of the History of the Church. Paul Cheesman fails to deal with this problem in his thesis. He quotes the statement Joseph Smith made concerning his First Vision, but his quotation is taken from the History of the Church, and he does not say anything concerning the change which has been made in it. It would appear that the Mormon writers are unwilling to face this problem.

The church has absolutely no manuscript evidence to support this change in Joseph Smith’s History of the Church. The original handwritten manuscript for this part of the History reads exactly like the Deseret News: “. . . I received the first visitation of angels . . .” (Manuscript History, Book B-1, p. 642). In addition to this, Joseph Smith’s 1835-36 Diary, page 37, provides supporting evidence for the word “angels”: “. . . I received the first visitation of angels . . .”

The fact that Mormon historians had to make such a serious change in Joseph Smith’s History after his death tends to further weaken the case for the First Vision.

Revision Required

At least one Mormon writer suggests that because of the release of the new documents Fawn Brodie may have to revise her argument that the First Vision was invented sometime after 1834. We feel that this criticism is a little unfair. Actually, the Mormon leaders are the ones who should revise their arguments. They are the ones that said Joseph Smith “told but one story,” and they are the ones who suppressed the two “strange” accounts of the vision. We are sure that Fawn M. Brodie would have used these documents if the Mormon leaders had made them available to her. In fact, in a Supplement to the new edition of her book she did reproduce and discuss these documents (see No Man Knows My History, N.Y., 1971, pp. 405-410). These documents fit perfectly into her thesis that Joseph Smith made up the vision many years after it was supposed to have occurred. She had said that the “awesome vision he described in later years may have been the elaboration of some half-remembered dream stimulated by the early revival excitement and reinforced by the rich folklore of visions circulating in his neighborhood. Or it may have been sheer invention, created some time after 1834 . . .” On page 22 of the older edition she stated that “Lesser visions than this were common in the folklore of the area.” She then goes on to explain that others claimed they saw the Lord, but Joseph’s vision of both the Father and the Son “dwarfed all these experiences.” If Fawn Brodie would have had access to the “strange” account written in the early 1830’s, she would have had the missing link to make her thesis complete. The fact that Joseph Smith only mentions Christ as being present in the vision makes it very similar to other visions “of the area.” Mormon writers admit that the thing that makes Joseph Smith’s account unique is that both the Father and the Son appeared. Paul R. Cheesman says that “Joseph Smith’s account is unique in that the Father and the Son appeared together and they both spoke. To those who accept the Bible and the Book of Mormon as authentic, nowhere in these histories do we have another example that parallels this experience in this respect” (“An Analysis of the Accounts Relating Joseph Smith’s Early Visions,” p. 18).

Now that we have Joseph Smith’s first account of his vision we know that it was not unique. In 1816 a minister by the name of Elias Smith published a book in which he told of his conversion. Notice how similar it is to Joseph Smith’s first account:

... I went into the woods...after a stick of timber; after taking it on my shoulder . . . as I walked along on a large log . . . my foot slipped . . . the timber fell one end on the log and the other on the snow, and held me, . . . While in this situation, a light appeared from heaven, . . . My mind seemed to rise in that light to the throne of God and the Lamb, . . . The Lamb once slain appeared to my understanding, and while viewing him, I felt such love to him as I never felt to any thing earthly. . . . It is not possible for me to tell how long I remained in that situation, . . . (The Life, Conversion, Preaching, Travels, and Sufferings of Elias Smith, Portsmouth, N.H., 1816, pp. 58-59)

Alexander Campbell wrote the following on March 1, 1824, concerning a “revival in the state of New York”:

Enthusiasm flourishes, . . . This man was regenerated when asleep, by a vision of the night. That man heard a voice in the woods, saying, “Thy sins be forgiven thee.” A third saw his Saviour descending to the tops of the trees at noon day. (The Christian Baptist, vol. 1, pp. 148-49)

The noted revival preacher Charles G. Finney, like Joseph Smith, went out “into the woods” to pray. That night he came into a room and though there “was no fire, and no light, in the room; nevertheless it appeared to me as if it were perfectly light. As I went in and shut the door after me, it seemed as if I met the Lord Jesus Christ face to face” (Charles G. Finney, pp. 15-21). This vision occurred in the early 1820’s, and since Finney was so popular in New York, Joseph Smith probably knew his story. Gilbert Seldes stated: “The story of his conversion spread and the grove in which he had communed with the Holy Spirit was frequented by other anxious souls who imitated him in prayer with equally successful results” (The Stammering Century, p. 104). We present other information concerning this matter in our Case, vol. 1, pp. 108-109.

In a book published in 1830, Stephen H. Bradley told that he thought he “saw the Savior” when he was fourteen years old. William James cites this book in The Varieties of Religious Experience, pages 157-58.

Asa Wild claimed to have a revelation which is very similar to the story Joseph Smith published. It was published in the Wayne Sentinel (the paper to which the family of Joseph Smith apparently subscribed) on October 22, 1823:

It seemed as if my mind...was struck motionless, as well as into nothing, before the awful and glorious majesty of the Great Jehovah. He then spake . . . He also told me, that every denomination of professing christians had become extremely corrupt; . . . He told me further, that he had raised up, and was now raising up, that class of persons signified by the Angel mentioned by the Revelator, xiv. 6, 7, which flew in the midst of heaven; having the everlasting gospel to preach: . . . Furthermore he said that all the different denominations of professing christians, constituted the New Testament Babylon; . . .

Much more the Lord revealed, but forbids my relating it in this way. (Wayne Sentinel, October 22, 1823)

It is plain to see, then, that the story Joseph Smith told in the early 1830's is not much different than the visions related by others. It was only when he added the part about the Father appearing with the Son that the story began to sound unique.

First History

In the early years of the Mormon Church the members were taught that the first vision Joseph Smith had was in 1823 when he was seventeen years of age, and that the personage who appeared was an angel (not God the Father and His Son Jesus Christ) who told him about the Book of Mormon. Oliver Cowdery, who was one of the three witnesses to the Book of Mormon, and the first Church Historian, wrote a history of the church which was published in the Messenger and Advocate. This history shows that the story of the visit of the Father and the Son was not taught to the Mormon people. Francis W. Kirkham, in his book, A New Witness For Christ In America, vol. 1, page 17, says:

The first published consecutive account of the origin of the Church began in the October, 1834, issue of the Messenger and Advocate. It consists of eight letters written by Oliver Cowdery to W. W. Phelps. This account is very important as Oliver Cowdery claims in a letter published in the October, 1834, issue, but dated September 7, 1834, that Joseph Smith assisted him in the writing of the letters.

The Mormon writer Hyrum L. Andrus states that the Messenger and Advocate was "the official Church organ between 1834 and 1837" (God, Man and the Universe, Salt Lake City, 1968, p. 48). In the Messenger and Advocate, vol. 1, page 13, the following statement was made concerning this history:

... we have thought that a full history of the rise of the church of the Latter Day Saints, and the most interesting parts of its progress, to the present time, would be worthy the perusal of the Saints. . . .

That our narrative may be correct, and particularly the introduction, it is proper to inform our patrons, that our brother J. Smith jr. has offered to assist us. . . . With his labor and with authentic documents now in our possession, we hope to render this a pleasing and agreeable narrative, well worth the examination of the Saints.—

On page 42 the reader was promised that this history would contain a correct account of events that have transpired:

Since, then, our opposers have been thus kind to introduce our cause before the public, it is no more than just that a correct account should be given; and since they have invariably sought to cast a shade over the truth, . . . it is also proper that it should be vindicated, by laying before the world a correct statement of events . . .

You will recollect that I informed you, . . . this history would necessarily embrace the life and character of our esteemed friend and brother, J. Smith Jr. . . . for information on that part of the subject, I refer you to his communication . . . I shall, therefore, pass over that, till I come to the 15th year of his life. . . . One Mr. Lane, a presiding Elder of the Methodist church, visited Palmyra, and vicinity. Elder Lane was a tallented man . . . There was a great awakening, or excitement raised on the subject of religion, and much enquiry for the word of life. Large additions were made to the Methodist, Presbyterian, and Baptist churches.—Mr. Lane's manner of communication was peculiarly calculated to awaken the intellect of the hearer, . . . in common with others, our brother's mind became awakened . . . his mother, one sister, and two of his natural brothers, were persuaded to unite with the Presbyterians. . . .

In the February 1835 issue of the Messenger and Advocate, Oliver Cowdery continued the history. He stated, however, that there had been a typographical error and that the revival had really occurred in 1823:

You will recollect that I mentioned the time of a religious excitement, in Palmyra and vicinity to have been in the 15th year of our brother J. Smith Jr's age—that was an error in the type—it should have been in the 17th.—You will please remember this correction, as it will be necessary for the full understanding of what will follow in time. This would bring the date down to the year 1823. . . . while this excitement continued, he continued to call upon the Lord in secret for a full manifestation of divine approbation, and for, to him, the all important information, if a Supreme being did exist, to have an assurance that he was accepted of him . . .

On the evening of the 21st of September, 1823, previous to retiring to rest, our brother's mind was unusually wrought up on the subject which had so long agitated his mind—his heart was drawn out in fervent prayer, . . . While continuing in prayer for a manifestation in some way that his sins were forgiven; endeavoring to exercise faith in the scriptures, on a sudden a light like that of day, only of a purer and far more glorious appearance and brightness, burst into the room.— . . . and in a moment a personage stood before him . . . he heard him declare himself to be a messenger sent by commandment of the Lord, to deliver a special message, and to witness to him that his sins were forgiven, . . . (Messenger and Advocate, vol. 1, pp. 78-79)

Several things should be noted concerning this history. First, that it claimed to be a "correct account." Second, that Joseph Smith assisted in the writing of this history. Third, that the date of the religious excitement in Palmyra was 1823. Fourth, that Joseph Smith desired to know at this time "if a Supreme being did exist." Fifth, that a "messenger sent by commandment of the Lord" appeared to him and told him that his sins were forgiven.

Mormon writers seem to be somewhat divided concerning this history. Dr. Hugh Nibley suggests that Joseph Smith may not have given Oliver Cowdery a "full account" of the First Vision and that this may account for the confusion:

If William Smith and Oliver Cowdery give confusing accounts of the first vision, we must remember that the Prophet knew from the first that those men were not to be trusted with too much information. . . . Were such men to be trusted with a full account of the first vision before it was officially given to the world? (Improvement Era, Nov. 1961, pp. 868-869)

This explanation for Oliver Cowdery's silence concerning the First Vision is not reasonable; if Cowdery was so unreliable, why was he chosen to be one of the three witnesses to the Book of Mormon? Could it be possible that Joseph Smith would not trust Oliver Cowdery—the first Church Historian—with the true history of the church? Actually, Joseph Smith trusted Cowdery with some of his most important secrets. The Mormon writer Max H. Parkin stated: "...the Prophet testified 'that Oliver Cowdery had been his bosom friend, therefore he entrusted him with many things'" (Conflict at Kirtland, M.A. thesis, BYU, 1966, p. 166).

Dr. Richard L. Anderson, of Brigham Young University, seems to disagree with Dr. Nibley. He claims that Cowdery was well aware of Joseph Smith's early account of the First Vision (i.e., the "strange" account), but feels that it was left out "for a reason":

Since Oliver Cowdery and William Smith narrated early Church history without mentioning the First Vision, it has been assumed that their silence proves that the event did not occur. Both associate Joseph Smith's revival investigations with 1823 instead of 1820, . . . Cowdery made the first public attempt to narrate pre-1830 Church history in letters to the 1834-35

Messenger and Advocate. It is incorrect to say that he wrote without an awareness of the First Vision. It may be that the reason for leaving it out is ambiguous, but . . . the initial manuscript history of the First Vision was entered in official Church records at least two years before Cowdery's history. When he stated that he would utilize "authentic documents now in our possession," it is virtually certain that he was alluding to the 1831-32 account. . . . at two points where the Prophet's personal experiences are narrated, identical phrases or structural similarities betray Cowdery's use of the earlier document. . . . added to these is a precise sequence of events that indicates that Cowdery composed his sketch of Joseph's first religious investigations with the 1831-32 manuscript before him: . . .

If Oliver Cowdery demonstrably followed the 1831-32 document in rehearsing the background of the First Vision, why didn't he report the full event as found in that history? . . . By date and verbal dependence, it is known that Cowdery had access to the 1831-32 document, which described two different prayers and two responding visions. Because the logical Cowdery presented differing prayer situations but an answer to only one of them, it must be assumed that he left out reference to the First Vision for a reason.

It is hard to avoid the impression that the second elder was corrected by Joseph Smith and exercised his editorial privilege of saving face. The installment of December 1834, in which the First Vision background was given, dated the "excitement raised on the subject of religion" in the "15th year" of the Prophet's life, . . . Pleading "an error in the type," the editor said that the above events happened "in the 17th" year of Joseph Smith's life. . . .

Since Cowdery knew of the First Vision and began to describe its circumstances, his failure to continue implies a correction. One might envision a reprimand for giving public details of a sacred experience, though that is inconsistent with Joseph Smith's open description of the event for the Jewish minister Joshua some months afterward. . . . The absence of the First Vision in these circumstances is an accident of presentation never rectified because the letter-presentation of early history was terminated some months afterward. (Brigham Young University Studies, Spring 1969, pp. 393-398)

It is rather obvious that Mormon writers do not know how to deal with this early history. One Mormon writer has maintained that Joseph Smith was not responsible for the contents of this history (see Dialogue, Spring 1969, pp. 84-86). President Joseph Fielding Smith, however, admitted that this history was written under the "personal supervision" of Joseph Smith. He even used it to prove where the Hill Cumorah is located:

The quibbler might say that this statement from Oliver Cowdery is merely the opinion of Oliver Cowdery and not the expression of the Prophet Joseph Smith. It should be remembered that these letters in which these statements are made were written at the Prophet's request and under his personal supervision. Surely, under these circumstances, he would not have permitted an error of this kind to creep into the record without correction. . . .

Later, during the Nauvoo period of the Church, and again under the direction of the Prophet Joseph Smith, these same letters by Oliver Cowdery, were published in the Times and Seasons, without any thought of correction. . . . (Doctrines of Salvation, vol. 3, p. 236)

The Mormon historian B. H. Roberts said that "Joseph Smith's association with Cowdery in the production of these letters make them, as to the facts involved, practically the personal narrative of Joseph Smith" (Comprehensive History of the Church, vol. 1, p. 78).

Too Many Stories

Prior to the time Paul Cheesman wrote his thesis at Brigham Young University, Mormon writers were emphatically proclaiming that Joseph Smith "told but one story" of the First Vision. The Mormon Apostle John A. Widtsoe stated: "The earliest available written official account of the First Vision dates from 1838 when Joseph Smith began to write the history of the Church" (Joseph Smith—Seeker After Truth, p. 19).

We may never know if John A. Widtsoe knew of the two "strange" accounts of the vision which were written prior to 1838, but one thing is certain, some of the Mormon leaders did know that the account written in 1838 was not the only one in the Historian's Office. In other words, certain leaders deliberately suppressed this information.

Now that these "strange" accounts have been printed and widely circulated, Mormon apologists are forced to admit their existence and authenticity. Dr. Richard L. Anderson, of the Brigham Young University, has gone a step further, however. He not only acknowledges the authenticity of the "strange" accounts, but he also classifies them as "official accounts of the First Vision from the Prophet":

Before one can prove that Joseph Smith contradicts history, he must be sure of what Joseph Smith claimed. There are four official accounts of the First Vision from the Prophet. The three manuscript texts are printed in Dean Jessee's article in this issue. As he shows, their dates of composition are 1831-32, 1835, and 1838. This 1838 account was published as the "History of Joseph Smith" in 1842. The fourth account is Joseph Smith's "Wentworth Letter," also published in 1842. (Brigham Young University Studies, Spring 1969, p. 374)

Dr. Anderson even goes so far as to state that "The most striking insight into the earliest religious experiences of the Prophet comes from the 1831-32 manuscript history" (Ibid., p. 375).

The Mormon newspaper, Deseret News, has now admitted the authenticity of the "strange" accounts, but it is made to appear that they are new discoveries:

Dean C. Jessee, a staff member at the Church historian's office in Salt Lake City, searched through documents of the Church historian's library concerning events of the 1820s. He located and analyzed three early accounts of Joseph Smith's first vision dictated by the Prophet himself. (Deseret News, Church Section, May 3, 1969, p. 15)

This article gives the impression that Dean C. Jessee just discovered the "strange" accounts. Actually, for many years some of the Mormon leaders have been aware of the fact that the printed account was not the only account written by Joseph Smith. The reader will remember that Levi Edgar Young had seen some documents containing a "strange" account of the First Vision prior to the interview with LaMar Petersen in 1953, but that he was "told not to copy or tell what they contained." The reader will also remember that we printed the first "strange" account in 1965.

The church has suppressed these documents for over 130 years, but now Mormon apologists are trying to make it appear that they are proud of them. Dr. Truman G. Madsen, of the Brigham Young University, claims that the harmony of these documents is impressive:

Now that we have copies of the three early manuscript accounts of the First Vision bound in this single volume, we are impressed with their harmony considering the very different circumstances of their writing: . . . (Brigham Young University Studies, Spring 1969, p. 240)

Richard L. Bushman admits that there are some variations in the story, but he states:

The reasons for reshaping the story usually have to do with changes in immediate circumstances. We know that Joseph suffered from attacks on his character . . . Small wonder that afterwards he played down his prayer for forgiveness in accounts of the vision. . . . One would expect variations in the simplest and truest story. (Dialogue, Spring 1969, p. 83)

On page 91 of the same article, Dr. Bushman says that “there are bound to be variations in the reports of any event, simply because the narrator emphasizes one portion or another of the story. Simple slips may account for other differences. In the 1831 story, for example, Joseph places the first vision in his sixteenth year instead of his fifteenth, a mistake I for one can easily excuse considering how I always have to stop to calculate just how old one is in his fifteenth year.”

While it is true that it would have been easy for Joseph Smith to have made a few mistakes in relating the vision, we must agree with Wesley P. Walters when he states that “The matter is far deeper than a mere lapse of memory as to dating, for it enters into the very fabric of the story itself” (Dialogue, Spring 1969, p. 70).

We would, of course, expect some variations in any story, but we feel that there are so many variations in Joseph Smith’s story and they are of such a nature that they make it impossible to believe. The reader will remember that in the first written account Joseph Smith stated that only one personage appeared to him. The second account says there were many, and the third account says there were two. How can we reconcile such discrepancies?

In the Supplement to the new edition of her book, page 409, Mrs. Brodie stated:

Devout Mormon scholars have made it clear that they believe the differences between the three versions are of no consequence. But to the non-devout the differences are evidence of Joseph Smith’s exuberant talent for improvisation before a stimulating audience and his lack of care about consistency of detail. They bear out my original speculation that the first vision, if not an invention, was an evolutionary fantasy beginning in “a half-remembered dream stimulated by the early revival excitement and reinforced by the rich folklore of visions circulating in his neighborhood.”

Doctrinal Change

When Lauritz G. Petersen, Research Supervisor at the Church Historian’s Office, was asked concerning the different accounts of the First Vision, he wrote a letter in which he stated:

We are not concerned really with which of the two Versions of the First Vision is right. . . . Personally I would take the version which the Prophet Joseph gave himself when he stated that he saw two personages. Regardless[s] whether he saw one or two the fact remains that Jesus Christ is mentioned in both of them.

It is obvious from this statement that Mormon apologists are beginning to retreat from the idea that God the Father appeared to Joseph Smith. This is actually a very important matter, for Mormon leaders have used this vision as evidence for their doctrine of a plurality of gods. They have stated that this vision proves that God and Christ are two distinct personages and that they both have a body. They use this vision to prove that God Himself is only an exalted man. George Q. Cannon, who was a member of the First Presidency of the Mormon Church, made this statement in 1883:

There was no man scarcely upon the earth that had a true conception of God; . . . But all this was swept away in one moment by the appearance of the Almighty Himself—by the appearance of God, the Father, and His Son Jesus Christ, to the boy Joseph. . . . In one moment all this darkness disappeared, and once more there was a man found on the earth, embodied in the flesh, who had seen God. . . . This revelation dissipated all misconceptions and all false ideas, and removed the uncertainty that had existed respecting these matters. The Father came accompanied by the Son, thus showing that there were two personages of the Godhead, . . . Joseph saw that the Father had a form; that He had a head; that He had arms; that He had limbs; that He had feet; that He had a face and a tongue . . . There can be no faith that is not built upon a true conception of God our Father. Therefore, before even angels came, He came Himself, accompanied by His Son, and revealed Himself once more to man upon the earth. (Journal of Discourses, vol. 24, pp. 371-72)

The Mormon Apostle LeGrand Richards states:

This was the prophet’s first vision. From this we learn among other truths, that God the Father and his Son, Jesus Christ, are separate and distinct personages, and that man is literally created in the image of God. (A Marvelous Work And A Wonder, 1966, p. 12)

President Joseph Fielding Smith has said that “There is no account in history or revelation extant, where ever before both the Father and the Son appeared in the presence of mortal man in glory” (Essentials in Church History, pp. 46-47).

The Mormon Apostle John A. Widtsoe commented:

It was an extraordinary experience. Never before had God the Father and God the Son appeared to mortal man. . . .

The First Vision . . . shattered many a false doctrine taught throughout the centuries. . . .

A few, and a very few, had conceived God to be a personage. This view had ordinarily been laid aside, since it made God more nearly like man in body and powers. Men had held up their hands in horror at an anthropomorphic God, whatever that may have meant. . . .

The First Vision clarified this whole matter. . . . It answered the centuries’ old query about the nature of God. The Father and the Son had appeared to Joseph as persons, like men on earth in form. . . .

From the early days of Christianity, the erroneous doctrine of the nature of God had led to . . . the conception that the Father, the Son, and the Holy Ghost, the Godhead, were One, a unity. . . .

This false doctrine was laid low by the first vision. Two personages, the Father and the Son, stood before Joseph. . . . There was no mingling of personalities in the vision. Each of the personages was an individual member of the Godhead. Each one separately took part in the vision. (Joseph Smith—Seeker After Truth, pp. 4-7)

Actually, the fact that the first written account of the First Vision only mentioned one personage is consistent with what Joseph Smith believed about God when he wrote the Book of Mormon. The Book of Mormon, which was first published in 1830, taught that there was but one God:

And now Abinadi said unto them: I would that ye should understand that God himself shall come down among the children of men, and shall redeem his people. And because he dwelleth in flesh he shall be called the Son of God, and having subjected the flesh to the will of the Father, being the Father and the Son—. . . And thus the flesh becoming subject to the Spirit, or the Son to the Father, being one God, . . . (Book of Mormon, Mosiah 15:1, 2, 5)

The Book of Mormon tells of a visitation of the Father and the Son to the “brother of Jared.” The Father and the Son mentioned, however, are not two separate personages. Only one personage appears, and this personage says:

Behold, I am he who was prepared from the foundation of the world to redeem my people. Behold I am Jesus Christ. I am the Father and the Son. In me shall all mankind have light, . . . (Ether 3:14)

The Book of Mormon clearly teaches that God the Father is a spirit, and the first edition of the Doctrine and Covenants also contained a reference which stated that God is a Spirit.

It would appear, then, that Joseph Smith did not believe that God the Father had a body at the time he wrote his first account of the vision in the “wilderness.” Towards the end of his life, however, Joseph Smith changed his mind and decided that God was just an exalted man. In 1844 he maintained: “First, God himself, who sits enthroned in yonder heavens, is a man like unto one of yourselves, . . .” (Times and Seasons, vol. 5, p. 613).

Since Joseph Smith had changed his mind concerning the Godhead, he evidently decided to change his story concerning the First Vision.

Source of Confusion

After Joseph Smith’s death the Mormon leaders made some very confusing statements concerning the First Vision. Now that we have Joseph Smith’s first written accounts of the vision we are able to understand why they were in such a state of confusion. Wesley P. Walters states: “. . . the shift from an angel to Christ, then to angels, and finally to two personages introduced such haziness that even the Mormon leaders appeared confused as to the nature of the story itself” (Dialogue, Spring 1969, p. 73).

Below are a few examples which show the confusion concerning the First Vision which existed after Joseph Smith’s death.

In 1855 Brigham Young, the second President of the Church, gave a sermon in which he denied that the Lord came to Joseph Smith in the First Vision:

But as it was in the days of our Savior, so was it in the advent of this new dispensation. It was not in accordance with the notions, traditions, and pre-conceived ideas of the American people. The messenger did not come to an eminent divine of any of the so-called orthodoxy, he did not adopt their interpretations of the Holy Scriptures. The Lord did not come with the armies of heaven, in power and great glory, nor send His messengers panoplied with aught else than the truth of heaven, to communicate to the meek, the lowly, and the youth of humble origin, the sincere enquirer after the knowledge of God. But he did send his angel to this same obscure person, Joseph Smith jun., who afterwards became a Prophet, Seer and Revelator, and informed him that he should not join any of the religious sects of the day, for they were all wrong; that they were following the precepts of men instead of the Lord Jesus; . . . (Journal of Discourses, vol. 2, p. 171)

John Taylor, the third President of the Mormon Church, made the following statement on March 2, 1879:

. . . when the Prophet Joseph asked the angel which of the sects was right that he might join it. The answer was that none of them are right. What, none of them? No. We will not stop to argue that question; the angel merely told him to join none of them that none of them were right. (Journal of Discourses, vol. 20, p. 167)

George A. Smith, who was sustained as first counselor in the First Presidency in 1868, made the following statement in November of the same year:

When Joseph Smith was about fourteen or fifteen years old, . . . there was a revival of religion, and the different sects in the portion of the State— . . . He had read the Bible and had found that passage in James which says, “If any of you lack wisdom let him ask of God that giveth to all men liberally and upbraideth not,” and taking this literally, he went humbly before the Lord and inquired of Him, and the Lord answered his prayers, and revealed to Joseph, by the ministration of angels, the true condition of the religious world. When the holy angel appeared, Joseph inquired which of all these denominations was right and which he should join, and was told they were all wrong,— . . . (Journal of Discourses, vol. 12, pp. 333-334)

Heber C. Kimball, the First Counselor to Brigham Young, made the following statement: “Do you suppose that God in person called upon Joseph Smith, our Prophet? God called upon him; But God did not come himself and call, . . .” (Journal of Discourses, vol. 6, p. 29). Heber C. Kimball went on to explain that rather than God coming Himself, He sent messengers to Joseph Smith. He went on to state:

Why did he not come along? Because he has agents to attend to his business, and he sits upon his throne and is established at headquarters, and tells this man, “Go and do this;” and it is behind the veil just as it is here. You have got to learn that. (Journal of Discourses, vol. 6, p. 29)

Many other confusing statements about the First Vision were made by Mormon leaders after Joseph Smith’s death (see our Case, vol. 1, pp. 119-128).

The Mormon writer Richard L. Bushman admits that members of the Mormon Church may not have understood that the Father and the Son appeared to Joseph Smith:

Until 1838, in accounts for non-Church members he called the beings in the first vision personages or angels, covering the fact that he claimed to see the Father and the Son. Only in the private narrations for his history written in 1831 and 1838 did he frankly say the Lord had come to him. As Mr. Walters rightly points out, some Church members in the early years may have been unaware of the actual identity of the heavenly visitors. (Dialogue, Spring 1969, p. 84)

It is interesting to note that even Joseph Smith’s own brother, William Smith, said that it was an angel that first appeared to him:

In 1822 and 1823, the people in our neighborhood were very much stirred up with regard to religious matters by the preaching of a Mr. Lane, . . . Joseph, then about seventeen years of age, had become seriously inclined, . . .

At length he determined to call upon the Lord . . . He accordingly went out into the woods . . . While engaged in prayer a light appeared in the heavens, and descended until it rested upon the trees where he was. It appeared like fire. But to his great astonishment, did not burn the trees. An angel then appeared to him and conversed with him upon many things. He told him that none of the sects were right; . . .

The next day I was at work in the field together with Joseph . . . Joseph looked pale and unwell, . . . and sat down by the fence, when the angel again appeared to him, . . . (William Smith on Mormonism, Lamoni, Iowa, 1883, as quoted in A New Witness For Christ In America, vol. 2, pp. 414-415)

On June 8, 1884, William Smith again spoke of the personage who appeared in the First Vision as “an angel.” He also said that “Joseph was but about eighteen years old at this time, too young to be a deceiver” (The Saints’ Herald, vol. 31, no. 40, p. 643).

Richard L. Anderson, of Brigham Young University, makes this comment concerning William’s statements:

One cannot be certain that Joseph Smith told his vision of 1820 to young William—or that the boy would have been receptive to such a religious experience. . . . In 1823 Joseph stood before the family and probably recounted both experiences on the same occasion. It is likely that the two experiences merged in William’s mind because he first heard them together. William relates all the elements of the visions described separately by his brother and mother, but he telescopes every detail into a single experience. (Brigham Young University Studies, Spring 1969, pp. 399-400)

An Evolving Story

The Apostle John A. Widtsoe and other Mormon writers taught that from the beginning Joseph Smith openly proclaimed the fact that he had seen the Father and the Son. New evidence, however, has forced Mormon apologists to retreat from this position. They now state that Joseph Smith kept the story a secret most of his life. In some of his later sermons Joseph Smith tried to prove the doctrine of a plurality of Gods, but he did not use his own vision to prove the point. James B. Allen made this statement:

Present-day Mormons use it to demonstrate . . . the concept of God and Christ as distinct and separate physical beings. It is clear, of course, that Joseph Smith taught these doctrines, but it is of special interest to note that, as far as any recorded material reveals, he never used the story of his vision specifically to illustrate them.

When did church members begin to make such use of the story? Apparently the early teachers of the Church relied upon scriptural evidence alone to demonstrate the Mormon doctrine of God, and not until well into the Utah period did they begin to use Joseph Smith's story to illustrate it. One of the earliest recorded sermons to make this use of the story was given by George Q. Cannon on October 7, 1883. . . .

Probably there were earlier sermons or writings that used the story of the first vision to demonstrate the Mormon doctrine of God. Evidence indicates, however, that they were rare in these early days and that only gradually did this use of the story find place in the traditions of the Church. (Dialogue: A Journal of Mormon Thought, Autumn 1966, pp. 38-39)

In 1852 Orson Pratt stated that "both the Father and the Son" appeared to Joseph Smith, but Mormon scholars have been unable to locate any sermon by Brigham Young in which he identifies the personages as God the Father and His Son Jesus Christ. As we have shown before, in one sermon Brigham Young said that "The Lord did not come . . . But he did send his angel to this same obscure person, Joseph Smith jun., . . ." (Ibid., vol. 2, p. 171). Even Dr. Nibley has to admit that Brigham Young never used the First Vision to prove the doctrine of a plurality of Gods:

A favorite theme of Brigham Young's was the tangible, personal nature of God, which he never illustrates by any mention of the first vision. (Improvement Era, November 1961, p. 868)

James B. Allen wrote:

It has been demonstrated that an understanding of the story of Joseph Smith's vision dawned only gradually upon the membership of the Church during his lifetime, and that new and important uses were made of the story after his death. (Dialogue: A Journal of Mormon Thought, Autumn 1966, p. 45)

Today the First Vision has become of such importance that a person must believe it to be considered a good Mormon. J. Reuben Clark, who was a member of the First Presidency, made this emphatic declaration:

No teacher who does not have a real testimony of the truth of the Gospel as revealed to and believed by the Latter-day Saints, and a testimony of the Sonship and Messiahship of Jesus, and of the divine mission of Joseph Smith—including in all its reality the First Vision—has any place in the Church school system. If there be any such, and I hope and pray there are none, he should at once resign; if the Commissioner knows of any such and he does not resign, the Commissioner should request his resignation. The First Presidency expect this pruning to be made. (Improvement Era, Sept. 1938, as quoted in "The Social Psychological Basis of Mormon New-Orthodoxy," M.A. thesis, by Owen Kendall White, Jr., University of Utah, 1967 p. 162)

Thus we see that to be in good standing a Mormon must believe in Joseph Smith's First Vision. David O. McKay, the ninth President of the Church, stated that the First Vision is the very "foundation of this Church" (Gospel Ideals, p. 85). In his thesis, page 75, Paul R. Cheesman has stated that the Mormon Church "must stand or fall on the authenticity of the First Vision and the appearance of the Angel Moroni." John A. Widtsoe stated: "The story of the First Vision need only be studied from original sources to assure the seeker not only of its truth, but also of the time of its occurrence" (Joseph Smith—Seeker After Truth, p. 26). When we examine the original sources, however, we find that the First Vision story rests on a very sandy foundation.

Dr. Hugh Nibley once criticized anti-Mormon writers for omitting the words "This is my beloved Son" when giving Joseph Smith's story. If Dr. Nibley had read Joseph Smith's first account of the vision, perhaps he would not have been so eager to criticize others, for Joseph Smith not only omitted the "all-important" words, but he also left God the Father completely out of the vision!

The second account by Joseph Smith also did not contain the "all important" words; in fact, it contained words which seem to show that it was not the Father and the Son.

An examination of the first published history of the church makes matters even worse, for it does not even mention the First Vision. Moreover, Oliver Cowdery claimed that in 1823 Joseph Smith did not even know "if a Supreme being did exist." Certainly, if Joseph Smith had seen the Father and the Son in 1820, he would know in 1823 that a Supreme being did exist!

Besides all this, falsification has been found in the History of the Church. We have found that Joseph Smith told Erastus Holmes about his "first visitation of angels," but later Mormon historians have altered this to read: "my first vision."

We have also found that Joseph Smith's "brief history" which he related to "Joshua the Jewish minister" (more than 800 words) has been left out of the printed version of the History of the Church.

It is very difficult to believe in the authenticity of Joseph Smith's First Vision when there is so much evidence against it.

Those who argue that the "strange" accounts of the First Vision can be harmonized with Joseph Smith's printed account might do well to read a speech given by S. Dilworth Young, of the First Council of the Seventy. This speech was given sometime before the "strange" accounts became known to the public. We quote the following from this speech:

I cannot remember the time when I have not heard the story, . . . concerning the coming of the Father and the Son to the Prophet Joseph Smith. . . .

I am concerned however with one item which has recently been called to my attention on this matter. There appears to be going about our communities some writing to the effect that the Prophet Joseph Smith evolved his doctrine from what might have been a vision, in which he is supposed to have said that he saw an angel, instead of the Father and Son. According to this theory, by the time he was inspired to write the occurrence in 1838, he had come to the conclusion that there were two beings.

This rather shocked me. I can see no reason why the Prophet, with his brilliant mind, would have failed to remember in sharp relief every detail of that eventful day. I can remember quite vividly that in 1915 I had a mere dream, and while the dream was prophetic in its nature, it was not startling. It has been long since fulfilled, but I can remember every detail of it as sharply and clearly as though it had happened yesterday. How then could any man conceive that the Prophet, receiving such a vision as he received, would not remember it and would fail to write it clearly, distinctly, and accurately? (Improvement Era, June 1957, p. 436)

Now that we have the “strange” accounts we find that the First Vision story did evolve. The story was changed from one personage to two, and Joseph Smith once referred to the vision as a “visitation of Angels.”

No Revival in 1820

Joseph Smith claimed that just before he received his First Vision there was a great revival in his neighborhood:

Some time in the second year after our removal to Manchester, there was in the place where we lived an unusual excitement on the subject of religion. It commenced with the Methodists, but soon became general among all sects in that region of country, indeed the whole district of country seemed affected by it, and great multitudes united themselves to the different religious parties, which created no small stir and division amongst the people, . . .

I was at this time in my fifteenth year. My father’s family was proselyted to the Presbyterian faith, and four of them joined that church, namely, my mother Lucy, my brothers Hyrum, Samuel, Harrison, and my sister Sophronia.

During this time of great excitement my mind was called up to serious reflection . . . So in accordance with this my determination, to ask of God, I retired to the woods to make the attempt. It was on the morning of a beautiful clear day, early in the spring of eighteen hundred and twenty. (Times and Seasons, vol. 3, pp. 727-28)

In 1967 the Utah Christian Tract Society published Wesley P. Walters’ study, New Light on Mormon Origins From The Palmyra (N.Y.) Revival. In the foreword to this work, Mr. Walters states:

Mormons account for the origin of their movement by quoting from a narrative written by their prophet Joseph Smith, Jr. in 1838. In this account he claims that a revival broke out in the Palmyra, New York area in 1820 . . .

Information which we have recently uncovered conclusively proves that the revival did not occur until the fall of 1824 and that no revival occurred between 1819 and 1823 in the Palmyra vicinity.

On pages 5, 8, 11 and 12 of the same pamphlet we find these statements by Wesley Walters:

However, the point at which one might most conclusively test the accuracy of Smith’s story has never been adequately explored. A vision, by its inward, personal nature, does not lend itself to historical investigation. A revival is a different matter, especially one such as Joseph Smith describes, in which “great multitudes” were said to have joined the various churches involved. Such a revival does not pass from the scene without leaving some traces in the records and publications of the period. In this study we wish to show by the contemporary records that the revival, which Smith claimed occurred in 1820, did not occur until the fall of 1824. We also show that in 1820 there was no revival in any of the churches in Palmyra or its vicinity. In short, our investigation shows that the statement of Joseph Smith, Jr. can not be true when he claims that he was stirred up by an 1820 revival to make his inquiry in the grove near his home. . . .

An even more surprising confirmation that this revival occurred in 1824 and not in 1820 has just recently come to light. While searching through some dusty volumes of early Methodist literature at a nearby Methodist college, imagine our surprise and elation when we stumbled upon Rev. George Lane’s own personal account of the Palmyra revival. It was written, not at some years distance from the event as the Mormon accounts all were, but while the revival was still in progress and was printed a few months later. Lane’s account gives us not only the year, 1824, but even the month and date. . . .

By September 1825 the results of the revival for Palmyra had become a matter of record. The Presbyterian church reported 99 admitted on examination and the Baptist had received 94 by baptism, while the Methodist circuit showed an increase of 208. . . .

When we turn to the year 1820, however, the “great multitudes” are conspicuously missing. The Presbyterian Church in Palmyra certainly experienced no awakening that year. Rev. James Hotchkin’s history records revivals for that church as occurring in the years 1817, 1824, 1829, etc., but nothing for the year 1820. The records of Presbytery and Synod give the same picture. . . . Since these reports always rejoice at any sign of a revival in the churches, it is inconceivable that a great awakening had occurred in their Palmyra congregation and gone completely unnoticed.

The Baptist Church records also show clearly that they had no revival in 1820, for the Palmyra congregation gained only 5 by baptism, while the neighboring Baptist churches of Lyons, Canandaigua and Farmington showed net losses of 4, 5 and 9 respectively. . . .

The Methodist figures, though referring to the entire circuit, give the same results, for they show net losses of 23 for 1819, 6 for 1820 and 40 for 1821. This hardly fits Joseph Smith’s description of “great multitudes” being added to the churches of the area. In fact, the Mormon Prophet could hardly have picked a poorer year in which to place his revival, so far as the Methodists were concerned. (New Light On Mormon Origins, pp. 5, 8, 11, 12)

Mormon scholars became very concerned when they saw Wesley P. Walters’ study. They were so disturbed, in fact, that a team was sent back east to do research concerning the First Vision and other matters dealing with the history of the Mormon Church in New York.

Richard L. Bushman, who was on the committee headed by Truman G. Madsen, made these interesting statements regarding Walters’ work:

The Reverend Mr. Walters’ article on the first vision raised quite a stir among Mormon scholars when an early version circulated about a year and a half ago. . . . Mr. Walters’ purpose, like that of many of his predecessors, was to discredit Joseph Smith’s account of the first vision and all that depended on it. But the style of his attack was both refreshing and disconcerting. . . . it was free of the obvious rancor characteristic of anti-Mormon writers. . . . They cannot resist twisting the knife. Mr. Walters, by contrast, sticks to his facts. . . .

The article also set us back because Mr. Walters took an entirely new track and followed it with admirable care. . . . he . . . concentrated on a brand-new question: Were there revivals in 1819-20 in the vicinity of Palmyra as Joseph said? Everyone up until now had assumed that of course there were. Walters said no, and the sources of his answer were impressive. They stood apart from the biased materials on which most anti-Mormon work is based. They were contemporaneous with the event, and they were right to the point. Our consternation was a genuine compliment to the quality of Mr. Walters’ work.

While Mr. Walters has put us on the spot for the moment, in the long run Mormon scholarship will benefit from his attack. Not only was there an immediate effort to answer the question of an 1819 revival, but Mormon historians asked themselves how many other questions remain unasked as well as unanswered. Not long after we saw his essay, a committee on “Mormon History in New York” sent a group of scholars east for special research. . . . Without wholly intending it, Mr. Walters may have done as much to advance the cause of Mormon history within the Church as anyone in recent years.

Meanwhile, of course, we have to assess the damage he has done to Joseph's story of the first vision. (Dialogue: A Journal of Mormon Thought, Spring 1969, pp. 82-83)

Although the scholars who went east "scoured libraries, studied newspapers, and sought to find private individuals who might uncover hitherto unknown source materials" (BYU Studies, Spring 1969, p. 242), they were unable to find evidence of a revival in Palmyra in 1820. In their article, "Mormon Origins in New York," James B. Allen and Leonard J. Arrington (who later became Church Historian) reported:

What evidence do we have, other than the word of Joseph Smith, that there was "an unusual excitement on the subject of religion" in the vicinity of Palmyra in 1820? Up to this point little such evidence has been uncovered, and Walters challenged the story in the article referred to above. Milton Backman, however, has discovered interesting new material which he presents in his important article on the historical setting of the First Vision. (Brigham Young University Studies, Spring 1969, p. 272)

Richard L. Anderson, of the Brigham Young University, makes some rather strange statements with regard to Joseph Smith's account of the revival:

If years of religious activity are summarized in the short sentences of abbreviated accounts, did Joseph Smith's 1838 history really intend to portray all revival events as happening just before his vision? In that narrative the Prophet identifies the "unusual excitement" as beginning "in the second year after our removal to Manchester," but the outcome may move considerably beyond this sequence. Beginning in the Smith's area, revival spread through "that region of country," then to the "whole district of country." Even though Joseph alludes to himself as fifteen then, it is possible that "this time of great excitement" may refer to the entire period of revivals in his youth, with special reference to excesses, irrespective of chronology. . . . There is no reason why Joseph Smith might not have viewed the intense 1824-25 Palmyra revivals as part of a period beginning earlier than his vision. (Brigham Young University Studies, Spring 1969, pp. 375-376)

In his article, "Awakenings in the Burned-over District: New Light on the Historical Setting of the First Vision," Milton V. Backman, Jr., seems unable to provide evidence that there was a revival in Palmyra. He indicates, however, that Joseph Smith may have heard or read of revivals in other portions of the state:

Although membership records provide one indication of religious activity in a community, occasionally an unusual religious excitement occurred in a neighborhood without resulting in an immediate increase in church membership. . . . Some "outpourings of the Spirit" have vanished from mankind's memory because a contemporary failed to record the "extension of the power of godliness" or because the primary source was not preserved. . . . A careful reading of the Prophet's account indicates that the great increase in membership occurred in "the whole district of country," meaning possibly western New York or eastern and western New York and not necessarily Palmyra, Farmington, or just the neighborhood where he lives. Joseph undoubtedly learned that many revivals were occurring in New York in 1819 and 1820. . . . In the summer and early fall of 1820, for example, descriptive accounts of awakenings occurring in central and upstate New York were published in the Palmyra Register, . . . The June 7, 1820, issue carried a brief report of "Great Revivals in Religion" in the eastern part of the state. This revival was more fully reported on in a later issue. (Brigham Young University Studies, Spring 1969, pp. 315-16)

Dr. Backman cites three issues of the Palmyra Register—i.e., June 7, 1820; August 16, 1820; and September 13, 1820. The reader will note that these are the same issues that we cited in our Case Against Mormonism, vol. 1, page 113:

In briefly looking over the Palmyra Register we have found no evidence of a revival in Palmyra in 1820. The issue for June 7, 1820 tells of a revival in the towns of Stillwater, Malta, Ballston, Schenectady, Amsterdam and Galway, but no mention is made of Palmyra or Manchester. The issue for August 16, 1820 tells of a revival in Homer, New York, but again there is no mention of a local revival. The issue of September 13, 1820 also speaks of revivals in cities in New York, but there is no mention of any revivals in Palmyra or Manchester.

We feel that it is very significant that the Mormon research team has been unable to find any reference to a local revival in the Palmyra Register. The fact that the Palmyra Register devoted space to revivals that occurred in other parts of the state and did not mention any local revival seems to prove that there was no revival in Palmyra in 1820. Richard L. Bushman makes these comments concerning this matter:

Mr. Walters' main argument is that no revival occurred in Palmyra itself. But even that fact cannot be established absolutely. It is a negative claim and depends on negative evidence, which is always tenuous. Mr. Walters relies on the absence of revival reports, but just because someone failed to write a report of an event does not mean it did not occur. . . . lots of things happen that are never recorded. . . . The news included in the Palmyra paper depended on the taste and inclinations of the editor. . . . The point is that although we think a revival should have been recorded, there are many reasons why it could have been missed. We cannot know for sure that an event did not occur unless reliable witnesses on the scene say so, and thus far Mr. Walters has found none such to testify. (Dialogue: A Journal of Mormon Thought, Spring 1969, p. 87)

Richard L. Bushman states that "Mr. Walters relies on the absence of reports in newspapers and general histories to reach his conclusion of no revivals" (Ibid., pp. 89-90). Wesley P. Walters, however, shows that the denominational magazines would have mentioned a revival if one had actually occurred:

Another significant lack of information concerning an 1820 revival lies in the area of the religious press. The denominational magazines of that day were full of reports of revivals, some even devoting sections to them. These publications carried more than a dozen glowing reports of the revival that occurred at Palmyra in the winter of 1816-17. Likewise, the 1824-25 revival is covered in a number of reports. These magazines, however, while busily engaged in reporting revivals during the 1819 to 1821 period, contain not a single mention of any revival taking place in the Palmyra area during this time. It is unbelievable that every one of the denominations which Joseph Smith depicts as affected by an 1820 revival could have completely overlooked the event. Even the Palmyra newspaper, while reporting revivals at several places in the state, has no mention whatever of any revival in Palmyra or vicinity either in 1819 or 1820. The only reasonable explanation for this massive silence is that no revival occurred in the Palmyra area in 1820. (Dialogue, Spring 1969, p. 67)

Richard Bushman claims that Mr. Walters is judging by a wrong standard:

In assessing Mr. Walters' second line of reasoning, the inferior size of the 1819-20 revivals, two considerations must be kept in mind. The first is that the revivals of 1824 were not the standard for people in 1819. In his article, Mr. Walters tells us first of the hundreds converted in the later years and then goes back to 1819 to show how insipid by comparison. . . . Without knowing anything greater, did the excitement of 1819 strike him as unusual? Did the reports of conversions in the surrounding area sound like great multitudes joining the churches? Remember that he was just developing personal religious concerns and, judging by the 1831-32 narrative of the first vision, was sensitive to religious sincerity and hypocrisy. Would reports of awakenings and conversions, however modest by comparison to later revivals, have registered with this sensitized man as unusual and great? (Dialogue, Spring 1969, p. 99)

In rebuttal Mr. Walters stated:

... he mistakenly suggests that “the revivals of 1824 were not the standard for the people in 1819.” Actually, the Palmyra Presbyterian Church received more converts in their 1817 revival (“126 have been hopefully born again, and 106 added”) than they did in the 1824 revival (99 added). Most of the people who lived through this 1817 revival were still living in 1819 and in 1824, Joseph’s own family to name just one example. (Ibid, pp. 95-96)

Lane and Stockton

According to the first history of the church, published in the Messenger and Advocate, in 1834-35, a Methodist minister by the name of Lane participated in the revival in Palmyra:

One Mr. Lane, a presiding Elder of the Methodist church, visited Palmyra, and vicinity. . . . There was a great awakening, or excitement raised on the subject of religion, . . . Large additions were made to the Methodist, Presbyterian, and Baptist churches. (Messenger and Advocate, vol. 1, p. 42)

The Mormon historian B. H. Roberts claimed that both Rev. Lane and Rev. Stockton were present at the revival, which he claims occurred in the spring of 1820:

In the spring of 1820 the ministers of the several churches in and about Palmyra decided upon a “union revival,” in order to “convert the unconverted.” The Presbyterians, Methodists and Baptists were the sects represented, and the Reverend Mr. Stockton of the Presbyterian church was the leading spirit of the movement, and chairman of the meetings. . . . The Reverend Mr. Stockton, however, insisted that the work done was largely Presbyterian work as he had been a dominating influence in the movement, and presided at the meetings. The Reverend Mr. Lane of the Methodist church preached a sermon on the subject, “What church shall I join?” He quoted the golden text of James—. . .

The text made a deep impression on the mind of the Prophet. (A Comprehensive History of the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints, 1930, vol. 1, pp. 51-53)

Wesley P. Walters shows that this could not have occurred in 1820 as B. H. Roberts maintained:

The records, however, of both the Presbyterian and Methodist churches, to which Mr. Stockton and Mr. Lane respectively belonged, make it clear that neither of these men were assigned to the Paymyra [sic] area until 1824. Rev. Benjamin B. Stockton from March 4, 1818 until June 30, 1822 was serving as pastor of the church at Skaneateles, N.Y. While he did visit Palmyra for a speech to the youth missionary society in October 1822, the Palmyra newspaper still describes him as “Rev. Stockton of Skaneateles.” The earliest contemporary reference to his ministering in the Palmyra area is in connection with a wedding November 26, 1823, just a week after Alvin Smith’s death. Following this date there are several references to his performing some service there, but he was not installed as pastor of the Presbyterian Church until February 18, 1824. It is in this latter year, 1824, that Rev. James Hotchkin, in cataloging the revivals that occurred in the churches of Geneva Presbytery, writes under the heading of the Palmyra church, that a “copious shower of grace passed over this region in 1824, under the labors of Mr. Stockton, and a large number were gathered into the church, some of whom are now pillars in Christ’s house.”

In the summer of 1819 Rev. Lane, whom Mormon writers have correctly identified as Rev. George Lane, was assigned to serve the Susquehanna District in central Pennsylvania, over 150 miles from Palmyra. He served this area for 5 years and not until July of 1824 did he receive an appointment to serve as Presiding Elder of the Ontario District in which Palmyra is located. This post he held only until January of 1825 when ill health in his family forced him to leave the ministry for a while. Any revival, therefore, in which both Lane and Stockton shared, as the accounts of Oliver Cowdery and William Smith both indicate, has to fall in the latter half of the year 1824, and not in the year 1820. (New Light on Mormon Origins From the Palmyra (N.Y.) Revival, by Wesley P. Walters, 1967, pp. 7-8)

The Mormon writer Larry C. Porter has made a study concerning Rev. George Lane. His research tends to confirm Wesley Walters’ study:

For eight days, July 1, 1819 to July 8, 1819, George Lane was in attendance at the annual Genesee Conference at Vienna, New York (now Phelps), some fifteen miles southeast of the Smith farm at Manchester. . . .

From July 1819 to July 1823, Lane served as supervising elder of the Susquehanna District. During the interval from July 1823 to July 1824, his appointment was the Wyoming circuit. In July 1824 he was once more assigned as a presiding elder, this time, however, to the Ontario District. . . . For an entire year, then, July 1824 to July 1825, Lane presided over the district within the confines of which the Smith family resided (Manchester was probably on the Ontario circuit). (Brigham Young University Studies, Spring 1969, pp. 335-336)

James Allen and Leonard Arrington frankly admit that the Mormon historian B. H. Roberts was in error about Lane serving in Palmyra in 1820 but feel there is a “possibility” he passed through the vicinity:

Are we Mormons willing to admit that some of our writers have made mistakes in trying to reconcile conflicting accounts of Joseph Smith’s early experience? A case in point is B. H. Roberts’ description of the setting for Joseph Smith’s First Vision. Roberts based his conclusion upon an attempted correlation of the accounts of Joseph Smith, William Smith, and Oliver Cowdery. He said that it was in 1820 that a certain Reverend Lane so affected Joseph Smith by his preaching that he was induced to utter the prayer which resulted in that First Vision. . . . It is probable that Roberts came to his conclusion because the revival described by Cowdery seemed similar to the 1820 religious excitement later described by Joseph Smith. Clearing up the confusion of dates does not seem as important here as a frank recognition that there is such confusion. The inconsistencies in early sources do not affect the credibility of Joseph Smith, but our failure to discuss them perpetuates the myth that Mormon writers are not willing “to face the facts.” . . . Larry Porter, in his fine essay in this issue, effectively challenges some of Walters’ inferences by showing the possibility that Lane may have passed through the Palmyra vicinity in 1820. But more research is needed before a final conclusion can be reached. (Brigham Young University Studies, Spring 1969, pp. 271-272)

Wesley P. Walters makes this statement concerning this matter:

Except for Elder Lane’s brief presence at the 1819 meeting that appointed him to serve in Pennsylvania, there seems to be no evidence whatever that he even came near the Palmyra area during the 1819-20 period. Since the assigned fields of labor, for both Lane and Stockton, were so far from Palmyra, any revival in which both of these men shared must fall in the latter half of the year 1824, and not in the year 1820. (Dialogue, Spring 1969, pp. 63-64)

The Mormon writer Richard L. Anderson seems to be willing to concede that Lane did not minister in Palmyra in 1820: “As shown by Larry Porter’s accompanying article, this Methodist leader had no Palmyra ministry until several years after 1819-20” (BYU Studies, Spring 1969, p. 398). Mormon writers now find themselves in an embarrassing position regarding Reverend Lane. Before Walters’ work appeared they had tried to show that Lane was involved in the revival. Hyrum Andrus, for instance, made this statement:

It was during this contest that a Methodist minister, Reverend Lane, preached a sermon on “What church shall I join?” He admonished the people to ask God, using the text, “If any of you lack wisdom, let him ask of God, . . .” (Joseph Smith, the Man and the Seer; Salt Lake City, 1965, p. 65)

The Mormon historian B. H. Roberts claimed that “Reverend Mr. Lane” was “at least the most active minister of the Methodist persuasion in the revival” and that it was “he who had preached the sermon on ‘What church shall I join;’ and had used James 1:5 as his text” (Comprehensive History of the Church, vol. 1, p. 56, n. 10). The Mormon Apostle John A. Widtsoe emphatically maintained that George Lane was ministering in Palmyra when Joseph Smith had his First Vision:

The preacher to whom he told his story was Reverend George Lane, who was the leader of the Palmyra revival and who had quoted the saying from James, which had so deeply affected the lad.

It is only reasonable to suppose that Reverend Lane told others of Joseph’s story. (Joseph Smith—Seeker After Truth, pp. 16-17)

On page 22 of the same book, the Apostle Widtsoe claimed that Oliver Cowdery confirmed the date of Rev. Lane’s work in Palmyra: “Oliver Cowdery in his letters confirms the story of Reverend Lane and the date of his work in Palmyra.”

Actually, Oliver Cowdery did not confirm the date as 1820. Instead, he insisted that the correct date should be 1823:

You will recollect that I mentioned the time of a religious excitement, in Palmyra and vicinity to have been in the 15th year of our brother J. Smith Jr’s. age—that was an error in the type—it should have been in the 17th. —You will please remember this correction, as it will be necessary for the full understanding of what will follow in time. This would bring the date down to the year 1823. (Messenger and Advocate, vol. 1, p. 78)

In footnote 10 on page 22 of his book, Joseph Smith—Seeker After Truth, the Apostle Widtsoe stated: “Reverend Lane himself confirms the dates of the revival. It was 1820, not 1823.”

Notice that John A. Widtsoe gives no source for this statement. Now that Mormon writers are beginning to admit that Lane “had no Palmyra ministry until several years after 1819-20” (BYU Studies, Spring 1969, page 398), they are casting a shadow of doubt upon the honesty of the Apostle Widtsoe. When Wesley P. Walters wrote the LDS Church Historian’s Office asking for documentation for Apostle Widtsoe’s statement, he received a letter from Lauritz G. Petersen, Assistant Librarian. In this letter Petersen stated:

The letter that you sent to Mr. Earl Olson was handed to me to answer. I checked all the footnotes or found the footnot[es] for Mr. Widtsoe’s book on Joseph Smith.

The reference made by Mr. Widtsoe on page 22 n. 10 could not be verified. I asked Mr. Widtsoe not to insert it in the book, but he did anyway. (Letter by Lauritz G. Petersen, December 7, 1966)

Moving the Revival

Before Mr. Walters’ study appeared Mormon writers taught that the revival occurred right in Palmyra, but since the Mormon research team has been unable to find evidence of a revival in Palmyra, Mormon apologists are now beginning to forsake Palmyra and search elsewhere for a revival. Lauritz G. Petersen, Research Supervisor at the Church Historian’s Office, made these statements in a letter dated November 1, 1968:

Now let me ask you a question. Where was the revival? In Palmyra? He doesn’t mention a revival at all. He mentions an unusual excitement [sic] in the “Whole district of country.” Could an excitement [sic] be caused by a revival somewhere near the area? He doesn’t mention being to a revival. If there was a revival somewhere outside of Palmyra and the news of it had already excited the village, would or could it be possible that the Smith family have travelled there to sell root beer and cakes? (Letter from Lauritz G. Petersen, November 1, 1968)

Although it is true that Joseph Smith does not use the word “Palmyra,” his description makes it very clear that he was referring to this area. He states that there “was in the place where we lived an unusual excitement on the subject of religion” (History of the Church, vol. 1, p. 2). In 1843 Joseph Smith told a reporter that the revival occurred right in his “neighborhood”: “There was a reformation among the different religious denominations in the neighborhood where I lived, and I became serious, and was desirous to know what church to join” (New York Spectator, September 23, 1843, as quoted in Joseph Smith the Prophet, by Preston Nibley, pp. 30-31).

Since Joseph Smith said that the revival occurred in “the neighborhood where I lived,” we feel that he must have been referring to Palmyra. Furthermore, the first printed “history of the rise of the church” published in the Messenger and Advocate—the official church organ—in 1834-35 plainly stated that the revival was in “Palmyra, and vicinity” (Messenger and Advocate, vol. 1, p. 42). The Mormon historian B. H. Roberts definitely stated that the revival was in “Palmyra” (Comprehensive History of the Church, vol. 1, p. 35). On page 51 of the same volume, Mr. Roberts claimed that the “churches in and about Palmyra decided upon a ‘union revival,’ in order to ‘convert the unconverted.’”

Since Mormon apologists have been unable to prove that the revival took place in Palmyra, they have tried to find reasons why Joseph Smith would have been in another city. Some Mormon writers have suggested that Joseph Smith might have been present at Conference meetings held in Vienna (now known as Phelps). Wesley P. Walters, however, has answered this argument in Dialogue: A Journal of Mormon Thought, Spring 1969, p. 69.

Mormon writers are not only trying to move the location of the revival from Palmyra to Vienna, but they are also trying to change the date of the revival. In the past it was taught that the revival occurred in 1820. Joseph Smith stated that he was in his “fifteenth year” at the time of the excitement (History of the Church, vol. 1, p. 3). Also, that he had had his first vision “early in the spring of eighteen hundred and twenty.” The Mormon historian B. H. Roberts dated the revival in the “spring of 1820” (Comprehensive History of the Church, vol. 1, p. 51). The Apostle John A. Widtsoe stated: “Palmyra, a village in western New York State, near his home, was swept in the winter and spring of 1820 by a religious revival” (Joseph Smith—Seeker After Truth, p. 1). Many other references could be cited, but these are enough to illustrate that the Mormon leaders have always taught that the revival occurred in 1820. That they are trying to revise this date is obvious from Richard Bushman’s answer to Mr. Walters, for he speaks of the “question of an 1819 revival” (Dialogue, Spring 1969, p. 83). In his book, Joseph Smith—the Man and the Seer, Hyrum L. Andrus claimed that the revival occurred in “the spring of 1820” (page 63). In his latest book, however, Andrus speaks of the revival as “the revival of 1819-1820” (God, Man and the Universe, 1968, p. 42), and on page 41 of the same book we find this statement: “Joseph Smith evidently attended the Methodist revival meetings in the woods near Vienna, in the summer of 1819.”

Although Dr. Andrus still maintains that the revival came to Palmyra, it is plain to see that he is trying to explain away the fact that the churches in Palmyra did not increase in membership as they would have if a revival had actually occurred:

There were some features about the revival of 1819-1820 which caused it to end on a negative note, particularly in the area of Manchester and Palmyra. . . . Joseph Smith wrote that “great multitudes united themselves to the different religious parties, which created no small stir and division amongst the people.” This does not necessarily mean that they became members of the existing churches. . . . The revival of 1819-1820 was an abortive affair that failed to produce many positive results for the existing churches. It was an emotional upsurge that ended on a negative note. (God, Man, and the Universe, pp. 42-43)

Wesley P. Walters makes this interesting observation in regard to this argument:

A second approach maintains that the revival was at some distance from the area where the Smiths lived, that it caused considerable stir in their immediate neighborhood, but ended “on a negative note.” It consequently left no visible traces either in the local or denominational papers of 1820 or in terms of substantial membership gains for the churches of the Palmyra and Manchester area. . . . The point of the Prophet’s story is not that there were revivals occurring throughout the state that year—for this was true every year. His point was that “an unusual excitement” was going on right there “in the place where we lived.” Multitudes of his neighbors became “converts” and “united” with the various churches of his community, and it was this situation that led him to ask “which I should join.”...

It is further suggested by those who approach the problem by this method that when Joseph spoke of great multitudes “uniting with the different religious parties,” he did not necessarily mean that they joined the various churches, but rather that they split up into little cliques which merely took sides in a general controversy. To put such a construction on the word “parties” is to fail to notice that the Prophet uses this very term to refer to the various denominations. In the “war of words” among Presbyterians, Baptists, and Methodists, Joseph speaks of the denominations as “endeavoring to establish their own tenets and disprove all others” and this leads him to ask, “Who of all the parties are right?” Even members of his own family had been “proselyted” to the Presbyterian faith, while “converts” flied off to the different parties. That these converts actually joined the churches of Palmyra and vicinity is made clear when the Cowdery-Smith account states that “large additions were made to the Methodists, Presbyterian and Baptist churches.” To suggest that these multitudes merely aligned themselves with various feuding groups and that consequently the revival was “abortive” and ended “on a negative note” is to completely miss one of the main points of Joseph’s narrative. The entire thrust of his story is that right there where he lived multitudes were joining the various churches, but with so much conflict in their tenets he was at a loss which one to join himself. The year 1820, however, was not the period when any great multitudes were joining the churches of Palmyra and vicinity. It is not until the revival of 1824-25 that we find a situation that matches the conditions described in this official first vision story. (Dialogue: A Journal of Mormon Thought, Spring 1969, pp. 68-70)

In trying to explain the lack of evidence for a revival in Palmyra, Richard L. Bushman states:

The second consideration is that admissions to membership do not necessarily measure the intensity of a revival. . . . There might be an unusual excitement about a religion and only a few people actually qualify for admission. High admissions are a good sign of a revival; absence of admissions does not necessarily mean no religious excitement. . . . The “great multitudes” joining churches occurred in “the whole district of country.” The excitement may have been an awakening or a prospect of a revival, not a shower of grace itself with the resulting increase in memberships and reports in the national religious press. (Dialogue: A Journal of Mormon Thought, Spring 1969, p. 88)

A Changing Story

Before Wesley P. Walters’ work appeared, Mormon writers claimed to have a great deal of evidence to prove that the revival occurred in Palmyra in 1820. Preston Nibley, who later became Assistant Church Historian, claimed there were “several accounts of the religious revival which took place at Palmyra in the spring of 1820” (Joseph Smith the Prophet, Salt Lake City, 1944, p. 21).

Preston Nibley offers three accounts to prove that there was a revival “in Palmyra in the Spring of 1820.” One of the accounts is the one published by Joseph Smith in the Times and Seasons. Another is a statement by Joseph Smith’s brother, William Smith. Preston Nibley quotes from an interview which a “Brother Briggs” had with William Smith:

“What caused Joseph to ask for guidance as to what church he ought to join?” asked Bro. Briggs. William answered as follows:

Why there was a joint revival in the neighborhood between the Baptists, Methodists and Presbyterians and they had succeeded in stirring up quite a feeling, and after the meeting the question arose which church should have the converts. Rev. Stockton was the president of the meeting and suggested that it was their meeting and under their care and they ought to join the Presbyterians, but as father did not like Rev. Stockton very well, our folks hesitated . . . (Joseph Smith the Prophet, pp. 23-24)

If Preston Nibley had quoted the paragraph just before it would have overthrown his argument that the revival occurred in the spring of 1820. This paragraph, which was published in the Deseret News, January 20, 1894, read as follows:

“Hyrum, Samuel, Katharine and mother were members of the Presbyterian church. My father would not join. He did not like it because a Rev. Stockton had preached my brother’s funeral sermon and intimated very strongly that he had gone to hell, for Alvin was not a church member, but he was a good boy and my father did not like it.”

Notice that William Smith tells that his father would not join the Presbyterian church because Reverend Stockton had intimated that Alvin “had gone to hell.” Now, since Alvin did not die until 1823, this would mean that the revival could not have started before 1823. Thus we see that when the statement is taken in context it proves that the revival did not occur in the spring of 1820.

President Nibley’s only other evidence for a revival in 1820 is taken from a book written by Willard Bean, a Mormon writer. Mr. Nibley states:

I shall reproduce first the account as related in “The Beginning of Mormonism.”

In the year 1819 a sort of religious awakening started in Massachusetts, gradually moving down the eastern seaboard, gathering momentum as it spread, . . . After reaching New York it spread to the rural districts upstate, reaching Palmyra and vicinity in the Spring of 1820. It appears that Rev. Jesse Townsend, a young Yale graduate, but recently set apart for the ministry and assigned to the pastorate of the new Presbyterian Church of Palmyra, was the first in these parts to catch the religious fervor, and accordingly started a revival. He was soon joined by the Presbyterian minister of East Palmyra, closely followed by the Baptist minister and two Methodist ministers of Palmyra.

The revival started the latter part of April, before the rural people could get onto their land to begin spring plowing, which gave the farmers a chance to attend the meetings. Even business and professional men neglected their work and all but shut up shop. By the first of May, the revival was well under way with scores of people confessing religion, and each new convert becoming a self-appointed missionary to solicit friend and neighbor. The prevailing question among people of the neighborhood was, "What shall I do to be saved?"

. . . The revival had been even more successful than the ministers had anticipated. I quote from the "Religious Advocate" of Rochester: "More than 200 souls have become hopeful subjects of divine grace in Palmyra, Macedon, Manchester, Lyons and Ontario since the late revival commenced. This is a powerful work. It is among young as well as old people. Many are ready to exclaim— 'What hath God wrought?' " It is the Lord's doing and it is marvelous in our eyes. The cry is yet from many, 'Come over and help us. . . . Such intelligence must be pleasing to every child of God who rightly estimates the value of immortal souls, and wishes well to the cause of Zion.' "

A week later (from the same publication) . . . "It may be added that in Palmyra and Macedon, including Methodist, Presbyterian and Baptist churches, more than 400 have already confessed that the Lord is good. The work is still progressing. In neighboring towns, the number is great and still increasing. Glory be to God on high; and on earth peace and good will to all men."

During the second week in May the revival began to show signs of breaking up, and the many converts were solicited by the different preachers to join their respective churches. (Joseph Smith the Prophet, pp. 21-22)

Upon first examination it would appear that this is definite proof that there was a revival in Palmyra and Manchester in 1820. A more careful examination, however, reveals that these references from the Religious Advocate do not refer to a revival in 1820, but rather to the one in 1825!

Wesley P. Walters shows that the quotation from the Religious Advocate of Rochester could not have appeared in that publication in 1820 because "the Religious Advocate did not begin publication at Rochester until about 1825, . . ." (Dialogue, Spring 1969, p. 67). In footnote 51 in the same article Mr. Walters states: "The Religious Advocate began publication in 1822 at Saratoga Springs, N.Y., moving to Rochester about October 1824."

This, of course, means that the quotations from the Religious Advocate of Rochester could not have appeared before the 1824-25 Palmyra revival. That they did not appear until 1825 is verified by the fact that both references were printed in the Wayne Sentinel under the date of March 2, 1825. In other words, these references have been used to support the date of 1820 for a revival, when in reality they have to do with a revival that took place in 1825. Below is a comparison which proves that the references are the same ones which appeared in the Wayne Sentinel in 1825.

Mormon writers were apparently so hard pressed to prove there was a revival in Palmyra in 1820 that they used material concerning the 1825 revival to try to prove there was a revival in 1820. In the quotation Preston Nibley takes from Willard Bean's book, it talks of "Jessee Townsend, a young Yale graduate," starting the revival. Wesley P. Walters makes these comments concerning Bean's account:

Bean, a Mormon . . . has put together an account that Mormon writers are still appealing to. According to Mr. Bean, a revival did break out in "the spring of 1820," sparked under the ministry of Reverend Jesse Townsend, whom he describes as "a young Yale graduate, but recently set apart for the ministry." "The revival started the latter part of April" and by the first of May was well under way. Bean adds an account from "the Religious Advocate of Rochester" to show how extensive the awakening was. All this sounds very authentic until one begins to examine the story more closely. Jesse Townsend was not a "young Yale graduate" in 1820, since he was fifty-four years old and thirty years had expired since his graduation from Yale. He was not "recently set apart for the ministry" for he had been ordained in 1792. Instead of sparking a revival in Palmyra in "the spring of 1820," he was in reality on his way west, arriving near Hillsboro, Illinois, May 25, 1820. Furthermore, the Religious Advocate did not begin publication at Rochester until about 1825, and the account which Mr. Bean quotes from that journal is the same one which appeared in the Palmyra newspaper in March of 1825 in reference to the 1824-25 revival. We do not believe that this avenue of approach will yield any fruitful results. (Dialogue: A Journal of Mormon Thought, Spring 1969, pp. 67-68)

The Mormon Apostle Gordon B. Hinckley, who recently became a member of the First Presidency, wrote a book entitled Truth Restored. This book, which was reprinted by the church in 1969, has a beautiful representation of Joseph Smith's First Vision on the cover. Unfortunately, however, the references which were written concerning the 1824-25 revival were still used as though they applied to a revival in 1820:

In 1820 it reached western New York. The ministers of the various denominations united in their efforts, and many conversions were made among the scattered settlers. One week a Rochester paper noted: "More than two hundred souls have become hopeful subjects of divine grace in Palmyra, Macedon, Manchester, Lyons, and Ontario since the later revival commenced.” The week following it was able to report “that in Palmyra and Macedon . . . more than four hundred souls have already confessed that the Lord is good.” (Truth Restored, Salt Lake City, 1969, p. 2)

In the 1972 edition of Mormonism—Shadow or Reality? we commented: “It will be interesting to see whether the Mormon leaders will continue to use these references now that it is obvious that their own research team has been unable to verify them.” An examination of the most recent printing of Truth Restored shows that the Mormon leader Gordon B. Hinckley has stubbornly refused to face the facts. In 1979 the church issued a revised edition of his book which still contains these discredited references about the First Vision. If the references Hinckley uses had really been written concerning a revival in 1820 they would have furnished the strongest type of evidence possible. They would, in fact, have proved that a revival occurred in Palmyra in 1820. As it is, however, we can show that they appeared in the Wayne Sentinel on March 2, 1825, and had absolutely nothing to do with a revival in 1820.

It would appear, then, that all evidence for a revival in Palmyra and vicinity has fallen, and that Wesley P. Walters’ work has been vindicated. All that the Mormon research team have been able to do is to confirm his original findings. Mr. Walters makes this interesting observation:

Joseph made his great mistake when he tried to alter the course of history by moving a whole revival back some 4 years. This defect places his entire movement upon a crumbling foundation. For our part we agree that “life is too short to follow something false, when we can follow what is true” (Richard Evans). We urge all to find in Christ alone “the way, the truth and the life.” (The Case Against Mormonism, vol. 1, pp. 114-115)

In our pamphlet, The First Vision Examined, we presented additional information showing that the Mormon research team failed in their effort to establish a revival in Palmyra in 1820. The reader should also see the articles on the First Vision by Wesley P. Walters and Richard L. Bushman which were published in Dialogue: A Journal of Mormon Thought, Spring 1969, pp. 59-100)

Joseph a Methodist?

Wesley P. Walters has not only shown that there was no revival in 1820, but he has produced evidence to show that neither Joseph nor his family took the message of the First Vision seriously. The reader will remember that in the vision Joseph Smith was told to join none of the churches:

I was answered that I must join none of them, for they were all wrong; and the Personage who addressed me said that all their creeds were an abomination in his sight; that those professors were all corrupt; . . .

He again forbade me to join with any of them; . . . (Pearl of Great Price, Joseph Smith, verses 19-20)

Now, if Joseph Smith had really received such a message, we would expect to find that he had nothing to do with other churches after his First Vision. Furthermore, if his family believed his story we would expect to find that they did not support other churches after 1820.

Joseph Smith claims that just before he had his First Vision, his “father’s family was proselyted to the Presbyterian faith, and four of them joined that church, namely, my mother, Lucy; my brothers Hyrum and Samuel Harrison; and my sister Sophronia” (Pearl of Great Price, Joseph Smith, verse 7).

Joseph Smith would have us believe that this happened in 1820, but since the revival did not occur until 1824-25 we must assume that they joined the church at that time. Stanley B. Kimball states that the volume of Presbyterian records which “would probably give the exact date the Smiths joined, has been missing since at least 1932” (Dialogue: A Journal of Mormon Thought, Winter 1970, p. 121).

Nevertheless, vol. 2 of the “Session Records” for the Western Presbyterian Church of Palmyra has been located, and this volume shows that the Smiths were still involved with the Presbyterian Church in 1828. Fawn M. Brodie made this interesting observation in the Supplement to the new edition of her book:

Of greater significance is the Reverend Mr. Walters’s recent discovery, in the records of the Palmyra Presbyterian Church for 1830, that Joseph Smith’s mother, and his brothers Hyrum and Samuel, were active members of this church for at least eight years after 1820, the official date of the first vision. The Palmyra records point out that these three members of the Smith family began to neglect “public worship and the sacrament of the Lord’s supper” about September 1828. The 1830 proceedings of this church for March 3, 10, and 29 make it clear that they were accused of this neglect and abandonment “for the last eighteen months,” and that finally, at the end of March 1830, they were suspended as members of the Presbyterian Church.

This raises a question that has never been seriously studied: whether or not Joseph Smith’s own family took his religious mission seriously before his alleged discovery or unearthing of the golden plates. (No Man Knows My History, 1971, pp. 410-411)

The Mormon writer Stanley B. Kimball seems willing to admit that the Smiths were involved with the Presbyterians many years after the First Vision:

. . . Lucy, Hiram, and Samuel Harrison were indeed members of the Palmyra congregation, that sometime during the translation of the Book of Mormon they had become inactive and that by early March of 1830 they were being charged with “Neglect of public worship and the Sacrament of the Lord’s Supper. . . .” (Dialogue: A Journal of Mormon Thought, Winter 1970, p. 122)

Milton V. Backman, Jr. and James B. Allen state that the Smith family “had not actively involved themselves in the affairs of the Presbyterian church since September, 1828, which was just a year after Joseph had received the plates . . .” (Brigham Young University Studies, Summer 1970, p. 483).

While it is true that the Smiths became inactive in the Presbyterian Church in 1828, we wonder why they would have remained in it so long after Joseph Smith was supposed to have received his First Vision.

As if this is not bad enough, Wesley P. Walters presents evidence that in 1828 Joseph Smith himself took steps towards becoming a member of the Methodist Church. The Utah Christian Tract Society has prepared an article from material furnished by Wesley P. Walters (see the newsletter for July-August, 1971). In this article we find the following:

Joseph Smith’s 1838 account which is recorded in the pamphlet of “his own story” claims that in 1820 he had seen “two glorious personages” identified as the Father and the Son, and that he was informed that all the creeds of all the “sects,” or various denominations, “were an abomination” and he was twice forbidden to join any of them. . . .

Perhaps the death of his first-born son on June 15, 1828 induced him to seek membership in the Methodist Church to which his wife belonged since she was seven years old. The “prophet” Joseph’s role as a Methodist member did not last very long, however, only three days—according to statements made by his wife’s cousins, Joseph and Hiel Lewis. In their local newspaper at Amboy, Illinois, they told of their earlier years with Joseph Smith in Pennsylvania and of his uniting with the Methodist class:

He presented himself in a very serious and humble manner, and the minister, not suspecting evil, put his name on the class book, in the absence of some of the official members. (The Amboy Journal, April 30, 1879, p. 1).

When Joseph Lewis, who was 21 at the time (about a year and a half younger than Smith), learned of this act, he felt that Joseph's manner of life rendered him unfit to be a member and told him either to "publicly ask to have his name stricken from the class book, or stand a disciplinary investigation." Mr. Lewis gave further details about the incident a month after the first article appeared in the Amboy paper, and he wrote:

I, with Joshua McKune, a local preacher at the time, I think in June, 1828, heard on Saturday, that Joe Smith had joined the church on Wednesday afternoon, (as it was customary in those days to have circuit preaching at my father's house on week-day). We thought it was a disgrace to the church to have a practicing necromancer, a dealer in enchantments and bleeding ghosts, in it. So on Sunday we went to father's, the place of meeting that day, and got there in season to see Smith and talked to him some time in father's shop before the meeting. Told him that his occupation, habits, and moral character were at variance with the discipline, that his name would be a disgrace to the church, that there should have been recantation, confession and at least promised reformation—That he could that day publicly ask that his name be stricken from the class book, or stand investigation. He chose the former, and did that very day make request that his name be taken off the class book. (The Amboy Journal, June 11, 1879, pg. 1).

Mr. Lewis' more detailed statement was called forth because the original statement he and his brother had made had been challenged by a local Mormon elder from the Reorganized Church. This elder, Mr. Edwin Cadwell, was a neighbor of Mr. Michael Morse, the brother-in-law of Joseph Smith. Mr. Cadwell stated that Mr. Morse told him that "Smith's name remained on the class book . . . for about six months, when it was simply 'dropped' as Smith did not seek to become a full member." (The Amboy Journal, May 21, 1879, pg. 1).

Mr. Morse had been the "class leader" at that time and had been the one who had taken Smith's name for recording in the class book. (The Amboy Journal, July 2, 1879, pg. 1). To the statement of Mr. Morse, Joseph Lewis replied that, "If said Morse was a leader at that time, and Smith's name remained on the class book six months, the class leader carelessly or wickedly neglected his duty." (The Amboy Journal, June 11, 1879, pg. 1).

Like so many of the early Methodist records, the early class books of Harmony (now Lanesboro) Church are lost, so we will never know for certain whether Joseph Smith remained a member for only three days or for six months. However, there was never any dispute that he had become a member, and by this one act he completely undercut the story he later put forth claiming that God in a special vision had instructed him not to join any of the existing churches, . . .

From the evidence presented it would appear that Joseph Smith did not complete all the steps to become "a full member" of the Methodist Church, but he had certainly started the process when he joined the Methodist class in Pennsylvania. Milton V. Backman, Jr., gives some information on Methodist classes in his book Joseph Smith's First Vision, p. 70: "At the time of the First Vision these classes, which usually consisted of less than thirty members, met in homes, barns, schools, and groves."

It is interesting to note that Joseph Smith stated that before his First Vision his "mind became somewhat partial to the Methodist sect, and I felt some desire to be united with them; . . ." (History of the Church, vol. 1, p. 3). There is some evidence that Joseph Smith joined a Methodist class sometime before he moved to Pennsylvania. Pomeroy Tucker stated:

At one time he joined the probationary class of the Methodist Church in Palmyra, and made some active demonstrations of engagedness, though his assumed convictions were insufficiently grounded or abiding to carry him along to the saving point of conversion, and he soon withdrew from the class. (Origin of Mormonism, pp. 17-18, as quoted in BYU Studies, Spring 1969, p. 384)

The Mormon writer Hyrum L. Andrus is willing to admit that

It is possible that Joseph Smith was affiliated with this organization for a time and served on the local level in the area of Palmyra and Manchester. Turner's statement that Joseph Smith became a "passable exhorter" for Methodism points to this possibility. The History of Wayne County also states: "Revivals occurred, and Smith joined a class of probationers in the Methodist church of Palmyra, but soon withdrew." (God, Man, and the Universe, pp. 41-42)

Although no dates are given as to when Joseph Smith joined the Methodist class in Palmyra, Andrus maintains that Joseph Smith's "affiliation with the Methodist cause occurred shortly before the First Vision" (Ibid., p. 41).

However this may be, Joseph Smith's affiliation with the Methodists in Pennsylvania occurred eight years after he was supposed to have received his First Vision and at the very time he was translating the Book of Mormon! We must agree that "by this one act he completely undercut the story he later put forth claiming that God in a special vision had instructed him not to join any of the existing churches, . . ."

The newsletter published by the Utah Christian Tract Society, July-August, 1971, also points out that in "retelling" the story of the First Vision "to Alexander Neibaur on May 24, 1844, Joseph specifically singled out the Methodist Church as being unworthy of his membership." Neibaur's journal reads: ". . . Mr. Smith then asked must I join the Methodist Church—No—they are not my People, They have gone astray . . ." (Improvement Era, April 1970, p. 12, n. 12).

It is interesting to note that although Joseph Smith took steps towards becoming a Methodist in 1828, by 1835 he was condemning a member of the church who "confessed that he had been in temptation, and fallen into error, so much as to join the Methodists; . . ." Joseph Smith made this comment concerning this matter:

I spoke of the impropriety of turning away from the truth, and going after a people so destitute of the spirit of righteousness as the Methodists. (History of the Church, vol. 2, p. 319)

Joseph Changed His Mind

Earlier in this chapter we wrote:

It would appear, then, that Joseph Smith did not believe that God the Father had a body at the time he wrote his first account of the vision in the "wilderness." Towards the end of his life, however, Joseph Smith changed his mind and decided that God was just an exalted man. . . . Since Joseph Smith had changed his mind concerning the Godhead, he evidently decided to change his story concerning the First Vision.

Just after we published the 1972 edition of this book, Marvin S. Hill, of the Department of History at Brigham Young University, wrote an article in which he admitted that Joseph Smith may have changed his mind about the Godhead. Hill, however, was still unwilling to concede that this shows fraud on Joseph Smith's part:

Brodie's assumption of a deceitful prophet was supported by her discovery that early Mormons did not relate the first vision story consistently, and, as she maintained in 1945, the earliest version by the prophet was not written until 1838. She has had to revise the argument somewhat since it is now known that the earliest account extant was written in 1832. But there are, undeniably, differences in the several accounts, not all of them minor from the standpoint of Mormon theology. . . . To focus upon the discrepancies touching the personages of the Godhead in the first vision story, whether one or two personages, is to concentrate on a theological question and to miss its historical significance. . . . Brodie and others have been preoccupied with the first vision's theological implications which were the product of Joseph Smith's and the Mormon people's later thinkings. This has caused them to miss the important implications as to the social and religious origins of Mormonism which may be the essential point. If over the years Joseph's conception of the Godhead changed, this is not evidence of fraud any more than the adaptation of other aspects of his theology in later years proves to be. (Dialogue: A Journal of Mormon Thought, Winter 1972, pp. 78-79)

While we feel that Marvin Hill has still not faced the real implications of this matter, it is refreshing to see a noted Mormon writer admit that "Joseph's conception of the Godhead" might have changed.

Clandestine's Errors

The anonymous Mormon historian whom we refer to as "Dr. Clandestine" has made a pathetic attempt to save Joseph Smith's credibility with regard to the First Vision. Clandestine apparently realizes the serious nature of the discrepancies in Joseph Smith's accounts of the First Vision. Unlike Mormon apologists Dr. Hugh Nibley and Apostle John A. Widtsoe, Dr. Clandestine seems willing to concede that there are "varying accounts by Joseph Smith of that experience," and instead of giving any convincing defense for the claim that Joseph Smith saw both God the Father and His Son Jesus Christ in 1820, he tries to minimize the importance of the vision:

A crucial question that is the starting point for interpreting the First Vision is: What significance did this experience (as related in any and all descriptions of it by Joseph Smith) have for Mormonism as a movement and the claim of the LDS Church to be a prophet-led restoration of the ancient Church of Christ? . . . The First Vision experience of Joseph Smith, Jr. had no significance for his later claims about the Book of Mormon, his prophetic calling, or the concept of a divinely restored priesthood and church. . . . it is a personal experience to be connected with Mormonism only because it had occurred to the translator of the Book of Mormon . . .

The accounts of the First Vision consistently describe an experience that was intensely personal for Joseph Smith, rather than a revelation of significance for his followers. . . . Mormon historians have made the whole issue vulnerable to attack by putting too much emphasis on the spring of 1820 as the date of the First Vision. The obvious uncertainty of the adult Joseph Smith's memory and the ambiguity of his descriptions of age provide a possible time-frame for the First Vision that extends from the spring of 1818 prior to his fourteenth birthday ("I was about 14 years old") to the spring of 1822 ("In the 16th year of my age"). . . .

I acknowledge freely the sketchy character of Joseph Smith's accounts of his early religious experiences and that some Mormon writers have been wrong or inadequate in their use of the sources of history. (Jerald and Sandra Tanner's Distorted View of Mormonism, pp. 29-31, 34, 39)

Dr. Clandestine's whole treatment of the First Vision appears to be a desperate attempt to salvage at least something out of a mass of contradictory material. His attempt to play down the importance of the vision will probably not set well with orthodox Mormons. While a recent convert may fall for Dr. Clandestine's reasoning, those who have been in the church for any length of time know that the First Vision has been proclaimed as the very foundation of the church. Apostle Widtsoe said that "The First Vision of 1820 is of first importance in the history of Joseph Smith. Upon its reality rest the truth and value of his subsequent work" (Joseph Smith—Seeker After Truth, p. 19). President David O. McKay plainly stated: "The appearing of the Father and the Son to Joseph Smith is the foundation of this church" (Gospel Ideals, p. 85). That Dr. Clandestine would attempt to minimize the importance of the First Vision is almost beyond belief. We feel that this amounts to a vindication of our work on this vision. In a letter dated February 26, 1980, G. Homer Durham, Managing Director of the Church Historical Department, had to admit that Dr. Clandestine had gone too far in his concessions on the First Vision:

The appellation adopted by the anonymous author to whom you refer was self-adopted and carries no authority except the opinion of an anonymous writer. Many style themselves as "Mormon historians" but they all speak on their own responsibility. The most responsible historians of the LDS faith known to me have views contrary to the anonymous statement that Mormon historians "have put too much emphasis on the spring of 1820 as the date of the First Vision." Rather, they support the statement of the Prophet noted above, as do I.

On pages 30-32 of his rebuttal, Dr. Clandestine goes so far as to try to separate the First Vision from Joseph Smith's divine calling. In the face of all the evidence to the contrary, Dr. Clandestine says that the distinction between private experience and divine calling explains the contrasting publicity given to the Angel Moroni story and the story of the First Vision. . . . the private experience of the First Vision that had nothing to do with the rise of Mormonism, except that it (like the bone surgery incident Joseph Smith included in one of the manuscript histories of his early life) was one of a mass of autobiographical details that would be of interest to persons trying to understand the life of the man who brought forth the Book of Mormon and Mormonism itself. When Joseph Smith finally published an account of the First Vision, he appropriately titled it (in significant contrast to Cowdery's 1834 narrative): "History of Joseph Smith." (Jerald and Sandra Tanner's Distorted View of Mormonism, pp. 31-32)

Dr. Clandestine would apparently have us believe that since Joseph Smith titled his account "History of Joseph Smith," instead of "History of the Church" in the Times and Seasons, we do not have to believe that it had anything to do with the rise of Mormonism. If he had read the paragraph which appears just above the title, Dr. Clandestine could have never made such a grave error:

In the last number I gave a brief history of the rise and progress of the Church. I now enter more particularly into that history, and extract from my journal. JOSEPH SMITH. (Times and Seasons, vol. 3, p. 726)

If Dr. Clandestine had turned to the April 15, 1842, issue of the Times and Seasons, page 753, he would have discovered the same title ("History of Joseph Smith"), yet he would have found the account of the Angel Nephi—later changed to Moroni—telling Joseph Smith about the "gold plates" from which he translated the Book of Mormon. The logical extension of Clandestine's reasoning would be that the story of the Book of Mormon has nothing to do with the Mormon Church.

Earlier in this chapter we presented information showing that Wesley P. Walters demonstrated that "in 1820 there was no revival in any of the churches in Palmyra or its vicinity." Dr. Clandestine seems to realize that it would be difficult to maintain there was a revival in 1820 in light of Walters' research. Therefore, he tries to fit Joseph Smith's story into the framework of a revival which occurred in 1817:

The combined data from the 1838 and the 1832 accounts therefore establish the possibility that the religious revivals that impressed Joseph Smith had occurred as early as 1817-1818. Despite their insistence on the year 1820, the Tanners themselves present information that supports the above possibility: On page 65 they quote the 1887 book of M. T. Lamb that the revival occurred “sixty or seventy years ago” (1817 to 1827), and on page 156 they quote Reverend Walters’ verification that a revival did occur in Palmyra in 1817. . . . the ambiguity of Joseph Smith’s own dating does not allow the year 1820 to be seized upon as the only date for the revival, the vision, or both. . . . Many Mormon writers until recent years interpreted Joseph Smith’s 1838 reference to the location of the religious excitement (“ . . . in the place where we lived . . . in that region of country, indeed the whole district of Country seemed affected by it . . .”) as meaning that there was a religious revival in Palmyra in 1820. Reverend Walters has demonstrated that there was no revival in Palmyra in 1820, and therefore he and the Tanners claim that they have refuted the historicity of the First Vision, when all they have done is show that Mormon writers have misinterpreted the sketchy descriptions of the First Vision. (Jerald and Sandra Tanner’s Distorted View of Mormonism, pp. 35-36)

Since Joseph Smith would have only been 11 years old at the time of the 1817 revival, we doubt that many people will take Dr. Clandestine’s reconstruction seriously. Joseph Smith’s 1838 account says that he was in his “fifteenth year” at the time of the “great excitement” (Pearl of Great Price, Joseph Smith, verses 7-8). It is interesting to note that Clandestine admits that Joseph Smith’s earliest account of the First Vision “does not mention revivals or religious excitement beyond his own, . . .” (p. 35).

Mormon writers have always depended on the book by Joseph Smith’s mother to prove that the First Vision actually occurred. Dr. Clandestine says that “when Lucy Mack Smith came to the early visions of her son Joseph Smith, she (or her ghost writers, Howard and Marthy Coray) simply quoted from the published version in the Times and Seasons” (Jerald and Sandra Tanner’s Distorted View of Mormonism, p. 20). The fact that Mrs. Smith’s book used Joseph Smith’s official account of the First Vision has convinced many Mormons that she knew no other story. Wesley P. Walters, however, has recently examined a “preliminary draft” of Lucy Smith’s manuscript in the Church Historical Department. Instead of a vision of the Father and Son in the woods, Joseph Smith’s mother reports that it was an angel who appeared to Joseph Smith in his bedroom and told him all churches were wrong. We feel that this manuscript destroys the value of Lucy Smith’s book as evidence for the First Vision.

Wesley P. Walters has written an excellent response to Dr. Clandestine’s work on the First Vision (see Answering Dr. Clandestine: A Response to the Anonymous LDS Historian, pp. 53-55).

Professor Hill’s Speech

At the 1981 Sunstone Theological Symposium, Marvin S. Hill, Professor of History at Brigham Young University, gave an extremely interesting speech concerning the First Vision. In this speech Professor Hill, who is one of the top Mormon scholars, tried to deal with some of the objections to the First Vision which appear in this book. While Hill feels that we are biased in our presentation, he concedes some major points—i.e., that the revival did not occur in 1820 and that Joseph Smith probably changed his view of the Godhead between 1832 and 1838:

After weighing the arguments in this long and sustained controversy, where does one come down with respect to the Walters, Tanner, Bachman, Crawley debate? . . . It is my belief that both sides have overlooked some important points and that a plausible argument can be made for the basic church chronology despite some contradictions in some sources, provided that concessions be made with respect to some inaccuracies in the 1838 account. It seems to me that everybody has approached the issue from the wrong end, by taking as the point of departure the 1838 official version when the account that they should be looking at is that of 1832. Merely on the face of it, the 1832 version stands a better chance to be accurate and unembellished than the 1838 account which was intended as a public statement streamlined for publication. When Joseph dictated his 1838 version, if he did dictate it, he was aware of what had been previously published by Oliver Cowdery and aware of his stature as a prophet of a new and important religious movement. It would be natural for him to smooth out the story to make it more logical and compelling than perhaps it seemed in 1820. But let me react first to the Walters - Bachman war of words. It seems to me that Walters has scored some important points, although not nearly as many as he professes. I am inclined to agree with him that the turmoil that Joseph describes that led to some family members joining the Presbyterians and that led to much sectarian bitterness, does not fit well into the 1820 context detailed by Bachman. For one thing, it does not seem likely that there would have been so much sectarian strife in 1820 and then have a joint revival where all was harmony in 1824. In addition, as Walters notes, Lucy Mack Smith says the revival where she became interested in a particular sect, came after Alvin’s death, thus almost certainly in 1824. . . . She would not be likely to make up such a personal reaction of her own or the family’s, nor mistake the time when it happened. I am persuaded that it was 1824 when Lucy joined the Presbyterians, and that, of course, is a critical point for dating the revival. . . . Larry Porter’s argument that Lane passed through in July 1820 and that everything occurred at that time, does not fit what Joseph said, for he indicated that . . . he did attend the revival meetings as often as occasion would permit. The revival Joseph is describing was a protracted one, covering several days. It would take some time to generate the kind of excitement that Joseph recalled; a one night stand won’t do. Walters maintains that an 1824 revival destroys the credibility of Joseph Smith’s whole story, since the revival occurred after Moroni’s visit. Here Walters appears more the anti-Mormon missionary than the objective scholar. An 1824 revival creates problems for the 1838 account, but not that of 1832. Walters overlooks the fact that Joseph said nothing in his 1832 account about a revival prompting his prayer. . . . Not only does this account ignore the revival, so, too, does the 1835 account . . . Neither does Lucy Mack Smith mention a revival when she describes Joseph’s first vision, where an angel told him that the churches are man-made and also told him about the plates. She indicates that this vision occurred during the third year after their move to Manchester, which would make it 1820, . . . The Walters/Tanner argument that Lucy’s joining the Presbyterians, and Joseph’s the Methodists, destroys Joseph’s credibility, fails to consider that unlike 1838, the 1832 version says nothing about Joseph’s being forbidden to join a church. . . . there is no great inconsistency as Walters and Tanners assume, when Lucy Mack Smith joins the Presbyterians or Joseph tried to become a Methodist in 1828. Joseph was fairly convinced that all were wrong, but perhaps responded to the urgings of his wife, Emma, who had very close ties with the Methodists in Harmony, Pennsylvania. . . . At any rate, if Joseph Smith in 1838 read back into 1820 some of the details about a revival that actually occurred in 1824, there is no reason to conclude that he invented his religious experiences. . . . Giving priority to the 1832 account also makes it more understandable why Oliver Cowdery got his story tangled. . . . Another point deserves comment here: If initially Joseph said one personage came to him in 1820, it thus became easier for Oliver Cowdery to confuse this visit with the coming of Moroni than it would have been a few years later when Joseph taught emphatically that there were three separate personages in the Godhead. The Tanners make much of the argument that Joseph Smith changed his view of the Godhead. There is a good deal of evidence that his understanding grew on many points of theology; his view of man and his potential; his view of salvation, of what it consists and how it is obtained. If, as the Tanners argue, Joseph grew in his understanding in the nature of the Godhood, this does not provide evidence of his disingenuousness. I do not agree with the Tanners that the 1835 narrative is no evidence that Joseph believed in two separate personages by that time. It is true, as the Tanners note, that the two personages are not specifically named, and it seems unlikely that Joseph would have distinguished between the two personages and the many angels he said he saw, unless he thought that the two personages were something different. The 1835 version with its two personages, stands at odds with the statement in Lectures on Faith that God is a spirit. This is a conflict that nobody has really reconciled or explained. It seems to me that if the Latter-day Saints can accept the idea that Joseph gained his full understanding of the nature of God only after a period of time, not immediately in 1820, then most of the difficulties with chronology can be resolved.

The reader will notice that in this speech Marvin Hill wants the church to accept Joseph Smith's 1832 version of the First Vision as more accurate than the 1838 version. In a response to Professor Hill's paper, James B. Allen commented:

... in asking Mormons to accept the primacy of the 1832 account over the official version written in 1838 he may be unrealistic with respect to how far the church can go.

Since the 1838 version became scripture when it was canonized in the Pearl of Great Price, the Mormon leaders would find it very difficult to say that the account mentioning only one personage is more accurate. Apostle Boyd K. Packer made this very clear when he denounced the liberal Mormon historians:

There are qualifications to teach or to write the history of this church. If one is lacking in any one of these qualifications, he cannot properly teach the history of the Church. . . .

I will state these qualifications in the form of questions so that you can assess your own qualifications.

Do you believe that God the Father and His Son Jesus Christ personally appeared to the boy prophet, Joseph Smith, Jr., in the year 1820?

Do you have personal witness that the Father and the Son appeared in all their glory and stood above that young man and instructed him according to the testimony that he gave to the world in his published history? (Brigham Young University Studies, Summer 1981, pp. 272-273)

Although it is very unlikely that the church leaders will accept Professor Hill's ideas, his speech is certainly a step in right direction. We have been informed that it will be published in a forthcoming issue of Dialogue: A Journal of Mormon Thought.

9. The Godhead

In the book of Isaiah 44:8 we read: “. . . Is there a God besides me? yea, there is no God; I know not any.” Joseph Smith’s first published work, the Book of Mormon, seems to be in harmony with the teachings of the Bible, for it states that there is only one God. In Alma 11:26-31 we read as follows:

Now Zeezrom said unto him: Thou sayest there is a true and living God? And Amulek said: Yea, there is a true and living God. Now, Zeezrom said: Is there more than one God? And he answered, No. Now Zeezrom said unto him again: How knowest thou these things? And he said: An angel hath made them known unto me.

The Bible teaches that God is a Spirit. In John 4:24, Jesus himself said: “God is a spirit: and they that worship him must worship him in spirit and truth.” In Jeremiah 23:24 we read: “Can any hide himself in secret places that I shall not see him? saith the Lord. Do not I fill heaven and earth? saith the Lord.” The Book of Mormon also teaches that God is a Spirit. In Alma 18:26-28, we read as follows: “And then Ammon said: Believest thou that there is a Great Spirit? And he said, Yea, And Ammon said: This is God.”

The Book of Mormon also teaches that Christ was God himself manifest in the flesh. In Mosiah 15:1, 2 and 5 we read the following:

And now Abinadi said unto them: I would that ye should understand that God himself shall come down among the children of men, and shall redeem his people. And because he dwelleth in flesh he shall be called the Son of God, and having subjected the flesh to the will of the Father, being the Father and the Son — . . . And thus the flesh becoming subject to the Spirit, or the Son to the Father, being one God, . . .

This is also in harmony with the Bible, for in 2 Corinthians 5:19 we read as follows: “To wit, that God was in Christ, reconciling the world unto himself, . . .”

It is interesting to note that the three witnesses to the Book of Mormon finished their testimony with the following statement: “And the honor be to the Father, and to the Son, and to the Holy Ghost, which is one God. Amen” (Book of Mormon, Preface).

From One to Many

By the year 1844 Joseph Smith had completely disregarded the teachings of the Book of Mormon, for he declared that God was just an exalted man and that men could become Gods. He stated as follows:

First, God himself, who sits enthroned in yonder heavens, is a man like unto one of yourselves, that is the great secret. . . . I am going to tell you how God came to be God. We have imagined that God was God from all eternity. . . . God himself; the Father of us all dwelt on an earth the same as Jesus Christ himself did, . . . You have got to learn how to be Gods yourselves; . . . No man can learn you more than what I have told you. (Times and Seasons, vol. 5, pp. 613-614)

The best way to illustrate Joseph Smith’s change of mind concerning the Godhead is to compare the Book of Moses with the Book of Abraham. Both of these books are printed in the Pearl of Great Price—one of the four standard works of the Mormon Church. The Book of Abraham was supposed to have been given some years after the Book of Moses. Both books are supposed to contain a direct revelation concerning the creation of the world. While the Book of Moses states that “I, God” created the heavens and the earth, the Book of Abraham states that “they (the Gods)” created them.

Book of Moses

. . . the Lord spake unto Moses, saying: Behold I reveal unto you concerning this heaven, and this earth; write the words which I speak. . . .

And I, God, said: Let there be light; and there was light. . . .

And I, God, called the dry land Earth; . . .

And I, God, made the beasts of the earth after their kind, . . .

And I, the Lord God, planted a garden eastward in Eden, . . . (Moses 2:1, 3, 10, 25; 3:8)

Book of Abraham

And the Lord said unto me: Abraham, I show these things unto thee before ye go into Egypt, that ye may declare all these words . . .

And they (the Gods) said: Let there be light; and there was light. . . .

And the Gods pronounced the dry land, earth; . . .

And the Gods organized the earth to bring forth the beasts after their kind, . . .

And the Gods planted a garden in Eden, . . . (Abraham 3:15; 4:3, 10, 25; 5:8)

The Mormon Apostle Orson Pratt made this statement concerning the Mormon doctrine of a plurality of Gods: “If we should take a million of worlds like this and number their particles, we should find that there are more Gods than there are particles of matter in those worlds” (Journal of Discourses, vol. 2, p. 345).

The Mormon Church teaches that God the Father had a Father, and that God’s Father also had a Father, and so on. Brigham Young, the second President of the Mormon Church, made these statements:

He [God] is our Father—the Father of our spirits, and was once a man in mortal flesh as we are, and is now an exalted being.

How many Gods there are, I do not know. But there never was a time when there were not Gods . . .

It appears ridiculous to the world, under their darkened and erroneous traditions, that God has once been a finite being; . . . (Journal of Discourses, vol. 7, p. 333)

Heber C. Kimball, who was a member of the First Presidency, made these observations:

. . . then we shall go back to our Father and God, who is connected with one who is still farther back; and this Father is connected with one still further back, and so on; . . . (Journal of Discourses, vol. 5, p. 19)

. . . for our God is a natural man, . . . the first of all mechanics. Where did he get his knowledge from? From his Father, just as we get knowledge from our earthly parents. (Ibid., vol. 8, p. 211)

The Mormon Apostle Orson Pratt made these statements:

The Gods who dwell in the Heaven . . . have been redeemed from the grave in a world which existed before the foundations of this earth were laid. They and the Heavenly body which they now inhabit were once in a fallen state. . . they were exalted also, from fallen men to Celestial Gods to inhabit their Heaven forever and ever. (The Seer, p. 23)

We were begotten by our Father in Heaven; the person of our Father in Heaven was begotten on a previous heavenly world by his Father; and again, He was begotten by a still more ancient Father; and so on, from generation to generation, from one heavenly world to another still more ancient, until our minds are wearied and lost in the multiplicity of generations and successive worlds, and as a last resort, we wonder in our minds, how far back the genealogy extends, and how the first world was formed, and the first Father was begotten. (The Seer, p. 132)

The Mormon Church also teaches that men can become Gods. Brigham Young made these statements:

The Lord created you and me for the purpose of becoming Gods like Himself; . . . We are created, . . . to become Gods like unto our Father in heaven. (Journal of Discourses, vol. 3, p. 93)

. . . man is the King of Kings and Lord of Lords in embryo. (Ibid., vol. 10, p. 223)

In his book, The Gospel Through the Ages, Milton R. Hunter (of the First Council of the Seventy) makes the following statements concerning the plurality of Gods:

Mormon prophets have continuously taught the sublime truth that God the Eternal Father was once a mortal man who passed through a school of earth life similar to that through which we are now passing. He became God—an exalted being—through obedience to the same eternal Gospel truths that we are given opportunity today to obey. (The Gospel Through the Ages, Salt Lake City, 1958, p. 104)

The Mystery Religions, pagan rivals of Christianity, taught emphatically the doctrine that “men may become Gods.” . . . Hermes declared: “We must not shrink from saying that a man on earth is a mortal god, and that God in heaven is an immortal man.” This thought very closely resembles the teachings of the Prophet Joseph Smith and of President Lorenzo Snow. (Ibid., p. 110)

. . . we must accept the fact that there was a time when Deity was much less powerful than He is today. Then how did He become glorified and exalted and attain His present status of Godhead? In the first place, aeons ago God undoubtedly took advantage of every opportunity to learn the laws of truth . . . From day to day He exerted His will vigorously, . . . he gained more knowledge through persistent effort and continuous industry, as well as through absolute obedience. His understanding of the universal laws continued to become more complete. Thus he grew in experience and continued to grow until He attained the status of Godhood. In other words, He became God by absolute obedience to all the eternal laws of the Gospel . . .

No prophet of record gave more complete and forceful explanations of the doctrine that men may become Gods than did the American Prophet, . . . (Ibid., pp. 114-115)

Bruce R. McConkie, who is also a member of the First Council of Seventy, makes these statements:

. . . God . . . is a personal Being, a holy and exalted Man, a glorified, resurrected Personage having a tangible body of flesh and bones, an anthropomorphic Entity, . . . (Mormon Doctrine, Salt Lake City, 1966, p. 250)

. . . as the Prophet also taught, there is “a God above the Father of our Lord Jesus Christ. . . .” (Ibid., p. 322)

Those who “are raised to become gods” (Teachings, p. 312) will progress . . . until they are “glorified in truth” and know “all things.” . . . God himself, the Father of us all, is a glorified, exalted, immortal, resurrected Man! (Ibid., pp. 642-643)

Joseph Fielding Smith, who recently became the tenth President of the Church, made these statements:

God is an exalted Man. Some people are troubled over the statements of the Prophet Joseph Smith . . . The matter that seems such a mystery is the statement that our Father in heaven at one time passed through a life and death and is an exalted Man. This is one of the mysteries, . . . The Prophet taught that our Father had a Father and so on. Is not this a reasonable thought, especially when we remember that the promises are made to us that we may become like him? (Doctrines of Salvation, vol. 1, pp. 10, 12)

The Mormon Apostle LeGrand Richards made this statement in a letter written in 1966:

There is a statement often repeated in the Church, and while it is not in one of the Standard Church Works, it is accepted as church doctrine, and this is:

As man is, God once was; as God is, man may become. (Letter from LeGrand Richards to Morris L. Reynolds, July 14, 1966)

As we showed on page 26, one of Joseph Smith’s revelations, Doctrine and Covenants, Section 121, has had some serious changes made in it concerning the Godhead. If Joseph Smith falsified the revelation before it was published, as Garland E. Tickemyer suggests, then he was secretly teaching the doctrine of a plurality of Gods before he moved to Illinois. But however this may be, we know that he was teaching this doctrine while he was at Nauvoo, Illinois. We can establish this from both Mormon and anti-Mormon writings. For instance, the Nauvoo Expositor for June 7, 1844, contained this information:

Resolved 2nd, Inasmuch as . . . Joseph Smith, Hyrum Smith, and many other official characters . . . have introduced false and damnable doctrines into the Church, such as a plurality of Gods above the God of this universe, and his liability to fall with all his creations; . . . we therefore are constrained to denounce them as apostates from the pure and holy doctrines of Jesus Christ.

In a letter written from the “Vicinity of Nauvoo,” June 16, 1844, Sarah Scott stated:

Joseph says there are Gods above the God of this universe as far as he is above us, and if He should transgress the laws given to Him by those above Him, He would be hurled from His Throne to Hell, as was Lucifer and all his creations with him. (Among the Mormons, by Mulder and Mortensen, 1958, p. 44)

The Heavenly Mother

Because of their belief that God is just an exalted man, Mormon leaders teach that He had a mother as well as a wife. Brigham Young stated:

Brother Kimball quoted a saying of Joseph the Prophet, that he would not worship a God who had not a father; and I do not know that he would if he had not a mother; the one would be as absurd as the other. (Journal of Discourses, vol. 9, p. 286)

Although the Mormon leaders do not worship God’s wife, they teach that she is our “Eternal Mother.” Bruce R. McConkie, of the First Council of the Seventy, stated:

Implicit in the Christian verity that all men are the spirit children of an Eternal Father is the usually unspoken truth that they are also the offspring of an Eternal Mother. An exalted and glorified Man of Holiness (Moses 6:57) could not be a Father unless a woman of like glory, perfection, and holiness was associated with him as a Mother. The begetting of children makes a man a father and a woman a mother whether we are dealing with man in his mortal or immortal state.

This doctrine that there is a Mother in heaven was affirmed in plainness by the First Presidency . . . they said that “man, as a spirit, was begotten and born of heavenly parents, . . .” (Mormon Doctrine, 1966, p. 516)

Milton R. Hunter, of the First Council of the Seventy, made these statements:

The stupendous truth of the existence of a Heavenly

Mother, as well as a Heavenly Father, became established facts in Mormon theology. (The Gospel Through The Ages, 1958, p. 98)

The Mormon Apostle Abraham H. Cannon recorded the following in his journal:

... Pres. Petersen told of an incident which he often heard Zebedee Coltrin relate. One day the Prophet Joseph asked him and Sidney Rigdon to accompany him into the woods to pray. When they had reached a secluded spot Joseph laid down on his back and stretched out his arms. He told the brethren to lie one on each arm, and then shut their eyes. After they had prayed he told them to open their eyes. They did so and saw a brilliant light surrounding a pedestal which seemed to rest on the earth. They closed their eyes and again prayed. They then saw on opening them, the Father seated upon a throne; they prayed again and on looking saw the Mother also; after praying and looking the fourth time they saw the Savior added to the group. He had auburn brown, rather long, wavy hair and appeared quite young. ("Daily Journal of Abraham H. Cannon," August 25, 1890)

Although we cannot take this purported vision very seriously, it is interesting because it illustrates how far the Mormon leaders would go to establish an unscriptural doctrine. At any rate, President Joseph Fielding Smith still maintains that there is an Eternal Mother:

The fact that there is no reference to a Mother in heaven either in the Bible, Book of Mormon or Doctrine and Covenants, is not sufficient proof that no such thing as a Mother did exist there. . . . does not common sense tell us that we must have had a Mother there also? (Answers to Gospel Questions, vol. 3, p. 142)

Serious Changes

As we pointed out in chapter 5, the Mormons claim that a voice from heaven told the witnesses to the Book of Mormon that the translation was "correct." In spite of this Joseph Smith tried to change the Book of Mormon to support his concept of a plurality of Gods. Four important changes were made in the second edition of the Book of Mormon concerning the Godhead. One of the most significant changes was made in 1 Nephi 13:40. In the 1830 edition it was stated that the very purpose of the Nephite records was to make known that Christ is the Eternal Father:

... These last records, . . . shall make known to all kindreds, tongues, and people, that the Lamb of God is the Eternal Father and the Savior of the world; and that all men must come unto Him, or they cannot be saved; (Book of Mormon, 1830 Edition, p. 32, lines 5-12)

In the current Utah Edition, 1 Nephi 13:40, three words have been interpolated:

... These last records, . . . shall make known to all kindreds, tongues, and people, that the Lamb of God is the Son of the Eternal Father, and the Savior of the world; and that all men must come unto him, or they cannot be saved.

Another important change was made in 1 Nephi 11:18; this is page 25 of the 1830 edition. In the first edition it read: "... Behold, the virgin which thou seest, is the mother of God, after the manner of the flesh." In modern editions it has been changed to read: "... Behold, the virgin whom thou seest is the mother of the Son of God, after the manner of the flesh." Notice that the words "the Son of" have been inserted in the middle of the sentence. Verse 21 of the same chapter originally read: "And the angel said unto me, behold the Lamb of God, yea, even the Eternal Father!" It was changed to read: "And the angel said unto me: Behold the Lamb of God, yea, even the Son of the Eternal Father!" Verse 32 of the same chapter, which is on page 26 of the original edition, was also changed. In the 1830 edition it read: "... the Everlasting unto me, Knowest thou the condescension of God? And I said unto him, I know that he loveth his children; nevertheless, I do not know the meaning of all things. And he said unto me, Behold, the virgin which thou seest, is the mother of God, after the manner of the flesh.

And it came to pass that I beheld that she was carried away in the spirit; and after that she had been carried away in the spirit for the space of a time, the angel spake unto me, saying, look! And I looked and beheld the virgin again, bearing a child in her arms. And the angel said unto me, behold the Lamb of God, yea, even the Eternal Father! Knowest thou the meaning of the tree which thy father saw? And I answered him, saying: Yea, it is the love of God, which sheddeth itself abroad in the hearts of the children of men; wherefore, it is the most desirable above all things. And he spake unto me, saying, Yea, and the most joyous to the soul. And after that he had said these words, he said unto me, look! And I looked, and I beheld the Son of God going forth among the children of men; and I saw many fall down at his feet and worship him.

And it came to pass that I beheld that the rod of iron which my father had seen, was the word of God, which led to the fountain of living waters, or to the tree of life; which waters are a representation of the love of God; and I also beheld that the tree of life was a representation of the love of God. And the angel said unto me again, Look and behold the condescension of God! And I looked and beheld the Redeemer of the world, of which my father had spoken; and I also beheld the prophet, which should prepare the way before him. And the Lamb of God went forth, and was baptized of him; and after that he was baptized, I beheld the Heavens open, and the Holy Ghost come down out of Heaven and abode upon him in the form of a dove. And I beheld that he went forth ministering unto the people, in power and great glory; and the multitudes were gathered together to hear him; and I beheld that they cast him out from among them. And I also beheld twelve others following him.

And it came to pass that they were carried away in the spirit, from before my face, that I saw them not. And it came to pass that the angel spake unto me again, saying, look! And I looked, and I beheld the Heavens open again, and I saw angels descending upon the children of men; and they did minister unto them. And he spake unto me again, saying, look! And I looked, and I beheld the Lamb of God going forth among God, was judged of the world; and I saw and bear record." It was changed to read: "... the Son of the everlasting God was judged of the world: and I saw and bear record."

Dr. Sidney B. Sperry, of the Brigham Young University, claims that the words "the son of" were in the original handwritten manuscript, and that they were accidentally omitted when the first edition of the Book of Mormon was printed:

Mr. Budvarson may be forgiven for some errors, but on pages 14 to 17 of his brochure he makes mistakes that few scholars would forgive him for. He exhibits photo reproductions of pages 25 and 32 of the First Edition of the Book of Mormon, underlining "doctrinal statements concerning God" which he contends were changed in later editions of the Nephite record. Now we grant that the three statements he underlines were changed in later editions, but let us examine the statements and see what possible significance he is entitled to attach to them. . . . Why were these changes made in the text? . . . the early leaders of the Church . . . knew that typographical errors had crept into the 1830 edition in the course of printing. So they attempted to correct those errors by comparing the original manuscripts with the 1830 text. The changes they made in the statements underlined by you on pages 14 and 15 of your brochure are simple corrections of errors in the First Edition. They are corrections (including grammar) such as might be made in the second edition of any book. That the italicized words above were, . . . accidental omissions in the First Edition is also proved by the fact that the manuscript of the Book of Mormon written by Oliver Cowdery and now in the possession of the Reorganized Church of Jesus Christ of Latter day Saints at Independence, Missouri, contains the added words. (The Problems of the Book of Mormon, pp. 197-198)

This statement by Dr. Sperry is very misleading for evidence shows that the Book of Mormon manuscript (which the Reorganized LDS Church has in its possession) has been tampered with. Those who have examined this manuscript (or photographs of it) in the RLDS Church Library, claim that the words “the son of” have been added into the original manuscript in two places. These interpolations are written above the line and were obviously not in the manuscript at the time the Book of Mormon was first published. If they had been there the printer would have included them in the First Edition.

It is interesting to note that interpolations were only made in two places in the manuscript, whereas the words “the Son of” were added into the printed text of the Book of Mormon in four different places. The fact that the interpolations do not appear in these two places certainly seems to give the whole thing away.

Richard P. Howard, RLDS Church Historian, has recently made these revealing statements about this matter:

While it appears likely that the major emphases in the 1830-1837 emendation on the E MS [the manuscript owned by the RLDS Church] were grammatical and stylistic, it can also be demonstrated that theological considerations were operative. For example, note the following two places in 1 Nephi which reflect Joseph Smith’s clarification in 1837 of his post-1830 understanding of the Godhead, at least insofar as God and Christ were thought to be involved at those points . . .

It should be noted that the preceding two revisions of the 1830 text were written into the manuscript for the 1837 printer, as evidenced in column 3. However, two very similar changes involving the identical interpolation were included in the 1837 edition but not recorded in the manuscript. (Restoration Scriptures, pp. 47-48)

It is very interesting to note that Dr. Sperry says nothing of the manuscript of the Book of Mormon which his own church has in its possession. Before the Book of Mormon was ever published another handwritten copy was made in case the first one was stolen. The RLDS Church has one manuscript and the Utah Mormon Church has a small portion of the other. This portion which the Utah Mormon Church has includes three of the four places we are discussing. Photographs reveal that the words “the Son of” do not appear in any of these places. Below is an actual photograph of the handwritten manuscript of the Book of Mormon which is in the LDS Church Historian’s Library. The arrow points to the line which is printed in 1 Nephi 11:21. Notice that the manuscript reads: “. . . even the eternal father.” This is in harmony with the 1830 Edition of the Book of Mormon, and proves that the reading found in current editions (“. . . even the Son of the Eternal Father!”) has been falsified.

Thus we see that the claim that the printer accidentally omitted these words in the first edition cannot be supported by the evidence furnished from the manuscripts.

Removing the Lectures

In 1835 the “Lectures on Faith,” which were originally delivered before a class of the Elders, in Kirtland, Ohio, were printed in the Doctrine and Covenants. In these lectures it was definitely stated that God the Father was a personage of spirit. In the fifth lecture we find this statement about the Godhead:

. . . the Father being a personage of spirit, glory, and power, possessing all perfection and fullness, the Son, . . . a personage of tabernacle, . . . (Doctrine and Covenants, 1835 edition, p. 53)

The “Lectures on Faith” not only taught that God the Father is a spirit, but also that God is omnipresent—i.e., present everywhere at the same time. In the second lecture the following statement is made: “2. We here observe that God is the only supreme governor and independent being in whom all fullness and perfection dwells; who is omnipotent, omnipresent, and omniscient; without beginning of days or end of life; . . .” (Doctrine and Covenants, 1835 edition, p. 12)

On page 26 of the 1835 Edition of the Doctrine and Covenants the following is stated: “. . . he is omnipotent, omnipresent, and omniscient; without beginning of days . . .”

President Joseph Fielding Smith admits that Joseph Smith helped prepare these lectures:

Now the Prophet did know something about these Lectures on Faith, because he helped to prepare them, and he helped also to revise these lectures before they were published, . . . (Doctrines of Salvation, vol. 3, p. 195)

These “Lectures on Faith” were printed in all of the early editions of the Doctrine and Covenants, but they have been removed from recent editions. John William Fitzgerald, in his thesis “A Study of the Doctrine & Covenants,” states as follows:

The reasons for the omission of these Lectures from The Doctrine And Covenants beginning with the 1921 edition and from all subsequent editions as given to the writer by Elder Joseph Fielding Smith were as follows:

- They were not received as revelations by the Prophet Joseph Smith.
- They are instructions relative to the general subject of faith. They are explanations of this principle but not doctrine.
- They are not complete as to their teachings regarding the Godhead. More complete instructions on this point of doctrine are given in section 130 of the 1876 and all subsequent editions of The Doctrine And Covenants.
- It was thought by Elder James E. Talmage, chairman, and other members of the committee who were responsible for their omission that to avoid confusion and contention on this vital point of belief, it would be better not to have them bound in the same volume as the commandments or revelations which make up The Doctrine And Covenants. (“A Study of the Doctrine & Covenants”, M.A. thesis, Brigham Young University, p. 344)

The reasons Joseph Fielding Smith gave John William Fitzgerald as to why the “Lectures on Faith” were removed from the Doctrine and Covenants are very interesting. Reason (a), that they “were not received as revelations” could hardly be considered a reason at all. If every section that is not a revelation was removed from the Doctrine and Covenants, it would be a much shorter book. There are at least nine, if not more, sections in the Doctrine and Covenants that are not revelations; they are sections 102, 113, 121, 123, 128, 131, 134 and 135.

Reason (b), that they were “not doctrine” does not agree with the statement on page 256 of the 1835 Edition of the Doctrine and Covenants. This statement reads as follows: “. . . that the lectures were judiciously arranged and compiled, and were profitable for doctrine; . . .”

Joseph Smith himself signed a statement which was printed in the Preface to the 1835 Edition of the Doctrine and Covenants. In this statement we read:

The first part of the book will be found to contain a series of Lectures as delivered before a Theological class in this place, and in consequence of their embracing the important doctrine of salvation, we have arranged them into the following work.

Reason (c), “that they are not complete as to their teachings regarding the Godhead” is getting much closer to the truth than the first two reasons. A more correct way of wording this, however, might be, “they contradict what is now taught concerning the Godhead in the Mormon Church.”

Actually, these lectures were considered complete with regard to their teachings concerning the Godhead at the time they were given. On page 58 of the 1835 edition of the Doctrine and Covenants the following question and answer appear:

Q. Does the foregoing account of the Godhead lay a sure foundation for the exercise of faith in him unto life and salvation?

A. It does.

Now that the Mormon Church teaches a plurality of Gods and that men become Gods, these lectures are considered “not complete” as to their teachings on the Godhead. Actually, they contradict what is presently taught by the church leaders with regard to this subject.

Reason (d), that to avoid “confusion and contention on this vital point of belief, it would be better not to have them bound in the same volume,” is probably the true reason they were left out. Certainly it would cause confusion and contention in the Mormon Church if one of the elders started to teach that God is a personage of spirit and is everywhere present at the same time, as the Lectures on Faith taught.

To avoid “confusion and contention” the Mormon leaders slyly removed the Lectures on Faith from the Doctrine and Covenants, even though Joseph Smith had thought them important enough to be included. John William Fitzgerald states as follows on page 345 of his 1940 BYU thesis, “A Study of the Doctrine & Covenants”:

The “Lectures on Faith” were voted on unanimously by the conference assembled August 17, 1835 to be included in the forthcoming book of doctrine and covenants. The writer could find no documentary evidence that they were voted on by a general conference of the Church to be omitted in the 1921 and all subsequent editions of The Doctrine [and] Covenants.

“Inspired” Correction

In our book, Mormon Scriptures and the Bible, we deal extensively with Joseph Smith’s “Inspired Version of the Bible.” In this chapter we will consider a few changes he made concerning the Godhead. Since the Inspired Revision of the Bible is a product of Joseph Smith’s earlier thinking, it does not contain the idea that there are many Gods or the doctrine that men can become Gods.

Joseph Smith made a very interesting change in Luke 10:22 (verse 23 of the Inspired Revision); in the King James Version it reads: “. . . no man knoweth who the Son is, but the Father; and who the Father is, but the Son, and he to whom the Son will reveal him.” Joseph Smith changed this to read as follows: “. . . no man knoweth that the Son is the Father, and the Father is the Son, but him to whom the Son will reveal it.”

As Joseph Smith began to develop the idea of a plurality of Gods, he also began to ignore the changes he had made in his “Inspired Version.” Revelation 1:6 was one of the verses Joseph Smith changed in the Inspired Version of the Bible. In the King James Version it read: “And hath made us kings and priests unto God and his Father; . . .”

With an improper understanding of the language used in the scriptures, it would be possible to read this verse with the understanding that God himself had a Father. This is because of the fact that the word “and” is used between the words “God” and “his Father.” In the Inspired Version of the Bible, Joseph Smith left out the word “and” so that this verse could not be used to support the idea of a plurality of Gods. He worded it as follows: “. . . and hath made us kings and priests unto God, his Father.”

In 1844, after Joseph Smith had developed the idea of a plurality of Gods, he decided that the rendition given in the King James Version of the Bible was correct; thus repudiating his own “inspired” rendition of this verse. In a sermon delivered June 16, 1844, and recorded in the History of the Church, vol. 6, page 473, we read as follows:

President Joseph Smith read the 3rd chapter of Revelation, and took for his text 1st chapter, 6th verse—“And hath made us kings and priests unto God and His Father: to Him be glory and dominion forever and ever. Amen.”

Now, after quoting this text from the King James Version, Joseph Smith remarked that the translation of it was correct: “It is altogether correct in the translation” (History of the Church, vol. 6, p. 473). Thus he completely ignored his own “inspired” rendition of this verse, and went on to preach a sermon on the plurality of Gods, using this as a text. On page 474 of the same volume, Joseph Smith stated:

I will preach on the plurality of Gods. I have selected this text for that express purpose.

Our text says “And hath made us kings and priests unto God and His Father.”

If Abraham reasoned thus—If Jesus Christ was the Son of God, and John discovered that God the Father of Jesus Christ had a father, you may suppose that he had a father also. (History of the Church, vol. 6, pp. 474-476)

Because of the fact that the Reorganized LDS Church gained possession of the original manuscripts of the “Inspired Revision” and did not print them until after Joseph Smith’s death, it has been suggested that they “altered the text of Revelation 1:6” because they did not believe in the plurality of Gods. Recently, however, the RLDS Church has released a photograph of the original manuscript which clearly shows that Joseph Smith did remove the word “and” from the text. They have allowed the Utah Mormon Church to reproduce this photograph in Brigham Young University Studies, Spring 1971, page 265. Below is a copy of the important portion of this photograph.

the first begotten of the dead, & the prince of the living, the one who made him who loved us, be glory, who washed us from our sins in his own blood, & hath made us kings & priests unto God, his Father, to him be glory & dominion, for ever & ever

The Utah Mormon scholar Robert J. Matthews has written an excellent article concerning the Inspired Version in which he concedes that the RLDS Church did not alter Revelation 1:6. He states:

An important doctrinal concept is involved in this passage. Perhaps no verse in the printed editions of the Inspired Version of the Bible has been so critically examined and has been so much the subject of discussion as Revelation 1:6. . . . On June 16, 1844, the Prophet Joseph is reported to have said in a public discourse that the King James Version of Revelation 1:6 is “altogether correct in the translation.”

Because the printed Inspired Version as published by the RLDS differs in the text of Revelation 1:6 from what the Prophet said was the correct translation, the RLDS have been accused of deliberately altering the text. . . . Since the original manuscripts have not been available for examination, the conclusion has persisted through the years since the first publication of the Inspired Version in 1867. However, at our most recent request, Richard P. Howard, RLDS Church Historian, graciously supplied a photocopy of the manuscript page in question. . . . Critical examination of the original manuscript does not give any evidence that it has been altered. The writing is relatively small and the letters are close together and neatly written and any alteration would be immediately obvious. It is this writer’s conclusion that the original manuscript does not and never did contain the said “and” in this particular phrase of Revelation 1:6 and that the printed editions of the Inspired Version correctly represent the text of the original manuscript. (Brigham Young University Studies, Spring 1971, p. 264)

Robert J. Matthews admits that there is a “discrepancy” between Joseph Smith’s rendition in the Inspired Version and his sermon of June 16, 1844:

How to account for this discrepancy the writer does not know, but several explanations can be offered. It may be that there occurred an unintentional omission of “and” in the mechanical process as the scribe recorded what the Prophet dictated. It may be that the scribe recorded what he heard, but that the Prophet did not possess as much knowledge about the plurality of Gods when he dictated the Bible revision in 1833 as he did eleven years later in 1844 when he delivered a special discourse on the subject. (Brigham Young University Studies, Spring 1971, pp. 263, 264, 267)

The reader will notice from the photograph of the original manuscript of Revelation 1:6 that a comma which was not in the King James Version has been added between the words “God” and “his.” Therefore, it seems very unlikely that the word “and” was accidentally omitted. Robert J. Matthews’ second explanation seems far more likely—i.e., Joseph Smith did not “possess” the same ideas about the Godhead in the early 1830’s as he did in later years.

Another interesting change that Joseph Smith made in the Bible is found in Exodus 7:1. In the King James Version it reads as follows: “And the Lord said unto Moses, See, I have made thee a god to Pharaoh: . . .” In his “Inspired Version,” Joseph Smith changed this verse to read: “And the Lord said unto Moses, See, I have made thee a prophet to Pharaoh; . . .” Joseph Smith was apparently trying to destroy the idea of Moses being a god, so he changed the verse to read that Moses was a prophet. In 1844, however, he again changed his mind and decided that Moses was a God:

The scriptures are a mixture of very strange doctrines to the Christian world, who are blindly led by the blind. I will refer to another scripture. “Now,” says God, when He visited Moses in the bush, (Moses was a stammering sort of a boy like me) God said, “Thou shalt be a God unto the children of Israel.” (History of the Church, vol. 6, p. 478)

That Joseph Smith had originally changed the word “god” to “prophet” is verified by a photograph of the original manuscript which is published by Merrill Y. Van Wagoner in his book The Inspired Revision of the Bible, page 22. Below is a reproduction of that photograph.

The reader will notice that the arrow points to the word “prophet.”

Elohim

In 1844 Joseph Smith claimed that the word Elohim, which is usually translated God in the Bible, should really be translated “Gods”:

In the very beginning the Bible shows there is a plurality of Gods beyond the power of refutation. It is a great subject I am dwelling on. The word Eloheim ought to be in the plural all the way through—Gods. (History of the Church, vol. 6, p. 476)

This criticism is not confined to Mormon scholars. William McCarthy, a critic of the Bible, made this statement:

The first verse of the bible is an example: “In the beginning God created the heaven and the earth.” The earliest text was: “In the beginning Elohim created . . .” Had these compilers been honest, they would have said: “In the beginning the gods created . . .” . . . The bible’s compilers lied more than twenty-five hundred times by changing the plural, Elohim, gods, into the singular “god.” (Bible, Church and God, by William McCarthy, Truth Seeker Co., New York, N.Y., 1946, p. 174)

In the History of the Church, vol. 6, page 475, we find this statement by Joseph Smith:

. . . Eloheim is from the word Eloi, God, in the singular number; and by adding the word heim, it renders it Gods. . . . I defy all the world to refute me. . . . I once asked a learned Jew, “If the Hebrew language compels us to render all words ending in heim in the plural, why not render the first Eloheim plural?” He replied, “That is the rule with few exceptions; but in this case it would ruin the Bible.”

While it is true the Hebrew word Elohim has a masculine plural ending, this does not mean that it should be rendered “Gods” throughout the Bible as Joseph Smith would have us believe. Actually, it can be rendered either “God” or “gods.” How it should be translated depends on the context of the sentence in which it appears. In The Wycliffe Bible Commentary we find these statements concerning this matter:

Elohim is the usual word for “God” in Hebrew, Aramaic, and Arabic. It is actually plural in form, but is used with a verb in the singular. Perhaps the plural is best explained as indicating “plenitude of might” or exceptional dignity and unlimited greatness. In this One are united all the powers of eternity and infinity. (The Wycliffe Bible Commentary, Chicago, 1968, p. 2)

Elohim is plural in form. It is usually translated “God.” But it can be translated “gods,” as, for instance, when it refers to the gods of the heathen neighbors of Israel. (Ibid., p. 11)

In the English language we also have words that are exactly the same in the singular and plural. The word “deer,” for instance, can be used to refer to one, two or many deer, and only the context of the sentence reveals exactly what is meant. We could say, “I saw several deer,” and the reader would immediately know that we were referring to more than one deer. But if we say, “I saw a deer,” the context shows that we are speaking of only one deer. The same can be said of the following words: sheep, trout, species, Chinese, Portuguese, moose or fish. A person can only determine whether these words are singular or plural by the context in which they appear.

When Joseph Smith stated that “Elohim” should always be rendered “Gods,” he was making a serious mistake, for this would be ignoring the context in which the word appears. It would be just as unreasonable to say that the English word “deer” always refers to two or more animals.

Below are three Hebrew words which have the masculine plural ending but can be translated as singular or plural as the context requires. Since Hebrew reads from right to left the ending of each word is on the left hand side.

Hebrew Word	Pronounced	Translates
אלהים	Elohim	God, Gods, Angels or Judges
פנים	Panim	Face or Faces
תרפים	Teraphim	Idol, Idols, Image or Images

Now let us consider two verses that contain the word “Elohim.” The first is Exodus 18:11; in this verse Elohim is translated “gods”: “Now I know that the Lord is greater than all gods: . . .” Common sense tells us that we can not render Elohim as “God” in this instance. If we did we would have a translation that would not make sense: “Now I know that the Lord is greater than all God: . . .”

In our second example (Exodus 20:2) we find just the opposite, for in this case Elohim must be rendered “God:” “I am the Lord thy God, . . .” It would be impossible to render Elohim as plural in this instance. If we did it would read: “I am the Lord thy gods, . . .” Obviously, the word “gods” would not be compatible with the word “I” at the first of the verse. The word “I” comes from the Hebrew word anoki (אֲנֹכִי), and is translated “I” or “me.” Therefore, it is clear that Elohim must be rendered as singular in this verse.

The word panim can be translated as either “face” or “faces” as indicated above. In Genesis 50:1 we read: “And Joseph fell upon his father’s face, . . .” The same word, however, is translated “faces” in Genesis 9:23: “. . . their faces were backward, . . .”

The word teraphim is translated as “images” in Genesis

31:19: “. . . Rachel had stolen the images . . .” In 1 Samuel 19:13, however, teraphim is rendered “image”: “And Michal took an image, and laid it in the bed, and put a pillow of goats’ hair for his bolster, and covered it with a cloth.”

When we examine the structure of the Hebrew language we find that Joseph Smith’s statement that Elohim should be translated “Gods” throughout the Bible is incorrect. In fact, Joseph Smith himself sometimes used the word Elohim when speaking only of God the Father: “We believe in the Great Eloheim who sits enthroned in yonder heavens” (History of the Church, vol. 5, p. 499). The Mormon writer Hyrum L. Andrus makes the following statement about this matter: “. . . Joseph Smith used the exalted name-title ‘Elohim’ to designate the Father. The word ‘Elohim’ is a plural term meaning ‘Gods,’ as the Prophet pointed out while analyzing the meaning of the term in Hebrew, and in this sense he also used it. Either usage is appropriate, and the reader must determine from the context of the statement in which sense it is being applied” (God, Man and the Universe, p. 113). Bruce R. McConkie, of the First Council of Seventy, admits that “Elohim, plural word though it is, is also used as the exalted name-title of God the Eternal Father, a usage that connotes his supremacy and omnipotence, he being God above all Gods” (Mormon Doctrine, 1966, p. 224).

If Joseph Smith’s statement that Elohim should always be translated “Gods” were true we would expect to find the word Elohim rendered as “Gods” throughout his “Inspired Version” of the Bible, but instead we find it rendered “God” just like the King James Version. It is very interesting to compare Genesis 1:3 of the King James Version with Joseph Smith’s “translation.” In the King James Version we read: “And God said, Let there be light: . . .” Joseph Smith changed this to read: “And I, God, said, Let there be light, . . .” (Inspired Revision, Genesis 1:6; also found in Pearl of Great Price, Moses 2:3). Notice that Joseph has added the word “I,” thus making it even more apparent that the verse is referring to only one God. In the Book of Abraham, however, Joseph Smith completely reversed his position with regard to this matter, for in Abraham 4:3 we read: “And they (the gods) said: Let there be light; . . .”

Louis C. Zucker, Professor Emeritus of English and Lecturer in Hebrew at the University of Utah, has written a very interesting article concerning Joseph Smith’s work in the Hebrew language. He shows that Joseph Smith’s translation of Elohim as “Gods” is incorrect, and concludes his article by stating: “If there has been another artist of religion in modern times who, excepting his blatant imitator ‘Baneemy,’ transformed the Hebrew of the Bible to suit his own purposes as freely as did Joseph Smith, who would he be?” (Dialogue: A Journal of Mormon Thought, Summer 1968, p. 55).

Hands or Wings?

In the chapter on Joseph Smith’s First Vision we showed that the Mormon leaders have used this vision to prove that God the Father has a body. George Q. Cannon, who was a member of the First Presidency, stated: “Joseph saw that the Father had a form; that He had a head; that He had arms; that He had limbs; that He had feet; that He had a face and a tongue with which to express His thoughts; . . .” (Journal of Discourses, vol. 24, p. 372). In the manual used by the Mormon missionaries the following appears:

Elder: Mr. Brown, . . . In 1820 Joseph Smith . . . saw, standing above him in the air, two personages in the form of men . . . Mr. Brown, who were these two personages?

Brown: God and Jesus Christ.

Elder: I know that Joseph Smith did see the Father and the Son. . . . he could see that his own body truly was created in the image and likeness of God. . . . What do we learn about God from the experience of Joseph Smith?

Brown: That he has a real body.

Elder: Yes, he does. The Church also taught that God the Father and Jesus Christ, his Son, were both the same person. But what did Joseph Smith see?

Brown: He saw two Personages in the form of men. (A Uniform System For Teaching Investigators, August 1961, pp. 11-12)

Now that we have Joseph Smith’s first written account, we know that he did not claim to see God the Father in his First Vision and that this element was added to the story after he changed his mind concerning the Godhead. Even Mormon writers have to admit that “the first account appears to make specific reference to only one personage” (James B. Allen, Improvement Era, April 1970, p. 6).

It would appear, then, that the story of the First Vision can no longer be used to support the idea of a plurality of Gods or that God the Father has a body. (For a more complete treatment of this subject see the preceding chapter of this book.)

When the Mormons first started arguing about whether God had “body, parts or passions,” they were not referring to God the Father, but rather to the question of whether Christ had a resurrected body (see The Evening and the Morning Star, April 1834, p. 149). By 1842, however, they were definitely teaching that the Father had a body. The following appeared in the Millennial Star:

The Old and New Testament everywhere reveals a God with body, parts, and passions. The following are a few of the many texts which speak of his body and parts:—

Image.—Gen. 1st, 27th.
Eyes.—Prov. xv. 3rd.
Mouth.—Isaiah lv. 11th.
Nose.—Isaiah lxxv. 5th
Lips and Tongue.—Isaiah xxx. 27th
Ear.—2d Kings xix. 16th
Soles of his feet.—Ezekiel xl. 7th.
Arm.—Jeremiah xxi. 5th
Finger.—Exod. xxxi. 18th
Fingers.—Psalms viii. 3rd
Loins.—Ezek. i. 27th
Heart.—Gen. vi. 6th
Nostrils.—Exod. xv. 8th
Hand, face, and back parts.—Exod. xxxiii. 22nd

The foregoing abundantly show that the Father of our Lord Jesus Christ had both body and parts, to say nothing of Jesus Christ, . . . (Millennial Star, vol. 2, p. 184)

Most of the references which Mormons use to try to prove that God the Father has a body are taken from the Old Testament—all fourteen references cited above are from the Old Testament. Occasionally, however, Mormons will refer to Acts 7:55 as evidence that God has a body: “But he, . . . saw the glory of God, and Jesus standing on the right hand of God, . . .” In scripture the “right hand” of God is considered to be a position of favor or power. At the judgment described in Matthew 25:33-41 the righteous are found at the “right hand,” whereas the wicked are at the “left hand.” In Isaiah 41:10 we read: “. . . I am thy God: . . . I will uphold thee with the right hand of my righteousness.” On one occasion Jesus himself said: “. . . ye shall see the Son of man sitting on the right hand of power, and coming in the clouds of heaven” (Mark 14:62). Now, certainly no one would argue that this verse proves that “power” is a man or literally has a right hand.

Some of the Old Testament verses used by Mormons in an attempt to prove that God has a body were never meant to be taken literally. For instance, Exodus 15:8, cited above as evidence that God has “nostrils,” reads as follows: “And with the blast of thy nostrils the waters were gathered together, the floods stood upright as an heap, and the depths were congealed in the heart of the sea.” We feel that it would be just as ridiculous to claim that the “heart of the sea” is a literal heart as to claim that the word “nostrils” actually proves that God has a nose.

Another verse cited above is Proverbs 15:3: “The eyes of the Lord are in every place, beholding the evil and the good.” If the word “eyes” were taken literally it would seem to imply that God has many eyes, for how could just two eyes be “in every place”? In 2 Chronicles 16:9 we read: “For the eyes of the Lord run to and fro throughout the whole earth, . . .” It would be impossible to interpret the word “eyes” literally in this case; however, if we accept the fact that “God is a Spirit” (John 4:24) and that he fills “heaven and earth” (Jeremiah 23:24), we can easily understand the meaning of this verse—i.e., that God is able to watch over his entire creation.

To attempt to interpret some of these words literally to prove that God has a body is making a great mistake, for they are sometimes used to describe even inanimate objects (see our Case, vol. 3, p. 106).

If a person decided to interpret Psalms 91:4 only according to the literal meaning of the words, he could make a very good case for the idea that God is a bird: “He shall cover thee with his feathers, and under his wings shalt thou trust: . . .”

Although the early Mormon leaders interpreted statements concerning God which appear in the Old Testament very literally, some of the leaders today realize that this was carried too far. Even President Joseph Fielding Smith has admitted that some of the expressions used in the Old Testament concerning God are figurative:

The statement that men anciently “walked with God” we accept, of course, as a figure of speech. It means that they were in perfect harmony and at the same time receiving constant guidance and revelation from the Lord. It does not mean that they were privileged to walk along the streets, for instance, as Jesus walked with the two disciples after his resurrection. (Doctrines of Salvation, vol. 1, p. 4)

The scriptural accounts of talking face to face and of walking with God should not be interpreted in the sense that the Savior stood before those prophets and revealed his whole person. That he may have done so at later periods in the cases of Abraham and Moses is possible, but he had not done so in that fulness in the antediluvian days. (Ibid., p. 37)

Mormon writers who try to use the Old Testament to prove that God has a body are faced with a very serious problem, for their own theology plainly teaches that Jehovah (the God of the Old Testament) is Jesus Christ. Therefore, any appearance of the God of the Old Testament is only an appearance of the preexistent Christ and does not prove that God the Father has a body. Joseph Fielding Smith, the 10th President of the Mormon Church, seems to realize this and has made some comments which are in direct contradiction to those made by earlier leaders of the Mormon Church:

. . . Jesus Christ was Jehovah, who led Israel in the days of Abraham and Moses, and in fact from the days of Adam. Also that Jehovah, or Jesus Christ, as a personage of Spirit appeared to the Brother of Jared, . . . (Doctrines of Salvation, vol. 1, p. 11)

All revelation since the fall has come through Jesus Christ, who is the Jehovah of the Old Testament. In all of the scriptures, where God is mentioned and where He has appeared, it was Jehovah who talked with Abraham, with Noah, Enoch, Moses and all the prophets. He is the God of Israel, the Holy One of Israel; the one who led that nation out of Egyptian bondage, and who gave and fulfilled the Law of Moses. The Father has never dealt with man directly and personally since the fall, and he has never appeared except to introduce and bear record of the Son. Thus the Inspired Version records that “no man hath seen God at any time, except he hath borne record of the Son.” (Ibid., p. 27)

Although the Mormon leaders are beginning to curtail the use of the Old Testament to prove that God the Father has a body, they still maintain that this doctrine is true.

Since the Mormon Church teaches that God is only an exalted man and that there are many Gods, it has led the Mormon people to the conclusion that God is somewhat limited. The Mormon Apostle Orson Hyde stated that God needs angels and ministers to tell him what is going on: “. . . He knows everything. How? When His angels and ministers tell Him of it, like any other ruler” (Journal of Discourses, vol. 2, p. 64).

Although the “Lectures on Faith” taught that God is “omnipresent,” Brigham Young, the second President of the Mormon Church, denied this doctrine: “Some would have us believe that God is present everywhere. It is not so” (Journal of Discourses, vol. 6, p. 345).

The idea of a plurality of Gods and the idea that God is limited led Brigham Young to the conclusion that there are many redeemers: “Consequently every earth has its redeemer, and every earth has its tempter; . . .” (Journal of Discourses, vol. 14, p. 71). Young also taught that the Mormons themselves will be redeemers: “But I expect, . . . that I shall see the time with yourselves that we shall know how to prepare to organize an earth like this—know how to people that earth, how to redeem it, how to sanctify it, and how to glorify it, with those who live upon it who hearken to our counsels” (Ibid., vol. 6, pp. 274-75).

A Changeable God

The idea of a progressive God was a natural outgrowth of the Mormon teaching of a plurality of Gods. The Apostle Orson Hyde made this comment: “Remember that God, our heavenly Father, was perhaps once a child, and mortal like we ourselves, and rose step by step in the scale of progress, in the school of advancement; has moved forward and overcome, until He has arrived at the point where He now is” (Journal of Discourses, vol. 1, p. 123).

Brigham Young, the second President of the Mormon Church, made this statement: “We are now, or may be, as perfect in our sphere as God and Angels are in theirs, but the greatest intelligence in existence can continually ascend to greater heights of perfection” (Journal of Discourses, vol. 1, p. 93).

Wilford Woodruff, who became the fourth President of the Mormon Church, made this statement: “God Himself is increasing and progressing in knowledge, power, and dominion, and will do so, worlds without end” (Journal of Discourses, vol. 6, p. 120).

This idea of a progressive and changeable God is very different from the concept of God taught in the Bible and Book of Mormon. In Malachi 3:6 we read: “For I am the Lord, I change not; . . .” In the Book of Mormon, Moroni 8:18, we find this statement: “For I know that God is not a partial God, neither a changeable being; but he is unchangeable from all eternity to all eternity.”

While Brigham Young and other leaders of the Mormon Church openly rejected the Book of Mormon teaching that God is “unchangeable,” the Apostle Orson Pratt had a difficult time accepting these new teachings. Although he accepted the idea of a plurality of Gods, he did not seem to believe that they progressed in knowledge:

The Father and the Son do not progress in knowledge and wisdom, because they already know all things past, present, and to come. . . . Now we wish to be distinctly understood that each of these personal Gods has equal knowledge with all the rest; there are none among them that are in advance of the others in knowledge; though some may have been Gods as many millions of years, as there are particles of dust in all the universe, yet there is not one truth that such are in possession of but what every other God knows. They are all equal in knowledge, and in wisdom, and in the possession of all truth. None of these Gods are progressing in knowledge; neither can they progress in the acquirement of any truth.

98. Some have gone so far as to say that all the Gods were progressing in truth, and would continue to progress to all eternity, and that some were far in advance of others: but let us examine, for a moment, the absurdity of such a conjecture. . . . Have we any right to say that there is a boundless ocean of materials, acting under such Superior laws that none of the Gods to all ages of eternity can be able to understand them? We should like to know what Law Giver gave such superior laws? . . . This is the great absurdity, resulting from the vague conjecture that there will be an endless progression in knowledge among the Gods. Such a conjecture is not only extremely absurd, but it is in direct opposition to what is revealed.

99. We shall now show from the revelations given through Joseph, the Seer, that God and his son, Jesus Christ, are in possession of all knowledge, and that there is no more truth for them to learn, . . . (The Seer, pp. 117-118)

Brigham Young openly differed with Orson Pratt on this issue. In a sermon delivered in the Tabernacle on January 13, 1867, Brigham Young stated:

. . . Brother Orson Pratt, has in theory, bounded the capacity of God. According to his theory, God can progress no further in knowledge and power; but the God that I serve is progressing eternally, and so are his children: they will increase to all eternity, if they are faithful. (Journal of Discourses, vol. 11, p. 286)

J. M. Grant, a member of the First Presidency under Brigham Young, made this statement concerning Orson Pratt's teaching about the Gods: ". . . Orson Pratt lariatied out the Gods in his theory; his circle is as far as the string extends. My God is not lariatied out" (Journal of Discourses, vol. 4, p. 126).

It is very interesting to note that the Mormon Church is still divided over this issue. Joseph Fielding Smith, the tenth President of the Mormon Church, has sided with Orson Pratt, declaring that God does not progress in knowledge:

False notions about God's progression. It seems very strange to me that members of the Church will hold to the doctrine, "God increases in knowledge as time goes on." . . . Where has the Lord ever revealed to us that he is lacking in knowledge? That he is still learning new truth; discovering new laws that are unknown to him? I think this kind of doctrine is very dangerous. . . .

Will God destroy himself? I cannot comprehend God in his perfection having to spend time discovering laws and truth he does not know. Such a thought to me is destructive, not progressive. Should there be truth which God has not discovered, when may he discover it, and, like a chemist who mixes certain elements and blows himself up, when will the Almighty find some hidden truth or law which will shatter all? Is there not a danger that some other personage may discover some greater truth than our Father knows? If such could be the case, what would become of God? (Doctrines of Salvation, vol. 1, pp. 7, 8, 10)

Our Father in heaven is infinite; he is perfect; he possesses all knowledge and wisdom. (Ibid., vol. 2, p. 34)

The Holy Ghost

One of the most confusing areas of Mormon theology is that dealing with the Holy Ghost. In the Lectures on Faith, published in the first edition of the Doctrine and Covenants in 1835, it was declared that there were only two personages in the Godhead—the Father and the Son—and that the Holy Spirit is the mind of the Father and the Son:

2 There are two personages . . . the Father and the Son: The Father being a personage of spirit, glory and power: possessing all perfection and fullness: The Son, who was in the bosom of the Father a personage of tabernacle, . . . called the Son because of the flesh . . . possessing the same mind with the Father, which mind is the Holy Spirit, . . .

Q. How many personages are there in the Godhead?

A. Two: the Father and the Son.

Q. How do you prove that there are two personages in the Godhead?

A. By the Scriptures. . . .

Q. Do the Father and the Son possess the same mind?

A. They do. . . .

Q. What is this mind?

A. The Holy Spirit. . . .

Q. Do the Father, Son and Holy Spirit constitute the Godhead?

A. They do. . . .

Q. Does the foregoing account of the Godhead lay a sure foundation for the exercise of faith in him unto life and salvation?

A. It does. (Doctrine and Covenants, 1835 Ed., pp. 52, 53, 55, 57, 58; removed from modern editions)

The Mormon leaders now teach that there are three personages in the Godhead—the Father and the Son both being personages of tabernacle and the Holy Ghost being a personage of Spirit. It is interesting to note, however, that in 1855 the Mormon Apostle Orson Pratt was still not certain whether there was a personal Holy Ghost: "I am inclined to think from some things in the revelations, that there is such a being as personal Holy Ghost, but it is not set forth as a positive fact, and the Lord has never given me any revelation upon the subject, and consequently I cannot fully make up my mind one way or the other" (Journal of Discourses, vol. 2, p. 338). On another occasion Pratt stated: "In the Book of Covenants, page 45, we are informed that there are two personages besides the Holy Spirit, which constitute the Godhead; but we are not there informed whether the third, called the Holy Spirit is a personage or not" (Millennial Star, vol. 12, p. 308). In a pamphlet, which later fell into disrepute, Orson Pratt argued that the Holy Spirit is a fluid substance: "Heat, light, electricity, and all the varied and grand displays of nature, are but the tremblings, the vibrations, the energetic powers of a living, all-pervading, and most wonderful fluid, full of wisdom and knowledge, called the Holy Spirit. . . . there are many expressions in Scripture which plainly show that the Holy Ghost exists, not only as a person, but as a diffused fluid substance. . . . Let it be remembered that the Holy Ghost and Holy Spirit represent the same Holy Substance or fluid, being two different names for the same thing" (Pamphlets by Orson Pratt, "The Holy Spirit," p. 50).

The Mormon Apostle Parley P. Pratt—Orson Pratt's brother—also taught that the Holy Spirit is a "substance or fluid," but after his death the Mormon leaders deleted this from his book (see our Changes in the Key to Theology).

Today, of course, the Mormons teach that the Holy Ghost is an actual personage. William E. Berrett quoted Joseph F. Smith as saying: "'The Holy Ghost is a personage of Spirit, he constitutes the third person in the Godhead'" (The Restored Church, p. 541).

Since the Mormon leaders teach that God has a wife, some people have speculated that the Holy Ghost might be the wife of God the Father. President Joseph Fielding Smith, however, vigorously opposed such an idea: "The Holy Ghost is not a personage with a body of flesh and bones, and in this respect differs from the Father and the Son. The Holy Ghost is not a woman, as some have declared, and therefore is not the mother of Jesus Christ" (Doctrines of Salvation, vol. 1, p. 39). The Apostle LeGrand Richards says that "the Holy Ghost is a male personage. . . . He is a male personage of spirit as was Jesus before he was born of the Virgin Mary" (A Marvelous Work And A Wonder, p. 118). Heber C. Kimball, who was a member of the First Presidency, said that "the Holy Ghost is a man; he is one of the sons of our Father and our God; and he is that man that stood next to Jesus Christ, just as I stand by brother Brigham" (Journal of Discourses, vol. 5, p. 179).

William E. Berrett gives this information concerning the Holy Ghost: "The Holy Ghost is a person. Unlike the Father and the Son who have bodies of flesh and bone, the Holy Ghost has no body of flesh and bone (that is, of the elements as we know them) but is a personage of spirit" (The Restored Church, p. 540). While the Mormon Church leaders teach that the Holy Ghost does not have a body of flesh and bones, they also teach that it is absolutely essential to have one. In fact, they claim that the devils were denied bodies of flesh and bone as a punishment for their sins. Joseph Fielding Smith stated:

Devils denied mortal bodies. The punishment of Satan and the third of the hosts of heaven who followed him, was that they were denied the privilege of being born into this world and receiving mortal bodies. They did not keep their first estate and were denied the opportunity of eternal progression. (Doctrines of Salvation, vol. 1, p. 65)

There is no greater blessing that can come than the blessing of birth. One third of the hosts of heaven, because of rebellion, were denied that privilege, and hence they have no bodies of flesh and bones, that great gift of God. (Ibid., p. 16)

Brigham Young related that Joseph B. Nobles once told a Methodist Priest that the Devil was “a being without a body, whereas our God has a body, parts, and passions. The Devil was cursed and sent down from heaven. He has no body of his own; . . .” (Journal of Discourses, vol. 5, p. 331)

The Mormon leaders are unable to explain why God the Father should have a body and yet the Holy Ghost be without one. It is claimed that a body is necessary for eternal progression, yet the Mormon Church teaches that the Holy Ghost became a God without one. Milton R. Hunter, of the First Council of the Seventy, says that the “crowning Gospel ordinance requisite for Godhood is celestial marriage. . . . obedience to this law is absolutely necessary in order to obtain the highest exaltation in the Kingdom of God” (The Gospel Through the Ages, pp. 118-119). According to Mormon theology, then, it would have been impossible for the Holy Ghost to have obtained Godhood, since he had no body with which to obey the law of “celestial marriage.” In a revelation given by Joseph Smith we find this statement: “Broad is the gate, and wide the way that leadeth to the deaths; and many there are that go in thereat, . . .” (Doctrine and Covenants 132:25). Mormon writers explain that these are the ones who have not obeyed the law of “celestial marriage” and who cannot have children in the resurrection. Bruce R. McConkie, of the Council of the Seventy, states: “The opposite of eternal lives is eternal deaths. Those who come up separately and singly in the resurrection and who therefore do not have spirit children eternally are said to inherit ‘the deaths’ (D. & C. 132:16-17, 25.)” (Mormon Doctrine, 1958, p. 220). According to this reasoning, the Holy Ghost seems to be on the path that “leadeth to the deaths.”

Some members of the Mormon Church have been concerned as to whether or not the Holy Ghost will get a body at some future time. Joseph Fielding Smith, however, says that he is not troubled by this matter: “I have never troubled myself about the Holy Ghost whether he will sometime have a body or not because it is not in any way essential to my salvation” (Doctrine of Salvation, vol. 1, p. 39).

Bruce R. McConkie made this comment about the Holy Ghost: “He is a Personage of Spirit, a Spirit Person, a Spirit Man, . . . In this dispensation, at least, nothing has been revealed as to his origin or destiny; expressions on these matters are both speculative and fruitless” (Mormon Doctrine, p. 329).

No Real Answers

In his Master’s thesis, “The Social Psychological Basis of Mormon New-Orthodoxy,” Owen Kendall White, Jr., made these interesting observations concerning the Mormon view of the Godhead:

In contrast with the sovereign God of Christian orthodoxy and neo-orthodoxy, the Mormon God is finite. This is indicated in the fact that God is not the only reality with necessary existence. That is, He is not the Creator of all that is. (“The Social Psychological Basis of Mormon New-Orthodoxy,” M.A. thesis, University of Utah, June 1967, p. 86)

. . . to the Mormon, God is involved within space and time. He is not the creator of these dimensions. In fact, the possession of a physical body places rather obvious spatial limitations upon God. . . .

The conception of a changing God, a God in the process of “becoming” rather than “being,” which deeply permeates Mormon theology illustrates God’s temporality. . . . time imposes serious restrictions upon God. . . . God did not always exist as he now is. In other words, God was not always God. He has changed. He has progressed. . . . Joseph Smith taught that “God himself was once as we are now, and is an exalted man, and sits enthroned in yonder heavens! That is the great secret.” . . . Mormonism is not without some confusion on the changeability of God. The problem may partially stem from Joseph Smith’s earlier teaching when he took a position similar to orthodox Christianity. (Ibid., pp. 91-93)

Thus, Orson F. Whitney, an early Mormon apostle, says that it is God’s “superior intelligence that makes Him God,” and that the gospel is merely a ladder “of light, of intelligence, of principle” by which men become Gods. . . . it should be apparent that the Mormon God is a heretical departure from traditional Christianity, and the traditional Christian terminology of omnipotence and omniscience are not justifiably applied to the Mormon God. (Ibid., pp. 95-96)

. . . Mormonism’s traditional emphasis has been on God’s humanity rather than his transcendence. In other words, Mormon theology is much more concerned with the similarities between God and man than the differences between them.

This emphasis upon the closeness and similarity of God and man is clearly evident in the Mormon doctrine that God is a person with a physical body. For it is the notion that God has a physical body that leads to Mormon claims that man is literally, not figuratively, the offspring of God. Through its entire history, Mormonism has employed its extremely anthropomorphic conception of God to illustrate the similarities rather than the differences between God and man. (Ibid., pp. 121-122)

In this chapter we have seen how the Mormon concept of God has changed from one God to a plurality of Gods. Mormon leaders claim that all Christians are in a state of apostasy and have lost the true knowledge of the Godhead, yet a careful examination of Mormon teachings concerning the Godhead reveals a serious state of confusion. While Mormonism claims to give all the answers about the Godhead, the honest investigator soon finds that these answers do not solve the real problems and that many of them are built upon the sandy foundation of change or falsification.

In the next chapter we will deal with Brigham Young’s Adam-God doctrine, which is certainly one of the low points in Mormon theology.

Mormon Leaders Hold Fast to Plural God Doctrine

Since the publication of the revised edition of Mormonism—Shadow or Reality? in 1972, the Mormon leaders have continued to cling to the doctrine that God was once in a fallen state and that men can become Gods. In a speech published in The Ensign, November 1975, page 80, Church President Spencer W. Kimball declared:

Brethren, 225,000 of you are here tonight. I suppose 225,000 of you may become gods. There seems to be plenty of space out there in the universe. And the Lord has proved that he knows how to do it. I think he could make, or probably have us help make, worlds for all of us, for every one of us 225,000.

On April 3, 1977, the Salt Lake Tribune reported:

President Spencer W. Kimball of the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints told members of his faith Saturday night that they can attain godhood if they continue to perfect their lives. . . .

President Kimball said that “What man is, God has been and what God is, man seeks to become.”

The church leader said that according to LDS scripture, Abraham has attained godhood in eternal life and that if members of the LDS Church continue to perfect their lives in accordance with God’s teachings, they too can attain godhood in immortality.

On October 7, 1974, the Tribune quoted President Kimball as saying:

“In each of us is the potentiality to become a God—pure, holy, true, influential, powerful, independent of earthly forces. . . . we were in the beginning with God.”

On still another occasion President Kimball stressed:

. . . “Man can transform himself, but he has in him the seeds of Godhood that can grow. He can lift himself by his very bootstraps.” (Ibid., September 18, 1974)

Marion G. Romney, second counselor in the First Presidency, maintains that God Himself is only a “saved soul”:

“Man is a soul, that is a dual being, a spirit person clothed in a tangible body of flesh and bones. God is a perfected, saved soul enjoying eternal life. He is both immortal and exalted to the highest glory. He is enjoying that blessed condition which men may attain to, by obedience to the laws and ordinances of the gospel.” (Ibid., October 6, 1974)

The Mother in Heaven and Women in Mormon Theology

Mormon leaders have also continued to maintain God has a wife. On April 8, 1973, the Salt Lake Tribune reported:

Outburst after outburst of delighted laughter filled the Tabernacle Saturday . . .

The speaker was Elder LeGrand Richards of the Council of Twelve Apostles, . . . Elder Richards told of speaking to a large gathering of clergymen. . . .

“I explained to them the difference between reformation and restoration,” Elder Richards said. “Then, when I finished my remarks, one of them stood up and said, “Mr. Richards, we’ve been told you believe God had a wife. Would you please explain this.”

“I think he thought he had me,” said Elder Richards. The audience in the Tabernacle began to chuckle. “I retorted that I didn’t see how God could have a Son if He didn’t have a wife.”

Proper Answer?

The Tabernacle audience’s chuckle grew to a full roar of laughter as Elder Richards turned to President Harold B. Lee, seated near the podium, to ask if this was a proper answer.

President Lee nodded.

Writing in Sunstone, Linda Wilcox indicates that there has been increased discussion in the church of the concept of a Heavenly Mother:

What seems to be happening currently as far as development of the Mother in Heaven concept is concerned is that there is an increasing awareness of and attention to the idea at the grass-roots level in the Church—particularly among women, and in informal ways. A sampling of the poems submitted to the last Eliza R. Snow Poetry Contest sponsored by the Relief Society illustrates one strain of such thought.

In the memory of one of the judges, this year was the first in which there were several poems submitted dealing with the subject of a Heavenly Mother. . . . There is also speculation about what the Mother in Heaven’s previous earth-life experience was like—and the supposition that it was very much like our own. . . . the poems themselves are indicative of a wider interest in the concept of a Heavenly Mother among mainstream Church members than has been usual in the course of Mormon church history. . . .

Lately there has also been increased discussion and speculation about how we can or do relate to our Heavenly Mother (or possibly mothers?). Orson Pratt taught that we are not to worship the mother of our spirits although we worship the father, . . . Rudger Clawson, however, pointed out that men as well as women and children crave a Mother in Heaven to worship and “yearn to adore her.” He said, “It doesn’t take from our worship of the Eternal Father, to adore our Eternal Mother, any more than it diminishes the love we bear our earthly fathers, to include our earthly mothers in our affections.” Currently there is no encouragement on the part of Mormon church leaders to pray to a Heavenly Mother, and in fact even active discouragement. Whether one can worship or adore her without the mechanism of prayer and/or meditation is an open question.

Still, there has been recently a more evident desire to reach out to Mother in Heaven in some way. A letter to the editor of Dialogue about five years ago told of a Mormon woman spending preparatory time in meditation, kneeling privately to pray, and then calling out for the first time, “Mother in Heaven. I believe you may exist. Are you there? We know the Father and the Son, but why have you not revealed yourself?” (Sunstone, vol. 5, no. 5, pp. 13-14)

A careful examination of the teaching concerning the Mother God brings to light the fact that women are considered to be spiritually inferior in Mormon theology. Since the excommunication of Sonia Johnson, national attention has been focused on this matter. Mormon leaders have apparently been concerned for some time that this issue would finally come to a head. Just after President Spencer W. Kimball issued the revelation granting blacks the priesthood, he did his best to make sure that women did not get the idea that he would be pressured into another revelation:

HONOLULU (AP)—The President of the Mormon Church said Monday the church will not extend the priesthood to women, now that it has ordained its first black priest. (Salt Lake Tribune, June 13, 1978)

Time magazine for August 7, 1978, reported that “Kimball states that unlike blacks, it is ‘impossible’ that women would ever attain priesthood.”

While we feel that the Mormon Church has many good teachings concerning women and the family, there is definitely a belief in the inferiority of women which stems back to the teachings of Joseph Smith and Brigham Young. Joseph Smith, for instance, established a doctrine of polygamy which held Mormon women in bondage for many years (see chapter 16 of this book). Smith’s revelation concerning the subject is still printed as Section 132 of the Doctrine and Covenants. After Joseph Smith’s death, Brigham Young led the church. Notwithstanding the fact that he had many wives, Brigham Young admitted that “There are probably but few men in the world who care about the private society of women less than I do” (Journal of Discourses, vol. 5, p. 99). While Young did not care much for the “private society of women,” he taught that man’s place in heaven depended to a great extent on the size of his family. His wife, therefore, should bear as many children as possible:

Sisters, do you wish to make yourselves happy? Then what is your duty? It is for you to bear children, in the name of the Lord, . . . bring forth in the name of Israel’s God, that you may have the honour of being the mothers of great and good men . . . are you tormenting yourselves by thinking that your husbands do not love you? I would not care whether they loved a particle or not; but I would cry out, like one of old, in the joy of my heart, “I have got a man from the Lord!” . . . I have borne an image of God! (Journal of Discourses, vol. 9, p. 37)

Fanny Stenhouse, who left the church in Brigham Young’s day, made these interesting observations:

In my unhappy condition, I thought that perhaps I might derive some consolation from the sermons in the Tabernacle . . . But instead of obtaining consolation, I heard that which aroused every feeling of my soul to rebellion, . . . I heard that woman was an inferior being, designed by the Lord for the special glory and exaltation of man, that she was a creature that should feel herself honoured if he would only make her the mother of his children—a creature who if very obedient and faithful through all the trials and tribulations in life, might some day be rewarded by becoming one of her husband’s queens, but should even then shine only by virtue of the reflected light derived from the glory of her spouse and lord. He was to be her “saviour,” for he was all in all to her; and it was through him alone and at his will that she could obtain salvation. We were informed that man was the crowning glory of creation, for whom all things—woman included—were brought into being; and that the chief object of woman’s existence was to help man to his great destiny.

Not a sentence—indeed, not a word—did we ever hear as to the possibility of womanly perfection and exaltation in her own right; . . . The great object of marriage, we were told, was the increase of children. . . . if some woman was found objecting to polygamy on account of its crushing and degrading effects upon women generally, then, . . . she was told in the coarse language of Brigham Young himself, that “Such women had no business to complain; it was quite enough honour for them to be permitted to bear children to God’s holy Priesthood.” . . . It was painfully clear to my understanding, then as now, that in Mormonism woman was to lose her personal identity. All that Christianity had done to elevate her was to be ruthlessly set aside and trampled under foot, and she was instantly to return to the position which she occupied in the darkest ages of the world’s existence. (Tell It All, 1875, pp. 342-343)

Although the church no longer allows the practice of polygamy, some of the teachings concerning the inferiority of women persist in its theology. Church leaders teach, for instance, that plural marriage will be practiced in heaven. Joseph Fielding Smith, who recently served as the tenth President of the Church, remarried after the death of his first wife. In his book Doctrines of Salvation, vol. 2, page 67, President Smith remarked: “. . . my wives will be mine in eternity. I don’t know how some other people feel, but that is a glorious thought to me. That helps to keep me sober.”

Every Mormon woman, therefore, faces the possibility of living in a polygamous relationship in heaven if she dies first and her husband decides to be sealed to another woman. A woman, on the other hand, cannot be sealed for eternity to more than one husband. Because a woman is not granted the same privilege as a man a problem has arisen for those doing work for the dead. In a newsletter published by Sandy First Ward we find the following:

. . . Brother Christiansen talked about new rulings concerning sealings for the dead. It is now possible for a woman that was married more than once to be sealed to all her husbands, providing that in life she had not been sealed to any of her husbands.

The First Presidency of the Church has ruled that rather than try to decide which husband a deceased woman should be sealed to, she can be sealed to all of them. However, only one sealing will be valid and accepted before God. God and the woman will decide which one of the sealings will be accepted on Judgment Day. (Tele-Ward, Sandy First Ward, Jan. 25, 1976, vol. V, no. 2, p. 5)

In 1976 the First Presidency announced a new rule which discriminates against a woman who wishes to obtain her endowments in the temple after marriage:

A wife whose husband is not endowed should not be given a recommend to receive her endowments. . . . A worthy man whose wife has not received her endowments may be given a recommend to receive his own endowments. (General Handbook of Instructions, no. 21, 1976, p. 54)

Christian theology teaches that males and females will be equal in the resurrection:

But they which shall be accounted worthy to obtain that world, and the resurrection from the dead, neither marry, nor are given in marriage: Neither can they die any more: for they are equal unto the angels; and are the children of God, being the children of the resurrection. (Luke 20:35-36)

Mormon Church leaders teach that both men and women can attain Godhood. Apostle Bruce R. McConkie says that “Godhood is not for men only; it is for men and women together” (Mormon Doctrine, 1979, p. 844). While at first glance it appears that this would make men and women equal, a more careful examination of the doctrine reveals just the opposite. According to Mormon theology, church members follow the same plan of eternal progression as God the Father. Now, if the “Eternal Mother” had really gained equality with her husband, we would expect the Mormons to pray to her. The Apostle Orson Pratt, however, made it plain that the Eternal Mother’s Godhood does not really amount to much since she is in “the most perfect obedience” to her “great head”:

But if we have a heavenly Mother as well as a heavenly Father, is it not right that we should worship the Mother of our spirits as well as the Father? No; for the Father of our spirits is at the head of His household, and His wives and children are required to yield the most perfect obedience to their great Head. It is lawful for the children to worship the King of Heaven, but not the “Queen of heaven.” The children of Israel were severely reprov’d for making offerings to the “Queen of heaven.” Although she is highly exalted and honored as the beloved bride of the great King, yet the children, so far as we are informed, have never been commanded to pray to her or worship her. Jesus prayed to His Father, and taught His disciples to do likewise; but we are nowhere taught that Jesus prayed to His heavenly Mother: neither did he pray to the Holy Ghost as his Father. (The Seer, p. 159)

It would appear, then, that in Mormon theology the claim that a woman can obtain “Godhood” amounts to very little. Like the present “Heavenly Mother,” she will be required to “yield the most perfect obedience” to her “great head”—i.e., her husband, while she continues to give birth to “many millions” of spirit children.

Since the Mormon Church changed the anti-black doctrine, many Mormon women have come to see that they are the ones who will be “second class” citizens in heaven. Mormon leaders used to explain that blacks could not hold the priesthood because they were not valiant in the pre-existence, but no reason has been given for the inferiority of women in Mormon theology.

10. The Adam-God Doctrine

The Adam-God doctrine was a natural outgrowth of the doctrine of a plurality of Gods. Although this doctrine was not publicly taught until 1852, Adam was held in high esteem at the very beginning of the Mormon Church.

Falling Upward

The Mormon Apostle John A. Widtsoe made this statement concerning Adam and Eve:

In Joseph Smith's philosophy of existence Adam and Eve were raised to a foremost place among the children of men, second only to the Savior. Their act was to be acclaimed. They were the greatest figures of the ages. The so-called "fall" became a necessary, honorable act in carrying out the plan of the Almighty. (Joseph Smith—Seeker After Truth, p. 160)

The Book of Mormon contains this statement: "Adam fell that men might be; and men are, that they might have joy" (Book of Mormon, 2 Nephi 2:25). In Joseph Smith's production "The Book of Moses," we read the following:

And in that day Adam blessed God...and began to prophesy . . . saying: Blessed be the name of God, for because of my transgression my eyes are opened, and in this life I shall have joy, and again in the flesh I shall see God.

And Eve, . . . was glad, saying: Were it not for our transgression we never should have had seed, and never should have known good and evil, and the joy of our redemption, and the eternal life which God giveth unto all the obedient. (Pearl of Great Price, Book of Moses 5:10-11)

Joseph Fielding Smith, who became the tenth President of the Church in 1970, made these statements:

The fall of man came as a blessing in disguise, . . . I never speak of the part Eve took in this fall as a sin, nor do I accuse Adam of a sin . . . it is not always a sin to transgress a law. . . .

We can hardly look upon anything resulting in such benefits as being a sin, in the sense in which we consider sin. (Doctrines of Salvation, vol. 1, pp. 114-115)

Sterling W. Sill, who is an Assistant to the Council of the Twelve Apostles, made these statements:

Some time ago I heard a radio speaker discussing the fall of Adam. He seemed to think that Adam should be held responsible for most of the troubles that are presently plaguing our world . . .

This old sectarian doctrine, built around the idea of man's natural depravity and weakness inherited from Adam, is at the root of innumerable problems among us. Adam was one of the greatest men who has ever lived upon the earth. . . .

Under Christ Adam yet stands at our head . . . Adam fell, but he fell in the right direction. He fell toward the goal . . .

Adam fell, but he fell upward. Jesus says to us, "Come up higher." Our greatest need is to raise our standards, the standards of our thinking, and the standards of our living. (Desert News, Church Section, July 31, 1965, p. 7)

In his thesis, "The Social Psychological Basis of Mormon New-Orthodoxy," Owen Kendall White, Jr., makes these interesting observations:

Mormonism rejects the notion that man's condition is best described by "depravity." Nowhere within Mormon theology is its optimism concerning man's natural condition more clearly apparent than in this denial of the Christian doctrine of original sin. . . . In contrast with the orthodox Christian notion that the fall resulted in a condition of human depravity, the Mormon view asserts that the fall was a necessary condition for man to realize his ultimate potential. . . . Mormons generally avoid using "sin" to describe Adam's disobedience to God since it seems too extreme for them. . . . to the Mormon the fall is a fall upward rather than downward. It is an important step in the eternal quest of man. In a recent article, Sterling Sill, a contemporary Mormon ecclesiastical official, wrote: "Adam fell, but he fell in the right direction." . . .

A second though perhaps not as important evidence of the Mormon rejection of original sin is found in the status accorded Adam within Mormon angelology. Rather than the view of literalistic Christian orthodoxy where Adam is conceived as the cause of human suffering, the scoundrel who got mankind into this mess, Mormonism holds Adam in very high esteem indeed. . . .

Within Mormon angelology Adam is Michael the Archangel, the Ancient of Days. He assisted in the creation process and will assist in the resurrecting of the dead. He holds positions of importance next to the members of the Godhead. Indeed, Adam was so highly regarded within early Mormonism that Brigham Young elevated him to the status of God. ("The Social Psychological Basis of Mormon New-Orthodoxy," Master's thesis, by Owen Kendall White, Jr., University of Utah, June 1967, pp. 101-104)

"Our Father and Our God"

On April 9, 1852, Brigham Young, the second President of the Mormon Church, publicly preached the Adam-God doctrine. In this sermon he stated:

Now hear it, O inhabitants of the earth, Jew and Gentile, Saint and sinner! When our father Adam came into the garden of Eden, he came into it with a celestial body, and brought Eve, one of his wives, with him. He helped to make and organize this world. He is Michael, the Arch-angel, the Ancient of Days! about whom holy men have written and spoken—He is our Father and our God, and the only God with whom we have to do. Every man upon the earth, professing Christian or non-professing, must hear it, and will know it sooner or later. . . . the earth was organized by three distinct characters, namely, Eloheim, Yahovah, and Michael, these three forming a quorum, as in all heavenly bodies, and in organizing element, perfectly represented in the Deity, as Father, Son, and Holy Ghost. (Journal of Discourses, vol. 1, pp. 50-51)

The fact that the Mormon people understood Brigham Young to mean just what he said concerning Adam being God is verified by articles that appeared in the church's publication, Millennial Star. On December 10, 1853, an article entitled, "Adam, the Father and God of the Human Family" appeared in the Millennial Star.

In this article the following statements are found:

The above sentiment appeared in Star No. 48, a little to the surprise of some of its readers: and while the sentiment may have appeared blasphemous to the ignorant; it has no doubt given rise to some serious reflections with the more candid and comprehensive mind . . . Adam is really God! And why not? (Millennial Star, vol. 15, p. 801)

On page 825 of the same volume the following appeared:

It has been said that Adam is God and Father of the human family, and persons are perhaps in fear and great trouble of mind, lest they have to acknowledge him as such in some future day. For our part we would much rather acknowledge Adam to be our Father, than hunt for another, and take up with the devil.

In vol. 17, page 195, of the Millennial Star this statement was made:

. . . every knee shall bow, and every tongue confess that he is the God of the whole earth. Then will the words of the Prophet Brigham, when speaking of Adam, be fully realized—“He is our Father and our God, and the only God with whom we have to do.”

Elder James A. Little made the following statement: “I believe in the principle of obedience; and if I am told that Adam is our Father and our God, I just believe it” (Millennial Star, vol. 16, p. 530).

Under the date of June 8, 1868, the following is recorded in the “Minutes of the School of the Prophets,” held in Provo, Utah:

A. F. Mac[Donald] I thought I would speak briefly in relation to Adam being our God—since the year 1853 when the Prest first spoke on this subject. I have frequently endeavored to reconcile what I have read with regard to this matter. I believe what the Pres. says on the subject although it comes in contact with all our tradition—I have not any doubt in my mind but that Adam is our God. . . .

Geo. G. Bywater rose and spoke . . . when I first heard the doctrine of Adam being our Father and God, I was favorably impressed—enjoyed, and hailed it as a new Revelation—it appeared reasonable to me as the father of our spirits, that he should introduce us here . . . (“Minutes of the School of the Prophets,” Provo, Utah, 1868-1871, pp. 38-39 of typed copy at Utah State Historical Society)

Brigham Young’s Adam-God doctrine met with opposition both within and without the church. In October 1857 he stated:

Some have grumbled because I believe our God to be so near to us as Father Adam. There are many who know that doctrine to be true. . . . Just wait till you pass Joseph Smith; . . . and after you pass the Apostles . . . and after a while you come to Jesus; and when you at length meet Father Adam, how strange it will appear to your present notions. . . . we shall be very glad to see the white locks of Father Adam. But those are ideas which do not concern us at present, although it is written in the Bible—“This is eternal life, to know thee, the only true God, and Jesus Christ whom thou has sent.” (Journal of Discourses, vol. 5, pp. 331-332)

That the Adam-God doctrine was causing dissension in the Mormon Church is evident from the articles that appeared in the Millennial Star. One article said that some of the officers had not met in council for three years because of the Adam-God doctrine:

. . . some of the officers have not met in council for three years. They are lacking faith on one principle—the last “cat that was let out of the bag.” Polygamy has been got over pretty well, that cloud has vanished away, but they are troubled about Adam being our Father and God. There is a very intelligent person investigating our principles, and who has been a great help to the Saints; he has all the works, and can get along very well with everything else but the last “cat,” and as soon as he can see that clearly, he will become a “Mormon.” I instructed him to write to Liverpool upon it. (Millennial Star, vol. 16, p. 482)

An answer to this problem appeared on page 534 of the same volume:

Concerning the item of doctrine alluded to by Elder Caffall and others, viz., that Adam is our Father and God, I have to say do not trouble yourselves, neither let the Saints be troubled about this matter . . . If, as Elder Caffall remarked, there are those who are waiting at the door of the Church for this objection to be removed, tell such, the Prophet and Apostle Brigham Young has declared it, and that is the word of the Lord. (Millennial Star, vol. 16, p. 534)

In his Master’s thesis, Rodney Turner made these statements: “. . . it is apparent that the doctrine was upsetting the theological equilibrium of some of the membership in England; that it was having a similar effect in America is also true” (“The Position of Adam in Latter-day Saint Scripture and Theology,” M.A. thesis, Brigham Young University, August 1953, p. 12).

On page 37 of the same thesis Rodney Turner states:

The members were puzzled, even alarmed by this shocking new concept. It was contrary to much that they had accepted as truth all their lives. And it was for that very reason that F. D. Richards had counseled the missionaries to help the membership “roll it aside” until it could be incorporated into their faith “without the sound of hammer of [or?] chisel.”

Joseph Lee Robinson, in his journal and autobiography (the journal the Apostle Richards tried to prevent us from seeing), stated that he feared that the Apostle Orson Pratt would apostatize because of his opposition to the Adam-God doctrine:

Oct. 6th attend Conference, a very interesting Conference, for at this meeting President Brigham Young said thus, that Adam and Eve, were the names of the first man and woman, of every Earth that was ever organized, and that Adam and Eve were the natural father and mother of every spirit that comes to this planet, or that receives tabernacles on this planet, consequently we are brothers and sisters, and that Adam was, God our Eternal Father, this as Brother Heber remarked was letting the cat out of the Bag, and it came to pass, I believed every word . . . our Beloved Brother Orson Pratt told me he did not believe it He said he would prove by the scripture it was not correct. I felt very sorry to hear professor, Orson Pratt say that, I feared lest he should apostetize. . . .

In his thesis, Rodney Turner gives some very interesting information concerning Orson Pratt’s disagreement with Brigham Young:

. . . according to T.B.H. Stenhouse...there was one man who did publicly oppose Brigham Young in his views. That man was Orson Pratt . . . of the quorum of the Twelve Apostles. Of him Stenhouse writes: “The mass of the Mormon people do not believe in the Adam-deity, but of them all, one only, Orson Pratt, has dared to make public protest against that doctrine.” (“The Position of Adam in Latter-day Saint Scripture and Theology,” p. 38)

Stenhouse claimed that Pratt found himself in serious trouble with Brigham Young over this matter, and tells of a meeting held in “Brigham’s little office.” While Rodney Turner tends to view Stenhouse’s story with suspicion, he admits that Brigham Young and Orson Pratt may have disagreed over the Adam-God doctrine:

The Stenhouse reference to an interview between Orson Pratt and Brigham Young in the latter’s “little office” is apparently based on fact. According to S. W. Richards, . . . such a meeting did take place on at least one occasion. However, the Richard’s statement gives the year as 1856, and not 1863 as Stenhouse indicates. Possibly more than one such meeting took place; in which event there is no real conflict between the two accounts. In the diary of Samuel Whitney Richards we read:

Tues. March 11, 1856

Evening with the Regency in the Upper Room of the President’s Office, . . . A very serious conversation took place between Prest. B. Young and Orson upon doctrine. O. P. was directly opposed to the Prest views and very freely expressed his entire disbelief in them after being told by the President that things were so and so in the name of the Lord. He was firm in the Position that the Prest's word in the name of the Lord, was not the word of the Lord to him. The Prest did not believe that Orson would ever be Adam, to learn by experience the facts discussed, but every other person in the room would if they lived faithful. . . .

The context of the above entry gives us good reason to believe that doctrine in some way concerning Adam was the cause of the disagreement between President Young and Orson Pratt. The president's remark that he did not believe "that Orson would ever be Adam," obviously "an Adam," would indicate this. ("The Position of Adam in Latter-day Saint Scripture and Theology," pp. 40-41)

According to the "Minutes of the School of the Prophets," held in Provo, Utah, the Apostle Lyman as well as Orson Pratt opposed Brigham Young's Adam-God doctrine. Under the date of June 8, 1868, we read:

The doctrine preached by Prest Young for a few years back wherein he says that Adam is our God—the God we worship—that most of the people believe this . . . Amasa Lyman stumbled on this he did not believe it—he did not believe in the atonement of Jesus—Orson Pratt has also told the Prest that he does not believe it—this is not the way to act—we should not suffer ourselves to entertain one doubt—we are not accountable on points of Doctrine if the President makes a statement it is not our prerogative to dispute it. ("Minutes of the School of the Prophets," Provo, Utah, 1868–1871, p. 38 of typed copy at the Utah State Historical Society)

In spite of the opposition, Brigham Young continued to teach the Adam-God doctrine. In 1873, just a few years before his death, Brigham Young declared:

How much unbelief exists in the minds of the Latter-day Saints in regard to one particular doctrine which I revealed to them, and which God revealed to me—namely that Adam is our Father and God . . . Our Father Adam helped to make this earth, it was created expressly for him . . . He brought one of his wives with him... We say that Father Adam came here and helped to make the earth. Who is he? He is Michael, . . . He was the first man on the earth, and its framer and maker. He with the help of his brethren brought it into existence. Then he said, "I want my children who are in the spirit world to come and live here. I once dwelt upon an earth something like this, in a mortal state. I was faithful, I received my crown and exaltation. I have the privilege of extending my work, and to its increase there will be no end. I want my children that were born to me in the spirit world to come here and take tabernacles of flesh that their spirits may have a house, a tabernacle, or a dwelling place as mine has," and where is the mystery? (Sermon by Brigham Young, printed in the Deseret News, June 14, 1873)

There are four important points that should be noted concerning the Adam-God doctrine. They are as follows:

1. Adam not created of the dust of this earth. In a sermon delivered in 1852, Brigham Young stated:

When our father Adam came into the garden of Eden, he came into it with a celestial body . . . He helped to make and organize this world. (Journal of Discourses, vol. 1, p. 50)

Brigham Young also stated:

You believe Adam was made of the dust of this earth. This I do not believe, though it is supposed that it is so written in the Bible; but it is not to my understanding. You can write that information to the States, if you please—that I have publicly declared that I do not believe that portion of the Bible as the Christian world do. I never did, and I never want to. What is the reason I do not? Because I have come to understanding, and banished from my mind all the baby stories my mother taught me when I was a child. (Ibid., vol. 2, p. 6)

Though we have it in history that our father Adam was made of the dust of this earth, and that he knew nothing about God previous to being made here, yet it is not so; and when we learn the truth we shall see and understand that he helped to make this world, and was the chief manager in that operation.

He was the person who brought the animals and the seeds from other planets to this world, and brought a wife with him and stayed here. You may read and believe what you please as to what is found written in the Bible. Adam was made from the dust of an earth, but not from the dust of this earth. He was made as you and I are made, and no person was ever made upon any other principle. (Journal of Discourses, vol. 3, p. 319)

Rodney Turner makes this comment concerning this matter:

Apparently President Young means that Adam was provided with a physical body through the normal pattern of conception, embryonic development, and birth, since that is [the] method by which "you and I are made." ("The Position of Adam in Latter-day Saint Scripture and Theology," p. 20)

2. Adam is the only God with whom we have to do. Brigham Young stated: "He is our Father and our God, and the only God with whom we have to do" (Journal of Discourses, vol. 1, p. 50).

On February 3, 1861, John D. Lee recorded the following in his journal: "Eving I attendd Prayer meeting & instruct the Saints on the points of Doctrine refered to by the true Latterday Saints Herald & their Bombarding Pres. B. Young for Saying that Adam is all the God that we have to do with & to those that know no better, it is quite a stumbling Block . . ." (A Mormon Chronicle: The Diaries of John D. Lee, vol. 1, p. 293). In the book, Women of Mormondom, p. 196, we read: "When Brigham Young proclaimed to the nations that Adam is our Father and God, and Eve, his partner, the Mother of a world—both in a mortal and celestial sense—he made the most important revelation ever oracled to the race since the days of Adam himself." The reader will also remember that we quoted this statement from the "Minutes of the School of the Prophets": ". . . Prest Young . . . says that Adam is our God—the God we worship—that most of the people believe this . . ."

3. Adam is the Father of our Spirits. Brigham Young also taught that Adam was the Father of our spirits. In 1873 he stated:

. . . Father Adam came here and helped to make the earth. . . . Then he said, "I want my children who are in the spirit world to come and live here. . . . I want My children that were born to me in the spirit world to come here and take tabernacles of flesh . . ." (Deseret News, June 14, 1873)

Joseph Lee Robinson stated that Brigham Young taught that Adam was the father of our spirits. The following appears in his journal and autobiography: "Brigham Young said . . . that Adam and Eve were the natural father and mother of every spirit that comes to this planet, or that received, tabernacles on this planet, . . . and that Adam was God, our Eternal Father, . . . On page 180 of Women of Mormondom we read the following: "Adam and Eve are the names of the fathers and mothers of worlds . . . These were father and mother of a world of spirits who had been born to them in heaven."

4. Adam, the Father of Jesus Christ. Since Brigham Young was teaching that Adam was the father of our spirits, it was very easy to teach that Adam was also the father of Jesus. In a discourse delivered April 9, 1852, Brigham Young declared:

When the Virgin Mary conceived the child Jesus, the Father had begotten him in his own likeness. He was not begotten by the Holy Ghost. And who is the Father? He is the first of the human family; . . . I could tell you much more about this; but were I to tell you the

DISCOURSE

By PRESIDENT BRIGHAM YOUNG, delivered in the New Tabernacle, Salt Lake City, Sunday Afternoon, June 8th, 1873.

REPORTED BY DAVID W. EVANS.

I WILL read the text that my brother Joseph has been talking about—"If the foundation be destroyed, what can the righteous do?" I will read the second verse—"For lo, the wicked bend their bow, they make ready their arrow upon the string, that they may privately shoot at the upright in heart." I shall make a few remarks to the Latter-day Saints and make the application of this scripture as liberal as I feel to. First, I will inquire of my brethren and sisters how far they would like to be righteous and upright in heart,—how far they would like to be Saints. I frequently use the sayings of our natives here and make the application to the Saints. You ask the native if he is a captain. He will sometimes say, "Yes, a little."

"How much?" "I am a captain, so much." "How I do love Babylon." Says one, "How I do love this fashionable coat, this beautiful hat, this pretty frock, that lovely ribbon?" "Oh, see the hat on that lady," and I say, see the five-bushed basket sticking out behind her. How beautiful it is! And she on it, sitting the spine of her back. How beautiful! It is lovely in the extreme. It is right from Babylon. What do you say, Saints? I must say that when I talk about these things I am like the young man who lost his apples. He was in the act of swearing a good deal, and one day while driving a load of apples up hill the hind gate of his wagon came out, and before he noticed it he had lost his apples. When he saw the situation said he, "I will not say a word, any swearing that I can do will fail to do justice to the occasion." So with my language that I know anything about would utterly fail in conveying a correct idea of the ridiculous nature of the conduct of many who profess to be Latter-day Saints.

"For lo, now read this text again—"For lo, the wicked bend their bow, do you know anybody who does this? Do you, Latter-day Saints, know of any such persons in this city?"—"For lo, the wicked bend their bow, they make ready their arrow upon the string, that they may privately shoot at the upright in heart." Take the people of this city as they were and take them as they are, and make the application for yourselves. The next verse says—"If the foundations be destroyed, what can the righteous do?" I shall apply this in my own way. If I can not suit myself thoroughly I will suit myself as well as I can; if I can not suit you, you must try and suit yourselves. I ask all the Latter-day Saints, do you like the condition here at the present time? Do you like to walk here in the evening or in the day time, and see and hear? Do you like to pass these grogshops, or to enter these gambling halls and other mischievous places and see what their inmates are doing? I am going to make my wishes known to you without regard to the feelings of any who may blame me for making these remarks, and I would that I had all the Latter-day Saints who live in this city before me this afternoon. But as they are not here I shall probably ask the bishops and teachers to learn what I want to find out. My brother has been speaking of Philadelphia, and that the civilized nations are governed by law. This nation is governed by law. There are just as good and wholesome laws in this city, Territory and Government as can be found anywhere. We have just as good laws in these United States and in the different States as can be found, probably, in any country on the face of the whole earth. In carrying out these laws it is our privilege, to magnify ourselves as individual citizens, as a community of men and women dwelling together in a town or city, to sign a petition to hard to take their measurement as Saints. I carry in my pocket a rule on which the inches are divided into a hundred parts. Such a rule would be necessary, in my opinion, to measure the standing of those who profess to be Saints, who refuse to sign a petition to stop drunkenness. You may differ from me in your opinion, and you have a perfect right to, and I have the same right to differ from you; but it is my opinion that the man or woman whose name is upon our records as a Latter-day Saint, who would fellowship what we see and have to endure here all the time, is a very poor Saint. I have some notion to ask you whether you like these things, and who among you will sign a petition to the City Council to stop them. I must explain here that the evils in our city are the result of the acts of men who, though administrators of the law in various capacities, instead of sustaining the laws, say, "Sell liquor as much as you please, pay no attention to the City Council, disregard the laws of this city and Territory, ride over and trample them under your feet, and break whatever law the City Council may make." This is what our administrators of the law say, and to this cause only can be attributed whatever of crime and defiance of law we see manifested here.

I have been said that Brother Brigham has professed his services to help stop the liquor traffic in this city. I will say, that is true, and I do it upon the principle of justice and truth, and within the bounds of our local laws, and in no other way; and if the inhabitants of this city are disposed to raise their voices and influence against the conduct we see here, and the City Council passes a law to stop the drunkenness and gambling, they will find us—the citizens—ready to sustain them by our faith and works. "For lo, the wicked bend their bow, they make ready their arrow upon the string, that they may privately shoot at the upright in heart."

I leave it to the people of the United States, to all good citizens from the Atlantic to the Pacific, if it is not better to live without gambling and drunkenness than to have them in our midst? What would they say if they were to express an opinion on the subject? The leading portion of them would say, "Let us have sober, civil communities," and they would rejoice to see the time when our Presidents, law-makers, and executors of the law would live civilly with sober hearts and brains, able to judge between right and wrong, and with willing hearts and steady hands administer the laws to this great nation in righteousness. Will we Latter-day Saints sign a petition to the Mayor and City Council to stop these evils entirely? (Congregation said, "Yes.") I will invite all, whether citizens or strangers, who are in favor of a people living a sober, steady life, to vote on this question, if they desire to do so. (The congregation voted unanimously in favor, by showing their right hands.) Does anybody want to vote against it? (A man who wanted to lift his hand against seeing a sober, civil, industrious community, a community that will work for what they need, instead of gambling, robbing and plundering for it? If there is a man, either in the church or out, present this afternoon, he is at liberty to make it manifest by the same sign. (No dissentient). No, we Latter-day Saints go together, and one fault found with us is that we will hang together. I recollect, not over a hundred years ago, there was a certain man in Philadelphia who said—"We are accused of hanging together; we might just as well hang together as hang separate, and if we do not hang together, we shall certainly hang separate." He was a rebel and traitor, so said the English government, and he was talking to his companions, and they had agreed to hang by hanging together they saved their necks and gained the freedom of their country. That is the way with the Latter-day Saints, they hang together just enough to save themselves.

Now that I have your minds, ing honestly. I want the bishops to go to and find out how many in their wards will sign a paper to the City Council, asking its members to pass a law for the suppression of liquor selling and enforce the present law against gambling. I am thankful that I have the privilege and am willing to put my name at the head of such a paper, for I am opposed to these things. At the present time it seems to be impossible for the City Council to license people to keep bars for the accommodation of strangers. They would be glad to do so, and would be reasonable with those who wanted them, but owing to circumstances it does seem that our citizens will be bound to stop the whole of it, or else let a few ride over every law enacted for the preservation of the people and receive our teachings in good and honest hearts and profit by them. I have been found fault with a great many times for casting reflections upon men of science, and especially upon theologians, because of the little knowledge they possess about man being on the earth, about the earth itself, about our Father in heaven, his Son Jesus Christ, the order of heavenly things, the laws by which angels exist, by which the worlds were created and are held in existence, &c. How pleased we would be to place these things before the people if they would receive them! How much unbelief exists in the minds of the Latter-day Saints in regard to one particular doctrine which I revealed to them, and which God revealed to me—namely, that Adam is our father and God—I do not know, I do not inquire, I care nothing about it. Our Father Adam helped to make this earth, it was created expressly for him, and after it was made he and his companions came here. He brought one of his wives with him, and she was called Eve, because she was the first woman upon the earth. Our Father Adam is the man who stands the gate and holds the keys of everlasting life and salvation to all his children who have or who ever will come upon the earth. I have been found fault with by the ministers of religion because I have said that they were ignorant. But I could help find any man on the earth who could tell me this, although it is one of the simplest things in the world, until I met and talked with Joseph Smith. Is it a great mystery that the earth exists? Is it a great mystery, that the world can not solve that man is in the earth? Yes, it is; but to whom? To the ignorant—those who know nothing about it. It is no mystery to those who understand. Is it a mystery to the Christian world that Jesus is the Son of God, and still the son of man? Yes, it is, it is hidden from them, and this fulfills the Scripture that says he hid it, it hid to them that are lost," who have no faith, and who pay no attention to the Spirit of God. These things are called mysteries by the people because they know nothing about them, just like laying hands on the sick. Is it a mystery that fever should be rebuked and the sick healed by the laying on of the hands of a man who is endowed with authority from God and has been ordained to that gift? "Oh yes," say the ignorant, "we know nothing about it." That is true, but where is the mystery? Will the ignorant receive the truth when they hear it? No, they will not, and this is their condemnation, that light has come into the world, and they choose darkness rather than light, because their deeds are evil. That is the fact in the case. What is the mystery about it? They do not understand invisible things. Ask the wicked, "Do you know anything about the laying on of hands?" "Oh yes, such a man"—a man who is wicked in his whole life—"has the art of laying on of hands for curing the tooth-ache, fevers, wounds," &c.; and now, in ful-priests and people—would follow after. Where did I declare this? In the cities of New York, Albany, Boston, throughout the United States and in England. Have I seen this fulfilled? I have. I told the people that as true as God lived, if they would not believe in what they would have error sent unto them, and they would believe it. What is the mystery of it?

The Christian world read of, and think much about, St. Paul, also St. Peter, the chief of the Apostles. These men were faithful to and magnified the priesthood on the earth. Now, where will be the mystery, after they have passed through all the ordeals, and have been crowned and exalted, and received their inheritances in the eternal worlds of glory, for them to be sent forth, as the Gods have been for ever and ever, to be a first man?—"Make yourselves an earth, and people it with your own children?" Do you think the starry heavens are going to fall? Do the Christian world or the heathen world think that all things are going to be wrapped up, consumed, and annihilated in eternal flames? Oh fools, and slow of heart to believe the great things that God has purposed in his own mind!

My brother said that God is as we are. He did not mean those words to be literally understood; the most silly, that in our organization we have all the properties in embryo in our bodies that our Father has in his, and that literally, morally, socially, by the spirit and the flesh we are his children. Do you think that God who holds the eternities in his hands and can do all things at his pleasure, is not capable of sending forth his own children, and annihilating them in eternal flames? Where is the mystery in this? We say that Father Adam came here and helped to make the earth. Who is he? He is Michael, a great prince, and was said to him by Eloheim, "Go ye and make an earth." What is the great mystery about it? He came and formed the earth. Geologists tell us that in millions of years ago. How do they know? They know nothing about it. But suppose it was here, what of it? Adam found it in a state of chaos, unorganized and incomplete. Philosophers, again, in talking of the development of the products of the earth, for instance, in the vegetable kingdom, say the little fish, the birds, the trees, the larger vegetation. When this preparatory stage was completed then came the various orders of the animal creation; and finally then appeared man, and whether these notions are true or not, they are more or less speculative. Adam came here and got it up in a shape that would suit him to commence business. What is the great mystery about it? One who has seen. The mystery in this, as with miracles, or anything else, is only to those who are ignorant. Brother Adam came here, and then he brought his wife. "Well," says one, "Why was Adam called Adam?" He was the first man on the earth, and his framer and maker. He, with the help of his brethren, brought it into existence. Then he said, "I want my children who are in the spirit world to come and live here. I once dwelt upon an earth, and I will give them an immortal state. I was faithful, I received my crown and exaltation. I have the privilege of extending my work, and to increase there will be no end. I want my children that were born to me in the spirit world to come here and take tabernacles of flesh, that their spirits may have a house, a tabernacle or a dwelling, as mine has, and where is the mystery?"

Now for Mother Eve. The evil principle always has and always will exist. Well, a certain character came to the earth, and Mother Eve, "The Lord has told you that you must not do so and so, for if you do you shall surely die. But I tell you that if you do not do this you will never know good upon evil, you will never be opened, and you may live on the earth forever and ever, and you will never know what the Gods know." The devil told the truth, what is the mystery about it? He is doing it to-day. He is telling one or two truths and mixing them with a thousand errors to get the people to swallow them. I do not blame Mother Eve, I would not have had her miss eating the forbidden fruit for anything in the world. I would not give a groat if I could not understand why she ate the fruit, or what she understood the bitter from the sweet, so can you. Here is intelligence, but bind it up and make machines of its reasoners, and when the time comes to be tempted, tried and weak, and how to reach down the hand of mercy to save the fallen angels. The evil principle has rebelled and instituted its ordinances that the inhabitants of the earth may have possession of eternal life. The law of them, however, will accept it. I have preached it to many thousands of those who are really just as honest as I am, and through tradition there is an overwhelming prejudice in their minds which overrules their hearts, their eyes, their ears. They do not want to see the ways of God, they do not want to see the independence of the truth, to see if there is so much truth in it, if this earth, who is in their organization, do not manifest it. There is a mystery in Jesus at the same time as there is in this, but their hearts are not in the practice of ing honestly. I want the bishops to go to and find out how many in their wards will sign a paper to the City Council, asking its members to pass a law for the suppression of liquor selling and enforce the present law against gambling. I am thankful that I have the privilege and am willing to put my name at the head of such a paper, for I am opposed to these things. No, they will not, and this is their condemnation, that light has come into the world, and they choose darkness rather than light, because their deeds are evil. That is the fact in the case. What is the mystery about it? They do not understand invisible things. Ask the wicked, "Do you know anything about the laying on of hands?" "Oh yes, such a man"—a man who is wicked in his whole life—"has the art of laying on of hands for curing the tooth-ache, fevers, wounds," &c.; and now, in ful-priests and people—would follow after. Where did I declare this? In the cities of New York, Albany, Boston, throughout the United States and in England. Have I seen this fulfilled? I have. I told the people that as true as God lived, if they would not believe in what they would have error sent unto them, and they would believe it. What is the mystery of it?

The Christian world read of, and think much about, St. Paul, also St. Peter, the chief of the Apostles. These men were faithful to and magnified the priesthood on the earth. Now, where will be the mystery, after they have passed through all the ordeals, and have been crowned and exalted, and received their inheritances in the eternal worlds of glory, for them to be sent forth, as the Gods have been for ever and ever, to be a first man?—"Make yourselves an earth, and people it with your own children?" Do you think the starry heavens are going to fall? Do the Christian world or the heathen world think that all things are going to be wrapped up, consumed, and annihilated in eternal flames? Oh fools, and slow of heart to believe the great things that God has purposed in his own mind!

My brother said that God is as we are. He did not mean those words to be literally understood; the most silly, that in our organization we have all the properties in embryo in our bodies that our Father has in his, and that literally, morally, socially, by the spirit and the flesh we are his children. Do you think that God who holds the eternities in his hands and can do all things at his pleasure, is not capable of sending forth his own children, and annihilating them in eternal flames? Where is the mystery in this? We say that Father Adam came here and helped to make the earth. Who is he? He is Michael, a great prince, and was said to him by Eloheim, "Go ye and make an earth." What is the great mystery about it? He came and formed the earth. Geologists tell us that in millions of years ago. How do they know? They know nothing about it. But suppose it was here, what of it? Adam found it in a state of chaos, unorganized and incomplete. Philosophers, again, in talking of the development of the products of the earth, for instance, in the vegetable kingdom, say the little fish, the birds, the trees, the larger vegetation. When this preparatory stage was completed then came the various orders of the animal creation; and finally then appeared man, and whether these notions are true or not, they are more or less speculative. Adam came here and got it up in a shape that would suit him to commence business. What is the great mystery about it? One who has seen. The mystery in this, as with miracles, or anything else, is only to those who are ignorant. Brother Adam came here, and then he brought his wife. "Well," says one, "Why was Adam called Adam?" He was the first man on the earth, and his framer and maker. He, with the help of his brethren, brought it into existence. Then he said, "I want my children who are in the spirit world to come and live here. I once dwelt upon an earth, and I will give them an immortal state. I was faithful, I received my crown and exaltation. I have the privilege of extending my work, and to increase there will be no end. I want my children that were born to me in the spirit world to come here and take tabernacles of flesh, that their spirits may have a house, a tabernacle or a dwelling, as mine has, and where is the mystery?"

Now for Mother Eve. The evil principle always has and always will exist. Well, a certain character came to the earth, and Mother Eve, "The Lord has told you that you must not do so and so, for if you do you shall surely die. But I tell you that if you do not do this you will never know good upon evil, you will never be opened, and you may live on the earth forever and ever, and you will never know what the Gods know." The devil told the truth, what is the mystery about it? He is doing it to-day. He is telling one or two truths and mixing them with a thousand errors to get the people to swallow them. I do not blame Mother Eve, I would not have had her miss eating the forbidden fruit for anything in the world. I would not give a groat if I could not understand why she ate the fruit, or what she understood the bitter from the sweet, so can you. Here is intelligence, but bind it up and make machines of its reasoners, and when the time comes to be tempted, tried and weak, and how to reach down the hand of mercy to save the fallen angels. The evil principle has rebelled and instituted its ordinances that the inhabitants of the earth may have possession of eternal life. The law of them, however, will accept it. I have preached it to many thousands of those who are really just as honest as I am, and through tradition there is an overwhelming prejudice in their minds which overrules their hearts, their eyes, their ears. They do not want to see the ways of God, they do not want to see the independence of the truth, to see if there is so much truth in it, if this earth, who is in their organization, do not manifest it. There is a mystery in Jesus at the same time as there is in this, but their hearts are not in the practice of

A photograph of the Deseret Weekly News, June 18, 1873. Brigham Young defends his Adam-God doctrine. He states that God revealed the doctrine to him. He also claimed that Adam is the father of the spirits that come to this earth to take mortal bodies. This sermon was also printed in the Deseret Evening News, June 14, 1873.

whole truth, blasphemy would be nothing to it, in the estimation of the superstitious and over righteous of mankind. However, I have told you that truth as far as I have gone. . . . Jesus, our elder brother, was begotten in the flesh by the same character that was in the Garden of Eden, and who is our Father in Heaven. Now, let all who may hear these doctrines, pause before they make light of them, or treat them with indifference, for they will prove their salvation or damnation. (Journal of Discourses, vol. 1, pp. 50-51)

John A. Widtsoe, who was a recent Apostle in the Mormon Church, denied that Brigham Young taught that Adam was the Father of Christ:

Brigham Young's much-discussed sermon says that "Jesus was begotten in the flesh by the same character that was in the Garden of Eden, and who is our Father in heaven." Enemies of the Church, or stupid people, reading also that Adam is "our father and our God," have heralded far and wide that the Mormons believe that Jesus Christ was begotten of Adam. (Evidences and Reconciliations, 3 vols. in 1, p. 56)

It is easy to show that Apostle Widtsoe's statement is false for many good Mormons in Utah held to this view. For instance, Hosea Stout, who was a prominent Mormon, recorded the following in his diary under the date of April 9, 1852:

Another meeting this evening. President B. Young taught that Adam was the father of Jesus and the only God to us. That he came to this world in a resurrected [sic] body &c more hereafter. (On the Mormon Frontier, The Diary of Hosea Stout, University of Utah Press, 1964, vol. 2, p. 435)

In the Women of Mormondom we read:

Adam is our father and God. He is the God of the earth. So says Brigham Young . . . He is the father of our elder brother, Jesus Christ—the father of him who shall also come as Messiah to reign. He is the father of the spirits as well as the tabernacles of the sons and daughters of man. Adam! (Women of Mormondom, p. 179)

Heber C. Kimball, the first councilor to Brigham Young, stated:

I have learned by experience that there is but one God that pertains to this people, and he is the God that pertains to this earth—the first man. That first man sent his own son to redeem the world, . . . (Journal of Discourses, vol. 4, p. 1)

In 1856 the Mormons published a hymnal which contained a hymn entitled, "We Believe In Our God." This hymn plainly taught that Adam was the father of Christ:

We believe in our God the great Prince of His race, The Archangel Michael, the Ancient of Days, Our own Father Adam, earth's Lord, as is plain, Who'll counsel and fight for his children again.

We believe in His Son, Jesus Christ, who, in love To his brethren and sisters, came down from above To die to redeem them from death, and to teach To mortals and spirits the Gospel we preach. (Sacred Hymns and Spiritual Songs for the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints, Liverpool, 1856, p. 375, as quoted in "The Position of Adam in Latter-day Saint Scripture and Theology," p. 16)

Rodney Turner states that this hymn "was not included in later editions of the hymnal in England. Nor was the writer able to find it in any hymnal published by the Church in America. Franklin D. Richards must have approved it for publication, since he edited the particular edition in which it is found" (Ibid., p. 16).

George Q. Cannon, a member of the First Presidency of the Mormon Church, seemed to believe that Adam was the father of Christ. His son recorded the following in his journal:

. . . Father [George Q. Cannon] . . . asked me what I understood concerning Mary conceiving the Savior; and as I found no answer, he asked what was to prevent Father Adam from visiting and overshadowing the mother of Jesus. "Then," said I, "He must have been a resurrected Being." "Yes," said he, "and though Christ is said to have been the first fruits of them that slept, yet the Savior said he did nothing but what He had seen His Father do, for He had power to lay down His life and take it up again. Adam, though made of dust, was made, as Pres. Young said, of the dust of another planet than this." I was very much instructed by the conversation and this day's services. ("Daily Journal of Abraham H. Cannon," March 10, 1888, vol. 10, pp. 178-179; original at Brigham Young University)

Under the date of June 23, 1889, Abraham Cannon recorded that George Q. Cannon taught that "Jesus Christ is Jehovah" and that "Adam is His Father and our God" ("Daily Journal of Abraham H. Cannon," vol. 11, p. 39).

Below is a photograph from Abraham H. Cannon's journal:

Sunday, June 23d, 1889:— Very hot day. — I spent the forenoon in conversing on the Gospel principles and reading. Father proved to my entire satisfaction this morning by passage from the Book of Mormon and Doctrine and Covenants that all men, even the sons of perdition, will be resurrected and stand before God to be judged. He believes that Jesus Christ is Jehovah, and that Adam is His Father and our God; that under certain unknown conditions the benefits of the Savior's atonement extend to our entire solar system. Jesus, in speaking of Him

The information given above certainly shows that Brigham Young did teach that Jesus was the son of Adam, and that it was not just "Enemies of the Church, or stupid people" who felt that he taught this doctrine. The most devastating evidence, however, comes from the "Journal of L. John Nuttall." On Wednesday, February 7, 1877, L. John Nuttall recorded in his journal that Brigham Young taught that Jesus was the son of Adam:

Wed 7 . . . Prest Young was filled with the spirit of God & revelation & said, when we got our washings and anointings under the hands of the Prophet Joseph at Nauvoo we had only one room to work in . . . he gave the Key words, tokens (sic) and penalties . . . these things of which I have been speaking are what are termed the mysteries of godliness but they enable you to understand the expression of Jesus made while in Jerusalem. This is life eternal that they might know thee the only true God and Jesus Christ whom thou hast sent . . . Adam was an immortal being when he came on this earth . . . and had begotten all the spirit that was to come to this earth and Eve our common Mother who is the mother of all living bore those spirits in the celestial world . . .

Father Adam's oldest son (Jesus the Savior) who is the heir of the family is Father Adams first begotten in the spirit World, who according to the flesh is the only begotten as it is written. (In his divinity he having gone back into the spirit world, and come in the spirit to Mary and she conceived . . .) (Journal of L. John Nuttall, vol. 1, pp. 18-21, taken from a typed copy at the Brigham Young University)

The Mormon writer Rodney Turner seems to be willing to concede that the Nuttall journal probably contains a reliable account of Brigham Young's comments:

There is no legit[i]mate reason to question the general accuracy of this account of Brigham Young's remarks as it appears in the Nuttall journal. . . . He acted as private secretary to President John Taylor (1879-1887) and President Wilford Woodruff (1887-1892). . . . He occasionally acted as a clerk in the general conferences of the Church; and in taking of formal notes was considered "extremely reliable." In fact, he was acting as a special secretary to President Young at the time the journal entry in question was made. . . .

There is one thought expressed in the Nuttall journal which merits analysis. It is the explanation of how Adam, who in a state of morality had many direct offspring, could still be the Father of Christ, who is spoken of as the “Only Begotten” Son of God. Brigham Young implies that Christ is the “only begotten” of Adam “in his divinity.” In other words, when Adam begat physical offspring, he did so in a fallen state of mortality which precluded the transfer of “divinity” or immortality to that offspring. But in the case of the Savior, such a transfer of divinity could take place because Adam and Eve, without actually suffering a physical death, had “returned to the spirit world from whence they came” and reassumed their former glory and divinity. Thus, Adam, having regained his divinity and immortality, could, in begetting Christ, declare him to be the “Only Begotten Son” . . . (“The Position of Adam in Latter-day Saint Scripture and Theology,” M.A. thesis, Brigham Young University, August 1953, pp. 33-35)

When the Mormon Church was accused of teaching that “Adam is God . . . and that Jesus is his son,” the Mormon historian B. H. Roberts replied:

As a matter of fact, the “Mormon” Church does not teach that doctrine. A few men in the “Mormon” Church have held such views: and several of them quite prominent in the councils of the church, . . . Brigham Young and others may have taught that doctrine, . . . (Deseret News, July 23, 1921)

Joseph Fielding Smith, who became the tenth President of the Church, is not as willing to admit that “Brigham Young and others may have taught that doctrine.” In his book, Doctrines of Salvation, he makes this statement:

The statement by President Brigham Young that the Father is the first of the human family is easily explained. But the expression that he was the same character that was in the Garden of Eden has led to misunderstanding because of the implication which our enemies place upon it that it has reference to Adam. Unfortunately President Brigham Young is not here to make his meaning in this regard perfectly clear. (Doctrines of Salvation, vol. 1, p. 102)

Confusion and Strife

Brigham Young’s Adam-God doctrine has brought much confusion into the Mormon Church. Wilford Woodruff, the fourth President of the Church, once stated:

Cease troubling yourselves about who God is; who Adam is, who Christ is, who Jehovah is. For heaven’s sake, let these things alone...God is God. Christ is Christ. The Holy Ghost is the Holy Ghost. That should be enough for you and me to know... I say this because we are troubled every little while with inquiries from Elders anxious to know who God is, who Christ is, and who Adam is. I say to the elders of Israel, stop this. (Millennial Star, vol. 57, pp. 355-356)

In all fairness to the Mormon Church it should be stated that they no longer teach the Adam-God doctrine, even though some members of the church still believe it. Anyone who is caught teaching this doctrine is liable to be excommunicated. This, however, shows the inconsistency of the Mormon Church, for they say that Brigham Young was a prophet, and at the same time they will excommunicate a person for believing in his teachings.

Even before the turn of the century the Mormon leaders seemed to be ashamed of the Adam-God doctrine. On November 28, 1898, George Q. Cannon, a member of the First Presidency, stated that Brigham Young had taught some things concerning Adam and Jesus, but they felt it was not “wise to advocate these matters”:

I was stopped yesterday afternoon by a young man, who wanted to know whether Adam was the Father of our Lord and Savior—whether he was the being we worshipped, etc. Now, we can get ourselves very easily puzzled, if we choose to do so, by speculating upon doctrines and principles of this character. The Lord has said through His Prophet that there are two personages in the Godhead. That ought to be sufficient for us at the present time. . . . Concerning the doctrine in regard to Adam and the Savior, the Prophet Brigham Young taught some things concerning that; but the First Presidency and the twelve do not think it wise to advocate these matters. It is sufficient to know we have a Father—God the Eternal Father, who reveals Himself by His Holy Spirit unto those who seek Him; and that Jesus Christ is His Son, our Redeemer, the Savior of the world. (Proceedings of the First Sunday School Convention of the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints, Salt Lake City, 1899, as quoted in “The Position of Adam in Latter-day Saint Scriptures and Theology,” pp. 69-70)

Even though the Mormon leaders were trying to put down Brigham Young’s Adam-God doctrine, many Mormons continued to believe it. Rodney Turner cites Charles W. Penrose, a member of the First Presidency, as making this statement in 1916: “There still remains, I can tell by the letters I have alluded to, an idea among some of the people that Adam was and is the Almighty and Eternal God” (“The Position of Adam in Latter-day Saint Scripture and Theology,” p. 81). On the same page of his thesis, Rodney Turner cites Penrose as saying: “. . . the notion has taken hold of some of our brethren that Adam is the being that we should worship.”

In a letter, dated May 11, 1966, the Mormon Apostle LeGrand Richards wrote: “Your third question: ‘Is the Adam God Doctrine, as taught in the Journal of Discourses, true?’ Answer: No.” In our Case, vol. 3, page 122, we show that some of the Mormon leaders now claim that Brigham Young was misquoted. This claim is completely untrue. Rodney Turner, who now teaches religion at the Brigham Young University, feels that it is impossible to maintain such a position:

Was Brigham Young Misquoted?

It is the writer’s opinion that the answer to this question is a categorical no. There is not the slightest evidence from Brigham Young, or any other source, that either his original remarks on April 9, 1852, or any of his subsequent statements were ever misquoted in the official publications of the Church. . . .

In the light of Brigham Young’s attitude toward the errors of others, and in view of the division created by his remarks concerning Adam, it would be stretching one’s credulity to the breaking point to believe that he would have remained silent had he been misquoted. To the contrary, we could expect him to be rather watchful of the manner in which his addresses were published in the official organs of the Church. . . . President Young did not hesitate to cite what he considered to be the false ideas of Orson Pratt by chapter and verse; had erroneous teachings concerning Adam been advanced due to the misquoting of his addresses, Brigham Young would surely have referred to those misquotations at sometime or other—he never did. . . . The complete absence of any real evidence to the contrary obliges the writer to conclude that Brigham Young has not been misquoted in the official publications of the Church. (“The Position of Adam in Latter-day Saint Scripture and Theology,” M. A. thesis, Brigham Young University, August, 1953, pp. 45-47)

On page 58 of the same thesis, Rodney Turner states: “A careful, detached study of his available statements, as found in the official publications of the Church, will admit of no other conclusion than that the identification of Adam with God the Father by President Brigham Young is an irrefutable fact.”

We must agree with Rodney Turner; the evidence that Brigham Young taught the Adam-God doctrine is “irrefutable.”

Apostle Petersen Fails to Show Brigham Young Misquoted

As we have shown in this chapter, after Brigham Young's death, his Adam-God doctrine fell into disrepute. In 1976 the Mormon Apostle Mark E. Petersen wrote a book in which he attacked this doctrine as unscriptural:

To say that Adam is God is, of course, opposed utterly and completely to the scriptures as well as to our Articles of Faith, . . . to say that we have nothing to do with "any God but Adam," . . . violates all the teachings of the gospel of Christ, who taught us to pray to the Father in the name of Christ, . . . (Adam: Who Is He? p. 14)

Apostle Petersen claimed that Brigham Young was misquoted on April 9, 1852, and brought forth some new information which he maintained would establish his case:

Elder Charles C. Rich, of the Council of the Twelve, was present on a day when President Young gave an address that was wrongly reported as saying Adam was Deity. In the copy of the Journal of Discourses that he had, Elder Rich referred to the misquotation as it appears in the Journal of Discourses, and in his own hand he wrote the following as the correct statement made by President Young: "Jesus our elder Brother, was begotten in the flesh by the same character who talked with Adam in the Garden of Eden, and who is our Heavenly Father." (This signed statement is in the hands of the Church Historian.) . . .

On the face of it the mistake is obvious and was quickly noted by Elder Rich, who was present and heard the sermon. Hence the correction that he made. (Adam: Who Is He? pp. 16-17)

After Adam: Who Is He? appeared in print, Bob Witte marshaled evidence to show that Apostle Petersen was inaccurate in his statement about Apostle Rich correcting Brigham Young's statement (see the enlarged edition of Where Does It Say That?). Chris Vlachos later wrote an article which completely smashes Apostle Petersen's whole thesis:

What seems to be a good case made by Mr. Petersen crumbles, however upon cross-examination. C. C. Rich, who Petersen claims "was present and heard the sermon," was in reality not even in Salt Lake City on that day! Rich left San Bernardino, California, on March 24, 1852, for the Great Salt Lake. He did not reach his destination until April 21. Under this date, the LDS Journal History records:

April 21, 1852:

Elder Chas. C. Rich and thirteen others arrived today in G.S.L. from California.

In the May 1, 1852 issue of the Mormon Deseret Weekly the following announcement was made:

Elder C. C. Rich arrived on Wednesday, the 21 of April, in company with 13 others...direct from San Bernardino.

Hosea Stout, in his journal, also noted the event:

Wednesday 21st April 1852 . . . Gen. Rich and some 15 others arrived today from California by the South rout all well.

Furthermore, not only was C. C. Rich absent on the ninth, but the reference Petersen claims was written by C. C. Rich "in his own hand" was in reality written and signed by his son, Ben E. Rich, many years after the sermon was delivered!

Whether Mr. Petersen was deliberately seeking to suppress the facts or not, the truth is that there is no evidence whatsoever that Brigham Young was misquoted. As we shall see, Young came under much criticism from outside and from within the Mormon Church for teaching that Adam was God the Father. If he had merely been misquoted, Brigham simply could have corrected his hearers and accusers. Instead, however, Young continued to affirm and preach this doctrine against all opposition. (The Journal of Pastoral Practice, vol. 3, no. 2, 1979, pp. 99-100)

Although Apostle Petersen does not acknowledge making a mistake with regard to this important matter, he has made some very revealing changes in the 1979 printing of his book. He admits, in fact, that Charles Rich was not present and that the statement was in reality written by his son, Ben E. Rich:

Elder Charles C. Rich was not present on the day when President Young gave an address that was wrongly reported as saying Adam was our Father in heaven. (See JD 1:51.) The sermon was delivered April 9, 1852, and Elder Rich returned April 21. In a copy of the Journal of Discourses Elder Ben E. Rich, son of Elder Charles C. Rich, referred to the misquotation as it appears in the Journal of Discourses, and in his own hand corrected the statement to read as follows: "Jesus our Elder Brother, was begotten in the flesh by the same character who talked with Adam in the Garden of Eden, and who is our Father in heaven." In this same statement Ben E. Rich wrote "As corrected above is what Prest. Young said, as testified to me by my father, C. C. Rich." (This signed statement is in the hands of the Church Historical Department.) . . .

On the face of it the mistake is obvious. We find in Genesis 2:15-16 and 3:8-9 that God walked and talked with Adam in the Garden of Eden. (Adam: Who Is He? 1979 printing, pp. 16-17)

The reader will notice that in the 1976 printing, Apostle Petersen asserted: "Elder Charles C. Rich, of the Council of the Twelve, was present on a day when President Young gave an address that was wrongly reported . . ." In the 1979 printing this was changed to read: "Elder Charles C. Rich was not present on the day when President Young gave an address that was wrongly reported . . ." The 1976 printing assured us that "Elder Rich referred to the misquotation as it appears in the Journal of Discourses, and in his own hand he wrote the following . . ." This was changed to read that "Elder Ben E. Rich, son of Elder Charles C. Rich, referred to the misquotation as it appears in the Journal of Discourses, and in his own hand corrected the statement . . ." Apostle Petersen originally stated: "On the face of it the mistake is obvious and was quickly noted by Elder Rich, who was present and heard the sermon. Hence the correction that he made." In the 1979 printing this was altered to read: "On the face of it the mistake is obvious. We find in Genesis 2:15-16 and 3:8-9 that God walked and talked with Adam in the Garden of Eden."

It is very difficult to understand how Apostle Petersen could make such a serious mistake. We wonder, too, why he continues to use this material when it is of no real value. Since Charles C. Rich was not present, and since his son, Ben E. Rich, who recorded the material, had not even been born at the time, we cannot see that it provides any substantial help to Apostle Petersen's thesis. The fact that he would even use such material shows that he is totally unprepared to deal with the issue of the Adam-God doctrine.

More on Brigham Young's Fight Over the Adam-God Doctrine

Chris Vlachos has gleaned a great deal of new evidence from manuscript sources to prove that Brigham Young vigorously defended his Adam-God doctrine and that President Young and Apostle Pratt contended over this matter as indicated on page 174-75 of this book:

During a discourse given on Sunday night, February 19,

1854, Brigham Young again addressed the question of who begot Jesus Christ in the flesh. Speaking of Christ, he asked:

Who did beget him? His Father, and his father is our God, and the Father of our spirits, and he is the framer of the body, the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ. Who is he. He is Father Adam; Michael; the Ancient of day. . . .

While Brigham in his discourse of 1852 may have been unclear, in this 1854 address there is no question about his meaning. Here Brigham distinctly names Adam as God the Father. Wilford Woodruff, Mormon Apostle and later Church President, had no doubt about what Brigham meant. Referring to this discourse under the date of February 19, 1854, in his journal, Woodruff recorded:

He [Brigham Young] said that our God was Father Adam He was the Father of the Saviour Jesus Christ—Our God was no more or less than Adam, Michael the Arkangel.

It should be noted that Brigham identifies Adam as the “Father of our spirits.” . . . By referring to Adam as the Father of our spirits, Brigham was clearly identifying him as the being whom Mormons address as “Heavenly Father.” . . .

Though Richards and most of the other Church authorities accepted their prophet’s declaration as the word of God, there was one member of the Quorum of the Twelve Apostles who openly opposed Brigham Young in his views. That man was Orson Pratt. Under the date of September 17, 1854, LDS Apostle Wilford Woodruff recorded in his journal the details of a confrontation between Young and Pratt. . . . When Young declared some of Orson’s doctrines to be false, Pratt retaliated against the prophet by voicing his disbelief in the Adam-God doctrine:

Brother Pratt also thought that Adam was made of the dust of the Earth Could not believe that Adam was our God or the Father of Jesus Christ President Young said that He was that He came from another world . . . He told Brother Pratt to lay aside his Philosophical reasoning & get revelation from God to govern him & enlighten his mind more. . . .

This dispute between the Mormon Prophet and his Apostle continued for several years. Because of his disbelief in the Adam-God teaching and in other doctrines of Young, Pratt was for years upon the point of being severed from the Church. (The Journal of Pastoral Practice, vol. III, no. 2, 1979, pp. 101-104)

Gary James Bergera has prepared an excellent study of the conflict between Brigham Young and Orson Pratt (see Dialogue: A Journal of Mormon Thought, Summer 1980, pp. 14–58). In this article Bergera has quoted a great deal of unpublished material from the LDS Church Archives. This material shows that the dissension between Young and Pratt lasted for years and became rather heated on some occasions. For instance, on January 27, 1860, Orson Pratt asserted:

. . . When Joseph teaches any thing & Brigham seems to teach another contrary to Joseph . . . I believe them as Joseph has spoken them . . . I have spoken plainly I would rather not have spoken so plainly but I have no excuses to make President Young said I ought to make a confession But Orson Pratt is not a man to make a confession of what I do not believe. I am not going to crawl to Brigham and act the Hypocrite and confess what I do not Believe. I will be a free man President Young condemns my doctrines to be fals I do not believe them to be fals . . . I will not act the Hypocrite it may cost me my fellowship But I will stick to it if I die tonight I would say O Lord God Almighty[y] I believe what I say. (“Minutes of a Meeting of the Presidency & Twelve Presidents of Seventies and Others assembled in President Youngs Council Room,” WWJ, 27 January 1860, as cited in Dialogue: A Journal of Mormon Thought, Summer 1980, p. 19)

In his reply to Pratt, Brigham Young countered: “ ‘You have been like a stubborn mule,’ . . . and have taken a fals position in order to accuse me . . . Orson Pratt puts down a lie to argue upon he has had fals ground all the time tonight . . .” (Ibid.)

On page 26 of the same article, Bergera cites an interesting exchange between Young and Pratt which is taken from “Minutes of Meeting at Historian’s Office, April 4, 1860”:

“There are certain points,” he said, “taught by Bro. Y as being true that there does seem to be disputed between those & the Revel[at]ions]

& when I reflect that there is—item upon item, doctrine upon doctrine—I would be a hypocrite if I came out & said that these [are] views on which I have strong faith [I] would be acting too much a hypocrite. . . . I would like to ennumerate [those] items. first preached & publish[ed] that Adam is the fa[ther] of our spirits, & father of Spirit & father of our bodies. When I read the Rev[elations] given to Joseph I read directly the opposite.

“Your statements to night,” Young retorted, “you came out to night and place them as charges, & have as many against me as I have [against] you. One thing I have thought I might still have ommited,” he said. “It was Joseph’s doctrine that Adam was God when in Luke Johnson’s . . . Joseph could not reveal what was revealed to him, if Joseph had it revealed, he was told not to reveal it. . . .”

President Young threatened that if Apostle Pratt did not back down he would be “voted as a false teacher, & your false doctrines discarded. I love your integrity, but your ignorance is as great as any philosophers ought to be.”

The next day the church leaders met again and Pratt maintained:

. . . in regard to Adam being our Father and our God, I have not published it, altho I frankly say, I have no confidence in it, altho advanced by bro. Kimball in the stand, and afterwards approved by bro. Brigham . . . I have never intended to advance new ideas, but to keep within revelation. It is said the revelations given to Joseph Smith, answered them, and if Joseph would translate now, it would be so very different, if that was so, I should never know when I was right, in fourteen years hence, all the revelations of Brigham may be done away, but I do not admit it, The Lord deals with us on consistent principles, . . . (Ibid, p. 30)

On pages 31-32 of the same article, we find the following:

“It was the Father of Jesus Christ that was talking to Adam in the garden,” Pratt pressed on. “B. Young says that Adam was the Father of Jesus Christ, both of his spirit and Body, in his teachings from the stand. . . .”

Despite Hyde’s attempted reconciliation, Pratt remained uncompromising. “I have heard Brigham say,” he remarked, “that Adam is the Father of our Spirits, and he came here with his resurrected body, to fall for his children, and I said to him, it leads to an endless number of falls, . . . that is revolting to my feelings, . . . [A]nother item, I heard brother Young say that Jesus had a body, flesh and bones, before he came, he was born of the Virgin Mary, it was so contrary to every revelation given.”

Under a great deal of pressure from Brigham Young and other church leaders, Orson Pratt was finally forced to back down. Bergera says that “Throughout the ensuing years until Young’s death in 1877, conflict between the Apostle and his President submerged markedly, . . .” (Ibid., p. 39). Nevertheless, “On 10 April 1875, some two years before Brigham Young’s death, the church President rearranged the order of seniority in the Quorum of the Twelve, placing three others before Pratt, though the latter chronologically preceded them based on date of original ordination to the quorum, Pratt did not succeed to the presidency as would have otherwise occurred if the order not been realigned. While Young maintained that such action was necessary because of Pratt’s 1842 excommunication, it would not be entirely incorrect to assume that Young was motivated by his unwillingness to permit Pratt’s eventual succession as Church President” (Ibid., p. 40).

Evidence on the Adam-God Doctrine Mounting

As time goes on, more and more evidence that Brigham Young taught the Adam-God doctrine is coming to light. In the face of this material, an increasing number of Mormon scholars are now willing to concede that the doctrine was taught. Even Apostle Bruce R. McConkie appears to be weakening. In a letter to “Honest Truth Seekers,” Apostle McConkie declared:

Some prophets—I say it respectfully—know more and have greater inspiration than others. Thus, if Brigham Young, who was one of the greatest of the prophets, said something about Adam which is out of harmony with what is in the Book of Moses and in Section 78, it is the scripture that prevails.

In a talk given at the BYU Marriott Center on June 1, 1980, Apostle McConkie severely attacked the Adam-God doctrine. If McConkie’s words were applied to Brigham Young, they would make him a false prophet who was in danger of losing his soul:

HERESY NO. 6 — There are those who believe, or say they believe, that Adam is our father and our God, that he is the father of our spirits and our bodies, and that he is the one we worship. The devil keeps this heresy alive as a means of obtaining converts to cultism. It is contrary to the whole plan of salvation set forth in the scriptures. Anyone who has read the Book of Moses and anyone who has received the temple endowment and who yet believes the Adam-God theory does not deserve to be saved.

In his article published in The Journal of Pastoral Practice, vol. 3, no. 2, 1979, Chris Vlachos not only presents a great deal of evidence to prove that Brigham Young taught the Adam-God doctrine, but he shows clearly that this was a serious violation of the commandment. “Thou shalt have no other gods before me” (Exodus 20:3). He points out the grave implications for present-day Mormons:

While throughout the flow of Bible history we see God proclaiming that He alone is to be worshiped, at the same time we find prophets who were not of God taught the contrary. True prophets would never be found teaching the people to worship another god— whether it was a stone idol, an imaginary god dwelling in heaven, or a deified man. . . . when these living oracles of God spoke as prophets, they were moved to proclaim, “Thou shalt worship the LORD thy God, and Him only shalt thou serve.” . . .

Holding fast to these truths let us turn now to Brigham Young, a man who claimed for himself the station and office of prophet of God. Recent history records the lives of few men who have possessed the leadership qualities that Young exhibited. For thirty years he presided as Prophet, Seer, and Revelator over the Mormon Church, a people claiming to be led by prophets of God as in the days of ancient Israel. . . . Their priesthood claims sole possession of the authority or power needed to act on behalf of God, and they consider all other “Christian churches” to be in a state of apostasy, who at best teach a partial truth about the gospel of Christ. Now if Brigham Young, Mormon prophet from 1847 to 1877, were a false prophet all along, then the claims of those who have sought to derive their priesthood authority through him are empty and void. If Brigham taught false doctrine, that cuts the ground from under Mormonism’s claim of latter-day prophetic revelation and the Mormon Church is not divinely led. . . .

The Mormon Church must base the truth of her claims on the authenticity of Brigham’s calling. Yet, we shall see that Brigham Young, who presided over the Mormon Church longer than any other man, did indeed advance false doctrine that focused worship on a god other than the Lord God of Israel. . . .

An examination of the evidence, however, will admit to no other conclusion than that Brigham Young did teach that Adam was Heavenly Father, the Father of men’s spirits as well as the Father of Jesus Christ in the flesh. . . . The doctrine that he taught for over 25 years was false doctrine and the LDS Church admits this today. It has, in effect, sided with Orson Pratt and has adopted his arguments and views as being right. However, in doing this it has unknowingly admitted that Brigham was not an inspired prophet of God. . . .

The implications certainly are obvious. The claims of the Utah LDS Church utterly collapse when they claim to be the only true church and the sole possessor of God’s authority.

The Mormon, furthermore, faces the dilemma of being unable to be certain that his present prophet is advancing true doctrine. Perhaps the present teachings of the living prophet will be tomorrow’s false teachings of a dead prophet. Perhaps the present revelations which the modern President claims to have received will be swept under the carpet as was the revelation concerning Adam that Brigham Young claimed to have received from God.

Today’s Mormon cannot hide behind a testimony that the living prophet is advancing correct doctrine. His testimony holds no more weight than the strong testimonies which past members had concerning the truth of Brigham’s Adam-God teaching. . . .

This frightening dilemma in which the Mormon finds himself is not peculiar to him or to his people, but is the snare in which all men find themselves when they put their trust in men. To trust in the arm of flesh is really to have no hope at all. . . .

God invites all men today to place their trust in Him directly through His Son, Jesus Christ. Unlike a false prophet who teaches the people to follow a strange god, Jesus can be fully trusted to lead us to His Father. By His death, Christ has secured a place in the presence of God for all who place their trust in him. Those who trust Him can be absolutely sure that He will never fail. (pp. 94-96, 118, 119)

11. The Priesthood

The Mormon leaders claim that those who hold the Priesthood in the Mormon Church are the only ones who have the authority to administer the ordinances of the Gospel. This concept leads members of the church to believe that the work of other churches is in vain. In the Mormon Missionary Handbook we read the following:

Elder: Why is the priesthood so important?

Brown: Because a man must have it to do those things.

Elder: He certainly must. Suppose a priest or minister baptizes without the priesthood, what does that mean in the sight of the Lord?

Brown: It doesn't mean anything.

Elder: Why is that?

Brown: Because he would lack the necessary authority.

Elder: Right. So even though a minister might be sincere, unless he has the priesthood, will the Lord recognize a baptism performed by him?

Brown: No.

(A Uniform System For Teaching Investigators, 1961, p. 15)

In the Bible we read that John at one time held a belief similar to this, for which Jesus rebuked him:

And John answered and said, Master, we saw one casting out devils in thy name; and we forbad him, because he followeth not with us.

And Jesus said unto him, forbid him not: for he that is not against us is for us. (Luke 9:49-50)

Added Later

David Whitmer, one of the three witnesses to the Book of Mormon, said the following concerning the Priesthood.

This matter of "Priesthood," since the days of Sydney Rigdon, has been the great hobby and stumbling-block of the Latter Day Saints. Priesthood means authority; and authority is the word we should use. I do not think the word priesthood is mentioned in the New Covenant of the Book of Mormon. Authority is the word we used for the first two years in the church—until Sydney Rigdon's days in Ohio. This matter of the two orders of priesthood in the Church of Christ, and lineal priesthood of the old law being in the church, all originated in the mind of Sydney Rigdon. He explained these things to Brother Joseph in his way, out of the old Scriptures, and got Joseph to inquire, etc. He would inquire, and as mouthpiece speak out the revelations just as they had it fixed up in their hearts. . . . according to the desires of the heart, the inspiration comes, but it may be the spirit of man that gives it. . . . This is the way the High Priests and the "priesthood" as you have it, was introduced into the Church of Christ almost two years after its beginning—and after we had baptized and confirmed about two thousand souls into the church. (An Address To All Believers In Christ, by David Whitmer p. 64)

The question might well be asked, "If what David Whitmer says is true, how can section 27 and other sections of the Doctrine and Covenants be accounted for?" It does seem like there is a contradiction here. Section 27 tells of the bestowal of the lesser priesthood and the visitation of Peter, James, and John, and is dated August 1830, whereas David Whitmer stated that the idea of two orders of priesthood, lineal priesthood, etc., did not come into the church until Sidney Rigdon's days in Ohio. Actually, these revelations have been changed from the way they originally read when they were first printed in the Book of Commandments. David Whitmer stated:

You have changed the revelations from the way they were first given and as they are today in the Book of Commandments, to support the error of Brother Joseph in taking upon himself the office of Seer to the church. You have changed the revelations to support the error of high priests. You have changed the revelations to support the error of a President of the high priesthood, high counselors, etc. You have altered the revelations to support you in going beyond the plain teachings of Christ in the new covenant part of the Book of Mormon. (An Address To All Believers In Christ, p. 49)

In his book, Problems in Mormon Text, La Mar Petersen gives this interesting information about the changes concerning Priesthood which have been made in Joseph Smith's revelations:

The important details that are missing from the "full history" of 1834 are likewise missing from the Book of Commandments in 1833. The student would expect to find all the particulars of the Restoration in this first treasured set of 65 revelations, the dates of which encompassed the bestowals of the two Priesthoods, but they are conspicuously absent . . . The notable revelations on Priesthood in the Doctrine and Covenants before referred to, Sections 2 and 13, are missing, and Chapter 28 gives no hint of the Restoration which, if actual, had been known for four years. More than four hundred words were added to this revelation of August, 1829 in Section 27 of the Doctrine and Covenants, the additions made to include the names of heavenly visitors and two separate ordinations. The Book of Commandments gives the duties of Elders, Priests, Teachers, and Deacons and refers to Joseph's apostolic calling but there is no mention of Melchizedek Priesthood, High Priesthood, Seventies, High Priests, nor High Councilors. These words were later inserted into the revelation on church organization and government of April, 1830, making it appear that they were known at that date, but they do not appear in the original, Chapter 24 of the Book of Commandments three years later. Similar interpolations were made in the revelations known as Sections 42 and 68. (Problems in Mormon Text, by La Mar Petersen, pp. 7-8)

At this point the reader may be interested in taking a closer look at the photographs showing the changes made in Joseph Smith's revelations which we presented earlier—see CHANGES E (page 19), I (page 22), K (page 23), M (page 23), N (page 23), O (page 24), P (page 24) and Q (page 25).

Aaronic Priesthood

The Mormon Church claims to have the Aaronic Priesthood; the Bible, however, makes it clear that it was fulfilled at the death of Christ. In Hebrews 7:11-14 we read:

If therefore perfection were by the Levitical priesthood, (for under it the people received the law,) what further need was there that another priest should rise after the order of Melchisedec, and not be called after the order of Aaron?

For the priesthood being changed, there is made of necessity a change also of the law.

For he of whom these things are spoken pertaineth to another tribe, of which no man gave attendance at the altar.

For it is evident that our Lord sprang out of Juda; of which tribe Moses spake nothing concerning priesthood.

Members of the early Christian Church were not ordained to the Aaronic Priesthood, neither is there any mention of the Aaronic Priesthood in the Book of Mormon. The Mormon Apostle Parley P. Pratt admitted that the Nephites did not have the Aaronic Priesthood: “. . . the Aaronic Priesthood is no where pretended to in the Book of Mormon” (Writings of Parley Parker Pratt, p. 209).

The Mormon Church claims that on May 15, 1829, John the Baptist conferred the Aaronic Priesthood on Joseph Smith and Oliver Cowdery. Section 13 of the Doctrine and Covenants is cited as evidence that the Aaronic Priesthood was conferred on Joseph Smith and Oliver Cowdery. We must remember, however, that this section did not appear in the revelations as they were originally printed in the Book of Commandments. It was published in the Times and Seasons on August 1, 1842, but it was not added to the Doctrine and Covenants until 1876.

Section 27 of the Doctrine and Covenants might lead one to believe that in 1830 the ordination of Joseph Smith and Oliver Cowdery to the Aaronic Priesthood by John the Baptist was common knowledge in the church. In verse 8 we read:

Which John I have sent unto you, my servants, Joseph Smith, Jun., and Oliver Cowdery, to ordain you unto the first priesthood which you have received, that you might be called and ordained even as Aaron;

Since the introduction to this revelation states that it was given in 1830, Mormon writers use it in their attempt to prove the Restoration of the Priesthood. A careful examination of this revelation, however, reveals that it has been falsified. Verse 8 was not in the revelation as it was originally published in the Book of Commandments. It was added to the Doctrine and Covenants in 1835 (see Change K, p. 23).

Melchizedek Priesthood

It is claimed by the Mormon leaders that before the church was organized Peter, James and John restored the Melchizedek Priesthood. The Mormon Apostle LeGrand Richards admitted that the exact date of this ordination is not known:

While we are a record-keeping people, as the Lord commanded, nevertheless our records are not complete. . . . we do not have the date that Peter, James and John conferred the Melchizedek Priesthood upon them. (Letter from LeGrand Richards, dated Sept. 26, 1960)

The Doctrine and Covenants 27:12 is cited as proof that the Melchizedek Priesthood was conferred at a very early date:

And also with Peter, and James, and John, whom I have sent unto you, by whom I have ordained you and confirmed you to be apostles, . . .

This verse, however, did not appear in the revelation when it was published in the Book of Commandments in 1833. It was added into the Doctrine and Covenants, and therefore it cannot be cited as proof that the Melchizedek Priesthood was in the church at the time the revelation was given (see Change K, p. 23).

It is claimed that an Elder is an office in the Melchizedek Priesthood, although neither the Bible nor the Book of Mormon teach this. In the Doctrine and Covenants 107:7 we read: “The office of an elder comes under the priesthood of Melchizedek.” There is evidence, however, that in the beginning the Elders of the Mormon Church did not have the Melchizedek Priesthood. Joseph Smith himself made this statement concerning a conference held in June, 1831:

. . . the authority of the Melchizedek Priesthood was manifested and conferred for the first time upon several of the Elders. (History of the Church, vol. 1, pp. 175-176)

John Whitmer, who was Church Historian, confirmed the fact that the Elders were ordained to the High Priesthood on June 3, 1831:

June 3, 1831. A general conference was called . . . the Lord made manifest to Joseph that it was necessary that such of the Elders as were considered worthy, should be ordained to the high priesthood. . . . these were ordained to the high priesthood, namely: Lyman Wight, Sidney Rigdon, John Murdock, Reynolds Cahoon, Harvey Whitlock, and Hyrum Smith were ordained by Joseph Smith, Junior, except Sidney Rigdon. (John Whitmer's History, chapter 7)

John Corrill also stated that the Melchizedek Priesthood was first introduced in the church at that conference: “About fifty Elders met, which was about all the Elders that then belonged to the church. . . . The Malchisedic priesthood was then for the first time introduced, and conferred on several of the Elders” (A Brief History of the Church of Christ of Latter Day Saints, 1839, p. 18). George A. Smith, speaking in the Tabernacle in 1864, also mentioned this conference: “He [Ezra Booth] was present in June, 1831, . . . the manifestation of the power of God being on Joseph, he set apart some of the Elders to the High Priesthood” (Journal of Discourses, vol. 11, p. 4).

If the Melchizedek Priesthood is really necessary it is certainly odd that the elders were able to function from the organization of the church until June, 1831, without it. All evidence points to the fact that the Melchizedek Priesthood did not come from the hands of Peter, James and John in 1829, but rather from the mind of Sidney Rigdon in Ohio in 1831. The Mormon historian B. H. Roberts made the following admission concerning the restoration of the Melchizedek Priesthood: “. . . there is no definite account of the event in the history of the Prophet Joseph, or, for matter of that, in any of our annals, . . .” (History of the Church, vol. 1, p. 40, footnote). In trying to prove that there was a restoration of the Melchizedek Priesthood, Roberts cites two statements by Oliver Cowdery. These statements are of little value, however, since they were not made until the late 1840's and were not published until some time later.

High Priests

David Whitmer, one of the three witnesses to the Book of Mormon, made the following statements concerning the ordination of High Priests in the Mormon Church:

The next grievous error which crept into the church was in ordaining high priests in June, 1831. This error was introduced at the instigation of Sydney Rigdon. The office of high priests was never spoken of, and never thought of being established in the church until Rigdon came in. Remember that we had been preaching from August 1829, until June, 1831—almost two years—and had baptized about 2,000 members into the Church of Christ, and had not one high priest. During 1829, several times we were told by Brother Joseph that an elder was the highest office in the church. . . . In Kirtland, Ohio, in 1831, Rigdon would expound the Old Testament scriptures of the Bible and Book of Mormon (in his way) to Joseph, concerning the priesthood, high priests, etc., and would persuade Brother Joseph to inquire of the Lord about this doctrine, and of course a revelation would always come just as they desired it. Rigdon finally persuaded Brother Joseph to believe that the high priests which had such great power in ancient times, should be in the Church of Christ to-day. He had Brother Joseph inquire of the Lord about it, and they received an answer according to their erring desires. (An Address To All Believers In Christ, p. 35)

High Priests were only in the church before Christ; and to have this office in the “Church of Christ” is not according to the teachings of Christ in either of the sacred books: Christ himself is our great and last High Priest. Brethren—I will tell you one thing which alone should settle this matter in your minds; it is this: you cannot find in the New Testament part of the Bible or Book of Mormon where one single high priest was ever in the Church of Christ. It is a grievous sin to have such an office in the church. As well might you add to the teachings of Christ—circumcision—offering up the sacrifice of animals—or break the ordinances of Christ in any other way by going back to the old law of Moses. (Ibid., pp. 62-63)

In Kirtland, Ohio, in June, 1831, . . . the first High Priests were ordained. . . . When they were ordained, right there at the time, the devil caught and bound Harvey Whitlock so he could not speak, his face twisted into demon-like shape. Also John Murdock and others were caught by the devil in a similar manner. Now brethren, do you not see that the displeasure of the Lord was upon their proceedings in ordaining High Priests? Of course it was. These facts are recorded in the History of the Church—written by my brother, John Whitmer, who was the regularly appointed church historian . . . Brother John was himself ordained a High Priest at that time, so he was in error and could not see it; but he saw it very clearly in 1848, when the Lord opened our eyes to see and understand it. . . . Brother John gives an account of a prophecy uttered by Lyman Wight just after Brother Joseph ordained him a High Priest, which prophecy will prove to be a false prophecy. Brother John’s history of the church says as follows:

He (Joseph) laid his hands upon Lyman Wight and ordained him to the high priesthood after the holy order of God. And the spirit fell upon Lyman, and he prophesied concerning the coming of Christ. He said that there were some in this congregation that should live until the Savior should descend from Heaven with a shout, with all the holy angels with him, etc.

The early future will determine as to whether this prophecy was true or false. (Ibid., pp. 64-65)

Hiram Page, one of the eight witnesses to the Book of Mormon, also repudiated the idea of High Priests in the church after the time of Christ. He stated: “. . . the office of High Priest does not belong to the church of Christ under the gospel dispensation, . . .” (The Olive Branch, Springfield, Ill., August, 1849, p. 28).

First Presidency

The Mormon writer Bruce R. McConkie states that the Mormon Church “conforms, for instance, to the New Testament pattern of the Lord’s Church. In it is found the same authority, the same organization, the same ordinances, the same teachings and doctrines that were found in the primitive Church” (Mormon Doctrine, 1958, p. 129). If we carefully examine this claim, we find that it cannot be supported by the Bible. For instance, the Mormon Church is led by a First Presidency, yet the Bible says nothing about a First Presidency. The Mormon Apostle LeGrand Richards admits that the Bible does not mention a First Presidency, but he suggests that it may have been composed of Peter, James and John:

We find no direct statement in the Bible to the effect that a Presidency of the Church was appointed by the Savior to stand at the head of the Church after his departure. However, the fact that he sent Peter, James, and John back to the earth in this dispensation to restore the Melchizedek Priesthood, . . . would indicate that they held a position of preference over the other Apostles, which, by virtue of their administration in this dispensation, would indicate that they were the presidency of the Melchizedek Priesthood and of the Church in the meridian of time, following the ascension of Jesus. (A Marvelous Work and A Wonder, Salt Lake City, 1966, p. 140)

Even if a person were to accept Peter, James and John as the First Presidency of the primitive church, this would still present a serious problem. The Bible states that Jesus chose twelve Apostles and that Peter, James and John were included among these men, whereas the Mormon Church has a First Presidency composed of three men in addition to the “Council of the Twelve.” Joseph Fielding Smith, the tenth President of the Mormon Church, admits that there is a difference:

He also appointed three of these Twelve to take the keys of presidency. Peter, James, and John, acted as the First Presidency . . . All the information we have indicates that they served in this capacity while serving at the same time as three of the Council of the Twelve.

In this last dispensation we have received the added information, and perhaps the added order of priesthood, and we have in the Church of Jesus Christ today the quorum of the First Presidency, separate from the Council of the Apostles. (Doctrines of Salvation, vol. 3, 1956, p. 152)

The Mormon Church has another problem with regard to the First Presidency: “Of the Melchizedek Priesthood, three Presiding High Priests, . . . form a quorum of the Presidency of the Church” (Doctrine and Covenants, 107:22). Under the leadership of David O. McKay, however, the First Presidency was expanded to six members. The Salt Lake Tribune for January 19, 1970, reported:

In October, 1965, because of the “increasing work load on church leadership and rapid growth of the Church,” President McKay appointed two new counselors to the First Presidency. They are Joseph Fielding Smith and Thorpe B. Isaacson.

During General Conference in April, 1968, Alvin R. Dyer also was elevated to the First Presidency, raising the total membership to six.

In his book, Doctrines of Salvation, written before David O. McKay enlarged the First Presidency, Joseph Fielding Smith stated that the Lord had never called more than the Twelve and a Presidency of three: “. . . at no place has the Lord said that others more than the Twelve and a Presidency of three should be called” (Doctrines of Salvation, vol. 3, p. 153). In spite of this statement, Joseph Fielding Smith accepted a position in McKay’s enlarged First Presidency. At McKay’s death, however, Joseph Fielding Smith became the tenth President of the Mormon Church and immediately cut down the number in the First Presidency to three—his counselors are Harold B. Lee and Nathan Eldon Tanner. This move seems to show that Smith feels that McKay made a mistake in enlarging the First Presidency to six.

The reader will notice that McKay added extra counselors because of “increased work load on church leadership and rapid growth of the Church.” How can Joseph Fielding Smith justify the elimination of these counselors when the church is supposed to be larger today than it was in 1965?

As we indicated earlier, the Bible does not support the idea of a First Presidency. While this presents a problem for Mormon apologists, the problem becomes even more serious when we learn that the Book of Mormon does not have a word to say about a First Presidency. Even worse than this, however, is the fact that Joseph Smith’s revelations were changed to support the idea of a First Presidency. For instance, in a revelation given March, 1831, we read: “And then ye shall begin to be gathered. . . every man according to his family, . . . as is appointed to him by the bishop and elders of the church, . . .” (Book of Commandments, chapter 51, verse 6). In the Doctrine and Covenants this has been changed to include the Presidency: “. . . and then shall ye begin to be gathered. . . every man according to his family, . . . as is appointed to him by the Presidency and the bishop of the church, . . .” (Doctrine and Covenants 48:6). In a revelation given November, 1831, the word “presidency” was not included, but when this revelation was reprinted in the Doctrine and Covenants it was added in several places (see Change Q, p. 25).

Age of Ordination

In the Mormon Church twelve-year-old boys are ordained deacons. This is the first step in the Priesthood. This seems to be in direct contradiction to the Bible, for in 1 Timothy 3:12 we read: “Let the deacons be the husbands of one wife, ruling their children and their own houses well.” Joseph Fielding Smith tries to explain this contradiction by stating:

It was the judgment of Paul that a deacon in that day should be a married man. That does not apply to our day. Conditions were different in the days of Paul. In that day a minister was not considered qualified to take part in the ministry until he was 30 years of age. Under those conditions deacons, teachers, and priests were mature men. This is not the requirement today. (Doctrines of Salvation, vol. 3, pp. 109-110)

Bruce R. McConkie, of the First Council of the Seventy, stated:

It is the practice of the Church in this dispensation . . . to confer the Aaronic Priesthood upon worthy young men who are 12 years of age and to ordain them to the office of a deacon in that priesthood. . . . In the meridian of time the needs of the ministry were such that adult brethren were ordained deacons. (Mormon Doctrine, 1958, p. 170)

Joseph Smith’s own revelations, however, seem to show that he had mature men in mind when he spoke of deacons. In the Doctrine and Covenants 84:111 we read: “. . . the deacons and teachers should be appointed to watch over the church, to be standing ministers unto the church.” On Oct. 6, 1854, Brigham Young taught that deacons were to be married:

It is not the business of an ignorant young man, of no experience in family matters, to inquire into the circumstances of families, and know the wants of every person. . . . it is not the business of boys to do this; but select a man who has got a family to be a deacon, whose wife can go with him, and assist him in administering to the needy in the ward. (Journal of Discourses, vol. 2, p. 89)

Although Brigham Young publicly taught that deacons should be married, he ordained his own sons to be Apostles when they were still young men—one son was eighteen but the other was only eleven. In the book, Church Chronology, we find the following:

Young, Brigham, jun.; born Dec. 18, 1836; baptized in 1845, by his father, Brigham Young; ordained a Seventy; ordained an Apostle Nov. 22, 1855, by Brigham Young, and admitted into the Council of Twelve Apostles Oct. 9, 1868, being set apart by Brigham Young.

Young, John W.; born Oct. 1, 1844; ordained an Apostle Nov. 22, 1855, by Pres. Brigham Young, but has never been admitted into the Council of Twelve Apostles. (Church Chronology, Compiled by Andrew Jenson, Assistant Church Historian, Salt Lake City, 1899, p. xxvii)

Heber C. Kimball, First Counselor to Brigham Young, ordained his boy a high priest when he was only about six years old. This boy died when he was fourteen, and Heber C. Kimball made this statement at his funeral:

Joseph was a kind-hearted, obedient, good boy. He was fourteen years of age the third day of last April, . . . Joseph was never cross, he was always pleasant to all persons. Eight years ago he came near dying; I was impressed to ordain him a high priest. I ordained him, and I do know that that had a saving effect upon the boy, . . . (Journal of Discourses, vol. 10, pp. 370-372)

In the autobiography and journal of Joseph Lee Robinson we find that Robinson ordained his infant son, and when he asked the Patriarch John Smith about it he told him that he had done the same thing on several occasions.

In this chapter we have covered some of the problems one encounters when studying the Mormon Priesthood. There are many other problems and inconsistencies which we cannot cover due to the lack of space.

12. The Arm of Flesh

In Jeremiah 17:5 we read: “Thus saith the Lord; cursed be the man that trusteth in man, and maketh flesh his arm, . . .” This scripture means that we are not to put our trust in any man, but that we are to rely only upon God and put our trust in Him. Men can lead us into error, but God leads us only into truth and righteousness.

The Mormon Church condemns the Catholic Church for teaching that the Pope is infallible. Joseph Fielding Smith, Jr., made this statement concerning the Catholic teaching of infallibility:

This dogma sets forth the belief that the “Vicar of Christ” cannot teach error because he is promised divine protection from error . . . infallibility is a fabrication devised by the powers of darkness to act as a counterfeit for revelation. (Religious Truths Defined, 1962, p. 183)

While the Mormon Church leaders condemn the Catholics for teaching the doctrine of infallibility, they teach essentially the same thing. Brigham Young stated:

The Lord Almighty leads this Church, and he will never suffer you to be led astray if you are found doing your duty. You may go home and sleep as sweetly as a babe in its mother’s arms, as to any danger of your leaders leading you astray, . . . (Journal of Discourses, vol. 9, p. 289)

Wilford Woodruff, the fourth President of the Church, stated: “The Lord will never permit me or any other man who stands as the President of this Church to lead you astray. It is not in the program” (Essentials in Church History, 1922, p. 609). Joseph Fielding Smith, who recently became the tenth President of the Church, once stated:

The time will never come when we will not be able to put confidence and exercise faith in the teachings and in the instruction of those who lead us . . . Therefore it behooves us, as Latter-day Saints, to put our trust in the presiding authorities of the Church, . . .

Saints Safe in Following Church Authorities. No man ever went astray by following the counsel of the authorities of the Church. (Doctrines of Salvation, vol. 1, p. 243)

Thinking a Sin?

Carl Gustav Jung, one of the world’s greatest psychiatrists, made these very interesting observations:

All mass movements, as one might expect, slip with the greatest ease down an inclined plane represented by large numbers. Where the many are, there is security; what the many believe must of course be true; what the many want must be worth striving for, and necessary, and therefore good. In the clamor of the many there lies the power to snatch wish-fulfillments by force; sweetest of all, however, is that gentle and painless slipping back into the kingdom of childhood, into the paradise of parental care, into happy-go-luckiness and irresponsibility. All the thinking and looking after are done from the top; to all questions there is an answer; and for all needs the necessary provision is made. The infantile dream state of the mass man is so unrealistic that he never thinks to ask who is paying for this paradise. The balancing of accounts is left to a higher political or social authority, which welcomes the task, for its power is thereby increased; and the more power it has, the weaker and more helpless the individual becomes. (The Undiscovered Self, pp. 70-71)

Very few organizations would want to admit that “All the thinking and looking after are done from the top.” The Mormon Church, however, is an exception. In fact, the ward teacher’s message for June 1945 contained these statements:

Any Latter-day Saint who denounces or opposes, whether actively or otherwise, any plan or doctrine advocated by the “prophets, seers, and revelators” of the Church is cultivating the spirit of apostasy. . . . Lucifer . . . wins a great victory when he can get members of the Church to speak against their leaders and to “do their own thinking”. . . .

When our leaders speak, the thinking has been done. When they propose a plan—it is God’s plan. When they point the way, there is no other which is safe. When they give direction, it should mark the end of controversy. (Improvement Era, June 1945, p. 354)

Heber C. Kimball, First Councilor to Brigham Young, made these statements:

When brother Joseph Smith lived, he was our Prophet, our Seer, and Revelator; he was our dictator in the things of God, and it was for us to listen to him, and do just as he told us. (Journal of Discourses, vol. 2, p. 106)

. . . learn to do as you are told, . . . if you are told by your leader to do a thing, do it, none of your business whether it is right or wrong. (Ibid., vol. 6, p. 32)

If you do things according to counsel and they are wrong, the consequences will fall on the heads of those who counseled you, so don’t be troubled. (William Clayton’s Journal, p. 334)

On September 6, 1857, Thomas B. Marsh declared that the president of the Mormon Church is in reality a Pope:

I have now got a better understanding of the Presidency of the Church than I formerly had. I used to ask myself, What is the difference between the President of our Church and a Pope? True, he is not called a Pope, but names do not alter realities, and therefore he is a Pope. (Journal of Discourses, vol. 5, p. 208)

Joseph Smith gave a revelation in which the Mormons were told to “give heed unto all his words and commandments which he shall give unto you . . . his word ye shall receive, as if from mine own mouth, in all patience and faith” (Doctrine and Covenants 21:4-5).

In 1860 the Mormon Apostle Orson Pratt stated:

Have we not a right to make up our minds in relation to the things recorded in the word of God, and speak about them, whether the living oracles believe our views or not? We have not the right. . . .

God placed Joseph Smith at the head of this Church; God has likewise placed Brigham Young at the head of this Church; . . . We are commanded to give heed to their words in all things, and receive their words as from the mouth of God, in all patience and faith. (Journal of Discourses, vol. 7, pp. 374-375)

Wilford Woodruff, who later became President of the Church, stated:

Now, whatever I might have obtained in the shape of learning, by searching and study respecting the arts and sciences of men—whatever principles I may have imbibed during my scientific researches, yet, if the Prophet of God should tell me that a certain principle or theory which I might have learned was not true, I do not care what my ideas might have been, I should consider it my duty, at the suggestion of my file leader, to abandon that principle or theory. (Journal of Discourses, vol. 5, p. 83)

Joseph Smith himself once said:

God made Aaron to be the mouthpiece for the children of Israel, and He will make me to be God to you in His stead, and the Elders to be mouth for me; and if you don't like it, you must lump it. (Teachings of the Prophet Joseph Smith, by Joseph Fielding Smith, p. 363; also found in the History of the Church, vol. 6, pp. 319-320)

No Revelation

Although the Mormon Church claims to be led by revelation, Joseph F. Smith, the sixth President of the Mormon Church, testified as follows in the Reed Smoot Investigation:

Senator Dubois.—Have you received any revelations from God, which has been submitted by you and the apostles to the body of the church in their semiannual conference, which revelation has been sustained by that conference, through the upholding of their hands?

Mr. Smith.—Since when?

Senator Dubois.—Since you became President of the Church.

Mr. Smith.—No, sir; none whatever.

Senator Dubois.—Have you received any individual revelations yourself, since you became President of the church under your own definition, even, of a revelation?

Mr. Smith.—I cannot say that I have.

Senator Dubois.—Can you say that you have not?

Mr. Smith.—No; I cannot say that I have not.

Senator Dubois.—Then you do not know whether you have received any such revelation as you have described or whether you have not?

Mr. Smith.—Well, I can say this: That if I live as I should in the line of my duties, I am susceptible, I think, of the impressions of the Spirit of the Lord upon my mind at any time, just as any good Methodist or any other good church member might be. And so far as that is concerned, I say yes; I have had impressions of the Spirit upon my mind very frequently, but they are not in the sense of revelations. (Reed Smoot Case, vol. 1, pp. 483-484)

On page 99 of the same volume Joseph F. Smith stated: “I have never pretended to nor do I profess to have received revelations.” From this it is plain to see that just because a man is ordained a “Prophet, Seer, and Revelator,” it does not necessarily mean that he is. If Joseph F. Smith was only as susceptible to the impressions of the Spirit of the Lord as “any good Methodist,” then why should his word be trusted above that of a good Methodist?

Although the Mormon Church is supposed to be led by revelation, the evidence of this revelation is very hard to find. The Manifesto of 1890 is the last revelation, if it can be termed a revelation, that has been added to the Doctrine and Covenants. So we see that the last revelation that was added to the Doctrine and Covenants is eighty years old. Bruce R. McConkie, of the First Council of Seventy, admits that there is not much written revelation in the church today, but he still maintains that the church leaders are receiving “daily revelation”:

It is true that not many revelations containing doctrinal principles are now being written, because all we are as yet capable and worthy to receive has already been written. But the Spirit is giving direct and daily revelation to the presiding Brethren in the administration of the affairs of the Church. . . .

President Wilford Woodruff said:

Where are the revelations of President Young? Do you find them on record? Only a few; but the Holy Ghost and the revelations of God were with Brigham Young . . . There was no necessity particularly for Brigham Young to give written revelation, only in a few instances. So with John Taylor. So with Wilford Woodruff. And so in a great measure probably with all who may follow us, until the coming of the Son of Man. . . . (Discourses of Wilford Woodruff, pp. 55-56.)

The presence of revelation in the Church is positive proof that it is the kingdom of God on earth. (Mormon Doctrine, Salt Lake City, 1966, p. 650)

The Reorganized LDS Church has continued to add new revelations to their Doctrine and Covenants, but the Utah Mormon Church has not added a new revelation since they added the Manifesto of 1890. It is interesting to note that during the last century, when new revelations were being added to the Doctrine and Covenants, the Mormon leaders were condemning the Catholics for not adding new revelations to their “sacred canon.” The Mormon Apostle Orson Pratt stated:

That the Romanists have continued in their apostacy until the present day is demonstrated from the fact that they have not added one single book to their canon since they first formed it. Now, if there had been any prophet or apostle among them, during the last seventeen centuries, they certainly would have canonized his epistles, revelations, and prophecies, as being equally sacred with those of the first century. As they have not done this, it shows most clearly, that even they, themselves, do not consider that they have had apostles, prophets, and revelators among them, during that long period of time. . . . in no single instance have they confirmed any other books as the word of God, so that their canon stands now as when the council of Carthage left it, without an addition of one revelation. . . . Upwards of 250 Popes pretend to have successively filled the chair of St. Peter. All these Popes, we are told, have possessed the same authority and power as St. Peter, whom they designate as the first Pope; if this really be the case, then each of these Popes must have been inspired of God, and the writings of each must be equally as sacred as the writings of Pope St. Peter. Why then has the church showed such great partiality? Why has she placed Pope St. Peter's writings in the sacred canon, and left all the writings of the other Popes out?

26.—Bishop Milner . . . says, “That bishops in general succeed to the rank and functions of the apostles; . . .” If this be true, . . . then each bishop, as well as the Pope, must be a revelator; for apostles were Revelators, and one of the “functions” of their office was to receive revelations; . . . According to this, since the first century, the Catholics must have had many tens of thousands of revelators, and yet, strange to say, none of their revelations are permitted to enter the sacred canon . . . Here, indeed, is a strange inconsistency! Even the Catholic church herself, evidently places no confidence in the popes and bishops, the pretended successors of St. Peter and the rest of the apostles; if she did, she would have canonized their revelations along with the rest of the revelations of the New Testament. What must we conclude then, as to her bishops holding “the rank and functions of apostles?” We can but conclude that it is all an imposition—a wicked soul-destroying imposition, practiced upon the nations by a corrupt apostate church . . . Well might the revelator John, . . . call her “the mother of harlots and abominations of the earth!” (Orson Pratt's Works, “The Bible Alone An Insufficient Guide,” pp. 38-39)

The very words used by Orson Pratt concerning the Catholics could now be applied to the Mormon Church, for “if there had been any prophet or apostle among them,” during the past eighty years, “they certainly would have canonized his epistles, revelations, and prophecies, . . .” The church “evidently places no confidence” in the last six Presidents; “if she did, she would have canonized their revelations along with the rest of the revelations” in the Doctrine and Covenants.

We are told that revelation is found in the conferences of the church when the leaders of the church speak under the inspiration of the Lord, but how can we know when they are speaking under the Spirit of the Lord? Obviously, much of what has been said at the conferences of the church down through the years was not spoken under the inspiration of the Lord. If a leader of the church were to stand up in conference today and say the same things that Brigham Young said, he would stand the chance of being excommunicated from the church; yet it was Brigham Young himself who stated: “I have never yet preached a sermon and sent it out to the children of men, that they may not call scripture” (Journal of Discourses, vol. 13, p. 95).

In a letter to Morris L. Reynolds, dated May 16, 1966, the Mormon Apostle LeGrand Richards made the following statement:

Your next question: “Can the Journal of Discourses be used as doctrine if the man speaking says, “Thus saith the Lord?”

I cannot answer that question because I don’t know what part of the Journal of Discourses you have in mind. I would have to know just what you were referring to.

The search for revelation, that is, present-day revelation, in Mormonism is really in vain. As we have pointed out, no new revelations have been added to the Doctrine and Covenants. The last revelation added is 80 years old. The sermons given in conference may be considered as scripture today, but 50 years from now they may be rejected as many of Brigham Young’s sermons are today.

Even though the leaders of the church are supposed to be led by revelation, it is evident that they are not always in harmony as to which doctrines are from the Lord. Brigham Young once stated that there were Apostles in the Mormon Church who taught that there was no personage called God, that Jesus was not the Savior and that the spirits of some who lived formerly have been reincarnated:

. . . and yet right here in the Quorum of the Twelve, if you ask one of its members what he believes with regard to Deity, he will tell you that he believes in those great and holy principles which seem to be exhibited to man for his perfection and enjoyment in time and in eternity. But do you believe in the existence of a personage called God? “No, I do not,” says this Apostle. So you see there are schisms in our day. . . .

We have another one in the Quorum of the Twelve who believes that infants actually have the spirits of some who have formerly lived on the earth, and that this is their resurrection. . . . This is not all, we have another one of these Apostles, right in the Quorum of the Twelve, who, I understand, for fifteen years, has been preaching on the sly in the chimney corner to the brethren and sisters with whom he has had influence, that the Savior was nothing more than a good man, and that his death had nothing to do with your salvation or mine. (Journal of Discourses, vol. 12, p. 66)

It has been admitted that even Joseph Smith did not always speak under the inspiration of the Lord. He once stated that children would not grow after the resurrection:

But as the child dies, so shall it rise from the dead. . . . It will never grow: it will still be the child, in the same precise form as it appeared before it died. . . . Children dwell in the mansions of glory and exercise power, but appear in the same form as when on earth. Eternity is full of thrones, upon which dwell thousands of children reigning on thrones of glory, with not one cubit added to their stature. (A Discourse, by Joseph Smith, delivered at the Conference held near the Temple, Nauvoo, April 6, 1844, reported in Journal of Discourses, vol. 6, p. 10)

The Mormon Apostle Orson Pratt suggested that Joseph Smith had not been instructed by revelation when he spoke on this subject:

There is a sermon of the Prophet Joseph Smith, reported by long-hand reporters, in which it is stated that resurrected infants will for ever remain infants. But I doubt very much in my own mind, if those who reported that sermon got the full idea on this subject; and if they did, I very much doubt whether the prophet Joseph, at the time he preached that sermon, had been fully instructed by revelation on that point. . . . So in regard to the resurrection, there may have been many things revealed to him that were true, and others upon which, without having revelation, he would draw his own conclusions, until it should please the Lord to give further revelation. (Journal of Discourses, vol. 16, p. 335)

In a lecture read in the Logan Temple on June 2, 1888, Joseph E. Taylor disagreed with the Apostle Orson Pratt. After quoting Joseph Smith’s statement that children will never grow in heaven, he stated:

These sentiments have never to my knowledge been flatly contradicted; but they have been most severely criticised at times in private circles. To all the criticisms that I have heard I have one reply to make, which is, that if ever Joseph was inspired by God, he certainly was at that time. . . .

A few minutes previous to his speaking upon the condition of children after the resurrection he said concerning Brother Follett: “I am authorized to say by the authority of the Holy Ghost that you have no occasion to fear, for he is gone to the Home of the just, etc.” Did Joseph at this particular moment have the Holy Ghost; and the next moment lose it, insomuch that his next utterance was an error? I dare not assume such a position . . .

Four brethren reported this sermon. . . . In comparing notes so serious, an error—had it been one—would certainly have been discovered. . . . several persons who were present on that occasion have testified to me that Joseph did utter the sentiment I have quoted upon that particular occasion; and I am certainly not in the wrong in endeavoring to sustain God’s prophet. (Deseret Weekly News, December 29, 1888, p. 25)

Joseph Fielding Smith, President of the LDS Church, seems to reject Joseph Smith’s teaching with regard to this matter. He stated:

When a child is raised in the resurrection, the spirit will enter the body and the body will be the same size as it was when the child died. It will then grow after the resurrection to full maturity to conform to the size of the spirit. (Doctrines of Salvation, vol. 2, p. 56)

Thus we see that even the Mormons have a hard time determining when Joseph Smith was speaking as a mere man and when he was speaking as a Prophet of the Lord.

During the past few years the Mormon leaders have been faced with some serious problems. Their response to these problems plainly shows that they are not led by revelation. Some of these problems appear to be complicated by the fact that some of the Mormon leaders are very old. Wallace Turner made these statements:

In 1966, I attended the April conference . . . President David O. McKay was then greatly enfeebled by age and a stroke. He sat in the top row of the tiers of seats for the General Authorities while his first counselor, Hugh B. Brown, spoke, explaining that President McKay was “presiding” while Brown was “conducting” the meeting. Then the ninety-two-year-old man slowly moved two or three steps to the rostrum, so aged and frail that one’s anxiety was increased lest he fall. He spoke slowly and indistinctly and with great effort. Since his stroke at age ninety his once-powerful voice had faded. But he was still handsome and straight as he stood erect at the rostrum. . . . (The Mormon Establishment, 1966, pp. 52-53)

David O. McKay lived to be 96 years old, but he was in very poor health toward the end of his life and was hardly in any condition to function as Prophet, Seer and Revelator for the church.

Instead of appointing a younger man to lead the church after McKay’s death, they chose Joseph Fielding Smith who will be 96 years old on July 19, 1972. He is the son of Joseph F. Smith—the man who testified that although he was Prophet, Seer and Revelator of the church, he had never received a revelation.

Still No New Revelation

As we have already shown in the updated material for chapter 3, on April 3, 1976, the Church Section of the Deseret News reported:

Two revelations received by former Presidents of the Church, were accepted as scripture Saturday afternoon, April 3, by vote of Church membership. . . .

The new scriptures, which will be arranged in verses as part of the Pearl of Great Price, include the account of the Prophet Joseph Smith's vision of the Celestial Kingdom received Jan. 21, 1836. . . .

This was certainly a surprising move for the Mormon leaders to make, and it is difficult to resist the idea that they decided to canonize the “new” revelations to offset the criticism found in this book. It is especially interesting to note that they would chose a revelation given to Joseph F. Smith. This purported revelation was given less than two months before Joseph F. Smith's death in 1918 at a time when he “was very ill.” He had served as “Prophet, Seer and Revelator” for some seventeen years before receiving this revelation. The reader will remember that Joseph F. Smith had previously admitted he had served as “Prophet, Seer and Revelator” for some time without receiving any revelation: “I have never pretended to nor do I profess to have received revelations.”

The other revelation which the Mormons canonized was given to Joseph Smith on January 21, 1836. As we have shown in the updated material for chapter 3, this revelation was falsified when printed by the church to avoid a major contradiction.

In our book, The Changing World of Mormonism, page 435, we criticised the Mormon authorities for adding the “new” revelations to the Pearl of Great Price instead of the Doctrine and Covenants:

Joseph F. Smith once stated that any new revelations would be added to the Doctrine and Covenants, but Mormon leaders have decided that these two revelations should be added to the Pearl of Great Price instead. (Deseret News, Church Section, April 3, 1976)

President Smith's statement appears as follows in The Reed Smoot Case, vol. 1, page 489:

. . . if the Lord should reveal His mind to His people and it should be accepted by His people in the way that He has appointed, it would then become a matter to be added to the Book of Doctrine and Covenants.

The Mormon leaders now seem to realize that they made a mistake when they added the revelations into the Pearl of Great Price. The Church Section of the Deseret News for June 2, 1979, reported that these revelations will be transferred to the Doctrine and Covenants:

Joseph Smith's Vision of the Celestial Kingdom and Joseph F. Smith's Vision of the Redemption of the Dead have been transferred from the Pearl of Great Price to become Sections 137 and 138, respectively, in the Doctrine and Covenants. . . .

The decision to place these revelations in the Doctrine and Covenants has been made by the First Presidency and the Council of the Twelve.

The fumbling around with these “new” revelations only tends to emphasize that the Mormon Church is led by fallible men rather than by direct revelation from God.

Even though the leaders of the Mormon Church have decided to make these additions to the Doctrine and Covenants, our criticism that the church does not fulfill its claim to present-day revelation still stands. To begin with, the revelations which are to appear as Sections 137 and 138 of the Doctrine and Covenants can hardly be considered as “new” revelations. The one given to Joseph F. Smith is sixty-three years old, and the revelation given to the Prophet Joseph Smith is 145 years old.

Besides adding these old revelations by Joseph Smith and Joseph F. Smith to the Doctrine and Covenants, the Mormon leaders decided to go a step further; the Church Section of the Deseret News for June 2, 1979, reported:

The statement of the First Presidency telling of the revelation extending the priesthood to “all worthy male members of the Church” released June 9, 1978, will also be added to the Doctrine and Covenants.

Although we will deal more extensively with this purported revelation in the updated material for chapter 21, we will make a few comments here. To begin with, the announcement that the First Presidency's statements is to be added to the Doctrine and Covenants is apparently another attempt to offset criticism that the church does not have any present-day revelation. As in the case of the other two revelations, the fact that this statement is to be added to the Doctrine and Covenants fails to show the church is led by revelation. The June 1978 declaration on blacks is not a revelation, but only a statement that a revelation has been received. Furthermore, President Kimball himself made a statement that gives the impression that it was only a feeling or assurance that he received. The reader will remember that President Joseph F. Smith admitted that “any good Methodist or any other church member” is susceptible to “impressions of the Spirit of the Lord.” Now, if the Mormon leaders really believe they are led by revelation, why don't they canonize a revelation by the current President which begins with the words, “Thus Saith the Lord your God . . .”

That the General Authorities do not give the declaration on blacks the same status as the “visions” of Joseph Smith and Joseph F. Smith is obvious from the fact that they are not going to give it a section number in the new Doctrine and Covenants. The church's magazine, The Ensign, for August 1979, page 75, explained:

. . . yet-to-be printed copies of the Doctrine and Covenants will contain three new additions. . . .

The two visions to be transferred from the Pearl of Great Price to the Doctrine and Covenants are Joseph Smith's Vision of the Celestial Kingdom and Joseph F. Smith's Vision of the Redemption of the Dead. These two additions will become sections 137 and 138 in the Doctrine and Covenants. . . .

The third addition . . . will be the proclamation of 9 June 1978 . . . Declaration—I will be the title of the announcements discontinuing plural marriage that are already part of the Doctrine and Covenants.

The church has now had twelve Prophets. Excluding the Manifesto and the statement on blacks, only three of these Presidents received revelations which were added to the “four standard works.” None of the last six presidents have given revelations that have been canonized.

Old Age Continues to Plague Mormon Leadership

On page 185 of this book we pointed out that some of the church's problems appear to be complicated by the fact that some of the Mormon leaders are very old. We mentioned that President David O. McKay lived to be ninety-six years old and that Joseph Fielding Smith succeeded McKay. Since the publication of this book, President Smith passed away. Smith lived to be ninety-five, and the leadership of the church passed to Harold B. Lee who was seventy-three years old. Lee lived less than two years and Spencer W. Kimball became president. President Kimball became eighty-six years old on March 28, 1981. The way the Mormon hierarchy is structured there seems to be little hope of a younger leader, and apparently less hope for any new revelation. The claim of being led by a “living Prophet” has for a long time appeared to be just an idle boast.

Living Prophets or Standard Works?

Although most people do not realize it, there is a great conflict among Mormons over the importance of the four standard works. Joseph Fielding Smith, the tenth President of the Church, was adamant in proclaiming that the standard works should be the final authority for settling doctrinal controversies. In a letter to Morris L. Reynolds, dated May 9, 1966, Smith wrote:

In the study of the Gospel of Jesus Christ, kindly confine your study to the Standard Works of the Church. They are The Bible, The Book of Mormon, The Pearl of Great Price and The Doctrine and Covenants . . . leave individual discourses alone and the statements of individuals . . . Keep both of your feet on the solid ground. By that I mean keep within the teachings of the Standard Works . . . then you will not be led astray.

Ezra Taft Benson, President of the Council of the Twelve and next in line to lead the church, has taken an entirely different stand. He dogmatically asserts that the “Living Prophet” is more important than the scriptures—i.e., the four standard works—and that the most important reading material is found in the current church magazines and the Deseret News. On February 26, 1980, President Benson made these comments at Brigham Young University:

Soon we will be honoring our Prophet on his 85th birthday. As a Church we sing the song, “We Thank Thee, Oh God, For A Prophet.” Here then is the grand key—Follow the Prophet—and here now are Fourteen Fundamentals In Following the Prophet, the President of the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints.

FIRST: The Prophet is the Only Man Who Speaks For The Lord in Everything. . . .

SECOND: The Living Prophet is More Vital to Us Than The Standard Works. . . .

THIRD: The Living Prophet is More Important to Us Than a Dead Prophet....the most important prophet so far as you and I are concerned is the one living in our day and age to whom the Lord is currently revealing His will for us. Therefore the most important reading we can do is in any of the words of the Prophet contained each week in the Church Section of the Deseret News, and any words of the Prophet contained each month in our Church magazines. Our marching orders for each six months are found in the General Conference addresses which are printed in the Ensign magazine. . . .

Beware of those who would pit the dead prophets against the living prophets, for the living prophets always take precedence. (“Fourteen Fundamentals In Following The Prophets,” by President Ezra Taft Benson, BYU Devotional Assembly, February 26, 1980, pp. 1-5)

The Apostle Bruce R. McConkie’s opinion of the value of the four standard works appears to be diametrically opposed to Benson’s view:

The Standard Works are scripture. They are binding upon us. They are the mind and will and voice of the Lord. He never has, he does not now, and he never will reveal anything which is contrary to what is in them. No person, speaking by the spirit of inspiration, will ever teach doctrine that is out of harmony with the truths God has already revealed.

These words of President Joseph Fielding Smith should guide all of us in our gospel study:

It makes no difference what is written or what anyone has said, if what has been said is in conflict with what the Lord has revealed, we can set it aside. My words and the teachings of any other member of the Church, high or low, if they do not square with the revelations, we need not accept them. Let us have this matter clear. We have accepted the four standard works as the measuring yardsticks, or balances by which we measure every man’s doctrine.

You cannot accept the books written by the authorities of the Church as standards of doctrine, only in so far as they accord with the revealed word in the standard works.

Every man who writes is responsible, not the Church, for what he writes. If Joseph Fielding Smith writes something which is out of harmony with the revelations, then every member of the Church is duty bound to reject it. If he writes that which is in perfect harmony with the revealed word of the Lord, then it should be accepted.

(A letter to “Honest Truth Seekers,” by Apostle Bruce R. McConkie, 1980, pp. 2-3)

It would appear that the views of Apostles McConkie and Benson are irreconcilable.

13. False Prophecy

Mormon writers state that Joseph Smith's claim to be a prophet is established by the fulfillment of his prophecies. Actually, the evidence seems to prove just the opposite.

The Canadian Revelation

David Whitmer, one of the three witnesses to the Book of Mormon, tells of a false revelation that Joseph Smith gave when the Book of Mormon was in the hands of the printer:

In June 1829, the translation of the Book of Mormon was finished. God gave it to us as his Holy Word, and left us to work out our own salvation and set in order the Church of Christ . . .

When the Book of Mormon was in the hands of the printer, more money was needed to finish the printing of it. We were waiting on Martin Harris who was doing his best to sell a part of his farm, in order to raise the necessary funds. After a time Hyrum Smith and others began to get impatient, thinking that Martin Harris was too slow and under transgression for not selling his land at once, even if at a great sacrifice. Brother Hyrum thought they should not wait any longer on Martin Harris, and that the money should be raised in some other way. Brother Hyrum was vexed with Brother Martin, and thought they should get the money by some means outside of him, and not let him have anything to do with the publication of the Book, or receiving any of the profits thereof . . . He was wrong in thus judging Bro. Martin, because he was doing all he could toward selling his land. Brother Hyrum said it had been suggested to him that some of the brethren might go to Toronto Canada, and sell the copy-right of the Book of Mormon for considerable money: and he persuaded Joseph to inquire of the Lord about it. Joseph concluded to do so. He had not yet given up the stone. Joseph looked into the hat in which he placed the stone, and received a revelation that some of the brethren should go to Toronto, Canada, and that they would sell the copy-right to the Book of Mormon. Hiram Page and Oliver Cowdery went to Toronto on this mission, but they failed entirely to sell the copy-right, returning without any money. Joseph was at my father's house when they returned. I was there also, and am an eye witness to these facts. Jacob Whitmer and John Whitmer were also present when Hiram Page and Oliver Cowdery returned from Canada. Well, we were all in great trouble; and we asked Joseph how it was that he had received a revelation from the Lord for some brethren to go to Toronto and sell the copy-right, and the brethren had utterly failed in their undertaking. Joseph did not know how it was, so he enquired of the Lord about it, and behold the following revelation came through the stone: "Some revelations are of God: some revelations are of man: and some revelations are of the devil." So we see that the revelation to go to Toronto and sell the copy-right was not of God, but was of the devil or the heart of man. (An Address To All Believers In Christ, Richmond, Missouri, 1887, pp. 30-31)

Joseph Fielding Smith, who recently became President of the Church, was apparently referring to this episode in a press conference in Salt Lake City: "President Smith said he believed, as did LDS Church founder Joseph Smith, that there are three kinds of revelations [sic]: 'revelations from God, from man and from the devil'" (Salt Lake Tribune, January 25, 1970).

The Mormon historian B. H. Roberts made these comments concerning this matter:

. . . our knowledge of the "Toronto Journey Incident" rests chiefly upon the testimony of David Whitmer, and the possibility is suggested of his misapprehending some detail of the matter, which might, if accurately known, put the incident in an entirely new light. That, however, is but conjecture; and while the possibility and even probability of misapprehension by Whitmer is great, still the incident must be considered as it is presented by him, since his testimony may not be set aside.

In that view of the case we have here an alleged revelation received by the Prophet, through the "Seer Stone," directing or allowing men to go on a mission to Canada, which fails of its purpose; namely, the sale of the copyright of the Book of Mormon in Canada. Then in explanation of the failure of that revelation, the Prophet's announcement that all revelations are not of God; some are of men and some even from evil sources. The question presented by this state of facts is: May this Toronto incident and the Prophet's explanation be accepted and faith still be maintained in him as an inspired man, a Prophet of God? I answer unhesitatingly in the affirmative. The revelation respecting the Toronto journey was not of God, surely; else it would not have failed; but the Prophet, overwrought in his deep anxiety for the progress of the work, saw reflected in the "Seer Stone" his own thought, or that suggested to him by his brother Hyrum, rather than the thought of God. . . . in this instance of the Toronto journey, Joseph was evidently not directed by the inspiration of the Lord. (A Comprehensive History of the Church, vol. 1, pp. 164-165)

In his book, Mormon Portraits, Dr. Wyl prints a letter from "Mr. Traugher." We take the following statements from this letter:

Early in 1830, . . . Joe delivered a whooping big revelation directing Oliver Cowdery and Hiram Page to go over into Kingston, Canada, and sell a copyright under that Dominion, and thus get money to pay the printer and let Martin go—be independent of him . . . the boys . . . came back nearly starved, completely wearied, with no money nor copyright sold either. In 1831, when Joe and Sidney were talking about having the revelations published, David Whitmer got up in the council and said all he could against the measure. But Joe raved and declared that the Revelations should be published. David said, "Brother Joseph, are you going to publish all of them?" Joe replied, "yes, all, in the order of their dates." Then David asked, "are you going to publish that revelation for Oliver and Hiram to go to Kingston and get out a copyright for the Book of Mormon?" Joe hung his head a while, then answered, "No." "Why not, Brother Joseph?" asked honest David. "Because," replied Joe, "It was not true." I have this from both

Dr. W. E. McLellan [apostle and apostate] and David Whitmer, both of whom have read the revelation. (Mormon Portraits, 1886, p. 311)

David Whitmer states that there were other revelations given by Joseph Smith which were not printed:

I will say here, that I could tell you other false revelations that came through Brother Joseph as mouthpiece, (not through the stone) but this will suffice. Many of Brother Joseph's revelations were never printed. The revelation to go to Canada was written down on paper, but was never printed. (An Address To All Believers In Christ, p. 31)

Brigham Young confirmed the fact that some of Joseph Smith's revelations were not published:

Brother Hyde spoke of a revelation which he tried to find in the Book of Doctrine and Covenants. That revelation was reserved at the time the compilation for that book was made by Oliver Cowdery and others, in Kirtland. It was not wisdom to publish it to the world, and it remained in the private escritoire. Brother Joseph had that revelation concerning this nation at a time when the brethren were reflecting and reasoning with regard to African slavery on this continent, and the slavery of the children of men throughout the world. There are other revelations, besides this one, not yet published to the world. (Journal of Discourses, vol. 8, p. 58)

Joseph Fielding Smith admits that some of the revelations are still withheld from the world:

Not all the revelations given to Joseph the Seer were place in the Doctrine and Covenants in his day; . . . Some of them were for the Church and not for the world, and therefore are given only to the saints. (Doctrines of Salvation, vol. 1, p. 280)

It would certainly be interesting to see the revelations that are withheld from the "world," but this is next to impossible. The Mormon Church leaders complain that the Catholics withheld the scriptures from the common people, and yet they keep some of Joseph Smith's revelations hid from their own people.

The Lord's Coming

In 1835 Joseph Smith prophesied that the coming of the Lord was near and that 56 years should wind up the scene. In the History of the Church, vol. 2, page 182, we read:

President Smith then stated . . . it was the will of God that those who went to Zion, with a determination to lay down their lives, if necessary, should be ordained to the ministry, and go forth to prune the vineyard for the last time, or the coming of the Lord, which was nigh—even fifty-six years should wind up the scene.

Klaus J. Hansen gives this interesting information concerning this matter:

. . . in 1890 there was a widespread belief among church members that Joseph Smith's prediction of 1835, that fifty-six years would "wind up the scene," would be fulfilled. But such enthusiasm was shortlived. In 1903, Patriarch Benjamin F. Johnson, . . . could not conceal his disappointment when he remarked that "we were over seventy years ago taught by our leaders to believe that the coming of Christ and the millennial reign was much nearer than we believe it to be now." (Dialogue: A Journal of Mormon Thought, Autumn 1966, p. 76)

Oliver Boardman Huntington felt that the Lord might return in 1881 instead of 1891:

The Lord had said in one of the revelations to Joseph Smith that there should, out of them that were driven from Jackson Co. Missouri, "a few remain to receive their inheritances" there again. I frequently heard them counted, that were of that number, and only 12 or 14 did I hear of left, and felt sure that the time was not very far off when Zion would be redeemed. The signs of the times made the hearts of them that were looking for Christ is coming rejoice with an assurance that it was not far off even to the natural view of time with man.

On the 14th of Feb. 1835, Joseph Smith uaid [said?] that God had revealed to him that the coming of Christ would be within 56 years, which being added to 1835 shows that before 1891 and the 14th of Feb. the Savior of the world would make his appearance again upon the earth and the winding up scene take place. In connection with this event, was related by my brother Dimick Huntington, the fact that when Joseph and Hyrum Smith submitted in their feelings to consent to give themselves up to the state mob at Nauvoo Illinois, after they had passed the Mississippi River. Joseph said "if they shed my blood it shall shorten this work 10 years." That taken from 1891 would reduce the time to 1881 which if the true time within which the Savior should come much must be crowded into 6 years. (Journal of Oliver Boardman Huntington, vol. 2, pp. 128-129)

On October 14, 1886, Abraham H. Cannon recorded the following in his journal:

Thursday, Oct. 14th: —The following are words spoken by Apostel Moses Thatcher, at Lewiston, . . . our entire trust will be in the Lord, then shall that man like unto Moses be raised up, and shall lead us out of bondage back to Jackson county in the state of Missouri. There will be no hesitation; everything will be decisive and prompt. The mountains shall tremble before him and if there be a tree or anything else in the way of their progress, it shall be plucked up by the Power of God. Then is the time the Scriptures will be fulfilled that says: "One shall chase a thousand and two shall put ten thousand to flight."

It is my belief, that the time of our deliverance will be within five years; the time indicated being February 14th, 1891. (See Mill. Star, Vol. XV, Page 205). And that the man raised up will be no other than the Prophet Joseph Smith in his resurrected body . . . no other man can perform this mission but the Prophet Joseph Smith. . . . I do not say all the people of the nation will be destroyed within the time mentioned, but I do say that in consequence of the wickedness and corruption of the officers of the nation, the government will pass into the hands of the Saints, and that within five years. There will not be a city in the Union that will not be in danger of disruption by the Knights of Labor, who are becoming a formidable power in the land. You people in quiet Lewiston need not be surprised if within the next four years the rails are torn up from Ogden to the Missouri River and to San Francisco and into Montana in the North, leaving us as isolated as we were when we first came to this Territory. There is a power to do this, and a disposition to—meaning the Knights of Labor.

(A servant of God, holding the power and keys of the holy apostleship does not speak in this manner for mere pastime. There is more in these utterances than we are apt to attach to them, unless we are aided by the Spirit of God.) ("Daily Journal of Abraham H. Cannon," October 14, 1886)

As the year 1891 drew near the Mormon people seemed to lose confidence in Joseph Smith's prophecy. On February 16, 1890, the Apostle Cannon recorded the following in his journal:

In the evening Ward meeting Bro. Palmer occupied the time in a good discourse on the coming of the Savior. He believes He will come twice in this dispensation—once to his temple in 1891 when He will clothe his servants with power to go among the House of Israel with the gospel, and leave the Gentiles in their iniquity, and the second time at some later day when he will place his foot on Mt. Olivet . . . At this latter time His glory and power will be manifested in the eyes of all men, but at His first coming perhaps very few will be aware of it. (Ibid., February 16, 1890)

The Mormon writer Max H. Parkin gives this information concerning the early Mormons:

During the visit of the missionaries in the Reserve, the Ohio Star stated that while they were preaching in the Methodist Chapel in Painesville they "predicted the end of the world in 15 years." According to an article appearing in the Painesville Telegraph, when Martin Harris arrived in Kirtland March 12, 1831, he immediately proceeded to the barroom of the hotel and enthusiastically prophesied to the patrons that “all who believed the new bible would see Christ within fifteen years, and all who did not would absolutely be destroyed and dam’d.” . . . In June, 1831, Levi Hancock reported,

Joseph Smith began to speak, he said, “that the kingdom that Christ spoke of . . . would some day come. . . . Some of you shall live to see it come with glory.”

To what extent these early members taught and believed in the imminence of the end of the world may not clearly be established; however, there was at least one case where an afflicted Saint refused to call a physician because of his belief that he would never die. (Conflict at Kirtland, Salt Lake City, 1966, pp. 53-55)

Under the date of January 23, 1833, Joseph Smith recorded the following in his History of the Church, vol. 1, page 323:

Among the number, my father presented himself, but before I washed his feet, I asked of him a father’s blessing, which he granted by laying his hands upon my head, in the name of Jesus Christ, and declaring that I should continue in the Priest’s office until Christ comes.

As we have already shown in the chapter on Priesthood, John Whitmer states that at the time the High Priesthood was introduced into the church the following occurred:

The Spirit of the Lord fell upon Joseph in an unusual manner, and he prophesied that John the Revelator was then among the Ten Tribes of Israel. . . . After he had prophesied he laid his hands upon Lyman Wight and ordained him. . . . And the Spirit fell upon Lyman, and he prophesied concerning the coming of Christ. He said that there were some in the congregation that should live until the Savior should descend from heaven with a shout, with all the holy angels with Him. (John Whitmer’s History, chapter 5; also found in History of the Church, vol. 1, p. 176)

When the Twelve Apostles were first ordained in the Mormon Church some of them received the promise that they would live until Christ came. The following appeared in the blessing of Apostle Lyman E. Johnson:

The blessing of Lyman E. Johnson was, . . . that holy angels shall administer to him occasionally; . . . and that he shall live until the gathering is accomplished, . . . and he shall see the Savior come and stand upon the earth with power and great glory. (History of the Church, vol. 2, p. 188)

The following appeared in Heber C. Kimball’s blessing:

Heber C. Kimball’s blessing was, . . . that many millions may be converted by his instrumentality; that angels may waft him from place to place, and that he may stand unto the coming of our Lord, . . . (History of the Church, vol. 2, p. 189)

William Smith’s blessing stated: “He shall be preserved and remain on the earth, until Christ shall come to take vengeance on the wicked” (History of the Church, vol. 2, p. 191).

The Apostle Orson Hyde’s blessing originally stated that “he shall stand on earth” till the coming of Christ; however, when this was reprinted in the History of the Church it was changed to “he may stand on earth.” In the Millennial Star, vol. 15, page 206, this read as follows:

. . . he shall stand on the earth and bring souls till Christ comes . . . he shall have power to smite the earth with pestilence; to divide waters, and lead through the Saints; he shall go from land to land, and from sea to sea; he shall be like one of the three Nephites.

When this was reprinted in the History of the Church, vol. 2, page 189, it was changed to read:

. . . he may stand on the earth and bring souls till Christ comes . . . may he have power to smite the earth with pestilence; to divide waters, and lead through the Saints; may he go from land to land and from sea to sea, and may he be like one of the three Nephites.

Of course, none of the Mormon Apostles lived to see the Lord come, and Joseph Smith’s statement that “fifty-six years should wind up the scene” did not come to pass. Writing in 1838, the Mormon Apostle Parley P. Pratt prophesied that in 50 years there would not be an unbelieving Gentile on this continent, and if the inhabitants were not greatly scourged within 5 or 10 years the Book of Mormon would be proven untrue. His statement appears as follows in the tract, Mormonism Unveiled—Truth Vindicated:

Now, Mr. Sunderland, you have something definite and tangible, the time, the manner, the means, the names, the dates; and I will state as a prophesy, that there will not be an unbelieving Gentile upon this continent 50 years hence; and if they are not greatly scourged, and in a great measure overthrown, within five or ten years from this date, then the Book of Mormon will have proved itself false. (Mormonism Unveiled—Truth Vindicated, by Parley P. Pratt, p. 15; copied from a microfilm of the original tract at the Mormon Church Historian’s Library)

When Parker Pratt Robinson reprinted the tract Mormonism Unveiled in the book, Writings of Parley P. Pratt, he was apparently embarrassed by Parley P. Pratt’s unfulfilled prophecy. He reprinted the statement “Now, Mr. Sunderland, you have something definite and tangible, the time, the manner, the means, the names, the dates” but instead of putting a semicolon after the word “dates” (as Parley P. Pratt did), he put a period and deleted the entire prophecy without any indication (see the Writings of Parley Parker Pratt, 1952, p. 205).

A Temple in Zion

In a revelation given by Joseph Smith September 22 and 23, 1832, the following statements appear:

Yea, the word of the Lord concerning his church, established in the last days for the restoration of his people, as he has spoken by the mouth of his prophets, and for the gathering of his saints to stand upon Mount Zion, which shall be the city of New Jerusalem.

Which city shall be built, beginning at the temple lot, which is appointed by the finger of the Lord, in the western boundaries of the State of Missouri, and dedicated by the hand of Joseph Smith, Jun., and others with whom the Lord was well pleased.

Verily this is the word of the Lord, that the city New Jerusalem shall be built by the gathering of the saints, beginning at this place, even the place of the temple, which temple shall be reared in this generation.

For verily this generation shall not all pass away until an house shall be built unto the Lord, and a cloud shall rest upon it, which cloud shall be even the glory of the Lord, which shall fill the house. . . . Therefore, as I said concerning the sons of Moses—for the sons of Moses and also the sons of Aaron shall offer an acceptable offering and sacrifice in the house of the Lord, which house shall be built unto the Lord in this generation, upon the consecrated spot as I have appointed—(Doctrine and Covenants, Sec. 84:2-5 & 31)

Notice that this revelation, given in 1832, plainly states that a temple would be built in the western boundaries of the state of Missouri (that is, in Independence, Missouri) before all of those that were then living passed away. The leaders of the Mormon Church understood this revelation to mean exactly what it said. Although the Mormons were driven from Independence (Jackson County, Missouri), they expected to return and fulfill the prophecy. The Mormon Apostle Orson Pratt stated:

And when the Saints were driven out from Jackson County, almost all in the Church expected that they would speedily be restored; and a person was considered almost an apostate that would say, they would not come back in five years, or ten at the furthest; . . . The people think of almost everything else but the redemption of Zion, and speak to individuals about it, and they put it off a great distance ahead. But I do not feel to go to this extreme. I will give you my opinion; so far as the revelations go, in speaking of this subject, I think that this event is nearer than this people are aware of. (Journal of Discourses, vol. 3, p. 17)

On April 6, 1845, Brigham Young stated: “. . . as the Lord lives we will build up Jackson county in this generation (cries of amen) . . . and we will be far better off with regard to temporal things, . . .” (Times and Seasons, vol. 6, p. 956).

Heber C. Kimball, a member of the First Presidency of the Mormon Church, made the following statements in discourses he gave between 1857 and 1861:

. . . but if you cannot learn to keep the commandments of God in Great Salt Lake City, . . . how do you expect them in Jackson County?—for we are as sure to go back there as we exist. (Journal of Discourses, vol. 5, p. 134)

They are holy places, and they will be held sacred even as Jackson County; . . . Joseph the Prophet dedicated that land, . . . I shall yet see the day that I will go back there, with Brother Brigham and with thousands and millions of others, and we will go precisely according to the dedication of the Prophet of the living God. Talk to me about my having any dubiety on my mind about these things being fulfilled!—I am just as confident of it as I am that I am called to be a saviour of men, and no power can hinder it. (Ibid., vol. 6, p. 190)

Brethren, I shall go to Jackson County with thousands of this people who will be faithful to their integrity; but we cannot go back until we have built some good houses. (Ibid., vol. 8, p. 350)

Elias Smith stated that he expected “to live to be an old man, and to go back with the Saints to the land of Jackson County” (Journal of Discourses, vol. 6, p. 221). On March 10, 1861, the Mormon Apostle George A. Smith stated:

Who is there that is prepared for this move back to the centre stake of Zion, and where the architects amongst us that are qualified to erect this temple and the city that will surround it? . . . And let me remind you that it is predicted that this generation shall not pass away till a temple shall be built, and the glory of the Lord rest upon it, according to the promises. (Journal of Discourses, vol. 9, p. 71)

George Q. Cannon made this statement on October 23, 1864:

The day is near when a Temple shall be reared in the Center Stake of Zion, and the Lord has said his glory shall rest on that House in this generation in which the revelation was given, which is upwards of thirty years ago. (Journal of Discourses, vol. 10, p. 344)

In the 1870’s the Mormon Apostle Orson Pratt still maintained that the temple would be built in his generation. The following statements are taken from his discourses:

We have . . . confidence in returning to Jackson County and the building of a great central city . . . There are many of the old stock, who passed through all those tribulations I have named, still living, whose faith in returning to Jackson county, and the things that are coming, is as firm and fixed as the throne of the Almighty. (Journal of Discourses, vol. 13, p. 138)

. . . God promised in the year 1832 that we should, before the generation then living had passed away, return and build up the City of Zion in Jackson County; that we should return and build up the temple of the Most High where we formerly laid the corner stone . . .

We believe in these promises as much as we believe in any promise ever uttered by the mouth of Jehovah. The Latter-day Saints just as much expect to receive a fulfillment of that promise during the generation that was in existence in 1832 as they expect that the sun will rise and set tomorrow. Why? Because God cannot lie. He will fulfil all His promises. He has spoken, it must come to pass. This is our faith. (Ibid., vol. 13, p. 362)

We just as much expect that a city will be built, called Zion, in the place and on the land which has been appointed by the Lord our God, and that a temple will be reared on the spot that has been selected, and the corner-stone of which has been laid, in the generation when this revelation was given; we just as much expect this as we expect the sun to rise in the morning and set in the evening; or as much as we expect to see the fulfillment of any of the purposes of the Lord our God, pertaining to the works of his hands. But says the objector, “thirty-nine years have passed away.” What of that? The generation has not passed away; all the people that were living thirty-nine years ago have not passed away; but before they do pass away this will be fulfilled. (Ibid., vol. 14, p. 275)

God said, in the year 1832, before we were driven out of Jackson County, in a revelation which you will find here in this book, that before that generation should all pass away, a house of the Lord should be built in that county, . . .

This was given forty-two years ago. The generation then living was not only to commence a house of God in Jackson County, Missouri, but was actually to complete the same, and when it is completed the glory of God should rest upon it.

Now, do you Latter-day Saints believe that? I do, and if you believe in these revelations you just as much expect the fulfillment of the revelation as of any one that God has ever given in these latter times, or in former ages . . . we Latter-day Saints expect to return to Jackson County and to build a Temple there before the generation that was living forty-two years ago has all passed away. Well, then, the time must be pretty near when we shall begin the work. (Ibid., vol. 17, p. 111)

By February 7, 1875, Orson Pratt was teaching that only a few of those who were driven from Jackson County would return to receive their inheritances:

We need not expect, from what God has revealed, that a very great number of those who were then in the Church and who were driven, will have the privilege of returning to that land. . . . There will be some that will live to behold that day, and will return and receive their inheritances, they and their children, grandchildren, and great grandchildren, according to the promise. (Journal of Discourses, vol. 17, pp. 291-292)

Joseph Lee Robinson claimed that Jesus appeared to him and told him that the temple would be built in that generation:

On a Sunday evening, . . . A light, a beautiful light, was present before my eyes.... Then as quick as thought, a very large building was present before my eyes . . . Presently the voice of the Good Shepherd said to me: “This house you see is the temple of the Living God that shall be built in this generation by the hands of the Latter-day Saints, upon the consecrated spot in Jackson County, Missouri.” . . . I know and have testified many times that I know that whatever might befall the Saints, the Temple of the living God will be built by the Saints—the Latter-day Saints—in this generation. (“Diary of Joseph Lee Robinson,” as published in Temples of the Most High, pp. 240-241)

Klaus J. Hansen shows that as late as 1900 Lorenzo Snow, the fifth President of the Church, was still hoping that the prophecy would be fulfilled:

In 1900, Woodruff’s successor, Lorenzo Snow, affirmed at a special priesthood meeting in the Salt Lake Temple that “there are many here now under the sound of my voice, probably a majority, who will live to go back to Jackson County and assist in building that temple.” (Dialogue: A Journal of Mormon Thought, Autumn 1966, p. 74)

In 1923 Hyrum M. Smith and Janne M. Sjordahl still held to the hope that the revelation would be fulfilled. In the book, Temples of the Most High, N. B. Lundwall quotes them as saying the following:

“This generation shall not pass away, etc. This is a promise that some living at the time when it was made, in 1832, would still be on earth in the flesh, when the house of the Lord would begin to lift its spires toward the sky on that consecrated ground. A generation does not pass away in one hundred years, and every generation has a few who live over a hundred year.”—Doctrine and Covenants Commentary, 1923 Edition, by Hyrum M. Smith and Janne M. Sjodahl. (Quoted in Temples of the Most High, p. 234)

The 1890 Edition of the Doctrine and Covenants carried a footnote which read: “a generation does not all pass away in one hundred years” (Doctrine and Covenants, Salt Lake City, 1890 ed., section 84, p. 289). This footnote has been deleted in more recent editions.

As late as 1935 Joseph Fielding Smith, President of the Mormon Church, maintained that the revelation would be fulfilled:

I firmly believe that there will be some of that generation who were living when this revelation was given who shall be living when this temple is reared. And I do not believe that the Lord has bound himself to accomplish the matter within one hundred years from 1832, . . . I have full confidence in the word of the Lord and that it shall not fail. (The Way To Perfection, Salt Lake City, 1935, p. 270)

In a more recent book, however, Joseph Fielding Smith stated: “It is also reasonable to believe that no soul living in 1832, is still living in mortality on the earth” (Answers to Gospel Questions, vol. 4, p. 112). It has now been 140 years since Joseph Smith gave the prophecy that the temple would be built in that generation. Since the Mormons have not even begun work on this temple, it appears that there is no way possible for Joseph Smith’s prophecy to be fulfilled.

The Civil War

On December 25, 1832, Joseph Smith gave his famous revelation concerning the Civil War. It is printed as follows in Section 87 of the Doctrine and Covenants:

1. Verily, thus saith the Lord concerning the wars that will shortly come to pass, beginning at the rebellion of South Carolina, which will eventually terminate in the death and misery of many souls;
2. And the time will come that war will be poured out upon all nations, beginning at this place.
3. For behold, the Southern States shall be divided against the Northern States, and the Southern States will call on other nations, even the nation of Great Britain, as it is called, and they shall also call upon other nations, in order to defend themselves against other nations; and then war shall be poured out upon all nations.
4. And it shall come to pass, after many days, slaves shall rise up against their masters, who shall be marshaled and disciplined for war.
5. And it shall come to pass also that the remnants who are left of the land will marshal themselves, and shall become exceedingly angry, and shall vex the Gentiles with a sore vexation.
6. And thus, with the sword and by bloodshed the inhabitants of the earth shall mourn; and with famine, and plague, and earthquake, and the thunder of heaven, and the fierce and vivid lightning also, shall the inhabitants of the earth be made to feel the wrath, and indignation, and chastening hand of an Almighty God, until the consumption decreed hath made a full end of all nations;
7. That the cry of the saints, and of the blood of the saints, shall cease to come up into the ears of the Lord of Sabaoth, from the earth, to be avenged of their enemies.
8. Wherefore, stand ye in holy places, and be not moved, until the day of the Lord come; for behold, it cometh quickly, saith the Lord, Amen. (Doctrine and Covenants, Section 87)

The Mormon people believe that this revelation proves that Joseph Smith was a prophet. Larry Jonas, on the other hand, shows that Joseph Smith may have received the idea for this revelation from the views of his time:

“On July 14, 1832, Congress passed a tariff act which South Carolina thought was so bad, she declared the tariff null and void. President Andrew Jackson alerted the nation’s troops. At the time

Smith made his prophecy, the nation expected a war between North and South to begin at the rebellion of South Carolina. This can be confirmed in a U.S. history book. Better yet, let me confirm it from a Latter-day Saints Church publications, Evening and Morning Star, published monthly from Kirtland. Example 28 is page 122 of the issue which came out for January 1833. The news of South Carolina’s rebellion was known before January 1833. It was known before December 25, 1832 but it was not available in time for the December issue. It takes quite a while for news to be set up even today in our dailies. We would expect it to wait for a month to come out in a monthly. The example contains the information available to the church before the paper hit the street. The example and the prophecy are strangely similar . . . Both consider the pending war a sign of the end—which it is not. In fact, the war expected in 1832 did not come to pass . . .

Far from being evidences of Smith’s divine calling, the most famous prophecies which he made are evidences that he can copy views of his time. (Mormon Claims Examined, by Larry S. Jonas, p. 52)

One interesting fact that would seem to support the argument that Joseph Smith borrowed from the “views of his time” is that there is another article printed in the January 1833 issue of the original paper, The Evening and the Morning Star, which has the title, “REBELLION IN SOUTH CAROLINA.” Interestingly enough, Joseph Smith’s revelation has the words “beginning at the rebellion in South Carolina” in the first verse. In this article we read as follows:

In addition to the above tribulations, South Carolina has rebelled against the laws of the United States; held a state convention, and passed ordinances, the same as declaring herself an independent nation, . . .

And Gen. Jackson has ordered several companies of Artillery to Charleston, and issued a Proclamation, urging submission and declaring such moves as that of S. Carolina Treason. (The Evening and the Morning Star, vol. 1, no. 8)

Joseph Smith was probably familiar with the fact that South Carolina had rebelled at the time he gave the revelation. Just before the revelation concerning the Civil War is recorded in Joseph Smith’s History, the following statement is attributed to him:

. . . the United States, amid all her pomp and greatness, was threatened with dissolution. The people of South Carolina, in convention assembled (in November), passed ordinances, declaring their state a free and independent nation; . . . (History of the Church, vol. 1, p. 301)

Julius Petrofsky has pointed out an interesting fact with regard to this matter. On December 10, 1832, the Boston Daily Advertiser & Patriot printed “Extracts from the Message of the Governor of South Carolina at the opening of the Legislature, November 27, 1832.” His message warned that South Carolina was prepared to resist the U.S. Government by force if necessary. The same day that this was printed (Dec. 10, 1832), Orson Hyde “left Boston.” On December 22, 1832, he “arrived at Kirtland, Ohio, . . .” (Journal of Orson Hyde, typed copy, pp. 56-57). We cannot, of course, prove that Orson Hyde brought a copy of the Boston Daily Advertiser & Patriot with him, but it is interesting to note that just three days after his arrival (December 25, 1832), Joseph Smith gave his revelation on “the rebellion of South Carolina.”

Thus we see that the statement in Joseph Smith’s revelation that the wars would begin at the rebellion of South Carolina was probably inspired by the fact that South Carolina had already rebelled before the revelation was given. This rebellion did not end in war, but the Civil War did start some years later over trouble in South Carolina.

The fact that Joseph Smith predicted a civil war is not too remarkable. Many people believed there would be a civil war before it actually took place. The December 1840 issue of the Millennial Star quoted an article from the New York Herald. In this article a civil war was predicted:

“We begin to fear that this unhappy country is on the eve of a bloody Civil War, a final dismemberment of the Union . . .” (Millennial Star, vol. 1, p. 216)

The Mormon writer John J. Stewart makes these comments regarding Joseph Smith’s revelation:

Many Mormons, better versed in prophecy than history, have supposed that Joseph made this prediction long before there was any thought of Civil War or any evidence to indicate that it would begin in South Carolina . . . the Prophet himself prefaced the revelation by an account of the South Carolina affair, and the Evening and Morning Star treated it in some detail. (Joseph Smith, The Mormon Prophet, Salt Lake City, 1966, p. 88)

Alice Smith McKay did a great deal of research with regard to Joseph Smith’s revelation concerning the Civil War and came to the conclusion that it was only “the natural result of the stirring conditions of that particular period of history.” In her thesis she made these interesting observations:

In 1831, a French Scholar and publicist, Alexis de Tocqueville, came to the United States. He became interested in the study of the machinery of the government and as a result wrote his famous treatise on “Democracy in America.” He predicted the “inevitable separation” of the North and the South after his study of existing conditions. (“A Psychological Examination of a Few Prophecies of the Early Founders of Mormonism,” unpublished Master’s thesis, University of Utah, 1930, p. 15)

In the Annual Register of the History of Europe, published in London, 1832 (p. 406) is the following prediction of the conditions of the United States:

Civil war and a dissolution of the union seems thus to be approaching.

This statement was given at the same time that Joseph Smith gave his prophecy. The conditions at South Carolina pointed directly to war. Joseph Smith a man of foresight and wisdom, accurately interpreted the facts and information known. . . . The prediction was given at a period of actual preparation for war in South Carolina. (Ibid., p. 19)

In view of the historical evidence, as presented, the most reasonable conclusion is that this Civil War prediction was the natural result of the stirring conditions of that particular period of history. The data in this short discussion indicates very forcibly that this utterance was not “Beyond the power of human sagacity to discern or to calculate.” (Ibid., p. 20A)

Joseph Smith’s revelation concerning the Civil War was never published during his lifetime, and although it is included in the handwritten manuscript of the History of the Church, it was suppressed the first two times that Joseph Smith’s History was printed (see Times and Seasons, vol. 5, p. 688; also Millennial Star, vol. 14, pp. 296, 305). It is obvious that this was a deliberate falsification on the part of the Mormon historians, for over 300 words were deleted without any indication!

The Mormon historian B. H. Roberts informs us that the revelation was not printed until 1851 (seven years after Joseph Smith’s death):

In Vol. 13 of the Millennial Star, published in 1851, pp. 216 and 217, is an advertisement of a new church publication to be called the Pearl of Great Price. In the announced contents is named this revelation of December, 1832, with a statement that it had “never before appeared in print.” (Comprehensive History of the Church, vol. 1, p. 294)

It is interesting to note that verse 3 of Joseph Smith’s revelation concerning the Civil War did not come to pass. In verse 3 we read: “. . . the Southern States will call on other nations, even the nation of Great Britain, as it is called, and they shall also call upon other nations in order to defend themselves against other nations; and then war shall be poured out upon all nations.” War was certainly not poured out on all nations at that time as Joseph Smith predicted.

Heber C. Kimball, a member of the First Presidency, in a sermon delivered April 14, 1861, predicted that the Civil War would destroy the nation:

In this country the North and the South will exert themselves against each other, and ere long the whole face of the United States will be in commotion, fighting one against another, and they will destroy their nationality. (Journal of Discourses, vol. 9, p. 55)

Brigham Young, the second President of the Mormon Church, prophesied that the Civil War would continue until the land was emptied so that the Mormons could return to Missouri:

Do they know what they are doing? No; but they have begun to empty the earth, to cleanse the land, and prepare the way for the return of the Latter-day Saints to the centre Stake of Zion.

Have we inheritances there? When I left the State of Missouri, I had a deed for five pieces of as good land as any in the State, and I expect to go back to it. . . . Many of the Saints will return to Missouri, and there receive an inheritance . . . The earth will also be emptied upon natural principles: . . . Will it be over in six months or in three years? No; it will take years and years, and will never cease until the work is accomplished. There may be seasons that the fire will appear to be extinguished, and the first you know it will break out in another portion, and all is on fire again, and it will spread and continue until the land is emptied. (Journal of Discourses, vol. 9, pp. 142-143)

The Mormon Apostle Orson Pratt prophesied:

This great war is only a small degree of chastisement, just the beginning; . . . For instance the great, powerful and populous city of New York, that may be considered one of the greatest cities of the world, will in a few years become a mass of ruins. The people will wonder while gazing on the ruins that cost hundreds of millions to build, what has become of its inhabitants. Their houses will be there, but they will be left desolate. So saith the Lord God. That will be only a sample of numerous other towns and cities on the face of this continent . . . But there are some in this congregation who will live, to behold the fulfillment of these other things, and will visit the ruins of mighty towns and cities scattered over the face of this land destitute and desolate of inhabitants. (Journal of Discourses, vol. 12, p. 344)

Orson Pratt delivered this discourse in 1868, therefore, it has been over a hundred years since these prophecies were given.

Wilford Woodruff, who later became President of the Church, made these statements:

I copied a revelation more than twenty-five years ago, in which it is stated that war should be in the south and in the north, and that nation after nation would become embroiled in the tumult and excitement, until war should be poured out upon the whole earth, and that this war would commence at the rebellion of South Carolina, and that times should be such that every man who did not flee to Zion would have to take up the sword against his neighbor or against his brother. . . . Who can stay this war that is devastating the whole nation both North and South? No human hand; . . . Will there ever be any more peace among them? No, not until the earth is drenched with the blood of the inhabitants thereof. (Journal of Discourses, vol. 10, pp. 13, 15)

The following questions and answers appeared in the February 1854 issue of The Seer, edited by Orson Pratt:

Q. What will be the consequence if they do not embrace the Book of Mormon as a divine revelation?

A. They will be destroyed from the land and sent down to hell, like all other generations who have rejected a divine message.

Q. In what way will the Lord destroy this nation if they reject the Book of Mormon?

A. By a succession of the most terrible judgments . . . The bonds of the Union which now hold together the States of this Republic, will be severed, and a fearful, desolating, civil war will rage between the South and the North. . . . thus will the whole nation mourn and waste away and perish, unless they will hearken unto the great message which God has in mercy sent to them. There is no other alternative; they must either embrace the Book of Mormon as a divine revelation, or be cut off by judgments from the land, for it is the sure and certain decree of heaven. (The Seer, p. 215)

Brigham Young, the second President of the Mormon Church, prophesied that the Civil War could not free the slaves:

Ham will continue to be the servant of servants, as the Lord decreed, until the curse is removed. Will the present struggle free the slave? No; . . . Can you destroy the decrees of the Almighty? You cannot. Yet our Christian brethren think that they are going to overthrow the sentence of the Almighty upon the seed of Ham. They cannot do that. . . . (Millennial Star, vol. 25, p. 787; also published in Journal of Discourses, vol. 10, p. 250)

Verse 5 of Joseph Smith's prophecy concerning the Civil War is rather unclear: "And it shall come to pass also that the remnants who are left of the land will marshal themselves, and shall become exceedingly angry, and shall vex the Gentiles with a sore vexation." The Apostle Orson Pratt explained that the "remnants" mentioned are the Indians:

To add to the sufferings and great calamities of the nation, they will be greatly distressed by the Aborigines who "will marshal themselves and become exceeding angry" and vex them "with a sore vexation." We are inclined to believe that this will not take place until millions of the nation have already perished in their own revolutionary battles. To what extent the Indians will have power over the nation is not stated in this revelation; . . . (The Seer, p. 242)

The fact that Joseph Smith believed the wicked of his generation would be completely destroyed is obvious from a letter he wrote N. E. Seaton, on January 4, 1833. In this letter he stated:

And now I am prepared to say by the authority of Jesus Christ, that not many years shall pass away before the United States shall present such a scene of bloodshed as has not a parallel in the history of our nation; pestilence, hail, famine, and earthquake will sweep the wicked of this generation from off the face of the land, to open and prepare the way for the return of the lost tribes of Israel from the north country. . . . flee to Zion, before the overflowing scourge overtake you, for there are those now living upon the earth whose eyes shall not be closed in death until they see all these things, which I have spoken, fulfilled. (History of the Church, vol. 1, pp. 315-316)

On October 15, 1843, Joseph Smith stated:

I prophesy, in the name of the Lord God of Israel, anguish and wrath and tribulation and the withdrawing of the Spirit of God from the earth await this generation, until they are visited with utter desolation. (History of the Church, vol. 6, p. 58)

On December 16, 1843, Joseph Smith prophesied:

While discussing the petition to Congress, I prophesied, by virtue of the holy Priesthood vested in me, and in the name of the Lord Jesus Christ, that, if Congress will not hear our petition and grant us protection, they shall be broken up as a government, and God shall damn them, and there shall nothing be left of them—not even a grease spot. (Millennial Star, vol. 22, p. 455)

When this prophecy was reprinted in the History of the Church the Mormon Church historians tried to tame it down by putting a period after the word "government" and omitting the clause "and God shall damn them, and there shall nothing be left of them—not even a grease spot" (see the History of the Church, vol. 6, p. 116).

Brigham Young also predicted that the Government of the United States would be destroyed. On August 17, 1867, he stated:

I told General Kane that the Government of the United States would be shivered to pieces. Will this Government ever be restored to its former peace and tranquility, and the institutions thereof ever be maintained and honored? If they are, it will be by this people. Everything they are doing at present in Congress is only calculated to widen the breach, and alienate and destroy every vestige of love and affection that may yet be existing; and this they will continue to do until they have severed the last tie and worked out the entire destruction of the government. (Journal of Discourses, vol. 12, pp. 119-120)

The Gathering

The same revelation that stated that the Mormons were to build a temple at Independence, Missouri, also stated that they were to gather to Independence and build the New Jerusalem. This was to be the land of Zion. In the revelation we read:

Yea, the word of the Lord concerning his church, . . . for the gathering of his saints to stand upon Mount Zion, which shall be the city of New Jerusalem.

Which city shall be built, beginning at the temple lot, which is appointed by the finger of the Lord, in the western boundaries of the State of Missouri, . . .

Verily this is the word of the Lord, that the city New Jerusalem shall be built by the gathering of the Saints, beginning at this place, . . . (Doctrine and Covenants, sec. 84, verses 2-4)

In 1833 the Mormons who were attempting to build up the city of Zion according to Joseph Smith's revelation were driven out of Jackson County, Missouri, by the Gentiles. This was a great disappointment to Joseph Smith, and since his reputation as a prophet was at stake, he decided to try to reinstate the Mormons in Jackson County. Klaus J. Hansen states that he "resolved to meet force with force." On December 16, 1833, Joseph Smith gave a revelation in which the Lord was supposed to have said the following:

And now, I will show unto you a parable, that you may know my will concerning the redemption of Zion.

A certain nobleman had a spot of land, very choice; . . .

And the enemy came by night, and broke down the hedge; and the servants of the nobleman arose and were affrighted, and fled; and the enemy destroyed their works, and broke down the olive-trees. . . .

And the lord of the vineyard said unto one of his servants: Go and gather together the residue of my servants, and take all the strength of mine house, which are my warriors, my young men, and they that are of middle age also among all my servants, who are the strength of mine house, save those only whom I have appointed to tarry;

And go ye straightway unto the land of my vineyard, and redeem my vineyard; for it is mine; I have bought it with money.

Therefore, get ye straightway unto my land; break down the walls of mine enemies; throw down their tower, and scatter their watchmen.

And inasmuch as they gather together against you, avenge me of mine enemies, that by and by I may come with the residue of mine house and possess the land. (Doctrine and Covenants, sec. 101, verses 43, 44, 51, 55-58)

On February 24, 1834, Joseph Smith gave a revelation in which the following appears:

Behold, I say unto you, the redemption of Zion must needs come by power;

Therefore, I will raise up unto my people a man, who shall lead them like as Moses led the children of Israel.

For ye are the children of Israel, and of the seed of Abraham, and ye must needs be led out of bondage by power, and with a stretched-out arm. . . .

Verily, verily I say unto you, that my servant Baurak Ale [Joseph Smith, Jun.] is the man to whom I likened the servant to whom the Lord of the vineyard spake in the parable which I have given unto you.

Therefore let my servant Baurak Ale [Joseph Smith, Jun.] say unto the strength of my house, my young men and the middle aged—Gather yourselves together unto the land of Zion, . . .

And my presence shall be with you even in avenging me of mine enemies, unto the third and fourth generation of them that hate me. . . . Therefore, if you cannot obtain five hundred, seek diligently that peradventure you may obtain three hundred.

And if ye cannot obtain three hundred, seek diligently that peradventure ye may obtain one hundred.

But verily I say unto you, a commandment I give unto you, that ye shall not go up unto the land of Zion until you have obtained a hundred of the strength of my house, to go up with you unto the land of Zion.

Therefore, as I said unto you, ask and ye shall receive; pray earnestly that peradventure my servant Baurak Ale [Joseph Smith, Jun.] may go with you, and preside in the midst of my people, and organize my kingdom upon the consecrated land, . . .

All victory and glory is brought to pass unto you through your diligence, faithfulness, and prayers of faith. (Doctrine and Covenants, sec. 103, vs. 15-17, 21, 22, 26, 32-36)

Notice that Joseph Smith's name appears in brackets in the 1963 edition of the Doctrine and Covenants quoted above. A footnote in the History of the Church, vol. 1, page 255, explains:

It was not always desirable that the individuals whom the Lord addressed in revelations should at the time be known by the world, and hence in this and in some subsequent revelations the brethren were addressed by other than their own names. The temporary necessity having passed for keeping the names of the individuals addressed unknown, their real names were subsequently given in brackets.

Joseph Smith did raise an army as commanded, but he was unable to drive the enemy out of Jackson County. Reed Peck made this statement in a manuscript written in 1839:

In accordance with the interpretation of this parable Joseph Smith called for volunteers collected about 210 "Warriors" and marched to Clay County under arms, but the cholera on the second day after their arrival dispersed them and all hopes were destroyed of "redeem[in]g Zion" for the present, but to console the Mormons under this disappointment, Joseph Smith, before he returned from the campaign prophesied publicly to them, that "within three years they should march to Jackson County and there should not be a dog to open his mouth against them" . . . (The Reed Peck Manuscript, p. 3)

The Mormon writer Max Parkin stated: "The Camp, however, failed to accomplish its objective of reinstating the distressed Saints and it further aided in festering the sore of unpopular public opinion the Mormons already had in Ohio" (Conflict at Kirtland, p. 129).

After the trouble in Missouri, the Mormons tried to build up Kirtland, Ohio. On April 6, 1837, Joseph Smith made this statement concerning Kirtland:

He [Joseph Smith] then closed at about 4 P.M. by uttering a prophecy saying this place must be built up, and would be built up, and that every brother that would take hold and help secure and discharge those contracts that had been made, should be rich. (Messenger and Advocate, April 1837, vol. 3, p. 488)

When this was reprinted in the History of the Church, vol. 2, p. 479, the first twelve words were deleted. This was apparently done to cover up the fact that the Mormon people considered Joseph Smith's statement "a prophecy."

However this may be, Kirtland was not built by the Mormons as Joseph Smith predicted. Just nine months later this statement appears in Joseph Smith's History:

January, 1838.—A new year dawned upon the Church in Kirtland in all the bitterness of the spirit of apostate Mobocracy; . . . Elder Rigdon and myself were obliged to flee . . . On the evening of the 12th of January, about ten o'clock, we left Kirtland, on horseback, to escape mob violence, . . . (History of the Church, vol. 3, p. 1)

After the trouble in Kirtland, the Mormons tried to build up Far West, Missouri. On April 26, 1838, Joseph Smith gave a revelation which contains the following statements:

Let the city, Far West, be a holy and consecrated land unto me; and it shall be called most holy, for the ground upon which thou standest is holy.

Therefore, I command you to build a house unto me, for the gathering together of my saints, that they may worship me . . .

And let the beginning be made on the fourth day of July next; and from that time forth let my people labor diligently to build a house unto my name;

And in one year from this day let them re-commence laying the foundation of my house.

Thus let them from that time forth labor diligently until it shall be finished, from the corner stone thereof unto the top thereof, until there shall not anything remain that is not finished. . . .

And again, verily I say unto you, it is my will that the city of Far West should be built up speedily by the gathering of my saints; . . . (Doctrine and Covenants, section 115, verses 7, 8, 10, 11, 12, 17)

Just a few months later the Mormons were driven from Far West, and although they managed to lay the corner stone for the temple, the building itself was never completed.

After this the Mormons tried to build up a city in Illinois which Joseph Smith called Nauvoo. On January 5, 1843, this statement appears in Joseph Smith's History:

Esquire Butterfield asked me "to prophesy how many inhabitants would come to Nauvoo." I said, I will not tell how many inhabitants will come to Nauvoo; . . . we have now about 12,000 inhabitants. I will prophesy that we will build up a great city; for we have only to fill up the interstices. (History of the Church, vol. 5, p. 232)

As we have already shown, Joseph Smith claimed that Nauvoo would be "the place" where the work for the dead would be performed (Millennial Star, vol. 23, p. 280). Brigham Young, however, brought the Mormons to Utah, and Joseph Smith's statement was changed so that it could be applied to Utah (see History of the Church, vol. 6, p. 319). We have also presented evidence which seems to show that the prophecy attributed to Joseph Smith concerning the Mormons being established in the Rocky Mountains (History of the Church, vol. 5, p. 85) was written after his death.

In her thesis, Alice Smith McKay makes this interesting observation concerning Joseph Smith's idea about the location of "Zion":

Enlargement of the term Zion was due to the continued movement of the Saints from one locality to another. Prophecies show that in 1833 Zion meant Independence, Missouri. But after the Saints were driven from Independence, the meaning Zion broadened . . . ("A Psychological Examination of a Few Prophecies of the Early Founders of Mormonism," p. 71)

It is interesting to compare a statement made by Joseph Smith on January 4, 1833, with one he made just before his death in 1844. In the earlier statement Smith warned that the people of the United States must gather to Zion "in the state of Missouri" to escape from "the overflowing scourge":

And now I am prepared to say by the authority of Jesus Christ, that not many years shall pass away before the United States shall present such a scene of bloodshed as has not parallel in the history of our nation; . . . The people of the Lord, . . . have already commenced gathering together to Zion, which is in the state of Missouri; therefore I declare unto you the warning which the Lord has commanded to declare unto this generation, . . . flee to Zion, before the overflowing scourge overtake you, for there are those now living upon the earth whose eyes shall not be closed in death until they see all these things, which I have spoken, fulfilled. (History of the Church, vol. 1, pp. 315-316)

On April 8, 1844, however, Joseph Smith declared that all of America is Zion:

You know there has been great discussion in relation to Zion—where it is, and where the gathering of the dispensation is, and which I am now going to tell you. . . . The whole of America is Zion itself from north to south, and is described by the Prophets, who declare that it is the Zion where the mountain of the Lord should be, and that it should be in the center of the land. . . .

I have received instructions from the Lord that from henceforth wherever the Elders of Israel shall build up churches and branches unto the Lord throughout the States, there shall be a stake of Zion. In the great cities, as Boston, New York, &c., there shall be stakes. (History of the Church, vol. 6, pp. 318-319)

There are a number of statements which Joseph Smith made in the 1830's which show that he believed that the Mormon people would build Zion in Jackson County, Missouri. On December 5, 1833, Joseph Smith wrote a letter in which he stated:

I would inform you, that it is not the will of the Lord for you to sell your lands in Zion, if means can possibly be procured for your sustenance without . . . the spot of ground upon which you are located, is the place appointed of the Lord for your inheritance, and it is right in the sight of God that you contend for it to the last.

You will recollect that the Lord has said, that Zion should not be removed out of her place; therefore the land should not be sold, but be held by the Saints, until the Lord in His wisdom shall open a way for your return; and until that time, if you can purchase a tract of land in Clay county for present emergencies, it is right you should do so, if you can do it, and not sell your land in Jackson county. (History of the Church, vol. 1, pp. 450-451)

Five days later Joseph Smith wrote a letter in which he stated:

. . . it is better in the eyes of God that you should die, than that you should give up the land of Zion, the inheritances which you have purchased with your moneys; . . .

Now hear the prayer of your unworthy brother . . . O My God! Thou who hast called and chosen a few, . . . and sent them to Missouri [sic], a place which Thou didst call Zion, . . . and as Thou hast said that no other place should be appointed like unto this, therefore, I ask Thee in the name of Jesus Christ to return Thy people unto their houses and their inheritances, to enjoy the fruit of their labors; that all the waste places may be built up; that all the enemies of Thy people, who will not repent and turn unto Thee may be destroyed from off the face of the land; . . . (History of the Church, vol. 1, pp. 455-456)

On December 16, 1833, Joseph Smith gave a revelation which plainly stated that Zion could not be moved:

Zion shall not be moved out of her place, notwithstanding her children are scattered . . .

And, behold, there is none other place appointed than that which I have appointed; neither shall there be any other place appointed than that which I have appointed, for the work of the gathering of my saints—

Until the day cometh when there is found no more room for them; and then I have other places which I will appoint unto them, and they shall be called stakes, for the curtains or the strength of Zion. (Doctrine and Covenants, 101:17, 20, 21)

The reader will remember that although Joseph Smith gathered an army and marched toward Jackson County, he was not successful in his attempt to restore the Mormon people to their lands. In July, 1834, the Mormons wrote “An Appeal” in which they stated: “. . . the propositions of the Jackson county committee could not be accepted on our part, because they proposed to ‘buy or sell,’ and to sell our land would amount to a denial of our faith, as that land is the place where the Zion of God shall stand, according to our faith and belief in the revelations of God, . . .” (History of the Church, vol. 2, p. 127).

The Mormon people felt so strongly with regard to this matter that it was considered a real offense for a person to sell the land he had acquired in Jackson County. On February 5, 1838, the Far West Presidency were tried for a number of offenses. In the minutes of the proceedings we find the following:

Elder Lyman Wight stated that he considered all other accusations of minor importance compared to Brothers Phelps and Whitmer selling their lands in Jackson County; that they had set an example which all the Saints were liable to follow. He said that it was a hellish principle on which they had acted, and that they had flatly denied the faith in so doing. (History of the Church, vol. 3, p. 4)

It is interesting to note that only about a year later (March 8, 1839) Joseph Smith himself “counseled to sell all the land in Jackson county”:

Alanson Ripley made a report of his journey to Liberty, and said that President Joseph Smith, Jun., counseled to sell all the land in Jackson County, and all other lands in the state whatsoever. (History of the Church, vol. 3, p. 274)

The Mormon writer Leland Gentry makes this comment about Joseph Smith's decision: “The decision to sell the lands in Jackson County was revolutionary indeed, but the exigency of the situation appears to have made it necessary” (A History of the Latter-day Saints in Northern Missouri from 1836 to 1839, by Leland H. Gentry, B.Y.U., 1965, pp. 160-161).

As the Mormon leaders changed their ideas concerning Zion, they gradually gave up the idea of “the gathering.” This had been one of the most important teachings in Joseph Smith's early theology. In a revelation given in 1830 we find the following:

Wherefore the decree hath gone forth from the Father that they shall be gathered in unto one place upon the face of this land, to prepare their hearts and be prepared in all things against the day when tribulation and desolation are sent forth upon the wicked. (Doctrine and Covenants, sec. 29, verse 8)

In the minutes of a conference held in Norton, Ohio, April 21, 1834, we find the following:

President Joseph Smith, Jun., . . . addressed the conference as follows:

. . . The time is near when desolation is to cover the earth, and then God will have a place of deliverance in His remnant, and in Zion . . .

Take away the Book of Mormon and the revelations, and where is our religion? We have none; for without Zion, and a place of deliverance, we must fall; . . . for God will gather out His Saints from the Gentiles, and then comes desolation and destruction, and none can escape except the pure in heart who are gathered . . . President Joseph Smith, Jun., prophesied.

If Zion is not delivered, the time is near when all of this Church, wherever they may be found, will be pe[r]secuted and destroyed in like manner.

(History of the Church, vol. 2, pp. 52-53)

On February 1, 1846, this statement was printed in the Mormon publication, Millennial Star:

There is no characteristic by which the Saints are distinguished in the present days so peculiar as that of the gathering, and so long as we continue in connexion with the kingdom of God, the doctrine of the gathering will be of vital importance, indeed everything hinges upon this point, the Saints must be gathered out from Babylon, in order that they may become a kingdom and a people prepared for the Lord at his coming. (Millennial Star, vol. 7, pp. 47-48)

The Mormon Apostle Orson Pratt wrote:

Hence, there is connected with the great message of the Book of Mormon, “a voice from heaven,” commanding the Saints to come out from all nations as fast as they obey the gospel message; this they have been doing for these many years, and this they will continue to do, until the work of gathering is fully accomplished. And after the saints, who are the salt of the earth, are gathered out, those who are left will quickly perish, as did Sodom and Gomorra. (Orson Pratt’s Works, “Prophetic Evidence in Favour of the Book of Mormon,” p. 85)

Klaus J. Hansen gives this interesting information:

Mormon missionaries, fanning out to the far corners of the earth, instructed their converts that gathering to Zion was one of the basic tests of orthodoxy. “None of the Saints,” admonished Orson Pratt, “can be dilatory upon this subject, and still retain the spirit of God. To neglect or be indifferent about gathering, is just as displeasing in the sight of God as to neglect or be indifferent about baptism for the remission of sins.” (Quest for Empire, p. 47)

The idea of the gathering, which was so important to the early Mormon leaders, has now been abandoned. Richard L. Bushman, a Mormon author, made this statement in a letter published in Dialogue: A Journal of Mormon Thought, Spring 1966, p. 11: “But the doctrine of gathering has been suspended and our job now is to live in the world.” The Mormon writer James L. Clayton stated: “In our early history, for example, the doctrine of the gathering was assumed to be a permanent part of the Gospel. Today just the reverse is taught, and a general gathering of the faithful would be disastrous” (Dialogue: A Journal of Mormon Thought, Autumn 1968, p. 73). The Mormon writer John J. Stewart gives this information:

This program of gathering continued to be a prominent one for the first hundred years of the Church. More recently, having firmly established itself in western America, the Church has undertaken to build up wards and stakes, temples and chapels throughout all parts of the world receptive to its message. Rather than emigrating to Zion, converts are now encouraged to remain in their native lands and help build up the Church there. (Joseph Smith, The Mormon Prophet, Salt Lake City, 1966, p. 60)

It would appear, then, that Joseph Smith’s doctrine concerning the gathering has failed, and therefore the church has abandoned this teaching. With this thought in mind it is interesting to read some comments concerning the gathering made by the Mormon Apostle Orson Pratt over a hundred years ago:

Joseph Smith . . . professes to have received, through revelation and commandment from God, a dispensation for the gathering of the Saints from all nations. Now the doctrine of the gathering of the Saints in the last days must either be false or true; if false, then J. Smith must be an imposter. It matters not how correct he may have been in all other points of his system, if this one point—the doctrine of the gathering be false, he must be a deceiver. Why? Because he professes to have received this doctrine by direct revelation and commandment. On the other hand, if the doctrine of the gathering of the Saints be a true doctrine and scriptural, this will be another presumptive evidence that Mr. Smith was sent of God. (Orson Pratt’s Works, “Divine Authority,” p. 5)

Joseph’s Boys

After Joseph Smith’s death it was expected that his son would someday lead the church, although he was too young at the time. John D. Lee stated:

It was then understood among the Saints that young Joseph was to succeed his father, . . . Joseph, the Prophet, had bestowed that right upon him by ordination, but he was too young at that time to fill the office . . . Brigham Young arose and roared like a young lion, imitating the style and voice of Joseph, the Prophet. Many of the brethren declared that they saw the mantle of Joseph fall upon him. I myself, at the time, imagined that I saw and heard a strong resemblance to the Prophet in him, and felt that he was the man to lead us until Joseph’s legal successor should grow up to manhood, when he should surrender the Presidency to the man who held the birthright. (Confessions of John D. Lee, p. 155)

On June 29, 1856, Heber C. Kimball, a member of the First Presidency, stated:

At present the Prophet Joseph’s boys lay apparently in a state of slumber, everything seems to be perfectly calm with them, but by and bye God will wake them up, and they will roar like the thunders of Mount Sinai. (Journal of Discourses, vol. 4, p. 6)

Brigham Young, the second President of the Mormon Church, made this statement on June 3, 1860:

What of Joseph Smith’s family? What of his boys? . . . They are in the hands of God, and when they make their appearance before this people, full of his power, there are none but what will say—“Amen! we are ready to receive you.”

The brethren testify that brother Brigham is brother Joseph’s legal successor. You never heard me say so. . . I do not think anything about being Joseph’s successor. That is nothing that concerns me. (Ibid., vol. 8, p. 69)

As it ended up the Mormon people did not receive Joseph Smith’s sons as Brigham Young prophesied. One of Joseph Smith’s sons became the president of the Reorganized L.D.S. Church—this is the church which actively fought against some of the doctrines of the Utah L.D.S. Church.

Other Prophecies

On August 31, 1856, Brigham Young stated: “In the days of Joseph it was considered a great privilege to be permitted to speak to a member of Congress, but twenty-six years will not pass away before the Elders of this Church will be as much thought of as the kings on their thrones” (Journal of Discourses, vol. 4, p. 40).

To those who have studied Mormon history, it is obvious that this prophecy did not come to pass. In 1882—twenty-six years after the prophecy was uttered—the Elders of the Mormon Church were held in derision because they taught polygamy.

On September 6, 1856, Heber C. Kimball made these statements:

The Church and kingdom to which we belong will become the kingdom of our God and his Christ, and brother Brigham Young will become President of the United States.

(Voices responded. “Amen.”)

And I tell you he will be something more; but we do not now want to give him the name: but he is called and ordained to a far greater station than that, and he is fore-ordained to take that station, and he has got it; and I am Vice-President, and brother Wells is the Secretary of the Interior—yes, and of all the armies in the flesh.

You don’t believe that; but I can tell you it is one of the smallest things that I can think of. You may think that I am joking; but I am perfectly willing that brother Long should write every word of it; for I can see it just as naturally as I see the earth and the productions thereof. (Journal of Discourses, vol. 5, p. 219)

Harold Schindler tells of a prophecy uttered by Brigham Young:

The church leader then added a prophecy which brought hurrahs from his audience. “In twelve years,” he said, “I will either be President of the United States or will dictate who shall be!” On this enthusiastic note the Mormon cavalcade began retracing its steps down the steep canyon road to the city. (Orrin Porter Rockwell; Man of God, Son of Thunder, University of Utah Press, 1966, p. 250)

For other false prophecies and extravagant boasts see the Journal of Discourses, vol. 3, pp. 228, 253, 262; vol. 5, pp. 10, 93, 94, 164, 173, 174, 274, 275.

More on Forgeries and Their Effect on the Mormon Church

One of the chief differences between the Mormon Church and the Reorganized LDS Church centers around the question of who was the successor to Joseph Smith (see page 195 of this book). While the Utah Mormons steadfastly maintain that Brigham Young was the true successor, the RLDS claim that Joseph Smith had bestowed this right on his son Joseph Smith III. On March 19, 1981, the Mormon newspaper, The Deseret News, made the startling announcement that an extremely important document which dealt with the issue of the succession of the presidency had been found:

A handwritten document thought to be a father's blessing given by Joseph Smith Jr., first president and prophet of The Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints, to his son Joseph Smith III, has been acquired by the Church Historical Department. . . .

[Earl E.] Olson and other LDS officials said they are convinced the blessing is authentic. Handwriting and the paper were examined and compared with other documents. . . .

The blessing document, dated Jan. 17, 1844, is thought to have been written by Thomas Bullock, one of several men who served as clerk to Joseph Smith Jr. . . .

Church officials obtained the document from Mark William Hofmann, a collector of historical documents and antiques. He said he received it from a descendant of Thomas Bullock. . . .

The document outlines a blessing given by Joseph Smith Jr. to his son, then age 11, and includes the possibility of the son succeeding his father "to the Presidency of the High Priesthood: A Seer, and a Revelator, and a Prophet, unto the Church."

This document, which the Mormon leaders purchased from Mark Hofmann, clearly supported the claims of the Reorganized Church. The following words are found in the text of the blessing:

A blessing, given to Joseph Smith, 3rd, by his father, Joseph Smith, Jun., on Jan. 17, 1844.

Blessed of the Lord is my son Joseph, who is called the third, . . . For he shall be my successor to the Presidency of the High Priesthood: a Seer, and a Revelator, and a Prophet, unto the Church; which appointment belongeth to him by blessing, and also by right.

Since the blessing appeared to be in agreement with the material we presented on page 195 of this book, we included it in the 1982 edition. As we have indicated in the updated material on the Anthon Transcript (see pages 125-A to 125-F), we began to have reservations concerning some of Mark Hofmann's discoveries in 1984. One document which we became rather suspicious of was the Joseph Smith III

Blessing. The church's Deseret News, March 19, 1981, had claimed that Hofmann had "received it from a descendant of Thomas Bullock." We decided that it would be wise to talk to the individual who was supposed to have had the document before it came into Mr. Hofmann's hands. We reasoned that if we could trace it back beyond Hofmann to the Bullock family, we would be sure of its authenticity. We soon learned that it was virtually impossible to find out the name of the descendant of Thomas Bullock from whom the blessing was supposed to have been obtained, which caused us to become even more suspicious. On August 22, 1984, we published the following:

In his public statement about the Joseph Smith III Blessing document Hofmann has said he a[c]quired it from a descendant of Thomas Bullock. An official from the Reorganized Church [RLDS Church Historian Richard P. Howard] told us that when he asked Hofmann the specific source of this document, he would not reveal it. The same man [Howard] asked us the question, "Would you want to buy a used car from someone who wouldn't tell you who the last owner was." At any rate, he was given a name by the Mormon Church historians, but never followed up on the matter because he was told it could prove embarrassing for the Mormon Church. The reason why it would prove embarrassing was not explained. (The Money-Digging Letters, pp. 8-9)

The day following the publication of The Money-Digging Letters (August 23, 1984), Mark Hofmann came to our home and had a long talk with Sandra. He seemed very distressed and hurt that we, of all people, would question his discoveries. He had expected that opposition might come from those in the church, but he was amazed that Utah Lighthouse Ministry had taken a position which was critical of him. Mr. Hofmann tried to explain that he could not reveal the source of the Salamander letter because he had sold it to Steven Christensen. With regard to the Joseph Smith III Blessing, Hofmann indicated that he had given the Mormon Church an affidavit which stated where he had obtained it. He could not reveal the source to the public, however, because the member of the Bullock family from whom he had purchased the document also had important papers concerning Brigham Young's finances that would be embarrassing to the church. Mark Hofmann was almost to the point of tears as he pled his case as to why we should trust him.

Testimony given by former Mormon Church Archivist Donald Schmidt at Hofmann's preliminary hearing [Salt Lake City, Utah, April 1986] confirms that he actually gave the church a notarized statement with the name of a man he was supposed to have obtained the blessing from:

A— . . . He furnished me with a notarized . . . statement.

Q—Does that statement state where or whom he received the Joseph Smith III Blessing from?

A—The statement was signed by an Allen Bullock.

Q—That being the person he obtained it from?

A—Yes.

Q—Were you able to receive any more information about an Allen Bullock?

A—Yes. In a conversation on [the] telephone with Mark Hofmann, he told me his full name was Allen Lee Bullock. Donald Schmidt claimed that Hofmann even told him when “Allen Lee Bullock” was born. In his testimony Mr. Schmidt went on to reveal that the church failed to verify whether there was such an individual:

Q—As a result of those investigations, what did [you] have in your . . . files verifying the provenance of this document?

A—We were unable to do so.

Q—Did you have any personal contact with this Allen Lee Bullock?

A—I did not.

Q—Did anyone in your department have contact with him.

A—No, sir.

Mark Hofmann told one scholar that the descendant of Thomas Bullock from whom he obtained the blessing document had a collection of 37 items. Hofmann also indicated that this individual lived in Coalville, Utah. Jeffery O. Johnson, who used to work for the Church Historical Department, also indicated that Hofmann claimed that he obtained the blessing in Coalville:

LDS historian Jeffery O. Johnson, . . . said that, since the document controversy following the bombings, he has questioned the source of the Joseph Smith III blessing.

“The Smith family logically would have had such an important blessing,” Johnson said. “It’s never been clear where it came from. Hofmann said it came from the Bullock family in Coalville. But why did the clerk keep it through all those generations? Thomas Bullock worked in the church history department. This is more like a historical document than something he would keep in his family.” (Deseret News, December 22, 1985)

Even with all the information that Hofmann gave concerning “Allen Lee Bullock” (his name, city and when he was born), no one seems to be able to locate him. One would think that if Mr. Bullock actually existed, his name would be found in genealogical records of the Bullock family or that someone in Coalville would have heard of him. To date, all efforts to confirm his existence have failed.

Forensic document expert George Throckmorton testified that the Joseph Smith III Blessing was not authentic because he found the “characteristic cracking effect” in the ink. William Flynn also observed this phenomenon: “This is another one of the documents where the surface of [the] ink is extensively cracked throughout the document.” As we indicated in the updated material on the Anthon Transcript, the fact that the ink was cracked led the experts to believe that it had been artificially aged with chemicals. Mr. Flynn commented that he also saw “one-directional ink running on that document.” When asked if he believed the blessing was authentic, Flynn responded: “I don’t believe that’s genuine either.”

While some people originally subscribed to the theory that “the bombs [which killed two people and set off the investigation into the document scandal] were planted by people radically opposed to the teachings of the Mormon Church,” the facts completely discredit such an idea. At this point it appears that the entire Salamandergate scandal grew out of an internal problem which took root within the Mormon Church itself. Almost all of those who played a role in the transactions which brought international attention to Salt Lake City were members of the Mormon Church. Mark Hofmann himself was at one time a missionary for the church. According to the Church Section of the Deseret News, October 20, 1985, “Hofmann . . . served in the England Southwest Mission, 1974-76.” On February 4, 1986, the same newspaper said that on “one mission report of average proselyting hours, Hofmann’s name ranks 49th out of 208 missionaries. Part of the time, Hofmann served in the mission office in Bristol.” Utah Holiday, January 1986, page 53, reported that Hofmann married “in the Salt Lake LDS temple.” In an interview published in Sunstone Review, September 1982, page 19, Mr. Hofmann described himself as “an eighth-generation Mormon, and my mother is a stake Relief Society president right now.” Some of Hofmann’s closest associates (Lyn Jacobs, Shannon Flynn and Brent Metcalfe) were returned Mormon missionaries. Like Hofmann, Brent Metcalfe had served his mission in England. Lyn Jacobs was a missionary in Canada, and Shannon Flynn served in Brazil. One of the persons that Hofmann defrauded was Wilford Cardon. Mr. Cardon testified: “Mr. Flynn served a mission in Brazil and I was his mission president from July 1978 until the end of his mission.” Shannon Flynn introduced Mark Hofmann to Wilford Cardon, and Hofmann proceeded to talk Cardon into investing heavily in his schemes. Another faithful Mormon who lost a great deal of money by investing in Hofmann’s forgeries is Brent Ashworth. The Church Section of the Deseret News, June 23, 1985, said that Mr. Ashworth was “bishop of the BYU 82nd Ward.” On July 23, 1986, Brent Ashworth filed a lawsuit against Mark Hofmann in which he claimed that Hofmann had sold him many forgeries and that he had paid $225,100 for the documents. Alvin Rust, who invested in the McLellin collection and a number of Hofmann’s other forgeries, has served as a bishop in the Mormon Church. Steven Christensen and J. Gary Sheets, who invested in the Salamander letter and later had bombs delivered to them, were also bishops in the church. (Sheets’ wife, of course, opened the package addressed to him and died in the explosion.)

Mark Hofmann was well acquainted with Wade Lillywhite and Curt Bench who worked at the church’s Deseret Book. Many of Hofmann’s forgeries, in fact, were sold to the church’s bookstore. David Sorenson, who was to purchase the McLellin collection on the day Hofmann was injured, was serving as a mission president. Mr. Hofmann was well acquainted with the former LDS Church Archivist Donald Schmidt and sometimes met with Gordon B. Hinckley, of the church’s First Presidency. Donald Schmidt testified that Hinckley and Apostle Boyd K. Packer often gave approval for the church to purchase Hofmann’s documents.

Hugh Pinnock, of the First Quorum of Seventy, helped Hofmann find a buyer for the McLellin collection and secure a loan of $185,000, and even Apostle Dallin Oaks found himself meeting with Hofmann.

One thing that must be very embarrassing for Mormon Church leaders is that they not only gave Hofmann money for forgeries, but that they also traded genuine material stored in the archives for bogus documents. At the press conference, President Gordon B. Hinckley said that the “Historical Department later traded him other documents of interest for the ‘Anthon Manuscript’ ” (Salt Lake Tribune, October 27, 1985). Hinckley also said that the Joseph Smith III Blessing “was acquired from Mr. Hofmann with a trade of historic materials . . .” (Ibid.).

The Hofmann documents which were not unfavorable to the Mormon Church were proudly displayed in church publications. The church’s Ensign magazine, December 1983, printed an article which was filled with pictures of documents that came through Hofmann. On the other hand, the unfavorable documents which the public were not aware of, were buried in the church’s vaults. In the Salt Lake Tribune, February 6, 1986, we find the following:

Sources close to the investigation have said the church apparently did little to authenticate many of these documents before they were purchased, stating that church historians felt “they had time and all eternity” to check their veracity. “They just wanted them off the streets,” the source said.

Although the story of Mark Hofmann and his document dealing is a real tragedy for everyone involved, it can provide some very helpful insights with regard to Joseph Smith and the origin of the Mormon Church. In fact, it even throws light on the actions of the present leaders of the church. While it must be admitted that there are many dissimilarities between Mark Hofmann and Joseph Smith, there are some remarkable parallels between the two men. To begin with, Joseph Smith was only in his twenties when he brought forth the Book of Mormon. Because of his age many people have argued that it would have been impossible for him to produce a book like the Book of Mormon without divine help. Mark Hofmann was about the same age when he began making his discoveries. Hofmann’s followers have advanced an argument similar to that used for Joseph Smith—i.e., how could such a young, inexperienced man fabricate so many remarkable documents and fool church leaders, historians and document experts?

Both Joseph Smith and Mark Hofmann had many devoted followers. It is often argued that the rapid growth and dedication of the early Mormon Church is a strong argument for Joseph Smith’s divine calling. While it is certainly true that Joseph Smith had many people who firmly believed in him, the same could be said of Mark Hofmann. In fact, the leaders of the Mormon Church had a great deal of faith in “Brother Hofmann” (see Deseret News, Church Section, May 3, 1980). In the Salt Lake Tribune, April 19, 1986, Mike Carter referred to the “blind trust of LDS officials in Bombing suspect Mark W. Hofmann . . .” Mr. Carter went on to say that it “was apparent that church leaders, including President Hinckley, trusted Mr. Hofmann implicitly . . .”

Another parallel between Mark Hofmann and Joseph Smith is that they both became famous because of a document they discovered. The Los Angeles Times, November 8, 1985, printed the following:

Indeed, the very founding of Mormonism was based on the discovery of a document of sorts. Church doctrine holds that . . . Joseph Smith was led by an angel named Moroni to a set of golden plates . . . Smith, the Mormons believe, translated a “reformed Egyptian” text on the plates into the Book of Mormon, which supposedly corrects the errors of other Christian religions.

Mark Hofmann, of course, found himself in the limelight when he discovered the Anthon transcript—purported to be Joseph Smith’s own handwritten copy of the characters from the gold plates of the Book of Mormon. Mr. Hofmann went on to discover the first extant letter of Joseph Smith—the 1825 letter to Josiah Stowell. As if this were not startling enough, he found the last extant letter of Joseph Smith, written on the very day of his death. Prior to Hofmann’s time, no one had ever found a letter signed by Martin Harris. Hofmann filled this gap by finding two letters signed by Harris—the Salamander letter of 1830 and the 1873 letter, which was written toward the end of his life. Both letters were extraordinary in their content. The 1873 letter contained a glowing testimony to both the Book of Mormon and the angel who showed Harris the gold plates. The Salamander letter, on the other hand, turned out to be a devastating account of how Joseph Smith found the gold plates. Mr. Hofmann also found the earliest known letter of Joseph Smith’s mother, Lucy Mack Smith. Besides these documents and many others, Hofmann claimed to have the McLellin collection, containing extremely important and sensitive Mormon documents. Hofmann’s finds even went beyond Mormonism. For instance, he found an original Betsy Ross letter. Then, to top it all off, he discovered the “Oath of a Freeman,” the first document printed in colonial America. While the discovery of a copy of the Oath of a Freeman would be astounding enough, Mark Hofmann claimed that he found two copies of the document! Moreover, he said that these copies were worth $1,500,000 each—making a total of $3,000,000.

While Mark Hofmann’s claims almost leave one breathless, they seem insignificant when compared with the claims of Joseph Smith. We have already discussed some of these claims in the first chapter of this book. The reader may remember that Joseph Smith claimed to have found original papyri containing the writings of Abraham and Joseph of Egypt. According to Josiah Quincy, the Prophet showed him the papyrus rolls and commented:

“That is the handwriting of Abraham, the Father of the Faithful,” . . . “This is the autograph of Moses, and these lines were written by his brother Aaron. Here we have the earliest account of the Creation, from which Moses composed the First Book of Genesis.” . . .

While Mark Hofmann claimed to have some very old and important autographs, Joseph Smith’s collection was far superior.

Although Mark Hofmann’s actions can not be excused in the eyes of the law because of his background, we can not help but feel sorry for him. His involvement with Mormon history certainly could have played an important role in his problems. If we assume that he started out as a true believer in the church, the things he learned from his study of Joseph Smith and early Mormonism could have come as a shattering blow to his faith. Before Mark Hofmann went on his mission for the church, he would have been thoroughly instructed in the importance of Joseph Smith to those who wish to be good Mormons. For instance, in the Doctrine and Covenants, section 135, verse 3, we read:

Joseph Smith, the Prophet and Seer of the Lord, has done more, save Jesus only, for the salvation of men in this world, than any other man that ever lived in it. . . . He lived great, and he died great in the eyes of God and his people; . . .

What a disappointment it must have been to Mr. Hofmann when he found out that Joseph did not tell the truth concerning his involvement in polygamy (see pages 245-248 of this book). If Mark Hofmann had learned from his study of history that the first Prophet of his church had been a man of impeccable honesty, it could have made a great difference in his life. Perhaps he would have continued his study of medicine and become a doctor. Instead, he finds himself accused of deceit and treachery. Alvin Rust claimed that Mr. Hofmann told him four stories with regard to the McLellin collection. In this respect Hofmann was no different than Joseph Smith. On pages 143-150, we demonstrated that the Mormon Prophet told a variety of different stories concerning his most important vision—the First Vision of 1820. In a manuscript written in his own hand in 1832, preserved in the Mormon Church Archives, Joseph Smith clearly taught that only one personage (Jesus) appeared to him in this vision. In an entry in Joseph Smith’s diary for 1835, also stored in the Mormon Church Archives, Joseph Smith related a different story. He claimed that there were many personages in the vision. In the official account, written in 1838, Joseph Smith asserted that both God the Father and His Son Jesus Christ appeared to him.

When it comes to the forgery of historical church documents, Mark Hofmann could have read a great deal about Mormonism that might be used in an attempt to justify his actions. For instance, Mormon leaders claim that the Book of Mormon is a translation of an ancient history of the Nephites written on gold plates. The internal evidence in the book itself, however, clearly reveals that it is a 19th century production. It appears to have material taken from the Westminster Confession, which was not adopted until 1729 (see pages 68-69), and also reflects the anti-Masonic controversy which was raging in Joseph Smith’s time (pages 69-72). The most devastating evidence against the Book of Mormon, however, is its use of material from the Bible. That Joseph Smith plagiarized from the King James Version of the Bible in creating the Book of Mormon is evident to those who have made a careful comparison of the two books. On pages 74-79, we have cited over 200 places where the Book of Mormon used quotations from the New Testament. Most of these quotations were supposed to have been recorded in the Book of Mormon between 600 B.C. and 33 A.D.—i.e., before the New Testament was even written!

Joseph Smith's successors also seemed to have little regard for truthful history. The Mormon leaders actually forged the greatest portion (60%) of Joseph Smith's History of the Church after his death. While it is true that they used carefully selected portions from Joseph Smith's diaries and letters written by him, other portions were taken from newspapers and diaries written by other people and some material was created specifically to fill in vacancies in the record. The portions taken from other authors were changed to the first person in an obvious attempt to mislead the reader into believing that they were written by Joseph Smith himself (see pages 126-142 of this book). What Brigham Young and other Mormon leaders did when they fabricated Joseph Smith's History and claimed that it was written by Joseph Smith "himself" (History of the Church vol. 1, title page), is exactly what happened in the production of the Salamander letter. In both cases other documents have been plagiarized to create what appears to be an original document written in the first person singular. While the History of the Church and the Salamander letter both contain a certain amount of material that is historically accurate, neither of them can be really depended upon because the authorship has been misrepresented. The History of the Church, of course, presents a pro-Mormon position, whereas the Salamander letter is anti-Mormon in content. In both cases, however, the same deceptive method has been used.

Mr. Hofmann must have believed that his "discoveries" would tend to liberalize the Mormon Church as scholars and church leaders came to accept them, and there is little doubt that this has turned out to be the case. Some Mormon scholars, in fact, have confessed that the Salamander letter served as the catalyst that led them to deeper studies regarding the connection between Mormonism and magic. Now that the documents have been exposed as forgeries, historians may have suffered some loss of credibility with the average member of the church. This would probably tend to strengthen the orthodox position in the church if it were not for another factor—i.e., the loss of credibility that the Mormon leaders have suffered. While it is true that both Mormon and non-Mormon historians were fooled, as a general rule historians do not claim to be inspired by God. The Mormon leaders, on the other hand, claim special guidance from the Lord. According to Ezra Taft Benson, the present Prophet, Seer and Revelator of the Mormon Church, "The Prophet Will Never Lead The Church Astray" ("Fourteen Fundamentals In Following The Prophets," an address given at BYU, February 26, 1980; printed in Following The Brethren, p. 5). President Benson claims that the leaders of the church have special discernment which is far superior to "earthly knowledge":

FIFTH: The Prophet is Not Required to Have Any Particular Earthly Training or Credentials to Speak on Any Subject or Any Matter at Any Time.

Sometimes there are those who feel their earthly knowledge on a certain subject is superior to the heavenly knowledge which God gives to His Prophet on the same subject. . . . We haven't yet had a prophet who earned a doctorate degree in any subject, but as someone said, "A prophet may not have his PhD but he certainly has his LDS." We encourage earthly knowledge in many areas, but remember if there is ever a conflict between earthly knowledge and the words of the prophet, you stand with the prophet and you'll be blessed and time will vindicate you. (Ibid., p. 6)

On page 10 of his address, President Benson said:

NINTH: The Prophet Can Receive Revelation on Any Matter—Temporal or Spiritual.

As we think of President Benson's statements concerning the special powers of a prophet, we cannot help but remember a photograph of his predecessor, Spencer W. Kimball, the twelfth Prophet, Seer and Revelator of the Mormon Church, which appeared in the Church Section of the Deseret News on May 3, 1980. President Kimball is flanked by Mark Hofmann, President N. Eldon Tanner, President Marion G. Romney, Apostle Boyd K. Packer and Apostle Gordon B. Hinckley. Neither President Kimball nor any of the other General Authorities were able to detect anything wrong with either "Brother Hofmann" or the Anthon transcript which he was trying to palm off on them. Although President Kimball was supposed to be a "seer" and have the power to "translate all records that are of ancient date" (Book of Mormon, Mosiah 8:13), he was unable to translate the purported Book of Mormon characters which appear on the Anthon transcript. Instead of using the "seer stone," he examined the characters which appear on the transcript with a magnifying glass. Not only did he fail to provide a translation, but he was unable to detect that the church was being set up to be defrauded of a large amount of money and many items out of its archives. Moreover, he entirely failed to see the devastating and embarrassing effect this transaction and others which followed would have on the Mormon Church. If ever revelation from the Lord was needed, it was on that day in 1980 when Mark Hofmann stood in the presence of President Kimball.

While the Mormon leaders claim to have the same powers as the ancient Apostles in the Bible, their performance with regard to Mark Hofmann certainly does not match up to that of the Apostle Peter when he caught Ananias and Sapphira red-handed in their attempt to deceive the church with regard to a financial transaction: “But Peter said, Ananias, why hath Satan filled thine heart to lie to the Holy Ghost, and to keep back part of the price of the land?” (Acts 5:3).

As President Kimball got older, he became less able to function and President Gordon B. Hinckley took over many of his responsibilities and became to all appearances the acting president of the church. Hinckley, who stood with President Kimball in the 1980 photograph, was deceived on a number of occasions by Mr. Hofmann. He, together with Apostle Boyd K. Packer (also shown in the picture), approved many of the deals the church made with Hofmann. It appears that if the Mormon Church was ever led by revelation, it has been lacking since Mark Hofmann came into the church offices with the Anthon transcript. The inability of the Mormon leaders to detect the religious fraud perpetrated upon them raises a question as to their testimony with regard to the Book of Mormon. After all, if they could not determine that Hofmann’s documents—which were only 150 years old—were forgeries, how can we trust their judgment with regard to a record which is supposed to be ten times as old? They have seen and inspected Mark Hofmann’s documents, but they have never seen the gold plates the Book of Mormon was translated from. While it could be possible that Joseph Smith really had some kind of metal plates, how would the present leaders of the Mormon Church know if they were genuine or fabricated? With regard to the inability of the Mormon leaders to detect that the Hofmann documents were fraudulent, a person might try to argue that these documents were not really important spiritual writings, and therefore the Lord did not see fit to intervene when the General Authorities examined them. The truth of the matter, however, is that they contain extremely important material directly relating to spiritual affairs. The Salamander letter, for example, changes the story of the Angel Moroni appearing to Joseph Smith to that of a cantankerous and tricky “old spirit” who transforms himself from a white salamander and strikes Joseph Smith. Moreover, some of the purported Joseph Smith writings which Hofmann sold to the church contain revelations from the Lord Himself. For instance, the Joseph Smith III Blessing document gives this message from the Lord: “Verily, thus saith the Lord: if he abides in me, his days shall be lengthened upon the earth, but, if he abides not in me, I, the Lord, will receive him, in an instant, unto myself.” The 1838 letter of Joseph Smith to his brother, Hyrum, is in its entirety a revelation purporting to come from the Lord. It begins with the words, “Verily thus Saith the Lord,” and ends with the word “Amen.” The fact that the Mormon leaders were unable to recognize the spurious nature of these revelations casts doubt upon their ability to discern the truthfulness of the other revelations given by Joseph Smith. It has always been claimed that it is virtually impossible for a person to write a revelation that would compare with Joseph Smith’s. It now appears that there is someone who can write revelations comparable to Joseph Smith’s and that it is even possible to get them past the scrutiny of the highest leadership of the Mormon Church.

The Mormon leaders teach that there has been “a restoration of the gospel” through Joseph Smith the Prophet. Smith restored the Book of Mormon and a great deal of other ancient Scripture. All of these purported Scriptures have no provenance—i.e., there is no proof of their existence prior to the manuscripts written on what was modern paper during Joseph Smith’s lifetime. Mark Hofmann, like Joseph Smith, seems to have produced his own “restoration” of religious documents from the past. While he has not pretended to find the signatures of Abraham, Moses and Aaron, he has “discovered” Mormon material which was supposed to have been written as far back as the 1820’s. Mr. Hofmann restored important letters and revelations from Joseph Smith as well as material from other prominent Mormons. Hofmann’s “restoration” was even more convincing than Joseph Smith’s because he not only gave us the text of these significant documents, but he claimed to have the very original copies on paper dating back to the period in which they were supposed to have been written.

The exposure of Mr. Hofmann’s attempt to undermine the Mormon Church does not really help the church. On the contrary, it shows how gullible we all can be and that even the Prophet of the Mormon Church can be deceived. Once the fallibility of the present Prophet, Seer and Revelator is perceived, one begins to wonder about Joseph Smith himself. When the searchlight is focused upon him, we see that he looks remarkably like Mark Hofmann.

Mark Hofmann’s forgery scheme has been referred to as “an attempted blackmail of the Mormon church itself.” (Chicago Tribune, October 25, 1985) The purported 1825 letter of Joseph Smith to Josiah Stowell is a good example of Hofmann’s attempt to play upon the fears of the Mormon leaders. This letter has Joseph Smith attempting to help a money-digger find buried treasure. Smith tells him that the “treasure must be guarded by some clever spirit” and instructs him to “take a hasel stick one yard long being new Cut and cleave it Just in the middle and lay it asunder on the mine . . . and if there is treasure after a while you shall see them draw and Join together again of themselves . . .” While we have marshalled a great deal of evidence linking Joseph Smith to money-digging and magic, the Mormon leaders must have felt that it would be just too devastating to church members to allow them to read a letter signed by Joseph Smith which seemed to confirm his occultic activities. Consequently, “on or about January 11, 1983,” Gordon B. Hinckley, a member of the Mormon Church’s First Presidency, secretly purchased the letter from Mark Hofmann for “$15,000.” If the contents of this letter had not been embarrassing, the church’s Deseret News would have undoubtedly published a photograph of it with a large headline announcing that the earliest known letter of Joseph Smith had been discovered. As it turned out, the letter was put in a vault and very few people knew of its existence. In 1984 a typescript of the letter leaked out and we published it in The Money-Digging Letters. One would think that after we published the contents of the letter the Mormon Church would admit that it had the letter. Instead, however, the church decided to “stonewall.” At about the time we printed the letter, we had a discussion with one of the top historians in the Mormon Church, who lamented that the church had allowed itself to become involved in a cover-up a situation with regard to the 1825 letter. On April 29, 1985, Salt Lake Tribune reporter Dawn Tracy wrote:

A letter reportedly written by Mormon Church founder Joseph Smith describing money-digging pursuits and treasure guarded by a clever spirit seems to have disappeared from view. . . .

Research historian Brent Metcalfe said he knows from “very reliable, first-hand sources” the letter exists, and the Mormon Church has possession of it.

Church spokesman Jerry Cahill denied the claim.

“The church doesn’t have the letter,” said Mr. Cahill, “It’s not in the church archives or the First Presidency’s vault.” . . .

Someone may be playing word games, said George Smith, president of Signature Books, a Mormon publishing house focussing on scholarly publications.

“The church clearly has possession of the letter,” he said. “If the exact question isn’t asked, someone can wink and say the church doesn’t have it.”

“No, said Mr. Cahill, the church does not have possession of the letter.” (Salt Lake Tribune, April 29, 1985)

On May 6, 1985, the Salt Lake Tribune published a letter to the editor by George Smith. In this letter he revealed that “some scholars have reported seeing it at the church offices, . . . A number of scholars have photocopies of the letter, . . .” When it became apparent to the church leaders that the letter was going to be published in a major newspaper without their consent, they decided to back down and admit the existence of the letter. Jerry Cahill, Director of Public Affairs for the Mormon Church, admitted in a letter to the editor that his earlier statement was incorrect:

. . . staff writer Dawn Tracy correctly quoted my statement to her that the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints doesn’t have a letter purportedly written in 1825 by Joseph Smith to Josiah Stowel (or Stool) either in the church archives or in the First Presidency’s vault.

My statement, however, was in error, for which I apologize . . . Some months ago I was asked the same question by another inquirer and made a thorough check before responding. Dawn Tracy called me twice as she prepared her article and I responded without checking again.

When my published statement came to his attention, President Gordon B. Hinckley of the First Presidency of the church informed me of my error. The purported letter was indeed acquired by the church. For the present it is stored in the First Presidency’s archives . . . (Salt Lake Tribune, May 7, 1985)

It is very obvious from all this that the Mormon leaders were caught in a very embarrassing cover-up with regard to the letter and that they only published it because their own scholars were preparing to release it to the press. Since President Hinckley secretly bought this letter in 1983 and never mentioned its existence, it is obvious that church leaders intended to suppress it. Time magazine for May 20, 1985, reported that “The church offered no explanation for withholding news of the earliest extant document written by Smith, . . .” Church leaders were able to hide the fact that they had the letter for 28 months! In the Salt Lake Tribune, October 20, 1985, Dawn Tracy revealed that even top Mormon historians, including the Church Archivist, were kept in the dark concerning the purchase of the 1825 letter:

Don Schmidt, retired LDS Church archivist, said members of the First Presidency didn’t tell him or church historians about the 1825 letter. Nor did they ask him or anyone in his department to authenticate the letter. . . . Church spokesman Jerry Cahill said Dean Jesse[e], an expert in writings of Joseph Smith, had authenticated the letter at the time church officials purchased it.

Dr. Jesse[e] said he did not see the letter until after church officials purchased it and publicly released its contents. He said the man who invited him in May to authenticate the letter was Mr. Cahill.

In April Mr. Cahill said the church did not possess the 1825 letter. A few days later he said he had been in error and apologized.

At Hofmann's preliminary hearing, document expert William Flynn testified that "The ink cracking phenomenon, that I'm talking about, is present in the Josiah Stowell letter . . ." Flynn concluded: "I don't believe it's a genuine document of that era."

The action of the church leaders in buying up and suppressing Mark Hofmann's documents raises another important question: if they were willing to pay thousands of dollars to buy forgeries which tended to discredit Joseph Smith, how many authentic documents have they bought up and locked away in the church archives and the First Presidency's vault? The fact that the General Authorities of the church believed in and bought Mr. Hofmann's forgeries reveals a great deal about their own thinking concerning the original Prophet. They must have known from other things they have read that Joseph Smith was deeply involved in money-digging and magic or they would not have been so easily persuaded to buy Hofmann's documents. The impression one gets is that the Mormon leaders know that Joseph Smith was not really like the image the church has presented to the people, but that they must maintain that image at all costs—even if it means they have to buy up and suppress documents.

We are only able to present a portion of the results of our investigation into the Hofmann affair in the space available. For a detailed study see our publication, Tracking the White Salamander—The Story of Mark Hofmann, Murder and Forged Mormon Documents.

Suppressed Material Concerning the Civil War Prophecy

On pages 190-92 of this book we deal with Joseph Smith's famous prophecy concerning the Civil War. In the History of the Church, vol. 5, page 324, we find another reference to the 1832 prophecy attributed to Joseph Smith:

I prophesy, in the name of the Lord God, that the commencement of the difficulties which will cause much bloodshed previous to the coming of the Son of Man will be in South Carolina. It may probably arise through the slave question. This a voice declared to me while I was praying earnestly on the subject, December 25, 1832.

In our research in the diary of Joseph Smith we found that this statement does appear under the date of April 2, 1843, although there have been a few changes in wording. A careful examination of this portion of Joseph Smith's diary, however, reveals that some very important material has been suppressed. Before we can understand the significance of this matter we must turn back in Joseph Smith's diary to the date of March 11, 1843, where we find the following:

A dream, then related, Night before last I dreamed that an old man came to me and said there was a mob force coming upon him, and he was likely to loose his life, that I was Leut General and had the command of a large force, and I was also a patriot and disposed to protect the innocent & — [word unclear] finding & wanted I should assist him. I told him I wanted some written documents to show the facts that they are the aggressors, & I would raise a force sufficient for his protection, that I would call out the Legion. He turned to go from me, but turned again and said to me. "I have any amount of men at my command and will put them under your command."

This dream, with some modifications, appears in the History of the Church, vol. 5, page 301.

Now, when we move ahead to the date of April 2, 1843, in the diary of Joseph Smith, we find that just before Joseph Smith gives his second account of the prophecy concerning South Carolina, there is an interpretation of the dream which reads as follows:

Related the dream written on page 3—Book B Interpretation by O. Hyde—old man.—government of these United States, who will be invaded by a foreign fee, probably England. U.S. Government will call on Gen. Smith to defend probably all this western territory and offer him any amount of men he shall desire & put them under his command.

This important interpretation of the dream should appear in the History of the Church, vol. 5, page 324, just before the words "I prophesy." The reader will find, however, that the interpretation has been completely omitted. The reason that it was suppressed is obvious: Joseph Smith was dead by the time the Civil War started, and therefore the interpretation could not be fulfilled. In his first account of the prophecy on the Civil War, Doctrine and Covenants 87:3, Joseph Smith had predicted that England would come into the war and that the war would spread until it "shall be poured out upon all nations." The war did not spread to "all nations" as Smith had predicted, and the U.S. Government certainly did not call upon Joseph Smith to protect it from England or any other country. As we shall show later, Joseph Smith was lieutenant general of the Nauvoo Legion, and he did ask the U.S. Government for "100,000 men to extend protection to persons wishing to settle Oregon and other portions of the territory" (History of the Church, vol. 6, p. 282). This request, however, was denied.

We feel that the interpretation of the dream that was suppressed undermines the prophecy on the Civil War. It should be noted also that the part omitted should have appeared in the middle of a portion of Joseph Smith's History (vol. 5, pp. 323-24) which was later canonized as a revelation in the Doctrine and Covenants, section 130. In other words, section 130 contains the abbreviated material from the History of the Church. The portion that was suppressed should appear between verses 11 and 12.

On pages 190-92 of this book, we have shown that the prophecy about the Civil War came because of the rebellion of South Carolina in 1832, and that it contains inaccuracies which tend to invalidate it. In addition to this we have found out that the Mormon leaders have suppressed part of Joseph Smith's diary which tended to discredit the revelation.

14. The Hereafter

The Mormon writer J. N. Washburn states: “I know of nowhere outside the Book of Mormon where the relationship of justice and mercy is so fully discussed as it is here. Indeed, it is almost central” (The Contents, Structure and Authorship of the Book of Mormon, 1954, p. 124).

While we must agree that the Book of Mormon is filled with the discussion of justice and mercy, this is not too surprising when we find that this was a very important issue at the time Joseph Smith was working on his book.

Universalists

Because the Universalists were claiming that man would not receive eternal punishment for his sins, the question of justice and mercy was a burning issue during Joseph Smith’s lifetime. The evangelist Charles G. Finney tells of an incident that took place in the 1820’s:

... a Universalist minister came in and began to promulge his objectionable doctrines ... people became so interested that there was a large number that seemed to be shaken in their minds, in regard to the commonly received views of the Bible. ... The great effort of the Universalist was of course to show that sin did not deserve endless punishment. He inveighed against the doctrine of endless punishment as unjust, infinitely cruel and absurd ... how could a God of love punish men endlessly? ...

When the evening came for my lecture, the house was crowded. I took up the question of the justice of endless punishment, and discussed it through that and the next evening. There was general satisfaction with the presentation. (Charles G. Finney, pp. 48-49)

Speaking of another incident, Charles G. Finney said: “. . . as Universalists always do, he dwelt mainly on the utter injustice of endless punishment” (Ibid., p. 120).

The Gospel Advocate, a Universalist publication which was printed in Buffalo, New York, stated that orthodox Christians were the “violent opposers of the Universalists . . .” (Gospel Advocate, April 21, 1826, p. 118). On November 17, 1826, the Gospel Advocate printed a letter from a minister to Mrs. Mary Cooley. In this letter we read:

It is currently reported, that you deny the final and eternal punishment of the wicked; and avow your belief that all men will finally be saved . . . if you do not renounce this error and heresy, the Church will be obliged to cut you off as a heretic from their communion.

On March 3, 1826, the Gospel Advocate printed a letter from an orthodox Christian which stated that “infidel preachers have come into the neighborhood, who blas[p]hemiously assert that there is neither hell nor devil, and that all my fears proceed from ignorance.”

When we examine the Book of Mormon we see that it is filled with this controversy. In Alma 1:3 we read of a wicked man who “had gone about among the people, preaching to them that which he termed to be the word of God, . . .” In the fourth verse of the same chapter it becomes clear that this man was a Universalist in his doctrine:

And he also testified unto the people that all mankind should be saved at the last day, and that they need not fear nor tremble, but that they might lift up their heads and rejoice; for the Lord had created all men, and had also redeemed all men; and, in the end, all men should have eternal life. (Alma 1:4)

The reader will notice that this wicked man taught that “all mankind should be saved at the last day.” In the Universalist publication, Gospel Advocate, we find many similar expressions:

The Universalists believe . . . all men will ultimately enjoy happiness, . . . (Gospel Advocate, Feb. 17, 1826, p. 47)

. . . he both can and will save all mankind with an everlasting salvation . . . (Ibid., p. 47)

. . . all punishment will ultimately have an end. (Ibid., p. 123)

. . . all men will be saved. (Ibid., p. 158)

. . . all men will finally be saved. (Ibid., p. 178)

The Universalists taught that “the devil is a nonentity, and an endless hell of brimstone a bug-bear . . .” (Gospel Advocate, August 25, 1826, p. 245). The Book of Mormon, on the other hand, warns against such a teaching:

And behold, others he flattereth away, and telleth them there is no hell; and he saith unto them: I am no devil, for there is none—and thus he whispereth in their ears, until he grasps them with his awful chains, . . . and all that have been seized therewith must . . . go into the place prepared for them, even a lake of fire and brimstone, which is endless torment. (2 Nephi 28:22-23)

Joseph Smith could hardly have avoided this controversy. The Mormon historian B. H. Roberts informs us that Joseph Smith lived with Joseph Knight and his family “when he was twenty-one years of age, . . .” (Comprehensive History of the Church, vol. 1, p. 85, n. 1), and on page 200 of the same volume, B. H. Roberts informs us that they were Universalists: “Of this family and the friendship subsisting between them and Joseph Smith we have already spoken. The family were Universalists in their faith, . . .”

Richard L. Anderson, of Brigham Young University, has recently discovered evidence that Joseph Smith’s own father was at one time a Universalist:

. . . the Tunbridge Town Record, . . . records the formation of a Universalist Society in 1797, three of whose members were Asael Smith, Jesse Smith (the eldest son), and Joseph Smith (the Prophet’s father). (The Ensign, Feb. 1971, p. 16)

Although Joseph Smith’s father was a Universalist in Tunbridge, he apparently did not give much support to any church in Palmyra. Joseph Smith states that his “father’s family was proselyted to the Presbyterian faith,” but that “my mind became somewhat partial to the Methodist sect, . . .” (Pearl of Great Price, Joseph Smith 2:7-8). Since the Presbyterians and the Methodists were opposed to the Universalists, it is not surprising that the Book of Mormon supports the orthodox position. It is also interesting to note that Alexander Campbell was opposed to the Universalists. On December 5, 1825, he wrote:

. . . I would earnestly request those preachers of universal deliverance from hell, to stop and think...we are very sure that all the Universalists on earth cannot produce one sentence in all the revelations of God that says any thing about the termination of the punishment of the wicked. (The Christian Baptist, vol. 3, pp. 104-105)

On September 7, 1826, Alexander Campbell published a letter from a boy who was questioning the doctrine of eternal punishment. In this letter we read the following:

You will, no doubt, be surprised at receiving a letter from a boy; . . . While reflecting, one day, on the subject of the truth of revealed religion, a thought occurred to me with peculiar force, it was: Whether the Deity would have created any being and placed him in such a situation in which it was possible for him to make himself deserving of eternal torment. . . . I was led strongly to doubt the divinity of the Bible. . . . I thought that as the greatest degree of happiness, was the only object of creation, the design of the Almighty would have failed, if as the scripture authorize us to believe, a majority of mankind will be forever damned: . . . I thought that as the Deity was the first cause of all things, . . . he could not punish any of his creatures with eternal misery; . . . I . . . could not satisfy myself of the necessity or justice of God's punishing a being, eternally, for the effects of a weakness in which he was born. Punishment, I thought, should be proportioned to criminality; but in inflicting eternal punishment for temporal crimes, this principle of justice [is] violated. (The Christian Baptist, vol. 4, pp. 36-37)

Alexander Campbell devoted almost 20 pages of The Christian Baptist to answer this boy's arguments.

In the Book of Mormon we find that Alma had a similar problem with his son:

And now, my son, I perceive there is somewhat more which doth worry your mind, which ye cannot understand—which is concerning the justice of God in the punishment of the sinner; for ye do try to suppose that it is injustice that the sinner should be consigned to a state of misery.

Now behold, my son, I will explain this thing unto thee. (Book of Mormon, Alma 42:1-2)

In the Gospel Advocate for January 19, 1827, we read: "In England, . . . several of the most zealous and useful Unitarian ministers publicly avow their belief in the final restoration of all men to happiness; . . ."

In another article, we read of "the doctrine of the final restoration" of all souls to "holiness and happiness" (The Gospel Advocate, February 3, 1826, p. 25).

Now, in Alma's discussion with his son, he seems to answer this very point:

And now, my son, I have somewhat to say concerning the restoration of which has been spoken; for behold, some have wrested the scriptures, . . . Behold, it is requisite . . . that the soul of man should be restored to its body, and that every part of the body should be restored to itself.

And it is requisite with the justice of God that men should be judged according to their works; and if their works were good in this life, and the desires of their hearts were good, that they should also, at the last day, be restored unto that which is good.

And if their works are evil they shall be restored unto them for evil. . . .

Do not suppose, because it has been spoken concerning restoration, that ye shall be restored from sin to happiness. Behold, I say unto you, wickedness never was happiness. . . .

And now behold, is the meaning of the word restoration to take a thing of a natural state and place it in an unnatural state, or to place it in a state opposite to its nature?

O, my son, this is not the case; but the meaning of the word restoration is to bring back again evil for evil, or carnal for carnal, or devilish for devilish—. . . therefore, the word restoration more fully condemneth the sinner, and justifieth him not at all. (Book of Mormon, Alma 41:1-4, 10, 12, 13, 15)

It is very difficult for us to believe that the ancient Nephites would be arguing over exactly the same issues and terms that were being discussed in Joseph Smith's time.

Richard L. Anderson informs us that "the Universalists held a faith that denied the orthodox doctrine of damnation . . . A convention agreed on the following typical tenet in 1803: 'We believe there is one God, . . . who will finally restore the whole family of mankind to holiness and happiness'" (The Ensign, February 1971, p. 16).

Milton V. Backman, Jr., says that during Joseph Smith's boyhood days in Palmyra "the views of the Universalists were also being fanned in the area by means of pamphlets written by their apologists and by a few enthusiastic spokesmen living within seven miles of the Smith farm, . . ." (Joseph Smith's First Vision, 1971, p. 93).

Joseph Changes His Mind

Although Joseph Smith vigorously opposed the doctrine of the Universalists and supported the orthodox position concerning hell in his Book of Mormon, within a year he had completely changed his mind concerning this matter. In a revelation given to Martin Harris in March, 1830, Joseph Smith made this statement: "Nevertheless, it is not written that there shall be no end to this torment, but it is written endless torment" (Doctrine and Covenants 19:6). Joseph Smith goes on to explain that "endless punishment" does not mean that the sinner will suffer the punishment eternally. B. H. Roberts stated: "Christians believed that to receive eternal punishment was to be punished eternally. This popular Christian error was corrected in a revelation to Martin Harris . . ." (Outlines of Ecclesiastical History, p. 408).

President Joseph Fielding Smith stated: "We learn from the Doctrine and Covenants that eternal punishment, or everlasting punishment, does not mean that a man condemned will endure this punishment forever, . . ." (Doctrines of Salvation, vol. 2, p. 160). On page 228 of the same book President Smith states that a "man may partake of endless torment, and when he has paid the penalty for his transgression, he is released, but the punishment remains and awaits the next culprit, and so on forever."

When Joseph Smith became converted to the ideas of the Universalists he completely repudiated the teachings of the Book of Mormon. It would almost appear that he completely forgot what he had previously written in the Book of Mormon. In his later theology he taught that eternal punishment would eventually come to an end, but in the Book of Mormon he had stated that eternal punishment is as eternal as the life of the soul:

Now, repentance could not come unto men except there were a punishment, which also was eternal as the life of the soul should be, affixed opposite to the plan of happiness, which was as eternal also as the life of the soul. (Book of Mormon, Alma 42:16)

In Mosiah 2:38, 39, we read that it is a final doom: "Therefore if that man repenteth not, and remaineth and dieth an enemy to God, . . . mercy hath no claim on that man; therefore his final doom is to endure a never ending torment." In 3 Nephi 27:11, 17, it is made clear that the wicked can never return:

. . . and by and by the end cometh, and they are hewn down and cast into the fire, from whence there is no return. . . .

And he that endureth not unto the end, the same is he that is also hewn down and cast into the fire, from whence they can no more return, because of the justice of the Father.

Although it seems almost incredible that Joseph Smith completely reversed his position regarding eternal punishment, we must remember that he did this with regard to many other doctrines and practices. For instance, he condemned polygamy and secret societies in the Book of Mormon, yet he became a polygamist and a Mason before his death.

Although Joseph Smith took a great deal of space in the Book of Mormon to warn against an "awful hell," toward the end of his life he seemed to be indifferent and even flippant concerning this matter. In the Nauvoo Expositor, June 7, 1844, we read the following:

... our petitions were treated with contempt; and in many cases the petitioner spurned from their presence, and particularly by Joseph, who would state that if he had sinned, and was guilty of the charges we would charge him with, he would not make acknowledgment, but would rather be damned; for it would detract from his dignity, and would consequently ruin and prove the overthrow of the Church. We would ask him on the other hand, if the overthrow of the Church was not inevitable, to which he often replied, that we would all go to Hell together, and convert it into a heaven, by casting the Devil out; and says he, Hell is by no means the place this world of fools suppose it to be, but on the contrary, it is quite an agreeable place: to which we would now reply, he can enjoy it if he is determined not to desist from his evil ways; but as for us, and ours, we will serve the Lord our God! (The Nauvoo Expositor, June 7, 1844)

That Joseph Smith may have made the comments attributed to him seems likely, for we find the following in the History of the Church:

I see no faults in the Church, and therefore let me be resurrected with the Saints, whether I ascend to heaven or descend to hell, or go to any other place. And if we go to hell, we will turn the devils out of doors and make a heaven of it. (History of the Church, vol. 5, p. 517)

The fact that Joseph Smith completely changed his position concerning hell has led to a great deal of confusion among the Mormon people. Brigham Young taught that there would be no females in hell:

I doubt whether it can be found, from the revelations that are given and the facts as they exist, that there is a female in all the regions of hell. (Journal of Discourses, vol. 8, p. 222)

The Mormon Apostle John A. Widtsoe taught that “Very few will be so condemned” as to become the “sons of perdition” because “very few have the knowledge required.” The Apostle Widtsoe went on to state:

All others, who are not classed as sons of perdition, will be “redeemed in the due time of the Lord”; that is, they will all be saved. The meanest sinner will find some place in the heavenly realm. . . .

In the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints, there is no hell. All will find a measure of salvation. . . . The gospel of Jesus Christ has no hell in the old proverbial sense. (Joseph Smith—Seeker After Truth, Salt Lake City, 1951, pp. 177-178)

It is interesting to note that the Book of Mormon says that it is the devil who will say there is no hell. In 2 Nephi 28:21 and 22 we read:

And others will he pacify, and lull them away into carnal security, that they will say: All is well in Zion; yea, Zion prospereth, all is well—and thus the devil cheateth their souls, and leadeth them away carefully down to hell.

And behold, others he flattereth away, and telleth them there is no hell; . . . and thus he whispereth in their ears, until he grasps them with his awful chains, from whence there is no deliverance.

The Apostle John A. Widtsoe seemed to be teaching the very thing that the Book of Mormon condemned!

Mormon Purgatory

Milton V. Backman, Assistant Professor of Church History at the Brigham Young University, stated: “Joseph Smith . . . accepted the Roman Catholic concept that there was an intermediate or preparatory stage between death and a final judgment” (Seminar On The Prophet Joseph Smith, Brigham Young University, Feb. 18, 1961).

President Joseph Fielding Smith stated:

It is the duty of men in this life to repent. Every man who hears the gospel message is under obligation to receive it. If he fails, then in the Spirit World he will be called upon to receive it. . . . (Doctrines of Salvation, vol. 2, p. 183)

On page 220 of the same book President Smith says:

Even the wicked of the earth . . . shall at last come forth from the prison house, repentant and willing to bow the knee and acknowledge Christ, . . .

President Smith also stated:

It is decreed that the unrighteous shall have to spend their time during this thousand years in the prison house prepared for them where they can repent and cleanse themselves through the things which they shall suffer. (Doctrines of Salvation, vol. 3, p. 60)

Heber C. Kimball, who was a member of the First Presidency under Brigham Young, made these statements:

That is loving the wicked, to send them there to hell to be burnt out until they are purified. Yes, they shall go there and stay there and be burnt, like an old pipe that stinks with long usage and corruption, until they are burnt out, and then their spirits may be saved in the day of God Almighty. (Journal of Discourses, vol. 4, p. 223)

You have often heard me speak about my kindred. . . . Will they be saved? Yes, they will, but they will be saved as I have told you many of this people will; they will first go to hell and remain there until the corruption with which they are impregnated is burnt out; and the day will yet come when they will come to me and acknowledge me as their Savior and I will redeem them and bring them forth from hell to where I live and make them my servants; and they will be quite willing to enter into my service. (Ibid., vol. 3, p. 109)

In accepting the Roman Catholic concept of a purgatory or “preparatory stage between death and a final judgment,” the Mormon Church leaders have had to lay aside the teachings of the Book of Mormon. In Alma 34:32-35 it is made very clear that there is no chance for repentance after death:

For behold this life is the time for men to prepare to meet God, yea, behold the day of this life is the day for men to perform their labors. . . . I beseech of you that ye do not procrastinate the day of your repentance until the end; for after this day of life, which is given us to prepare for eternity, behold, if we do not improve our time while in this life, then cometh the night of darkness wherein there can be no labor performed.

Ye cannot say, when ye are brought to that awful crisis, that I will repent, that I will return to my God. Nay, ye cannot say this; for that same spirit which doth possess your bodies at the time that ye go out of this life, that same spirit will have power to possess your body in that eternal world.

For behold, if ye have procrastinated the day of your repentance even until death, behold, ye have become subjected to the spirit of the devil, and he doth seal you his; therefore, the Spirit of the Lord hath withdrawn from you, and hath no place in you, and the devil hath all power over you; and this is the final state of the wicked.

Degrees of Glory

On February 16, 1832, Joseph Smith gave a revelation which states that there will be three different degrees of glory after the resurrection (see Doctrine and Covenants, section 76). In the History of the Church, vol. 1, page 283, we find the following statement about these three degrees:

Except a man be born again, he cannot see the Kingdom of God . . . A man may be saved, after the judgment, in the Terrestrial kingdom, or in the Telestial kingdom, but he can never see the Celestial kingdom of God, without being born of water and the Spirit.

President Joseph Fielding Smith stated:

Those who reject the gospel, but live honorable lives, shall also be heirs of salvation, but not in the Celestial kingdom. The Lord has prepared a place for them in the Terrestrial kingdom.

Those who live lives of wickedness may also be heirs of salvation, that is, they too shall be redeemed from death and from hell eventually. (Doctrines of Salvation, vol. 2, p. 133)

This doctrine of three degrees of glory is certainly not in harmony with the teachings of the Book of Mormon. In 1 Nephi 15:35 we read that there is only a heaven and a hell:

And there is a place prepared, yea, even that awful hell of which I have spoken, and the devil is the foundation of it; wherefore the final state of the souls of men is to dwell in the kingdom of God, or to be cast out because of that justice of which I have spoken.

In Alma 5:24, 25, 39, we read that those who are cast out of the kingdom of heaven are of the kingdom of the devil:

Behold, my brethren, do ye suppose that such an one can have a place to sit down in the kingdom of God, . . . I say unto you, Nay; except ye make our Creator a liar from the beginning, . . . ye cannot suppose that such can have place in the kingdom of heaven; but they shall be cast out for they are the children of the kingdom of the devil. . . .

And now if ye are not the sheep of the good shepherd, of what fold are ye? Behold, I say unto you, that the devil is your shepherd, and ye are of his fold; and now, who can deny this? Behold, I say unto you, whosoever denieth this is a liar and a child of the devil.

The Apostle Orson Pratt had to admit that the Bible and Book of Mormon did not lend much support to the doctrine of three degrees of glory:

Then again, what could we learn from either the Bible or Book of Mormon in regard to three glories—the celestial, the terrestrial and the telestial glories? What did we know concerning those that should inhabit these various worlds of glory? Nothing at all. (Journal of Discourses, vol. 20, p. 70)

The Mormon Church uses the statement made by Paul in 1 Corinthians 15:40 to try to prove there are three degrees of glory: “There are also celestial bodies, and bodies terrestrial: but the glory of the celestial is one, and the glory of the terrestrial is another.”

The first thing that should be noted about this verse is the fact that it does not use the word telestial; this is a word that was made up by Joseph Smith. Bruce R. McConkie says: “The fact that some of these are telestial bodies has been lost from the King James Version of the Bible” (Mormon Doctrine, 1966, p. 777). Bruce R. McConkie and other Mormon writers are, of course, unable to furnish any evidence that this has been deleted from the Bible or even that “telestial” is an actual word.

The second thing that should be noted is the meaning of the words celestial and terrestrial. The American College Dictionary tells us that the meaning of celestial is “pertaining to the spiritual or invisible heaven; heavenly; . . .” The word terrestrial means “pertaining to, consisting of, or representing the earth: . . .” So we see that the word celestial simply means “heavenly” and the word terrestrial means “earthly.” In Young’s Literal Translation of the Holy Bible, the original Greek words epourania and epigeia are rendered as “heavenly” and “earthly” instead of “celestial” and “terrestrial”: “. . . and there are heavenly bodies, and earthly bodies; but one is the glory of the heavenly, and another that of the earthly; . . .”

The third thing that should be noted concerning this verse is the context it appears in. A careful examination of the context, verses 35-54, reveals that Paul was comparing our earthly body with the body we shall receive in the resurrection; he was not speaking of three kingdoms in heaven. All of us now have a terrestrial or earthly body, but in the resurrection we shall have a celestial or heavenly body. Verse 44 makes it clear that Paul was speaking of the difference between the body we now have and the body we shall receive in the resurrection: “It is sown a natural body; it is raised a spiritual body. There is a natural body, and there is a spiritual body.”

Therefore, we see that the doctrine of three degrees of glory cannot be supported from the Bible, nor can it be supported from the Book of Mormon. Both books condemn this teaching.

It is very interesting to note that the revelation concerning the degrees of glory (Doctrine and Covenants, section 76) had four important changes made in it regarding the “sons of perdition.” When the revelation was first published in The Evening And The Morning Star, it contained these statements:

And we saw a vision of the eternal sufferings of those . . . who are the sons of perdition, . . . they are vessels of wrath doomed to suffer the wrath of God, with the devil and his angels, throughout eternity: . . . to reign with the devil and his angels throughout eternity, . . . this is the end of the vision of the eternal sufferings of the ungodly! (The Evening And The Morning Star, July, 1832, p. 2)

In the Doctrine and Covenants this has been changed to read:

And we saw a vision of the sufferings of those . . . who are the sons of perdition, . . . they are vessels of wrath, doomed to suffer the wrath of God, with the devil and his angels in eternity; . . . to reign with the devil and his angels in eternity, . . . this is the end of the vision of the sufferings of the ungodly. (Doctrine and Covenants 76:30, 32, 33, 44, 49)

The reader will notice that the word “throughout” has been changed to “in” in two places and that the word “eternal” has been deleted in two places.

Dissolved and Reorganized Spirits

Brigham Young once stated: “Every possession and object of affection will be taken from those who forsake the truth, and their identity and existence will eventually cease.” (Journal of Discourses, vol. 4, pp. 31-32) Heber C. Kimball said:

I believe in annihilation in one degree. Men will sin so that they will be damned spiritually and temporally. There will be a dissolution of the natural body and of the spirit, and they will go back into their native element, the same as the chemist can go to work and dissolve a five-dollar gold piece, and throw it into a liquid. Does not that show there can be a dissolution of the natural body and of the spirit? This is what is called the second death. (Journal of Discourses, vol. 5, p. 95)

Brigham Young hinted that after the spirits were dissolved they would be reorganized or made over again:

He had not the power of endless life in him, and he will be decomposed, and the particles which compose his body and spirit will return to their native element. . . . What can you make of this but decomposition, the returning of the organized particles to their native element, after suffering the wrath of God until the time appointed. . . . When the elements in an organized form do not fill the end of their creation, they are thrown back again, like brother Kimball’s old pottery ware, to be ground up, and made over again. (Journal of Discourses, vol. 1, p. 275)

The rebellious will be thrown back into their native element, there to remain myriads of years before their dust will again be revived, before they will be re-organized. Some might argue that this principle would lead to the re-organization of Satan, and all the devils. I say nothing about this, only what the Lord says—that when he comes, “he will destroy death, and him that has the power of it.” (Journal of Discourses, vol. 1, p. 118)

The Mormon Apostle John A. Widtsoe made the following statement:

President Brigham Young has suggested that the ultimate punishment of the sons of perdition may be that they, having their spiritual bodies disorganized, must start over again, must begin anew the long journey of existence, repeating the steps that they took in the eternities before the Great Council was held. (Evidences and Reconciliations, pp. 213-214)

15. The Missionary System

Since the time of Joseph Smith the Mormon leaders have sent missionaries throughout the world to gain converts to the church. The Mormon Apostle George A. Smith once stated that a member of the Mormon Church had been excommunicated for refusing to go on a mission:

It was at the same Council that Daniel Copley, a timid young man, who had been ordained a Priest, and required to go and preach the Gospel, was called to an account for not going on his mission. The young man said he was too weak to attempt to preach, and the Council cut him off the Church. I wonder what our missionaries now would think of so rigid a discipline as was given at that time thirty years ago, under the immediate supervision of the Prophet. (Journal of Discourses, vol. 11, p. 8)

Under Brigham Young the church continued to send missionaries throughout the world, but Young did not seem to be very concerned about the quality of the missionaries he sent out. In an article published in the Valley Tan on April 26, 1859, it was claimed that Brigham Young was sending men on missions to get rid of them:

We have heard it intimated that it is the custom of the church whenever they want to rid themselves of bad elders, without resorting to violent means, the Conference politely gives them a call to go on a mission, a species of exile which, while it relieves them from their presence at home, is not the most complementary or befitting way to propagate even Mormonism.

Brigham Young did not attempt to deny this charge; instead, he frankly admitted that he “sent men on missions to get rid of them”:

Some of you wondered why I sent Thomas Bullock to take your names; I wanted to know the men who were coaxing hell into our midst, for I wish to send them to China, to the East Indies, or to where they cannot get back, at least for five years. . . . we will send off the poor curses on a mission, and then the devil may have them, and we do not care how soon they apostatize, after they get as far as California. (Journal of Discourses, vol. 3, p. 239)

Keep away from court houses; no decent man will go there unless he goes as a witness, or is in some manner compelled to go. I know that many are obliged to go, but those who creep around to see what is going on, let me tell you, the devil has possession of them. I wish such persons to go to California, if they wish to. I counsel you to keep away from courts, we have got the names of those who have attended that court room, and we will send those characters on long missions, for we want to get rid of them, and we do not care whether they apostatize or not. . . . People abroad may say, “Why don’t you send us all good men?” Do you believe them? No, you do not, when we send them. We wish them to stay here, only those whom it is necessary to have go, but we have no business here for those poor miserable devils. (Ibid., p. 241)

We have at times sent men on missions to get rid of them; but they have generally come back. Some think it is an imposition upon the world to send such men among them. But which is best—to keep them here to pollute others, or to send them where pollution is more prevalent? . . . We have tried to turn the filthy ones out of the flock, but they will not always stay out. (Ibid., vol. 7, pp. 228-229)

Things have changed a great deal since Brigham Young’s time. The Mormon leaders no longer send men on missions to get rid of them, although in some cases they might be sent to help reform them. Bruce R. McConkie states: “Foreign missionaries drop their temporal pursuits, travel to the nations of the earth, and for periods of two or three years, without financial help from the Church, devote their full time to proclaiming the message of the restoration” (Mormon Doctrine, 1966, p. 509). Most of the missionaries are young men just out of high school—for example, Lynn Kenneth Packer was 19 years old at the time he began his mission (A Missionary Experience, p. 9). Except for a “week’s general training in the Salt Lake City mission home” (Ibid., p. 9), the missionary receives no formal preparation before going to the field. In 1961 Joseph Fielding Smith, the tenth President of the Mormon Church, made these revealing statements:

The missionary of the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints is a modern miracle. In the world the idea prevails that a man must go to school, college, get an education, be trained and get a degree to qualify him to preach and to teach the gospel of Jesus Christ, as he understands it. We call our young men and women at the beginning, really, of life, . . . We send them out into the world untrained, . . . They are unprepared, insofar as education and knowledge are concerned. Most of them have never read the Book of Mormon, a great part of them, if not the greater part, have never read the New Testament. They are not familiar with the revelations in the Doctrine and Covenants. I find this out when I interview them. But they have one thing that the world does not have, and cannot have, and that’s a testimony and the determination to go out into the field, as unprepared as they are, and spend two or maybe more years bearing witness to the restoration of the gospel, expounding the scriptures, as they learn them. (Improvement Era, October 1961, p. 716)

Joseph H. Weston, who was converted to the church in 1948, stated that before the missionaries left for the field they were given a letter containing 42 “strict rules of personal conduct.” One of these rules reads as follows: “26. Never say in public or in private that you do not know the gospel is true” (These Amazing Mormons, Salt Lake City, 1961, p. 64).

Because the Mormon missionaries go to the field almost unprepared—and perhaps for other reasons—the Mormon leaders have published a booklet entitled “A Uniform System For Teaching Investigators.” This booklet contains six lessons which the missionary is supposed to memorize. William J. Whalen states:

Such is the six-lesson course of instruction completed by more than 100,000 men and women last year. Little is left to chance. The young missionaries are not encouraged to depart from the prescribed dialogue. The basis is simple memorization of dialogue and appropriate passages from the Bible and Book of Mormon. The subjects about which the typical

Gentile may be most curious, such as polygamy and the Mormon temple rites, are not even mentioned. (The Latter-day Saints in the Modern Day World by William J. Whalen, New York, 1964, p. 243)

Lynn Kenneth Packer, who has served on a mission for the church, made these statements:

The six lessons are to be memorized and then used, exclusively, for the entire mission of the missionary. Theoretically the only allowed deviation from the word-for-word dialog[ue] would be that of overcoming objections and explaining doctrine . . . we discover that the use of the six discussions is compulsory. (A Missionary Experience, New York, 1969, p. 138)

The manual used by the missionaries even tells them how to bear their testimony! Below is a photo of page 3 from the manual, A Uniform System For Teaching Investigators, published by the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints, August 1961.

TEACHING THE INVESTIGATOR

Our hope in teaching the gospel is to convert people and baptize them. Your work is not finished until your contact either understands and accepts the gospel or understands and rejects it.

I. TEACHING PRINCIPLES

A. Repetition

1. Ask questions which require the contact to think before he answers.
2. Have contact repeat ideas rather than words.
3. As your teaching progresses make certain contact agrees before proceeding.

B. Enthusiasm

1. Have the "Attitude of Success."
2. Relax. Be at ease with your contacts.
3. Show genuine interest in your contacts. Praise them for their achievements.
4. Motivate your contacts by expressing confidence in their ability. Do not rely on forceful speech or logic alone.

C. Simplicity

1. Follow the handbook dialogues.
2. Stick to the logic and scriptures given in the dialogues.
3. Answer objections with questions. Avoid the temptation to lecture.

D. Testimony

1. Remember: Conversion comes only through the Holy Ghost. Your contacts feel his presence strongest as you bear testimony.
2. Set your testimony apart.
  - a. Pause slightly.
  - b. Look contact in the eye.
  - c. Bear testimony in a natural tone of voice.

E. Addressing the contact

In all discussions except the first, the contact probably should be called "Brother Brown" rather than "Mr. Brown." This is never offensive, and it makes the contact feel much closer to being a member of the Church, since he knows that the members refer to each other in this way. People enjoy being called "brother" and "sister." If the meeting is being held in the home of a member

On pages 21-22 of A Uniform System For Teaching Investigators, we find the following:

Elder: The Church of Jesus Christ has been restored to the earth, Mr. Brown. I know and testify that these things we have discussed here are true.

Elder J: (Interrupting spontaneously) It has been a real pleasure for me to be here tonight and to participate in this discussion, Mr. Brown. I also know that Joseph Smith was a prophet of God and that the true Church of Jesus Christ has been restored to the earth.

In a rebuttal to the handbook, Hal Hougey makes this interesting observation:

How can one interrupt "spontaneously" (by impulse, lack of prompting - Webster's New Collegiate Dictionary) when he has previously been taught to do so by this manual? (Mormon Missionary Handbook, Concord, Calif., 1969, comment on p. 21)

Lynn Kenneth Packer, who served on a mission for the Mormon Church, had a difficult time accepting the idea of a "memorized lesson plan":

. . . from a spiritual standpoint I found it hard to justify a memorized lesson plan with a scripture in the Doctrine and Covenants given as advice to missionaries:

"Neither take ye thought beforehand what ye shall say; but treasure up in your minds continually the words of life, and it shall be given you in the very hour that portion that shall be meted unto every man." (A Missionary Experience, p. 24)

Because of his opposition to the missionary plan, Lynn Kenneth Packer found himself in trouble with the Mormon leaders. He finally wrote a letter home in which he stated:

. . . I don't believe that people can be converted with "6 easy lessons." . . . I don't believe that just because a contact stumbles through the lesson logic that he understands the gospel sufficiently to be baptized. . . . I stated that I was unwilling to comply with all that the mission asked of me. . . . Pres. Allen said either I would do everything the mission asked or I would have to go home. If I don't (or won't) teach exclusively by the lessons, etc., then I would have to go home. (Ibid., pp. 85-86)

The Mormon leaders allowed Packer to finish his mission, but he was assigned to an "Indian reservation in Nevada." He states that "Owyhee had a reputation for being a place to send problem Elders" (Ibid., p. 95).

Lynn K. Packer is apparently not the only missionary opposed to the "memorized lesson plan." In a review of A Missionary Experience, Edward Geary quotes the following from "a current mission handbook":

Sometimes missionaries feel they are restricted by being required to learn the discussions word for word. There was never a more fallacious train of reasoning. Salesmen, who are sent out to sell their products, must commit to memory certain lines by which they can be effective in conveying their product in just the right manner. Once they have learned their lines, then they can bring forth their personality in affecting the thoughts of others. Actors on a stage must learn their lines; and having once learned them they are in a position to use themselves through those lines to touch hearts and to convey feelings in a very moving manner. (Dialogue: A Journal of Mormon Thought, Spring 1970, pp. 103-104)

Lynn Kenneth Packer stated that in the "missionary lesson we try to prove the LDS Church is the only true church" (A Missionary Experience, p. 14). In proving that the LDS Church is the only true church, the missionary is supposed to attack all other churches by claiming that they are false. Conclusion number nine, which the contact is supposed to reach, is: "There was a complete apostasy and my church is false" (A Uniform System For Teaching Investigators, p. 9). William J. Whalen makes the following comments about this matter:

Mormon missionaries generally labor among people who already profess some belief in Christianity. Clergymen of other denominations often accuse the eager Mormon missionaries of sheep stealing but the Mormons believe that they are simply building on a previous belief in God, in Jesus Christ, and in the Bible to bring the potential convert to a knowledge of the restoration of the true Church in these latter-days. (The Latter-day Saints in the Modern Day World, p. 231)

None of the present Christian churches except the LDS Church is said to have apostles, authority to teach or baptize, or the valid priesthood. This frontal attack on all other Christian churches is what arouses the Church of England clergymen and others. Except in a few Pacific islands and Japan, the Mormons concentrate their mission activities among people who are at least nominally Christians. (Ibid., p. 240)

As we have shown at the first of this book, the Mormon leaders claim that the church now has about 3,000,000 members, and they predict that if they continue to grow at the same rate they will have 10,000,000 members by 2000 A.D. (Deseret News, October 21, 1967) While we feel that the idea of 10,000,000 Mormons by 2000 A.D. is rather fantastic, we must admit that the missionary system has been very effective—in 1970 they made 79,126 converts. The Mormon Church therefore, still remains a serious threat to Christian churches, especially since its attack is directed against these churches.

16. Plural Marriage

The Mormon writer John J. Stewart made this statement:

... there are at least two points of doctrine and history of the Church about which many LDS themselves—to say nothing of non-members—feel apologetic or critical. One of these is its doctrine and history regarding plural marriage. There is probably no other Church subject on which there is so much ignorance and misunderstanding and so many conflicting views. (Brigham Young and His Wives, p. 8)

On pages 21 and 22 of the same book Mr. Stewart states:

So gross have been the falsehoods circulated against it, and so strong the feelings created over it, that it may be an under-statement rather than an overstatement to say that within the Church itself misunderstanding and lack of understanding about it are more nearly universal than a correct understanding of it. This despite the fact that seven of our nine Church presidents have lived plural marriage, and that this principle still is and always will be a doctrine of the Church.

The revelation sanctioning the practice of plural marriage was given by the Mormon Prophet Joseph Smith on July 12, 1843. This revelation is still printed in the Doctrine and Covenants—one of the four standard works of the Mormon Church. The following is taken from this revelation:

Verily, thus saith the Lord unto you my servant Joseph, that inasmuch as you have inquired of my hand to know and understand wherein I, the Lord, justified my servants Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, as also Moses, David and Solomon, my servants, as touching the principle and doctrine of their having many wives and concubines—

Behold, and lo, I am the Lord thy God, and will answer thee as touching this matter.

Therefore, prepare thy heart to receive and obey the instructions which I am about to give unto you; for all those who have this law revealed unto them must obey the same.

For behold, I reveal unto you a new and an everlasting covenant; and if ye abide not that covenant, then are ye damned; for no one can reject this covenant and be permitted to enter into my glory. . . .

And again, verily I say unto you, if a man marry a wife by my word, which is my law, and by the new and everlasting covenant, . . . they shall pass by the angels, and the gods, which are set there, to their exaltation . . .

Then shall they be gods, because they have no end; . . .

God commanded Abraham, and Sarah gave Hagar to Abraham to wife. . . .

Was Abraham, therefore, under condemnation? Verily I say unto you, Nay; for I, the Lord, commanded it. . . .

Abraham received concubines, and they bore him children; and it was accounted unto him for righteousness, . . .

David also received many wives and concubines, and also Solomon and Moses my servants, . . . and in nothing did they sin save in those things which they received not of me.

David's wives and concubines were given unto him of me, . . .

And let mine handmaid, Emma Smith, receive all those that have been given unto my servant Joseph, and who are virtuous and pure before me; and those who are not pure, and have said they were pure, shall be destroyed, saith the Lord God. . . .

Let no one, therefore, set on my servant Joseph; for I will justify him; . . .

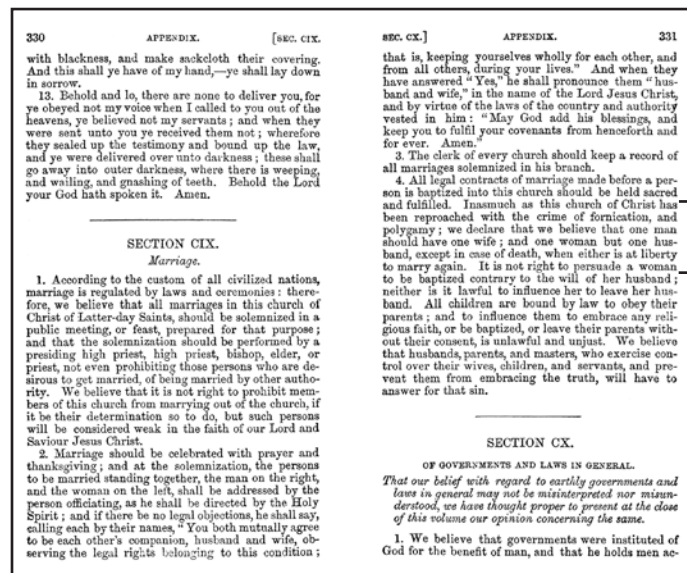

And again, as pertaining to the law of the priesthood—if any man espouse a virgin, and desire to espouse another, and the first give her consent, and if he espouse the second, and they are virgins, and have vowed to no other man, then is he justified; he cannot commit adultery for they are given unto him; for he cannot commit adultery with that that belongeth unto him and to no one else.

And if he have ten virgins given unto him by this law, he cannot commit adultery, for they belong to him, and they are given unto him; therefore is he justified. (The Doctrine and Covenants, published by the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints, 1966, section 132, verses 1, 2, 3, 4, 19, 20, 34, 35, 38, 39, 52, 60, 61, 62)

To begin with the Mormon Church did not believe in the practice of plural marriage. In the first edition of the Doctrine and Covenants, printed in 1835, there was a section which denounced the practice of polygamy. In section 101:4 it was stated:

Inasmuch as this church of Christ has been reproached with the crime of fornication, and polygamy: we declare that we believe, that one man should have one wife; and one woman, but one husband, except in the case of death, when either is at liberty to marry again.

Below is an actual photograph of this section as it appeared in the 1854 edition of the Doctrine and Covenants.

This section was printed in every edition of the Doctrine and Covenants until the year 1876. At that time the Mormon leaders inserted section 132, which permits a plurality of wives. Obviously, it would have been too contradictory to have one section condemning polygamy and another approving of it in the same book! Therefore, the section condemning polygamy was completely removed from the Doctrine and Covenants. Wilford Woodruff, the fourth President of the Mormon Church, testified as follows concerning this matter:

Q.—Now I will ask you, Mr. Woodruff, why the church of which you are President in the publication of the Book of Doctrine and Covenants in the edition of 1876, eliminated from that edition the section on marriage as found in the 1835 edition, and in all the editions of the Book of Doctrine and Covenants published up to 1876, and inserted in lieu of that section on marriage the revelation on polygamy, dated July 12, 1843.

A.—I do not know why it was done. It was done by the authority of whoever presided over the church, I suppose. Brigham Young was the President then.

Q.—Was it not done because one was in conflict with the other?

A.—I do not know that I can state why it was done. (Temple Lot Case, p. 309)

Lorenzo Snow, who became the fifth President of the Mormon Church, testified:

And a man that violated this law in the Doctrine and Covenants, 1835 edition, until the acceptance of that revelation by the church, violated the law of the church if he practiced plural marriage. Yes, Sir, he would have been cut off from the Church, I think I should have been if I had.

Before the giving of that revelation in 1843 if a man married more wives than one who were living at the same time, he would have been cut off from the church. It would have been adultery under the laws of the Church and under the laws of the state, too.

Q.—I will ask you now, Mr. Snow, why it was that in this edition of the Book of Doctrine and Covenants, this article on marriage was taken out and this revelation or purported revelation put in its stead?

A.—That is, I take it, you want to know why this principle of plural marriage was inserted instead of the principle of single marriage?

Q.—Yes, sir, why did you take out one and put the other in?

A.—I cannot tell you, for I did not do it, nor I cannot tell why.

Q.—Was it not because this taught or had changed the order of marriage in the church?

A.—Well, it is a fact that the order of marriage was changed, but whether that was the purpose of the substitution or not, I do not know.

Q.—...you state that if a person had been married or sealed by this revelation, according to your understanding, that is, if they had been married according to the provisions of this polygamous revelation prior to the year 1843, they would have violated the laws of the church and been guilty of adultery?

A.—Yes, Sir.

Q.—You state now that Joseph Smith was sealed or married to your sister in April, 1843, and this so-called revelation was given in July, 1843?

A.—Well, the time I said it, it was all right. According to my understanding of this new covenant, the woman is sealed to the man and not the man to the woman, and I stated that Joseph took my sister for a wife when he had a wife living, and that was prior to the giving of this revelation.

Q.—Well, what kind of a position did it put your sister and Joseph Smith in?

A.—It put them in a first-rate, splendid condition for time and eternity. (Temple Lot Case, pp. 320-322)

Just when and how the practice of plural marriage started in the Mormon Church has caused much controversy. There is evidence, however, to show that it was secretly practiced when the church was in Kirtland, Ohio. In the introduction to vol. 5 of Joseph Smith's History of the Church, the Mormon historian B. H. Roberts stated that the "date in the heading of the Revelation on the Eternity of the Marriage Covenant, including the Plurality of Wives, notes the time at which the revelation was committed to writing, not the time at which the principles set forth in the revelation were first made known to the Prophet." Fawn Brodie states that Joseph

Fielding Smith told her "that a revelation foreshadowing polygamy had been written in 1831, but that it had never been published. In conformity with the church policy, however, he would not permit the manuscript, which he acknowledged to be in possession of the church library, to be examined" (No Man Knows My History, p. 184, footnote).

The Mormon writer John J. Stewart states:

... Joseph as a servant of God was authorized to enter plural marriage, and it is not at all unlikely that he did so in the early or mid-1830's. Perhaps Nancy Johnson or Fanny Alger was his first "plural" wife, at Hiram or Kirtland, Ohio. (Brigham Young and His Wives, p. 31)

The reader will find information concerning Nancy Johnson's relationship with Joseph Smith in The Mormon Kingdom, vol. 1, pages 25-26.

The Mormon writer Max Parkin made this statement concerning Fanny Alger:

The charge of adulterous relations "with a certain girl" was leveled against Smith by Cowdery in Missouri in 1837; this accusation became one of the complaints the Church had against Cowdery in his excommunication trial in Far West, April 12, 1838. In rationalizing Cowdery's accusation, the Prophet testified "that Oliver Cowdery had been his bosom friend, therefore he entrusted him with many things." (Conflict at Kirtland, by Max H. Parkin, 1966, p. 166)

Max Parkin's source for this information is the "Far West Record." This is an unpublished "record book containing minutes of meetings in Kirtland and Far West, Missouri." The original is in the Church Historian's Office.

The reader will remember that Oliver Cowdery was one of the three witnesses to the Book of Mormon. In a letter dated January 21, 1838, Oliver Cowdery plainly stated that Joseph Smith had an "affair" with Fanny Alger:

When he [Joseph Smith] was there we had some conversation in which in every instance I did not fail to affirm that what I had said was strictly true. A dirty, nasty, filthy affair of his and Fanny Alger's was talked over in which I strictly declared that I had never deviated from the truth in the matter, and as I supposed was admitted by himself. (Letter written by Oliver Cowdery and recorded by his brother Warren Cowdery; see photograph in The Mormon Kingdom, vol. 1, p. 27)

Mormon writers admit that there was a connection between Joseph Smith and Fanny Alger; however, they claim that Fanny Alger was Joseph Smith's plural wife and that he was commanded by God to enter into polygamy.

Andrew Jenson, who was the Assistant L.D.S. Church Historian, made a list of 27 women who were sealed to Joseph Smith. In this list he said the following concerning Fanny Alger: "Fanny Alger, one of the first plural wives sealed to the Prophet" (Historical Record, p. 233). The Mormon Apostle John A. Widtsoe stated: "It seems that Fannie Alger was one of Joseph's first plural wives. She lived many years after the Prophet's death and never denied her relationship to him" (Joseph Smith—Seeker After Truth, p. 237).

The Mormon writer John J. Stewart gives this interesting information:

Benjamin F. Johnson, another close friend to Joseph...says,

In 1835, at Kirtland, I learned from my sister's husband, Lyman R. Sherman, who was close to the Prophet, and received it from him, "that the ancient order of Plural Marriage was again to be practiced by the Church." This, at the time, did not impress my mind deeply, although there lived then with his family [the Prophet's] a neighbor's daughter, Fannie Alger, a very nice and comely young woman . . . toward whom not only myself but everyone, seemed partial, for the amiability of her character; and it was whispered even then that Joseph loved her.

Johnson, a church patriarch at the time of writing, put his finger on the beginning of Oliver Cowdery's and Warren Parrish's downfall—Parrish was the Prophet's secretary:

There was some trouble with Oliver Cowdery, and whisper said it was relating to a girl then living in his (the Prophet's) family; and I was afterwards told by Warren Parrish, that he himself and Oliver Cowdery did know that Joseph had Fannie Alger as wife, for they were spied upon and found together. . . . "Without doubt in my mind," says Johnson, "Fannie Alger was, at Kirtland, the Prophet's first plural wife, in which, by right of his calling, he was justified of the Lord, . . ."

One of the charges against Cowdery when he was excommunicated was that he had insinuated that Joseph was guilty of adultery. (Joseph Smith, The Mormon Prophet, pp. 103-104)

John Whitmer, who was one of the witnesses to the Book of Mormon, wrote the following in chapter 20 of his history of the church:

In the fall of 1836, Joseph Smith, Jun., S. Rigdon and others of the leaders of the Church at Kirtland, Ohio, established a bank for the purpose of speculation, and the whole Church partook of the same spirit; they were lifted up in pride, and lusted after the forbidden things of God, such as covetousness, and in secret combinations, spiritual-wife doctrine, that is plurality of wives, . . . (John Whitmer's History, p. 21)

Ebenezer Robinson gives this information:

In the spring of 1841, the doctrine of "spiritual wives" began to be secretly talked about . . . Don Carlos Smith said: "Any man who will teach and practice the doctrine of spiritual wifery will go to hell, I don't care if it is my brother Joseph." (The Return, vol. 2, p. 287)

Reason For Revelation

The revelation on polygamy was apparently given to convince Emma Smith (Joseph's wife) that polygamy was right. William Clayton, who wrote the revelation as Joseph Smith dictated it, stated:

On the morning of the 12th of July, 1843; Joseph and Hyrum Smith came into the office . . . They were talking on the subject of plural marriage. Hyrum said to Joseph, "If you will write the revelation on celestial marriage, I will take it and read it to Emma, and I believe I can convince her of its truth, and you will hereafter have peace." Joseph smiled and remarked, "You do not know Emma as well as I do." . . . Joseph then said, "Well, I will write the revelation and we shall see." . . . Hyrum then took the revelation to read to Emma. Joseph remained with me in the office until Hyrum returned. When he came back, Joseph asked how he had succeeded. Hyrum replied that he had never received a more severe talking to in his life, . . .

Joseph quietly remarked, "I told you you did not know Emma as well as I did." Joseph then put the revelation in his pocket, and they both left the office.

. . . Two or three days after the revelation was written Joseph related to me and several others that Emma had so teased, and urgently entreated him for the privilege of destroying it, that he became so weary of her teasing, and to get rid of her annoyance, he told her she might destroy it and she had done so, but he had consented to her wish in this matter to pacify her, realizing that he . . . could rewrite it at any time if necessary. (History of the Church, by Joseph Smith, Introduction to vol. 5, pp. xxxii-xxxiii)

Brigham Young, the second President of the Church, gave this information:

Brother George A. Smith has been reading a little out of the revelation concerning celestial marriage, and I want to say to my sisters that if you lift your heels against this revelation, and say that you would obliterate it, and put it out of existence if you had the power to nullify and destroy it, I say that if you imbibe that spirit and feeling, you will go to hell, just as sure as you are living women. Emma took that revelation, supposing she had all there was; but Joseph had wisdom enough to take care of it, and he had handed the revelation to Bishop Whitney, and he wrote it all off. After Joseph had been to Bishop Whitney's he went home, and Emma began to teasing for the revelation. Said she—"Joseph you promised me that revelation, and if you are a man of your word you will give it to me." Joseph took it from his pocket and said—"Take it." She went to the fireplace and put it in, and put the candle under it and burnt it, and she thought that was the end of it, and she will be damned as sure as she is a living woman. Joseph used to say that he would have her hereafter, if he had to go to hell for her, and he will have to go to hell for her as sure as he ever gets her. (Journal of Discourses, vol. 17, p. 159)

The revelation was not printed until 1852 and did not appear in the Doctrine and Covenants until 1876. As we have shown, the revelation on polygamy is now printed as section 132 of the Doctrine and Covenants. Upon careful examination it can be seen that this revelation is filled with inconsistencies. Joseph F. Smith, the sixth President of the Mormon Church, was apparently embarrassed by the contents of the revelation, for he stated that it could have been written in a somewhat different form:

When the revelation was written, in 1843, it was for a special purpose, by the request of the Patriarch Hyrum Smith, and was not then designed to go forth to the Church or to the world. It is most probable that had it been then written with a view to its going out as a doctrine of the church, it would have been presented in a somewhat different form. (Journal of Discourses, vol. 20, p. 29)

The first contradiction in this revelation is the date it was given. The date on the revelation reads July 12, 1843, yet Lorenzo Snow, who became the fifth President of the Mormon Church, testified that anyone who lived in plural marriage prior to the time the revelation was given was living in "adultery under the laws of the Church and under the laws of the State, too" (Temple Lot Case, p. 320). Upon careful examination we find that Joseph Smith was married to at least twelve women prior to July 12, 1843. According to Lorenzo Snow's statement, this would make Joseph Smith an adulterer. In an article published in the Millennial Star (a Mormon publication) on July 25, 1857, we read as follows: "The Latter-day Saints, from the rise of the Church in 1830, till the year 1843, had no authority to marry any more than one wife each. To have done otherwise, would have been a great transgression" (Millennial Star, vol. 19, p. 475).

In order to get out of this dilemma the Mormon leaders now claim that Joseph Smith received the revelation prior to the time he wrote it down and that the date on the revelation is the date the revelation was written down, not the date it was actually received. It is interesting to compare the introduction to the revelation as printed in the 1890 edition of the Doctrine and Covenants with the way it is printed today. In the 1890 edition it is stated that the revelation was actually given on July 12, 1843: "Revelation on the Eternity of the Marriage Covenant, including Plurality of Wives. Given through Joseph, the Seer, in Nauvoo, Hancock County, Illinois, July 12th, 1843" (Doctrine and Covenants, 1890 ed., p. 463). In the edition printed today the word "recorded" has been added and it completely changes the meaning:

Revelation given through Joseph Smith the Prophet, at Nauvoo, Illinois, recorded July 12, 1843, relating to the new and everlasting covenant, including the eternity of the marriage covenant, as also plurality of wives. (Doctrine and Covenants, 1963 ed., p. 239)

Even though the Mormon leaders have changed the introduction to the revelation, Joseph Smith's History of the Church still says that the revelation was actually given on July 12, 1843:

Wednesday, 12.—I received the following revelation in the presence of my brother Hyrum and Elder William Clayton:—

“Revelation on the Eternity of the Marriage Covenant, including the Plurality of Wives. Given through Joseph, the Seer, in Nauvoo, Hancock County, Illinois, July 12th, 1843.” (History of the Church, vol. 5, pp. 500-501)

Breaking the Law

The revelation on polygamy (section 132 of the Doctrine and Covenants) contradicts section 58 of the Doctrine and Covenants, for section 58 states that a person that keeps the laws of God has no need to break the laws of the land:

Let no man break the laws of the land, for he that keepeth the laws of God hath no need to break the laws of the land. (Doctrine and Covenants 58:21)

Now, in order to practice polygamy in Nauvoo the Mormons had to break the law of the land, for there was an Illinois State law against bigamy (or “the crime of marrying while one has a wife or husband still living from whom no valid divorce has been effected”). This law was enacted February 12, 1833, before Joseph Smith established his doctrine of polygamy. Anyone who was convicted of this crime could be punished by “a fine not exceeding one-thousand dollars, and imprisoned in the penitentiary not exceeding two years” (see the pamphlet Is Plural Marriage Essential to Salvation? p. 2).

The Mormon Church leaders understood that polygamy was a crime. In an article published in the Times and Seasons (a Mormon paper) on November 15, 1844, the following statement appeared: “The law of the land and the rules of the church do not allow one man to have more than one wife alive at once, . . .” (Times and Seasons, vol. 5, p. 715).

After the Mormons came to Utah Brigham Young made this comment: “If I had forty wives in the United States, they did not know it, and could not substantiate it, neither did I ask any lawyer, judge, or magistrate for them. I live above the law, and so do this people” (Journal of Discourses, vol. 1, p. 361).

Just before he was murdered Joseph Smith was indicted for polygamy. The following is found in the Church Chronology under the date of May 25, 1844: “Sat. 25.—Joseph Smith learned that the grand jury at Carthage had found two indictments against him, one of them for polygamy” (Church Chronology, p. 25). Joseph Smith was murdered shortly after this. Had he lived, however, it is very possible that he would have gone to prison for being a polygamist.

Contradicts Book of Mormon

Joseph Smith used the polygamous practices of David and Solomon as justification for polygamy, but this is a direct contradiction to the teachings of the Book of Mormon. Below is a comparison of some verses from the Book of Mormon and the Doctrine and Covenants.

Book of Mormon	Doctrine and Covenants
. . . For behold, thus saith the Lord: This people begin to wax in iniquity; they understand not the scriptures, for they seek to excuse themselves in committing whoredoms, because of the things which were written concerning David, and Solomon his son. Behold, David and Solomon truly had many wives and concubines, which thing was abominable before me, saith the Lord. (Book of Mormon, Jacob 2:23-24)	Verily, thus saith the Lord . . . you have inquired of my hand to know and understand wherein I, the Lord, justified my servants . . . David and Solomon, . . . as touching the principle and doctrine of having many wives and concubines— David’s wives and concubines were given unto him of me, . . . (Doctrine and Covenants, section 132, verses 1, 39)

Notice that the revelation states that David and Solomon were justified in their polygamous practices, whereas the Book of Mormon states that it was an abominable practice. When the Mormon Apostle LeGrand Richards was asked concerning this contradiction, he stated:

Your fourth question: . . . explain Jacob, 2:23-27 compared to D. & C. 1[3]2:1. In one place it said it was “abominable” and the other “justified.” I am afraid I can’t adequately reconcile these two statements. If the one in Doctrine and Covenants 131:1 had omitted the names of David and Solomon, then I think I could reconcile the two statements. (Letter from LeGrand Richards to Morris L. Reynolds, dated July 14, 1966)

When Wilford Woodruff, who was President of the Church, was questioned concerning this matter, he gave this testimony:

Q.—Well, now, from the reading, do you say that the Lord approved or condemned the practice of polygamy in David and Solomon?

A.—Well, he condemned these men for the course they pursued in that matter.

Q.—In the 27th paragraph [Book of Mormon, Jacob 2:27] it says:—Wherefore, my brethren, hear me, and hearken to the word of the Lord; for there shall not any man among you have save it be one wife; and concubines he shall have none. Have I read that correct?

A.—Yes, sir, that is correct.

Q.—that is the law as it was laid down in the days of David and Solomon.

A.—Well, it seems to apply to them.

Q.—Well, don’t it apply to them?

A.—Yes, sir, it was the law of God to them,— . . . (Temple Lot Case, p. 306)

Joseph F. Smith, the sixth President of the Mormon Church, gave the following testimony in the “Reed Smoot Case”:

The CHAIRMAN. That is the Book of Mormon?

Mr. SMITH. Yes sir; that is the Book of Mormon.

The CHAIRMAN. Is the doctrine of polygamy taught in that revelation?

Mr. SMITH. Taught in it?

The CHAIRMAN. Yes.

Mr. SMITH. It is emphatically forbidden in that book.

The CHAIRMAN. In that book it is emphatically forbidden?

Mr. SMITH. It is. (Reed Smoot Case, vol. 1, p. 480)

The Mormon Apostle Orson Pratt made these statements with regard to this matter:

Do you believe that the Book of Mormon is a divine revelation? We do. Does that book teach the doctrine of plurality of wives? It does not. Does the Lord in that book forbid the plurality doctrine? He forbid the ancient Nephites to have any more than one wife. . . . a man among the Nephites, by the law of God, had no right to take more than one wife, unless the Lord should command for the purpose of raising up seed unto Himself. . . . the Book of Mormon is somewhat more strict than the Bible; for there is nothing in the Bible that limits mankind to one wife, but the Book of Mormon does absolutely forbid a man to have more than one wife, unless God shall command otherwise.

Now in the early rise of this church, the Lord gave no command unto any of His servants authorizing them to take more than one wife, but on the contrary, said unto them that they should give heed to that which was written in the book of Mormon; therefore, they were under the strictest obligations to confine themselves to one wife, until a commandment came to the contrary, . . . (The Seer, by Orson Pratt, p. 30)

The Book of Mormon, therefore, is the only record (professing to be divine) which condemns the plurality of wives as being a practice exceeding abominable before God. (Journal of Discourses, vol. 6, p. 351)

Some Mormons have claimed that the words “raise up seed unto me” (found in Jacob 2:30) refer to the practice of polygamy, but this is proven false in 1 Nephi 7:1, for it says: “. . . the Lord spake unto him again, saying that it was not mete for him, Lehi, that he should take his family into the wilderness alone; but that his sons should take daughters to wife, that they might raise up seed unto the Lord in the land of promise.” This raising up seed unto the Lord was evidently done by the one wife system, for according to the Book of Mormon. Nephi stated: “And it came to pass that I, Nephi, took one of the daughters of Ishmael to wife; . . .” (1 Nephi 16:7). From this it is obvious that the Book of Mormon teaches that the Lord raises up seed to himself by monogamy, and not polygamy.

The Jaredites, as well as the Nephites, were commanded not to enter into polygamy, for in Ether 10:5 we read: “And it came to pass that Riplakish did not do that which was right in the sight of the Lord, for he did have many wives and concubines, . . .”

Another reference to polygamy is found in Mosiah 11:2: “For behold, he did not keep the commandments of God, but he did walk after the desires of his own heart. And he had many wives and concubines.”

It is very interesting to note that David Whitmer, one of the three witnesses to the Book of Mormon, denounced the doctrine of polygamy:

I desire to say a few words especially to the Latter Day Saints who believe in the doctrine of polygamy. Why is it that you can put your trust in a man, and believe a revelation of his that contradicts the Word of God in the Book of Mormon, is very strange indeed. . . . that revelation is a plain contradiction of the Word of God in the Book of Mormon. This is plain enough for any one to see and understand. Can you not see that this revelation is not of God? Why, oh why are you trusting in an arm of flesh? . . . you are believing in a revelation purporting to come from God, that He had changed and allowed his people to practice what He says is a sin and an abomination in his sight! (An Address To All Believers In Christ, p. 44)

Contradicts the Bible

The Doctrine and Covenants, section 132, verse 65, contains this statement: “. . . I, the Lord his God . . . commanded Abraham to take Hagar to wife.” This is in direct contradiction to the account given in the Bible, for the Bible says nothing about God commanding this but rather that “Abram hearkened to the voice of Sarai” (Genesis 16:2). Why, then, did Sarai give Hagar to Abram? Simply because she did not believe that she could have a child in her old age. It is obvious that God was not involved in this transaction, for Genesis 16:5 makes it clear that Sarai had sinned in this matter: “And Sarai said unto Abram, my wrong be upon thee . . .”

Although some of the kings mentioned in the Old Testament had many wives, Deuteronomy 17:17 condemned this practice: “Neither shall he multiply wives to himself that his heart turn not away . . .”

There is no mention in the New Testament of any of the apostles practicing polygamy. In fact, in 1 Timothy the bishops and deacons were instructed to have only one wife: “A bishop then must be blameless, the husband of one wife . . . Let the deacons be the husbands of one wife . . .” (1 Timothy 3:2, 12). In Titus we find that elders are to have but one wife: “. . . ordain elders in every city, as I had appointed thee: If any be blameless, the husband of one wife, . . .” (Titus 1:5, 6).

The Mormon Church uses the Old Testament to justify the practice of plural marriage. While it is true that it was practiced by the people of the Old Testament, that does not mean that it was right in the sight of God. These people also committed many other sins which God will not allow us to commit now that Christ has revealed the perfect way. The people in the Old Testament also had slaves, and cursed their enemies. To say that plural marriage is right because it was practiced in the Old Testament makes no more sense than to say that God approves of slavery since it was also practiced in the Old Testament. Christ came to set us free from these Old Testament practices. For instance, divorce was common in the Old Testament, but Jesus said: “. . . Moses because of the hardness of your hearts suffered you to put away your wives; but from the beginning it was not so” (Matthew 19:8).

Polygamy, as well as divorce, was instituted by man, not God. Jesus said that the perfect pattern for marriage was that the twain (two) should become one flesh:

. . . Have ye not read, that he which made them at the beginning made them male and female, And for this cause shall a man leave father and mother, and shall cleave to his wife: and they twain shall be one flesh? (Matthew 19:5)

Threatened With Destruction

In the revelation on polygamy (Doctrine and Covenants 132:54) Emma Smith is threatened with destruction: “. . . I am the Lord thy God, and will destroy her if she abide not my law.” It is interesting to note, however, that it was Joseph who was destroyed. He was killed less than a year after this revelation was written, while Emma lived until 1879.

The Doctrine and Covenants 132:64 reads as follows:

And again, verily, verily, I say unto you, if any man have a wife, holds the keys of this power, and he teaches unto her the law of my priesthood, as pertaining to these things, then shall she believe and administer unto him, or she shall be destroyed, saith the Lord your God; for I will destroy her; for I will magnify my name upon all those who receive and abide in my law.

The Mormon Apostle John Henry Smith testified as follows in the case concerning “the application of John Moore, for naturalization”:

Q. Do you understand that revelation to be to this effect—that if the first wife refuses to consent to her husband taking a second wife, she shall be damned?

A. I understand that principle; and a good many women have taken that chance. Under the Mormon theory they shall be damned. (Extracts from the report of the proceedings in 1889 in the district court of Utah, quoted in Reminiscences of Early Utah, by R. N. Baskin, 1914, p. 95)

In the 132nd section of the Doctrine and Covenants it is plainly stated that a man must obtain the consent of the first wife in order to be justified in taking more wives:

And again, as pertaining to the law of the priesthood—if any man espouse a virgin, and desire to espouse another, and the first give her consent, and if he espouse the second, and they are virgins, and have vowed to no other man, then is he justified; he cannot commit adultery for they are given unto him; for he cannot commit adultery with that that belongeth unto him and to no one else. (Doctrine and Covenants 132:61)

Joseph Smith certainly did not follow the rules of his own revelation, for he took plural wives without his first wife’s consent. Emily Dow Partridge testified that she was married to Joseph without Emma’s consent:

. . . the Prophet Joseph and his wife Emma offered us a home in their family, and they treated us with great kindness. We had been there about a year when the principle of plural marriage was made known to us, and I was married to Joseph Smith on the 4th of March 1843, Elder Heber C. Kimball performing the ceremony. My sister Eliza was also married to Joseph a few days later. This was done without the knowledge of Emma Smith. Two months afterward she consented to give her husband two wives, providing he would give her the privilege of choosing them. She accordingly chose my sister Eliza and myself, and to save family trouble Brother Joseph thought it best to have another ceremony performed. Accordingly on the 11th of May, 1843, we were sealed to Joseph Smith a second time, in Emma's presence, . . . From that very hour, however, Emma was our bitter enemy. We remained in the family several months after this, but things went from bad to worse until we were obligated to leave the house and find another home. (Historical Record, p. 240)

Joseph F. Smith, the sixth President of the Mormon Church, testified as follows:

Senator PETTUS. Have there been in the past plural marriages without the consent of the first wife?

Mr. SMITH. I do not know of any, unless it may have been Joseph Smith himself.

Senator PETTUS. Is the language that you have read construed to mean that she is bound to consent?

Mr. SMITH. The condition is that if she does not consent the Lord will destroy her, but I do not know how He will do it.

Senator BAILEY. Is it not true that in the very next verse, if she refuses her consent her husband is exempt from the law which requires her consent?

Mr. SMITH. Yes; he is exempt from the law which requires her consent.

Senator BAILEY. She is commanded to consent, but if she does not, then he is exempt from the requirement?

Mr. SMITH. Then he is at liberty to proceed without her consent, under the law.

Senator BEVERIDGE. In other words, her consent amounts to nothing?

Mr. SMITH. It amounts to nothing but her consent. (Reed Smoot Case, vol. 1, p. 201)

Many other Mormons married without obtaining the consent of the first wife. Joseph Smith told Heber C. Kimball to take a second wife and not to let his first wife know anything about it. Heber C. Kimball's daughter related the following:

"In Nauvoo, shortly after his return from England, my father, among others of his brethren, was taught the plural wife doctrine, and was told by Joseph, the Prophet, three times, to go and take a certain woman as his wife; but not till he commanded him in the name of the Lord did he obey. At the same time Joseph told him not to divulge this secret, not even to my mother, for fear that she would not receive it; . . . This was one of the greatest tests of his faith he had ever experienced. The thought of deceiving the kind and faithful wife of his youth, . . . was more than he felt able to bear. . . . his sorrow and misery were increased by the thought of my mother hearing of it from some other source, which would no doubt separate them, and he shrank from the thought of such a thing, or of causing her any unhappiness. Finally he was so tried that he went to Joseph and told him how he felt—that he was fearful if he took such a step he could not stand, but would be overcome. The Prophet, . . . inquired of the Lord; His answer was, 'Tell him to go and do as he has been commanded, and if I see that there is any danger of his apostatizing, I will take him to myself.' . . .

"When first hearing the principle taught, believing that he would be called upon to enter into it, he had thought of two elderly ladies named Pitkin, . . . But the woman he was commanded to take was an English lady named Sarah Noon, nearer my mother's age, who came over with the company of Saints in the same ship in which Father and Brother Brigham returned from Europe. She had been married and was the mother of two little girls, but left her husband on account of his drunken and dissolute habits. Father was told to take her as his wife and provide for her and her children, and he did so." (Life of Heber C. Kimball, by Orson F. Whitney, pp. 335-336)

In February, 1853, the Mormon Apostle Orson Pratt gave certain rules governing the practice of polygamy. One of those rules was that a man must obtain the consent of the first wife before entering into the practice of plural marriage:

It is necessary to state, that before any man takes the least step towards getting another wife, it is his duty to consult the feelings of the wife which he already has, and obtain her consent, as recorded in the 24th paragraph of the revelation, published in the first No. of "The Seer." (The Seer, p. 31)

Strange as it may seem, Orson Pratt himself violated this rule. The Mormon writer T. Edgar Lyon stated:

While in England on this short business trip, Pratt married Sarah Louise Lewis, . . . There are not many times in his life when he appears to have deviated from the strict letter of the law of the Church, but this marriage was one of them. Before leaving Washington he had published the rules governing the practice of plural marriage by the church. He stated that the first wife must give her consent to such a marriage, the bride's parents must consent and the President of the Church must receive a revelation that such a union would be pleasing in the sight of God before such a marriage could be consummated. He further specified that at the actual ceremony, the first wife must be present and give her consent and the President of the Church alone had the authority from God to perform the ordinance. But in the face of these rules which he was endeavoring to show would safeguard the system against abuse, he married another wife in England, without the consent, knowledge or presence of any of his other wives and the ceremony was not performed with the sanction of, or by the President of the Church, who was then in Utah. It was such imprudent actions as these, which gave some foundation to the persistent rumors that the "Mormons were marrying English girls and taking them to Utah as plural wives." Such conduct displays a hypocritical attitude toward the very religious laws he was laying down for observance of others. (Thomas Edgar Lyon, "Orson Pratt—Early Mormon Leader," M.A. Thesis, University of Chicago, June 1932, pp. 54-55 of typed copy)

This is quite an admission for a Mormon writer to make. In a footnote on page 55 of the same thesis, T. Edgar Lyon stated that Orson Pratt did the same thing in 1857: "Pratt repeated this same procedure on July 24, 1857, when he married Eliza Crooks at Liverpool."

B. H. Roberts, the famous Mormon historian, testified that he married his third wife without the knowledge or consent of his first and second wives:

Senator OVERMAN. Did your first wife or your second wife consent to your marrying the third wife?

Mr. ROBERTS. No, sir.

Senator OVERMAN. Did they protest against it?

Mr. ROBERTS. I do not hear the question.

Senator OVERMAN. Was there any protest on their part?

Mr. ROBERTS. No, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Did they know of it at the time?

Mr. ROBERTS. Not at the time.

Mr. TAYLOR. When did they learn of it?

Mr. ROBERTS. I can not answer that question.

Mr. TAYLOR. I mean about when—how long afterwards?

Mr. ROBERTS. Two or three years afterwards, I think. (Reed Smoot Case, vol. 1, pp. 712-713)

The Mormon leaders have claimed that polygamy is different than the crime of bigamy. In 1889 the Apostle John Henry Smith gave the following testimony in the case concerning "the application of John Moore for naturalization":

Q. Didn't you know that the Congress of the United States, as early as 1862, prohibited the practice of polygamy in the Territory of Utah?

A. No, sir. It prohibited the practice of bigamy in the Territory of Utah.

Q. Well, what distinction do you make between bigamy and polygamy?

A. I make this distinction—that a bigamist is a man that marries a wife, and then marries another, deceiving the first by not permitting her to know that he has married a second, or the second that he had married the first. (Extracts from the report of proceedings in the district court, quoted in Reminiscences of Early Utah, p. 95)

The Apostle F. D. Richards stated:

Wherein consists the crime of bigamy? It is this. When a man takes one wife he covenants to adhere to her until death do them part. He violates that covenant when he takes another woman, unknown to his wife; he thus practices fraud upon her. This is where the crime comes in. Fraud is perpetrated upon his own family. . . . This crime of taking another wife when a man has one is called bigamy; and there are laws and penalties against it. With the Latter-day Saints there is no fraud practiced, the second wife being accepted with the mutual consent of the first, and in accordance with the revelations of God. (Journal of Discourses, vol. 26, p. 341)

Now, according to the statements above Joseph Smith was a bigamist in every sense of the word, for he definitely practiced “fraud” upon his first wife Emma. He not only deceived her, but he also advised Heber C. Kimball to deceive his first wife. Orson Pratt, B. H. Roberts and many other Mormon men married without the consent of their first wife.

Wives Before the Revelation

One thing that is very obvious when reading the 132nd section of the Doctrine and Covenants is the fact that Joseph Smith was already in the practice of plural marriage before he ever inquired of the Lord to see if it was right. The first verse of section 132 tells that Joseph Smith inquired of the Lord to see if plural marriage was right, but verse 52 shows that he had already taken wives before the revelation was given, for it commands Emma (his first wife) to receive the other women that had already been given to Joseph: “And let mine handmaid, Emma Smith, receive all those that have been given unto my servant Joseph, . . .” (Doctrine and Covenants 132:52).

Some people have tried to excuse this by saying that the date on the revelation was only the date it was written down and not the date the revelation was actually given, but anyone who honestly examines this argument must admit that it doesn’t make any difference when the revelation was given. Whether it was given in 1843 or years before isn’t important. Regardless of the date it was given, verse 52 plainly states that Joseph had already entered into the practice of polygamy.

It is interesting to note that section 132 not only says that plural marriage is justifiable in God’s sight, but also concubinage: “Abraham received concubines, and they bore him children; and it was accounted unto him for righteousness, . . .” (Doctrine and Covenants 132:37).

Leaders Puzzled

The Apostle John A. Widtsoe stated: “We do not understand why the Lord commanded the practice of plural marriage” (Evidences and Reconciliations, 1960, p. 393). Some Mormons have maintained that the church practiced polygamy because there was a surplus of women. The Mormon writer William E. Berrett stated: “In the early period of the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints an unusual condition prevailed. More women than men joined the Church . . . There were not enough men to go around . . . The alternative was plural marriage” (The Restored Church, 1956, p. 250). This explanation is very popular in the Mormon Church. The truth is, however, that there were less women than men. The Mormon Apostle John A. Widtsoe admitted that there was no surplus of women:

Plural marriage has been a subject of wide and frequent comment. Members of the Church unfamiliar with its history, and many nonmembers, have set up fallacious reasons for the origin of this system of marriage among the Latter-day Saints.

The most common of these conjectures is that the Church, through plural marriage sought to provide husbands for its large surplus of female members. The implied assumption in this theory, that there have been more female than male members in the Church, is not supported by existing evidence. On the contrary, there seems always to have been more males than females in the Church . . .

The United States census records from 1850 to 1940, and all available Church records, uniformly show a preponderance of males in Utah, and in the Church. Indeed, the excess in Utah has usually been larger than for the whole United States, . . . Orson Pratt, writing in 1853 from direct knowledge of Utah conditions, when the excess of females was supposedly the highest, declares against the opinion that females outnumbered the males in Utah . . .

Another conjecture is that the people were few in numbers and that the Church, desiring greater numbers, permitted the practice so that a phenomenal increase in population could be attained. This is not defensible, since there was no surplus of women. (Evidences and Reconciliations, 1960, pp. 390-392)

The following appeared in the Mormon publication The Juvenile Instructor, vol. 20, page 133:

But then the proportion of the sexes in Utah would not, at present, admit of an extensive practice of plural marriage. When the census was taken five years ago, there were 143,963 souls in Utah Territory, not counting untaxed Indians. In this number there was an excess of 5,055 males over females. This does not have the appearance of permitting an extensive practice of plural marriage, . . .

The sociologist Kimball Young says that “under polygamy some men would have to remain unwed. . . it was not uncommon for a man to select a plural mate from among recent arrivals of converts in Salt Lake City. . . This was a kind of open matrimonial market and men, on hearing of the coming of attractive girls, would seek them out with an eye to courtship and possible marriage” (Isn’t One Wife Enough? by Kimball Young, 1954, pp. 124-125).

The Mormon leaders were evidently worried that the missionaries would take the best women. Heber C. Kimball, a member of the First Presidency, stated:

I say to those who are elected to go on missions, . . . gather the sheep into the fold. You are sent out as shepherds to gather the sheep together; and remember they are not your sheep: they belong to Him that sends you. Then do not make a choice of any of those sheep; do not make selections before they are brought home and put into the fold. You understand that. Amen. (Journal of Discourses, vol. 6, p. 256)

Stanley P. Hirshon gives this information:

Kimball always kept an eye out for romance. “Brethren,” he instructed some departing missionaries, “I want you to understand that it is not to be as it has been heretofore. The brother missionaries have been in the habit of picking out the prettiest women for themselves before they get here, and bringing on the ugly ones for us; hereafter you have to bring them all here before taking any of them, and let us all have a fair shake.” (The Lion of the Lord, New York, 1969, pp. 129-130)

The shortage of women was so great that some of the men were marrying girls who were very young. Fanny Stenhouse stated:

That same year, a bill was brought into the Territorial Legislature, providing that boys of fifteen years of age and girls of twelve might legally contract marriage, with the consent of their parents or guardians! In stating this disgraceful fact, I feel certain that the reader who has never lived among the Saints and is not versed in Utah affairs will think that I must be mistaken in what I say. It is, however, I am sorry to say, only too true, and the records of the Legislature will bear me witness. The fact was stated in the New York Herald of January 27, 1872. (Tell It All, 1875, p. 607)

The early Mormon leaders certainly did allow their young people to marry at an early age. Mosiah Hancock was only 11 years old when he was “sealed” to a “young girl.” According to his journal, he was “born in Kirtland, Ohio, on April the 9th, 1834” (“The Mosiah Hancock Journal,” typed copy, p. 1). On pages 20-21 of the same journal, we find this statement by Mosiah Hancock:

On about January 10, 1846, I was privileged to go in the temple and receive my washings and anointings. I was sealed to a lovely young girl named Mary, who was about my age, but it was with the understanding that we were not to live together as man and wife until we were 16 years of age. The reason that some were sealed so young was because we knew that we would have to go West and wait many a long time for another temple.

Stanley P. Hirshon gives this information:

“Make haste and get married,” Remy heard Young preach. “Let me see no boys above sixteen and girls above fourteen unmarried.” Fifteen years later, as Dodge’s party listened, . . . Young threatened that “if the young men did not marry the girls, he and the old men would.”

With such encouragement Saints married early . . . In 1857 The New York Times, reporting the sealings to old men of two girls aged ten and eleven, estimated that most girls married before they were fourteen. . . . Troskolawski knew one bishop who was sealed to four of his nieces, the youngest thirteen years old, . . . On August 1, 1856, he put on the stagecoach for Ohio twelve-year-old Emma Wheat, who was being forced into a marriage she detested. (The Lion of the Lord, pp. 126-127)

Sorrows of Polygamy

The fact that plural marriage brought great sorrow to many of the women involved can hardly be denied. Heber C. Kimball once stated: “There is a great deal of quarrelling in the houses, and contending for power and authority; and the second wife is against the first wife, perhaps, in some instances” (Journal of Discourses, vol. 4, p. 178).

Brigham Young made the following statements:

Our sisters need not be worried about any doctrine. Brother Penrose said it would be better for them if they believed in the doctrine of polygamy. But they do believe it; they know it is true, and that is their torment. It perplexes and annoys many of them, because they are not sanctified by the spirit of it; if they were there would be no trouble. (Journal of Discourses, vol. 12, p. 312)

A few years ago one of my wives, when talking about wives leaving their husbands said, “I wish my husband’s wives would leave him, every soul of them except myself . . .” That is the way they all feel, more or less, at times, both old and young. (Journal of Discourses, vol. 9, p. 195)

Sisters, do you wish to make yourselves happy? Then what is your duty? It is for you to bear children, . . . are you tormenting yourselves by thinking that your husbands do not love you? I would not care whether they loved a particle or not; but I would cry out, like one of old, in the joy of my heart, “I have got a man from the Lord!” “Hallelujah! I am a mother— . . .” (Ibid., p. 37)

Stanley P. Hirshon gives this information:

In 1869, while describing to the New York World the responsibilities of Mormon women, Zina Huntington inadvertently revealed how lonely and unhappy she and Young’s other wives were. “It is the duty of a first wife to regard her husband not with a selfish devotion that would claim the whole of his society, time, and attention,” she noted, “but rather as owing attentions to other women also, which they have a right to expect. She finds before she has been many years the head of a polygamous household that she must regard her husband with indifference, and with no other feeling than that of reverence, for love we regard as a false sentiment; a feeling which should have no existence in polygamy. . . . we believe in the good old custom by which marriages should be arranged by the parents of the young people.” (The Lion of the Lord, pp. 229-230)

One of Heber C. Kimball’s wives testified that there was no love in her union with him:

I was married to Heber C. Kimball in 1845, . . . I was married in the Temple; . . .

I never asked Mr. Kimball how many wives he had at the time I married him. I do not know how many he had besides myself after I married him. I never asked him whether he had more wives than me or not.

There was not any love in the union between myself and Kimball, and it is my business entirely whether there was any courtship or not. (Temple Lot Case, p. 375)

It is almost impossible to conceive of the sorrow that the Mormon women went through. Joseph Lee Robinson, who was himself a polygamist and a faithful member of the Mormon Church, made this comment: “Plural marriage . . . is calculated in its nature to severely try the women even to nearly tear their heart strings out of them, . . .” (Journal and Autobiography of Joseph Lee Robinson, p. 60).

In a letter written November 4, 1856, from Great Salt Lake City, Ellen Spencer Clawson reveals the sorrows of plural marriage. Her husband had just taken another wife:

Your letter commenced with a wedding so mine shall be “ditto.” Just ten days ago Hiram brought home a new wife, no more or less than Miss Alice Young, . . . as they have just gone out riding on horse back and I am alone, I feel as though it would do me good to write, for my heart is rather heavy. I never thought I could care again if Hiram got a dosen wives, but it seems as though my affections return with double force, now that I feel as if I had lost him...you know a new wife is a new thing, and I know it is impossible for him to feel any different towards her just at present, still it make[s] my heart ache to think I have not the same love, but I console myself with thinking it will subside into affection, the same as it is with me, for you know the honey-moon cannot always last at least if you dont know it now you will sometime perhaps.

I think perhaps Margaret feels worse than I do for she was the last, and I suppose thought he would never get another, the same as I did, and “miserly loves company” you know. . . .

But excuse me for dwelling on this subject so long, “Out of the abundance of the heart the mouth speaketh” and I forgot myself. (Letter written by Ellen Spencer Clawson to Ellen Pratt McGary, printed in “Dear Ellen”: A Utah-California Correspondence, 1856-1857, by S. George Ellsworth; reprinted from The Western Humanities Review, Spring 1959, pp. 214-215)

Kimball Young gave this interesting information:

When James Hunter took his second wife, the first who had accompanied the couple to the Endowment House for the ceremony could not sleep and walked the floor all night as she thought of her husband lying in the arms of his new bride. . . .

A person brought up in a polygamous household and in a town in which there were a great many plural households told this story: “There is one real tragedy in polygamy that I can remember. One evening a man brought home a second wife. It was in the winter and the first wife was very upset. That night she climbed onto the roof and froze to death.” (Isn’t One Wife Enough? pp. 147-148)

The first wife of Herbert Winslow made the following statement about her life in polygamy:

Three of us lived in the same house for a year. I said I couldn’t stand it, I was going to lose my mind. I couldn’t stand to see him fondle over the others. Oh, he had to show them a little affection . . . No, he never slighted me, but I just couldn’t stand it. I’m not the jealous kind, though. (Ibid., p. 201)

At one time conditions became so bad in Brigham Young’s family that he offered to set all his wives free:

Now for my proposition; it is more particularly for my sisters, as it is frequently happening that women say they are unhappy. Men will say, “My wife, though a most excellent woman, has not seen a happy day since I took my second wife.” “No, not a happy day for a year,” says one; and another has not seen a happy day for five years. It is said that women are tied down and abused: that they are misused and have not the liberty they ought to have; that many of them are wading through a perfect flood of tears, . . .

I wish my own women to understand that what I am going to say is for them as well as others, and I want those who are here to tell their sisters, yes, all the women of this community, and then write it back to the States, and do as you please with it. I am going to give you from this time to the 6th day of October next, for reflection, that you may determine whether you wish to stay with your husbands or not, and then I am going to set every woman at liberty and say to them, Now go your way, my women with the rest, go your way. And my wives have got to do one of two things; either round up their shoulders to endure the afflictions of this world, and live their religion, or they may leave, for I will not have them about me. I will go into heaven alone, rather than have scratching and fighting around me. I will set all at liberty. “What, first wife too?” Yes, I will liberate you all. . . . I wish my women, and brother Kimball’s and brother Grant’s to leave, and every woman in this Territory, or else say in their hearts that they will embrace the Gospel—the whole of it . . . say to your wives, “Take all that I have and be set at liberty; but if you stay with me you shall comply with the law of God, and that too without any murmuring and whining. You must fulfil the law of God in every respect, and round up your shoulders to walk up to the mark without any grunting.”

Now recollect that two weeks from to morrow I am going to set you at liberty. But the first wife will say, “It is hard, for I have lived with my husband twenty years, or thirty, and have raised a family of children for him, and it is a great trial to me for him to have more women;” then I say it is time that you gave him up to other women who will bear children. If my wife had borne me all the children that she ever would bare, the celestial law would teach me to take young women that would have children. . . .

Sisters, I am not joking. I do not throw out my proposition to banter your feelings, to see whether you will leave your husbands, all or any of you. but I know that there is no cessation to the everlasting whining of many of the women in this territory; I am satisfied that this is the case. And if the women will turn from the commandments of God and continue to despise the order of heaven, I will pray that the curse of the Almighty may be close to their heals, and that it may be following them all the day long. . . .

Prepare yourselves for two weeks from to morrow; and I will tell you now, that if you will tarry with your husbands, after I have set you free, you must bow down to it, and submit yourselves to the celestial law. You may go where you please, after two weeks from to-morrow; but, remember, that I will not hear any more of this whining. (Sermon by Brigham Young, Journal of Discourses, vol. 4, pp. 55-57; also printed in Deseret News, vol. 6, pp. 235-236)

Heber C. Kimball, a member of the First Presidency, also offered to set his wives free:

How long is it since brother Brigham proffered to release all the women in this Territory who wished to be released? At the last October Conference. That woman is to blame who wanted to be free and did not take the liberty that was given; and I say to all of mine that want to go, go, and I will give you all the writings you want; and, besides that, I will give you the means to help you away. (Journal of Discourses, vol. 5, p. 274)

Jedediah M. Grant, second counselor to Brigham Young, made this statement:

And we have women here who like any thing but the celestial law of God; and if they could break as under the cable of the Church of Christ, there is scarcely a mother in Israel but would do it this day. And they talk it to their husbands, to their daughters, and to their neighbors, and say they have not seen a week’s happiness since their husbands took a second wife. (Deseret News, vol. 6, p. 235; also Journal of Discourses, vol. 4, p. 51)

Discord in Joseph’s Home

The Mormon writer John J. Stewart stated:

Thus did Satan sow the seeds of discord in the Prophet’s own home, cause a torment of mind to Emma, distress to Joseph, and lay the groundwork of the apostate Reorganized Church, eventually taking Emma and their sons outside the true Church. (Brigham Young and His Wives, p. 33)

In his thesis on Emma Hale, Raymond T. Bailey indicates that there was serious trouble in Joseph Smith’s marriage from 1841 until the time of his death:

Joseph did love Emma and was also extremely happy when he could be with his children, but from the year 1841 until the time of his martyrdom a portion of that happiness seems to be lacking. (“Emma Hale—Wife of the Prophet Joseph Smith,” a thesis by Raymond T. Bailey, Brigham Young University, 1952, p. 52 of typed copy)

Also during this period we find several stories told about quarrels between Joseph and Emma and their periods of reconciliation. . . .

From all that I have read on both sides of this issue . . . I feel that the teachings on polygamy must have been the cause for her [Emma’s] dissatisfaction with the main body of the Church and with the Apostolic quorum which led it after the death of her husband. It appears to be public knowledge that there were quarrels between Emma and Joseph especially during the Illinois period of their lives. (Ibid., p. 104)

On April 17, 1844, the Warsaw Signal reported the following:

We learn direct from Nauvoo, that Jo Smith, on Friday last, turned his wife out of doors. “Sister Emma’s” offence was, that she was in conversation with Mr. E. Robinson, and refused, or hesitated to tell the Prophet on what subject they were engaged. The man of God, thereupon, flew into a holy passion, and turned the partner of his bosom, and the said Robinson, into the street—all of which was done in broad day-light, and no doubt in the most approved style.

In his journal and autobiography, Joseph Lee Robinson (the brother of “E. Robinson” who is mentioned above) frankly admitted that Joseph and Emma had a fight over the doctrine of polygamy:

. . . Angeline Ebenezers wife had some time before this had watched Brother Joseph the Prophet had seen him go into some house that she had reported to sister Emma the wife of the Prophet it was at a time when she was very suspicious and jealous of him for fear he would get another wife . . . she was determined he should not get another if he did she was determined to leave and when she heard this she Emma became very angry and said she would leave . . . It came close to breaking up his family . . . the Prophet felt dreadful bad over it, he went to my Brothers and talked with Angelene on the matter, and she would not give him any satesfaction, and her husband did not reprove his wife, and it came to pass, the Prophet cursed her severely . . . I thought that I would not have a wife of mine do a thing of that kind for a world, but if she had done it she should get upon her nees at his feet and beg his pardon . . .

The reader will remember that the Mormon Apostle LeGrand Richards tried to prevent us from seeing the autobiography and journal cited above.

The following appears in the book Mormon Portraits:

Mr. W.: “Joseph kept eight girls in his house, calling them his ‘daughters.’ Emma threatened that she would leave the house, and Joseph told her, ‘All right, you can go.’ She went, but when Joseph reflected that such a scandal would hurt his prophetic dignity, he followed his wife and brought her back. But the eight ‘daughters’ had to leave the house.”

“Miss” Eliza R. Snow, one of the most curious figures in the history of Mormondom, . . . was one of the first

(willing) victims of Joseph in Nauvoo. She used to be much at the prophet's house and "Sister Emma" treated her as a confidential friend. Very much interested about Joseph's errands, Emma used to send Eliza after him as a spy. Joseph found it out and, to win over the gifted (!) young poetess, he made her one of his celestial brides. There is scarcely a Mormon unacquainted with the fact that Sister Emma, on the other side, soon found out the little compromise arranged between Joseph and Eliza. Feeling outraged as a wife and betrayed as a friend, Emma is currently reported as having had recourse to a vulgar broomstick as an instrument of revenge: and the harsh treatment received at Emma's hands is said to have destroyed Eliza's hopes of becoming the mother of a prophet's son. (Mormon Portraits, by Dr. W. Wyl, 1886, pp. 57-58)

Fawn M. Brodie made this statement:

There is a persistent tradition that Eliza conceived a child by Joseph in Nauvoo, and that Emma one day discovered her husband embracing Eliza in the hall outside their bedrooms and in a rage flung her downstairs and drove her out into the street. The fall is said to have resulted in a miscarriage. (This tradition was stated to me as fact by Eliza's nephew, LeRoi C. Snow, in the Church Historian's Office, Salt Lake City.) (No Man Knows My History, p. 447)

The Mormon writer Claire Noall made this statement:

Willard realized that Emma had refused to believe that any of the young women boarding at the Mansion when it was first used as a hotel had been married to Joseph. She had struck Eliza Snow at the head of the stairs, and Eliza, it was whispered, had lost her unborn child. (Intimate Disciple, a Portrait of Willard Richards, 1957, p. 407)

In a letter to Mrs. Vesta Pierce Crawford, John R. Young related the following:

At the time Joseph and Alexander—the Prophet's sons—visited S.L. city—I was living at St. George—at a Sacrament meeting I heard Solon Foster, who in Nauvoo lived with Joseph, was his coachman—He went from St. George to S.L. City to meet the Prophet's sons—upon his return Pres. Snow asked him to tell the Saints of the meeting—He said after greeting the Boys—I said, . . . Joseph, the night your mother turned Eliza R. Snow, into the street in her night clothes, you and all the Family stood crying, I led you back into the house and took you into Bed with me—you said, "I wish Mother wouldn't be so cruel to Aunt Eliza"—You called her Aunt, because you knew she was your father's wife. He did not deny it—I believe that was what drove Emma from the main body of the Church. (Letter written by John R. Young, quoted in full in the thesis "Emma Hale—Wife of the Prophet Joseph Smith," pp. 186-187)

Lived With His Wives

There are some members of the Mormon Church who maintain that Joseph Smith did not actually live with his wives here on earth. There is plenty of evidence, however, to show that he did. Benjamin F. Johnson stated:

As I could not long be absent from my home and business, we soon returned to Ramus. On the 15th day of May some three weeks later, the Prophet again came and at my home occupied the same room and bed, with my sister, that the month previous he had occupied with the daughter of the late Bishop Partridge as his wife. (Letter from Benjamin F. Johnson to George S. Gibbs, 1903, mimeographed copy)

Mr. Johnson made the following statement in an affidavit dated March 4, 1870:

After a short period, President Smith . . . came again to Macedonia (Ramus), where he remained two days, lodging at my house with my sister as man and wife (and to my certain knowledge he occupied the same bed with her). This visit was on the 16th and 17th of May, 1843, returning to Nauvoo on the 18th. (Historical Record, vol. 6, p. 222)

Lucy Walker made this statement in an affidavit:

I was a plural wife of the Prophet Joseph Smith . . . The Prophet was then living with his first wife, Emma Smith, and I know that she gave her consent to the marriage of at least four women to her husband as plural wives, and she was well aware that he associated and cohabited with them as wives. (Affidavit of Lucy Walker Smith Kimball, printed in Blood Atonement and the Origin of Plural Marriage, by Joseph Fielding Smith, p. 68)

R. C. Evans related the following:

When in Salt Lake City I called at the residence of Patriarch John Smith, . . . while there his wife, Helen, told me among many other interesting things, that "Melissa Lott told me that when a girl she sewed for Emma Smith and took care of the children. Joseph had to pass through her room to go to Emma's room. She said Joseph never had sexual intercourse with her but once and that was in the daytime, saying he desired her to have a child by him. She was barefooted and ironing when Joseph came in, and the ceremony was performed in the presence of her parents." (Forty Years in the Mormon Church, by R. C. Evans, 1920, p. 38)

Number of Wives

Andrew Jenson, who was the Assistant Mormon Church Historian, listed 27 women who were married to Joseph Smith (see the Historical Record, pp. 233-234). The Mormon author John J. Stewart, however, states that Joseph Smith may have married 36 or even 48 wives: ". . . he married many other women, perhaps three or four dozen or more. . . ." (Brigham Young and His Wives, p. 31).

Fawn M. Brodie includes a list of 48 women who may have been married to Joseph Smith (see No Man Knows My History, pp. 434-465). Stanley S. Ivins was considered to be "one of the great authorities on Mormon polygamy" (The Mormon Establishment, p. 187). At one time he stated that the number of Joseph Smith's wives "can only be guessed at, but it might have gone as high as sixty or more" (Western Humanities Review, vol. 10, pp. 232-233). Before his death Stanley S. Ivins prepared a list of 84 women who may have been married to Joseph Smith during his lifetime. We published this information in the book Joseph Smith and Polygamy, pp. 41-47. While Mr. Ivins was not certain that every woman listed was actually married to Smith, he pointed out that there may have been others who were married to Joseph Smith whose names did not appear on the list. In preparing this list Mr. Ivins did a great deal of research in the Nauvoo Temple records, the Endowment House records and other genealogical records. After Mr. Ivins' study was completed, some of the temple records in the L.D.S. Genealogical Library were restricted and are no longer available to the general public.

Before listing the last 11 names on his list, Stanley S. Ivins stated:

On April 4, 1899, eleven of the wives of Joseph Smith, all long since dead, were sealed to him by proxy. A not[e] accompanying the record of the sealing said: "The sealings of those named below were performed during the life of the Prophet Joseph but there is no record thereof. President Lorenzo Snow decided that they be repeated in order that a record might exist; and that this explanation be made." This incident suggests that others of the many dead women to whom Smith was sealed, by proxy, may have been married to him during his life. . . .

At the end of his paper Mr. Ivins stated: "In addition to these dead women, Joseph Smith was sealed to at least 229 others, up to March 18, 1881 (Additional note: Sealed to 246 Dead Women.)" (Joseph Smith and Polygamy, p. 47).

In the Preface to the Second Edition of her book No Man Knows My History, Fawn Brodie states:

. . . over two hundred women, apparently at their own request, were sealed as wives to Joseph Smith after his death in special temple ceremonies. Moreover, a great many distinguished women in history, including several Catholic saints, were also sealed to Joseph Smith in Utah. I saw these astonishing lists in the Latter-day Saint Genealogical Archives in Salt Lake City in 1944.

The Apostle John A. Widtsoe admitted that women were sealed to Joseph Smith after his death and without his approval:

After the death of the Prophet, women applied for the privilege of being sealed to him for eternity. . . . To these requests, assent was often given . . .

Women no longer living, whether in Joseph's day or later, have also been sealed to the Prophet for eternity. (Evidences and Reconciliations, single volume edition, 1960, pp. 342-343)

If the Mormon doctrine concerning plural marriage were true, Joseph Smith would have hundreds of wives in the resurrection. Some of the women Brigham Young and Heber C. Kimball married—who were previously married to Joseph Smith—would have to be surrendered to Joseph in the hereafter. Lucy W. Kimball testified:

The contract when I married Mr. Kimball was that I should be his wife for time, and time only, and the contract on the part of Mr. Kimball was that he would take care of me during my lifetime, and in the resurrection would surrender me, with my children, to Joseph Smith. That is what I call marrying by proxy, and men have been crushed who have refused to do such things. That was the kind of an agreement I had with Mr. Kimball.

I decline to answer whether I had any children while I was sealed to Joseph Smith. I have nine children since I was married to Heber C. Kimball. (The Temple Lot Case, 1893, p. 379)

In an article published in Western Humanities Review, vol. 10, pages 232-233, Stanley S. Ivins made this statement concerning the number of wives Brigham Young had:

Brigham Young is usually credited with only twenty-seven wives, but he was sealed to more than twice that many living women, and to at least 150 more who had died.

The Mormon writer John J. Stewart lists the names of 53 women who were sealed to Brigham Young, and then he makes this statement:

There were perhaps one or two others, plus some 150 dead women whom he had sealed to him; also a few women who were sealed to him after his death. (Brigham Young and His Wives, p. 96)

The Mormon Apostle Ezra T. Benson, in a speech delivered January 24, 1858, in the Tabernacle, indicated that Brigham Young had as many as 50 or 60 wives:

The next man who came on to the carpet wanted to know how many wives Brother Brigham had. I replied, “. . . I will guess, if that will do you any good . . . if I may judge from appearances, I should presume he has some fifty or sixty.” (Journal of Discourses, vol. 6, pp. 180-181)

Stanley P. Hirshon lists seventy women who may have been married to Brigham Young (see The Lion of the Lord, pp. 190-221). On pages 188-189 of the same book, he gives this information:

Like Kimball, Young often joked about his wives. “Tell the Gentiles,” he once observed, “I do not know half of them when I see them.” Later, asked the usual question by a Gentile governor of Utah, Young answered: “I don't know myself! I never refuse to marry any respectable woman who asks me, and it is often the case that I separate from a woman at the marriage altar, never to meet her again to know her. My children I keep track of, however. I have fifty-seven now living, and have lost three.” To a lady who wanted to see his wives, Young coldly said: “Madam, they are not on exhibition.”

Brigham Young made the following statements concerning his ability to obtain wives:

We are complained of for having more wives than one. I don't begin to have as many as I shall have by and by, nor you either, if you are faithful. (Journal of Discourses, vol. 8, p. 222)

Brother Cannon remarked that people wondered how many wives and children I had. He may inform them, that I shall have wives and children by the million, and glory, and riches and power and dominion, and kingdom after kingdom, and reign triumphantly. (Journal of Discourses, vol. 8, p. 178)

I could prove to this congregation that I am young; for I could find more girls who would choose me for a husband than can any of the young men. (Journal of Discourses, vol. 5, p. 210)

Irving Wallace claims that Brigham Young fell in love with an actress:

She was the justly celebrated and breath-takingly beautiful Julia Dean Hayne. Brigham, said Ann Eliza Webb, “was madly in love with her.” . . .

There seems every evidence that Brigham, at sixty-four had a deeply romantic involvement with Julia Dean Hayne. For winter sport Brigham ordered a huge green sleigh built and, in bold lettering on its side, he named it “The Julia Dean.” The sleigh, decorated with two large swan heads, and drawn by six horses, was capable of carrying two to three dozen adults. On two known occasions Brigham threw glittering parties for the actress at his country residence, The Farm House, four miles outside the city, and drove Julia Dean Hayne to the celebrations in the sleigh.

It is said that Brigham tried to convert the actress to the Mormon faith and even proposed marriage. But Julia Dean Hayne would have her patron neither as Prophet nor as polygamist. Besides, she had fallen in love with a non-Mormon. . . . On May 19, 1868, she died . . .

In faraway Utah Territory, Brigham Young grieved her loss. “His regard for her never ceased,” wrote Ann Eliza Webb, “and I have heard, on what seemed very good authority—although I cannot vouch for its truth—that after he heard of her death he had one of his wives baptized for her, and then sealed to him for her; so he is sure, he thinks, of possessing her in the next world, although he could not induce her to look kindly upon him here.” (The Twenty-Seventh Wife, New York, 1962, pp. 123, 125, 126)

The fact that Brigham Young did have Julia Dean sealed to himself was verified by Stanley S. Ivins when he was doing research in the Endowment House Records for August 16, 1866, to September 30, 1870. He found that on September 15, 1869, Brigham Young was sealed to the actress Julia Dean. Amelia Folsom Young acted as “proxy.”

Although Brigham Young was constantly marrying new wives, he claimed that “There are probably but few men in the world who care about the private society of women less than I do” (Journal of Discourses, vol. 5, p. 99).

Heber C. Kimball claimed that the congregation would not believe how many wives he had:

Plurality of wives! I have a good many wives. How much would you give to know how many? If I were to tell you, you would not believe it. (Journal of Discourses, vol. 5, p. 91)

John J. Stewart claims that Heber C. Kimball actually had 45 wives. Heber C. Kimball believed that in the resurrection he would be able to have thousands of wives:

Supposing that I have a wife or a dozen of them, and she should say, “You cannot be exalted without me,” and suppose they all should say so, what of that? . . . Suppose that I lose the whole of them before I go into the spirit world, but that I have been a good, faithful man all the days of my life, and lived my religion, and had favour with God, and was kind to them, do you think I will be destitute there. No, the Lord says there are more there than there are here. They have been increasing there; they increase there a great deal faster than we do here, . . .

In the spirit world there is an increase of males and females, there are millions of them, and if I am faithful all the time, and continue right along with brother Brigham, we will go to brother Joseph and say, “Here we are brother Joseph; we are here ourselves are we not, with none of the property we possessed in our probationary state, not even the rings on our fingers?” He will say to us, “Come along, my boys, we will give you a good suit of clothes. Where are your wives?” “They are back yonder; they would not follow us.” “Never mind,” says Joseph, “Here are thousands, have all you want.” (Journal of Discourses, vol. 4, p. 209)

The Mormon men certainly believed that they could have all the wives they wanted. Kimball Young stated:

One of the informants for this study said that her uncle had “some hundreds of wives sealed to him for eternity only.” (Isn't One Wife Enough? p. 146)

According to Stanley S. Ivins, the Endowment House Records reveal that on November 22, 1870, the Mormon Apostle Orson Pratt had himself sealed to 101 dead women. On November 29, 1870, he was sealed to 109 dead women. The same day (November 29, 1870) 91 dead women were sealed to his brother, Parley P. Pratt, who had died in 1857. Mr. Ivins found that the St. George Temple Records show that Wilford Woodruff—who later became the fourth President of the Mormon Church—was sealed to 189 dead women in a period of slightly over two years (January 29, 1879, to March 14, 1881). Moses Franklin Farnsworth probably holds the record, however, for he was sealed to 345 dead women in a two year period.

Taking Other Men's Wives

The fact that Joseph Smith asked for other men's wives was made very plain in a sermon delivered in the Tabernacle by Jedediah M. Grant, second counselor to Brigham Young. In this sermon, delivered February 19, 1854, Jedediah M. Grant stated:

When the family organization was revealed from heaven—the patriarchal order of God, and Joseph began, on the right and on the left, to add to his family, what a quaking there was in Israel. Says one brother to another, “Joseph says all covenants are done away, and none are binding but the new covenants; now suppose Joseph should come and say he wanted your wife, what you say to that?” “I would tell him to go to hell.” This was the spirit of many in the early days of this Church. . . .

What would a man of God say, who felt aright, when Joseph asked him for his money? He would say, “Yes, and I wish I had more to help to build up the kingdom of God.” Or if he came and said, “I want your wife?” “O Yes,” he would say, “Here she is, there are plenty more.” . . . Did the Prophet Joseph want every man's wife he asked for? He did not, . . . If such a man of God should come to me and say, “I want your gold and silver, or your wives,” I should say, “Here they are. I wish I had more to give you. Take all I have got.” (Journal of Discourses, vol. 2, pp. 13-14)

In his book Mormon Portraits, Dr. Wyl gave the following information:

Joseph Smith finally demanded the wives of all the twelve apostles that were at home then in Nauvoo. . . . Vilate Kimball, the first wife of Heber C. Kimball, . . . loved her husband, and he, . . . loved her, hence a reluctance to comply with the Lord's demand that Vilate should be consecrated . . . They thought the command of the Lord must be obeyed in some way, and a “proxy” way suggested itself to their minds. They had a young daughter only getting out of girlhood, and the father apologizing to the prophet for his wife's reluctance to comply with his desires, stating, however, that the act must be right or it would not be counselled—the abject slave of a father asked Joe if his daughter wouldn't do as well as his wife. Joe replied that she would do just as well, and the Lord would accept her instead. The half-ripe bud of womanhood was delivered over to the Prophet. (Mormon Portraits, 1886, pp. 70-72)

The fact that Joseph Smith asked for Heber C. Kimball's wife but actually married his daughter is verified in the book The Life of Heber C. Kimball, written by the Mormon Apostle Orson F. Whitney:

Before he would trust even Heber with the full secret, however, he put him to a test which few men would have been able to bear.

It was no less than a requirement for him to surrender his wife, his beloved Vilate, and give her to Joseph in marriage!

The astounding revelation well-nigh paraly[z]ed him. He could hardly believe he had heard aright. Yet Joseph was solemnly in earnest. . . . He knew Joseph too well, as a man, a friend, a brother, a servant of God, to doubt his truth or the divine origin of the behest he had made. No; Joseph was God's Prophet, His mouthpiece and oracle, and so long as he was so, his words were as the words of the Eternal One . . . He would try and do as he was told. Such, now, was his superhuman resolve.

Three days he fasted and wept and prayed. Then, with a broken and a bleeding heart, but with soul self-mastered for the sacrifice, he led his darling wife to the Prophet's house and presented her to Joseph.

It was enough—the heavens accepted the sacrifice. The will for the deed was taken, and “accounted unto him for righteousness.” Joseph wept at this proof of devotion, and embracing Heber told him that was all the Lord required.

The Prophet joined the hands of the heroic and devoted pair, and then and there, by virtue of the sealing power and authority of the Holy Priesthood, Heber and Vilate Kimball were made husband and wife for all eternity. (Life of Heber C. Kimball, pp. 333-335)

Soon after the revelation was given, a golden link was forged whereby the houses of Heber and Joseph were indissolubly and forever joined. Helen Mar, the eldest daughter of Heber Chase and Vilate Kimball was given to the Prophet in the holy bonds of celestial marriage. (Ibid., p. 339)

According to John D. Lee, Brigham Young tried to justify Joseph Smith's actions by saying that the Lord gave him special privileges: “After the death of Joseph, Brigham Young told me that Joseph's time on earth was short, and that the Lord allowed him privileges that we could not have” (Confessions of John D. Lee, photo reprint of 1880 ed., p. 147).

Joseph Smith was apparently worried concerning adultery. Joseph Lee Robinson recorded the following in his journal and autobiography:

. . . God had revealed unto him [Joseph Smith] that any man that ever committed adultery in either of his probations that that man could never be raised to the highest exaltation in the celestial glory, and that he felt anxious with regard to himself that he enquired of the Lord that the Lord told him that he Joseph had never committed adultery.

John D. Lee tells that Joseph Smith took H. B. Jacobs' wife while Mr. Jacobs was absent:

It was now June, 1842 . . . I then took a tour down through Illinois. H. B. Jacobs accompanied me as a fellow companion of the way. Jacobs was bragging about his wife and two children, what a true, virtuous, lovely woman she was. He almost worshiped her. But little did he think that, in his absense, she was sealed to the Prophet Joseph, and was his wife. (Confessions of John D. Lee, p. 132)

Juanita Brooks states that “Zina Diantha Huntington” was the woman who was married to Henry B. Jacobs and later sealed to Joseph Smith. She states that after she was sealed to Joseph Smith she continued to live with Jacobs, and that later she “renounced Jacobs and joined the family of Brigham Young” (see On The Mormon Frontier, The Diary of Hosea Stout, vol. 1, p. 141, n. 18). Andrew Jenson, who was assistant Church Historian, confirmed the fact that Zina D. Huntington married Joseph Smith and later became the wife of Brigham Young:

Zina D. Huntington, afterwards the wife of Pres. Brigham Young, sealed to the Prophet Oct. 27, 1841, Dimick B. Huntington officiating. Her sister Fanny was present as a witness. (Historical Record, by Andrew Jenson, p. 233) declaration to me was as the voice of Almighty God. Why? Because he had the Priesthood of God on the earth; the Priesthood that is without father, without mother, without beginning of days or end of years, which is God's authority, the eternal power and right of the government of God upon the earth. I was subject to that government in the days of Joseph. Men used to talk on this wise—"But would you believe in the Prophet if he should demand all your property?" Lucifer would suggest this idea to them. "No," says another, "I would not." "Suppose he should come to you, and tell you, you must sell your farm in the east, and go to Kirtland, and consecrate your property to the Lord, would you do it?" "No," answers his neighbor, "the Lord has no use for my property, I would not do it." "Well," says one, "do you think Joseph is right to dictate in temporal matters?" "No." There were quite a majority, I believe, in the days of Joseph, who believed he had no right to dictate in temporal matters, in farms, houses, merchandize, gold, silver, &c.; and they were tried on various points.

When the family organization was revealed from heaven—the patriarchal order of God, and Joseph began, on the right and on the left, to add to his family, what a quaking there was in Israel. Says one brother to another, "Joseph says all covenants are done away, and none are binding but the new covenants; now suppose Joseph should come and say he wanted your wife, what would you say to that?" "I would tell him to go to hell." This was the spirit of many in the early days of this Church.

If you maintain the fact that the Priesthood of God is upon the earth, and God's representatives are upon the earth, the mouth-piece of Jehovah, the head of the kingdom of God upon earth, and the will of God is done upon earth as it is in heaven, it follows that the government of God is upon the earth. I allude to the Church which it dictates; and then to the whole earth which it will dictate. Satan may succeed for a season to curtail the extent of this government, and the free working of its machinery, but if the Lord Almighty has organized a government upon the earth, and has committed the keys and Priesthood of it to His Prophet, that Prophet holds jurisdiction over the earth, the same as Adam did in the beginning. And righteous men in every dispensation since the creation, if they had any keys, had the keys of the kingdom of God; and they extended over this wide world, wherever God had a people and a government; and just as far as the Priesthood exercised its authority, just so far the rule of the Almighty reached.

If Joseph had a right to dictate me in relation to salvation, in relation to a hereafter, he had a right to dictate me in relation to all my earthly affairs, in relation to the treasures of the earth, and in relation to the earth itself. He had a right to dictate in relation to the cities of the earth, to the natives of the earth, and in relation to everything on land and on sea. That is what he had a right to do, if he had any right at all. If he did not have that right, he did not have the Priesthood of God, he did not have the endless Priesthood that emanates from an eternal being. A Priesthood that is clipped, and lacks length, is not the Priesthood of God; if it lacks depth, it is not the Priesthood of God; for the Priesthood in ancient times extended over the wide world, and coped with the universe, and had a right to govern and control the inhabitants thereof, to regulate them, give them laws, and execute those laws. That power looked like the Priesthood of God. This same Priesthood has been given to Joseph

A photograph of the Journal of Discourses, vol. 2, page 13. Jedediah M. Grant, second counselor to Brigham Young, tells what happened when Joseph Smith began to practice polygamy.

Smith, and has been handed down to his successors.

I do not care how many devils rap, it is no trouble to me. I say, rap away, and give as many revelations as you please, whether you are good spirits or bad ones, it does not trouble my cranium. Rap away, for I trust in the anchor of my soul that is sure and steadfast, in the Priesthood of God upon the earth.

What would a man of God say, who felt aright, when Joseph asked him for his money? He would say, "Yes, and I wish I had more to help to build up the kingdom of God." Or if he came and said, "I want your wife?" "O yes," he would say, "here she is, there are plenty more."

There is another main thread connected with this, that I have not brought out. You know in fishing with the hook and line, if you draw out suddenly on the line when you have got a large trout, you may break your line; you must therefore angle a little, and manage your prize carefully. I would ask you if Jehovah has not in all ages tried His people by the power of Lucifer and his associates; and on the other hand, has He not tried them and proved them by His Prophets? Did the Lord actually want Abraham to kill Isaac? Did the Prophet Joseph want every man's wife he asked for? He did not, but in that thing was the grand thread of the Priesthood developed. The grand object in view was to try the people of God, to see what was in them. If such a man of God should come to me and say, "I want your gold and silver, or your wives," I should say, "Here they are, I wish I had more to give you, take all I have got." A man who has got the Spirit of God, and the light of eternity in him, has no trouble about such matters.

I am talking now of the present day. There was a time when we could be tried pretty severely upon these points, but I now could pick you out hundreds of men that cannot be tried in this way, but they will hand over every thing they possess. They understand the nature of such doctrines, and the object of such requirements. They know it is to prove the people, both men and women, and to develop what they will do. How can the Priesthood judge the people, if it does not prove them.

If ever you are brought into the presence of God, and exalted to a seat in His celestial kingdom, it will be by virtue of the Holy Priesthood, therefore you have got to be proved, not only by being tempted by the devil, but the Priesthood will try you—it will try you to the core. If one thing won't try you, something else will be adopted, until you are like the passive clay in the hands of the Potter. If the Lord our God does not see fit to let the devil loose upon you, and mob you, He will employ some other means to try you as in a crucible, to prove you as gold is tried seven times in the furnace.

The world philosophizes about the "Mormons," about their leaders, and the life they are living. There are a thousand conjectures among them in relation to the "Mormons." The grand secret is told in a few words; the fact is, the Almighty God has spoken from the heavens, sent heavenly messengers, and organized His Church, restored the Holy Priesthood, established His government on the earth, and exerted his power to extend it, and send forth His word. And that Priesthood understands the principles and motives by which men are actuated, and it understands the workings of the devil on the earth; that Priesthood knows how to govern, when to strike, and when not to strike.

Some things in this Church start up at times, that you would think the whole Church would be rent asunder, like the clans of Scotland. Clanism,

Zina Diantha Huntington Jacobs is listed as wife number five in Stanley Ivins' list of 84 women who may have been married to Joseph Smith:

5.—ZINA DIANTHA HUNTINGTON JACOBS. Daughter of William and Zina Baker Huntington, and wife of Henry B. Jacobs. Born in Watertown, New York, January 31, 1821. Married Jacobs March 7, 1841. Married Joseph Smith, October 27, 1841. On February 2, 1846, she was sealed to Smith for eternity and to Brigham Young for time. She lived with Young as his wife, and died August 29, 1901. (Joseph Smith and Polygamy, p. 42)

Fawn M. Brodie stated:

Zina left Jacobs in 1846 to marry Brigham Young. William Hall asserted that he had heard Young say publicly to Jacobs: "The woman you claim for a wife does not belong to you. She is the spiritual wife of brother Joseph, sealed to him. I am his proxy, and she, in this behalf, with her children, are my property. You can go where you please, and get another, but be sure to get one of your own kindred spirits." Jacobs apparently accepted Young's decision as the word of the Lord, for he stood as witness in the Nauvoo temple in January 1846 when Zina was sealed to Brigham Young "for time" and to Joseph Smith "for eternity." (No Man Knows My History, p. 443)

Juanita Brooks stated: ". . . Zina had been moved to Winter Quarters. She now renounced Jacobs and joined the family of Brigham Young, traveling west in 1848 in a wagon provided by him and driven by her brother Oliver" (On The Mormon Frontier, the Diary of Hosea Stout, vol. 1, p. 141, n. 18). According to Juanita Brooks, Henry Jacobs was still alive in 1886 (Ibid., p. 142, footnote). Zina Diantha Huntington died on August 29, 1901.

Ann Eliza Young, who had been married to Brigham Young, charged that Joseph Smith was guilty of adultery:

Joseph not only paid his addresses to the young and unmarried women, but he sought "spiritual alliance" with many married ladies . . . He taught them that all former marriages were null and void, and that they were at perfect liberty to make another choice of a husband. The marriage covenants were not binding, because they were ratified only by Gentile laws. These laws the Lord did not recognize; consequently all the women were free.

One woman said to me not very long since, while giving me some of her experiences in polygamy: "The greatest trial I ever endured in my life was living with my husband and deceiving him, by receiving Joseph's attentions whenever he chose to come to me."

This woman, and others, whose experience has been very similar, are among the very best women in the church; they are as pure-minded and virtuous women as any in the world. They were seduced under the guise of religion, . . .

Some of these Women have since said they did not know who was the father of their children; this is not to be wondered at, for after Joseph's declaration annulling all gentile marriages, the greatest promiscuity was practiced; and, indeed, all sense of morality seemed to have been lost by a portion at least of the church. (Wife No. 19, by Ann-Eliza Young, 1876, pp. 70-71)

The Mormon Apostle John A. Widtsoe admitted that Joseph Smith was sealed to married women, but he claimed that they were not to be his wives until after death:

7. Another kind of celestial marriage seems to have been practiced in the early days of plural marriage. It has not been practiced since Nauvoo days, for it is under Church prohibition. Zealous women, married or unmarried, loving the cause of the restored gospel, considered their condition in the hereafter. Some of them asked that they might be sealed to the Prophet for eternity. They were not to be his wives on earth, in mortality, but only after death in the eternities. . . . Such marriages led to misunderstandings by those not of the Church, . . . Therefore any ceremony uniting a married woman, for example to Joseph Smith for eternity seemed adulterous to such people. Yet, in any day, in our day, there may be women who prefer to spend eternity with another than their husband on earth.

Such cases, if any, and they must have been few in number, gave enemies of the Church occasion to fan the flaming hatred against the Latter-day Saints. (Evidences and Reconciliations, 1960, p. 343)

John A. Widtsoe's statement that Joseph Smith did not live with the married women to whom he was sealed is certainly false. Patty Bartlett Sessions, the wife of David Sessions, made it very clear in her private journal that she was married to Joseph Smith for both "time" and "eternity":

I was sealed to Joseph Smith by Willard Richards Mar 9, 1842, in Newel K. Whitney's chamber, Nauvoo, for time and all eternity, and if I do not live to attend to it myself when there is a place prepared I want someone to attend to it for me according to order, Sylvia my daughter was present when I was sealed to Joseph Smith. I was after Mr. Sessions' death sealed to John Parry for time on the 27th, March, 1852, GSL City. (Journal of Patty Sessions, as quoted in Intimate Disciple, Portrait of Willard Richards, 1957, p. 611)

The following information concerning Patty Sessions is found in Stanley S. Ivins' list of 84 women who may have been married to Joseph Smith:

34.—PATTY BARTLETT SESSIONS. Wife of David Sessions. . . . Married Sessions, June 28, 1812. Married Joseph Smith on March 9, 1842. Her husband Sessions died about 1850. . . . On July 9, 1867, she was sealed to Joseph Smith in the Endowment House. . . . (Joseph Smith and Polygamy, p. 44)

Number 4 on the same list is Lucinda Pendleton Morgan Harris:

4.—LUCINDA PENDLETON MORGAN HARRIS. Daughter of Joseph Pendleton and the wife of George W. Harris. . . . She married William Morgan of Masonic notoriety, and after his death, married Harris. She married Joseph Smith, date unknown, and then on January 22, 1846, was sealed to him for eternity and to Harris for time. The next day she was again sealed to Harris for time. (Nauvoo Temple Sealing Record). On April 4, 1899, she was sealed, by Proxy, to Joseph Smith.

Andrew Jenson, the Assistant Church Historian, admitted that Lucinda Harris was sealed to Joseph Smith: "Lucinda Harris, also one of the first women sealed to the Prophet Joseph." (Historical Record, p. 233)

Mary Elizabeth Rollins Lightner, the wife of Adam Lightner, stated: "Joseph said I was his before I came here and he said all the Devils in Hell should never get me from him. I was sealed to him in the Masonic Hall, over the old brick store by Brigham Young in February 1842 and then again in the Nauvoo Temple by Heber C. Kimball. . . ." (Affidavit of Mary Elizabeth Rollins Lightner, as quoted in No Man Knows My History, p. 444).

In a speech given at Brigham Young University, Mrs. Lightner stated:

He [Joseph] preached polygamy and he not only preached it, but he practiced it. I am a living witness to it. It was given to him before he gave it to the Church. An angel came to him and the last time he came with a drawn sword in his hand and told Joseph if he did not go into that principle he would slay him. Joseph said he talked to him soberly about it, and told him it was an abomination and quoted scripture to him. He said in the Book of Mormon it was an abomination in the eyes of the Lord, and they were to adhere to these things except the Lord speak. . . .

I asked him if Emma knew about me and he said, "Emma thinks the world of you." I was not sealed to him until I had a witness. I had been dreaming for a number of years I was his wife. I thought I was a great sinner. I prayed to God to take it from me for I felt it was a sin, but when Joseph sent for me he told me all of these things. "Well," said I, "Don't you think it was an angel of the Devil that told you these things?" Said he, "No, it was an angel of God. God Almighty showed me the difference between an angel of Light and Satan's angels". . . . I talked with him for a long time . . . He asked me if I was going to be a traitor. "I have never told a mortal and shall never tell a a mortal I had such a talk with a married man,” said I. . . .

Joseph came up the next Sabbath.... My husband was far away from me at the time, . . . I went forward and was sealed to him. Brigham Young performed the sealing and Heber C. Kimball the blessing.

I knew he had six wives and I have known some of them from childhood up. I know he had three children. They told me. I think two of them are living today, they are not known as his children as they go by other names. (Speech by Mary E. Lightner, Brigham Young University, April 14th, 1905, typed copy)
