Andrew Jenson admits that Mary Elizabeth Rollins was sealed to Joseph Smith (see Historical Record, vol. 6, p. 234). In Stanley Ivins’ list of 84 women who may have been married to Joseph Smith we find the following:

22.—MARY ELIZABETH ROLLINS LIGHTNER. Daughter of John Rollins and wife of Adam Lightner. . . . Married Lightner on August 11, 1835. Married Joseph Smith in February, 1843. (Brodie: No Man Knows My History, page 444). On January 17, 1846 she was sealed to Joseph Smith for eternity and to Brigham Young for time. However she remained with her legal husband and came to Utah with him in 1863. Her death was on December 17, 1913. (Joseph Smith and Polygamy, p. 43)

It would appear, then, that Mary E. Lightner had two different husbands for “time” and a third for “eternity.” The Mormon writer John J. Stewart confirms this in his book Brigham Young and His Wives:

17. Mary Elizabeth Rollins. Born April 9, 1818, at Luna, New York; died December 17, 1913. The wife of a non-Mormon, Adam Lightner. Sealed to the Prophet Joseph in February, 1842, at the age of 23, and again January 17, 1846, at which time she was sealed to Brigham for time. (Brigham Young and His Wives, p. 89)

Stanley P. Hirshon gives this interesting information concerning Augusta Adams Cobb:

. . . Augusta Adams Cobb, . . . married Henry Cobb, a prosperous Boston merchant, about 1822 and bore seven children.

Augusta lived quietly until Young came east to preach in the summer of 1843. She heard him, converted to Mormonism, and with her two smallest children headed for Nauvoo. . . . Augusta continued on to Nauvoo and on November 2, 1843, without divorcing her first husband married Young. A few months later she briefly returned to Boston, where she saw her other children and told Henry she was leaving him forever. . . .

Augusta returned to Nauvoo and on February 2, 1846, was sealed to Young for eternity. The following year Henry Cobb, still in Massachusetts, divorced her. (The Lion of the Lord, pp. 192-194)

The Mormon writer John J. Stewart confirms the fact that Mrs. Cobb was married to Brigham Young in 1843:

5. AUGUSTA ADAMS. Born December 7, 1802, at Beverly, Massachusetts; died in 1886. Married to Brigham November 2, 1843, at the age of 40, and sealed to him February 2, 1846. She had several children by a previous marriage. (Brigham Young and His Wives, p. 86)

From these facts it is hard to escape the conclusion that Joseph Smith and Brigham Young were living in adultery (for additional evidence see our book Joseph Smith and Polygamy). John D. Lee stated:

Some have mutually agreed to exchange wives and have been sealed to each other as husband and wife by virtue and authority of the holy priesthood. One of Brigham’s brothers, Lorenzo Young, now a bishop, made an exchange of wives with Mr. Decker, the father of the Mr. Decker who now has an interest in the cars running to York. (Confessions of John D. Lee, photo reprint of 1880 ed., p. 165)

The fact that some members of the Mormon Church were worried that someone else would take their wives is shown by a speech delivered by Brigham Young on February 16, 1847. Young stated:

There is another principle that has caused considerable uneasiness and trouble (E.I.) the idea of some men having more wives than one. Such tremendous fear takes hold of some that they don’t know how to live and still they can’t die, and begin to whisper and talk around saying, I am actually afraid to go on a mission for fear some man will be sealed to my wife, or when they return home some will be babbling about you don’t know but what you have got another man’s wife. For my part some say I am afraid to speak to a young woman for fear that she belongs to someone else or for fear somebody else wants her (others deny the faith as they think, but they never had any), and say that it is all from the devil . . . those that suffer fears and jealousy to arrive in their bosoms either back right out or get to be mighty righteous and for fear that they are sleeping with some other man’s wife they kick up a broil at home and perhaps abuse their companions through jealousy, . . . (Sermon of Brigham Young, as quoted in Journals of John D. Lee, 1846-47 and 1859, edited by Charles Kelly, 1938, pp. 79-80)

Polygamy or Promiscuity?

The Mormon writer John J. Stewart states:

So it was that from the spring of 1841 Nauvoo had three patterns of sexual relationship: monogamy, polygyny, and promiscuity. These latter two, insisted Smith, were extreme opposites, the one divinely revealed and commanded, and lived by the morally worthy; the other inspired of Satan, the great counterfeiter, and lived by the morally corrupt; the one exalting, the other debasing. (Joseph Smith, The Mormon Prophet, 1966, p. 148)

Although John J. Stewart claims that there is a difference between Joseph Smith’s plural wife doctrine and the promiscuity practiced at Nauvoo, many people—including some members of the Mormon Church—cannot make this distinction. John J. Stewart has to admit that some members of the church believe that Brigham Young and Joseph Smith were guilty of sexual transgression:

. . . Satan, . . . is wrecking havoc among us in the sacred matter of marriage and morals, exploiting the LDS doctrine and history of plural marriage to deceive in two ways:

First, by persuading many members of the Church to rationalize themselves into committing acts of sexual sin, by whispering in their ear that Joseph Smith, Brigham Young and other associates were guilty of sexual transgression . . . In recent years there have been several novels and at least three pseudo-scholarly books by prominent LDS apostates depicting plural marriage as adultery and the Prophet Joseph as the most debauched of libertines. . . .

There is no question but what these gross falsehoods, given the respectability of print, have taken their toll, having an adverse effect upon the morals of some Church members, and sowing doubts among many others. (Brigham Young and His Wives, pp. 12-13)

Some people may wonder how Joseph Smith could convince his people that polygamy was a revelation from God. The answer is that the Mormon people were taught to follow their leaders in all things. Joseph Smith not only claimed to receive the 132nd section of the Doctrine and Covenants by direct revelation of God, but he also claimed that he received other personal revelations concerning the matter. For instance, according to Mercy R. Thompson, Joseph Smith claimed to have a revelation that she should be the plural wife of his brother Hyrum:

“My beloved husband, R. B. Thompson . . . died August 27th, 1841, . . . Nearly two years after his death your father told me that my husband had appeared to him several times, telling him that he did not wish me to live such a lonely life, and wished him to request your uncle Hyrum to have me sealed to him for time.” (Historical Record, p. 229)

While Joseph Smith used revelation as a tool to convince women to enter polygamy, the fact that he was very appealing to women must have helped him establish the doctrine. The reader will remember that Mrs. Lightner said that she “had been dreaming for a number of years

I was his wife.” Speaking of the time when she first met Joseph Smith, Mrs. Lightner stated:

“When I entered the room, . . . he looked at me so earnestly I felt afraid and thought, ‘He can read my every thought, and I thought how blue his eyes were.’ After a moment he came and put his hands on my head and gave me a great blessing.” (Autobiography of Mary E. Rollins Lightner, as quoted in No Man Knows My History, p. 443)

George A. Smith, a member of the First Presidency of the Church, related the following:

. . . General Lucas hesitated to execute the sentence of his court-martial, and he delivered Joseph Smith and his associates into the charge of General Moses Wilson, . . . I heard General Wilson, some years after, . . . telling some gentlemen about having Joseph Smith a prisoner in chains in his possession, and said he— “He was a very remarkable man. I carried him into my house, a prisoner in chains and in less than two hours my wife loved him better than she did me.” (Journal of Discourses, vol. 17, p. 92)

As we consider the reasons that women entered into polygamy we should not forget that the Mormon leaders taught that a woman was inferior and that her salvation depended on a man. Brigham Young once stated: “The man is the head and God of the woman, but let him act like a God in virtuous principles . . .” (Sermon of Brigham Young, as quoted in the Journals of John D. Lee, 1846-47 and 1859, edited by Charles Kelly, 1938, p. 81). On page 114 of the same journal John D. Lee related:

Just in time I received a letter from Nancy the 1st stating that she had not forgotten that in the moment of passion that I was the man to whom she was to look for salvation spiritually or temporally . . . I read the letter to Pres. B. Young. His counsel was to tell her that inasmuch as she claimed salvation at my hands that she must come to me and place herself under my guidance and control and protection and respect the priesthood and my standing as a savior but on no other consideration whatever.

Kimball Young gives this information:

And Daisy Barclay, herself brought up in a plural family, remarks: “Polygamy is predicated on the assumption that a man is superior to a woman . . . Mormon tradition follows that of the early Hebrews. It teaches woman to honor and obey her husband and look upon him as her Lord and Master.” As a daughter of the second wife of Isaac Lambert once complained, “Mother figures you are supposed to spend your life taking care of a man, and he is God.” (Isn’t One Wife Enough? p. 280)

It was no doubt easier to talk the men into believing in plural marriage than it was the women. John D. Lee, for example, made this statement:

I was greatly interested in the doctrine. It accorded exactly with my views of the Scripture, and I at once accepted and believed in the doctrine . . . In less than one year after I first learned the will of God concerning the marriage of the Saints, as made known by Him in a revelation to Joseph Smith, I was the husband of nine wives. . . . In 1858, Brigham Young gave me my seventeenth wife, . . . Brigham Young said that Isaac C. Haight, . . . and I, needed some young women to renew our vitality, so he gave us both a dashing young bride. . . .

After 1861 I never asked Brigham Young for another wife. By my eighteen real wives I have been the father of sixty-four children. (Confessions of John D. Lee, pp. 288-289)

Joseph Smith evidently found that William Clayton had met a woman in England to whom he “was very much attached,” and used this to help convince Clayton that he should live in plural marriage. In an affidavit given February 16, 1874, William Clayton stated:

. . . the Prophet Joseph . . . became well acquainted with my wife Ruth, to whom I had been married five years. One day in the month of February, 1843, . . . the Prophet invited me to walk with him. During our walk, he said he had learned that there was a sister back in England, to whom I was very much attached. I replied there was, but nothing further than an attachment such as a brother and sister in the Church might rightfully entertain for each other. He then said, “Why don’t you send for her?” I replied, “In the first place, I have no authority to send for her, and if I had, I have not the means to pay expenses.” To this he answered, “I give you authority to send for her, and I will furnish you with means,” which he did. This was the first time the Prophet Joseph talked with me on the subject of plural marriage. He informed me that the doctrine and principle was right in the sight of our Heavenly Father, and that it was a doctrine which pertained to celestial order and glory. After giving me lengthy instructions and informations concerning the doctrine of celestial or plural marriage, he concluded his remarks by the words, “It is your privilege to have all the wives you want.” (Historical Record, p. 225)

Although William Clayton denied that the “attachment” was in any way improper, we wonder how the rumor came all the way from England if the attachment was just “as a brother and sister in the Church might rightfully entertain”? If Clayton was not in love with the woman why did he accept Joseph Smith’s help in bringing her to America? From this it would appear that Joseph Smith looked for unfaithful tendencies in his followers and used these weaknesses to establish his doctrine.

John C. Bennett

Ann Eliza Young made this statement concerning John C. Bennett:

One of the first persons to be initiated into the plural-wife doctrine, if not indeed Joseph’s confederate in producing it, was Dr. John C. Bennett, at that time Mayor of the city, Major-General of the Nauvoo Legion, and a very great friend of Joseph. It is said that the pupil fairly outran the teacher, and his success as special pleader for the system of Celestial Marriage was so decided that he incurred the displeasure of the Prophet, and they quarrelled violently. He taught the doctrine to some ladies whom Smith had intended to convert himself, and thus coming directly in contact with the Prophet and his schemes, a rupture was caused between the worthy co-workers. (Wife No. 19, 1876, p. 74)

The Mormon writer John J. Stewart claims that Joseph Smith did not teach John C. Bennett the doctrine of plural marriage; however, he states that Bennett was a wicked man and may have joined the church because he had heard rumors concerning plural marriage:

One leader to whom Joseph did not confide the matter was Dr. John C. Bennett, Nauvoo’s mayor, whose moral conduct the Prophet had found questionable. Bennett, he learned, had deserted a wife and family in Indiana. Yet, professing to be Nauvoo’s most eligible bachelor, he was enthusiastically courting the women of Mormonism. Joseph’s admonition to him to refrain from this was ill received, and from that hour Bennett became his secret enemy. Rumors of plural marriage in the Church had persisted almost since its beginning—and may well have been the chief reason for Bennett seeking to affiliate with the Church. It was, of course, impossible to keep the doctrine and practice of it in Nauvoo from becoming known, even though public denials of it were made by the Church leaders— . . . (Joseph Smith, The Mormon Prophet, by John J. Stewart, pp. 147-148)

After John C. Bennett joined the church Joseph Smith gave a revelation commending him for his love and good works. This revelation was given in January, 1841, and is still published in the Doctrine and Covenants:

Again, let my servant John C. Bennett help you in your labor in sending my word to the kings and people of the earth, and stand by you, even you my servant Joseph Smith, in the hour of affliction; and his reward shall not fail if he receive counsel.

And for his love he shall be great, for he shall be mine if he do this, saith the Lord, I have seen the work which he hath done, which I accept if he continue, and will crown him with blessings and great glory. (Doctrine and Covenants 124:16-17)

The fact that this was a false revelation can be shown from a sermon which Brigham Young delivered on January 23, 1847, for Young stated that Bennett never did have any faith: “Geo. J. Adams, John C. Bennett and others never had any faith nor interest only to prostitute every female that they could; men that were ordained unto this condemnation” (Journals of John D. Lee, 1846-47 and 1859, p. 57).

Although Bennett was a “scoundrel,” he soon became one of Joseph Smith’s best friends. Joseph Smith knew that Bennett was a wicked man but he honored him. John C. Bennett was elected Mayor of the city of Nauvoo, and was even made an assistant President of the Mormon Church. The following appeared in the minutes of the General Conference held in April of 1841: “John C. Bennett was presented, with the First Presidency, as Assistant President until President Rigdon’s health should be restored” (History of the Church, by Joseph Smith, vol. 4, p. 431).

The Mormon publication Times and Seasons, vol. 2, page 432, vigorously defended Bennett:

But General Bennett’s character as a gentleman, an officer, a scholar, and physician stands too high to need defending by us, . . . He has, likewise, been favorably known for upwards of eight years by some of the authorities of the Church, . . . But being a Mormon, his virtues are construed into defects, . . .

On June 23, 1842, after John C. Bennett had left the church, Joseph Smith admitted that a letter had been received from a “respectable” person warning that Bennett had left a wife and two or three children and that he was a very mean man:

. . . Dr. John C. Bennett . . . located himself in the city of Nauvoo, about the month of August, 1840, and soon after joined the Church. Soon after it was known that he had become a member of said Church, a communication was received at Nauvoo from a person of respectable character and residing in the vicinity where Bennett had lived. This letter cautioned us against him, setting forth that he was a very mean man, and had a wife and two or three children . . . but knowing that it is no uncommon thing for good men to be evil spoken against, the above letter was kept quiet, but held in reserve. (History of the Church, vol. 5, pp. 35-36)

In a letter dated March 2, 1841, George Miller claimed that John C. Bennett’s “wife left him under satisfactory evidence of his adulterous connections; nor was this his only fault; he used her bad otherwise” (The Wasp, June 25, 1842, p. 3). It must have been very embarrassing for the Mormon leaders to have to publish this information, especially since Joseph Smith had received a revelation, purporting to come from God, stating that John C. Bennett would be “great” because of “his love.”

In a letter to Governor Carlin, Joseph Smith said:

Dear Sir: —It becomes my duty to lay before you some facts relative to the conduct of our major-general, John C. Bennett, . . .

It is evident that his general character is that of an adulterer of the worst kind, . . .

Some time ago it having been reported to me that some of the most aggravated cases of adultery had been committed upon some previously respectable females in our city, . . .

More than twenty months ago Bennett went to a lady in the city and began to teach her that promiscuous intercourse between the sexes was lawful and no harm in it, and requested the privilege of gratifying his passions; . . .

Finding this argument ineffectual, he told her that men in higher standing in the Church than himself not only sanctioned, but practiced the same deeds; and in order to finish the controversy, said and affirmed that I both taught and acted in the same manner, but publicly proclaimed against [it] in consequence of the prejudice of the people, and for fear of trouble in my own house. By this means he accomplished his designs; he seduced a respectable female with lying, and subjected her to public infamy and disgrace.

Not contented with what he had already done, he made the attempt on others, and by using the same language, seduced them also. (History of the Church, vol. 5, p. 42)

It is interesting to note, according to Joseph Smith’s own statement to Governor Carlin, that long after he found out what John C. Bennett was doing he still honored him. In the Conference Minutes for April 6, 1842, we find the following: “President William Law, General Bennett, President pro tem, and President Hyrum Smith all spoke upon the subject of military affairs, showing the necessity of a well organized and efficient force; . . .” (History of the Church, vol. 4, p. 583).

Mormon writers are puzzled as to why Joseph Smith continued to honor Bennett. John J. Stewart states:

. . . Joseph did not attend the first day of the conference. Surprisingly, he had Dr. Bennett serve as president pro tem in his absence—surprising because by this time Nauvoo was teeming with rumors not only of the practice of polygamy but of Bennett’s debauched “spiritual wife” system of promiscuity. . . . And three days later, in a Sabbath sermon in the grove, the Prophet declared, “We have thieves among us, adulterers, liars, hypocrites,” and noted in his journal that he had “pronounced a curse upon all adulterers, and fornicators, and unvirtuous persons, and those who have made use of my name to carry on their iniquitous designs.” It is impossible to believe that he was ignorant of the fact that Dr. Bennett was the chief among such culprits. Yet, knowing it, why he would still honor Bennett as he did at the conference is puzzling. Perhaps it was because at the conference he wished to emphasize—as he did—the importance of further developing the Nauvoo Legion, and Bennett still was second in command of the Legion. Also, Joseph was very charitable, and perhaps he felt that the recognition given to Bennett would help him resolve to repent of his misdeeds. (Joseph Smith, The Mormon Prophet, pp. 164-165)

In a speech delivered May 26, 1842, Joseph Smith stated: “At this time, the truth on the guilty should not be told openly, strange as this may seem, yet this is policy. We must use precaution in bringing sinners to justice, lest in exposing these heinous sins we draw the indignation of a Gentile world upon us . . .” (History of the Church, vol. 5, p. 20).

Speaking of Bennett, the Mormon writer William E. Berrett says: “When his promiscuous sexual practices were discovered he was excommunicated from the Church and deprived of all his civic positions” (The Restored Church, 1956, p. 219). Many Mormons would like to believe that Bennett was promptly excommunicated when Joseph Smith became aware of his transgression, but the evidence plainly shows that this is not true. Even John J. Stewart has to admit that Joseph Smith did not expose Bennett until after he began making trouble for the church:

Naturally of a charitable disposition, and extremely anxious to avoid having Bennett become an open enemy of the Church and tell lies about it as other apostates had, Joseph at the Masonic hearing plead for forgiveness for Bennett, on condition that he mend his ways. A short time later, however, Bennett left Nauvoo and began spreading lies against Joseph and the Mormons, claiming that he had joined them only so that he could expose them.

Bennett, who had been disfellowshipped, was now excommunicated from the Church, officially dropped from all his offices in Nauvoo, expelled from the Masonic Lodge, and late in June the Prophet finally published in the Nauvoo papers a detailed though belated expose of the ex-mayor: . . . (Joseph Smith, The Mormon Prophet, p. 168)

John C. Bennett began his expose of Joseph Smith in a series of letters to the Sangamo Journal. The same year (1842) his book, The History of the Saints, was published. Bennett charged that Joseph Smith was a very immoral man and that he was practicing polygamy and adultery. The Mormon publication Times and Seasons for August 1, 1842, made this statement concerning Bennett:

It may be asked why it was that we would countenance him so long after being apprised of his iniquities, and why he was not dealt with long ago. To this we would answer, that he has been dealt with from time to time; . . . He frequently wept like a child, and begged like a culprit for forgiveness, . . . The church afterwards publicly withdrew their fellowship from him, and his character was published in the 17th number of this paper; since that time he has published that the conduct of the Saints was bad—that Joseph Smith and many others were adulterers, . . . that we believed in and practiced polygamy— . . . As he has made his statements very public, and industriously circulated them through the country, we shall content ourselves with answering his base falsehoods and misrepresentations, without giving publicity to them, as the public are generally acquainted with them already. E.D. (Times and Seasons, vol. 3, p. 869)

The Times and Seasons for December 1, 1842, carried an article from the Baltimore Clipper. This article stated that a Mormon preacher by the name of Winchester absolutely denied John C. Bennett's charges:

He spoke of the various publications of Bennett and others, and of the prejudices which they had necessarily excited—that the Mormons were charged with sanctioning a community of wives and of goods, with polygamy, and various other enormities, not one word of which was true. (Times and Seasons, vol. 4, p. 28)

Although it is probably true that John C. Bennett was a scoundrel and may have exaggerated in his book, time has shown that much of what he revealed was the truth.

Sarah Pratt Affair

In his book, The History of the Saints, John C. Bennett made this statement about Sarah Pratt, the wife of the Apostle Orson Pratt:

Her husband was sent to Europe to convert the heathen, under a solemn promise that his family should be honorably provided for by the Church; but, as Mrs. Pratt was a beautiful and charming woman, Joe's real object was to convert her in another way—from virtue, . . . no sooner had her husband crossed the ocean, than Joe ordered the Bishops to restrict her in her allowance, . . .

Joe Smith told me, confidentially, during the absence of her husband, that he intended to make Mrs. Pratt one of his spiritual wives, . . . for the Lord had given her to him as a special favor for his faithfulness and zeal; and, as I had influence with her, he desired me to assist him in the consummation of his hellish purposes; but I refused compliance, . . . in a few days, . . . we proceeded to the residence of Mrs. Pratt, and found her home, and alone, . . . Joe asked her if she would keep a secret for him; to which she assented. "Do you pledge me your honor," said he, "that you will never tell without my permission?" She replied in the affirmative. He then continued, "Sister Pratt, the Lord has given you to me as one of my spiritual wives. I have the blessings of Jacob granted me, as God granted holy men of old; and as I have long looked upon you with favor, and an earnest desire of connubial bliss, I hope you will not repulse or deny me." She replied, "And is that the great secret that I am not to utter? Am I called upon to break the marriage covenant, and prove recreant to my lawful husband? I never will. . . . I believe in no such revelations, neither will I consent, under any circumstances whatever. I have one good husband, and that is enough for me." He then went off to see Miss Louisa Beeman, . . .

Joe afterwards tried to convince Mrs. Pratt of the propriety of his spiritual wife doctrine, and she at last told him peremptorily, "Joseph, if you ever attempt any thing of the kind with me again, I will make a full disclosure to Mr. Pratt on his return home. Depend upon it, I will certainly do it." Joe replied, "Sister Pratt, I hope you will not expose me, . . . Will you promise me that you will not do it?" . . . "If you should tell," said he, "I will ruin your reputation; remember that;

. . ." Time passed on without further molestation, until one day, after Mr. Pratt's return from Europe, Joe called at her new house, and, looking at Mrs. Pratt, . . . grossly insulted her again, by stealthily approaching and kissing her. This highly offended her, and she told her husband, Colonel Orson Pratt, who was highly incensed, and gave Joe a severe rebuke. . . .

Joe lied to Colonel Pratt afterwards, in the name of the Lord. This shook his faith, and he told the Prophet to his face that he was a liar, . . . (History of the Saints, by John C. Bennett, 1842, pp. 226-232)

The Mormon Apostle Orson Pratt evidently believed that Joseph Smith had tried to seduce his wife. The Mormon writer T. Edgar Lyon gives this information:

At the time Orson Pratt returned to Nauvoo from England in July, 1841, he had not been informed by the Prophet or any other Church official, that plural marriages were being contracted. When he heard the rumors afloat in the city, he was naturally astonished, but when his wife told him that during his absence, Joseph Smith had attempted to seduce her, he was greatly agitated. She said that Bennett had told her to beware of Joseph, as he planned to make her his spiritual wife. . . .

The summer of 1842 was a trying one for the professor of mathematics. With no session of school to occupy his mind, he worried over the moral situation of the Prophet and the Church. Had he really attempted to seduce his wife? Was Bennett telling the truth about Joseph, or had Bennett really deserved to be excommunicated? Or had both Bennett and the Prophet become libertines? If the Prophet was guilty as Bennett claimed, was he still a prophet?

These and many other questions raced through his mind. In this mental and emotional struggle he was trying to harmonize the conception of a Prophet of God, as he had always viewed Joseph, with that of the libertine Bennett had convinced him Joseph really was. In despair, his mind collapsed, and he wandered away from Nauvoo. Even the Prophet realized the seriousness of his mental condition, and fearing suicide, acted accordingly. ("Orson Pratt—Early Mormon Leader," M.A. Thesis by Thomas Edgar Lyon, University of Chicago, 1932, pp. 26, 28 of typed copy)

The following appears in Joseph Smith's History under the date of July 15, 1842:

Friday, 15.—It was reported early in the morning that Elder Orson Pratt was missing. I caused the Temple hands and the principal men of the city to make search for him. After which, a meeting was called at the Grove, and I gave the public a general outline of John C. Bennett's conduct. (History of the Church, vol. 5, pp. 60-61)

Under the date of August 29, 1842, Joseph Smith wrote:

Orson Pratt has attempted to destroy himself, and caused almost all the city to go in search of him. . . . I have the whole plan of the kingdom before me, and no other person has. And as to all that Orson Pratt, Sidney Rigdon, or George W. Robinson can do to prevent me, I can kick them off my heels, as many as you can name; I know what will become of them. . . . to the apostates and enemies, I will give a lashing every opportunity, and I will curse them. (History of the Church, vol. 5, pp. 138-139)

T. Edgar Lyon gives us this information concerning this matter:

Ebenezer Robinson, an associate editor of the Times and Seasons, said Pratt was found five miles below Nauvoo, in a state of frenzy, sitting on the bank of the Mississippi River.

His fellow Apostles then took up his case and endeavored to win back his allegiance to the Prophet. Brigham Young's Journal has this entry, for August 8, 1842:

Assisted by Elders H. C. Kimball and Geo. A. Smith, I spent several days laboring with Elder Orson Pratt, whose mind became so darkened by the influence and statements of his wife, that he came out in rebellion against Joseph, refusing to believe his testimony or obey his counsel.

He said he would believe his wife in preference to the Prophet. Joseph told him if he did believe his wife and followed here her suggestions, he would go to hell.

But Pratt was not convinced, even though the prophet had threatened him with hell and on August 20th, Brigham Young recorded: “. . . Brother Orson Pratt was cut off from the Church.” The notice of his excommunication was not given the usual widespread publicity, however, and he continued to reside in Nauvoo, again occupied with teaching duties. (“Orson Pratt—Early Mormon Leader,” M.A. Thesis by Thomas Edgar Lyon, University of Chicago, p. 29)

In footnote 5 on page 27 of his thesis, T. Edgar Lyon admitted that “Joseph’s conduct throughout this entire case does not appear to be admirable.” In another footnote on page 29, T. Edgar Lyon said: “Smith’s attitude throughout this entire affair is strange and without explanation. He did not appear to desire a reconciliation sufficiently to go to the bottom of the trouble with Pratt.”

A meeting of citizens of Nauvoo was held July 22, 1842. Joseph Smith said that “The object of the meeting was to correct the public mind relative to false reports put in circulation by Bennett and others. . . .” (History of the Church, vol. 5, p. 70). A resolution was passed by the assembly which contained this statement:

Resolved, That having heard that John C. Bennett was circulating many base falsehoods respecting a number of the citizens of Nauvoo, and especially against our worthy and respected Mayor, Joseph Smith, we do hereby manifest to the world, that so far as we are acquainted with Joseph Smith, we know him to be a good, moral, virtuous, peaceable and patriotic man, and a firm supporter of law, justice and equal rights; that he at all times upholds and keeps inviolate the constitution of this state and the United States. (History of the Church, vol. 5, p. 70)

Joseph Smith’s History as it is published today assures us that this resolution was adopted by a unanimous vote: “This resolution was adopted unanimously by the numerous assembly” (History of the Church, vol. 5, p. 70). In doing research on Joseph Smith’s History, however, we found that the word “unanimously” was interpolated by later historians and that it did not appear in Joseph Smith’s History as it was first published in the Millennial Star. In the Millennial Star the statement read: “. . . which resolution was adopted by the numerous assembly” (Millennial Star, vol. 19, p. 615).

Further research in the Mormon newspaper The Wasp has revealed the fact that the Mormon leaders made this change to cover up the fact that Orson Pratt and one or two others voted against the resolution. In the July 23, 1842, issue of The Wasp we read:

Resolved—That, having heard that John C. Bennett was circulating many base falsehoods respecting . . . Joseph Smith, we do hereby manifest to the world that so far as we are acquainted with Joseph Smith we know him to be a good, moral, virtuous, peaceable and patriotic man, . . .

A vote was then called and the resolution adopted by a large concourse of citizens, numbering somewhere about a thousand men. Two or three, voted in the negative.

Elder Orson Pratt then rose and spoke at some length in explanation of his negative vote. (The Wasp, July 23, 1842, p. 3)

Orson Pratt and his wife later returned to the church. According to John J. Stewart, Orson Pratt “became chief spokesman for the Church in defense of the principle of plural marriage” (Joseph Smith, The Mormon Prophet, p. 180). His wife, on the other hand, became a bitter enemy to polygamy. In 1886, more than forty years after the events in Nauvoo, Sarah Pratt still maintained that Joseph Smith had tried to seduce her:

When Bennett came to Nauvoo Joseph brought him to my house, stating that Bennett wanted some sewing done, . . . and Bennett gave me a great deal of work to do. He knew that Joseph had his plans set on me; Joseph made no secret of them before Bennett, and went so far in his impudence as to make propositions to me in the presence of Bennett, his bosom friend. . . .

You should bear in mind that Joseph did not think of a marriage or sealing ceremony for many years. He used to state to his intended victims, as he did to me: “God does not care if we have a good time, if only other people do not know it.” He only introduced a marriage ceremony when he had found out that he could not get certain women without it. I think Louisa Beeman was the first case of this kind. If any woman, like me, opposed his wishes, he used to say: “Be silent, or I shall ruin your character. My character must be sustained in the interest of the church.” (Statement of Sarah Pratt, as quoted in Mormon Portraits, pp. 61-62)

Martha Brotherton

On July 13, 1842, Martha Brotherton sent John C. Bennett a letter in which she stated:

“Dear Sir,—

“I left Warsaw a short time since for this city, and having been called upon by you, . . . to come out and disclose to the world the facts of the case in relation to certain propositions made to me at Nauvoo, by some of the Mormon leaders, I now proceed to respond to the call, . . . I had been at Nauvoo near three weeks, during which time my father’s family received frequent visits from Elders Brigham Young and Heber C. Kimball, two of the Mormon Apostles; when, early one morning, they both came to my brother-in-law’s (John Mellwrick’s) house, at which place I then was on a visit, and particularly requested me to go and spend a few days with them. I told them I could not at that time, . . . they urged me to go the next day, and spend one day with them. The day being fine, I accordingly went. When I arrived at the foot of the hill. Young and Kimball . . . both came to me, . . . Kimball turned to me and said, ‘Martha, I want you to say to my wife, when you go to my house, that you want to buy some things at Joseph’s store, . . . Kimball and I went to the store together. As we were going along, he said, ‘Sister Martha are you willing to do all that the Prophet requires you to do?’ I said I believed I was, thinking of course he would require nothing wrong. . . . He further observed, ‘Martha, you must learn to hold your tongue, and it will be well with you. You will see Joseph, and very likely have some conversation with him, and he will tell you what you shall do.’ When we reached the building, he led me up some stairs to a small room, the door of which was locked, and on it the following inscription: ‘Positively no admittance.’ . . . Young came in, and seated himself before me, and asked where Kimball was. I said he had gone out. He said it was all right. Soon after, Joseph came in, . . . I was introduced to the Prophet by Young. Joseph offered me his seat, and, to my astonishment, the moment I was seated, Joseph and Kimball walked out of the room, and left me with Young, who arose, locked the door, closed the window, and drew the curtain. He then came and sat before me, and said, ‘This is our private room, Martha.’ . . . ‘Well,’ said he, ‘what are your feelings towards me?’ I replied, ‘My feelings are just the same towards you that they ever were, sir.’ ‘But, to come to the point more closely,’ said he, ‘have not you an affection for me, that, were it lawful and right, you could accept of me for your husband and companion?’ My feelings at that moment were indescribable. God only knows them. What, thought I, are these men, that I thought almost perfection itself, deceivers? . . . So I considered it best to ask for time to think and pray about it. I therefore said, ‘If it was lawful and right, perhaps I might; but you know, sir, it is not.’ ‘Well, but,’ said he, ‘brother Joseph has had a revelation from God that it is lawful and right for a man to have two wives; . . . and if you will have me in this world, I will have you in that which is to come, and brother Joseph will marry us here to-day, and you can go home this evening, and your parents will not know any thing about it.’ . . . ‘I want time to think about it,’ said I. ‘Well,’ said he, ‘I will have a kiss, any how,’ and then rose, and said he would bring Joseph. He then unlocked the door, and took the key, and locked me up alone. He was absent about ten minutes, and then returned with Joseph. ‘Well,’ said Young, ‘sister Martha would be willing if she knew it was lawful and right before God.’ ‘Well, Martha,’ said Joseph, ‘it is lawful and right before God—I know it is. . . . I know Brigham will take care of you, and if he don’t do his duty to you, come to me, and I will make him; and if you do not like it in a month or two, come to me, and I will make you free again; and if he turns you off, I will take you on.’ ‘Sir,’ said I, rather warmly, ‘it will be too late to think in a month or two after. I want time to think first.’ ‘Well, but,’ said he, ‘the old proverb is, “Nothing ventured, nothing gained;” . . . “Well, then,” said Joseph, “what are you afraid of, sis? Come, let me do the business for you.” ‘Sir,’ said I, ‘do let me have a little time to think about it, and I will promise not to mention it to any one.’ . . . I then rose to go, when Joseph commenced to beg of me again. He said it was the best opportunity they might have for months, for the room was often engaged. I, however, had determined what to do. ‘Well,’ said Young, ‘I will see you to-morrow. I am going to preach at the school-house, opposite your house. I have never preached there yet; you will be there, I suppose.’ ‘Yes,’ said I.—The next day being Sunday, . . . Young stopped me, saying, ‘Wait, Martha, I am coming.’ I said, ‘I cannot; my sister is waiting for me.’ He then threw his coat over his shoulders, and followed me out, and whispered, ‘Have you made up your mind, Martha?’ ‘Not exactly, sir,’ said I; and we parted. I shall proceed to a justice of the peace, and make oath to the truth of these statements, and you are at liberty to make what use of them you may think best.

“Yours, respectfully,

“Martha H. Brotherton.

(History of the Saints, 1842, pp. 236-240)

Under the date of August 1, 1842, the following statement appeared in the Latter-day Saints’ Millennial Star:

Among the most conspicuous of these apostates, we would notice a young female who . . . conceived the plan of gaining friendship and extraordinary notoriety with the world, . . . She accordingly selected president J. Smith, and elder B. Young for her victims, and wrote to England that these men had been trying to seduce her, by making her believe that God had given a revelation that men might have two wives; . . .

But, for the information of those who may be assailed by those foolish tales about two wives, we would say that no such principle ever existed among the Latter-day Saints, and never will; this is well known to all who are acquainted with our books and actions, . . . (Millennial Star, vol. 3, pp. 73-74)

The Mormon newspaper The Wasp made a vicious attack upon the character of Martha Brotherton:

. . . and John C. Bennett, the pimp and file leader of such mean harlots as Martha H. Brotherton and her predecessors from old Jezebel, whom the dogs eat: may flourish with impunity! (The Wasp, August 27, 1842, p. 2)

Brigham Young made an affidavit in which he absolutely denied Martha Brotherton’s accusations:

I do hereby testify that the affidavit of Miss Martha Brotherton that is going the rounds in the political and religious papers, is a base falsehood, with regard to any private intercourse or unlawful conduct or conversation with me.

BRIGHAM YOUNG

Sworn to and subscribed before me this 27th day of August, A.D., 1842.

E. ROBINSON, J.P.

This affidavit was published in Affidavits and Certificates, Disproving the Statements and Affidavits Contained in John C. Bennet[t]’s Letters, Nauvoo, August 31, 1842. Also contained in this publication is a certificate by William Marks in which he stated:

Inasmuch as John C. Bennett has called upon me . . . to come out and confirm the statements which he has made concerning Joseph Smith and others, I take this opportunity of saying to the public, that I know many of his statements to be false. . . . I know of no order in the Church which admits of a plurality of wives, and do not believe that Joseph Smith ever taught such a doctrine, . . .

Time, of course, has shown that plural marriage was being taught, and although Brigham Young called Martha Brotherton’s affidavit a “base falsehood,” Stanley S. Ivins’ research in the “Endowment House Records” for August 16, 1869, to September 30, 1870, seems to show that there may have been a great deal of truth in her story. Brigham Young must have been in love with Martha Brotherton, for after her death he had her sealed to him for eternity. This “proxy” marriage took place on August 1, 1870. If the story that Martha Brotherton told was a “base falsehood” and if she was one of Bennett’s “mean harlots,” why did Brigham Young seal her to himself after her death?

Nancy Rigdon

In his book History of the Saints, John C. Bennett relates the following:

Miss Rigdon is the eldest unmarried daughter of Sidney Rigdon, Esq., and is a beautiful girl, . . . Knowing that I had much influence with Mr. Rigdon’s family, Joe Smith said to me, one day last summer, when riding together over the lawn, in Nauvoo, “If you will assist me in procuring Nancy as one of my spiritual wives, I will give you five hundred dollars, or the best lot on Main street.” I replied, “I cannot agree to it. . . .” “But,” said Joe, “the Lord has given her to me to wife. . . . and there is no wickedness in it. It would be wicked to approach her, unless I had permission of the Lord; but, as it is, it is as correct as to have a legal wife, in a moral point of view.” . . . at the funeral of Mr. Ephraim R. Marks, Mrs. Hyde told Miss Rigdon that Joseph desired to see her at the printing office, where Mrs. Hyde and Dr. Richards resided, on special business. She said she would go, and accordingly did; but Joe was busily engaged at his store. . . . I then went to Colonel Higbee, and told him Joe’s designs, and requested him to go immediately and see Miss Rigdon, and tell her the infernal plot—that Joe would approach her in the name of the Lord, by special revelation, &c., and to put her on her guard, but advise her to go and see for herself what Joe would do. He did so, and she went down. Joe was there, took her into a private room, (his favorite assignation room,) and locked the door, . . .

Joe then swore her to secrecy, and told her that she had long been the idol of his affections, and that he had asked the Lord for her, and that it was his holy will that he should have her . . . that he had the blessings of Jacob granted to him—and that all was lawful and right before God. He then attempted to kiss her, and desired her to kiss him. . . . She told him she would alarm the neighbors if he did not open the door and let her out immediately. He did so; and, as she was much agitated, he requested Mrs. Hyde to explain matters to her; and, after agreeing to write her a doctrinal letter, left the house. Mrs. Hyde told her that these things looked strange to her at first, but that she would become more reconciled on mature reflection. Miss Rigdon replied, “I never shall,” left the house, and returned home. In a day or two, Dr. Richards, who is so notorious for Hyde-ing in these last days, handed her the following letter from the Prophet Joe, (written by Richards, by Joe’s dictation,) and requested her to burn it after reading, to wit: —

Happiness is the object and design of our existence, . . . That which is wrong under one circumstance, may be, and often is, right under another. God said, Thou shalt not kill; at another time he said, Thou shalt utterly destroy. . . . Whatever God requires is right, no matter what it is, . . . If we seek first the kingdom of God, all good things will be added. So with Solomon; first he asked wisdom, and God gave it him, and with it every desire of his heart; even things which might be considered abominable to all who understand the order of Heaven only in part, but which, in reality, were right. . . .

Our Heavenly Father is more liberal in his views, and boundless in his mercies and blessings, than we are ready to believe or receive, . . . he says, Ask and ye shall receive, . . . no good thing will I withhold from them who walk uprightly before me, and do my will in all things; who will listen to my voice and to the voice of my servant whom I have sent; for I delight in those who seek diligently to know my precepts, and abide by the laws of my kingdom; for all things shall be made known unto them in mine own due time, and in the end they shall have joy.

The original, of which the above is a literal copy, in the handwriting of Dr. Richards, is now in my possession. . . .

. . . On Tuesday, the 28th day of June last, Joe went to Mr. Rigdon's accompanied by his High Priest, George Miller, . . . for a witness for him that he had successfully confronted Miss Rigdon, and, by boisterous words and violent gestures, tried to deny the attempted seduction and alarm the girl; but, with daring bravery, she met the Monster of Iniquity, and told him he was a "cursed liar;" that all that she said of him was true to the letter, and dared him to face her to the contrary. Joe then made a full acknowledgment of the whole affair, in the presence of the family, and several other persons who were present. . . . George Miller, then groaned in the spirit, and cried aloud, "You must not harm the Lord's Anointed; the Lord will not suffer his Anointed to fall!!!" (History of the Saints, 1842, pp. 241-245)

The Mormon Apostle Orson Hyde admitted that his wife had invited Nancy Rigdon to visit Joseph Smith, but he stated that Miss Rigdon was a wicked woman and that Joseph Smith desired the meeting to "reprove and reclaim her if possible":

Will the best and most blessed people on the earth have spiritual wives, and tolerate adultery? . . .

During my absence to Palestine, the conduct of his daughter, Nancy, became notorious in this city, according to common rumour, she was regarded generally, little, if any better, than a public prostitute. Joseph Smith knowing the conduct she was guilty of, felt anxious to reprove and reclaim her if possible. He, accordingly, requested my wife to invite her down to her house. He wished to speak with her, and show her the impropriety of being gallanted about by so many different men, many of whom were comparatively strangers to her. Her own parents could look upon it, and think that all was right; being blind to the faults of their daughter. There being so many of this kind of men visiting Mr. Rigdon's house . . . that Mr. Smith did not care to go there to see her. Miss Nancy, I presume, considered her dignity highly insulted at the plain and sharp reproofs she received from this servant of God. She ran home and told her father that Mr. Smith wanted her for a spiritual wife, and that he employed my wife to assist him in obtaining her. This was a good time for Miss Nancy and John C. Bennett to wreak vengeance on the victim of their hatred for his severe admonitions. . . . Miss Nancy is made, therefore, to attribute to Joseph Smith and to my wife, language which neither of them ever used. Thus must an innocent and unsuspecting female suffer for putting down a hand to help, as it is verily believed, a poor miserable girl out of the very slough of prostitution. . . .

Can Mr. Rigdon believe that Joseph Smith ever tried to seduce his daughter? Can he believe that he ever tried to get her for a spiritual wife? . . . if Mr. Smith had tried to get Miss Nancy for a carnal wife, he might, probably, have been successful. I do not, however, think Mr. Rigdon believes any such thing of Joseph Smith. But because he was rejected as the leader of this people, he now seeks to destroy us by the most cruel slanders—the most wicked misrepresentations and the foulest calumnies that ever proceeded from disappointed ambition. (Speech of Elder Orson Hyde, Delivered Before The High Priest's Quorum, In Nauvoo, April 27th, 1845, Liverpool, 1845, pp. 27-29)

In a letter to James Arlington Bennett (not to be confused with John C. Bennett), George W. Robinson made this statement:

Smith and Bennett have always been on very friendly terms, and were together a great deal, and I have no doubt but that Bennett was Smith's confidant in nearly all things. It appears from General Bennett's story, that . . . Smith sent for Miss Rigdon . . . took her into another room, and locked the door, . . . She repulsed him, and was about to raise the neighbors if he did not unlock the door . . . she left . . . came home and told her father of the transaction; upon which Smith was sent for. He came. She told the tale in the presence of all the family, and to Smith's face. I was present. Smith attempted to deny it at first, and face her down with the lie; but she told the facts with so much earnestness, and the fact of a letter being present, which he had caused to be written to her, on the same subject, the day after the attempt made on her virtue, breathing the same spirit, and which he had fondly hoped was destroyed,—all came with such force that he could not withstand the testimony; and he then and there acknowledged that every word of Miss Rigdon's testimony was true. Now for his excuse, which he made for such a base attempt, and for using the name of the Lord in vain, on that occasion. He wished to ascertain whether she was virtuous or not, and took that course to learn the facts!!! I would say, sir, that I have reason to believe General Bennett's story in his disclosures of Smith's rasclity; although I am not a witness to all of the facts, yet I am to some. (History of the Saints, 1842, pp. 245-246)

In a footnote to an article published in Dialogue, we find the following:

One interesting event mentioned in the "Life Story" but not included here is the occasion when Joseph Smith proposed "spiritual marriage" to Rigdon's daughter Nancy in 1843, "promising her great exaltation in the world to come," the brother reports. She "resented" the proposal and "utterly refused" him. Sidney Rigdon was "very indignant at Joseph Smith to think he should make such a proposal . . ." This was the first the Rigdon family had heard of the doctrine of plural marriage. The son reports that Joseph Smith denied having proposed to the daughter, but Rigdon claims that he later got him to confess that it was true. (Dialogue: A Journal of Mormon Thought, Winter 1966, p. 39, n. 57)

In an affidavit by John W. Rigdon, the brother of Nancy Rigdon, we find the following:

And deponent further says: Joseph the Prophet, at the City of Nauvoo . . . made a proposition to my sister, Nancy Rigdon, to become his wife. . . . Nancy flatly refused him, . . . The story got out and it became the talk of the town that Joseph had made a proposition to Nancy Rigdon to become his wife, and that she refused him. A few days after the occurrence Joseph Smith came to my father's house and talked the matter over with the family. . . . The feelings manifested by our family on this occasion were anything but brotherly or sisterly, more especially on the part of Nancy, as she felt that she had been insulted. A day or two later Joseph Smith returned to my father's house, when matters were satisfactorily adjusted between them, and there the matter ended. (Affidavit by John W. Rigdon, July 28, 1905, as quoted in Blood Atonement and the Origin of Plural Marriage, by Joseph Fielding Smith, pp. 83-84)

In rebuttal to John C. Bennett's charges concerning Joseph Smith's conduct toward Miss Rigdon the Mormons claimed that the letter that Smith was supposed to have written to her was a fake. In The Wasp for August 27, 1842, we read the following:

BENNETT'S LETTERS. — We have read the fifth and sixth letters of Dr. Bennett, . . . The sixth letter is what purports to be a copy of a letter from Joseph Smith to Miss Nancy Rigdon, without date, name or proof, . . . we hope the community are not yet quite so far from a common course of Justice and propriety as to take Bennett's word for the truth or fallacy of the curious thing. Joseph Smith is not the author. — The fact is, candid people begin to see what Bennett's stuff, with his help meets of harlots' affidavits, . . . amounts to!

In a letter to the editor of The Wasp, Sidney Rigdon said: “I would further state that Mr. Smith denied to me the authorship of that letter” (The Wasp, September 3, 1842).

Strange as it may seem, definite proof that Joseph Smith was the author of the letter is now found in the History of the Church. The Mormon leaders who finished publishing Joseph Smith’s History after his death apparently found a copy of the letter among Smith’s private papers and included it in the History of the Church. Since the letter does not seem to have any date or name on it, the Mormon historians evidently did not realize its implications. It is now found in the History of the Church, vol. 5, pages 134-136. Below is a comparison of a small portion of the letter as published by John C. Bennett and as printed in the History of the Church.

Bennett’s Book

Happiness is the object and design of our existence; and will be the end thereof, if we pursue the path that leads to it; That which is wrong; under one circumstance, may be, and often is right under another Whatever God requires is right, no matter what it is, . . . even things which might be considered abominable to all who understand the order of Heaven only in part, . . . (History of the Saints, by John C. Bennett, pp. 243-244)

History of the Church

Happiness is the object and design of our existence, and will be the end thereof, if we pursue the path that leads to it That which is wrong under one circumstance, may be, and often is, right under another Whatever God requires is right, no matter what it is, . . . even things which might be considered abominable to all who understand the order of heaven only in part, . . . (History of the Church, vol. 5, pp. 134-135)

We could publish the entire letter in parallel columns, but this should be sufficient to convince the reader that John C. Bennett’s reprint is completely accurate. Although Joseph Smith denied the authorship of the letter, the History of the Church, completed after his death, proves beyond all doubt that he was the author. The fact that Smith did write the letter goes a long way toward confirming Bennett’s story about the Nancy Rigdon affair. Apparently the Mormon historian B. H. Roberts was not aware of the implications of this document when he edited the History of the Church. In a footnote concerning this document he said:

It is not positively known what occasioned the writing of this essay; but when it is borne in mind that at this time the new law of marriage for the Church—marriage for eternity, including plur[al]ity of wives under some circumstances—was being introduced by the Prophet, it is very likely that the article was written with a view of applying the principles here expounded to the conditions created by introducing said marriage system. (History of the Church, vol. 5, p. 134)

It is interesting to note that the Mormon writer John J. Stewart now admits that Joseph Smith did make a proposal to Nancy Rigdon, and that he did write the letter concerning happiness:

At about the time that the Bennett scandal broke, Joseph invited Nancy Rigdon, Sidney Rigdon’s nineteen-year-old daughter, to become his wife in patriarchal marriage. But Nancy, who had come under the influence of Dr. Bennett, rejected the Prophet’s proposal and reported it to her father. Rigdon, still not converted to the doctrine of plural marriage, was infuriated, and Joseph had a difficult time placating him. . . . neither he nor Joseph any longer had much confidence in the other. Rigdon felt that Joseph had fallen under Bennett’s vile influence, . . .

In a friendly note of explanation to Nancy, the Prophet argued that, “Happiness is the object and design of our existence; . . . That which is wrong under one circumstance, may be, and often is, right under another . . . Everything that God gives us is lawful and right. . . .” (Joseph Smith, The Mormon Prophet, pp. 170-171)

The reader will remember that Nancy Rigdon claimed that

Joseph Smith locked her in a room, and that Martha Brotherton made a similar charge against the Mormon leaders. Dr. W. Wyl gives this information:

Said a perfectly reliable witness, a lady, to me: “A Mrs. Ann Dawson went to Nauvoo . . . one of her daughters, Mary, got an invitation for ‘a special meeting.’ They brought her to that little sealing office; Joseph was there and told her that it was the Lord’s will concerning her that she should be sealed to Brother John Taylor without delay as his celestial wife; she refused. They (Joseph and Taylor) bolted the door, and wanted to force things, but she managed to get away from them. This event caused the whole Dawson family to apostatize and to leave Nauvoo.” (Mormon Portraits, 1886, p. 256)

Even before Martha Brotherton wrote her letter to Bennett, there was a rumor circulating that a woman had been locked in a room for the purpose of convincing her that polygamy was a correct doctrine. The Conference Minutes for April 7, 1842, contain the following:

President Hyrum Smith . . . spoke in contradiction of a report in circulation about Elders Heber C. Kimball, Brigham Young, himself, and others of the Twelve, alleging that a sister had been shut in a room for several days, and that they had endeavored to induce her to believe in having two wives. (History of the Church, vol. 4, p. 585)

That Joseph Smith had a habit of locking the door when he spoke of polygamy is verified in an affidavit by Joseph A. Kelting:

I heard rumors to the effect that Joseph Smith was practising polygamy; . . . the Prophet invited me into a room upstairs in his house called the Mansion. After we entered the room he locked the door, and then asked me if I had heard the rumors connecting him with polygamy. I told him I had. He then began a defense of the doctrine by referring to the Old Testament. . . . He expressed some doubts as to how I might receive it, and wanted to know what stand I would take if I should not believe what he had to say about it. I then pledged him my word that whether I believed his revelation or not I would not betray him. . . . He acknowledged to having married several wives. I told him that was all right. He said he would like a further pledge from me that I would not betray him. I asked him if he wanted me to accept the principle by marrying a plural wife. He answered yes. A short time after this I married two wives in that order of marriage. (Affidavit of Joseph A. Kelting, March 1, 1894, as printed in The Juvenile Instructor, Salt Lake City, May 1, 1894, pp. 289-290)

Strange Marriages

On July 25, 1857, the following appeared in an article in the Latter-day Saints’ Millennial Star:

Among ancient Israel, marriage was forbidden within certain degrees of consanguinity. . . .

The Polygamist was not only laid under the same restraints as the Monogamist, but placed under additional restraints in regard to the persons whom he should select as additional wives. He was not permitted by the law of Moses to marry the sister of his wife. (See Leviticus xviii. 18.) Neither was he permitted to marry a mother and daughter. “And if a man take a wife and her mother, it is wickedness; they shall be burnt with fire both he and they; that there be no wickedness among you.” (See Leviticus xx. 14.) . . . the Polygamist Israelite was under a law restricting him within certain limits. Though he had a right to marry many wives, yet he had no right to marry a mother and daughter or two sisters. (Millennial Star, vol. 19, pp. 473-474)

In the year 1870 the Mormon Apostle Orson Pratt debated in the Mormon Tabernacle with Dr. John F. Newman concerning whether the Bible sanctions polygamy. Thomas Edgar Lyon made this comment concerning the debate:

During the three days Orson Pratt related numerous instances of plural marriage among ancient Israel, and argued that God sanctioned it, . . . Dr. Newman built his case entirely upon the marginal translation of Leviticus 18:18, in the King James version: “Neither shalt thou take one wife to another . . . beside the other in her life time.” This he held was an absolute prohibition of any type of plural marriage. Orson Pratt then reverted to the Hebrew text to prove that the marginal translation was incorrect and that the regular translations “Neither shalt thou take a wife to her sister . . .”—merely a prohibition against marrying sisters—was the literal and accurate rendering of the text. . . . With the collapse of Dr. Newman’s marginal rendering his case failed completely. (“Orson Pratt—Early Mormon Leader” p. 104)

Even though Orson Pratt may have won this point, he proved that the Mormon practice of polygamy was not even based upon the Old Testament, for Pratt himself was guilty of marrying two sisters. The Mormon writer T. Edgar Lyon admits that Orson Pratt was inconsistent:

This controversy also illustrates one of the inconsistencies of the Mormon contention that their polygamy was biblical. They did not abide by the rules of plural marriage as set forth in the Bible. Pratt himself married two sisters. Others had done the same thing and even married mothers and daughters. (Ibid., p. 104)

Although the early Mormon leaders wanted to return to the Old Testament practice of putting adulterers to death, they did not want to accept Leviticus 20:14, which said that when a man married “a wife and her mother” they should be put to death. If they had accepted this, Joseph Smith would have been one of the first to die, for he had married a woman and her mother. Fawn Brodie stated:

The prophet married five pairs of sisters: Delcena and Almera Johnson, Eliza and Emily Partridge, Sarah and Maria Lawrence, Mary Ann and Olive Grey Frost, and Prescinda and Zina Huntington. Patty and Sylvia Sessions were mother and daughter. (No Man Knows My History, p. 336)

The fact that Patty and Sylvia Sessions were mother and daughter is verified by the Mormon writer Claire Noall:

Sylvia Lyon, Patty’s daughter and the wife of Windsor J. Lyon, was already sealed to Joseph. This afternoon she was to put her mother’s had in the Prophet’s. (Intimate Disciple, p. 317)

The sociologist Kimball Young stated:

Of our family records, 19 per cent of them report that the men married sisters. . . . Of these 30 cases all but one marriage were to full sisters; in this one it was to a half-sister. In one family a man married four sisters; in another he took twins as numbers one and two and a half-sister as wife number three. In still another a man married two sisters and their widowed mother! (Isn’t One Wife Enough? 1954, p. 111)

Joseph Carey wanted to marry a certain widow, but she only consented if he would agree to also marry her two daughters when they grew up. They were then in their early teens. A few years after he wed the widow, she accompanied him to the temple where he married his two stepdaughters on the same day. (Ibid., p. 142)

Fanny Stenhouse wrote the following:

It would be quite impossible, with any regard to propriety, to relate all the horrible results of this disgraceful system. . . . Marriages have been contracted between the nearest of relatives; and old men tottering on the brink of the grave have been united to little girls scarcely in their teens; while unnatural alliances of every description, which in any other community would be regarded with disgust and abhorrence, are here entered into in the name of God, . . .

It is quite a common thing in Utah for a man to marry two and even three sisters. . . . I know also another man who married a widow with several children; and when one of the girls had grown into her teens he insisted on marrying her also, having first by some means won her affections. The mother, however, was much opposed to this marriage, and finally gave up her husband entirely to her daughter; and to this very day the daughter bears children to her step-father, living as wife in the same house with her mother! (Tell it All, by Mrs. T.B.H. Stenhouse, 1874, pp. 468-469)

Stanley P. Hirshon states:

Some Utah matches were even more startling. A man named Winchester married his mother, and Young himself sealed a mother and daughter to their cousin, Luman A. Shurtliff. . . . He also sealed an elderly man to a fifty-seven-year-old woman and her fourteen-year-old granddaughter. (The Lion of the Lord, p. 126)

The anti-Mormon writer Joseph H. Jackson charged that Joseph Smith “feigned a revelation to have Mrs. Milliken, his own sister, married to him spiritually” (The Adventures and Experience of Joseph H. Jackson: . . ., 1846, p. 29). While this statement seems almost beyond belief, there is evidence that John Taylor, who became the third President of the Church, promised his own sister that she could be sealed to him in the event that she could not be reconciled to continue with any of her husbands. L. John Nuttall, a very prominent Mormon, recorded the following:

Monday Feb 25/89.

. . . Agnes Schwartz & her daughter Mary called this morning to see Prest. Woodruff, on her family matters. which he promised to write to her about. She said that her brother John the late President John Taylor had told her some 30 years ago that if She could not be reconciled to continue with any of her husbands she might be sealed to his brother William or himself and she now wanted to be sealed to him. This is a very curious proceeding & which I dont understand. (Journal of L. John Nuttall, vol. 2, pp. 362-363 of typed copy at the Brigham Young University Library)

L. John Nuttall does not relate what happened, but if the sealing actually took place, John Taylor, according to Mormon doctrine, could find himself married to his own sister in the resurrection.

Polygamy and Courtship

Kimball Young stated:

. . . married men in Mormondom were free to court any likely candidates among the fair and the young. As a four-time married man put it, “It was common enough for married men to spark around among the girls.” . . . Brother George MacKay was one of the more eager type. All his life, so a daughter of his sixth wife reports, he kept his eye open for prospective wives. He had seven. He usually got the consent of all his other wives before he took a new one, however. His chief technique was to get up large sleighride parties of young girls. Afterwards he would take the girls home for supper, for his wives to observe. . . .

Like Mackay, Elder Hyrum Stratton went through life with an eye out for a prospective mate. . . . His eldest daughter said that “Father was always acting silly around young girls” often to the embarrassment of his wives and children. (Isn’t One Wife Enough? by Kimball Young, pp. 129-130)

Often enough the courtship was not so well accepted by the first wife. Making advances to a domestic, for example, right under the nose of the first wife might and often did produce strong negative attitudes. In the Roger Knight family the first wife was none too pleased when her husband, under the impress of preaching, began paying attention to the hired girl in the home. . . . he would bring the girl into their home nights and make love to her while his wife looked on. “I felt so ungainly and awkward at the time that it was more than I could endure to see the attractive young girl sitting on my husband’s lap, being kissed and fondled by him.” She hated the girl before she came into the home as a wife and the years did not much improve her first reactions. (Ibid., pp. 132-133)

Sometimes the Mormon men would bring their prospective brides home to live with their families to see if they were compatible. Juanita Brooks states:

Lucretia Fisher lived in the home two months before she was married to Stout. This plan was sometimes followed to see if the two wives would be compatible, and also to determine whether or not the second was attracted to the husband sufficiently to become his wife. (On The Mormon Frontier—The Diary of Hosea Stout, edited by Juanita Brooks, vol. 1, p. 21)

Only 2%?

The Mormon Apostle John A. Widtsoe made this statement:

The practice of plural marriage . . . came to the Church by revelation and commandment from the Lord to Joseph Smith . . . He himself practised it as the wives who survived him have testified, . . . Yet only about two or three per cent of the male population ever practised it. (Joseph Smith—Seeker After Truth, 1951 ed., p. 233)

Lately this 2% figure has been criticized by both Mormon and non-Mormon writers. T. Edgar Lyon, a Mormon writer, criticized the book Mormonism, Americanism, and Politics for using, as he put it, the “worn-out theory” that but two percent of the men practiced plural marriage. Mr. Lyon stated:

Concerning the extent of the practice of plural marriage among the Mormons, this book repeats the worn-out theory that but two per cent of the men practiced this form of marriage. Research in recent years gives evidence that this is false. It was probably about six or eight times that figure. (The Utah Alumnus, book review by T. Edgar Lyon, Feb. 1962, p. 8)

In the July-August, 1962, issue of the Utah Alumnus, Mr. Lyon stated:

The extent to which plural marriage was practiced among the Mormons causes Mr. Vetterli again to betray both lack of correct information and failure to have done his elementary research. Sen. Wallace F. Bennett, in his Why I am a Mormon (p. 70), states the figure as being 8 to 10%, not the oft-quoted 2%. This figure was arrived at by Sen. Bennett after a bit of research in the U.S. Bureau of the Census. (Utah Alumnus, July-August 1962, p. 14)

Stanley S. Ivins made the following statement in the Western Humanities Review:

Curious visitors to Utah in the days when polygamy was flourishing were usually told that about one-tenth of the people actually practiced it. . . .

Of more than 6,000 Mormon families, sketches of which are found in a huge volume published in 1913, between fifteen and twenty per cent appear to have been polygamous. And a history of Sanpete and Emery counties contains biographical sketches of 722 men, of whom 12.6 per cent married more than one woman.

From information obtainable from all available sources, it appears that there may have been a time when fifteen, or possibly twenty, per cent of the Mormon families of Utah were polygamous. (Western Humanities Review, “Notes on Mormon Polygamy,” by Stanley S. Ivins, vol. 10, p. 230)

One-Wife System Condemned

At the time the Mormon Church was practicing polygamy the leaders of the church became very bitter against the one-wife system. Heber C. Kimball, the First Counselor to Brigham Young, was reported by the Deseret News as saying:

I have noticed that a man who has but one wife, and is inclined to that doctrine, soon begins to wither and dry up, while a man who goes into plurality looks fresh, young and sprightly. Why is this? Because God loves that man, and because he honors his word. Some of you may not believe this, but I not only believe it but I also know it. For a man of God to be confined to one woman is small business, . . . I do not know what we should do if we had only one wife apiece. (Deseret News, April 22, 1857)

In a sermon reported in the Deseret News, Brigham Young stated:

Monogamy, or restrictions by law to one wife, is no part of the economy of heaven among men. Such a system was commenced by the founders of the Roman empire. . . . Rome became the mistress of the world, and introduced this order of monogamy wherever her sway was acknowledged. Thus this monogamic order of marriage, so esteemed by modern Christians as a holy sacrament and divine institution, is nothing but a system established by a set of robbers. . . . Why do we believe in and practice polygamy? Because the Lord introduced it to his servants in a revelation given to Joseph Smith, and the Lord’s servants have always practised it. “And is that religion popular in heaven?” It is the only popular religion there, . . . (The Deseret News, August 6, 1862)

George A. Smith stated:

We breathe the free air, we have the best looking men and handsomest women, and if they envy us our position, well they may, for they are a poor, narrow minded, pinch-backed race of men, who chain themselves down to the law of monogamy and live all their days under the dominion of one wife. They ought to be ashamed of such conduct, and the still fouler channel which flows from their practices; and it is not to be wondered at that they should envy those who so much better understand the social relations. (Deseret News, April 16, 1856)

Brigham Young stated that the one-wife system was a “source of prostitution and whoredom”:

Since the founding of the Roman empire monogamy has prevailed more extensively than in times previous to that. The founders of that ancient empire were robbers and women stealers, and made laws favoring monogamy in consequence of the scarcity of women among them, and hence this monogamic system which now prevails throughout Christendom, and which had been so fruitful a source of prostitution and whoredom throughout all the Christian monogamic cities of the Old and New World, until rottenness and decay are at the root of their institutions both national and religious. (Journal of Discourses, vol. 11, p. 128)

The following appeared in the Mormon Church paper, the Millennial Star:

. . . The one-wife system not only degenerates the human family, both physically and intellectually, but it is entirely incompatible with philosophical notions of immortality; it is a lure to temptation, and has always proved a curse to a people. (Millennial Star, vol. 15, p. 227)

The Mormon Apostle Orson Pratt stated:

Some of the nations of Europe who believe in the one wife system have actually forbidden a plurality of wives by their laws; and the consequences are that the whole country among them is overrun with the most abomi[na]ble practices? adulteries and unlawful connections prevail through all their villages, towns, cities, and country places to a most fearful extent. (The Seer, p. 12)

What an immense amount of immorality, and consequent suffering would have been prevented, had the State governments not been influenced by the corrupt traditions of Apostate Christianity in prohibiting plurality and denouncing it criminal! . . . Plurality would also diminish greatly the temptations which beset the paths of married men, as well as those who are young; they would no longer be under the temptation to keep a mistress secretly, and to break the marriage covenant, and thus sin against their wives and against God. How many thousands there are who practice this great abomination. And why do they do it? Because they are compelled by our bigoted State laws to confine themselves to one wife. . . . Plurality, therefore, instead of injuring the morals of society, would have an effect directly the reverse; it would greatly purify society from the immoralities which now exist. . . . If plurality should be prohibited on account of jealousies which may arise, monogamy or the one-wife system should be prohibited on account of the still greater jealousies which may arise for fear the husband may keep his secret mistresses, as many thousands do. . . . If the great object be to put a polygamist. And Paul says, "and if ye be Christ's then are ye Abraham's seed, and heirs according to the promise." Did Abraham believe in Presbyterianism? Not much. Did he believe in Quakerism? Not much. Each of the different sects of religion has some truth, and so far as they have the truth so far did Abraham believe. But is the religion of any one of the sects, as a whole, the religion of heaven? It is not. We all desire to join the popular party. Light, truth and intelligence are the side that is popular with the heavens, and the side that will rule, govern, and control the nations. If we join that society, we then all become popular with the popular party. Some people will render themselves ridiculous by conspicuous, on purpose to become popular. Their desire for popularity or notoriety is so great that they will not hesitate to do a mean act to gain it. The great majority want to be on the strongest, wealthiest, and most popular side, and to be connected with that family which is possessed of immense wealth, influence, and power. Many of my brethren of the Elders of Israel rise up here to speak to the people, and they cannot give utterance to their ideas. What is the matter? They are fearful of making a slight mistake in their language, which they think would make them unpopular. I wish they were as I am, in this respect, and did not care what people may think or say, but pour out what the Holy Ghost shall give them to say, regardless of consequences. We all want to be on the side that will produce the most safety, the most joy, and the most sterling happiness. I can say, without fear of successful contradiction, that the man or woman who believes that the religion of Jesus leads into a thorny path, does not understand nor enjoy the true religion of heaven.

We can say to all the world that the persecution which the Latter Day Saints have received, and the misery they may have suffered in consequence thereof, will not begin to compare with the misery and real suffering they are now receiving in the United States in consequence of war. In Missouri our bleeding feet stained the prairies, but now they are shedding each others blood to cudde and bake in the sun or to be licked up by dogs and wild animals, while their flesh is given to the vultures and wolves. We were invited to sign away our property to pay the expenses of our persecutors, and we were permitted, as a body, to take away as much of our moveable property as we could; but now the Secessionists are robbed and pilaged without mercy, their houses are burned over their heads, their barns are destroyed, their food and clothing are taken, and the women and children are left without anything to eat, drink, or wear, while their husbands, fathers, and brothers are either killed or taken prisoners. In the same manner the Secession party fall upon the Federals or Union men and whip them, rob them, and hang them up at their own doors and in the presence of their families. Then comes a third party who are called May-walkers or Jayhawkers, but more properly they are buccaners or land-pirates, and they rob everybody that is left after the Union and Secession parties have done their worst. Have we ever suffered like that? I think not. When they come across a small settlement of Secessionists they plunder and destroy it, and when they come across a hamlet of Unionists they serve it in the same manner. Did the Latter Day Saints journey; doing everything he can to restore the sick to sound health, and giving them all possible comfort and aid. Is there the same care and fellow feeling manifested in the trains of emigrants who are passing over the country in search of gold? Each person is seeking to better his condition, and they have no interest that extends further than self. It is with them as with the man that prayed, "O Lord, bless me, my wife, my son John and his wife, we four, no more: Amen." They are for themselves, and not for the kingdom of God. They know that the world is going to destruction. They see the whole world in confusion—one party seeking to destroy another in the vain hope of building themselves up. The present government of the United States is self-destroying, as they are now proving.

If there is one class of persons on earth who need comfort more than another, it is both the poor and rich who will not serve God. Those who serve him are comforted all the day long; they walk in the light of his salvation, well under the smiles of his countenance, and the works of their hands are abundantly prospered. Still some apostatize from all this light—from this great salvation—to get gold. The reason of this is not because they have to suffer so much for their religion, but because they have not enough good common sense. What is the grace of God? Who can define it? You say it is the favor of God. If you had good common sense, you never would be out of his favor. He is the Father of our spirits—the great ruler of the universe. If we had enough common sense to understand things as they are, we certainly would choose to serve him, and be on the strongest side.

Do we intend to make our final abode in hell, or in heaven? If we mean it to be in heaven, we must become faithful Latter Day Saints; if in hell, we may be anything we please, no matter what. I profess to be a Latter Day Saint. I believe that the Old and New Testaments were given by the inspiration of God, and since such adulterated by uninspired translators, which makes it necessary for one to have the Spirit of revelation from God to read and understand them. I believe the doctrine that the Lord taught to Adam in the garden, and that Adam taught to his children, that Enoch taught to his city three hundred and sixty-five years, preparing a people to go into the presence of God the Father. I believe the doctrine taught by Noah, who was instructed of God to build an ark to save himself and family from destruction in the great flood. I believe the doctrine Abraham taught, that Isaac, Jacob and the patriarchs taught. I believe all the doctrine Moses taught to be the word of the Lord. I believe in the law of carnal commandments as he did; it was for them, and not for us. It was a yoke placed upon their necks because of their disobedience to the higher law of the gospel. Jesus Christ removed that yoke, and told them to follow the law of the gospel. Some Christians throw away all the Old Testament, except some portions of the prophets; but Moses had the gospel; Jethro had the gospel, and the house of Jacob were urged to receive it, but they would not; so the Lord told Moses to give them a law of carnal commandments that would be grievous for them to bear.

The people generally would not have the revelations which the Lord delivered to Joseph Smith, unless he would give them a law

David, and the prophets down to the days of the Apostles.

Monogamy, or restrictions by law to one wife, is no part of the economy of heaven among men. Such a system was commenced by the founders of the Roman empire. That empire was founded on the banks of the Tiber by wandering brigands. When these robbers founded the city of Rome, it was evident to them that their success in attaining a balance of power with their neighbors, depended upon introducing females into their body politic, so they stole them from the Sabines, who were near neighbors. The scarcity of women gave existence to laws restricting one wife to one man. Rome became the mistress of the world, and introduced this order of monogamy wherever her way was acknowledged. Thus this monogamic order of marriage, so esteemed by modern Christians as a holy sacrament and divine institution, is nothing but a system established by a set of robbers.

The Congress of the United States have lately passed a law to punish polygamy in the Territories of the United States and in other places over which they have exclusive jurisdiction. In doing this, they have undertaken to dictate the Almighty in his revelations to his people, and those who handle edged tools, unless they are skillful, are apt to cut their fingers; and those who hand out insult to the great I Am, in the end, are apt to get more than they have spoken for.

Why do we believe in and practise polygamy? Because the Lord introduced it to his servants in a revelation given to Joseph Smith, and the Lord's servants have always practised it. "And is that religion popular in heaven?" It is the only popular religion there, for this is the religion of Abraham, and, unless we do the works of Abraham, we are not Abraham's seed and heirs according to promise. We believe in Jesus Christ the Mediator of the new covenant, who has introduced the gospel for the benefit of the human family, to happy, exalt and glorify them in the presence of the Father, not to make them miserable, not to torture them, nor cause them to walk in the gloomy path of grief all their days. We rejoice in this gospel; it is all glory, hallelujah, peace and comfort. We believe in following the admonitions and instructions of the ancient Prophets and Apostles, and of all good men in this our day.

I do not make these remarks to cast reflections upon any being, but we should strive to know the mind and will of God and to be filled with his Spirit. I wish the Saints to be filled with the Spirit of understanding; and I never want to again hear a Saint say, "O, how we suffer for the religion of Jesus! We suffer more than the wicked," while at the same time, we are better clad, better fed and better looking, and our hearts are filled with joy, while the hearts of the wicked are filled with sorrow and mourning. All the cheerfulness, gladness, comfort, exuberance of spirit, joy, bliss, peace and brightness of expression that can be bestowed upon individuals are possessed and enjoyed by the sanctified in heaven, and if we are prepared by the principles of eternal life, the same halo will shine through our countenances and make our faces bright with glory.

Whatever leads to vanity, lightness, and worldly-mindedness is not the joy of heavenly beings, but the nonsense of the wicked world. There are men in this kingdom who cannot discriminate between that which is of God and who are at so and not so. I doubt upon your exactness, but I am sure which you are.

A photograph of the Deseret News, August 6, 1862. Brigham Young speaks against the one-wife system and declares that polygamy is the only "popular religion" in heaven.

stop by law to the evils arising from jealousies, let laws be enacted, requiring man to have a plurality of wives, or else none at all; prohibit the one wife practice, and you will accomplish much more than you do by prohibiting plurality. (Ibid., pp. 124-125)

At length, through priestcraft and tradition the Church was made to believe that the Monogamy, established by the Roman civil law, was actually a part of Christianity. . . . and relinquished the Polygamic system. The one wife system did not originate in the Christian Church, but was adopted from the practice of the Roman nation by the Romish Priesthood, and by them palmed upon the nations as originating in Christianity. (Ibid., p. 178)

George Q. Cannon stated:

It is a fact worthy of note that the shortest lived nations of which we have record have been monogamic. Rome . . . was a monogamic nation and the numerous evils attending that system early laid the foundation for the ruin which eventually overtook her. (Journal of Discourses, vol. 13, p. 202)

Under the system of Patriarchal Marriage, the offspring besides being equally as bright and brighter intellectually, are much more healthy and strong. . . . But how is it under the monogamic system? Temptations are numerous on every hand and young men fall a prey to vice. (Ibid., pp. 207-208)

Brigham Young made this interesting comment:

Talk about polygamy! There is no true philosopher on the face of the earth but what will admit that such a system, properly carried out according to the order of heaven, is far superior to monogamy for the raising of healthy, robust children! (Journal of Discourses, vol. 13, p. 317)

The Apostle Orson Pratt stated:

This law of monogamy, or the monogamic system, laid the foundation for prostitution and the evils and diseases of the most revolting nature and character under which modern Christendom groans, . . . (Journal of Discourses, vol. 13, p. 195)

Adam a Polygamist

Brigham Young, the second President of the Mormon Church, stated:

Now hear it, O inhabitants of the earth, Jew and Gentile, Saint and Sinner! When our father Adam came into the garden of Eden, he came into it with a celestial body, and brought Eve, one of his wives with him. (Journal of Discourses, vol. 1, p. 50)

Some of the Mormon people believed that the teaching that Adam was a polygamist actually originated with Joseph Smith. In a sermon delivered in the Tabernacle, in 1885, H. W. Naisbitt stated: “. . . it is said that Joseph Smith the Prophet taught that Adam had two wives” (Journal of Discourses, vol. 26, p. 115).

God and Christ Polygamists

Some of the leading authorities of the Mormon Church went so far as to proclaim that both the Father and the Son were polygamists. Jedediah M. Grant, Second Counselor to Brigham Young, said:

Celsus was a heathen philosopher; and what does he say upon the subject of Christ and his Apostles, and their belief? He says, “The grand reason why the Gentiles and philosophers of his school persecuted Jesus Christ, was, because he had so many wives; there were Elizabeth, and Mary, and a host of others that followed him.” After Jesus went from the stage of action, the Apostles followed the example of their master. . . .

The grand reason of the burst of public sentiment in anathemas upon Christ and his disciples, causing his crucifixion, was evidently based on polygamy, . . . a belief in the doctrine of a plurality of wives caused the persecution of Jesus and his followers. We might almost think they were “Mormons.” (Journal of Discourses, vol. 1, pp. 345-346)

The Apostle Orson Hyde made these statements:

It will be borne in mind that once on a time, there was a marriage in Cana of Galilee; . . . no less a person than Jesus Christ was married on that occasion. If he was never married, his intimacy with Mary and Martha, and the other Mary also whom Jesus loved, must have been highly unbecoming and improper to say the least of it.

I will venture to say that if Jesus Christ were now to pass through the most pious countries in Christendom with a train of women, such as used to follow him, . . . he would be mobbed, tarred, and feathered, and rode not on an ass, but on a rail . . .

At this doctrine the long-faced hypocrite and the sanctimonious bigot will probably cry, blasphemy! . . . Object not, therefore, too strongly against the marriage of Christ, . . . (Journal of Discourses, vol. 4, pp. 259-260)

I discover that some of the Eastern papers represent me as a great blasphemer, because I said, in my lecture on Marriage, at our last Conference, that Jesus Christ was married at Cana of Galilee, that Mary, Martha, and others were his wives, and that he begat children.

All that I have to say in reply to that charge is this—they worship a Savior that is too pure and holy to fulfil the commands of his Father. I worship one that is just pure and holy enough “to fulfil all righteousness;” not only the righteous law of baptism, but the still more righteous and important law “to multiply and replenish the earth.” (Ibid., vol. 2, p. 210)

When Mary of old came to the sepulchre . . . she saw two angels in white, “And they say unto her, Woman, why weepest thou? She said unto them, Because they have taken away my Lord,” or husband, “and I know not where they have laid him.” (Journal of Discourses, vol. 2, p. 81)

In 1853 the following appeared in the Millennial Star:

. . . we apprehend that even greater troubles than these may arise before mankind learn all the particulars of Christ’s incarnation—how and by whom he was begotten; the character of the relationships formed by that act; the number of wives and children he had, . . . (Millennial Star, vol. 15, p. 825)

When the “gentiles” stated that polygamy was one of the “relics of barbarism,” Brigham Young replied: “Yes, one of the relics of Adam, of Enoch, of Noah, of Abraham, of Isaac, of Jacob, of Moses, David, Solomon, the Prophets, of Jesus, and his apostles” (Journal of Discourses, vol. 11, p. 328).

On another occasion Brigham Young stated: “The Scripture says that He, the Lord, came walking in the Temple, with his train; I do not now who they were, unless his wives and children; . . .” (Journal of Discourses, vol. 13, p. 309).

The Mormon Apostle Orson Pratt stated:

. . . it will be seen that the Great Messiah who was the founder of the Christian religion, was a polygamist, . . . the Messiah chose . . . by marrying many honorable wives himself, show to all future generations that he approbated the plurality of wives under the Christian dispensation, as well as under the dispensation in which His Polygamist ancestors lived.

We have now clearly shown that God the Father had a plurality of wives, one or more being in eternity, by whom He begat our spirits as well as the spirit of Jesus His first Born, and another being upon the earth by whom He begat the tabernacle of Jesus, as his only begotten in this world. We have also proved most clearly that the Son followed the example of his Father, and became the great Bridegroom to whom kings’ daughters and many honorable wives were to be married

We have also proved that both God the Father and our Lord Jesus Christ inherit their wives in eternity as well as in time; . . . And then it would be so shocking to the modesty of the very pious ladies of Christendom to see Abraham and his wives, Jacob and his wives, Jesus and his honorable wives, all eating occasionally at the same table, and visiting one another, and conversing about their numerous children and their kingdoms. Oh, ye delicate ladies of Christendom how can you endure such a scene as this? . . . If you do not want your morals corrupted, and your delicate ears shocked, and your pious modesty put to the blush by the society of polygamists and their wives, do not venture near the New Earth; for polygamists will be honored there, and will be among the chief rulers in that Kingdom. (The Seer, p. 172)

If none but Gods will be permitted to multiply immortal children, it follows that each God must have one or more wives. (Ibid., p. 158)

It must be remembered, that seventy thousand million, however great the number may appear to us, are but two-thirds of the vast family of spirits who were begotten before the foundation of the world: . . . Add to seventy thousand million, the third part which fell, namely, thirty-five thousand million, and the sum amounts to one hundred and five thousand million which was the approximate number of the sons and daughters of God in Heaven . . .

If we admit that one personage was the father of all this great family, and that they were all born of the same mother, the period of time intervening between the birth of the oldest and the youngest spirit must have been immense. If we suppose, as an average, that only one year intervened between each birth, then it would have required over one hundred thousand million of years for the same mother to have given birth to this vast family . . .

If the father of these spirits, prior to his redemption, had secured to himself, through the everlasting covenant of marriage, many wives, . . . the period required to people a world would be shorter, . . . with a hundred wives, this period would be reduced to only one thousand million of years. . . . While the Patriarch with his hundred wives, would multiply worlds on worlds, . . . the other, who had only secured to himself one wife, would in the same period, just barely have peopled one world. (Ibid., pp. 38-39)

Fanny Stenhouse told of a woman who wanted to be sealed to Jesus Christ:

One of the wives of Brigham Young—Mrs. Augusta Cobb Young—a highly educated and intelligent Boston lady...requested of her Prophet husband a favor of a most extraordinary description. She had forsaken her lawful husband and family . . . to join the Saints, . . . when the lady of whom I speak asked him to place her at the head of his household, he refused: . . . finding that she could not be Brigham's "queen," and having been taught by the highest Mormon authorities that our Savior had, and has, many wives, she requested to be "sealed" to him! Brigham Young told her (for what reason I do not know) that it really was out of his power to do that, but that he would do "the next best thing" for her—he would "seal" her to Joseph Smith. So she was sealed to Joseph Smith, . . . in the resurrection she will leave him [Young] and go over to the original Prophet. (Tell It All, p. 255)

Stanley S. Ivins found evidence to show that Augusta Cobb Young was sealed to Joseph Smith as Mrs. Stenhouse indicated (see Joseph Smith and Polygamy, p. 46).

It is interesting to note that some members of the Mormon Church still maintain that God and Christ are polygamists. John J. Stewart, writing in 1961, made these comments:

Now, briefly, the reason that the Lord, through the Prophet Joseph, introduced the doctrine of plural marriage, and the reason that the Church . . . has never and will never relinquish the doctrine of plural marriage, is simply this: The major purpose of the Church is to help man attain the great eternal destiny suggested in that couplet . . . plural marriage is the patriarchal order of marriage lived by God and others who reign in the Celestial Kingdom. As well might the Church relinquish its claim to the Priesthood as the doctrine of plural marriage. (Brigham Young and His Wives, p. 41)

Plural marriage was a common practice among God's chosen people. . . . Mary, Martha, Mary Magdalene and many other women were beloved of Jesus. For a person to say that he believes the Bible but does not believe the doctrine of plural marriage is something akin to saying that he accepts the Constitution but not the Bill of Rights. (Ibid., p. 26)

Writing in 1966, John J. Stewart made the following statement:

Plural marriage, explained the Prophet, is the patriarchal order of marriage lived by God and others who reign in the Celestial Kingdom; therefore, both the eternity of the marriage covenant and the plurality of wives are contained in the revelation, . . . (Joseph Smith, The Mormon Prophet, page 69)

Although the Mormon Apostle LeGrand Richards admitted that "some of the older brethren" in the church taught that Jesus was a polygamist, he stated that it is not a doctrine of the church:

Your fifth question: "Was Jesus a polygamist?" We believe in the four standard Church works . . . we have no revelations from the Lord to indicate that Jesus was either married or a polygamist. There are some older brethren in the Church that like to philosophize, that have expressed the thought that he was. We have a little saying from one of the brethren who said, "Now brothers and sisters, I will now proceed to make very plain to you that which the Lord hath not yet seen fit to reveal." In that spirit, some have tried to express their own views with respect to this question, but as far as the Church is concerned, it does not teach that Jesus was married, or that he was a polygamist. (Letter from Apostle LeGrand Richards to Morris L. Reynolds, dated May 11th, 1966)

Essential to Salvation

After a special conference held in 1852, the Mormon Church leaders began to devote much of their time to the preaching of polygamy. During the period that the Mormon Church was openly practicing polygamy, the leaders of the church were declaring that it was absolutely necessary and essential for exaltation. One woman testified as follows in the Temple Lot Case:

Yes, sir, President Woodruff, President Young, and President John Taylor, taught me and all the rest of the ladies here in Salt Lake that a man in order to be exalted in the Celestial Kingdom must have more than one wife, that having more than one wife was a means of exaltation. (Temple Lot Case, p. 362)

The Juvenile Instructor, a Mormon publication, printed the following:

After I explained to him the nature of our belief in it and why we practiced it, how it was interwoven with all our hope for exaltation in the presence of God, and that it was impossible for us to renounce it without at the same time renouncing the heaven for which we were striving, . . . It is a vital part of our religion, . . . The law, therefore, was enacted by Congress against a law of God. It attempted to annul and make void that which He had commanded, and that which He declared to be essential to exaltation in His presence. (Juvenile Instructor, vol. 20, p. 116)

Joseph F. Smith, who was the sixth President of the Mormon Church, made these statements:

Some people have supposed that the doctrine of plural marriage was a sort of superfluity, or non-essential to the salvation of mankind. In other words, some of the Saints have said, and believe that a man with one wife, sealed to him by the authority of the Priesthood for time and eternity, will receive an exaltation as great and glorious, if he is faithful, as he possibly could with the five virgins are actually virgins or females who are to be married to the Bridegroom, then all the rest of the saints would constitute the guests. Are not these five wise virgins the "honorable Wives" which the Psalmist represents the Son of God as having taken from among king's daughters?

From the passage in the forty-fifth Psalm, it will be seen that the great Messiah who was the founder of the Christian religion, was a Polygamist, as well as the Patriarch Jacob and the prophet David from whom He descended according to the flesh. Paul says concerning Jesus, "Verily he took not on him the nature of angels; but he took on him the seed of Abraham." (Heb. 2: 16.) Abraham the Polygamist, being a friend of God, the Messiah chose to take upon himself his seed; and by marrying many honorable wives himself, show to all future generations that he approbated the plurality of Wives under the Christian dispensation, as well as under the dispensations in which His Polygamist ancestors lived.

We have now clearly shown that God the Father had a plurality of wives, one or more being in eternity, by whom He begat our spirits as well as the spirit of Jesus His First Born, and another being upon the earth by whom He begat the tabernacle of Jesus, as His Only Begotten in this world. We have also proved most clearly that the Son followed the example of his Father, and became the great Bridegroom to whom kings' daughters and many honorable Wives were to be married. We have also proved that both God the Father and our Lord Jesus Christ inherit their wives in eternity as well as in time; and that God the Father has already begotten many thousand millions of sons and daughters and sent them into this world to take tabernacles; and that God the Son has the promise that "of the increase of his government there shall be no end;" it being expressly declared that the children of one of His Queens should be made Princes in all the earth. (See Psalm 45: 16.)

Jesus says there shall be weeping and gnashing of teeth, when ye shall see Abraham, and Isaac, and Jacob, and all the prophets in the kingdom of God, and you yourselves thrust out." (Luke 13: 28.) There are many in this generation so pious that they would consider themselves greatly disgraced to be obliged to associate with a man having a plurality of wives; would it not be well for such to desire a place separate from the kingdom of God, that they may not be contaminated with the society of these old Polygamists? And then it would be so shocking to the modesty of the very pious ladies of Christendom to see Abraham and his wives, Jacob and his wives, Jesus and his honorable wives, all eating occasionally at the same table, and visiting one another, and conversing about their numerous children and their kingdoms. Oh, ye delicate ladies of Christendom, how can you endure such a scene as this? Oh, what will you do, when you behold on the very gates of the holy Jerusalem the names of the Twelve sons of the four wives of the Polygamist Jacob? If you do not want your morals corrupted, and your delicate ears shocked, and your pious modesty put to the blush by the society of polygamists and their wives, do not venture near the holy Jerusalem, nor come near the New Earth; for Polygamists will be honored there, and will be among the chief rulers in that Kingdom.

Peter says, Likewise ye wives be in subjection to your own husbands, * * * * even as Sarah obeyed Abraham, calling him Lord: whose daughters ye are, as long as ye do well." (1 Peter 3: 1, 6.) The females in the first age of Christianity considered it a great honor to become the daughters of Abraham, but now they have become so righteous that they think it a disgrace to be found in the society of a Polygamist; and no doubt they would think their characters ruined for ever, if any one should be so immodest as to call them the daughters of the Polygamist Abraham. But we will tell them how to avoid this deep disgrace; they can cease to do well; for Peter says that it is only on and reputation here that it has in London, New York, Boston, Philadelphia, or Washington, then we might be comparatively silent while such vices carried the popular sway. But anything unusual, and of a corrupting character in our midst, excites in us an indignation that often finds vent in maledictions upon the heads of the demons that attempt to introduce it.

If there were none but Latter-day Saints living in Utah, we should have no occasion to speak upon this subject as we do; but being infested by those "who profess the pure morality of the religion of Jesus," such as the Charleston Mercury endorses and eulogizes, we are constrained to speak in great plainness. I will now leave this subject, knowing that he or she that is righteous will be righteous still; and they who are filthy will be filthy still.

I discover that some of the Eastern papers represent me as a great blasphemer, because I said, in my lecture on Marriage, at our last Conference, that Jesus Christ was married at Cana of Galilee, that Mary, Martha, and others were his wives, and that he beget children.

All that I have to say in reply to that charge is this—they worship a Savior that is too pure and holy to fulfil the commands of his Father. I worship one that is just pure and holy enough "to fulfil all righteousness;" not only the righteous law of baptism, but the still more righteous and important law "to multiply and replenish the earth." Startle not at this! for even the Father himself honored that law by coming down to Mary, without a natural body, and begetting a son; and if Jesus beget children, he only "did that which he had seen his Father do."

But to return to our subject—the fellowship of the world. Unite with them just as far as you require them to unite with you, and upon the same principle. If they are hungry, feed them when in your power. If they are in distress, trouble, or difficulty, relieve them. Take them in when strangers, if they ask you. Be kind unto them and courteous; yet remember that God has given to you His Holy Spirit as a standard, to which the world should come. It is your duty to honor that standard, and to keep it erect. If the world have fellowship and union with you, let it be in the Spirit of the Lord. But if you allow that standard to fall in your own hearts, or to become recumbent, and you slide back into the spirit of the world and unite with them, you have virtually struck your colors to the enemy, and gone over to his side! The salt has lost its savor, and is become powerless to save. It is only fit to be cast out and trodden under foot of men.

If you love and respect the welfare of the world, never allow yourselves to imbibe their spirit, or to become one with them. For if you do, you cannot be a savior, but need one as well as they; for you both stand upon one and the same level. The world hated the Savior before they hated us, and they killed him because he would never unite in heart and spirit with them. They will kill some of us for the same cause. But blessed are the man and the woman that are hated by the world because they will not be one with them. "Do them all the good you can, and as little harm as possible."

In conclusion, the present is an important era, an era in which the nations are becoming angry. They thirst for each other's blood; and who knows but that all nations will, respectively, file off under the heads of Greek and Roman, or "Gog and Magog," to fight the terrible battles spoken of in sacred writ?

Ye Saints of Latter-days, keep your lamps trimmed and burning, that you walk not in darkness. Ye virgins, wise and foolish, awake, for, behold, the more than one. I want here to enter my protest against this idea, for I know it is false . . . Therefore, whoever has imagined that he could obtain the fullness of the blessings pertaining to this celestial law, by complying with only a portion of its conditions, has deceived himself. He cannot do it. When that principle was revealed to the Prophet Joseph Smith, he very naturally shrank, in his feelings, from the responsibilities thereby imposed upon him; . . . But he did not falter, although it was not until an angel of God, with a drawn sword, stood before him and commanded that he should enter into the practice of that principle, or he should be utterly destroyed, or rejected, . . . It need scarcely be said that the Prophet found no one any more willing to lead out in this matter in righteousness than he was himself . . . none excelled or even matched the courage of the Prophet himself.

If then, this principle was of such great importance that the Prophet himself was threatened with destruction, and the best men in the Church with being excluded from the favor of the Almighty, if they did not enter into and establish the practice of it on earth, it is useless to tell me that there is no blessing attached to obedience to the law, or that a man with only one wife can obtain as great a reward, glory or kingdom as he can with more than one, . . .

I understand the law of celestial marriage to mean that every man in this Church, who has the ability to obey and practice it in righteousness and will not, shall be damned, I say I understand it to mean this and nothing less, and I testify in the name of Jesus that it does mean that. (Journal of Discourses, Joseph F. Smith, vol. 20, pp. 28-31)

In 1891 the First Presidency and Apostles of the Mormon Church made the following statement in a petition to the President of the United States:

We, the First Presidency and apostles of the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-Day Saints, beg to respectfully represent to Your Excellency the following facts:

We formerly taught to our people that polygamy or celestial marriage as commanded by God through Joseph Smith was right; that it was a necessity to man's highest exaltation in the life to come.

That doctrine was publicly promulgated by our president, the late Brigham Young, forty years ago, and was steadily taught and impressed upon the Latter-Day Saints up to September, 1890. (Reed Smoot Case, vol. 1, p. 18)

The following statements appeared in the Latter-day Saints' Millennial Star:

And we, the people who have done this, are believers in the principles of plural marriage or polygamy, not simply as an elevating social relationship, and a preventive of many terrible evils which afflict our race, but as a principle revealed by God, underlying our every hope of eternal salvation and happiness in heaven. . . . we cannot view plural marriage in any other light than as a vital principle of our religion. (Millennial Star, vol. 40, pp. 226-227)

Upwards of forty years ago the Lord revealed to His Church the principle of celestial marriage. . . . the command of God was before them in language which no faithful soul dare disobey.

For, behold, I reveal unto you a new and an everlasting covenant and if ye abide not that covenant, then are ye damned; for no one can reject this covenant, and be permitted to enter into my glory. . . .

Damnation was the awful penalty affixed to a refusal to obey this law. It became an acknowledged doctrine of the Church; it was indissolubly interwoven in the minds of its members with their hopes of eternal salvation and exaltation in the presence of God . . . Who could suppose that...Congress would enact a law which would present the alternative to religious believers of being consigned to a penitentiary if they should attempt to obey a law of God which would deliver them from damnation! (Ibid., vol. 47, p. 711)

Wilford Woodruff made this statement:

We have many bishops and elders who have but one wife. They are abundantly qualified to enter the higher law and take more, but their wives will not let them. Any man who will permit a woman to lead him and bind him down is but little account in the Church and Kingdom of God. (Wilford Woodruff, p. 542, Utah State Historical Society)

William Clayton stated:

“From him [Joseph Smith] I learned that the doctrine of plural and celestial marriage is the most holy and important doctrine ever revealed to man on the earth, and that without obedience to that principle no man can ever attain to the fulness of exaltation in the celestial glory.” (Historical Record, by Andrew Jenson, p. 226)

George Q. Cannon made this statement:

Now, I want to say for myself personally, if I had not obeyed that command of God, concerning plural marriage, I believe that I would have been damned. (Journal of Discourses, vol. 23, p. 278)

John Taylor, who became the third president of the Mormon Church, made this statement in 1866:

Joseph Smith told others; he told me, and I can bear witness of it, “that if this principle was not introduced, this Church and kingdom could not proceed.” When this commandment was given, it was so far religious, and so far binding upon the Elders of this Church, that it was told them if they were not prepared to enter into it, and to stem the torrent of opposition that would come in consequence of it, the keys of the kingdom would be taken from them. (Journal of Discourses, vol. 11, p. 221)

Brigham Young made this statement on August 19, 1866:

The only men who become Gods, even the Sons of God, are those who enter into polygamy. (Journal of Discourses, vol. 11, p. 269)

Joseph Smith told Heber C. Kimball that if he didn't enter into polygamy “he would lose his apostleship and be damned” (Life of Heber C. Kimball, p. 336).

Jerome Sweet claimed that he “went to a special priesthood meeting where Joseph F. Smith [later President of the Church] was the speaker and he said that men holding positions in the priesthood should either marry in polygamy or they should step down and let someone who would marry have the position” (Statement by Jerome Sweet, quoted in Isn't One Wife Enough? p. 107).

Kimball Young stated:

One man recalled a Stake conference in Southern Utah where the brethren were bluntly told to marry in polygamy or “resign their church offices.” . . . Dennis Gallagher's wife so completely believed in the Principle, and felt so strongly that her own glory would be lessened by her husband's flat refusal to follow her urgent pleas to take another wife, that she divorced him after two years. Shortly thereafter she married as a plural wife a man well along in years. (Isn't One Wife Enough? p. 108)

The Mormon writer John J. Stewart, writing in 1961, still upholds the idea that plural marriage leads to exaltation:

Plural marriage is a pattern of marriage designed by God as part of His plan of eternal progress to further His kingdom and exalt His children. (Brigham Young and His Wives, p. 71)

Suppressed 1831 Revelation Revealed

As we indicated on page 203 of this book, for many years Mormon leaders have claimed that Joseph Smith gave a revelation concerning polygamy in 1831. Joseph Fielding Smith, who was LDS Church Historian and later became the tenth President of the Church, made this statement in a letter written to J.W.A. Bailey in 1935:

The exact date I cannot give you when this principle of plural marriage was first revealed to Joseph Smith, but I do know that there was a revelation given in July 1831, in the presence of Oliver Cowdery, W. W. Phelps and others in Missouri, in which the Lord made this principle known through the Prophet Joseph Smith. Whether the revelation as it appears in the Doctrine and Covenants [w]as first given July 12, 1843, or earlier, I care not. It is a fact, nevertheless, that this principle was revealed at an earlier date. (Letter dated September 5, 1935, typed copy)

In 1943 Joseph Fielding Smith told Fawn Brodie about this revelation, but he would not allow her to see it:

Joseph F. Smith, Jr., the present historian of the Utah church, asserted to me in 1943 that a revelation foreshadowing polygamy had been written in 1831, but that it had never been published. In conformity with the church policy, however, he would not permit the manuscript, which he acknowledged to be in possession of the church library, to be examined. (No Man Knows My History, 1971, p. 184, footnote)

Michael Marquardt, a student of Mormon history who became very disturbed with the church's policy of suppressing important records, became interested in this revelation. He found that some Mormon scholars had copies of the revelation, but had to promise not to make any additional copies. Finally, however, Mr. Marquardt learned what appears to be the real reason why the revelation was suppressed: it commanded the Mormons to marry the Indians to make them a "white" and "delightful" people!

Now, to a Christian who is familiar with the teachings of the Bible, the color of a man's skin makes no difference. In Mormon theology, however, a dark skin is a sign of God's displeasure. As we have already shown in the updated material for the chapter on the Book of Mormon (p. 96-A), this teaching comes directly from Joseph Smith's Book of Mormon. Speaking of the Indians, it says: "And the skins of the Lamanites were dark, according to the mark which was set upon their fathers, which was a curse upon them because of their transgression . . ." (Alma 3:6). This same teaching is found in 1 Nephi 12:23 and 2 Nephi 5:21. Until the latter part of 1981, when the Book of Mormon was altered, it was taught that the Indians who were converted would become "a white and delightful people" (2 Nephi 30:6). The new Book of Mormon, of course, says that they will become "a pure and delightful people."

We have previously quoted the Mormon leader Spencer W. Kimball as saying that Indian converts "are fast becoming a white and delightful people" (Improvement Era, December 1960, pp. 922-23). Now, while President Kimball seems to have felt that the Indians were to be made white strictly by the power of God, Michael Marquardt learned that Joseph Smith's 1831 revelation says they are to be made "white" through intermarriage with the Mormons. Because of this fact Mormon leaders seemed to feel that it was necessary to suppress this revelation. Only the most trusted men, such as Dr. Hyrum Andrus, were allowed a copy of it. It was only after a great deal of research that Mr. Marquardt was able to obtain a typed copy of it. We printed this revelation in its entirety in Mormonism Like Watergate? (pp. 7-8). The important part of the revelation reads as follows:

Verily, I say unto you, that the wisdom of man, in his fallen state, knoweth not the purposes and the privileges of my holy priesthood, but ye shall know when ye receive a fulness by reason of the anointing: For it is my will, that in time, ye should take unto you wives of the Lamanites and Nephites, that their posterity may become white, delightful and just, for even now their females are more virtuous than the gentiles.

After the contents of the revelation are given, the following appears:

Reported by W.W.P.

About three years after this was given, I asked brother Joseph, privately, how "we," that were mentioned in the revelation could take wives from the "natives" as we were all married men? He replied, instantly "In the same manner that Abraham took Hagar and Keturah; and Jacob took Rachel, Bilhah and Zilpah; by revelation—the saints of the Lord are always directed by revelation."

According to what Mr. Marquardt could learn, the original revelation is preserved in a vault in the LDS Church Historical Department. The paper on which it is written has the appearance of being very old. There is also a second copy of the revelation in the Church Historical Department. This appears in a letter from W. W. Phelps to Brigham Young. The letter is dated August 12, 1861. Dr. Hyrum Andrus, of Brigham Young University, actually quoted part of this revelation as it appears in the letter, but he was very careful to suppress the fact that the wives to be taken were Lamanites:

The Prophet understood the principle of plural marriage as early as 1831. William W. Phelps stated that on Sunday morning, July 17, 1831, he and others were with Joseph Smith over the border west of Jackson County, Missouri, when the latter-day Seer received a revelation, the substance of which said in part: "Verily I say unto you, that the wisdom of man in his fallen state knoweth not the purposes and the privileges of my Holy Priesthood, but ye shall know when ye receive a fulness." According to Elder Phelps, the revelation then indicated that in due time the brethren would be required to take plural wives. (Doctrines of the Kingdom, by Hyrum L. Andrus, Salt Lake City, 1973, p. 450)

In 1976 we were able to examine a microfilm of the original revelation, but we found it difficult to determine when it was actually recorded. From Phelps' letter to Brigham Young we know that the revelation had to have been recorded by 1861. As we understand it, the first document—containing only the revelation and Phelps' comment—appears to be older than the letter dated August 12, 1861. It is possible that the revelation could have been recorded any time between 1831 and 1861.

Lawrence Foster feels that "The present copy of the revelation, in the handwriting of W. W. Phelps who was present on the occasion, dates from the 1850s or 1860s; . . ." (Religion and Sexuality, New York, 1981, page 134). On page 299 of the same book, Foster gives this information:

The most readily available source for copies of the two manuscript versions of this revelation is Jerald and Sandra Tanner, Mormonism Like Watergate? pp. 7-8. According to scholars in the LDS Church Historical Department, the two extant manuscript copies are in the handwriting of W. W. Phelps, and both date from some time in the Utah period. . . . It is impossible to date the first copy, but the paper is definitely not of an 1830s vintage. The paper used for the first version is of the same rule and size as that used for the 1861 letter, though considerably more worn and discolored. The original copy is marred by numerous corrections and changes. (Ibid., p. 299, n. 29)

Regardless of when the revelation was actually written on paper, we have found definite historical proof that such a revelation was given in 1831. The proof is derived from a letter written by Ezra Booth and published in the Ohio Star only five months after the revelation was given! In this letter, Ezra Booth stated:

In addition to this, and to co-operate with it, it has been made known by revelation, that it will be pleasing to the Lord, should they form a matrimonial alliance with the Natives; and by this means the Elders, who comply with the thing so pleasing to the Lord, and for which the Lord has promised to bless those who do it abundantly, gain a residence in the Indian territory, independent of the agent. It has been made known to one, who has left his wife in the state of N.Y. that he is entirely free from his wife, and he is at liberty to take him a wife from among the Lamanites. It was easily perceived that this permission, was perfectly suited to his desires. I have frequently heard him state, that the Lord had made it known to him, that he is as free from his wife as from any other woman; and the only crime that I have ever heard alleged against her is, she is violently opposed to Mormonism. (Ohio Star, December 8, 1831)

This letter furnishes irrefutable proof that Joseph Smith gave the revelation commanding the Mormons to marry the Lamanite women. On March 6, 1885, S. F. Whitney, Newel K. Whitney's brother, made an affidavit which furnishes additional evidence that there was a revelation on this subject:

Martin Harris . . . claimed he had a revelation when he first came to Kirtland for him to go to Missouri, and obtain an Lamanite squaw for a wife to aid them in propagating Mormonism. Martin told me soon after Joseph, the prophet, left Kirtland, that, two years before, he had told him that as his wife had left him he needed a woman as other men. (Naked Truths About Mormonism, Oakland, California, January, 1888, p. 3)

It is interesting to note that Martin Harris, one of the three witnesses to the Book of Mormon, was one of "seven Elders" present when the 1831 revelation was given.

Like Joseph Smith, Brigham Young taught that the Indians would "become 'a white and delightsome people'" (Journal of Discourses, vol. 2, p. 143). While Brigham Young never released the 1831 revelation, there is evidence that he was familiar with its teaching that the Indians should be made white through intermarriage. In a book published in 1852, William Hall commented:

About the time of the breaking up of the camp at Sugar Creek, the people were called together and several speeches delivered to them by Brigham Young, and others. The speech of Young was in substance as follows:

. . . We are now going to the Lamanites, to whom we intend to be messengers of instruction. . . . We will show them that in consequence of their transgressions a curse has been inflicted upon them—in the darkness of their skins. We will have intermarriages with them, they marrying our young women, and we taking their young squaws to wife. By these means it is the will of the Lord that the curse of their color shall be removed and they restored to their pristine beauty . . .

(The Abominations of Mormonism Exposed, Cincinnati, 1852, pp. 58-59)

Juanita Brooks gives the following information concerning the marriage of Mormons to Indians at the Salmon River Mission:

Very early, some of the Mormon leaders recommended that the missionaries marry Indian women as a means of cementing the friendship between the races. . . .

The Elders who were sent to the Salmon River Mission were given similar instructions by Brigham Young and his party, who visited them in May, 1857. At least three different missionaries tell of them, all under the date of Sunday, May 10, 1857. Milton G. Hammond says simply, "The president and members of the Twelve all spoke. Pres. Young spoke of Elders Marrying natives." . . .

As a result of these teachings, at least three of the brethren married Indian women. . . . As to the Indian women whom they had taken as wives the "L.D.S. Journal History" of April 9, 1858, records:

Two squaws who had married the brethren refused to come, fearing the soldiers would kill all the Mormons.

(Utah Historical Quarterly, vol. 12, pp. 28-30)

T.B.H. Stenhouse provides further information concerning the Salmon River Mission:

Before any of the married brethren could make love to a maiden with the view of making her a second, third, or tenth wife, he was expected to go and obtain Brigham's permission. . . . He sent at one time a mission to Fort Limhi, Salmon River. . . . When Brigham and Heber afterwards visited the missionaries to see how they were succeeding, Heber, in his quaint way, told them that he did not see how the modern predictions could well be fulfilled about the Indians becoming "a white and delightsome people" without extending polygamy to the natives. The approach of the United States army, in 1857, contributed to break up that mission, but not before Heber's hint had been clearly understood, and the prophecy half fulfilled! Heber was very practical, and believed that the people should never ask "the Lord" to do for them what they could do themselves, and, as all "Israel" had long prayed that the Indians might speedily become a "white and delightsome people," he thought it was the duty of the missionaries to assist "the Lord" in fulfilling his promises. This was not the first time that a Mormon prophet attempted to aid in bringing to pass the prophecies of "the Lord." More than one missionary appears to have thoroughly understood him! (The Rocky Mountain Saints, 1873, pp. 657-59)

In 1857 John Hyde, Jr., made the following comments:

. . . Brigham now teaches that "the way God has revealed for the purification of the Indians, and making them 'a white and delightsome people,' as Joseph prophesied, is by us taking the Indian squaws for wives!!" Accordingly several of these tawny beauties have been already "sealed" to some of the Mormon authorities. (Mormonism: Its Leaders And Designs, pp. 109-110)

William Hall claimed that "Brigham Young was married to two young squaws, . . . near Council Bluffs." So far we have been unable to find any additional documentation for his statement. If Hall's statement is correct, Brigham Young must have left these Indian women behind, because we do not find them mentioned as Young's wives in Utah. According to John D. Lee, on May 12, 1849, Brigham Young said that he did not want to take the Indians "in his arms until the curse is removed":

Pres. B.Y. Said that he did not apprehend any danger from the Indians. Neither did he feel, as Some of the Brethren do, he does not want to live among them & take them in his arms until the curse is removed from off[f] them. . . . But we will take their children & school them & teach them to be clenly & to love morality & then raise up seed among them & in this way they will be brought back into the presance & knowledge of God . . . (A Mormon Chronicle, The Diaries of John D. Lee, vol. 1, p. 108)

It would appear, then, that Brigham Young would not follow Joseph Smith's revelation to take "wives of the Lamanites and Nephites, that their posterity may become white, delightsome and just." Even though the revelation said that "their females are more virtuous than the gentiles," Brigham Young built up his "kingdom" with women who were already "white" and "delightsome." If Brigham Young did not follow the 1831 revelation to marry the Lamanites, we must remember that he was only following Joseph Smith's example, for Smith also married "white" women. Even though Brigham Young suppressed Joseph Smith's 1831 revelation and chose "white" women in preference to the Lamanites, he did at least encourage others to marry them "that the curse of their color shall be removed and they restored to their pristine beauty."

For more information concerning marriage to Indians by the early Mormons see our publication Mormonism Like Watergate? pages 9-12.

Since Brigham Young's time the church has tended to frown upon interracial marriage with the Indians, even though there is no written rule against the practice. Apostle Mark E. Petersen has been especially vocal against interracial marriage. Apostle Petersen and other Mormon leaders who are opposed to intermarriage are probably very disturbed now that the 1831 revelation has come to light. The fact that they have suppressed this revelation could well mean that they do not really believe that it came from God. They have been involved in a cover-up to protect the image of Joseph Smith. Even after our publication of the revelation in 1974, the Mormon leaders continued to suppress it as much as they could. Robert N. Hullinger made these comments in his book:

Jerald and Sandra Tanner, . . . printed W. W. Phelps' version of a little-known 1831 revelation . . . Dr. Leonard Arrington, Church Historian of the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints, Salt Lake City, confirmed the existence of the Phelps copy. In a telephone conversation on June 13, 1975, he stated that the revelation may be released for scholarly study sometime in the future, but not yet. (Mormon Answer to Skepticism, Why Joseph Smith Wrote the Book of Mormon, 1980, p. 149, n. 24)

Three years after our publication of the revelation, the Mormon scholar Donna Hill, finally published the important part about the Indians (see Joseph Smith—The First Mormon, New York, 1977, p. 340). Finally, in 1979, Church Historian Leonard J. Arrington and his assistant Davis Bitton came to grips with the reality of the 1831 revelation:

A recently discovered document is a copy of a purported revelation of 1831 that instructed seven missionaries in Missouri as follows:

For it is my will, that in time, ye should take unto you wives of the Lamanites and Nephites that their posterity may become white, delightsome and just, for even now their females are more virtuous than the gentiles.

(The Mormon Experience, p. 195)

More on Taking Other Men's Wives

On pages 213-216 of this book we demonstrated that both Joseph Smith and Brigham Young believed that it was alright for Mormon leaders to take other men's wives. Since printing this material an unpublished sermon by Brigham Young which has been preserved in the Historical Department has come to light. In this speech, which was given October 8, 1861, Brigham Young revealed:

I will give you a few words of doctrine, upon which there has been much inquiry, and with regard to which considerable ignorance exists. Br Watt will write it, but it is not my intention to have it published; therefore pay good attention, and store it up in your memories. . . . Can a woman be freed from a man to whom she is sealed? Yes. But a bill of divorcement does not free her. . . . How can a woman be made free from a man to whom she has been sealed for time and all eternity? There are two ways. . . . The second way in which a wife can be seperated from her husband, while he continues to be faithful to his God and his priesthood, I have not revealed, except to a few persons in this Church, and a few have received it from Joseph the prophet as well as myself. If a woman can find a man holding the keys of the priesthood with higher power and authority than her husband, and he is disposed to take her he can do so, otherwise she has got to remain where she is. In either of these ways of seperation, you can discover, there is no need for a bill of divorcement. To recapitulate. First if a man forfeits his covenants with a wife, or wives, becoming unfaithful to his God, and his priesthood, that wife or wives are free from him without a bill of divorcement. Second. If a woman claims protection at the hands of a man, possessing more power in the priesthood and higher keys, if he is disposed to rescue her and has obtained the consent of her husband to make her his wife he can do so without a bill of divorcement. ("A few words of Doctrine," a speech given by President Brigham Young in the Tabernacle on October 8, 1861, Brigham Young Addresses, Ms/d/1234/Bx 49/fd 8; original in Church Historical Department, photocopy in our possession)

Married to Their Sisters

On page 224 of this book we quoted Joseph H. Jackson as saying that Joseph Smith "feigned a revelation to have Mrs. Milligan, his own sister, married to him spiritually." That Smith believed that a man could be married for eternity to his own sister has been confirmed by an entry added to Joseph Smith's private diary after his death. It appears under the date of October 26, 1843, and reads as follows:

The following named deceased persons were sealed to me (John M. Bernhisel) on Oct. 26th, 1843, by Pres. Joseph Smith—

Maria Bernhisel, Sister—

Brother Samuel's wife, Catherine Kremer

Mary Shatto (Aunt) . . .

Recorded by Robt. L. Cambell

July 29, 1868 (Joseph Smith's Diary, October 26, 1843, Church Historical Department).

The reader will notice that Bernhisel claims that he was sealed to his own sister by Joseph Smith. Now, if the doctrine of Celestial Marriage were true, in the resurrection John Bernhisel would find himself married to his own sister, Maria Bernhisel!

Limited to 999 Wives

On pages 212-213 of this book we demonstrated that the Mormon leaders had hundreds of dead women sealed to them for eternity. This startling entry was found in the Apostle Abraham Cannon's diary:

THURSDAY, APRIL 5th, 1894. . . . I met with the Quorum and Presidency in the temple . . . President Woodruff then spoke ". . . In searching out my genealogy I found about four hundred of my femal[e] kindred who were never married. I asked Pres. Young what I should do with them. He said for me to have them sealed to me unless there were more that [than?] 999 of them. the doctrine startled me, but I had it done, . . .” (“Daily Journal of Abraham H. Cannon,” April 5, 1894, vol. 18, pp. 66-67)

More Than One Heavenly Mother?

On pages 227-28 of this book we demonstrate that the early Mormon leaders taught that God the Father has a plurality of wives and that some members of the church still maintain that this is the case. This unusual teaching is presenting a real problem for some Mormons. Linda Wilcox, for instance, wrote the following:

A recent cartoon shows a wife asking her husband, “What do you think Heavenly Mother’s attitudes are about polygamy, Frank?” to which the husband responds, “Which Heavenly Mother?” A question to which there is as yet no definite answer—but much speculation—is whether there is more than one Mother in Heaven. The Mormon church’s doctrinal commitment to plural marriage as well as the exigencies of producing at least billions of spirit children suggest that probability—some believe necessity—of more than one Mother in Heaven. A Department of Seminaries and Institutes student manual hints at the possibility of multiple heavenly mothers. In a diagram entitled “Becoming a Spirit Child of Heavenly Parents,” the individual person (male) is depicted with upward lines to his heavenly parents, the one parent labeled “Heavenly Father” (caps), the other labeled “A heavenly mother” (lower case). (Sunstone, September-October 1980, p. 14)

Another Hidden Revelation Revealed and a Pretended Marriage

In 1842 Joseph Smith wanted to marry Newel K. Whitney’s daughter Sarah Ann Whitney. At that time he gave a special revelation concerning polygamy. Orson F. Whitney stated:

This girl was but seventeen years of age, but she had implicit faith in the doctrine of plural marriage. . . . The revelation commanding and consecrating this union, is in existence, though it has never been published. It bears the date of July 27, 1842, and was given through the Prophet to the writer’s grandfather, Newel K. Whitney, whose daughter Sarah, on that day, became the wedded wife of Joseph Smith for time and eternity. (The Contributor, vol. 6, no. 4, January 1885, p. 131)

This revelation was suppressed by Mormon leaders, but in 1973 Michael Marquardt obtained a typed copy and published it in his pamphlet The Strange Marriages of Sarah Ann Whitney . . ., page 23. In this revelation we find the following:

Verily, thus saith the Lord unto my servant N. K. Whitney, the thing that my servant Joseph Smith has made known unto you and your family and which you have agreed upon is right in mine eyes. . . . These are the words which you shall pronounce upon my servant Joseph and your daughter S. A. Whitney. They shall take each other by the hand and you shall say, You both mutually agree, calling them by name, to be each other’s companion so long as you both shall live. . . . If you both agree to covenant and do this, I then give you, S. A. Whitney, my daughter, to Joseph Smith, to be his wife. . . . Let immortality and eternal life hereafter be sealed upon your heads forever and ever.

The reader will notice that this revelation on polygamy is dated a year earlier than the one published in the Doctrine and Covenants.

According to the Assistant Church Historian Andrew Jenson, Sarah Ann Whitney was married to Joseph Smith by her father, Newel K. Whitney: “Sarah Ann Whitney, afterwards the wife of Pres. Heber C. Kimball, married to Joseph July 27, 1842, her father Newel K. Whitney officiating” (Historical Record, vol. 6, pp. 233-34).

Michael Marquardt also discovered photographs of a letter written by Joseph Smith himself and addressed to Bishop Newel K. Whitney and his wife. The letter is very interesting because Smith asks the “three” of them—presumably Mr. and Mrs. Whitney and their young daughter Sarah Ann, to whom he was secretly married—to come see him by night. In the letter, Joseph Smith makes it very clear that he does not want them to come when Emma, his first wife, would be present:

. . . all three of you can come and see me in the fore part of the night, . . . the only thing to be careful of, is to find out when Emma comes then you cannot be safe, but when she is not here, there is the most perfect safety: . . . I think Emma wont come tonight if she dont dont fail to come tonight, I subscribe myself your obedient and affectionate, companion, and friend. Joseph Smith

Below is a photograph of the last few lines of the letter. The reader will notice Joseph Smith’s signature.

Since finding photographs of this important letter in the George Albert Smith Collection at the University of Utah Library, Michael Marquardt has completed some very important research concerning this whole affair. He has published his findings in his pamphlet, The Strange Marriages of Sarah Ann Whitney to Joseph Smith the Mormon Prophet, Joseph C. Kingsbury and Heber C. Kimball. Among other things that Mr. Marquardt discovered is the fact that Joseph Smith actually performed a “pretended” marriage ceremony between Sarah Ann Whitney and Joseph C. Kingsbury so that his own relationship with her would not be noticed. Mr. Marquardt cites the following from “The History of Joseph C. Kingsbury,” a document that is now in the Western Americana section of the University of Utah Library:

. . . on 29th of April 1843 I according to President Joseph Smith Couscil & others agreed to Stand by Sarah Ann Whitney as supposed to be her husband & had a prete[n]ded marriage for the purpose of Bringing about the purposes of God in these last days as spoken by the mouth of the Prophets Isiah Jeremiah Ezekiel and also Joseph Smith, & Sarah Ann Should Recd a Great Glory Honor, & eternal lives and I Also Sould Recd a Great Glory, Honor & eternal lives to the full desire of my heart in having my Companion Caroline in the first Resurrection to claim her & no one have power to take her from me & we both shall be Crowned & enthroned together in the Celestial Kingdom of God. . . .

Mr. Marquardt has also found that Joseph Smith signed a document in which he stated: “I hereby certify, that I have upon this the 29th day of April 1843, joined together in Marriage Joseph C. Kingsbury and Sarah Ann Whitney, in the City of Nauvoo, Illinois.” That a man professing to be a prophet of God would perform a “pretended” marriage to cover up his own iniquity is almost beyond belief.

In his pamphlet, Mr. Marquardt goes on to show that after Joseph Smith’s death, Sarah Ann Whitney continued to live with Joseph C. Kingsbury in this “pretended” marriage—he referred to her as “Sarah my Supposed wife.” While still living with Kingsbury, she married the Apostle Heber C. Kimball. She was married to Kimball for time and sealed to Joseph Smith for eternity in the Nauvoo Temple on January 12, 1846. Mormon scholar Stanley B. Kimball claims that there is evidence of a secret marriage to Kimball before the ceremony in the temple was performed. He gives the date as March 17, 1845 (Heber C. Kimball: Mormon Patriarch and Pioneer, p. 315). In any case, she became pregnant with Apostle Kimball’s child but continued to live with Kingsbury until after the child was born. For more information on these marriages see Michael Marquardt’s pamphlet, The Strange Marriages of Sarah Ann Whitney, to Joseph Smith the Mormon Prophet, Joseph C. Kingsbury and Heber C. Kimball. Mr. Marquardt’s research has brought into focus the total disregard Joseph Smith had for the sacred vows of marriage.

17. The Manifesto

John Taylor, the Third President of the Mormon Church, made this statement in 1879:

I remember being asked in court here some three or four years ago . . . “Do you believe in obeying the laws of the United States?” “Yes I do, in all except one”—in fact I had not broken that. “What law is that?” “The law in relation to polygamy.” (Journal of Discourses, vol. 20, p. 317)

Thomas G. Alexander, Assistant Professor of History at Brigham Young University, admits that members of the Mormon Church openly defied the law:

Some maintain that because Mormons were law abiding they gave up plural marriage after the Supreme Court declared the anti-polygamy acts constitutional. But long after the 1879 Reynolds decision, Church members brought to bar for sentencing told federal judges that the law of God was higher than the law of the land and deserved prior obedience. The Manifesto officially ending polygamy as Church practice was not issued until 1890, and excommunication for practicing plural marriage did not come until 1904. (Dialogue: A Journal of Mormon Thought, Summer 1966, p. 128)

The Mormons continued to openly preach polygamy until the year 1890. During this time the leaders of the church taught that plural marriage was going to be a permanent part of the church and that it would never be stopped. Heber C. Kimball, First Counselor to Brigham Young, made these statements:

If you oppose what is called the “spiritual wife doctrine,” the patriarchal order, which is of God, that course will corrode you with a spirit of apostasy, and you will go overboard; . . .

The principle of plurality of wives never will be done away, although some sisters have had revelations that, when this time passes away and they go through the veil, every woman will have a husband to herself. (Deseret News, November 7, 1855)

Some quietly listen to those who speak against the Lord’s servants, against his anointed, against the plurality of wives, and against almost every principle that God has revealed. Such persons have half-a-dozen devils with them all the time. You might as well deny “Mormonism,” and turn away from it, as to oppose the plurality of wives. Let the Presidency of this Church, and the Twelve Apostles, and all the authorities unite and say with one voice that they will oppose the doctrine, and the whole of them will be damned. (Journal of Discourses, vol. 5, p. 203)

I speak of plurality of wives as one of the most holy principles that God ever revealed to man, and all those who exercise an influence against it, unto whom it is taught, man or woman, will be damned, and they, and all who will be influenced by them, will suffer the buffetings of Satan in the flesh; for the curse of God will be upon them, and poverty, and distress, and vexation of spirit will be their portion; . . . (Ibid., vol. 11, p. 211)

It would be as easy for the United States to build a tower to remove the sun, as to remove polygamy, or the Church and kingdom of God. (Millennial Star, vol. 28, p. 190)

John Taylor, who became the third President of the Church, made these statements:

Where did this commandment come from in relation to polygamy? It also came from God . . . Joseph Smith told others; he told me, and I can bear witness of it, “that if this principle was not introduced, this Church and kingdom could not proceed” . . . When I see any of our people, men or women, opposing a principle of this kind, I have years ago set them down as on the high road to apostasy, and I do today; I consider them apostates, and not interested in this Church and kingdom. (Journal of Discourses, vol. 11, p. 221)

God has given us a revelation in regard to celestial marriage. I did not make it. He has told us certain things pertaining to this matter, and they would like us to tone that principle down and change it and make it applicable to the views of the day. This we cannot do; nor can we interfere with any of the commands of God to meet the persuasions or behests of men. I cannot do it, and will not do it.

I find some men try to twist round the principle in any way and every way they can. They want to sneak out of it in some way. Now God don’t want any kind of sycophancy like that. . . . We have also been told that “it is not mete that men who will not abide my law shall preside over my Priesthood.” . . . He has told us what to do, we will do it, in the name of Israel’s God—and all who sanction it say Amen . . . If God has introduced something for our glory and exaltation, we are not going to have that kicked over by any improper influence, either inside or outside of the Church of the living God. (Journal of Discourses, vol. 25, pp. 309-310)

The Apostle Orson Pratt stated:

God has told us Latter-day Saints that we shall be condemned if we do not enter into that principle; and yet I have heard now and then . . . a brother or sister say, “I am a Latter-day Saint, but I do not believe in polygamy.” Oh, what an absurd expression! What an absurd idea! A person might as well say, “I am a follower of the Lord Jesus Christ, but I do not believe in him.” One is just as constant as the other . . . If the doctrine of polygamy, as revealed to the Latter-day Saints, is not true, I would not give a fig for all your other revelations that came through Joseph Smith the Prophet; I would renounce the whole of them, because it is utterly impossible, according to the revelations that are contained in these books, to believe a part of them to be divine—from God—and a part of them to be from the devil; . . . I did hope there was more intelligence among the Latter-day Saints, and a greater understanding of principle than to suppose that any one can be a member of this Church in good standing, and yet reject polygamy. The Lord has said, that those who reject this principle reject their salvation, they shall be damned, saith the Lord; . . .

Now I want to prophecy a little . . . I want to prophecy that all men and women who oppose the revelation which God has given in relation to polygamy will find themselves in darkness; the Spirit of God will withdraw from them the very moment of their opposition to that principle, until they will finally go down to hell and be damned, if they do not repent. . . .

Now, if you want to get into darkness, brethren and sisters, begin to oppose this revelation. Sisters, you begin to say before your husbands, or husbands you begin to say before your wives, “I do not believe in the principle of polygamy, and I intend to instruct my children against it.” Oppose it in this way, and teach your children to do the same, and if you do not become as dark as midnight there is no truth in Mormonism. (Journal of Discourses, vol. 17, pp. 224-225)

Brigham Young, the second President of the Mormon Church, made these statements:

Now if any of you will deny the plurality of wives and continue to do so, I promise that you will be damned; and I will go still further, and say, take this revelation, or any other revelation that the Lord has given, and deny it in your feelings, and I promise that you will be damned. (Deseret News, November 14, 1855)

I heard the revelation on polygamy, and I believed it with all my heart, and I know it is from God—. . . “Do you think that we shall ever be admitted as a State into the Union without denying the principle of polygamy?” If we are not admitted until then, we shall never be admitted. (Deseret News, October 10, 1866)

We are told that if we give up polygamy—which we know to be a doctrine revealed from heaven, and it is God and the world for it—but suppose this church should give up this holy order of marriage, then would the devil, and all who are in league with him against the cause of God, rejoice that they had prevailed upon the Saints to refuse to obey one of the revelations and commandments of God to them. (Journal of Discourses, vol. 11, p. 239)

George Q. Cannon, who was a member of the First Presidency, made these statements:

There has been some agitation in years past respecting plural marriage, and some people, calling themselves Latter-day Saints, have been almost ready to go into the open market, and bid for a State government, at the price of conceding this principle of our religion, for the privilege of becoming a State of the Union. . . . They are ready to sell out their belief as Latter-day Saints, and their veneration and reverence for that power which God has restored, for the sake of obtaining a little recognition of their rights as citizens, . . . When a man is ready to barter any principle of salvation for worldly advantage, that man certainly has reached the position that he esteems worldly advantage above eternal salvation. Can such persons retain the Spirit of God, and take such a course as this? No, they cannot. (Journal of Discourses, vol. 26, pp. 7-8)

If plural marriage be divine, as the Latter-day Saints say it is, no power on earth can suppress it, unless you crush and destroy the entire people. . . . A man that enters this Church ought to be able to die for its principles if necessary, and certainly should be able to go to prison for them without crying about the matter. If you are sentenced to prison for marrying more wives than one, round up your shoulders and bear it; prepare yourselves to take the consequences. (Journal of Discourses, vol. 20, p. 276)

As the principle of patriarchal marriage is the one now so savagely attacked, this is the one such persons are preparing themselves to yield. I view such men as apostates already in heart. They are more dangerous than our open enemies. . . .

There are men who say: “Yield this practice for the present; perhaps public opinion may soften and then this principle may be taught and practiced.”

I look upon such a suggestion as from the devil. It would be quite as proper to propose apostasy for a short season until public opinion would become more favorable to us. If there are any in the Church who cannot stand the pressure instead of talking compromise, let them withdraw quietly from the Church. (Juvenile Instructor, vol. 20, p. 156)

The Apostle George Teasdale bore this testimony concerning plural marriage:

I believe in plural marriage as a part of the gospel, just as much as I believe in baptism by immersion for the remission of sins. The same being who taught me baptism for the remission of sins, taught me plural marriage, and its necessity and glory. Can I afford to give up a single principle? I can not. If I had to give up one principle I would have to give up my religion. . . . I bear my solemn testimony that plural marriage is as true as any principle that has been revealed from the heavens. I bear my testimony that it is a necessity, and that the Church of Christ in its fulness never existed without it. Where you have the eternity of marriage you are bound to have plural marriage; bound to; and it is one of the marks of the Church of Jesus Christ in its sealing ordinances. (Journal of Discourses, vol. 25, p. 21)

The Apostle Orson Hyde said that “polygamy” is the “very principle that will break in pieces the power that would set it aside” (Journal of Discourses, vol. 13, p. 183).

Wilford Woodruff, who later became the fourth President of the Church and issued the Manifesto which was supposed to stop the practice of polygamy, made this statement in 1869:

If we were to do away with polygamy, it would only be one feather in the bird, one ordinance in the Church and kingdom. Do away with that, then we must do away with prophets and Apostles, with revelation and the gifts and graces of the Gospel, and finally give up our religion altogether and turn sectarians and do as the world does, . . . We just can't do that, for God has commanded us to build up his kingdom . . . and we shall obey him in days to come as we have in days past. (Journal of Discourses, vol. 13, p. 166)

F. D. Richards stated:

Now, in our case, the government has determined that polygamy shall be abolished, but the government of heaven had previously determined that polygamy should be established. . . . Jehovah will hold a contention with this nation, and will show them which is the higher and eternal law, and which is the lesser, and more recent law. (Journal of Discourses, vol. 20, pp. 314-315)

In the Latter-day Saints' Millennial Star the following was printed:

. . . the God of Israel knowing these things, commanded Joseph Smith, the prophet, and the Latter-day Saints, to obey this law, “or you shall be damned,” saith the Lord. Now, after having obeyed the law for many years, the Congress of the United States, and the supreme judges of the nation, stand forth and say, “You shall be damned if you do obey it.” Now Latter-day Saints, what are we going to do under the circumstances? God says, We shall be damned if we do not obey the law. Congress says, “We shall be damned if we do.” It places us precisely in the. . . position that it did the Hebrews in the fiery furnace, and Daniel in the den of lions. . . . Now who shall we obey? God or man? My voice is that we obey God. . . . The Congress of 1862, and the supreme judges of 1879, in their acts and decisions, have taken a dangerous and fearful step; their acts will sap the very foundation of our government, and it will be rent asunder, . . . (Millennial Star, vol. 41, pp. 242-243)

The Mormons did everything they could to escape the federal deputies. Kimball Young gives this information:

In addition to false names, disguises, and ruses, a whole system of information gathering, signaling, and spotting informers was developed. For example, the Church authorities would pass the word down to the smaller communities of movements of federal deputies out of Salt Lake City in the direction of any particular town. There are a variety of stories about the lookouts and warning systems. John Read tells that elaborate systems had been established along the border of Idaho and Utah and relates one instance. . . . A watch would be stationed on the road with a shotgun which he was to fire three times when he saw the officers coming. . . . He fired the gun and shortly the church bells started to ring. The alarm was successful and the police returned empty-handed. (Isn't One Wife Enough? 1954, p. 396)

At very early ages children were introduced into conspiratorial operations. Not talking to strangers, being part of a warning system, and being taught outright falsification were all elements in their training during those years which would certainly not be considered normal today. (Ibid., p. 402)

Most of the Saints were loyal and patriotic Americans, yet they were forced into hiding and obliged to lie and engage in all kinds of deceit in order to protect themselves in the name of their religion. (Ibid., pp. 406-407)

Wilford Woodruff, who became the fourth President of the Mormon Church, had an armed guard to protect him. In a letter written in 1887, Wilford Woodruff wrote:

I have a large stout man who goes with me every ____ [where?] night and day carries 2 pistols & a double barrel shot gun and sayes he will shoot the marshals if they come to take me (Dont tell anybody this) so I am _____ well garded. . . . (Letter from Wilford Woodruff to Miss Nellie Atkin, dated September 3, 1887, microfilm copy of the original)

In an article published in the Millennial Star, October 28, 1865, the Mormon people were told that they could not give up polygamy and that there would not be a revelation to suppress the practice:

It is time that members of the Government and the public at large should understand the true state of the question, and the real issues involved in these propositions. The doctrine of polygamy with the "Mormons," is not one of that kind that in the religious world is classed with "non-essentials." It is not an item of doctrine that can be yielded, and faith in the system remain. "Mormonism" is that kind of religion the entire divinity of which is invalidated, and its truth utterly rejected, the moment that any one of its leading principles is acknowledged to be false, . . .

The whole question, therefore, narrows itself to this in the "Mormon" mind. Polygamy was revealed by God, or, the entire fabric of their faith is false. To ask them to give up such an item of belief, is to ask them to relinquish the whole, to acknowledge their Priesthood a lie, their ordinances a deception, and all that they have toiled for, lived for, bled for, prayed for, or hoped for, a miserable failure and a waste of life.

All this Congress demands of the people of Utah. It asks the repudiation of their entire religious practice to-day; and inasmuch as polygamy is, in "Mormon" belief, the basis of the condition of a future life, it asks them to give up their hopes of salvation hereafter. . . .

To return to our starting point, the great question of what Congress demands. We have shown that in requiring the relinquishment of polygamy, they ask, the renunciation of the entire faith of this people. No sophistry can get out of this. "Mormonism" is true in every leading doctrine, or it is false as a system altogether. . . .

There is no half way house. The childish babble about another revelation is only an evidence how half informed men can talk. The "Mormons" have either to spurn their religion and their God, and sink self-damned in the eyes of all civilization at the moment when most blest in the practice of their faith, or go calmly on to the same issue which they have always had—"Mormonism" in its entirety the revelation of God, or nothing at all. . . . those who so unwisely seek to stir up the Government to wrath, will yet learn there is but one solution of the "Mormon" problem—"Mormonism" allowed in its entirety, or "Mormonism" wiped out in blood. (Millennial Star, October 28, 1865)

The government increased the pressure against polygamy, but the Mormons were determined to continue the practice. Under the date of April 6, 1884, Abraham H. Cannon recorded the following in his journal:

At a Priesthood meeting . . . the strongest language in regard to Plural Marriage was used that I ever heard, and among other things it was stated that all men in position who would not observe and fulfill that law should be removed from their places.

By the year 1888 many people were suggesting that the church have a new revelation which would suppress the practice of polygamy. Some friends of the church went so far as to write an epistle stating that polygamy would no longer be practiced, and they wanted the Mormon leaders to submit it to the people as if they had written it themselves. The Mormon leaders rejected this proposal, but the fact that Wilford Woodruff had the epistle read before the "council of apostles" shows that he was desperate for a solution to the church's predicament. L. John Nuttall recorded the following in his journal under the date of December 19, 1888:

Bro Jos. F Smith went home this evening Pres Woodruff & myself spent the evening together. he handed me a communication which had been sent to him for action by friends in the East. and which he purposes laying before the apostles to-morrow night It purports to be an epistle from the authorities to the Saints. and reiterates the passage of the anti-Polygamy laws. the rigid enforcement of the same, quotes from the Book of Doctrine & Covenants. and endeavors to show forth reasons why the church should openly renounce the practice of Polygamy in the future, and until the time comes when the Saints can again practice that principle of their religion unmolested. I did not see how such a (page 295) thing could be done consistently with our covenants. did not think that would satisfy our enemies These are the same ideas that were advanced by Dr. Miller of Omaha some 3 years ago & which Prest Taylor & Cannon could not accept. (Journal of L. John Nuttall, vol. 2, p. 329 of typed copy at Brigham Young University)

The next day (December 20, 1888) L. John Nuttall wrote:

This evening I attended a meeting of the Council of Apostles at the Presidents office. . . . The communication which Prest Woodruff handed to me last night was presented by Bro Woodruff who asked me to read it. which I did, then by request read it again. The youngest member was then asked to speak his views in brief and as continued until all had spoken. the brethren were very emphatic in opposing or accepting such a measure, they felt it had not come from the right source. did not offer even as much as a mess of potage for the relinquishment of our religion. If we gave up one portion we would be required to give up all. could not accept any such documents nor their propositions. I felt glad that I was of the same mind. (page 296) (Journal of L. John Nuttall, vol. 2, p. 331 of typed copy)

Abraham H. Cannon made this comment in his journal under the date of June 12, 1890:

He [George Q. Cannon] also showed me a paper which Secretary of State Blaine had prepared for the leading authorities of the Church to sign in which they make a virtual renunciation of plural marriage. My feelings revolt at signing such a document. (Journal of Abraham H. Cannon, June 12, 1890, Brigham Young University Library)

Shortly before the revelation known as the Manifesto (which put a stop to the practice of polygamy) was given, Lorenzo Snow, who later became President of the Mormon

Church, was declaring that no such revelation would ever come. When Lorenzo Snow was on trial for practicing polygamy, Mr. Bierbower (the prosecuting attorney) predicted that if he was convicted, “a new revelation would soon follow, changing the divine law of celestial marriage.” To this Mr. Snow replied:

Whatever fame Mr. Bierbower may have secured as a lawyer, he certainly will fail as a prophet. The severest prosecutions have never been followed by revelations changing a divine law, obedience to which brought imprisonment or martyrdom.

Though I go to prison, God will not change his law of celestial marriage. But the man, the people, the nation, that oppose and fight against this doctrine and the Church of God, will be overthrown. (Historical Record, vol. 6, 1887, p. 144)

Although Lorenzo Snow said that the “severest prosecutions have never been followed by revelations changing a divine law,” Wilford Woodruff, fourth President of the Mormon Church, issued the Manifesto in 1890. He claimed the Manifesto was given to stop the persecution the church would have to go through if they continued to practice polygamy. He stated:

The Lord showed me by vision and revelation exactly what would happen if we did not stop this practice. . . . all ordinances would be stopped. . . . many men would be made prisoners. . . . I went before the Lord, and I wrote what the Lord told me to write. . . . (Evidences and Reconciliations, by John A. Widtsoe, 3 volume edition, pp. 105-106)

The Mormon writer John J. Stewart made this statement: “. . . due to the extremely bitter persecution against the Church because of it [plural marriage], President Wilford Woodruff issued the manifesto, . . . suspending the general practice of it in the Church, while still retaining it as a doctrine” (Brigham Young and His Wives, pp. 29-30).

Before Wilford Woodruff became President of the Mormon Church he had stated that the church could not give up polygamy (Journal of Discourses, vol. 13, p. 166). After he became President he even claimed to receive a revelation that he should not yield to the pressure of the government. Under the date of December 19, 1889, the Apostle Abraham H. Cannon recorded the following in his journal:

During our meeting a revelation was read which Pres. Woodruff received Sunday evening, Nov'r 24th. Propositions had been made for the Church to make some concessions to the Courts in regard to its principles. Both of Pres. Woodruff's counselors refused to advise him as to the course he should pursue, and he therefore laid the matter before the Lord. The answer came quick and strong. The word of the Lord was for us not to yield one particle of that which he had revealed and established. He had done and would continue to care for His work and those of the Saints who were faithful, and we need have no fear of our enemies when we were in the line of our duty. We are promised redemption and deliverance if we will trust in God and not in the arm of flesh. . . . The whole revelation was filled with words of the greatest encouragement and comfort, and my heart was filled with joy and peace during the entire reading. It sets all doubts at rest concerning the course to pursue. (Journal of Abraham H. Cannon, December, 19, 1889)

Because of the fact that Wilford Woodruff had previously taught that polygamy could not be discontinued and had even claimed to receive revelation to that effect, the other leaders of the Mormon Church were confused by his Manifesto. That there was division among the highest leaders of the Mormon Church at the time the Manifesto was issued is evident from the journal of the Apostle Abraham H. Cannon. Under the dates of Sept. 30 and Oct. 1, 1890, he recorded the following:

. . . Pres. Snow [President of the Quorum of the Twelve] said: . . . God has a right to suspend His law, as he has done in the inspiration under which Pres. Woodruff wrote the manifesto, and as the Savior did when He suspended the law of Moses and permitted the disciples to pluck corn on the Sabbath day . . . John W. Taylor [an Apostle]: When I first heard of this manifesto I felt to say “Damn it,” but on further thought I felt it was not right to be so impulsive. I do not yet feel quite right about it. My father when President of the Church sought to find a way to evade the conflict between the Saints and government on the question of plural marriage, but the Lord said it was an eternal and unchangeable law and must stand. Pres. Woodruff lately received an encouraging revelation in regard to this principle, and now I ask myself, “Is the Lord a child that He thus changes?” Yet I feel that the Lord giveth a law and He can also take it away.— . . . F. M. Lyman [an Apostle]: “I endorse the manifesto, and feel it will do good. I design to live with and have children by my wives, using the wisdom which God gives me to avoid being captured by the officers of the law.” . . .—John H. Smith [an Apostle]: I cannot feel to say that the manifesto is quite right or wrong. It may be that the people are unworthy of the principle and hence the Lord has withdrawn it. I cannot consent to cease living with my wives unless I am imprisoned. (“Daily Journal of Abraham H. Cannon,” Sept. 30 and Oct. 1, 1890)

Many members of the church were very upset over the Manifesto. The plural wife of Samuel Spaulding made this statement:

“I was there in the tabernacle the day of the Manifesto, and I tell you it was an awful feeling. There President Woodruff read the Manifesto that made me no longer a wife and might make me homeless. I sat there by my mother and she looked at me and said, ‘How can you stand this?’ But I voted for it because it was the only thing to do. I raised my hand and voted a thing that would make me an unlawful wife.” (Isn't One Wife Enough? p. 411)

Kimball Young quotes another Mormon as saying:

“I will say that when polygamy was done away with it was a great blow to me, . . . the thing that bothered me was that the Lord had said to the Prophet Joseph that it should be a standing law and not it was done away, (sic)

“Could it be that the Lord has made a mistake? This question bothered me for a long time but it came to me all at once. That it is still a standing law and will be so forever, but we are not allowed to practice it for a while. I can now rest easy about it.” (Ibid., p. 411)

After the Manifesto

Russell R. Rich made this statement:

When the statement called “The Manifesto,” which was signed by President Wilford Woodruff, was voted upon for acceptance by the membership of the LDS Church . . . it appeared that there was a unanimous vote of support for abandonment of the practice of plural marriage. As time passed, however, it became apparent that not even among the general authorities of the Church was there unanimous support for abolishing the practice. (Brigham Young University Week, Those Who Would Be Leaders, by Russell R. Rich, [1959] p. 71)

In October, 1891, Wilford Woodruff testified that the Manifesto not only prohibited any more plural marriages, but that it also forbid the unlawful cohabitation of those who were already married in polygamy:

Q. Did you intend to confine your declaration and advice to the church solely to the question of forming new marriages, without reference to those that were existing—plural marriages? A. The intention of the proclamation was to obey the law myself—all the laws of the land on that subject, and expecting the church would do the same. . . .

Q. In the concluding portion of your statement you say: “I now publicly declare that my advice to the Latter-day Saints is to refrain from contracting any marriage forbidden by the law of the land.” Do you understand that that language was to be expanded and to include the further statement of living or associating in plural marriage by those already in the status? A. Yes, sir; I intended the proclamation to cover the ground—to keep the laws—to obey the law myself and expect the people to obey the law. . . .

Q. Your attention was called to the fact that nothing was said in that manifesto about the dissolution of existing polygamous relations. I want to ask you, President Woodruff, whether in your advice to the church officials, and the people of the church, you have advised them that your intention was, and that the requirement of the church was, that the polygamous relations already formed before that should not be continued; that is, there should be no association with plural wives; in other words, that unlawful cohabitation as it is named and spoken of should also stop, as well as future polygamous marriages? A. Yes, sir; that has been the intention. (Testimony of Wilford Woodruff, as quoted in Reminiscences of Early Utah, by R.N. Baskin, Salt Lake City, 1914, p. 246)

While Wilford Woodruff and other Mormon leaders were publicly stating that members of the church should observe the law, they were secretly teaching that it was alright to break the law concerning unlawful cohabitation. This is evident from a number of entries in the journal of the Apostle Abraham H. Cannon. For instance, on October 2, 1890, he wrote:

It was, however, resolved that “we use our private influence at present to prevent our brethren from going into Court and promising to obey the law; and as soon as possible we take steps to get some favors from the government for those who already have more wives than one.”

Under the date of October 7, 1890, the Apostle Abraham H. Cannon records some of the statements by the Mormon Church leaders:

Geo. Q. Cannon [a member of the First Presidency]: “I feel like saying ‘damn the law.’ We can expect neither justice nor mercy in the administration of the law with the present corrupt administrators. Women should be encouraged, for some feel as though they had been betrayed, and a man who will act the coward and shield himself behind the manifesto for deserting his plural wives, would be damned. . . . If it were not for my public duties I would not live a day in my present condition, but my family understand that my liberty depends on refraining from visiting them in their homes, and they are contented.” W. Woodruff [President of the Church]: “This manifesto only refers to future marriages, and does not affect past conditions. I did not, could not and would not promise that you would desert your wives and children. This you cannot do in honor.” . . . Angus M. Cannon: “Because of the manifesto many will feel justified in promising to obey the law when brought into Court. I would not feel justified in such a course, but many may.” (“Daily Journal of Abraham H. Cannon, October 7, 1890)

Under the dates of October 17 and 18, 1890, the Apostle Cannon recorded the following in his journal:

Uncle David came in about noon and told me that he had a conversation with Lindsey Sprague, a deputy marshal, who told him that there were papers out for my arrest, . . . I got Chas H Wilcken to investigate the matter for me and he learned that it was indeed a fact that a warrant was issued and in Doyle’s hands for my arrest. . . .

Saturday, Oct. 18th, 1890. . . . Bro. Wilcken came and informed me that he had bought Doyle off, and had got his promise that I should not be molested, nor should any other person without sufficient notice being given for them to escape, and to get witnesses out of the way. He gave Bro. Wilcken the names of some 51 persons whose arrest he intended to try and effect on a trip he and another deputy intended to undertake today, through Utah and Emery counties. A messenger was therefore despatched to give these people warning. Thus with a little money a channel of communication is kept open between the government offices and the suffering and persecuted Church members. (“Daily Journal of Abraham H. Cannon,” October 17 and 18, 1890)

Although the leaders of the Mormon Church had promised to obey the law of the land, many of them broke their promises, but very few people realized to what extent until they were called to testify in the “Proceedings Before the Committee on Privileges and Elections of the United States Senate in the Matter of the Protests Against the Right of Hon. Reed Smoot, a Senator From the State of Utah, to Hold His Seat.” Frank J. Cannon made the following statement concerning this matter:

The first oracular disclosure made by the Prophets, on the witness stand, came as a shock even to Utah. They testified that they had resumed polygamous cohabitation to an extent unsuspected by either gentiles or Mormons. President Joseph F. Smith admitted that he had had eleven children borne to him by his five wives, since pledging himself to obey the “revealed” manifesto of 1890 forbidding polygamous relations. Apostle Francis Marion Lyman, who was next in succession to the Presidency, made a similar admission of guilt, though in a lesser degree. So did John Henry Smith and Charles W. Penrose, apostles. So did Brigham H. Roberts and George Reynolds, Presidents of Seventies. So did a score of others among the lesser authorities. And they confessed that they were living in polygamy in violation of their pledges to the nation and the terms of their amnesty, against the laws and the constitution of the state, and contrary to the “revelation of God” by which the doctrine of polygamy had been withdrawn from practice in the Church! . . . Bishop Chas. E. Merrill, the son of an apostle, testified that his father had married him to a plural wife in 1891, and that he had been living with both wives ever since. A Mrs. Clara Kennedy testified that she had been married to a polygamist in 1896, in Juarez, Mexico, by Apostle Brigham Young, Jr., . . . There was testimony to show that Apostle George Teasdale had taken a plural wife six years after the “Manifesto”. . . . It was testified that Apostle John W. Taylor had taken two plural wives within four years, and that Apostle M. F. Cowley had taken one; and both these men fled from the country in order to escape a summons to appear before the Senate Committee. (Under the Prophet in Utah, 1911, pp. 268-270)

Joseph F. Smith, who was the sixth President of the Mormon Church, testified as follows in the Reed Smoot Case:

The CHAIRMAN. Do you obey the law in having five wives at this time, and having them bear to you eleven children since the manifesto of 1890?

Mr. SMITH. Mr. Chairman, I have not claimed that in that case I have obeyed the law of the land.

The CHAIRMAN. That is all.

Mr. SMITH. I do not claim so, and I have said before that I prefer to stand my chances against the law. (Reed Smoot Case, vol. 1, p. 197)

Mr. TAYLER. You say there is a State law forbidding unlawful cohabitation?

Mr. SMITH. That is my understanding.

Mr. TAYLER. And ever since that law was passed you have been violating it?

Mr. SMITH. I think likely I have been practicing the same thing even before the law was passed. (Ibid., p. 130)

The CHAIRMAN. And in not doing it, you are violating the law?

Mr. SMITH. The law of my State?

The CHAIRMAN. Yes.

Mr. SMITH. Yes, sir.

Senator OVERMAN. Is there not a revelation published in the Book of Covenants here that you shall abide by the law of the State?

Mr. SMITH. It includes both unlawful cohabitation and polygamy.

Senator OVERMAN. Is there not a revelation that you shall abide by the laws of the State and of the land?

Mr. SMITH. Yes, sir.

Senator OVERMAN. If that is a revelation, are you not violating the laws of God?

Mr. SMITH. I have admitted that, Mr. Senator, a great many times here. (Ibid., pp. 334-335)

When Senator Hoar was questioning Joseph F. Smith concerning polygamy, Smith finally stated: “I presume I am the greatest culprit” (Reed Smoot Case, vol. 1, p. 312).

B. H. Roberts, the Mormon historian, testified as follows in the “Reed Smoot Case”:

The CHAIRMAN. In living in polygamous cohabitation you are living in defiance of the manifesto of 1890, are you not?

Mr. ROBERTS. Yes, sir; in defiance of the action of the church on the subject.

The CHAIRMAN. And that was divinely inspired, as you understand?

Mr. ROBERTS. I think so.

The CHAIRMAN. And you are living in defiance of the law of the land?

Mr. ROBERTS. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Then you are disregarding both the law of God and of man?

Mr. ROBERTS. I suppose I am. (Reed Smoot Case, vol. 1, p. 718)

Francis M. Lyman, one of the twelve Apostles, testified:

Senator HOAR. Do you not understand that the revelation requiring you to abstain from polygamy comes from God?

Mr. LYMAN Yes, sir.

Senator HOAR. . . . You have said more than once that in living in polygamous relations with your wives, which you do and intend to do, you knew that you were disobeying this revelation?

Mr. LYMAN. Yes, sir.

Senator HOAR. And that in disobeying this revelation you were disobeying the law of God?

Mr. LYMAN. Yes, sir.

Senator HOAR. Very well. So that you say that you, an apostle of your church, expecting to succeed, if you survive Mr. Smith, to the office in which you will be the person to be the medium of Divine revelations, are living and are known to your people to live in disobedience of the law of the land and of the law of God?

Mr. LYMAN. Yes, sir. (Reed Smoot Case, vol. 1, p. 430)

Charles E. Merrill, the son of the Apostle Marriner W. Merrill, testified that he took a plural wife after the Manifesto and that his father performed the ceremony:

Mr. TAYLER. Let me understand. When was it you married your second wife; that is, the second wife you now have?

Mr. MERRILL. In the fall of 1888.

Mr. TAYLER. And the next marriage took place in 1891?

Mr. MERRILL. Yes, sir.

Mr. TAYLER. Who married you in 1891?

Mr. MERRILL. My father.

Mr. TAYLER. When were you married?

Mr. MERRILL. I could not give you the exact date, but it was in March.

Mr. TAYLER 1891?

Mr. MERRILL. Yes, sir.

Mr. TAYLER. Was your father then an apostle?

Mr. MERRILL. Yes, sir. (Reed Smoot Case, vol. 1, pp. 408-409)

Walter M. Wolfe, who was at one time professor of geology at Brigham Young College, claimed that the Apostle John Henry Smith made this statement to him: “Brother Wolfe, don’t you know that the Manifesto is only a trick to beat the devil at his own game?” (Reed Smoot Case, vol. 4, p. 13).

Kimball Young, the sociologist, gives us the following information:

And the daughter of Edward Gilbert, . . . admitted that there were some marriages after the Manifesto and that it seemed to be all right with the Church until the “second warning” in 1904. (Isn’t One Wife Enough? p. 411)

Workman had trouble in getting permission to marry Joan, . . . Arrangements had been made to marry her in late 1890 but before they could do so, Woodruff had issued the Manifesto. When Workman finally got to see President Woodruff, the latter simply said, “You know about the Manifesto.” . . . He was told to wait. Woodruff retired into his inner office and Workman never saw him again.

A little later George Q. Cannon came out of the inner office and talked over the situation, telling him how distressed Woodruff was, that the Church stood to lose all its property by confiscation, and that Woodruff had issued the Manifesto to save the Church for the people. Workman still persisted in his plea but got no decision, neither approval nor disapproval. He then said he would go to Mexico where he could live openly. He did not want to be a lawbreaker.

Workman later got verbal approval from a particular Apostle, . . . He was married in the St. George Temple and he left shortly thereafter for Mexico. . . .

We have just seen that although the Church officially withdrew its approval of plural marriages in 1890, there were sporadic instances of polygamous marriages later. Apparently in most instances the ceremony was performed secretly by some high official, usually an Apostle . . . As a rule a man who had married a plural wife under these circumstances would take her later to a Mormon temple and have her “properly sealed” to him. (Ibid., pp. 419-22)

The Apostle Abraham H. Cannon tells of a man being refused permission to enter polygamy in Mexico because another man had obtained permission to do this and had not kept the matter secret:

In relation to S. F. Ball who desires to go to Mexico and get a fourth wife Father said it could not be done, as such things had ceased to occur even there. One young man who recently had thus had this privilege, came back and allowed the knowledge of it to go out, and thus put the Church in danger. (“Daily Journal of Abraham H. Cannon,” November 2, 1890)

B. Harvey Allred gives this interesting information:

By special appointment, my father met the First Presidency in their office. President Wilford Woodruff, George Q. Cannon, and Joseph F. Smith were all present. Father presented his case, and was told by Wilford Woodruff, that because of the agreement entered into by the approval of the manifesto, no more plural marriages would be sanctioned or solemnized by the Church in the United States. However, inasmuch as that agreement had reference to no other lands where the practice of plural marriage was not prohibited by law, if father wished to obey the law now he would have to go where it could be done without violating the law. Joseph F. Smith then informed father that many Saints had already moved to Mexico for that very purpose, and others were going, that there were at that time several small colonies of the Saints established in that land.

At great sacrifice my father with his families moved to Mexico and there lived, with hundreds of other Saints, the law of plural marriage. (A Leaf In Review, by B. Harvey Allred, 1968 edition, p. 199)

Anthony W. Ivins, who later became a member of the First Presidency of the Mormon Church, was appointed by the Church leaders to perform plural marriages in Mexico after the Manifesto. Stanley S. Ivins, the son of Anthony W. Ivins, told us that his father received instructions after the Manifesto to perform marriages for time and all eternity outside of the Mormon temples. He received a ceremony for these marriages (which Stanley S. Ivins had in his possession). He was sent to Mexico and was told that when the First Presidency wanted a plural marriage performed they would send a letter with the couple who were to be married. Whenever he received these letters from the First Presidency, he knew that it was alright to perform the ceremony. He performed regular marriages as well as plural marriages and kept a record of each marriage in a book. After his father's death Stanley S. Ivins copied the names of those who had been married in polygamy into another book and then gave the original book to the Mormon leaders.

Wallace Turner relates the following:

In Salt Lake City I talked to . . . Stanley S. Ivins, one of the great authorities on Mormon polygamy. His father was Anthony W. Ivins, who was an apostle and was first counselor to President Heber J. Grant.

Anthony Ivins was an elder in the church in the mid-1890s when he was called in and told to go to Mexico to be president of the stake there. He was told that he was to have authority to perform plural marriages for those who were sent to him for that purpose. He would be able to identify them from the letters of introduction they would present, he was told.

After Anthony Ivins died in 1934 at eighty-two years of age, his family found the records of these marriages among his papers. They were turned over to the LDS church. More than fifty polygamous marriages were easily identifiable, beginning in June, 1897, when three men from Utah were married at Juarez, just across from El Paso. They had crossed over into Mexico just for the marriage ceremony, then went back into the United States. However, Ivins refused to perform marriages for the regular population of the Mormon colonies because the men lacked the letters from Salt Lake City which he considered to be his authority for the ceremony. However, by 1898 polygamous marriages were being performed routinely in Mexico by other Mormon leaders. (The Mormon Establishment, by Wallace Turner, 1966, p. 187)

According to Stanley S. Ivins, his father was very conscientious about the letters which those who wished to enter into polygamy were supposed to obtain from the First Presidency. Once a very prominent Mormon, who was already married, came to Mexico with another woman and asked to be married in polygamy. Anthony Ivins asked for the letter from the First Presidency. The man stated that he did not have a letter. Mr. Ivins stated that he could not perform the ceremony unless he received a letter from the First Presidency. The man then asked for a place to stay. Anthony Ivins told him that he had only one extra room but that it had two beds. The man replied that that was alright for he and the woman had been living as husband and wife since they started their journey to Mexico. This answer made Mr. Ivins angry, and he asked them to stay elsewhere.

Another man who was living in Mexico came to Anthony Ivins and asked him to marry a plural wife to him. Mr. Ivins asked for the letter. The reply was that he didn't have one. Because he did not have the letter Mr. Ivins refused to perform the marriage. Later two of the Mormon apostles came down to Mexico and asked Anthony Ivins to perform the plural marriage for the man. He still refused to perform the ceremony without a letter from the First Presidency. After the apostles left the man and woman commenced living together as husband and wife. From then on the special letters were not required. Stanley Ivins claims that his father continued to perform plural marriages for the church until the year 1904.

In the Reed Smoot Case Walter M. Wolfe testified as follows:

Mr. WOLFE. In the summer of 1897 I was in Colorado. On my return, at the beginning of the school year, I found that Ovena Jorgensen was not in attendance. She returned to school some time during the month of October. Shortly after her return, she came to my house and asked to see me privately. She said: "Brother Wolfe, I have something that I must tell you, the reason why I have been late in coming back to school. I have been married." I said, "Not in polygamy." She said: "Yes, sir; in polygamy. I have married Brother Okey."

The CHAIRMAN. What year was that, professor.

Mr. WOLFE. This was in October, 1897.

Mr. WORTHINGTON. That she told you this?

Mr. WOLFE. This is her story to me.

Mr. WORTHINGTON. I say, it was in October, 1897, that she told you?

Mr. WOLFE. Yes, sir. I asked her how it had happened, and she said that some years before she had gone into service at the house of this man Okey; that he had loved her and she loved him. He had asked her to marry him and she had declined, saying that it was impossible on account of the manifesto, but she had promised that she would marry no one else. Mr. Okey visited President Woodruff several times, I should judge from her conversation, and each time was refused his request that he marry the girl. In August, 1897, Okey and the girl went together to see President Wilford Woodruff, and they laid the case before him. He brushed them aside with a wave of his hand and said he would have nothing to do with the matter, but referred them to President George Q. Cannon. George Q. Cannon asked if the girl had been through the Temple and received her endowments. They told him no. He said that that must be done first and then he would see as to the rest of it. They went through the Temple and the girl received her endowments. Then they were given a letter by President George Q. Cannon to President Ivins, of the Juarez Stake, and they went to Mexico.

The CHAIRMAN. Who was this letter to?

Mr. WOLFE. President A. W. Ivins, of the Juarez Stake.

The CHAIRMAN. Mexico?

Mr. WOLFE. Mexico; yes, sir. They went to Mexico, and there the girl told me the marriage ceremony was performed, and they returned to Utah.

Mr. CARLISLE. This statement that you have made is the statement she made to you?

Mr. WOLFE. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. You say they were given a letter to the president. What do you mean by that? What president?

Mr. WOLFE. President Ivins. The Mormon Church geographically is divided into stakes very much as the States of the Union are divided into counties. (The Reed Smoot Case, 1906, vol. 4, pp. 10-11)

Stanley S. Ivins confirmed the fact that his father, Anthony W. Ivins, performed the marriage ceremony, and his father recorded this fact in his record book.

Stanley Ivins stated that Walter Wolfe's testimony concerning this marriage hurt the church's image so much that the First Presidency of the church sent Anthony Ivins a letter requesting him to go back to Washington, D.C. and give false testimony before the Committee on Privileges and Elections of the United States Senate. The First Presidency of the Mormon Church actually wanted him to lie under oath and state that he did not perform the ceremony. Stanley Ivins stated that his father refused to go back to Washington, D. C. and lie about the marriage, even if Walter Wolfe's testimony did damage the image of the church.

Frank J. Cannon, the son of George Q. Cannon and formerly United States Senator from Utah, gives this important information:

Late in July, 1896, when I was in New York on business for the Presidency, I received a telegram announcing the death of my brother, Apostle Abraham H. Cannon. . . . I realized that my father would have a greater stroke of sorrow to bear than I; . . .

I found him and Joseph F. Smith in the office of the Presidency, . . . He rose and put his hand on my shoulder with a tenderness that it was his habit to conceal. "I know how you feel his loss," he said hoarsely, "but when I think what he would have had to pass through if he had lived—I cannot regret his death." . . .

With a sweep of his hand toward Smith at his desk—a gesture and a look the most unkind I ever saw him use—he answered: “A few weeks ago, Abraham took a plural wife, Lillian Hamlin. It became known. He would have had to face a prosecution in Court. His death has saved us from a calamity that would have been dreadful for the Church—and for the state.”

“Father!” I cried. “Has this thing come back again! And the ink hardly dry on the bill that restored your church property on the pledge of honor that there would never be another case—” I had caught the look on Smith’s face, and it was a look of sullen defiance. “How did it happen?”

My father replied: “I know—it’s awful. I would have prevented it if I could. I was asked for my consent, and I refused it. President Smith obtained the acquiescence of President Woodruff, on the plea that it wasn’t an ordinary case of polygamy but merely a fulfilment of the biblical instruction that a man should take his dead brother’s wife. Lillian was betrothed to David, and had been sealed to him in eternity after his death. I understand that President Woodruff told Abraham he would leave the matter with them if he wished to take the responsibility—and President Smith performed the ceremony.”

Smith could hear every word that was said. My father had included him in the conversation, and he was listening. He not only did not deny his guilt; he accepted it in silence, with an expression of sulky disrespect.

He did not deny it later, when the whole community had learned of it. He went with Apostle John Henry Smith to see Mr. P. H. Lannan, proprietor of the Salt Lake Tribune, to ask him not to attack the Church for this new and shocking violation of its covenant. . . . I do not know all that the Smiths said to him; but I know that the conversation assumed that Joseph F. Smith had performed the marriage ceremony; I know that neither of the Smiths made any attempt to deny the assumption; and I know that Joseph F. Smith sought to placate Mr. Lannan by promising “it shall not occur again.” . . .

All of which did not prevent Joseph F. Smith from testifying—in the Smoot investigation at Washington in 1904—that he did not marry Abraham Cannon and Lillian Hamlin, that he did not have any conversation with my father about the marriage, . . .

If this first polygamous marriage had been the last—if it were an isolated and peculiar incident as the Smiths then claimed it was and promised it should be—it might be forgiven as generously now as Mr. Lannan then forgave it. But, about the same time there became public another case—that of Apostle Teasdale—and as this narrative shall prove, here was the beginning of a policy of treachery which the present church leaders, under Joseph F. Smith, have since consistently practised, in defiance of the laws of the state and the “revelation of God,” with lies and evasions, with perjury and its subornation, in violation of the most solemn pledges to the country, and through the agency of a political tyranny that makes serious prosecution impossible and immunity a public boast. (Under the Prophet in Utah, pp. 176-179)

John Henry Hamlin, the brother of Lillian Hamlin, testified as follows in the “Reed Smoot Case”:

Mr. TAYLER. What relation are you to Lillian Hamlin?

Mr. HAMLIN. Brother.

Mr. TAYLER. And whom did she marry?

Mr. HAMLIN. I only know what I heard.

Mr. TAYLER. What was your family conviction and understanding about that?

Mr. HAMLIN. That she was married to a Mr. Cannon.

Mr. TAYLER. What was his first name?

Mr. HAMLIN. Abram.

Mr. TAYLER. An apostle of the church?

Mr. HAMLIN. I believe so. I understand so.

Mr. TAYLER. That was in the summer of 1896, was it not?

Mr. HAMLIN. Yes, sir.

Mr. TAYLER. And where did you understand she was married?

Mr. HAMLIN. On the Pacific coast.

Mr. TAYLER. By whom?

Mr. HAMLIN. Well, our understanding was that President Joseph F. Smith married her. (Reed Smoot Case, vol. 2, pp. 67-68)

Mrs. Wilhelmina C. Ellis, who had been a plural wife of the Mormon Apostle Abraham H. Cannon, testified:

Mr. TAYLER. How old were you when you married Abraham Cannon?

Mrs. ELLIS. Nineteen.

Mr. TAYLER. You were a plural wife?

Mrs. ELLIS. Yes, sir.

. . . .

Mr. TAYLER. When did he marry Lillian Hamlin?

Mrs. ELLIS. I do not know the date.

Mr. TAYLER. I do not care about the exact date.

Mrs. ELLIS. After June 12 and before July 2.

Mr. TAYLER. Of what year?

Mrs. ELLIS. 1896.

Mr. TAYLER. He was at that time an Apostle?

Mrs. ELLIS. Yes, sir.

. . . .

Mr. TAYLER. Did he say he was going away that day, or that evening, to California?

Mrs. ELLIS. He told me to pack his grip or his satchel and told me he was going on this trip.

Mr. TAYLER. What did he say about Miss Hamlin?

Mrs. ELLIS. Of course I understood, in fact he said she was going with him and President Smith.

Mr. TAYLER. And President Smith?

Mrs. ELLIS. Yes, sir.

Mr. TAYLER. And that they were going to be married?

Mrs. ELLIS. Yes, sir.

Mr. TAYLER. . . . What did Mr. Cannon say to you shortly before his death about his having married Miss Hamlin?

Mrs. ELLIS. He told me he had married her and asked my forgiveness.

Mr. TAYLER. What else did he say about it?

Mrs. ELLIS. He said he had never had a well day since he had married her. I think it killed him.

Mr. TAYLER. You have stated, have you not, Mrs. Ellis, to several of your relatives and acquaintances in Salt Lake that he also told you that Joseph F. Smith married him?

Mrs. ELLIS. No, sir; I have never said that.

Mr. TAYLER. You have never said that?

Mrs. ELLIS. No, sir; not that he told me.

Mr. TAYLER. You have stated frequently that Joseph F. Smith did marry them?

Mrs. ELLIS. Yes, sir.

Mr. TAYLER. Did you not know they were married on the high sea?

Mrs. ELLIS. Only from reports.

Mr. TAYLER. That is not an essential part of the inquiry. [To the witness.] It was an inference from the fact that your husband said he was going to marry her, and went away to California for that purpose, and that Joseph F. Smith went along with them. From that you inferred that Joseph F. Smith had married them?

Mrs. ELLIS. Yes, sir.

(Reed Smoot Case, vol. 2, pp. 141-144)

“Manifesto a Deception”

The Committee on Privileges and Elections submitted a report in which the following was stated:

A sufficient number of specific instances of the taking of plural wives since the manifesto of 1890, so called, have been shown by the testimony as having taken place among officials of the Mormon Church to demonstrate the fact that the leaders in this church, the first presidency and the twelve apostles, connive at the practice of taking plural wives and have done so ever since the manifesto was issued which purported to put an end to the practice. It has been shown by the testimony, so clearly as to leave no doubt of the fact, that as late as 1896 one Lillian Hamlin became the plural wife of Abraham H. Cannon, who was then an apostle of the Mormon Church. . . . it was generally reputed in the community and understood by the families of both Abraham H. Cannon and Lillian Hamlin that a marriage had taken place between them; that they had been married on the high seas by Joseph F. Smith. Lillian Hamlin assumed the name of Cannon, and a child to which she afterwards gave birth bears the name of Cannon and inherited a share of the estate of Abraham H. Cannon. The prominence of Abraham H. Cannon in the church, the publicity given to the fact of his taking Lillian Hamlin as a plural wife, render it practically impossible that this should have been done without the knowledge, the consent, and the connivance of the headship of that Church.

George Teasdale, another apostle of the Mormon Church, contracted a plural marriage with Marion Scholes since the manifesto of 1890. The president of the Mormon Church endeavors to excuse this act upon the pretext that the first marriage of George Teasdale was not a legal marriage, but the testimony taken from the divorce proceedings which separated George Teasdale from his lawful wife, wholly controverts this assertion on the part of President Smith.

It is also in evidence that Walter Steed, a prominent Mormon, contracted a plural marriage after the manifesto of 1890. Charles E. Merrill, a bishop of the Mormon Church, took a plural wife in 1891, more than a year after the issuing of the manifesto. The ceremony . . . was performed by his father, who was then and until the time of his death an apostle in the Mormon Church. It is also shown that John W. Taylor, another apostle of the Mormon Church, has been married to two plural wives since the issuing of the so-called manifesto.

Matthias F. Cowley, another of the twelve apostles, has also taken one or more plural wives since the manifesto. . . . Apostles Taylor and Cowley, instead of appearing before the committee and denying the allegation, evade service of process issued by the committee for their appearance, and refuse to appear after being requested to do so, warrant the conclusion that the allegation is true and that said Taylor and Cowley have taken plural wives since the manifesto. . . .

It is also proved that about the year 1896 James Francis Johnson was married to a plural wife, Clara Mabel Barber, the ceremony in this instance being performed by an apostle of the Mormon Church. To these cases must be added that of Marriner W. Merrill, another apostle; J. M. Tanner, Superintendent of Church Schools; Benjamin Cluff, jr., President of Brigham Young University; Thomas Chamberlain, counselor to the president of a stake; Bishop Rathall, John Silver, Winslow Farr, Heber Benion, Samuel S. Newton, a man named Okey, who contracted a plural marriage with Ovena Jorgensen in the year 1897, and Morris Michelson about the year 1902. In the case of Benjamin Cluff, jr., before referred to, the polygamous marriage was tacitly sanctioned by President Joseph F. Smith when he "referred to Sister Cluff and the work she had been doing among the children in Colonial Diaz, Mexico."

It is morally impossible that all these violations of the laws of the State of Utah by the contracting of plural marriages could have been committed without the knowledge of the first presidency and the twelve apostles of the Mormon Church. In two of the above cases, that of George Teasdale and that of Benjamin Cluff, jr., the fact of the plural marriage was directly communicated to the president of the church, Joseph F. Smith, . . . Furthermore, it was shown by the testimony of one of the twelve apostles and of other witnesses that "under the established law of the church no person could secure a plural wife except by consent of the president of the church."

SUPPRESSION OF TESTIMONY BY MORMON LEADERS.

It is a fact of no little significance in itself, bearing on the question whether polygamous marriages have been recently contracted in Utah by the connivance of the first presidency and twelve apostles of the Mormon Church, that the authorities of said church have endeavored to suppress, and have succeeded in suppressing, a great deal of testimony by which the fact of plural marriages contracted by those who were high in the councils of the church might have been established beyond the shadow of a doubt. Before the investigation had begun it was well known in Salt Lake City that it was expected to show on the part of the protestants that Apostles George Teasdale, John W. Taylor, and M. F. Cowley, and also Prof. J. M. Tanner, Samuel Newton and others who were all high officials of the Mormon Church had recently taken plural wives, and that in 1896 Lillian Hamlin was sealed to Apostle Abraham H. Cannon as a plural wife by one of the first presidency and twelve apostles of the Mormon Church. All, or nearly all, of these persons except Abraham H. Cannon, who was deceased, were then within reach of service of process from the committee. But shortly before the investigation began all these witnesses went out of the country.

Subpoenas were issued for each one of the witnesses named, but in the case of Samuel Newton only could the process of the committee be served. Mr. Newton refused to obey the order of the committee, alleging no reason or excuse for not appearing. It is shown that John W. Taylor was sent out of the country by Joseph F. Smith on a real or pretended mission for the church. And it is undeniably true that not only the apostles, but also all other officials of the Mormon Church, are at all times subject to the orders of the governing authorities of the church.

It would be nothing short of self-stultification for one to believe that all these most important witnesses chanced to leave the United States at about the same time and without reference to the investigation. All the facts and circumstances surrounding the transaction point to the conclusion that every one of the witnesses named left the country at the instance of the rulers of the Mormon Church and to avoid testifying before the committee. It is, furthermore, a fact which can not be questioned that every one of these witnesses is under the direction and control of the first presidency and twelve apostles of the Mormon Church. Had those officials seen fit to direct the witnesses named to return to the United States and give their testimony before the committee, they would have been obliged to do so. The reason why the said witnesses left the country and have refused to come before the committee is easy to understand, in view of the testimony showing the contracting of plural marriages by prominent officials of the Mormon Church within the past few years.

It was claimed by the protestants that the records kept in the Mormon temple at Salt Lake City and Logan would disclose the fact that plural marriages have been contracted in Utah since the manifesto with the sanction of the officials of the church. A witness who was required to bring the records in the temple at Salt Lake City refused to do so after consulting with President Smith. . . .

The witness who was required to bring the records kept in the temple at Logan excused himself from attending on the plea of ill health. But the important part of the mandate of the committee—the production of the records—was not obeyed by sending the records, which could easily have been done.

In the case of other witnesses who were believed to have contracted plural marriages since the year 1890 all sorts of shifts, tricks, and evasions were resorted to in order to avoid service of a subpoena to appear before the committee and testify.

These instances of the suppression of testimony by the direct order or tacit consent of the ruling authorities of the Mormon Church warrant the committee in believing that the suppressed testimony would, if produced, strongly corroborate the testimony which was given, showing that those who direct the affairs of the Mormon Church countenance and encourage polygamous marriages, as well as polygamous cohabitation, and that the allegations of the protestants in that regard are true.

Aside from this it was shown by the testimony, and in such a way that the fact could not possibly be controverted, that a majority of those who give the law to the Mormon Church are now, and have been for years, living in open, notorious, and shameless polygamous cohabitation. The list of those who are thus guilty of violating the laws of the state and the rules of public decency is headed by Joseph F. Smith, the first president, “prophet, seer, and revelator” of the Mormon Church, who testified in regard to that subject . . .

The list also includes George Teasdale, an apostle; John Henry Smith, an apostle; Marriner W. Merrill, also an apostle; Heber J. Grant, an apostle; M. F. Cowley, an apostle; Charles W. Penrose, an apostle; and Francis M. Lyman, who is not only an apostle, but the probable successor of Joseph F. Smith as president of the church. Thus it appears that the first president and eight of the twelve apostles, a considerable majority of the ruling authorities of the Mormon Church, are noted polygamists.

In addition to these, the list includes Brigham H. Roberts, who is one of the presidents of seventies and a leading official of the church; J. M. Tanner, Superintendent of the Church Schools; Andrew Jenson, assistant historian of the church; Thomas H. Merrill, a bishop of the church; Alma Merrill, one of the presidency of a church stake; Angus M. Cannon, patriarch of the Mormon Church; a man named Greenwald, who is at the head of a church school; George Reynolds, one of the first seven presidents of seventies and first assistant superintendent of Sunday schools of the world; George H. Brimhall, President of Brigham Young University; and Joseph Hickman, teacher in Brigham Young University. All the officials named were appointed, either directly or indirectly, by the first presidency and twelve apostles; and in the case of J. M. Tanner, his appointment to his present office was made after he had been compelled to resign his position as president of the agricultural college because of the fact that he was a polygamist.

These facts abundantly justify the assertion made in the protest that “the supreme authorities in the church, of whom Senator-elect Reed Smoot is one, to wit, the first presidency and twelve apostles, not only connive at violation of, but protect and honor the violators of the laws against polygamy and polygamous cohabitation.”

It will be seen by the foregoing that not only do the first presidency and twelve apostles encourage polygamy by precept and teaching, but that a majority of the members of that body of rulers of the Mormon people give the practice of polygamy still further and greater encouragement by living the lives of polygamists, and this openly and in the sight of all their followers in the Mormon Church. It can not be doubted that this method of encouraging polygamy is much more efficacious than the teaching of that crime by means of the writings and publications of the leaders of the church, and this upon the familiar principle that “actions speak louder than words.”

And not only do the president and a majority of the twelve apostles of the Mormon Church practice polygamy, but in the case of each and every one guilty of this crime who testified before the committee, the determination was expressed openly and defiantly to continue the commission of this crime without regard to the mandates of the law or the prohibition contained in the manifesto. And it is in evidence that the said first president, addressing a large concourse of the members of the Mormon Church at the tabernacle in Salt Lake City in the month of June, 1904, declared that if he were to discontinue the polygamous relation with his plural wives he should be forever damned, and forever deprived of the companionship of God and those most dear to him throughout eternity. Thus it appears that the “prophet, seer, and revelator” of the Mormon Church pronounces a decree of eternal condemnation throughout all eternity upon all members of the Mormon Church who, having taken plural wives, fail to continue the polygamous relation. So that the testimony upon that subject, taken as a whole, can leave no doubt upon any reasonable mind that the allegations in the protest are true, and that those who are in authority in the Mormon Church, of whom Mr. Smoot is one, are encouraging the practice of polygamy among the members of that church, and that polygamy is being practiced to such an extent as to call for the severest condemnation in all legitimate ways.

THE MANIFESTO A DECEPTION.

Against these facts the authorities of the Mormon Church urge that in the year 1890 what is generally termed a manifesto was issued by the first presidency of that church, suspending the practice of polygamy among the members of that church. It may be said in the first place that this manifesto misstates the facts in regard to the solemnization of plural marriages within a short period preceding the issuing of the manifesto. It now appears that in a number of instances plural marriages had been solemnized in the Mormon Church, and, in the case of those high in authority in that church, within a very few months preceding the issuing of the manifesto. (Reed Smoot Case, vol. 4, pp. 476-482)

Frank J. Cannon made this interesting statement:

Some few years ago, Irving Sayford, . . . asked Mr. P. H. Lannan, of the Salt Lake Tribune, why someone did not swear out warrants against President Smith for his offences against the law. Mr. Lannan said:

You mean why don't I do it? . . . Well, I'll tell you why. . . . I don't make a complaint, because neither the district attorney nor the prosecuting attorney would entertain it. If he did entertain it and issued a warrant, the sheriff would refuse to serve the warrant. If the sheriff served the warrant, there would be no witnesses unless I got them. If I could get the witnesses, they wouldn't testify to the facts on the stand. If they did testify to the facts, the jury wouldn't bring in a verdict of guilty. If the jury did bring in a verdict of guilty, the judge would suspend sentence. If the judge did not suspend sentence, he would merely fine President Smith, three hundred dollars. And within twenty-four hours there would be a procession of Mormons and Gentiles crawling on their hands and knees to Church headquarters to offer to pay that three hundred dollar fine at a dime apiece.

Mr. Lannan's statement of the case was later substantiated by an action of the Salt Lake District Court. Upon the birth of the twelfth child that had been borne to President Smith in plural marriage since the manifesto of 1890, Charles Mostyn Owen made complaint in the District Court at Salt Lake, charging Mr. Smith with a statutory offence. The District Attorney reduced the charge to “unlawful cohabitation” (a misdemeanor), without the complainant's consent or knowledge. All the preliminaries were then graciously arranged and President Smith appeared in the District Court by appointment. He pleaded guilty. The judge in sentencing him remarked that as this was the first time he had appeared before the court, he would be fined three hundred dollars, but that should he again appear, the penalty might be different. Smith had already testified in Washington, before the Senate Committee, to the birth of eleven children in plural marriage since he had given his covenant to the country to cease living in polygamy; he had practically defied the Senate and the United States to punish him; he had said that he would “stand his chances” before the law and courts of his own state. All of this was well known to the judge who fined him three hundred dollars—a sum of money scarcely equal to the amount of Smith's official income for the time he was in court! (Under the Prophet in Utah, pp. 354-356)

It was sixteen years after the Manifesto was issued when Joseph F. Smith, the sixth President of the Mormon Church, was finally brought to trial for unlawful cohabitation. The following appeared in the Deseret News:

... President Smith appeared forthwith and entered a plea of guilty and was fined three hundred dollars. The fine was promptly paid and the defendant discharged. (Deseret Evening News, November 23, 1906)

Heber J. Grant, who served as the seventh President of the Mormon Church from 1918 until 1945, was also convicted of unlawful cohabitation after the manifesto was issued. This occurred in 1899—nine years after Woodruff issued the Manifesto (see the Daily Tribune, September 9, 1899). In 1903 Heber J. Grant fled from the country to avoid being arrested. Charles Mostyn Owen testified as follows:

The CHAIRMAN. Where did you say Grant was?

Mr. OWEN. Grant is in England.

The CHAIRMAN. When did he go to England?

Mr. OWEN. He left suddenly on the night of the 10th of November last year—1903.

Mr. OWEN. About the 5th or 6th of November he made a statement before the students of the State University at Salt Lake City, in which he held out in a very objectionable manner his association with two women as his wives. I was absent from the city on that day, but on my return I immediately went to work to find if I could get evidence of these statements as printed in the paper. I got the evidence in a shape which was satisfactory to me, and I went before the county attorney and swore to an information for him, and a warrant was issued on that information. Before Mr. Grant was served, however, he left the country.

The CHAIRMAN. When did he leave as to the time of the issuing of the warrant?

Mr. OWEN. When I next heard of him he was in Salt Lake—that afternoon, I understood—but he got on the train at Provo that night about midnight.

The CHAIRMAN. Where were those statements made to the students of the university?

Mr. OWEN. In an assembly organized or called together for the purpose of organizing or helping an alumni association.

The CHAIRMAN. What were the statements?

Mr. OWEN. That he regretted that the rules of the association were such that no single subscription of greater than $50 could be received, but to show his interest in the association he would give them $50 for himself and $50 for "each of my wives; and I have got two wives, and I would have a third, if it were not for the law."

The CHAIRMAN. Has he returned since that time?

Mr. OWEN. No, sir.

Senator PETTUS. Is he still an apostle?

Mr. OWEN. Yes, sir. (Reed Smoot Case, vol. 2, pp. 401-402)

Polygamy in Utah Today

Because of the insincerity of the Mormon leaders after the Manifesto thousands of people in Utah are still living in polygamy. Russell R. Rich stated:

... it appears that it was difficult to convince all members of the Church that the Church leaders were sincere in their efforts to halt this practice. (Brigham Young University Leadership Week, Those Who Would Be Leaders, p. 71)

Kimball Young made this statement concerning the fact that polygamy is still being practiced:

It may well be that the Short Creek community will be liquidated. Yet it is a reasonable guess that undercover preaching and practicing of plural marriage will continue among such dissident Mormon groups. There is evidence that polygamy is being practiced in Mormon settlements in Canada and Mexico. Moreover, there is more than mere rumor to the stories that the system is secretly in operation even in Salt Lake City and other cities in Utah. (Isn't One Wife Enough? p. 438)

The Mormon writer John J. Stewart gives us the following information regarding current polygamist groups:

Secondly, Satan is exploiting the doctrine and history of plural marriage in our Church by persuading many men and women to rebel against current Church policy on the matter, and thus forfeit their membership in the Church and Kingdom of God. More than seventy years after the first Manifesto was issued, as a step in suspending the practice of plural marriage, apostate sects are mushrooming throughout Mormondom in greater numbers than ever before, with the basic doctrine that plural marriage must be lived regardless of what the Church policy is. (Brigham Young and His Wives, p. 15)

The following appeared in Newsweek Magazine in 1955:

The Mormons officially abandoned polygamy as a doctrine. But a fundamentalist sect continues to believe in and practice plural marriage. In 1944, a Federal-State drive against the Fundamentalists resulted in 50 arrests. About a year ago, officials arrested most of the male population of the little town of Short Creek. The drives had little effect; men served their jail terms and returned to their wives and children.

This week, state and county officials in Salt Lake City, in nearby Bountiful, and in most of Utah's major urban spots were off on another polyg crackdown but were not faring very well. In three weeks they had rounded up only four men: . . .

The polyg hunters were getting little cooperation from sympathetic Utahans. Citizens were irked by the fact that the drive against the Fundamentalist sect was being financed by a $20,000 appropriation made by the 1954 legislature—a secret appropriation never revealed to press and public. Secondly, many a Utah Mormon takes quiet pride in his polygamous forebears and is inclined to be lenient toward the Fundamentalists.

Furthermore, reasonable estimates of the male Fundamentalists run as high as 2,000. Adding in the average number of wives and children, Utah polygamists may well number 20,000. As State Attorney General, E. R. Callister admitted last week: "Utah's jails aren't big enough to hold them all." (Newsweek, November 21, 1955, pp. 98-99)

Wallace Turner, writing for the New York Times, stated:

The problem of polygamy—for half a century a cardinal principle of Mormonism—has taken a number of members out of the church. One expert estimates that as many as 30,000 men, women and children live in families in which polygamy is practiced. . . .

Many live in and near Salt Lake City. Hundreds are concentrated in an isolated Arizona town, Colorado City. Others are scattered through the mountain West and in Mexico. (The New York Times, December 27, 1965, p. 18)

The Mormon writer Leonard J. Arrington claims that the estimate of 30,000 people living in polygamous families is a "far-fetched estimate" (Dialogue: A Journal of Mormon Thought, Winter 1966, p. 121). Ben Merson, on the other hand, seems to feel that more than 30,000 people are involved:

In Utah . . . the practice of polygamy has never ceased. It is more widespread than ever. And increasing year by year.

In metropolitan Salt Lake City alone, 10,000 are living in plural marriage. . . .

"Today in Utah," declares William M. Rogers, former special assistant to the State Attorney General, "there are more polygamous families than in the days of Brigham Young. At least 30,000 men, women and children in this state are now living in plural households and the number is rapidly increasing.” Thousands more live in the adjoining states of Idaho, Nevada, Wyoming, Colorado, New Mexico and Arizona—plus sizable populations in Oregon, California, Canada and Mexico.

The majority live in Utah. And, says Rogers, neither the state law, which punishes polygamy with a one- to four-year prison term, nor the Mormon church, which prohibits it on pain of excommunication, has been able to stem the rising tide of plural marriage. . . .

Strangely, it also remains the chief obstacle to law enforcement. For 72 percent of Utah’s 900,000 citizens are Mormon. And while most practice monogamy, they are aware of their polygamous heritage. Many are descendants of plural families. “This, coupled with the Mormon history of persecution,” says Rogers, “makes them sympathetic toward the Fundamentalists. They feel that prison—and excommunication—is too harsh a penalty. And they refuse to testify against their polygamous neighbors.”

So do the non-Mormons, who are referred to as Gentiles. . . .

More common are excommunications. But not because of any official witch-hunting by the L.D.S. church. It acts only when offenses are brought to its attention. (Ladies’ Home Journal, June 1967, p. 78)

Those who believe in practicing polygamy today are usually known as “Fundamentalists,” because they claim to go back to the fundamental doctrines of Mormonism.

Taylor’s 1886 Revelation

The “Fundamentalists” claim that John Taylor, the third president of the Mormon Church, gave a revelation on September 27, 1886, which stated that the Lord would not revoke the law concerning polygamy. In this revelation the Lord supposedly stated:

My son John. You have asked me concerning the new & everlasting covenant how far it is binding upon my peop[le]

Thus saith the Lord All commandments that I give must be obeyed by those calling themselves by my name unless they are revoked by me or by my authority, and how can I revoke an everlasting covenant; for I the Lord am everlasting & my everlasting covenants cannot be abrogated nor done away with; but they stand for ever. Have I not given my word in great plainness on this subject? Yet have not great numbers of my people been negligent in the observance of my law & the keeping of my commandment and yet have I borne with them these many years & this because of their weakness because of the perilous times & furthermore, it is more pleasing to me that men should use their free agency in regard to these matters. Nevertheless I the Lord do not change & my word & my covenants & my law do not & as I have heretofore said by my servant Joseph All those who would enter into my glory must & shall obey my law & have I not commanded men that if they were Abraham’s seed & would enter into my glory, they must do the works of Abraham. I have not revoked this law nor will I for it is everlasting & those who will enter into my glory must obey the conditions thereof, even so Amen. (A revelation given by John Taylor, dated September 27, 1886, photocopy of the original appears in 1886 Revelation—A Revelation of the Lord to John Taylor, published by the “Fundamentalists.”)

Although the present-day Mormon leaders reject the revelation, one of the Mormon apostles, Melvin J. Ballard, admitted, in a letter dated December 31, 1934, that there was such a revelation and that it was undoubtedly in the handwriting of John Taylor:

The pretended revelation of President John Taylor never had his signature added to it but was written in the form of a revelation and undoubtedly was in his handwriting; nevertheless it was never submitted to his own associates in the Presidency and the Twelve nor to the Church and consequently does not bind the Church in any sense. But still there is nothing in the revelation that the Church disputes because the correctness of that principle is set forth with emphasis, and the Church has never disputed the truthfulness of the 132nd Section when the right to practice that principle has been sanctioned by the Lord and the Church.

And if the Lord had wanted plural marriage to continue according to the interpretations some give of President Taylor’s revelation, he would have allowed President Taylor to have lived and enforced it but He took him and raised up President Wilford Woodruff who was inspired to give the Manifesto that stopped the practice of plural marriage. (Letter from L.D.S. Apostle Melvin J. Ballard to Mr. Eslie D. Jenson, December 31, 1934, quoted in The Star of Truth, July, 1955, p. 227)

If the Mormon Church leaders were to use the same reasoning with regard to Joseph Smith’s revelation on polygamy (Doctrine and Covenants, Sec. 132), they would have to reject it, for it does not have his signature at the bottom, neither was it presented to the church in his lifetime. If this revelation is “undoubtedly” in the handwriting of John Taylor, as Apostle Ballard claims, then it should be considered even more binding than section 132, since that revelation is only a copy (not in the handwriting of Joseph Smith) of the original that Emma Smith burned.

While Apostle Ballard does not attempt to deny that the revelation is in the handwriting of John Taylor, the First Presidency of the Mormon Church at one time issued an “Official Statement” which claimed that “no such a revelation exists”:

As to this pretended revelation it should be said that the archives of the Church contain no such a revelation; the archives contain no record of any such a revelation, nor any evidence justifying a belief that any such a revelation was ever given. From the personal knowledge of some of us, from the uniform and common recollection of the presiding quorums of the Church, from the absence in the Church archives of any evidence whatsoever justifying any belief that such a revelation was given, we are justified in affirming that no such a revelation exists. (As quoted in 1886 Revelation—A Revelation of the Lord to John Taylor)

This statement was signed by Heber J. Grant, A. W. Ivins and J. Reuben Clark, Jr. The “Fundamentalists” have printed what is purported to be “excerpts taken from the trial minutes of special meetings of the Twelve Apostles held in the Salt Lake Temple, February 22nd, and March 1st, 1911.” These “excerpts” seem to show that the Mormon leaders were well aware of the revelation and that the statement by the First Presidency was completely false:

Apostle John W. Taylor: My father received a revelation which however was never presented to the Church, and I refer to this not because it was a revelation to my father; I don’t think a revelation because it came through him was any greater than one received through any other president of the Church, but because it seems to pertain to this question.

Apostle John W. Taylor: There are two things I am drawing your attention to. I am not in politics and very little in the Church, but I do this as a matter of privilege. This revelation is either true or false. Assuming that it is true, it seems to me that it would be better to offer leniency on the side of the Lord if you are going to offer any leniency, than on the side of politics. . . . Brother Lyman what do you think of the revelation to my father?

President Francis M. Lyman: If you ask me if I believe in the plurality of wives, I would say that I believe it is true and will always be so, but the Lord may suspend the practice of it, . . . I am living with my wives now all the time, . . . I have no fault to find with the revelation.

President Francis M. Lyman: When did you find this revelation?

Apostle John W. Taylor: I found it on his desk immediately after his death, when I was appointed administrator of his estate . . .

President Francis M. Lyman: Do you think anyone can solemnize plural marriages with authority now?

Apostle John W. Taylor: I feel under certain circumstances they could, but it would depend on the circumstances.

Apostle Charles W. Penrose: What are your views with regard to that revelation?

Apostle John W. Taylor: I am not the one to pass upon that revelation. I think you are the ones to do that.

Apostle Anthony W. Ivins: Do you know how extensively this revelation has been circulated in times past and has guided people in their actions in this regard?

Apostle John W. Taylor: Brother Joseph Robinson came to me and asked for a copy of it upon the suggestion of Brother Cowley and he got it from Brother Cowley and he got it from Brother Badger. Brother Joseph F. Smith Jr. also got a copy but I don't know how many have got copies from these.

President Francis M. Lyman: The date of this revelation is September 1886, four years before the manifesto of President Woodruff and I remember at that time that President Taylor and all his brethren were very strongly entrenched in the principle of plural marriage. From 1880 to 1890 men were almost commanded to enter it, especially the officials of the Church. We were all pretty well engaged in this question. . . . I would like to ask if you have encouraged others to take plural wives, or taken them yourself or if you think these brethren who have copies of this revelation have taken it as an encouragement, for instance Brother Robinson.

Apostle John W. Taylor: I will answer that by asking if anyone you have had here before you has ever said that I encouraged him.

President Francis M. Lyman: No one except Wolff, and you admit having encouraged him under the direction of a superior officer.

Apostle David O. McKay: I would like to know who the man is that directed you to instruct Brother Wolff to marry a certain party.

Apostle John W. Taylor: I would not wish to take issue with the President of the Church. . . . I went to President Smith's office the other day..and he said that he had never authorized anyone to perform a plural marriage. I am not saying that he is the one to whom I refer, but I do not want to say any more on this point.

Apostle Hyrum M. Smith: I would like Brother Taylor to feel that we are not persuading him or any other man to do them harm but simply to get at the bottom of these matters. I feel that you are responsible for the circulation of that revelation.

Apostle John W. Taylor: I am willing to put in a supplemental answer to the effect that I have never married anyone without the endorsement and authority of the President of the Church and, if you desire, I will give the names of those I have married, but I think this would be unwise. . . . (1886 Revelation—A Revelation of the Lord to John Taylor)

That the First Presidency was not telling the truth when it claimed the revelation didn't exist can be shown by the diary of the Mormon Apostle Abraham H. Cannon, for he shows that the Mormon leaders were well aware of the revelation in the 1890's. Under the date of April 1, 1892, he recorded:

John W. Taylor [an Apostle] spoke in relation to the Manifesto: "I do not know that that thing was right, though I voted to sustain it, and will assist to maintain it; but among my father's papers I found a revelation given him of the Lord, and which is now in my possession, in which the Lord told him that the principle of plural marriage would never be overcome. Pres. Taylor desired to have it suspended, but the Lord would not permit it to be done.—At the close of John W's. remarks our meeting adjourned till tomorrow . . . (Journal of Abraham H. Cannon, April 1, 1892, original at the Brigham Young University)

Apostle John W. Taylor seems to have referred to this revelation on September 30, 1890. Abraham H. Cannon quotes him as saying:

My father when President of the Church sought to find a way to evade the conflict between the Saints and government on the question of plural marriage, but the Lord said it was an eternal and unchangeable law and must stand. (Journal of Abraham H. Cannon, September 30, 1890)

From these statements in Cannon's journal, we can only conclude that the First Presidency were not telling the truth with regard to this revelation when they issued their "Official Statement." The Mormon writer Kenneth W. Godfrey stated:

The family of John Taylor claims that the revelation referred to above was found in the prophet-leader's papers and the original given to the Church historian. Since that time it has not been available to the public and the Church Historian allegedly has declared that it is not in the Church Historian's Library. However Dean Jessee concluded in his study that it is highly probable that such a revelation does exist. (Dialogue: A Journal of Mormon Thought, Autumn 1970, p. 15, n. 10)

The "Fundamentalists" state that John Taylor set apart a number of men, gave them authority to perform marriages and told them to continue the practice of plural marriage. The Mormon Apostle John Henry Smith was willing to admit that John Taylor might have "authorized men to do sealing or marrying of wives to men" outside of the temple, but he claimed that these were only "single marriages" (Reed Smoot Case, vol. 2, pp. 295-296). However this may be, the "Fundamentalists" claim that they have authority today to perform plural marriages, and so the practice of polygamy continues in Utah.

The Dilemma

The Mormon leaders find themselves in a rather strange situation. On the one hand, they have to uphold polygamy as a righteous principle, but on the other, they have to discourage the members of the church from actually entering into its practice. If they repudiated the doctrine of polygamy they would be admitting that Joseph Smith was a deceiver, and that the church was founded on fraud. If, however, they openly preached and defended the doctrine many people would probably enter into the practice and bring disgrace upon the church. Their position is about the same as a person saying "My church believes in water baptism, but we are not allowed to practice it." Because of this peculiar dilemma the church leaders prefer that there is not much discussion of polygamy. Kimball Young stated: "Today the official Church wants to forget that it is a unique and different people. . . . Among other items that they want to forget is the plural marriage system. The general authorities do not like members to talk about polygamy if they can avoid doing so" (Isn't One Wife Enough? p. 456).

The Mormon writer Klaus J. Hansen made this statement:

Admittedly, descendants of polygamous families still proudly acknowledge their heritage; but many Mormons clearly wish it had never happened. A leading historian at the leading state university in Utah for years avoided any mention of the subject; references to it in graduate theses were eradicated with the remark, "Too Controversial!" Preston Nibley, it will be remembered, wrote an entire book on Brigham Young without mentioning the dread word once. (Dialogue: A Journal of Mormon Thought, Summer 1966, p. 107)

To show the confusion of the Mormon leaders in regard to polygamy we have only to quote from a statement made by Bruce R. McConkie, of the First Council of the Seventy. In the same statement he says that millions of people have gained eternal exaltation by the practice of polygamy, that Joseph Smith and other Mormon leaders entered the practice in virtue and purity of heart, that polygamy will be practiced after the Second Coming of Christ, yet he states that anyone who enters polygamy today is living in adultery, has sold his soul to Satan and will be damned in eternity:

. . . the Lord frequently did command his ancient saints to practice plural marriage. . . . the whole history of ancient Israel was one in which plurality of wives was the divinely accepted and approved order of matrimony. Millions of those who entered this order have, in and through it, gained for themselves eternal exaltation in the highest heaven of the celestial world. . . . the Lord revealed the principle of plural marriage to the Prophet. Later the Prophet and leading brethren were commanded to enter into the practice, which they did in all virtue and purity of heart . . . plural marriage was openly taught and practiced until the year 1890. At that time conditions were such that the Lord by revelation withdrew the command to continue the practice, . . . Obviously the holy practice will commence again after the second coming of the Son of Man and the ushering in of the millennium. . . .

Any who pretend or assume to engage in plural marriage in this day, when the one holding the keys had withdrawn the power by which they are performed, are guilty of gross wickedness. They are living in adultery, have already sold their souls to Satan, and (whether their acts are based on ignorance or lust or both) they will be damned in eternity. (Mormon Doctrine, by Bruce R. McConkie, 1958, pp. 522-523)

Is it any wonder that many Mormon people are confused over the practice of polygamy? They are taught that Joseph Smith entered polygamy in “virtue and purity of heart,” yet they are taught that if they follow his example they are living in “adultery.”

The Mormon people are taught that plural marriage is still practiced in heaven and will be practiced in the millennium. John J. Stewart stated:

. . . the restoration of the Church and Gospel of Jesus Christ, is to prepare for the second coming of the Savior, which is nigh at hand; to help usher in His great millennial reign, when the Gospel in its fulness, including plural marriage, will be lived by worthy members of the Church. (Brigham Young and His Wives, p. 73)

B. H. Roberts, the famous Mormon historian, apparently understood the Manifesto as only a temporary restriction of plural marriage:

If the labors and sufferings of the church of Christ for this principle have done nothing more, this much at least has been accomplished—the Saints have borne testimony to the truth. And it is for God to vindicate his own law and open the way for its establishment on the earth, which doubtless he will do when his kingdom shall come in power, and when his will shall be done in earth as it is in heaven. (Outlines of Ecclesiastical History, p. 441)

The Apostle Orson Pratt once stated:

Does not everything that is consistent and reasonable, and everything that agrees with the Bible show that plurality of wives must exist after the resurrection? It does, . . . (Journal of Discourses, vol. 14, pp. 244- 245)

Since the Mormon people are taught that polygamy was right in Joseph Smith’s time and that it will be practiced in heaven, is it any wonder that many of them are entering into the practice today? As a polygamist interviewed by a reporter from the New York Times expressed it:

“We believe it was all revealed by God to Joseph Smith, and plural marriage was a part of it as you can see just by reading the book [The Doctrine and Covenants]. If they want to leave it out, why don’t they tear it out of the book?” (New York Times, December 27, 1965, p. 18)

As long as the Mormon leaders continue to publish Joseph Smith’s revelation on polygamy (Doctrine and Covenants, section 132), there will, no doubt, be many people who will enter into the practice. They cannot completely repudiate this revelation, however, without repudiating their doctrine concerning temple marriage as the two doctrines are found in the same revelation.

Although the Mormon leaders will not give up the idea that this revelation is from God, they have already repudiated many of the teachings of the earlier leaders. For instance, Brigham Young taught: “The only men who become Gods, even the Sons of God, are those who enter into polygamy” (Journal of Discourses, vol. 11, p. 269). The Millennial Star, vol. 15, p. 226, contained this statement: “The order of plurality of wives is an everlasting and ceaseless order, designed to exalt the choicest men and women to the most superlative excellence, dominion, and glory.”

Today, however, the Mormon leaders teach that polygamy is not essential for exaltation: Bruce R. McConkie stated: “Plural marriage is not essential to salvation or exaltation” (Mormon Doctrine, 1958, p. 523).

Brigham Young once became so zealous to establish polygamy that he declared that a man who would not enter into polygamy would have his wife taken from him in the resurrection and given to another:

Now, where a man in this church says, “I don’t want but one wife, I will live my religion with one.” He will perhaps be saved in the Celestial kingdom; but when he gets there he will not find himself in possession of any wife at all. He has had a talent that he has hid up. He will come forward and say, “Here is that which thou gavest me, I have not wasted it, and here is the one talent,” and he will not enjoy it, but it will be taken and given to those who have improved the talents they received, and he will find himself without any wife, and he will remain single forever and ever. . . . I recollect a sister conversing with Joseph Smith on this subject. She told him: “Now don’t talk to me; when I get into the celestial kingdom, if I ever do get there, I shall request the privilege of being a ministering angel; that is the labor that I wish to perform. I don’t want any companion in that world; and if the Lord will make me a ministering angel, it is all I want.” Joseph said, “Sister, you talk very foolishly, you do not know what you will want.” He then said to me: “Here Brother Brigham, you seal this lady to me.” I sealed her to him. This was my own sister according to the flesh. (Deseret News, September 17, 1873)

The Mormon leaders today would not think of teaching that a man with only one wife would have her taken from him and given to a man who had taken more. Bruce R. McConkie stated: “In our day, the Lord summarized by revelation the whole doctrine of exaltation and predicated it upon the marriage of one man to one woman” (Mormon Doctrine, p. 523).

Although the Mormon leaders have changed many of the teachings concerning polygamy, they still teach that it was a righteous practice in Joseph Smith’s time. John J. Stewart makes it very clear that it is still an “integral part of LDS scripture”:

. . . the Church’s strictness in excommunicating those advocating and practicing plural marriage today has apparently been misconstrued by not a few loyal Church members as an acknowledgement that the evil falsehoods... and other misconceptions about plural marriage, are true, and that the Church’s near silence on the doctrine today is further evidence that it regrets and is embarrassed by the whole matter of plural marriage. Such an inference is, of course, unjustified and unrealistic. The Church has never, and certainly will never, renounce this doctrine. The revelation on plural marriage is still an integral part of LDS scripture, and always will be. If a woman, sealed to her husband for time and eternity, precedes her husband in death, it is his privilege to marry another also for time and eternity, providing that he is worthy of doing so. (Brigham Young and His Wives, 1961, pp. 13-14)

More on Marriages After the Manifesto and a Plan for Secret Concubines

On pages 237-238 of this book, we proved beyond all doubt that Apostle Abraham H. Cannon took a plural wife by the name of Lillian Hamlin in 1896—six years after the Manifesto was issued. We presented evidence which seems to indicate that Joseph F. Smith, who became the sixth President of the Mormon Church, married the couple “on the high sea” just off the coast of California. President Smith denied that he performed the marriage ceremony, but he acknowledged that he did go on a trip with Lillian Hamlin and the Apostle Cannon at the time when the marriage was supposed to have taken place. In the Reed Smoot Case we find the following testimony by Joseph F. Smith:

Mr. SMITH. . . . The first time I ever saw her [Lillian Hamlin], . . . was some time in June—I do not remember the date—1896. I was at that time president of the Sterling Mining and Milling Company. . . . I was asked by the board of directors to accompany Abraham H. Cannon to Los Angeles, . . . I accompanied Abraham H. Cannon and his wife on that trip, and had one of my wives with me on that trip.

Mr. TAYLER. When did you first learn that Lillian Hamlin was his wife?

Mr. SMITH. The first that I suspected anything of the kind was on that trip, because I never knew the lady before. (The Reed Smoot Case, vol. 1, p. 111)

Mr. TAYLER. Prior to June, 1896, you had never heard of Lillian Hamlin being his wife?

Mr. SMITH. No, sir.

Mr. TAYLER. Did you see them at Los Angeles?

Mr. SMITH. Yes, sir.

Mr. TAYLER. Were you out in a boat from there?

Mr. SMITH. Yes, Sir.

Mr. TAYLER. Did you have any talk on that journey or after you left Salt Lake—after you first heard or learned that Lillian Hamlin was the wife of Abraham Cannon—as to when they were married?

Mr. SMITH. No, sir.

Mr. TAYLER. Did you have any talk with either of them?

Mr. SMITH. Not in the least.

Mr. SMITH. Not in the least, sir; and no one ever mentioned to me that they were or were not married. I simply judged they were married because they were living together as husband and wife.

Mr. TAYLER. Did you say anything by way of criticism to Abraham Cannon?

Mr. SMITH. No, sir.

Mr. TAYLER. For going about with this wife?

Mr. SMITH. No, sir; I did not. (Ibid., pp. 127-128)

Mr. TAYLER. Now, the church—I gather from your statement the officials of the church have been ever since 1890, and are now, very sensitive as to the charge that plural marriages have been solemnized.

Mr. WORTHINGTON. Since the manifesto?

Mr. TAYLER. Since the manifesto.

Mr. SMITH. Yes; I think we have been very sensitive about that.

Mr. TAYLER. Very sensitive?

Mr. SMITH. Yes, sir.

Mr. TAYLER. What inquiry did you make to find out whether Abraham H. Cannon, one of the twelve apostles of the church, had made a plural marriage?

Mr. SMITH. I made no inquiry at all.

Mr. TAYLER. Did you have any interest in finding out whether there had been—

Mr. SMITH. Not the least. (Ibid., pp. 476-477)

The reader will remember that Mrs. Wilhelmina C. Ellis, one of Abraham H. Cannon’s wives, testified that Lillian Hamlin and Abraham H. Cannon were married while on this trip with Joseph F. Smith. Frank J. Cannon claimed that his father, George Q. Cannon, told him that “President Smith performed the ceremony” (see pages 237-238 of this book).

In the Reed Smoot Case, vol. 2, page 265, Abraham H. Cannon’s widow, Mrs. Ellis, was questioned about his diary. She replied: “I have seen it, but not since his death.” As we pointed out earlier, many diaries belonging to the Apostle Cannon have recently come to light. Unfortunately, however, if Cannon kept a diary at the time of his marriage in 1896, it has not been made public.

Even though we do not have Apostle Cannon’s diary for June of 1896, Michael Marquardt has pointed out some references in his diary for 1894 which throw important light on this marriage and on the attitude of the Mormon leaders concerning polygamy after the Manifesto. The reader will remember that Frank J. Cannon quoted his father George Q. Cannon as saying:

“. . . President Smith obtained the acquiescence of President Woodruff, on the plea that it wasn’t an ordinary case of polygamy but merely a fulfilment of the biblical instruction that a man should take his dead brother’s wife. Lillian was betrothed to David, and had been sealed to him in eternity after his death. . . .”

According to the diary of Abraham H. Cannon, his father, George Q. Cannon, a member of the First Presidency, lamented the fact that his sons could not raise up seed to David through polygamy: “My son David died without seed, and his brothers cannot do a work for him, in rearing children to bear his name because of the manifesto” (“Daily Journal of Abraham H. Cannon,” April 5, 1894, vol. 18, p. 70).

From an entry in Apostle Cannon’s diary for October 24, 1894, it would appear that the Mormon leaders had decided that a plural marriage could be performed in Mexico to raise up seed to David. Although the diary has been damaged at this point and a few words are missing, the remaining portion shows that the Mormon leaders did not take the Manifesto seriously:

After meeting I went to the President’s Office and _____ Father [George Q. Cannon] about taking a wife for David. I told him David had taken Anni[e] _____ cousin, through the vail in life, and suggested she might be a good pe _____ sealed to him for eternity. The suggestion pleased Father very much, and _____ Angus was there, He spoke to him about it in the presence of the Presidency. _____ not object providing Annie is willing. The Presidents Woodruff and Smith both sa[id] they were willing for such a ceremony to occur, if done in Mexico, and Pres. Woodruff[f] promised the Lord’s blessing to follow such an act.” (“Daily Journal of Abraham H. Cannon,” October 24, 1894, vol. 18, p. 170)

We may never know if Annie was “willing” to enter into this plural marriage, but we do know that less than two years later Lillian Hamlin was married to Apostle Cannon. Mrs. Wilhelmina C. Ellis, who had been one of Cannon’s plural wives testified:

Mrs. ELLIS. He said he could marry her out of the State—out of the United States.

Mr. TAYLER. What conversation did you have with him then about his going away and about his getting married again? What did he say first about going?

Mrs. ELLIS. He told me he was going to marry her for time, and that she would be David’s wife for eternity. (The Reed Smoot Case, vol. 2, pp. 142-143)

The Apostle Abraham H. Cannon's journal not only reveals that the Mormon leaders approved of polygamy after the Manifesto, but it shows they were considering the idea of a secret system of concubinage wherein men and women could live together without actually being married:

Father [George Q. Cannon] now spoke of the unfortunate condition of the people at present in regard to marriage. . . . I believe in concubinage, or some plan whereby men and women can live together under sacred ordinances and vows until they can be married. . . . such a condition would have to be kept secret, until the laws of our government change to permit the holy order of wedlock which God has revealed, which will undoubtedly occur at no distant day, in order to correct the social evil. . . . —President Snow. "I have no doubt but concubinage will yet be practiced in this church, but I had not thought of it in this connection. When the nations are troubled good women will come here for safety and blessing, and men will accept them as concubines." —Pres. Woodruff: "If men enter into some practice of this character to raise a righteous posterity, they will be justified in it. . . ." ("Daily Journal of Abraham H. Cannon," April 5, 1894, vol. 18, p. 70)

As we have shown earlier in this book, Joseph Smith's revelation on polygamy also said that concubinage was justifiable in God's sight: "Abraham received concubines and they bore him children; and it was accounted unto him for righteousness, . . ." (Doctrine and Covenants, 132:37).

At any rate, the diaries of Apostle Abraham H. Cannon reveal devastating evidence against the Mormon Church, and this evidence cannot be easily dismissed. The Mormon writer Kenneth W. Godfrey feels that the Apostle Abraham Cannon's diaries present an accurate picture of what was being said by the Mormon leaders in private: ". . . what were the Mormon leaders saying in private? With the recent acquisition of the Abraham H. Cannon diaries it is now possible to accurately report what was taking place in meetings of the Council of the Twelve Apostles" (Dialogue: A Journal of Mormon Thought, Autumn 1970, p. 22).

A "Lie of Expediency" on 1886 Revelation

On pages 242-243 of this book we show that in 1886 John Taylor, the third President of the Church, gave a revelation in which the Lord was supposed to have told him that the church could never give up the practice of plural marriage. Just four years later, however, the church issued the Manifesto which was supposed to put a stop to its practice. Since both the Manifesto and John Taylor's 1886 revelation could not possibly have come from the same God, the Mormon leaders decided to suppress the revelation. At one time the First Presidency of the Mormon Church issued an "Official Statement" which claimed that "no such a revelation exists."

In his unpublished study, "The New Mormon History," pages 76-77, Richard Stephen Marshall quotes both Reed Durham and Max Parkin, of the LDS Institute of Religion in Salt Lake City, as saying that the leaders of the church have not told the truth about the 1886 revelation:

The official Church position on the 1886 revelation is that it never was given and does not exist. . . . [Mark E.] Petersen's book calls the 1886 revelation spurious. Historical evidence would seem to indicate, in contradiction to the book, that the revelation was given and is at present moment contained in the Church archives.

Reed Durham told this writer that it is "an out and out lie" to say that the 1886 revelation does not exist. He said, "I could stand before the Bar of God and prove that revelation was given. I have minutes of the meetings of the First Presidency and the Quorum of the Twelve Apostles referring to it."

While Durham calls it an "out and out lie" to deny the revelation was given, Max Parkin, one of his colleagues calls it a "lie of expediency." He says that the mandate to carry the gospel, as taught by the Church, to all the nations of the world, is compelling to the degree that historical doctrines which could prove embarrassing to the Church, and thus hinder missionary work, are better covered or disavowed.

The Great Prostitution Conspiracy

On pages 231-233 of this book, we told of the animosity that existed between the Mormon Church and the United States government just before the Manifesto was issued. Because of their hatred towards those who were trying to do away with polygamy, the Mormons entered into a conspiracy to entrap the Gentiles in Salt Lake City. The Mormon historian B. H. Roberts frankly admitted that in 1885 the Mormons used "a system of secret espionage" to entrap federal officials who were trying to enforce the laws against polygamy:

Another regrettable thing done on the part of the Latter-day Saints, and growing out of the sense of unfairness attending upon the administration of the federal laws by the federal officials, led some overzealous men, officers of the city government, then entirely in "Mormon" hands, to arrange by a system of secret espionage on such characters in the city as resorted to places of prostitution, and by prosecution of them make, at least, public exposure of their crimes. It was believed that many prominent in prosecutions of polygamy and unlawful cohabitation cases would be entrapped.

Great consternation prevailed in certain quarters. It was rumored, and was matter of press comment, that "the anti-'Mormon' element had become wild with excitement, and wondered where the lightning would strike next. Many vague rumors were afloat, as to a list of from four to six hundred offenders being in the hands of the city officers, and there were more blanched cheeks and shaking knees than Salt Lake has ever before contained, notwithstanding the assertion regarding the anti-'Mormon' purity." (Comprehensive History of the Church, vol. 6, p. 158)

C. S. Varian, who served as assistant United States attorney in Utah, made these comments about the prostitution conspiracy:

The thought seems to have been that if it should be ascertained that others of the non-Mormon population were found to be guilty of offenses against the law, it would be a sufficient answer to the prosecutions which were being brought by the government. In this view, certain prominent and influential Mormon citizens of Salt Lake City conceived the idea of opening houses of ill-fame in certain localities of the municipality for the purpose of enticing prominent government officials and others into the commission of offenses, in order that they might be detected and publicity be given to their crimes. (Reminiscences of Early Utah, by R.N. Baskin, 1914, p. 224)

It is very interesting to note that in December, 1885, the grand jury for the third judicial district of the Territory issued a very revealing report concerning the conspiracy. It was printed by the Daily Tribune in Salt Lake City on December 8, 1885, and finally by the Deseret News on December 23, 1885. Since the Deseret News is owned by the Mormon Church we cite the following from the grand jury report which appeared in its pages:

Your Grand Jury herewith returns two indictments for conspiracy, four indictments for keeping houses of ill-fame, under the Territorial laws, . . .

Some time in April or May last an officer of the city government, not connected with the police, with others unknown at present to the grand jury, entered into a conspiracy to open houses of assignation and ill-fame within the city limits, for the avowed purpose of entrapping weak and vicious persons into the commission of offenses against chastity and morality, in order that all such might be exposed and punished in the courts. This scheme involved the renting and fitting up of houses for the purpose, the employment of public and private prostitutes, the conversion of the police bureau into a nest of spotters and spies, and the expenditure of a large sum of money.

For years there have been well-known houses of prostitution in Salt Lake, which have been under police surveillance. . . . We do not understand that the scheme above mentioned contemplated the investigation of these places, nor the enforcement of the law against those who reside therein or resort thereto for purposes of prostitution or lewdness. On the contrary, as appears by the evidence before us, the plan was conceived and carried into effect without reference to the suppression of existing nuisances, but with the design of using the criminal law as a snare for the weak and immoral, and with the object in part, at least, of creating a great public scandal. In pursuance of this scheme, houses were rented and furnished on West Temple Street, and women placed in possession thereof. These houses were so altered and arranged in their interior that persons could be placed to observe all that transpired within, and every member of the police force of Salt Lake City, with two honorable exceptions, John Y. Smith and Wm. Calder, volunteered his services as a spy and informer in all of the conspiracy. The women were hired to perform their parts, and their exertions stimulated by the promise of exorbitant sums for their success in entrapping high officials. One of these creatures was promised $1,000 in the event of her being able to draw the Governor of the Territory into her tolls. In the course of their operations, these women conveyed notes of invitation to many prominent officials and citizens, requesting interviews on business at the places designated. The following, leaving the names blank, is a sample of these notes, delivered by messenger boys:

Salt Lake City,
July 25, 1885.

Dear Sir—If convenient, I would be pleased to have you call and see me this afternoon or about dusk this evening. I want to see you on particular business. Please send answer by messenger boy when you will call.

Respectfully.

We are informed by persons engaged in this infamous plot, that from their secret posts of observation they, from time to time, personally witnessed all that took place in apartments in these houses visited by men and women, who were weak and depraved enough to respond to the opportunities presented to them. Their names were taken and the evidence noted for future reference and use.

When the exposure of this conspiracy was at hand the houses were closed. One woman was sent to California upon a ticket furnished her. Another was driven to Francklyn by a police officer who had previously purchased her a ticket, and then took the train for Denver under an assumed name.

One of these women was paid by the city official above referred to $300 or $400 and the other $700 for her services. . . . The money employed in this scheme, we are told by its prime mover, was paid by one of the high officials of Salt Lake County. It is claimed that the money was raised by private subscription. We have been unable to ascertain that any part of it came from the public treasury. Neither the Mayor, Chief of Police, nor other city official, except as herein stated, so far as we can learn, were advised of the proceeding until the plot was ripe. All of the police officers engaged in it. It is claimed performed the services required when off duty. One of them states that his services were rendered “for the good of the cause.” . . . a great crime has been perpetrated. . . . The law is humane and considerate, and has for its object the prevention of crime, and the reformation as well as the punishment of offenders. It does not, we think, contemplate the commission of crimes. In order that additional crimes may be committed, and the last offenders exposed and punished. . . .

MORRIS R. EVANS,

(The Deseret News, December 23, 1885)

The publishers of the Daily Tribune, which was not controlled by the Mormon Church, were incensed by this conspiracy. On November 24, 1885, the Tribune reported:

Bishop Speirs’s court at the City Hall presented a scene of unusual activity yesterday morning. The announcement that the defenders of the holy church had prepared a long list of Gentiles and fallen Saints who were to be dragged into the court on charges of lascivious conduct and that Deputy Marshal Vandercook had been selected as the first victim, was sufficient to attract the riff raff of the streets, . . . the crowd extending out into the hallway. Among the first to arrive were Cut-throat Crow and a corps of church spotters who were given favored seats within the sacred precincts set apart for witnesses and attorneys. The official reporter of the church was also present for the purpose of recording, for the use of the church historian, all of the obscenity and filth, which it was expected the witnesses who had been detailed for the occasion would relate. . . .

The complaints were sworn to by B. Y. Hampton and attested by Bishop Spiers. . . . The police and spotters propose to testify that they saw the alleged acts committed. . . . two houses were rented on West Temple street, and notes began to be sent to prominent officials and Gentiles. . . . and one of the women engaged in the business was free to inform her intended visitors that there was no danger of any arrests in her house—meaning that she had an understanding with the police that she should not be disturbed. . . .

Circumstances are rapidly coming to light which show conclusively that several assination houses have been opened and conducted with the money of the church, or of the city. It is believed, with good reason, that the prostitutes of these houses, as well as Mormon girls of loose character, were in the employ of the police, who were either admitted to the houses and allowed to watch proceedings, or were given the dates upon which certain individuals visited them. (The Daily Tribune, November 24, 1885)

The next day The Daily Tribune carried these statements:

Nothing shows the innate degradation of the Mormon Church more clearly than the present conspiracy and raid. Think of the Presbyterian Church, the Methodist Church, and Catholic or any other Christian churches bending to make an assignation with prostitutes for the sole purpose of proving that some outside men, in secret, practice a vice. . . . It is a church matter, every policeman who stands ready to swear, who has kept watch in secret with prostitutes, every man who has been engaged in the business in any way—except one Hebrew agent who acted under orders from a big Mormon—pays one-tenth of his salary to our “holy church.” . . . The final outcome will be a boomerang. The Saints believed that the lowering of the flag would awaken sympathy for them. They do not think so any more. So it will be with this. When the country understands that the emissaries of the church went to San Francisco and Denver and hired prostitutes to come here to decoy men, the fine point of the intention will be lost, and the question will be: “What kind of a thing is it which in the name of a church stoops to the use of such instruments as those?” (The Daily Tribune, November 25, 1885)

The Mormon Church's newspaper, The Deseret News, defended the "police" and launched an attack on the Tribune:

The organ of the prostitutes and apologist for lechery, as "one of the common vices of humanity," is working hard to divert attention from the official and private persons who are charged with beastly crimes, by reckless and whole-cloth lying—its usual tactics. . . .

Its story is that the "Mormon" Church has hired prostitutes to lead away the poor, innocent deputy marshals, Tribune supporters, merchants, ex-U.S. Commissioners and other persons addicted to "one of the common vices of humanity," . . .

Was ever a more senseless idea evolved from a softened brain, muddled with the fumes of cheap cigars and "forty-rod" whisky? Using its own elegant language, the Tribune must have "carried its folly to the point of putting a half idiot and half lunatic to the chair," for the purpose of shielding its friends, the male prostitutes, and voiding more of its venom against the "Mormon" Church . . . to what desperate straits must the organ of the prostitutes be driven in defending its friends, to print such stuff as now occupies its columns! . . . The courts, the Federal officials, the anti-"Mormon" press and all their little echoes, have pretended that "sexual crimes should be punished by the local laws and authorities." And now if they have any regard for consistency they ought to support the police in their enforcement of city ordinances, instead of rallying to the aid of the lecherous law-breakers, and raving like madmen against a Church that has no more to do with the matter than righteousness has with roguery or Truth has with the Tribune.

Let the light shine, even if it comes from the policeman's lantern. Let the strokes fall where they belong, even if they come from the policeman's club. Let the guilty be exposed, even though they be found in the ranks of those sacred officials whom courts appear bound to protect. Go on with the music. (The Deseret News, November 25, 1885)

The following day the Daily Tribune printed the following:

Salt Lake now enjoys the distinction of being the only city in the world in which houses of prostitution were established by the city authorities; the only city that ever hired its official prostitutes and paid them a premium for every man they enticed. This city also has the only newspapers in the world that are vile enough to defend such infamy. (The Daily Tribune, November 26, 1885)

On November 27, 1885, the Tribune made this statement about the conspiracy:

But Salt Lake is a peculiar place, and when the fact is made transparent that a certain course is being pursued, not with a view of arresting a wrong but to make [make?] a justification for committing another wrong, and that to carry out a conspiracy a direct crime under the Territorial statutes and against this city's ordinance was committed, why, certainly, the facts should be as plainly stated as decency will permit. It has been made clear that to execute a revenge upon certain men, the Mormon Church—through the city authorities, who are but creatures of the church and who do nothing except through the advice and consent of the chiefs of the church—entered into contracts with common prostitutes, paying them large sums and furnishing them with means to rent houses, over which they further extended the protection of the police, and from which they withdrew all the restrictions which attach to ordinary houses of ill fame. . . .

The Tribune is called upon by the Mormon press to endorse this business as altogether praiseworthy and noble. It can not very well do that.

The same evening the church's Deseret News reported the following:

The truth is that some dirty men, among them persons who have been prominent in urging the persecution of "Mormons" for living with their wives, have been consorting with lewd women in violation of the city ordinances, the police have made some arrests, the whole crew who have been crying out against "Mormon" immorality have rushed to the rescue, . . .

The morning organ of the prostitutes raves through nearly another column of idiocy about the "Mormon" Church and thinks this will be a sufficient apology for the lecherous doings of the libertines whose cause it fights for. But all its romances and epithets amount to nothing on the main question; which is, shall those guilty of sexual crimes which the courts here say are left to the police to prosecute, be punished for their bestiality, which the Tribune apologises for as "one of the common vices of humanity?" (The Deseret News, November 27, 1885)

The Deseret News for December 1, 1885, published an article entitled "PROSECUTE THE DEBAUCHEES" in which the following appeared:

It is true that a barrier has been placed in the way of the officers by the ruling of Judge Zane. . . . it is not expected that the municipal officers will be "bluffed" off by one failure of a technical character. The prosecution of these offenders is confidently looked for, and the community demand that the prosecutions shall go on . . . If the police do not continue the work they have begun, because they have met with a rebuff where they ought to have received assistance, they will become a public laughing stock and the municipal authorities will be subject to well-deserved reproach. Prosecute the debauchees.

On December 2, 1885, the church's Deseret News called the "police" conspiracy a "good work":

The arrest of Deputy Marshal Vandercook, U.S. Commissioner Pearson, Assistant U.S. Attorney S. H. Lewis and W. H. Yearian Esq., charged with lewd and lascivious conduct has caused quite a commotion in different circles of Utah society. The voice of the general public is, "Let the municipal ordinances be enforced, no matter whom they pinch; and if some persons who have been particularly active and venomous in spotting and arresting "Mormon" polygamists, and others who have been very urgent for the enforcement of the Edmunds law, happen to be among the corrupt and lustful violators of the local laws, no good citizen will be sorry if they "come to grief." But the vile crew who endorse prostitution or wink at occasional vice and excuse "sporadic cases," while they are rampart against plural marriage, rally to the support of the accused and have no good word for the police in their endeavors to enforce the city ordinances.

As might be expected, the morning organ of the prostitutes, in its Sunday issue, cries out "A Church move!"—"Church Spotters!"—"The ignominy will fall on themselves!" and hastens to acquit the accused before the evidence is heard. . . .

It has been argued and officially announced that Congress has left the passage and enforcement of laws against sexual sins to the local authorities, and that it is for the police to see to such ordinary and common vices. Well, the police it appears have been endeavoring to perform this duty, and have made a commencement in a proper direction. That is to say that instead of simply arresting and fining the unfortunate creatures who are ministers to masculine passion, they are carrying out the provisions of local law for the punishment of the active criminals, the male prostitutes, the really guilty principals in the degrading crime of which the culprits in charge are accused. . . . Let the work of cleansing go on and be made thorough. We want the help of the Lord and the power of His might. . . .

We hope the police will go on with their good work, no matter where the fur flies. Never mind the curses of anti-“Mormons,” the threatening of officials, the bluster of hired scribes or the consequences to pretended “Mormons.” The corrupt cannot injure those who faithfully perform their duty, and the Church will not flinch at the exposure of the hypocrites who have made it a cloak for their infamy.

The efforts of the police to enforce the city ordinances against sexual immorality, which ought to receive the support of all who desire social order and the public welfare, are denounced, defied and hindered by those who have figured for some time past as the champions of morality. The loudest clamorers against polygamy are the most vehement defenders of the parties charged with debauchery. It has been so from the beginning. The unvirtuous of both sexes are and have always been the bitterest enemies of plural marriage . . . the police, whose duty it is to do so have made some arrests; and what is the consequence? Instead of receiving the support of officials and others, who have been posing as the upholders of law and the defenders of society, the police are maligned and the ordinance under which they are acting is sought to be made inoperative. . . .

The honest performance of police duty is called “A Mormon Plot.” Without the shadow of a reason for the libel, police proceedings against reputed whoremongers are represented as “plans adopted by the Mormon Church.” . . . every effort is made to slander all who are engaged in the performance of a sworn duty by the prosecution of persons accused of debasing crime. . . . the law-and-order shriekers who are seeking to bring the ‘Mormons’ into bondage because of a distinctive feature or religion, care no more for law and order and decency than the most depraved of criminals, and that all their virtuous (?) declarations are but the shuffling pretenses of canting and lecherous hypocrites. (The Deseret News: Weekly, December 2, 1885)

The following day the church’s newspaper continued to defend the conspiracy:

Supposing the “traps” to have been laid. Why should those paragons of propriety, the Federal officials alluded to, walk into them? If lewd women “hired” or not, have been visited by those officials and others, and become the principal actors in scenes of debauchery, obscenity and filthiness too vile for description, why lay all the blame upon the “traps” set to catch them in their lechery and say not a word against the criminals?

We do not know which to denounce as the viler case of depravity, the low-lived, persecutors of decent men and women who have been overseen in their secret deeds of shame, or the scandalous journalists who strive to screen them from exposure and save them from punishment, by putting the blame on the police who detected their crimes, and by feeding the popular maw for the marvelous with the monstrous falsehood about the “Mormon hierarchy.” (The Deseret News, December 3, 1885)

Although the Mormon police sent the prostitutes away from Utah, their whereabouts was discovered and they were returned. The Tribune for December 4, 1885, indicates that this caused the conspirators a great deal of trouble:

The commotion that the return of Fanny Davenport and Mrs. Fields created in the prostitution circle at the City Hall, would be sufficient proof, if any were needed, that certain of the city officials had been in collusion with these females in corrupting the morals of the people. Their too apparent anxiety lest the women should tell all about their dealings with the city officials, was manifested in various ways. On the day that they returned a policeman was sent down the road as far as Provo to meet them, but was not given an opportunity to talk to them and “fix things.” . . .

In the meantime, Brig Hampton was doing some pretty tall rustling on the streets for bondsmen for the prostitutes. . . .

The examination of Fanny Davenport came up... The complaint in the case...alleges that Fanny Davenport, . . . at Salt Lake City, on May 1, 1885, and on divers other days and times until November 15th, did then and there unlawfully keep and maintain a certain house of ill fame, . . .

Considerable curiosity was manifested on the part of the spectators to see whether the gang of Church conspirators would give themselves away by bringing the brethren in as bondsmen. A good deal of surprise was created by the appearance of Alfred Soloman, a good saint, who offered himself as one of the sureties, and the astonishment was greater when Royal B. Young, the indicted polygamist, appeared as the other, Watson having backed out. The ready manner in which the brethren came to the front and helped their prostitute out was the subject of a good deal of comment, and was regarded as a complete “give away” of the infamous conspiracy. . . .

Brig. Hampton, wearing a wish-I-were-far-away expression on his countenance, came into the room, and the defendant greeted her old partner in corruption with a smile of recognition. The pair were soon afterward engaged in confidential chat . . . Deputy Marshal Vandercook entered soon afterward, and drawing a paper from his pocket walked up to Hampton and said: “Here is a subpoena, summoning you to appear as a witness in this case.” . . .

It is pretty safe to say that Brig Hampton and his whole gang of prostitution agents are feeling very uneasy over the unexpected turn of events and are heartily sick of the scheme they entered into with these prostitutes. That they should be called on as witnesses against their own hired women was something in their stupidity they never dreamed of. (The Daily Tribune, December 4, 1885)

The next day the Tribune reported the following:

It is reported on good authority that Fanny Davenport is an honored guest at the city jail boarding house, situated in the rear of the City Hall. A carriage is waiting whenever she wishes to go out, and anything she asks for is given. She fully realizes that she has the city ring under her thumb and is evidently making the most of her opportunities. (The Daily Tribune, December 5, 1885)

After printing the report of the Grand Jury concerning the prostitution scandal, the Tribune made this statement:

As might readily be surmised from the tenor of the above report, Brig. Hampton was the city official referred to as one of the prime movers in this infamous intrigue and was one of the men indicted. The grand jury dealt very kindly with him, considering the outrageous nature of his offense, and only presented four indictments against him. Two of them charged him with keeping houses of ill fame, . . . The other two charge him with conspiracy, by entering into the disgraceful compact with these prostitutes. (The Daily Tribune, December 8, 1885)

The Mormon leaders were very upset over the whole matter. The Deseret News for December 14 contained these statements:

Oscar Vandercook, charged with resorting to a house of ill-fame for lewdness, the charge backed by testimony conclusive and complete, is protected by Federal authority, turned loose without trial and immediately granted an appeal to the highest court, . . .

In order to put into effect the local laws against sexual crimes, noted frequenters of houses of ill-fame, who had been seen to enter those haunts of iniquity, were watched at their lewd and lascivious practices, in order that they might be prosecuted. It was the only way by which their guilt could be proven beyond question. It was disgusting business, no doubt. But which was the most disgusting, the detection of their bestiality or the acts which were witnessed? But mark the course of those who are waging the moral crusade against the “Mormons.” In order to cripple the prosecution of those lechers by the local laws, the machinery of the Federal court is set at work to punish the detector of crime so that the criminals may go free? The men who planned to expose and punish by local law the supporters of prostitution are indicted for “conspiracy,” while the befouled cohabiters with harlots, the polluted divers into the slime of base lust are shielded from the penalty of their guilt.

Say, priests and editors who are urging this crusade against the “Mormons” on moral grounds, what do you think of this kind of morality? Stamp out polygamy, cherish prostitution! No mercy for a “Mormon” who conscientiously marries and supports two or three wives and their children, but protection and relief and freedom for the libertine and the lecher. . . . The public prosecutor refuses to prosecute. Why? Is the evidence faulty? Cannot the facts be proved? Is there any doubt at all of the guilt of the accused? No. But a man who set himself to work to expose and bring to punishment the bestial debauchees of this city is indicted by the grand jury for doing that detective work, and the attorney prefers to prosecute him rather than the persons detected and proven guilty on testimony direct and unimpeachable enough to convict beyond question. . . .

The facts in these cases, barring the indecent details, should be telegraphed all over the country. It ought to be known how debauchery is protected and vice is encouraged. . . .

The organ of the lechers, like the counsel for Vandercook, wants to intimidate the officers who are engaged in the prosecution of the male prostitutes. . . .

No man who has “never done anything he is willing all the world should know,” is in any danger from the police prosecutions. It is only those who have been frequenting houses of ill fame and have been seen in their vile deeds who have occasion to fear. . . . for the beasts who have been detected we want no concealment. The proceedings to stop their exposure ought not to prevail. They should be prosecuted as the law requires, in the Justice’s Court; and if the Federal courts like to set them free, and would rather punish the detectives than the detected, let the responsibility lie with them. . . . Let the lechers be exposed, and let all those who threaten and bluster understand that no one cares a cent for all they can say or do. The arrests should go on. (The Deseret News, December 14, 1885)

Andrew Jenson, who was Assistant Church Historian, says that Brigham Y. Hampton was sentenced to one year’s imprisonment for his part in the conspiracy:

Thurs. 24. — After three days’ trial the jury in the Third District Court brought in a verdict of guilty against Brigham Y. Hampton for conspiracy.

Wed. 30. — In the Third District Court, Judge Zane sentenced Brigham Y. Hampton to one year’s imprisonment in the Salt Lake County jail. (Church Chronology, p. 127)

It is very difficult to determine how many Mormons were involved in this conspiracy. The Grand Jury report said that “every member of the police force of Salt Lake City, with two honorable exceptions, John Y. Smith and Wm. Calder, volunteered his services as a spy and informer in aid of the conspiracy” (Deseret News: Weekly, December 23, 1885, p. 3). The Mormon historian B. H. Roberts says that at this time the “city government” was “entirely in ‘Mormon’ hands” (Comprehensive History of the Church, vol. 6, p. 158). Roberts also frankly admits that this was a “regrettable thing done on the part of the Latter-day Saints” (Ibid.). How much the Mormon leaders knew about the conspiracy before it came to light is difficult to say, but they certainly gave full support to it when it was revealed. As we have shown, the church’s own Deseret News, December 2, 1885, claimed that the conspiracy was a “good work.”

After the Mormon leaders began to obey the law, the relationship with federal authorities began to normalize. The church which had previously encouraged disobedience to the law against polygamy began to demand that its members obey it. Heber J. Grant, the seventh President of the Church, who had himself been convicted of unlawful cohabitation in 1899, announced in 1931 that the church would give legal assistance so that polygamists could be prosecuted by the law. The Mormon leaders had previously made scathing denunciations against those who had spied on them when they were practicing polygamy. Now the situation was reversed: the Mormon leaders were using spies against members of the church who continued to advocate plural marriage. The Ogden Standard-Examiner for October 7, 1944, reported the following:

Meanwhile, the Mormon Church, which has been excommunicating polygamists ever since the 1890 manifesto, revealed that it has appointed investigators to “search out the cultists, turning over such information as they gather to the prosecution.”

The statement cited by the Ogden Standard-Examiner is a direct quote from a letter written by the Mormon Apostle Mark E. Petersen. It was sent to Murray Moler, Bureau Manager United Press, later became part of the Court files, and was finally printed in Truth, vol. 10, pages 207-208. We cite the following from this remarkable letter by Apostle Mark E. Petersen:

3—The Church has actively assisted federal and state authorities in obtaining evidence against the cultists and helping to prosecute them, under the law.

4—Among witnesses for the prosecution are men who have been appointed by the Church to search out the cultists, turning over such information as they gather to the prosecution for their use; these men have also been appointed by the Church to do all they can to fight the spread of polygamy.

5—The Church has opposed the practice and teaching of plural marriage since the adoption of a Manifesto in an official conference of the Church held in Salt Lake City October 6, 1890, and has excommunicated members since that time who have either taught or practiced it.

18. Mormonism and Truth

The Mormon Apostle John A. Widtsoe made the following statement: “The Church ever operates in full light. There is no secrecy about its doctrine, aim, or work” (Evidences and Reconciliations, single volume edition, p. 282). On page 226 of the same book, Apostle Widtsoe said: “From the beginning of its history the Church has opposed unsupported beliefs. It has fought half-truth and untruth” (Evidences and Reconciliations, p. 226).

John A. Widtsoe’s claim that the Mormon Church operates in full light and has from the beginning fought half-truth and untruth can hardly be supported by existing facts. Actually, untruth and secrecy were used by the church leaders to cover up the doctrine of polygamy. The Mormon writer William E. Berrett stated:

In 1840 the doctrine was taught to a few leading brethren who, with the Prophet, secretly married additional wives in the following year. . . . Only the secrecy surrounding its practice prevented a wholesale apostasy from the Church in 1844. (The Restored Church, 1958, pp. 247, 249)

As we have already shown (see page 202), the early editions of the Doctrine and Covenants contained an article which condemned the practice of polygamy. Joseph Smith and other Mormon leaders used this article as a shield to hide behind. The Mormon writer John J. Stewart stated:

The marriage article, in Oliver Cowdery’s handwriting, sustains monogamous marriage and denies any LDS practice of plural marriage. Joseph was not yet ready to publicly acknowledge this doctrine, even though he had spoken of it in confidence to a few close friends. (Joseph Smith, The Mormon Prophet, p. 103)

The May, 1837, issue of the Latter Day Saints’ Messenger and Advocate stated that the “Presidents of the Seventies met in council” and adopted the following resolution: “1st.—That we will have no fellowship whatever with any Elder belonging to the quorums of the Seventies who is guilty of polygamy or any offence of the kind, . . .” (Messenger and Advocate, vol. 3, p. 511).

In 1838 Joseph Smith answered some questions for the Elders’ Journal. Question number seven appears below:

Seventh— “Do the Mormons believe in having more wives than one?”

“No, not at the same time.” (History of the Church, by Joseph Smith, vol. 3, p. 28)

On May 3, 1844, Parley P. Pratt claimed that Augustine Spencer had written a letter which stated that “Joseph Smith is in the habit of drinking, swearing, carousing, dancing all night, &c., and that he keeps six or seven young females as wives, . . .” (History of the Church, by Joseph Smith, vol. 6, pp. 354, 355). On May 26, 1844, Joseph Smith absolutely denied the accusation that he was living in polygamy:

What a thing it is for a man to be accused of committing adultery, and having seven wives when I can only find one.

I am the same man, and as innocent as I was fourteen years ago; and I can prove them all perjurers. (History of the Church, vol. 6, p. 411)

The Mormon writer John J. Stewart said that “due to the extreme prejudice existing against the doctrine, it had to be kept as confidential as possible, and even public denials of it made” (Joseph Smith, The Mormon Prophet, pp. 67-68). On page 148 of the same book, Stewart admits that “public denials of it were made by the Church leaders—for the safety of the Church and the individuals concerned.”

According to Hyrum Smith, Joseph Smith said the following to John C. Bennett:

. . . why are you using my name to carry on your hellish wickedness? Have I ever taught you that fornication and adultery were right, or polygamy or any such practice? (History of the Church, by Joseph Smith, vol. 5, p. 72)

The following notice was published in the Times and Seasons, vol. 5, page 423:

THURSDAY, FEBRUARY 1, 1844.
NOTICE.

As we have lately been credibly informed, that an Elder of the Church of Jesus Christ, of Latter-day Saints, by the name of Hiram Brown, has been preaching polygamy, and other false and corrupt doctrines, in the county of Lapeer, state of Michigan.

This is to notify him and the Church in general, that he has been cut off from the church, for his iniquity; and he is further notified to appear at the Special Conference, on the 6th of April next, to make answer to these charges.

Joseph Smith,
Hyrum Smith,
Presidents of said Church.

Joseph Smith’s brother Hyrum, who was a member of the First Presidency of the Mormon Church, also secretly practiced plural marriage while denying it openly. On March 15, 1844, Hyrum Smith stated:

. . . brother Richard Hewitt has called on me to-day to know my views concerning some doctrines that are preached in your place, and states to me that some of your elders say, that a man having a certain priesthood, may have as many wives as he pleases, and that doctrine is taught here: I say unto you that that man teaches false doctrines, for there is no such doctrine taught; neither is there any such thing practised here. And any man that is found teaching privately or publicly any such doctrine, is culpable, and will stand a chance to be brought before the High Council, and lose his license and membership also: therefore he had better beware what he is about. (Times and Seasons, letter by Hyrum Smith, Nauvoo, Ill., March 15, 1844, vol. 5, p. 474)

Joseph F. Smith, who became the sixth president of the Mormon Church, made the following statement concerning the denials of Joseph and Hyrum Smith:

. . . Joseph Smith, the martyred Prophet, is responsible to God and the world for this doctrine, and let every soul know that he and his brother Hyrum did practice the doctrine in their lifetime, and until their death, notwithstanding their seeming denials as published in the Times and Seasons, . . . (Historical Record, p. 220)

The Mormon Apostle George A. Smith freely admitted that if someone had asked Joseph Smith about polygamy in

He comes to tell your honorable body, that the temple your fathers erected to freedom, whither their sons assembled to hear her precepts and cherish her doctrines in their hearts, has been desecrated; its portals closed, so that those that go up hither, are forbidden to enter.

He comes to tell your honorable body, that the blood of the heroes and patriots of the revolution, who have been slain by wicked hands for enjoying their religious rights, the boon of heaven to man, has cried, and is crying in the ears of the Lord of Sabaoth, saying, 'redress, redress our wrongs, O Lord God of the whole earth.'

He comes to tell your honorable body, that the dying groans of infant innocence, and the shrieks of insulted and abused females—and many of them widows of revolutionary patriots have ascended up into the ears of Omnipotence, and are registered in the archives of eternity, to be had in the day of retribution, as a testimony against the whole nation, unless their cries and groans are heard by the representatives of the people, and ample redress made, as far as the nation can make it, or else the wrath of the Almighty will come down in fury against the whole nation.

Under all these circumstances, your memorialist prays to be heard by your honorable body, touching all the matters of his memorial; and as a memorial will be presented to congress this session, for redress of our grievances, he prays your honorable body will instruct the whole delegation of Pennsylvania, in both houses, to use all their influence in the national councils, to have redress granted.

And, as in duty bound, your memorialist will ever pray.

THE GATHERING.

Jared and his brother, together with the families that were with them, and their several offsprings, were greatly blessed of God, for a length of time upon this continent; they prospered exceedingly. They were blessed with communion with the Lord, with revelations, visions, faith wisdom, and in all temporal blessings they became a great people. But when they transgressed the laws of God, the curse of Jehovah fell upon them, and they were swept from the face of the earth, according to the word of the Lord.

Abraham was made use of, he was selected and chosen as a peculiar personage, to whom God would commit his laws and ordinances, and to his seed after him, and in order that he might accomplish his purposes, he gave unto him, the land of Canaan as his inheritance, that he might be selected and set apart from all other nations; and this was the only principle upon which God could teach him his law, and establish the priesthood. It is true, that Abraham obtained it by faith, but then if he had not possessed faith, he would not have been a fit personage for the Lord to select, through whom he could communicate his will, and preserve a chosen seed upon the earth. Abraham, through a long train of afflictions, and in many trials, had proven his unflinching integrity and faithfulness to God, for many years, and when the Lord saw that he was a proper person to exalt, he said unto him, 'get thee out of thy country, and from thy kindred, and from thy father's house, unto a land that I will shew thee, and I will make of thee a great nation, and I will bless thee, and curse them that curse thee, and in thee shall all families of the earth be blessed.' And when Abraham had journeyed to the place appointed, 'the Lord appeared unto him and said, unto thy seed will I give this land,' and he afterwards entered into a covenant with Abraham, saying, 'unto thy seed have I given this land, from the river of Egypt unto the great river, the river Euphrates. The Kenites, and the Kennizites, and the Kadmonites, and the Hittites, and the Perrizites, and the Rophaines, and the Ammorites, and the Canaanites, and the Girgashites, and the Jebusites.'

That land was given unto Abraham, and unto his seed, for an everlasting inheritance, and 'Isaac, and Jacob were heirs with him, of the same promise.' The land was allotted unto the

A photograph of the Times and Seasons, vol. 5, page 423. Hiram Brown was cut off from the Mormon Church for teaching polygamy and other "false and corrupt doctrines."

The voice of reason, the voice of humanity, the voice of the nation, and the voice of heaven seem to say to the honest and virtuous, throughout the State of Missouri; Wash yourselves, make you clean, lest your negligence should be taken by the world, from the mass of facts before it, that you are guilty! Let there be one unison of hearts for justice, and when you reflect around your own firesides, remember that fifteen thousand, once among you, now not, but who are just as much entitled to the privileges and blessings you enjoy as yourselves; like the widow before the unjust judge, are fervently praying for their rights. When you meditate upon the massacre at Hawn's mill, forget not that the constitution of your state holds this broad truth to the world: that none shall "be deprived of life, liberty, or property, but by the judgment of his peers, or the law of the land." And when you assemble together in towns, counties or districts, whether to petition your legislature to pay the damage the saints have sustained in your state, by reason of oppression, and misguided zeal; or to restore them to their rights according to republican principles and benevolent designs, reflect, and make honorable, or annihilate, such statæ law as was in force in your state, in 1838; viz: "If twelve or more persons shall combine to levy war against any part of the people of this state, or to remove forcibly out of the state, or from their habitations, evidenced by taking arms and assembling to accomplish such purpose, every person so offending shall be punished by imprisonment in the penitentiary for a period not exceeding five years, or by a fine not exceeding five thousand dollars: and imprisonment in the county jail not exceeding six months."

Finally, if honor dignifies an honest people; if virtue exalts a community; if wisdom guides great men; if principle governs intelligent beings; if humanity spreads comfort among the needy; and if religion affords consolation by showing that charity is the first, best and sweetest token of perfect love: then, O ye good people of Missouri, like the woman in scripture who had lost one of her ten pieces of silver, arise, search diligently till you find the lost piece, and then make a feast and call in your friends for joy.

With due consideration

I am the friend of all good men,

JOSEPH SMITH.

Nauvoo, Ill., March 8, 1844.

Nauvoo, March 15, 1844.

To the brethren of the Church of Jesus Christ of Latterday Saints, living on China Creek, in Hancock County, Greeting:—Whereas brother Richard Hewitt has called on me to-day, to know my views concerning some doctrines that are preached in your place, and states to me that some of your elders say, that a man having a certain priesthood, may have as many wives as he pleases, and that doctrine is taught here: I say unto you that that man teaches false doctrine, for there is no such doctrine taught here; neither is there any such thing practised here. And any man that is found teaching privately or publicly any such doctrine, is culpable, and will stand a chance to be brought before the High Council, and lose his license and membership also: therefore he had better beware what he is about.

And again I say unto you, an elder has no business to undertake to preach mysteries in any part of the world, for God has commanded us all to preach nothing but the first principles unto the world. Neither has any elder any authority to preach any mysterious thing to any branch of the church unless he has a direct commandment from God to do so. Let the matter of the grand councils of heaven, and the making of gods, worlds, and devils entire'y alone: for you are not called to teach any such doctrine—for neither you nor the people are capacitated to understand any such principles—less so to teach them. For when God commands men to teach such principles the saints will receive them. Therefore beware what you teach! for the mysteries of God are not given to all men; and unto those to whom they are given they are placed under restrictions to impart only such as God will command them; and the residue is to be kept in a faithful breast, otherwise he will be brought under condemnation. By this God will prove his faithful servants, who will be called and numbered with the chosen.

And as to the celestial glory, all will enter in and possess that kingdom that obey the gospel, and continue in faith in the Lord unto the end of his days. Now, therefore, I say unto you, you must cease preaching your miraculous things, and let the mysteries alone until by and bye. Preach faith in the Lord Jesus Christ; repentance and baptism for the remission of sins; the laying on of the hands for the gift of the Holy Ghost: teaching the necessity of strict obedience unto these principles; reasoning out of the scriptures; proving them unto the people. Cease your schisms and divisions, and your contentions. Humble yourselves as in dust and ashes, lest God should make you an ensample of his wrath unto the surrounding world. Amen.

In the bonds of the everlasting covenant,

I am

Your obedient servant,

HYRUM SMITH.

A photograph of the Times and Seasons, vol. 5, page 474. Hyrum Smith, who was Joseph Smith's brother and a member of the First Presidency, calls polygamy a false doctrine.

Kirtland he would have denied it, and that he had to “unpreach” a statement he had made about “sealing” in Nauvoo:

Now if the Lord had considered it wisdom, on the day of the Kirtland endowment and great solemn assembly, to come forward and reveal to the children of men the facts that are laid down plainly in the Bible, and had told them that, without the law of sealing, no man could be exalted to a throne in the celestial kingdom, that is, without he had a woman by his side; . . . had He revealed this simple sentiment, up would have jumped some man, saying, “What! got to have a woman sealed to me in order to be saved, in order to be exalted to thrones, dominions, and eternal increase?” “Yes.” “I do not believe a word of it,” . . . Again up jumps somebody else, “Brother Joseph, I have had two wives in my lifetime, cannot I have them both in eternity?” “No.” If he had said Yes, perhaps we should all have apostatized at once. . . . We thus passed on from the year 1837 until the year 1843, . . .

Whereupon, the Prophet goes up on the stand, and, after preaching about everything else he could think of in the world, . . . makes a bare hint at the law of sealing, and it produced such a tremendous excitement that, as soon as he had got his dinner half eaten, he had to go back to the stand, and unpreach all that he had preached, and left the people to guess at the matter. (Journal of Discourses, vol. 2, pp. 216-217)

The article on marriage, which was published in the early editions of the Doctrine and Covenants (see photo on page 202 of this book), was frequently used to counteract the report that polygamy was being practiced. On September 1, 1842, this statement appeared in the Times and Seasons:

Inasmuch as the public mind has been unjustly abused through the fallacy of Dr. Bennett’s letters, we make an extract on the subject of marriage, showing the rule of the Church on this important matter. The extract is from the Book of Doctrine and Covenants, and is the only rule allowed by the Church.

“All legal contracts of marriage made before a person is baptized into this church, should be held sacred and fulfilled. Inasmuch as this church of Christ has been reproached with the crime of fornication, and polygamy; we declare that we believe, that one man should have one wife; and one woman, but one husband, except in case of death, when either is at liberty to marry again.” (Times and Seasons, vol. 3, p. 909)

A similar statement appeared in the Times and Seasons on October 1, 1842 (see vol. 3, pages 939-940).

In the Times and Seasons, vol. 4, page 143, we find the following:

We are charged with advocating a plurality of wives, and common property. Now this is as false as the many other ridiculous charges which are brought against us. No sect have a greater reverence for the laws of matrimony, or the rights of private property, and we do what others do not, practice what we preach.

In the Latter-Day Saints’ Millennial Star an article was published in which the following was stated:

But, for the information of those who may be assailed by those foolish tales about two wives, we would say that no such principle ever existed among the Latter-day Saints, and never will; this is well known to all who are acquainted with our books and actions, the Book of Mormon, Doctrine and Covenants; and also all our periodicals are very strict on that subject, indeed far more so than the bible. (Millennial Star, vol. 3, p. 74)

William Law, who was at one time a member of the First Presidency of the Mormon Church, became very disturbed by Joseph Smith’s practices and charged him with adultery. He joined with a few others and attempted to publish the Nauvoo Expositor. In the first and only issue we find the following:

It is a notorious fact, that many females . . . are requested to meet brother Joseph, or some of the Twelve, at some insulated point, or at some particularly described place on the bank of the Mississippi, or at some room, which wears upon its front— POSITIVELY NO

ADMITTANCE. . . after having been sworn in one of the most solemn manners, to never divulge what is revealed to them, with a penalty of death attached, that God Almighty has revealed it to him, that she should be his (Joseph’s) spiritual wife; for it was right anciently, and God will tolerate it again: but we must keep those pleasures and blessings from the world, for until there is a change in government, we will endanger ourselves by practicing it—. . . (Nauvoo Expositor, June 7, 1844, p. 2)

In an affidavit published in the Nauvoo Expositor, Austin Cowles stated:

In the latter part of the summer, 1843, the Patriarch, Hyrum Smith, did in the High Council, of which I was a member, introduce what he said was a revelation given through the Prophet; . . . according to his reading there was contained the following doctrines; 1st, the sealing up of persons to eternal life, against all sins, save that of shedding innocent blood or of consenting thereto; 2nd, the doctrine of a plurality of wives, or marrying virgins; that “David and Solomon had many wives, yet in this they sinned not save in the matter of Uriah. (Nauvoo Expositor, June 7, 1844)

On June 8, 1844, the Nauvoo City Council met and declared the Nauvoo Expositor a “public nuisance.” Joseph Smith stated: “I immediately ordered the Marshal to destroy it without delay, . . .” (History of the Church, vol. 6, p. 432). For more information on this matter see pages 257-258 of this book.

Joseph Smith and his brother Hyrum emphatically denied the Expositor’s charge that they were practicing polygamy. Hyrum Smith claimed that Austin Cowles statement was a “falsehood”:

Councillor H. Smith proceeded to show the falsehood of Austin Cowles in the “Expositor,” in relation to the revelation referred to, that it was in reference to former days, and not the present time as related by Cowles. (Nauvoo Neighbor, June 19, 1844)

When this statement was reprinted in the History of the Church, the last seventeen words were deleted without any indication to cover up the fact that Hyrum Smith had lied:

Councilor Hyrum Smith proceeded to show the falsehood of Austin Cowles in the Expositor, in relation to the revelation referred to. (History of the Church, vol. 6, p. 442)

Hyrum Smith also made this statement:

Councilor, H. Smith, . . . referred to the revelation, read to the High Council of the Church, which has caused so much talk about a multiplicity of wives, that said Revelation was in answer to a question concerning things which transpired in former days, and had no reference to the present time. (Nauvoo Neighbor, June 19, 1844)

When the Mormon historians reprinted this they left off the clause “and had no reference to the present time”:

Councilor Hyrum Smith . . . Referred to the revelation read to the High Council of the Church, which has caused so much talk, about multiplicity of wives; that said revelation was in answer to a question concerning things which transpired in former days. (History of the Church, vol. 6, p. 435)

The Nauvoo Neighbor reported the following concerning Joseph Smith:

He then read several statements of Austin Cowles in the Expositor concerning a private interview, and said he never had any private conversation with Austin Cowles on these subjects—that he preached on the stand from the bible, shewing the order in ancient days, having nothing to do with [t]he present times. (Nauvoo Neighbor, June 19, 1844)

When this was reprinted in the History of the Church, the clause “having nothing to do with [t]he present times” was deleted without any indication:

He then read several statements of Austin Cowles in the Expositor concerning a private interview, and said he never had any private conversations with Austin Cowles on these subjects; that he preached on the stand from the Bible, showing the order in ancient days. (History of the Church, vol. 6, p. 441)

Eight years after the Mormon leaders destroyed the Nauvoo Expositor, they published the revelation on plural marriage. This revelation proves beyond all doubt that the statements in Cowles affidavit are true. Thus it is plain to see that the Nauvoo Expositor was condemned on the basis of false testimony given by Joseph and Hyrum Smith.

After Joseph Smith's death, the Mormon leaders still tried to keep the doctrine of plural marriage secret. John J. Stewart stated: ". . . the doctrine had to kept confidential until after the Saints reached Utah" (Brigham Young and His Wives, p. 31). On May 1, 1845, the following statement appeared in the Times and Seasons:

For once let us say, that Cain, who went to Nod, and taught the doctrine of a "plurality of wives;" and the giants who practiced the same iniquity; . . . are all coworkers on the same plan:—when the reward for every man's work is given—this will be the everlasting answer to all sects, sorts, and conditions, from Cain down to Christian Israelites, I never knew you! (Times and Seasons, vol. 6, p. 888)

On page 894 of the same volume this statement appeared:

Sidney Rigdon, I see by the papers, has made an exposition of Mormonism, charging Joseph Smith and the Mormons with polygamy, &c. . . .

As to the charge of polygamy, I will quote from the Book of Doctrine and Covenants, which is the subscribed faith of the church and is strictly enforced. Article Marriage, sec. 91, par. 4, says, "Inasmuch as this church of Christ has been reproached with the crime of fornication and polygamy, we declare that we believe that one man should have but one wife, and one woman but one husband . . ."

In the July 1, 1845, issue of the Millennial Star the Mormon apostle Parley P. Pratt wrote:

Again, beware of seducing spirits, and doctrines of devils, as first introduced by John C. Bennet, under the name of the "spiritual wife" doctrine; . . .

Should any elder or member, come unto you professing to hold to any such doctrine or practice, either secretly or publicly, you may be sure he is not of God; and it becomes your duty to reject him, . . . he will be immediately disfellowshipped, and expelled from the church.

For know assuredly that no one has been authorized to teach, practice, or introduce any such doctrine in any of the branches of the church. Nor is there any such doctrine known, held, or practised, as a principle of the Latter-day Saints. (Millennial Star, vol. 6, p. 22)

The following is taken from an article published in the Times and Seasons on November 15, 1844:

. . . as if the law of the land allowed a man a plurality of wives, is fiendish, and like the rest of Sidney's revelation, just because he wanted "to go to Pittsburg and live." Wo to the man or men who will thus wilfully lie to injure an innocent people! The law of the land and the rules of the Church do not allow man to have more than one wife alive at once, . . . (Times and Seasons, vol. 5, p. 715)

When someone stated that Joseph Smith taught polygamy, the Latter-Day Saints' Millennial Star called it a lie:

12th Lie.—Joseph Smith taught a system of polygamy.

12th Refutation.—The Revelations given through Joseph Smith, state the following: . . . "We believe that one man should have one wife." Doctrine and Covenants, page 331. (Millennial Star, vol. 12, pp. 29-30)

As late as 1850 John Taylor, who became the third President of the Mormon Church, denied that the church believed in the practice of plural marriage, when he himself had six living wives.

In a public discussion in Boulogne-Sur-Mer, France, he stated:

We are accused here of polygamy, and actions the most indelicate, obscene, and disgusting, such that none but a corrupt and depraved heart could have contrived. These things are too outrageous to admit of belief; . . . I shall content myself by reading our views of chastity and marriage, from a work published by us, containing some of the articles of our Faith. "Doctrine and Covenants," page 330 . . . "Inasmuch as this Church of Jesus Christ has been reproached with the crime of fornication and polygamy, we declare that we believe that one man should have one wife, and one woman but one husband, except in case of death, when either is at liberty to marry again." (A tract published by John Taylor in 1850, p. 8; found in Orson Pratt's Works, 1851 edition)

The names of the six wives John Taylor had at this time are found in The Life of John Taylor, by B. H. Roberts, page 465. These names are listed below as well as the marriage dates.

Lonora Cannon, January 28, 1833
Elizabeth Haigham, December 12, 1843
Jane Ballantyne, February 25, 1844
Mary Ann Oakley, April, 1845
Sophia Whitaker, April, 23, 1847
Harriet Whitaker, December 4, 1847

There is no doubt that many of the Mormon people were very embarrassed when their leaders announced that polygamy was a doctrine of the church. Elder John Jaques wrote the following:

But to the question—Have not the Latter-day Saints denied that a plurality of wives existed in their midst, when such was actually the case? Doubtless some have, because they did not know that such was the case. . . . they are not culpable for denying it, because, to the best of their knowledge, such was not the case.

Probably you may wish to put the question still closer to me—Have not some Elders of the Latter-day Saints denied that Polygamy was practised in the Church, when at the same time they positively knew that it was? That is a personal question, and must be answered accordingly. I can only answer for myself—I have not, neither have I heard any other Elder.

The question may arise in your mind—If a plurality of wives has been prevalent in the Church so long, why have not the Elders publicly preached the doctrine? The answer is very plain. Because neither the body of the Saints nor Christendom were prepared for it. (Millennial Star, vol. 15, p. 165)

While Mr. Jaques may have been able to claim ignorance for an excuse, Joseph Smith, John Taylor and other Mormon leaders had no such excuse.

As we have already shown in another chapter, the Mormon leaders continued to pursue a deceitful course with regard to polygamy even after they issued the Manifesto. The reader will remember that Wilford Woodruff, the fourth President of the Mormon Church, testified before the Master in Chancery that the Manifesto was supposed to end all unlawful cohabitation even though the marriages had been performed before it was issued. Secretly, however, he taught that "This manifesto only refers to future marriages, and does not affect past conditions" ("The Daily Journal of Abraham H. Cannon." October 7, 1890). It is very obvious, then, that Wilford Woodruff was guilty of perjury in his testimony given before the Master in Chancery. That the Mormon leaders were embarrassed by this false testimony is evident from the Apostle Cannon's journal. Under the date of April 1, 1892, he reported the following:

. . . we got seven of the brethren together . . . Pres. Snow . . . then continued: ". . . When the Manifesto was issued we had no idea that it was to effect our cohabitation with our wives, but Pres. Woodruff and his brethren who were on the witness stand before the Master in Chancery, were forced to go further in their testimony than we anticipated, or we would have been placed in a worse position than we were before the Manifesto was issued.—It is the privilege of you brethren to see the Savior, and thus testify of Him and that you know He lives.”—Heber J. Grant said: “I remember Pres. Woodruff saying that the Manifesto would never apply to our living with our wives, and he would see them damned and in hell before he would agree to cease living with his wives or advise any other person to do so. . . . Concerning the living with our wives, I believe that if we had taken the manly stand and had said we will continue to live with and honor our present wives but will cease marrying in the future, we would have fared better; but now I cannot see any chance of our ever being permitted to live with our wives in freedom again.” (“Daily Journal of Abraham H. Cannon,” April 1, 1892)

The church leaders not only continued to practice unlawful cohabitation, but they also continued to perform plural marriages long after the Manifesto was issued. When they found themselves in trouble over this matter, they went so far as to ask Anthony W. Ivins to go back to Washington, D.C., and give false testimony before the Committee on Privileges and Elections of the United States Senate.

The Mormon Battalion

The story of the Mormon Battalion clearly reveals the duplicity of the early Mormon leaders. The Mormon Battalion was composed of 500 Mormons who were called by the President of the United States to serve in the U.S. Army. This group was raised after the Mormons left Nauvoo and were established in Winter Quarters. Dr. Hugh Nibley claims that this was a “great patriotic sacrifice” on the part of the Mormons. The anti-Mormon writer T.B.H. Stenhouse, however, said that “the instructions of the Federal Government to employ the Mormon volunteers was an act of sympathetic kindness. The Government did not require them at all, but extended as far as consistent its aid” (The Rocky Mountain Saints, 1873, p. 240).

Many Mormons have claimed that the President was persecuting them when he asked for the Battalion. Brigham Young, the second President of the Mormon Church, went so far as to say that President Polk should have been hung for requesting the Battalion. On September 13, 1857, he stated:

There cannot be a more damnable, dastardly order issued than was issued by the Administration to this people while they were in an Indian Country, in 1846 . . . while we were doing our best to leave their borders, the poor, low, degraded curses sent a requisition for five hundred of our men to go and fight their battles! That was President Polk; and he is now weltering in hell with old Zachary Taylor, where the present administrators will soon be, if they do not repent. . . .

There is high treason in Washington; and if the law was carried out, it would hang up many of them. And the very act of James K. Polk in taking five hundred of our men, while we were making our way out of the country under an agreement forced upon us, would have hung him between the heavens and the earth, if the laws had been faithfully executed. (Journal of Discourses, vol. 5, pp. 231, 232, 235)

On February 18, 1855, Brigham Young stated:

Permit me to draw your attention, for a moment, to a few facts in relation to raising the Battalion . . . I ask, had we not reason to feel that our enemies were in the ascendant? that even the government, by their silent acquiescence, were also in favor of our destruction? Had we not, I ask, some reason to consider them all, both the people and the government, alike our enemies?

And when, in addition to all this, and while fleeing from our enemies, another test of fidelity and patriotism was contrived by them for our destruction, and acquiesced in by the Government, . . . consisting of a requisition from the War Department, to furnish a Battalion . . . I ask again, could we refrain from considering both people and government our most deadly foes? . . . under these trying circumstances we were required to turn out of our travelling camps 500 of our most efficient men, leaving the old, the young, the women upon the hands of the residue, to take care of and support; and in case we refused to comply with so unreasonable a requirement, we were to be deemed enemies to the Government, and fit only for the slaughter.

Look also at the proportion of the number required of us, compared with that of any other portion of the Republic. . . . our quota of an equitable requisition would not have exceeded four persons. Instead of this, five hundred must go, thirteen thousand per cent above an equal ratio, even if all other things had been equal, but under the peculiar circumstances in which it was made comparison fails to demonstrate, and reason itself totters beneath its enormity. And for whom were we to fight? As I have already shown, for those that we had every reason to believe were our most deadly foes. . . . history furnished no parallel, either of the severity and injustice of the demand, or in the alacrity, faithfulness, and patriotism with which it was answered and complied. (Journal of Discourses, vol. 2, pp. 173-175)

John Taylor and Wilford Woodruff made similar statements. Joseph Fielding Smith, who recently became the tenth President of the Church, also claimed that the request for the Mormon Battalion was an act of persecution (see Doctrines of Salvation, vol. 3, pp. 360-361).

The anti-Mormon writer R. N. Baskin claimed that the Government’s request for the Mormon Battalion was a means of helping the Mormons and that the Mormon leaders misrepresented the Government’s motives in calling for the Battalion:

The masses of the people in Utah were formerly taught, and yet believe, that the government . . . demand was made for the purpose of oppressing the Mormons. . . .

Both Brigham Young and Wilford Woodruff knew that the enlistment of the Mormon Battalion was requested by Colonel Little, who represented the Mormon Church, and that President Polk granted the request for the purpose of assisting the Mormons on their journey to the West, and not to oppress or injure them. (Reminiscences of Early Utah, 1914, pp. 193-194)

Although the Mormon leaders later claimed that the Government was trying to persecute them when they called for the Battalion, their own books and journals written at the time prove that they considered it a favor. John Taylor, who became the third President of the Mormon Church, wrote the following in 1846:

. . . the President of the United States is favourably disposed to us. He has sent out orders to have five hundred of our brethren employed in an expedition . . . it amounts to the same as paying them for going to the place where they were destined to go without. They also had the privilege of choosing their own leaders. (Millennial Star, vol. 8, p. 117)

On July 13, 1846, Hosea Stout wrote that the Mormon Apostle George A. Smith explained that the Mormons themselves had requested the Government to help them and that the calling of the Mormon Battalion was a special favor:

To day Br George A. Smith gave an account of Col Kane the man from Washington spoken of before.

Col Kane & Elder Little from the East he said were the ones who brought about the order for the 500 mormon troops and that it was done as a special favor to us by the President & that they brought the dispatches to Col Kearney Commander of the West, who detailed Capt. James Allen to us to execute the same. This made the matter plain and I was well satisfied for I found that there was no trick in it. (On The Mormon Frontier, The Diary of Hosea Stout, vol. 1, p. 178)

The most devastating evidence against the Mormon claims of persecution, however, comes from the “Manuscript

History of Brigham Young” in the seventh volume of the History of the Church. Unfortunately, however, he discontinued following it with the close of February, 1846, claiming that there was an “inadequacy” of space in that volume to continue daily entries. Nevertheless, B. H. Roberts must have read the part concerning the Mormon Battalion, for he told the truth concerning it. He admitted that the whole thing was planned by the Mormon leaders and that there was no persecution involved:

... Jesse C. Little ... had been appointed to preside over the Eastern States Mission with instructions to visit Washington ... Elder Little contacted the federal administration and ... obtained the promise of President James K. Polk that an opportunity would be given for a company of at least 500 men ... Elder Little had proposed to raise 1000 settlers for California in the eastern branches of the church and 1000 men from their encampments on the Missouri, but the administration decided to take into service only 500 men. ...

Unfortunately there were many misapprehensions concerning the enlistment of this company of volunteers. For a long time it was represented as current traditional history that the opportunity given for enlistment was a “demand” or “requisition” or “draft” ... unjust and out of all proportion to the membership of the church, and made from sinister motives of encompassing the destruction of the moving caravans either by scattering or annihilating them. ... Nothing of this kind, of course, could be implied in the action of the administration at Washington, still it was so reported and believed. In the first place, a much larger offer than 500 men was tendered to the administration, and the service was almost piteously pleaded for by a representative of the Church—the president of the Eastern States Mission. ... The quota in most of the states was over-subscribed by three times the number asked for, and the United States did not really need the service of the Mormon Battalion of 500 men in the sense that there was a lack of volunteers. The war was a very popular one. (History of the Church, vol. 7, pp. 611-613)

Even though B. H. Roberts admits the truth concerning the Mormon Battalion, he is careful not to mention the fact that Brigham Young, John Taylor and Wilford Woodruff were the men who misrepresented the story of the Mormon Battalion.

Fortunately, we have been able to obtain a copy of the “Manuscript History of Brigham Young.” This history proves beyond all doubt that the Mormon leaders requested the Government to help them and that President Polk did them a special favor when he called for the Battalion. In a letter to “Prest. Samuel Bent & Council,” dated July 7, 1846, Brigham Young stated:

Elder Little, President of the New England churches, is here also, direct from Washington, who has been to see the President on the subject of emigrating the Saints to the western coast, and confirms all that Capt. Allen has stated to us. The U.S. want our friendship, the President wants to do us good, and secure our confidence. The outfit of these five hundred men costs us nothing, and their pay will be sufficient to take their families over the mountains. There is war between Mexico and the U.S., to whom California must fall prey, and if we are the first settlers, the old citizens cannot have a Hancock or Missouri pretext to mob the saints. The thing is from above, for our good, has long been understood between us and the U.S. Government, but the first blow was struck sooner than we anticipated, the church would not help the Twelve over the mountains when they wanted to go, and now we will help the churches. (“Manuscript History of Brigham Young,” July 7, 1846, typed copy)

On July 13, 1846, Brigham Young made a speech in which he made the following statement:

Now, suppose we refuse this privilege, what will we do? If you won't go, I will go and leave you. We told you some time ago we would fit you out to go, and now we are ready to fit you out with Capn. Allen as the agent of the U.S. to help us. The President has now stretched out his hand to help us and I thank God and him too. (“Manuscript History of Brigham Young,” July 13, 1846)

R. N. Baskin quoted Henry W. Lawrence as making the following statement:

... there was a battalion called for from the Mormons ... I always supposed, from the teachings of the Mormon leaders, that it was a requisition, and I have heard over and over the government handled roughly—denounced for calling upon the Mormon people for 500 of their best men, to cripple them right there on the banks of the Missouri, in the most trying time. ... I used often to think that that was a most damnable thing. That was preached in sermons by Brigham Young, by George A. Smith and the other leading men of the church, time and time again. The true condition of the thing was, we afterwards found out, and it was one of the things that turned me against the system, that it was on the solicitation of the agents of this church that the battalion was asked for. Jesse S. Little was one of them. The government, out of kindness to the people, and on the solicitations of the agents of this church, asked for that battalion. They paid them one or two months' wages in advance, and that money was used to help buy teams and assistance for the people, and helped them to come out here to Salt Lake. Instead of the truth being told, they were told that it was done in order to cripple them in the face of the Indians. This was one of the things they taught the people to prejudice them against the government of the United States. (Reminiscences of Early Utah, pp. 195-196)

R. N. Baskin charged that Brigham Young was guilty of “flagrant duplicity” because of his statements concerning the Mormon Battalion. A careful comparison of Brigham Young's statements made in 1846 with statements he made in 1857 does show “duplicity” on his part. In 1846 he said:

Elder Little, President of the New England churches ... has been to see the President on the subject of emigrating the Saints to the western coast, ... The U.S. want our friendship, the President wants to do us good, and secure our confidence. The outfit of these five hundred men costs us nothing, and their pay will be sufficient to take their families over the mountains ... the thing is from above, for our good, has long been understood between us and the U.S. Government, ... (“Manuscript History of Brigham Young,” July 7, 1846)

Just eleven years later (1857) Brigham Young stated:

There cannot be a more damnable, dastardly order issued than was issued by the Administration to this people while they were in an Indian country, in 1846. ... the poor, low, degraded curses sent a requisition for five hundred of our men to go and fight their battles! That was President Polk; and he is now weltering in hell ... the very act of James K. Polk in taking five hundred of our men, while we were making our way out of the country under an agreement forced upon us, would have hung him between the heavens and the earth, if the laws had been faithfully executed. (Journal of Discourses, vol. 5, pp. 231, 232, 235)

These statements by Brigham Young reveal duplicity of the very worst kind. For a more complete treatment of this whole matter see our Case, vol. 1, pages 27-34.

Making God a Liar

The Apostle John A. Widtsoe claimed that Joseph Smith was a man of truth:

The explanation that Joseph Smith was a deliberate deceiver has not satisfied all students. The record of Joseph's life is one of honesty. He taught honesty in all affairs; he insisted that his people be honest; the verified events of his life show him always reaching out for honesty. (Joseph Smith—Seeker After Truth, 1951 edition, p. 324)

It does not take much research to show that these statements concerning Joseph Smith are completely false.

As we have shown, Joseph Smith was completely dishonest in regard to the doctrine of polygamy. Strange as it may seem, however, the Book of Mormon teaches that liars will go to hell. In 2 Nephi 9:34 we read: “Wo unto the liar, for he shall be thrust down to hell.” In Enos 1:6 we read “And I, Enos, knew that God could not lie; wherefore my guilt was swept away.” In Ether 3:12 we find the following: “And he answered: Yea, Lord, I know that thou speakest the truth, for thou art a God of truth, and canst not lie.”

While the Book of Mormon, which was first printed in 1830, teaches that God is a God of truth, the Book of Abraham, published 12 years later, seems to teach that God approves of and encourages the practice of lying. In Abraham 2:22-25 we read that God told Abraham to lie concerning his wife. The Bible teaches that it was Abraham who told his wife to lie, not the Lord. In the book of Genesis we read:

And it came to pass, when he was come near to enter into Egypt, that he said unto Sarai his wife, Behold now, I know that thou art a fair woman to look upon:

Therefore it shall come to pass, when the Egyptians shall see thee, that they shall say, This is his wife: and they will kill me, but they will save thee alive.

Say, I pray thee, thou art my sister: that it may be well with me for thy sake; and my soul shall live because of thee. (Genesis 12:11-13)

In Joseph Smith’s Book of Abraham we find that this story has been rewritten to make it appear that God told Abraham to lie about his wife:

And it came to pass when I was come near to enter into Egypt, the Lord said unto me: Behold, Sarai, thy wife, is a very fair woman to look upon;

Therefore it shall come to pass, when the Egyptians shall see her, they will say—She is his wife; and they will kill you, but they will save her alive; therefore see that ye do on this wise:

Let her say unto the Egyptians, she is thy sister, and thy soul shall live.

And it came to pass that I, Abraham, told Sarai, my wife, all that the Lord had said unto me—Therefore say unto them, I pray thee, thou art my sister, that it may be well with me for thy sake, and my soul shall live because of thee. (Pearl of Great Price, Abraham 2:22-25)

Perhaps Joseph Smith rewrote the Bible story of Abraham and his wife, making God responsible for lying, to justify his own conduct. Since Joseph Smith could not tell the truth about his practice of polygamy, he evidently felt that it would be wise to make it appear that God approved of lying. His followers who knew that he practiced polygamy would then feel that it was God’s will for him to deny it.

Conclusion

In this chapter we have found that the Mormon Church leaders claim that their church operates in “full light,” that there “is no secrecy about its doctrine,” and that it has “fought half-truth and untruth.” Research, however, reveals that the church has not always operated in full light. Sometimes secrecy is used to further its purposes, and sometimes untruth and cover up have been used. The Mormon leaders would do well to consider these words found in the book of Isaiah:

Woe unto them that seek deep to hide their counsel from the Lord, and their works are in the dark, and they say, Who seeth us? and who knoweth us?

Surely your turning of things upside down shall be esteemed as the potter’s clay: for shall the work say of him that made it, He made me not? or shall the thing framed say of him that framed it, He had no understanding? (Isaiah 29:15-16)

19. Joseph Smith

The importance of Joseph Smith in Mormon theology cannot be overemphasized. Brigham Young, the second President of the Mormon Church, made these statements:

Well, now, examine the character of the Savior, and examine the characters of those who have written the Old and New Testament; and then compare them with the character of Joseph Smith, the founder of this work— . . . and you will find that his character stands as fair as that of any man’s mentioned in the Bible. We can find no person who presents a better character to the world when the facts are known than Joseph Smith, Jun., the prophet, and his brother, Hyrum Smith, who was murdered with him. (Journal of Discourses, vol. 14, p. 203)

. . . a better man never lived upon the face of this earth. (Ibid., vol. 1, p. 41)

I shall bow to Jesus, my Governor, and under him, to brother Joseph . . . he is my head, under Jesus Christ . . . (Ibid., vol. 4, p. 41)

. . . no man or woman in this dispensation will ever enter into the celestial kingdom of God without the consent of Joseph Smith. . . . every man and woman must have the certificate of Joseph Smith, junior, as a passport to their entrance into the mansion where God and Christ are— . . . I cannot go there without his consent . . . He reigns there as supreme a being in his sphere, capacity, and calling, as God does in heaven. (Ibid., vol. 7, p. 289)

He is the man through whom God has spoken...yet I would not like to call him a saviour, though in a certain capacity he was a God to us, and is to the nations of the earth, and will continue to be. (Ibid., vol. 8, p. 321)

What an uproar it would make in the Christian world to say, I am an Apostle of Joseph. Write it down, and write it back to your friends in the east, that I am an apostle of Joseph Smith. . . . all who reject my testimony will go to hell, so sure as there is one, no matter whether it be hot or cold; . . . (Ibid., vol. 3, p. 212)

I will now give my scripture—“Whosoever confesseth that Joseph Smith was sent of God . . . that spirit is of God; and every spirit that does not confess that God has sent Joseph Smith, and revealed the everlasting Gospel to and through him, is of Antichrist, . . .” (Ibid., vol. 8, p. 176)

Heber C. Kimball, who was a member of the First Presidency under Brigham Young, made these statements concerning Joseph Smith:

You call us fools; but the day will be, gentlemen and ladies, whether you belong to this Church or not, when you will prize brother Joseph Smith as the Prophet of the Living God, and look upon him as a God, and also upon Brigham Young, our Governor in the Territory of Deseret. (Journal of Discourses, vol. 5, p. 88)

In the Bible we read that when Stephen was stoned, he died “calling upon God, and saying, Lord Jesus, receive my spirit.” (Acts 7:59) When Brigham Young died, however, his last words were “Joseph, Joseph, Joseph!” The Mormon historian B. H. Roberts states:

“The last words he uttered, that were distinctly understood,” says the bedside chronicle, were—

“Joseph, Joseph, Joseph!”*

Other remarks relating to “Joseph” were expressed, but in a manner that was not comprehended. They gave evidence, however, that his mind was occupied with thoughts of his predecessor, the Prophet Joseph Smith. (A Comprehensive History of the Church, vol. 5, p. 509)

In a letter to us, dated April 14, 1961, Levi Edgar Young, one of the First Seven Presidents of Seventies, made this statement: “The grandeur of Joseph Smith’s life must become known to the people of the world, and I am praying daily that people by the thousands may turn to him” (Letter photographically reprinted in our Case Against Mormonism, vol. 1, p. 75).

Mormons tend to elevate Joseph Smith almost to the same level as Jesus Christ. The Mormon writer John J. Stewart stated that Joseph Smith was “perhaps the most Christ-like man to live upon the earth since Jesus himself” (Joseph Smith, The Mormon Prophet, p. 1). It is interesting to compare this with Joseph Smith’s own statement in the History of the Church, vol. 5, page 335: “I am not so much a ‘Christian’ as many suppose I am. When a man undertakes to ride me for a horse, I feel disposed to kick up and throw him off, and ride him.”

The following appeared in Tiffany’s Monthly in 1859:

People sometimes wonder that the Mormon can revere Joseph Smith. That they can by any means make a Saint of him. But they must remember, that the Joseph Smith preached in England, and the one shot at Carthage, Ill., are not the same. The ideal prophet differs widely from the real person. To one, ignorant of his character, he may be idealized and be made the impersonation of every virtue. He may be associated in the mind with all that is pure, true, lovely and divine. Art may make him, indeed, an object of religious veneration. But remember, the Joseph Smith thus venerated, is not the real, actual Joseph Smith . . . but one that art has created. (Tiffany’s Monthly, 1859, p. 170)

A Fighting Prophet

Joseph Smith was a man of great physical strength. He enjoyed wrestling and other sports where he could display his strength. Under the date of March 11, 1843, we find this entry in Joseph Smith’s History: “In the evening, when pulling sticks, I pulled up Justus A. Morse, the strongest man in Ramus, with one hand” (History of the Church, vol. 5, p. 302). Two days later Joseph Smith recorded: “Monday, 13.—I wrestled with William Wall, the most expert wrestler in Ramus, and threw him” (Ibid., p. 302). On June 30, 1843, Joseph Smith gave a speech in Nauvoo in which he stated: “I feel as strong as a giant. I pulled sticks with the men coming along, and I pulled up with one hand the strongest man that could be found. Then two men tried, but they could not pull me up, . . .” (Ibid., p. 466).

Mrs. Mary Ettie V. Smith gives this information in the *FOOTNOTE: Lester E. Bush, Jr., says that “The dying exclamation, ‘Joseph, Joseph, Joseph’ later attributed to Brigham by a daughter present at his death is mentioned neither by Richard Young nor the doctors” (Journal of Mormon History, vol. 5, p. 99). However this may be, Joseph Fielding Smith and other Mormon historians have accepted without question the words attributed to Brigham Young. Assistant Church Historian James B. Allen and Glen M. Leonard write: “His last words were simply: ‘Joseph! Joseph! Joseph!’” (The Story of the Latter-day Saints, 1976, p. 375).

book Mormonism: Its Rise, Progress, And Present Condition, by N. W. Green, p. 52:

It appears the Prophet Joseph had one day broken the leg of my brother Howard, while wrestling. They . . . were both fond of that sport, and on this occasion they had wrestled with uncommon enthusiasm, when, by an unlucky pass, Howard fell with a broken leg. It was immediately set by the "Prophet," . . . Howard to this day claims he experienced no pain of any amount, and believes yet that Joseph healed it.

John D. Lee related that one day Joseph Smith and some of his men were wrestling. Because it was "the Sabbath day" Sidney Rigdon tried to break it up. Joseph Smith "dragged him from the ring, bareheaded, and tore Rigdon's fine pulpit coat from the collar to the waist; then he turned to the men and said: 'Go in, boys, and have your fun'" (Confessions of John D. Lee, pp. 76-78).

He liked foot races and would have his boots off in a moment, to the great grief of old bigots. I remember the visit of a U.S.A. major, . . . Joseph wanted to wrestle with him. He threw off his coat and cried: "I bet you five dollars that I will throw you, come on!" The major declined, Joseph laughed and said: "Now you see the benefit of one's being a prophet; I knew you wouldn't wrestle." One of the Saints felt so scandalized by this joke of the prophet that he left the Church.

Two reverends came one day to Nauvoo . . . Joseph took them to his study, . . . The two reverends interrupted Joseph frequently . . . getting impatient the Prophet said to the two holy men, while he stood up in his full h[igh]light: "Gentlemen, I am not much of a theologian, but I bet you five dollars, that I will throw you one after the other." The reverends ran away and Joseph laughed himself nearly to death.

Jedediah M. Grant, a member of the First Presidency under Brigham Young, related this humorous incident:

I am aware that a great many have so much piety in them, that they are like the Baptist priest who came to see Joseph Smith. . . . the Baptist stood before him, and folding his arms said, "Is it possible that I now flash my optics upon a man who has conversed with my Savior?" "Yes," says the Prophet, "I don't know but you do; would not you like to wrestle with me?" That, you see, brought the priest right on to the thrashing floor, and he turned a summerset right straight. After he had whirled round a few times, like a duck shot in the head, he concluded that his piety had been awfully shocked, even to the centre, and went to the Prophet to learn why he had so shocked his piety. (Journal of Discourses, vol. 3, pp. 66-67)

Joseph Smith sometimes lost his temper and resorted to physical violence, Benjamin F. Johnson stated:

And yet, although so social and even convivial at times, he would allow no arrogance or undue liberties. Criticisms, even by his associates, were rarely acceptable. Contradictions would arouse in him the lion at once. By no one of his fellows would he be superceded. In the early days at Kirtland, and elsewhere, one or another of his associates were more than once, for their impudence, helped from the congregation by his foot. . . . He soundly thrashed his brother William, . . . While with him in such fraternal, social and sometimes convivial moods, we could not then so fully realize the greatness and majesty of his calling. But since his martyrdom, it has continued to magnify in our view as the glories of this last dispensation have more fully unfolded to our comprehension. (Letter by Benjamin F. Johnson to Elder George S. Gibbs, 1903, as printed in The Testimony of Joseph Smith's Best Friend, pp. 4-5)

Calvin Stoddard once testified that "Smith then came up and knocked him in the forehead with his flat hand—the blow knocked him down, when Smith repeated the blow four or five times, very hard—made him blind—that Smith afterwards came to him and asked his forgiveness . . ." (Conflict at Kirtland, p. 132). The Mormon writer Max Parkin quotes Luke Johnson as saying that when a minister insulted Joseph Smith at Kirtland, Ohio, Smith

"boxed his ears with both hands, and turning his face towards the door, kicked him into the street, . . ." (Ibid., p. 268).

In Joseph Smith's History for the year 1843, he tells of two fights which he had in Nauvoo:

Josiah Butterfield came to my house and insulted me so outrageously that I kicked him out of the house, across the yard, and into the street. (History of the Church, vol. 5, p. 316)

Bagby called me a liar, and picked up a stone to throw at me, which so enraged me that I followed him a few steps, and struck him two or three times. Esquire Daniel H. Wells stepped between us and succeeded in separating us. I told the Esquire to assess the fine for the assault, and I was willing to pay it. He not doing it, I rode down to Alderman Whitney, stated the circumstances, and he imposed a fine which I paid, and then returned to the political meeting. (Ibid., p. 524)

On August 13, 1843, Joseph Smith admitted that he had tried to choke Walter Bagby: "I met him, and he gave me some abusive language, taking up a stone to throw at me: I seized him by the throat to choke him off" (Ibid., p. 531).

Brigham Young once made this statement concerning Joseph Smith:

Some may think that I am rather too severe; but if you had the Prophet Joseph to deal with, you would think that I am quite mild. . . . He would not bear the usage I have borne, and would appear as though he would tear down all the houses in the city, and tear up trees by the roots, if men conducted to him in the way they have to me. (Journal of Discourses, vol. 8, pp. 317-318)

General Smith

Joseph Smith was very interested in military matters. This is reflected in the Book of Mormon, for it is filled with accounts of wars and bloodshed. Dr. Hugh Nibley admits that "Readers of the Book of Mormon often express disgust or at least weariness and impatience at having to wade through 170 pages of wars and alarms in a religious book. This writer must confess to having suffered from the same prejudice . . . In twenty years of writing about the Book of Mormon we have studiously ignored the war stories. But that is where we were wrong" (Since Cumorah, p. 328).

Only four years after Joseph Smith published the Book of Mormon, he organized an army and marched "to Missouri to 'redeem Zion.'" This project was a complete failure (see The Mormon Kingdom, vol. 1, pp. 3-4). In 1838 Joseph Smith had the Mormons organized into an army at Far West, Missouri, but he ended up surrendering to the Militia. At Nauvoo, Illinois, the Mormons organized the Nauvoo Legion. Robert Bruce Flanders states:

The crowning provision of the charter gave the city its own little army, the famous Nauvoo Legion. . . . The Legion was therefore independent of and not subject to the military laws of Illinois. (Nauvoo: Kingdom On The Mississippi, p. 100)

. . . "Colonel," "Captain," or "General" came to replace "Brother," "Elder," or "President" in the address of the Saints. Military trappings were for them a particular symbol of status, prestige, and reassurance . . . The record clearly reveals that Lieutenant General (he preferred the full title) Smith set great store by his military role. . . .

As the city grew, so did the Legion, exciting apprehension among gentiles in the vicinity concerning the nature and intent of the Mormon kingdom. (Ibid., pp. 112-113)

Fawn Brodie made these interesting observations concerning this matter:

Few visitors to Nauvoo . . . had any idea of the potentialities of the Mormon movement. But many of them were troubled by the unmistakable military atmosphere that pervaded the city. . . . Every able-bodied man between eighteen and forty-five was compelled to join [the Legion], and heavy fines were imposed for failure to appear at parade. By January 1842 the Legion had a complement of 2,000 men. . . .

Joseph requested—and received—from Governor Carlin the commission of lieutenant-general and thereafter frequently jested about his outranking every military officer in the United States. He came to prefer the title “General” even to “President” and used it in much of his correspondence. His uniform was smartly designed: . . . On his hip he carried a sword and two big horse-pistols. Delighting in the pomp and splendor of parades, he called out the Legion on every possible occasion, marching at the head on his magnificent black stallion, Charlie.

The military spirit infected all the boys in Nauvoo, and Joseph, with his eye ever on the future, soon had them organized into a military corps of their own. (No Man Knows My History, pp. 270-271)

The Mormon writer Hyrum L. Andrus stated: “Of the Prophet’s appearance as a Lieutenant General at the head of the Nauvoo Legion, Lyman L. Woods recalled, ‘I have seen him on a white horse wearing the uniform of a general. . . . He was leading a parade of the Legion and looked like a God’” (Joseph Smith, The Man and The Seer, p. 5).

Joseph Smith was very proud of his position as head of the Nauvoo Legion and liked to be referred to as “Lieutenant-General Joseph Smith” (see History of the Church, vol. 4, p. 382). The Mormon writer John J. Stewart said that “Joseph . . . was chosen as commanding officer with the rank of lieutenant-general . . . thus becoming the highest ranked military officer in the United States, although limited to command of the Legion” (Joseph Smith, The Mormon Prophet, p. 143). Actually, Joseph Smith’s title of “Lieutenant-General” did not really amount to anything outside of Nauvoo. When Ralph L. Foster wrote to the United States Military Academy at West Point regarding this matter, he received a letter from Joseph M. O’Donnell (Chief, Archives & History Division) in which the following appeared:

. . . although the Nauvoo Legion was chartered by the State of Illinois, it was not considered to be part of the state militia. . . . Joseph Smith, Jr., was not a Lieutenant General in the state militia, but of a small Mormon Army established to police Nauvoo, Illinois and to defend the state of Illinois. (Letter dated August 29, 1963, photographically reproduced in The Book of Mormon on Trial, by Ralph Leonard Foster, facing p. 20)

At any rate, Joseph Smith took his title very seriously. Josiah Quincy related the following:

As we rode back, there was more dispute between the minister and Smith. . . . the minister, . . . suddenly exclaimed, “Why, I told my congregation the other Sunday that they might as well believe Joe Smith as such theology as that.” “Did you say Joe Smith in a sermon?” inquired the person to whom the title had been applied. “Of course I did. Why not?” The prophet’s reply was given with a quiet superiority that was overwhelming: “Considering only the day and the place, it would have been more respectful to have said Lieutenant-General Joseph Smith.” Clearly, the worthy minister was no match for the head of the Mormon church. (Figures of the Past, as quoted in Among the Mormons, p. 140)

In Benjamin F. Johnson’s letter to George S. Gibbs, he stated that the “Prophet Joseph laid the foundation of our church in a military spirit.” Ebenezer Robinson related the following:

Thus the corner stones of the house of the Lord, . . . were laid amid the roar of cannon, and by the hands of men wearing the garments, and bearing the implements of war and of blood.

Lieut. General Joseph Smith, who superintended laying the chief corner stone and Brig. Gen’l. Don Carlos Smith, . . . were both clothed in their military garments, and wearing their swords at the time. (The Return, vol. 2, pp. 298-302, typed copy)

The History of the Church, vol. 4, pages 326-330, gives an interesting account of these proceedings.

Joseph Smith seems to have loved military displays. Under the date of May 7, 1842, we find this statement in the History of the Church:

The Nauvoo Legion...was reviewed by Lieutenant-General Joseph Smith, who commanded through the day. . . . At the close of the parade, Lieutenant-General Joseph Smith . . . remarked “that his soul was never better satisfied than on this occasion.” (History of the Church, vol. 5, p. 3)

The Mormon writer Gary Dean Guthrie made these observations concerning Joseph Smith’s love for military matters:

Many of Joseph’s own distinctive personality traits came out during the march [of Zion’s Camp] that became characteristic of his administration. The most prominent was a spirit of militancy and the excitement for parades, drills and sham battles. (“Joseph Smith As An Administrator,” M.A. thesis, B.Y.U., May 1969, p. 60)

Joseph Smith seems to have desired to lead a large army, for he prepared a “Petition to the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States, dated 26th March, asking the privilege of raising 100,000 men to extend protection to persons wishing to settle Oregon and other portions of the territory of the United States, and extend protection to the people in Texas” (History of the Church, vol. 6, p. 282). In this document we find the following:

Section 1. Be it ordained . . . that Joseph Smith, . . . is hereby authorized and empowered to raise a company of one hundred thousand armed volunteers . . .

Sec. 2. And be it further ordained that if any person or persons shall hinder or attempt to hinder or molest the said Joseph Smith from executing his designs in raising said volunteers, . . . he, or they so hindering, molesting, or offending, shall be punished by a fine not exceeding one thousand dollars . . . or by hard labor on some public work not exceeding two years, or both, . . .

See. [sic] 3. And be it further ordained, . . . the said Joseph Smith is hereby constituted a member of the army of the United States, . . . (History of the Church, vol. 6, p. 277)

There was, of course, hardly any chance that Joseph Smith’s petition would be accepted. On April 25, 1844, Orson Hyde wrote a letter from Washington in which he stated: “Mr. Semple said that Mr. Smith could not constitutionally be constituted a member of the army by law; and this, if nothing else, would prevent its passage” (History of the Church, vol. 6, p. 372).

Joseph Smith’s military plans and maneuvers were very disturbing to the non-Mormons who lived around Nauvoo. The following statements appeared in the anti-Mormon paper, The Warsaw Signal:

How military these people are becoming! Every thing they say or do seems to breathe the spirit of military tactics. Their prophet appears, on all great occasions, in his sp[ec]tacular regimental dress signs his name Lieut. General, and more titles are to be found in the Nauvoo Legion, than any one book on military tactics can produce; . . . Truly fighting must, be a part of the creed of these Saints! (Warsaw Signal, July 21, 1841)

The Mormon writer Kenneth W. Godfrey made these observations concerning the Nauvoo Legion:

Americans were for the most part decidedly opposed to large standing armies. Thus, many citizens in Illinois viewed with abhorrence the growing might of the Nauvoo Legion. Each muster, parade, or mock battle caused speculation regarding the ultimate design of its leaders. Rumors accusing Joseph Smith of calculating an attack on Texas, Mexico, Missouri, and even the United States itself, were incessantly printed in newspapers and disseminated by word of mouth throughout the country. Some individuals believed the Nauvoo Legion would have to be destroyed before it had grown so strong that opposition to it would be unthinkable. Citizens living in Missouri were especially fearful that the Mormons would assault their homes and cities in retribution for the losses they had suffered in that state in 1837 and 1838. (Brigham Young University Studies, Winter 1968, pp. 206-207)

“The Greatest Egotist”

In 1843 Charlotte Haven wrote some letters from Nauvoo, Illinois. These letters contain some very revealing statements:

Joseph Smith is a large, stout man, youthful in his appearance, . . . He is evidently a great egotist and boaster, for he frequently remarked that at every place he stopped going to and from Springfield people crowded around him, and expressed surprise that he was so “handsome and good looking.” (Overland Monthly, December 1890, p. 621)

We heard that Mrs. Joseph Smith wished to become acquainted with us, . . . She said very little to us, her whole attention being absorbed in what Joseph was saying. He talked incessantly about himself, what he had done and could do more than other mortals, and remarked that he was “a giant, physically and mentally.” In fact, he seemed to forget that he was a man. I did not change my opinion about him, but suppose he has good traits. They say he is very kindhearted, and always ready to give shelter and help to the needy. (Ibid., p. 623)

I rushed out with the umbrella to shield Mrs. Smith, the others following, . . . Mrs. Smith was pleasant and social, more so than we had ever seen her before, . . . while her husband is the greatest egotist I ever met. (Ibid., p. 631)

Josiah Quincy related the following:

The Mormon Temple . . . was a wonderful structure, . . . presumably, like something Smith had seen in vision, . . . In a tone half-way between jest and earnest, and which might have been taken for either at the option of the hearer, the prophet put this inquiry: “Is not here one greater than Solomon, who built a Temple with the treasures of his father David and with the assistance of Hiram, King of Tyre? Joseph Smith has built his Temple with no one to aid him in the work.” (Figures of the Past, as quoted in Among the Mormons, p. 138)

The editor of the Pittsburg Gazette visited Joseph Smith at Nauvoo. His report was reprinted in the New York Spectator. We quote the following from that publication:

We spent about an hour conversing on various subjects, the prophet himself, with amazing volubility, occupying the most of the time, and his whole theme was himself. Let us give what turn we would to the conversation, he would adroitly bring it back to himself. . . . Running on in his voluble style, he said: “The world persecutes me, it has always persecuted me. . . . They thought to put me down, but they hav’nt succeeded, and they can’t do it. When I have proved that I am right, and get all the world subdued under me, I think I shall deserve something.” (The New York Spectator, September 23, 1843)

Toward the end of his life Joseph Smith seems to have become obsessed with a desire for power and fame. As we will later show, Joseph Smith ran as a candidate for President of the United States and was secretly ordained a king. Joseph Smith’s own History of the Church contains some statements which show that he felt that he was almost equal with God:

I am a lawyer; I am a big lawyer and comprehend heaven, earth and hell, to bring forth knowledge that shall cover up all lawyers, doctors and other big bodies. (History of the Church, vol. 5, p. 289)

I wish the lawyer who says we have no powers in Nauvoo may be choked to death with his own words. Don’t employ lawyers, or pay them money for their knowledge, for I have learned that they don’t know anything. I know more than they all. (Ibid., p. 467)

I combat the errors of ages; I meet the violence of mobs; I cope with illegal proceedings from executive authority; I cut the gordian knot of powers, and I solve mathematical problems of universities, with truth-diamond truth; and God is my “right hand man.” (Ibid., vol. 6, p. 78)

God made Aaron to be the mouth piece for the children of Israel, and He will make me be God to you in His stead, and the Elders to be mouth for me; and if you don’t like it, you must lump it. (Ibid., pp. 319-320)

If they want a beardless boy to whip all the world, I will get on the top of a mountain and crow like a rooster: I shall always beat them.

. . . I have more to boast of than ever any man had. I am the only man that has ever been able to keep a whole church together since the days of Adam. A large majority of the whole have stood by me. Neither Paul, John, Peter, nor Jesus ever di it. I boast that no man ever did such a work as I. The followers of Jesus ran away from Him, but the Latter-day Saints never ran away from me yet. (Ibid., pp. 408-409)

In a speech delivered at Brigham Young University, April 14, 1905, Mary E. Lightner quoted Joseph Smith as saying:

“ . . . People little know who I am when they talk about me, and they never will know until they see me weighed in the balance in the Kingdom of God. Then they will know who I am and see me as I am. I dare not tell them and they do not know me.” (The Life and Testimony of Mary Lightner, Pioneer Press, pp. 41-42)

In the Life of Heber C. Kimball, 1888 edition, pages 332-333, we find the following:

Had not Joseph said many times—are not men living who heard him say: “Would to God, brethren, I could tell you who I am! Would to God I could tell you what I know! But you would call it blasphemy, and there are men upon this stand who would want to take my life.”

Mixing Politics and Revelation

One of the most important factors which led to Joseph Smith’s death was that he interfered in politics. On July 15, 1842, this statement appeared in the Sangamo Journal, published at Springfield, Illinois:

We received the Mormons into this state as we did every other sect. Disclosures have shown that the head of that church acts not under the influence of that pure religion which Jesus Christ established upon the earth; and that his vaulting ambition would secure to himself the control of our State elections. (Sangamo Journal, July 15, 1842)

The Quincy Whig printed an article in which the following appeared:

It is not so much the particular doctrines, which Smith upholds and practices, however abominable they may be in themselves, that our citizens care about—as it is the anti-republican nature of the organization, over which he has almost supreme control—and which is trained and disciplined to act in accordance with his selfish will. The spectacle presented in Smith’s case of a civil, ecclesiastical and military leader, united in one and the same person, with power over life and liberty, can never find favor in the minds of sound and thinking Republicans. (Quincy Whig, as reprinted in Nauvoo Expositor, June 7, 1844)

Robert Bruce Flanders made this observation:

The Church exhibited power—power enough perhaps to establish social, economic, and political dominion wherever it was located by the Prophet. Such a sect invited persecution. (Nauvoo: Kingdom on the Mississippi, pp. 3-4)

Thomas Ford, Governor of Illinois from 1842-1846, made these observations:

“But the great cause of popular fury was, that the Mormons at several preceding elections had cast their vote as a unit, thereby making the fact apparent that no one could aspire to the honors or offices of the country, within the sphere of their influence, without their approbation and votes. It appears to be one of the principles by which they insist upon being governed as a community, to act as a unit in all matters of government and religion. They express themselves to be fearful that if division should be encouraged in politics, it would soon extend to their religion, and rend their church with schism and into sects. . . . It is indeed unfortunate for their peace that they do not divide in elections, according to their individual preferences or political principles, like other people.

“This one principle and practice of theirs arrayed against them in deadly hostility all aspirants for office who were not sure of their support, all who have been unsuccessful in elections, and all who were too proud to court their influence, with all their friends and connections.” (History of Illinois, as quoted in History of the Church, vol. 7, pp. 2-3)

The fact that the Mormons voted one way in Nauvoo is obvious from entries in Hosea Stout’s diary:

Nov 4 M. Today was the Presidential election and the brethren all concluded to vote for Polk and Dallas for President and Vice President of the United States . . . (On the Mormon Frontier; The Diary of Hosea Stout, vol. 1, p. 8)

February 3rd 1845 Monday. Today I attended the Municipal election as one of the Judges of the same as mentioned on the 11th of January last there was about 850 votes polled and the persons nominated by the Twelve on the 8th of January was unanimously elected without a dissenting voice the greatest union and peace prevailed that I ever knew before in the place at an election . . . (Ibid., p. 19)

Joseph Smith admitted that the Mormons were united in their politics, but claimed they “were driven to union in their elections by persecution, . . .” (History of the Church, vol. 5, p. 232). Although it is true that the Mormons were persecuted, evidence shows that much of this persecution was the result of Joseph Smith’s intemperate speech and actions. Mormon historians have attempted to cover up this fact. For instance, in the History of the Church, vol. 4, page 40, 179 words have been omitted from a letter written by Joseph Smith and Elias Higbee which was originally printed in the Millennial Star, vol. 17, pages 452-453. In this letter the President of the United States is called a fool. The words that have been deleted without any indication are as follows:

Now we shall endeavour to express our feelings and views concerning the President, as we have been eye-witnesses of his Majesty. He is a small man, sandy complexion, and ordinary features; with frowning brow, and considerable body, but not well proportioned as to his arms and legs; and to use his own words, is “quite fat.” On the whole we think he is without body or parts, as no one part seems to be proportioned to another; therefore instead of saying body and parts, we say body and part, or partyism if you please to call it. And in fine, to come directly to the point, he is so much a fop or a fool (for he judged our cause before he knew it) we could find no place to put truth into him.

We do not say the Saints shall not vote for him, but we do say boldly, (though it need not be published in the streets of Nauvoo, neither among the daughters of the Gentiles,) that we do not intend he shall have our votes.

Joseph Smith’s History for February 15, 1844, contains an article which was originally printed in the Mormon publication Times and Seasons. In this article we find the following statement: “And however much we might wish to sustain the Democratic nomination, we cannot—we will not vote for Van Buren” (History of the Church, vol. 6, p. 216).

In the History of the Church, vol. 5, page 531, we find this statement by Joseph Smith:

King took me by the collar and told me to go away. (All our wrongs have arisen under the power and authority of Democracy; and I have sworn that this arm shall fall from my shoulder, and this tongue cleave to the roof of my mouth, before I will vote for them,) unless they make me satisfaction, and I feel it sensibly.

The New York Spectator for September 23, 1843, printed this statement by Joseph Smith:

. . . I have sworn by the eternal gods that I never will vote for a democrat again, and I intend to swear my children, putting their hands under the thigh, as Abraham swore Isaac, that they will never vote a democratic ticket in all their generations. It is the meanest, lowest party in all creation.

Francis M. Higbee wrote an article for the Nauvoo Expositor in which the following statements appeared:

. . . Hyrum Smith is already in the field as a candidate for the legislature, but will you support him, that same Hyrum Smith the devoted follower and brother of Joe, who feigned a revelation from God, directing the citizens of Hancock County to vote for J. P. Hoge, in preference to Cyrus Walker, and by so doing blaspheming the name of God? (Nauvoo Expositor, June 7, 1844)

Francis Higbee’s charge concerning the purported revelation is confirmed by Joseph Smith’s own History of the Church. Under the date of August 6, 1843, these words are attributed to Joseph Smith:

Brother Hyrum tells me this morning that he has had a testimony to the effect it would be better for the people to vote for Hoge; and I never knew Hyrum to say he ever had a revelation and it failed. Let God speak and all men hold their peace. (History of the Church, vol. 5, p. 526)

The Mormon writer Kenneth W. Godfrey made this statement concerning the political problems in Illinois:

Leaders of the Church attempted to minimize the growing number of Mormon voters and even made serious efforts to camouflage the baptism of two county commissioners. . . . immigration by August of 1842 augmented the Mormon population in Hancock County so that by voting solidly for the same candidates the Saints were able to dominate the politics of that region. . . . Following the 1842 election the Anti-Mormon Party was formally revived. . . . This party proved ultimately to be one of the most decisive forces in causing the death of the Mormon Prophet and the migration of large numbers of his followers to the Great Basin. (Brigham Young University Studies, Winter 1968, p. 211)

Harold Schindler gives this interesting information:

Bennett . . . was appointed lobbyist to the Illinois Legislature where he urged the passage of a bill seeking incorporation of Nauvoo. By dangling the prize of a solid Mormon voting bloc (by now the Saints knew full well how to apply political pressure) before both Democrats and Whigs, the measure passed and was signed by Governor Thomas Carlin. . . . There was good reason to rejoice; the Nauvoo City Charter was an extraordinary document, indeed.

It permitted, among other things, a city council, including a mayor, four aldermen, and nine councilmen, empowered to pass any ordinance not in conflict with state or federal constitutions. . . .

The Legislature, in its desire to curry Mormon favor, had placed in Joseph’s hands the legal and military power with which to institute a secular dictatorship unmatched by any other city in the land. (Orrin Porter Rockwell; Man of God, Son of Thunder, pp. 70-71)

Robert Bruce Flanders states: “On its face it was just another city charter with some novel clauses; in operation it was a charter to create a Mormon kingdom in the sovereign state of Illinois” (Nauvoo: Kingdom on the Mississippi, 1975, p. 104).

In a speech delivered June 30, 1843, Joseph Smith stated:

Relative to our city charter, courts, right of habeas corpus, etc., I wish you to know and publish that we have all power; and if any man from this time forth says anything to the contrary, cast it into his teeth. . . . All the power there was in Illinois she gave to Nauvoo; and any man that says to the contrary is a fool. (History of the Church, vol. 5, p. 466)

The Nauvoo City Council certainly passed some very unusual ordinances. For instance, the Nauvoo City Council “passed ‘an extra ordinance for the extra case of Joseph Smith and others.’” In this ordinance we find the following:

Section 1. Be it ordained by the City Council . . . that hereafter, if any person or persons shall come with process, demand, or requisition, founded upon the aforesaid Missouri difficulties, to arrest said Joseph Smith, he or they so offending shall be subject to be arrested by any officer of the city, with or without process, and tried by the Municipal Court, upon testimony, and, if found guilty, sentenced to imprisonment in the city prison for life; which convict or convicts can only be pardoned by the Governor, with the consent of the Mayor of said city. (History of the Church, vol. 6, p. 105)

It is interesting to note that Joseph Smith himself was

Mayor of Nauvoo at the time this ordinance was passed.

The unusual ordinances passed by the Nauvoo City Council and Joseph Smith's claim that he was not subject to the laws of Illinois caused serious problems with the non-Mormons in the vicinity of Nauvoo. The Mormon writer Klaus J. Hansen feels that Joseph Smith's "attempt to build a political kingdom of God was also the primary reason why the Mormons were forced to leave Illinois, and why Smith was murdered in 1844" (Quest for Empire, 1967, p. 154).

Destruction of Expositor

The Mormon writer Kenneth W. Godfrey makes these interesting observations concerning the conflict in Illinois:

Antagonism toward the Mormon Prophet was further incited when it was correctly rumored, that he had been ordained "King over the Immediate House of Israel" by the Council of Fifty. This action was wrongly interpreted by non-Mormons to mean that he was going to attempt to overthrow the United States government by force. . . . Still newspapers and tracts repeatedly charged that the Prophet conducted himself like a dictator and that his actions were not only treasonable but a violation of the constitutional principle that church and state should be disassociated. Thus, his kingly ordination only incensed the populace, and his untimely death became even more inevitable.

The Prophet's mayoral order, with the consent of the city council, to destroy the Nauvoo Expositor became the immediate excuse to stamp out his life. . . .

Perhaps in retrospect both Mormons and Gentiles were partly to blame for conflict which developed between them. The Mormons were sometimes boastful of their political and economic power. They frequently declared they were the chosen people of God, and tended to trade in a commercial way only with themselves, to promulgate a large army and to engage in a marriage system thought to be adulterous by the Gentiles. On the other side, the Gentiles blamed the Mormons for almost every crime committed in Hancock County, said Joseph Smith was a dictator, and believed themselves justified in opposing him without really waiting to determine the truth or falsity of the numerous accusations against him. (Brigham Young University Studies, Winter 1968, pp. 212-214)

The Nauvoo Expositor, spoken of by Kenneth Godfrey, was to be printed in Nauvoo by a number of people who opposed Joseph Smith's political ambitions and the practice of polygamy. The Mormon writer John J. Stewart says:

They attempted to set up their own church with William Law as President. They bought a press and published a newspaper entitled the Nauvoo Expositor, . . . Joseph Smith as mayor ordered the Expositor press destroyed. (Brigham Young and His Wives, p. 34)

Mormon writers often refer to the Nauvoo Expositor as a scandalous and vile publication, but in reality it advocated high morals and obedience to the law. This newspaper was very opposed to Joseph Smith's "political schemes":

The next important item which presents itself for our consideration, is the attempt at Political power and influence, which we verily believe to be preposterous and absurd. We believe it is inconsistent, and not in accordance with the christian religion. We do not believe that God ever raised up a Prophet to christianize a world by political schemes and intrigue. (The Nauvoo Expositor, June 7, 1844)

We have already shown that Joseph Smith's own History of the Church confirmed the Nauvoo Expositor's charge that Hyrum Smith had given a revelation that the Mormons were to vote for Hoge.

One thing that really disturbed the Mormon leaders, however, was that the Nauvoo Expositor exposed the fact that Joseph Smith was secretly advocating polygamy. The Mormon leaders claimed that this was a lie, but eight years after Joseph Smith's death they published the revelation on polygamy. This revelation proves beyond all doubt that the statements in the Expositor were true. Thus it is clear that the Expositor was condemned on the basis of false testimony given by Joseph and Hyrum Smith.

In a synopsis of the proceedings of the Nauvoo City Council we find the following:

Mayor [Joseph Smith] said, if he had a City Council who felt as he did, the establishment (referring to the Nauvoo Expositor) would be declared a nuisance before night; . . .

Councilor Stiles said . . . he would go in for suppressing all further publications of the kind.

Councilor Hyrum Smith believed the best way was to smash the press and pi the type. (History of the Church, vol. 6, pp. 441, 445)

When Joseph Smith's History was first published in the Millennial Star, Phineas Richards was quoted as saying: "He considered the publication of the Expositor as much murderous at heart as David was before the death of Uriah; was for making a short work of it; was prepared to take his stand by the Mayor, . . ." (Millennial Star, vol. 23, p. 828). When this was reprinted in the History of the Church, vol. 6, page 447, the words "was for making a short work of it" were deleted without any indication.

At any rate, the Nauvoo City Council ordered the press to be destroyed. The following is recorded in Joseph Smith's History under the date of June 10, 1844:

The Council passed an ordinance declaring the Nauvoo Expositor a nuisance, and also issued an order to me to abate the said nuisance. I immediately ordered the Marshal to destroy it without delay, . . .

About 8 p.m., the Marshal returned and reported that he had removed the press, type, printed paper, and fixtures into the street, and destroyed them. (History of the Church, vol. 6, p. 432)

The Mormon writer Klaus J. Hansen gives this information concerning the destruction of the Nauvoo Expositor:

The Expositor allegations and the subsequent reaction triggered the immediate events leading to the death of Joseph Smith and his brother Hyrum. . . .

The publication of the Expositor put Smith in a dilemma. If he did not stop its publication, exposure of the secrets of polygamy and the political kingdom of God might well rend the church asunder . . . When Smith convinced his rubber-stamp city council, in a trial without lawyers, witnesses, or jury, that the paper should be declared a public nuisance, . . . he may not have been prepared to pay for such a course of action with his life; but there is no question that he was prepared to pay a high price for the preservation of the kingdom. . . .

In destroying the press Smith had overstepped both his authority and the bounds of propriety. (Quest For Empire, pp. 156, 158, 159)

The Mormon historian B. H. Roberts made this statement concerning the destruction of the Expositor:

The legality of the action of the Mayor and City Counsel was, of course, questionable, though some sought to defend it on legal grounds; but it must be conceded that neither proof nor argument for legality are convincing. On the grounds of expediency or necessity the action is more defensible. (History of the Church, vol. 6, Introduction, p. 38)

George Q. Cannon, who became a member of the First Presidency, made this statement on October 7, 1868:

It was on the 10th of June, 1844, I had occasion to go to the City Council of Nauvoo, . . . the subject under discussion was the declaring of the "Nauvoo Expositor" a nuisance. . . . They had passed an ordinance declaring it a nuisance, and empowering the city marshal, . . . to abate it. . . . Yet we, for years have had in our city [Salt Lake City] a paper which publishes, if possible, more abominable lies about us and our people than were published by the "Nauvoo Expositor," for the abatement of which Hyrum Smith said he was willing to die. We have not noticed it; we have suffered it to go on undisturbed. But the time has come for us to take this matter into consideration. (Journal of Discourses, vol. 12, p. 292)

The Mormon writer John J. Stewart states that after the Expositor was destroyed, “The apostate publishers dashed away to Carthage, squealing like stuck pigs, and before Justice of the Peace Thomas Morrison, a notorious Mormon hater, sued out a writ for the arrest of Joseph and seventeen other Church and city officials, on a charge of riot” (Joseph Smith, The Mormon Prophet, p. 220).

Charles A. Foster, one of the publishers of the Expositor, wrote the following in a letter dated June 11, 1844:

Mr. Sharp: —I hasten to inform you of the unparalleled outrage, perpetrated upon our rights, . . . a company consisting of some 200 men, armed and equipped, with muskets, swords, pistols, bowie knives, sledge-hammers, &c, assisted by a crowd of several hundred minions, who volunteered their services on the occasion, marched to the building, and breaking open the doors with a sledge-hammer commenced the work of destruction and desperation.

They tumbled the press and materials into the street, and set fire to them, and demolished the machinery with a sledge hammer, and injured the building very materially. We made no resistance; but looked on and felt revenge, but leave it for the public to avenge this climax of insult and injury. (Warsaw Signal, June 12, 1844)

Charles A. Foster’s description of the destruction of the Expositor sounds more like a mob scene than a legal one. Vilate Kimball, the wife of Heber C. Kimball and a faithful Mormon, gave this description of the destruction of the press:

“June 11th. Nauvoo was a scene of excit[e]ment last night. Some hundreds of the brethren turned out and burned the press of the opposite party.” (Letter written by Vilate Kimball, as published in Life of Heber C. Kimball, p. 350)

The Mormon writer William E. Berrett stated:

The destruction of the Nauvoo Expositor June 10, 1844, proved to be the spark which ignited all the smoldering fires of opposition into one great flame. It offered the occasion for which the apostates from the Church were waiting, a legal excuse to get the Prophet and other leaders into their hands. The cry that the “freedom of the press” was being violated, united the factions seeking the overthrow of the Saints as perhaps nothing else would have done. (The Restored Church, p. 255)

According to George Laub, Joseph Smith claimed to have a vision in which he was directed to destroy the Nauvoo Expositor:

. . . Brother Joseph called a meeting at his own house and told us that God showed to him in an open vision in daylight that if he did not destroy that printing press (Nauvoo Expositor) that it would cause the blood of saints to flow in the streets and by this was that evil destroyed . . . I write what I know and seen and heard for myself. (Pioneer Journals, “Excerpts From the Diary of George Laub,” 1814-1880)

In a letter dated June 22, 1844, Governor Ford rebuked Joseph Smith for destroying the press of the Nauvoo Expositor:

I now express to you my opinion that your conduct in the destruction of the press was a very gross outrage upon the laws and liberties of the people. It may have been full of libels, but this did not authorize you to destroy it.

There are many newspapers in this state which have been wrongfully abusing me for more than a year, and yet such is my regard for the liberty of the press and the rights of a free people in a republican government that I would shed the last drop of my blood to protect those presses from any illegal violence. You have violated the Constitution in at least four particulars. You have violated that part of it which declared that the printing presses shall be free, being responsible for the abuse thereof, and that the truth may be given in evidence. . . . No civilized country can tolerate such conduct, much less can it be tolerated in this free country of the United States. (Letter from Governor Ford, as printed in the History of the Church, vol. 6, pp. 534-536)

Like a Lamb?

Edward Bonney gave the following information in his book, Banditti of the Prairies:

This outrage upon the public press helped to fan the flame already kindled . . . and plainly foreshadowed the storm that was to burst with startling fury.

The dissenting Mormons at once united with those opposed to that sect, and various meetings were called, and all parties urged to arm and prepare themselves to resist any further aggression: to be ready at all hazards to protect themselves and meet the worst. Warrants were issued against the Smiths, and other leaders, in the destruction of the printing office of the Expositor, and though served by the proper officers, they refused to obey the mandates of the law, and laughed at its power!

As in all former cases, the writ of habeas corpus was resorted to, and all the arrested at once set at liberty and discharged from arrest, the same persons that were arrested acting as officers of the courts that discharged them! Thus effectually defeating the ends of justice, and compelling the officer to return to Carthage without a single prisoner!

This mock administration of law, added new fuel to the flame. The public being convinced that Nauvoo was the headquarters of nearly all the marauders who were preying upon the surrounding community, together with the full belief that the Mormon leaders were privy to their depredations and the resistance and defeat of justice, now became enraged, and determined to rise in their might and enforce the law, even though it should be at the point of the bayonet or sabre. . . .

The officer from whose custody the Smiths and others were discharged proceeded to summon a posse and renew the arrest from the adjacent counties, rallied under the banner of law and justice. The Mormon leaders, learning this fact, gathered also their forces. The Nauvoo Legion, organized at the call of the Prophet, fully armed and equipped and numbering nearly four thousand, with their pieces of artillery prepared for a desperate resistance.

The city of Nauvoo was declared under martial law, and all necessary preparations were made to sustain the edicts of the Prophet and the freedom of the crime-stained ones or die in the attempt. . . .

A full investigation was entered into and Gov. Ford, instructing the officer having the writs from which the Mormons had discharged themselves, to proceed to Nauvoo and demand the surrender of the Smiths and others upon whom the writs had already been served, and in case of a refusal to obey the law, to enforce it at the point of the bayonet. At the same time pledging himself, as the Chief Executive of the state, to protect them from personal violence, and the troops under his command pledged themselves to sustain him. . . .

Morning came, and the hour of their departure arrived, but the Prophet could not be found, having crossed the Mississippi River during the night with his brother Hiram and secreted themselves in Iowa, and the officer was again forced to return to Carthage without the prisoners. . . .

During the day, several dispatches crossed the river to and from the Prophet, some advising him to seek safety in flight, and others urging him to return and save the city. Thus urged, the Prophet and his companion in flight, recrossed the river about sunset, and on the following morning started for Carthage, and Nauvoo was again quiet. . . .

On arriving there, the prisoners were examined on the charge of riot in destroying the printing press, and held to bail for their appearance at the next term of the Hancock Circuit Court. Joseph and Hiram Smith were arrested on charge of treason, and committed to await examination.

All being tranquil, and Governor Ford thinking an armed force no longer necessary, disbanded his troops on the morning of the 27th, leaving but a small force to guard the jail, and proceeded with his suite to Nauvoo. . . .

After the troops were disbanded, the most hostile of them believing the Smiths eventually would be acquitted on the charge of treason, and the Mormons still continued their depredations, and deeming that the only way to secure safety was by ridding them of their leaders, they still continued to fan the flame of revenge that had heretofore been burning but too brightly. Urged on by the Mormon dissenters, who were thirsting for blood, they collected, to the number of about 140, armed and disguised, and proceeded to the jail about five o'clock in the afternoon of the 27th. Having dispersed the guard, they attacked the jail, and Joseph and Hiram Smith in an effort to escape were both shot dead. Four balls pierced each of them, and any one of the wounds would have proved fatal. Having accomplished this cold-blooded murder (for surely no other name will apply to it) and glutted their appetite for blood, the mob instantly dispersed. (Banditti of the Prairies, 1963, pp. 20-24)

It is interesting to compare the death of Joseph Smith with that of Jesus. In Isaiah 53:7 we read the following: "He was oppressed, and he was afflicted, yet he opened not his mouth: he is brought as a lamb to the slaughter, and as a sheep before her shearers is dumb, so he openeth not his mouth." In the New Testament it is claimed that Christ fulfilled this prophecy (see Acts 8:32). The reason that Christ fulfilled it is that he did not try to fight back when he was led to death. He died without putting up a fight. In 1 Peter 2:23 we read: "Who, when he was reviled, reviled not again; when he suffered, he threatened not; but committed himself to him that judgeth righteously:"

When Peter tried to defend Jesus with the sword, Jesus told him: "Then said Jesus unto Peter, Put up thy sword into the sheath: the cup which my Father hath given me, shall I not drink it?" (John 18:11). It is claimed that before Joseph Smith was murdered in the Carthage jail he made this statement: "I am going like a lamb to the slaughter; . . ." (Doctrine and Covenants, section 135, verse 4).

Most Mormons believe that Joseph Smith died without putting up a struggle, but the actual truth is that he died in a gun fight. In the History of the Church the following is recorded concerning Joseph Smith's death:

Immediately there was a little rustling at the outer door of the jail, and a cry of surrender, and also a discharge of three or four firearms followed instantly. . . . Joseph sprang to his coat for his six shooter, Hyrum for his single barrel, . . .

When Hyrum fell, Joseph exclaimed; "Oh dear, brother Hyrum!" and opening the door a few inches he discharged his six shooter in the stairway (as stated before), two or three barrels of which missed fire.

Joseph, seeing there was no safety in the room, and no doubt thinking that it would save the lives of his brethren in the room if he could get out, turned calmly from the door, dropped his pistol on the floor, and sprang into the window when two balls pierced him from the door, and one entered his right breast from without, and he fell outward into the hands of his murderers, exclaiming, "O Lord, my God." (History of the Church, vol. 6, pp. 617-618)

In the Introduction to vol. 6 of the History of the Church, page XLI, the following is stated about Joseph Smith's death:

When the jail in Carthage was assailed, and the mob was pouring murderous volleys into the room occupied by himself and friends, the Prophet turned from the prostrate form of his murdered brother to face death-dealing guns and bravely returned the fire of his assailants, "bringing his man down every time," and compelling even John Hay, who but reluctantly accords the Prophet any quality of virtue, to confess that he "made a handsome fight". . .

John Taylor, who became the third President of the Mormon Church, made these statements concerning the death of Joseph Smith:

Elder Cyrus H. Wheelock came in to see us, and when he was about leaving drew a small pistol, a six-shooter, from his pocket, remarking at the same time, "Would any of you like to have this?" Brother Joseph immediately replied, "Yes, give it to me," whereupon he took the pistol, and put it in his pantaloons pocket. . . . I was sitting at one of the front windows of the jail, when I saw a number of men, with painted faces, coming around the corner of the jail, and aiming towards the stairs. . . .

I shall never forget the deep feeling of sympathy and regard manifested in the countenance of Brother Joseph as he drew nigh to Hyrum, and, leaning over him, exclaimed, "Oh! my poor, dear brother Hyrum!" He, however, instantly arose, and with a firm, quick step, and a determined expression of countenance, approached the door, and pulling the six-shooter left by Brother Wheelock from his pocket, opened the door slightly, and snapped the pistol six successive times; only three of the barrels, however, were discharged. I afterwards understood that two or three were wounded by these discharges, two of whom, I am informed died. (History of the Church, vol. 7, pp. 100, 102, 103)

From the information given above it can be seen that the death of Joseph Smith can in no way be compared to the death of Jesus. Jesus did go like a "lamb to the slaughter," but Joseph Smith died like a raging lion.

In a letter dated July 22, 1844, Sarah Scott wrote:

I suppose you received our letter and was somewhat prepared, when you heard of the dreadful murder of Joseph and Hyrum Smith in Carthage jail. . . . Joseph prophesied in the last Neighbor that was published before his death that they would come off victorious over them all, as sure as there was a God in Israel. Joseph also prophesied on the stand a year ago last conference that he could not be killed within five years from that time; that they could not kill him till the Temple would be completed, for that he had received an unconditional promise from the Almighty concerning his days, and he set Earth and Hell at defiance; and then said, putting his hand on his head, they never could kill this Child. But now that he is killed some of the Church say that he said: unless he gave himself up. My husband was there at the time and says there was no conditions whatever, and many others testify to the same thing. . . . Brigham Young said if he had been here, he wouldn't have consented to give Joseph up and he would be damned if he would give himself up to the law of the land. He would see them all in hell first; the Church [sic], and then he said he would see all Creation in Hell before he would. (Among the Mormons, pp. 152-153)

Joseph Smith's prophecy that he would prevail against his enemies is found in the Nauvoo Neighbor for June 19, 1844:

I therefore, in behalf of the Municipal Court of Nauvoo, warn the lawless, not to be precipitate in any interference in our affairs, for as sure as there is a God in heaven, we shall ride triumphant over all oppression.

Joseph Smith, Mayor

Just eight days after Joseph Smith made this prophecy he was murdered in the Carthage jail, and before two years had elapsed the Mormons were driven from Illinois.

There is some evidence that just before his death Joseph Smith sent for the Nauvoo Legion to rescue him from the Carthage jail. Harold Schindler states:

Because Ford had permitted Joseph to use the debtor's apartment in jail and allowed several of the prophet's friends access to him, it was possible to smuggle messages out of Carthage. Realizing time was precious, Joseph dictated a note to Major General Jonathan Dunham ordering him to call out the Legion and march on the jail immediately. Dunham received the communication in Nauvoo but failed to carry out the command. One of the Legionnaires, Allen Stout, said, "Dunham did not let a single man or mortal know that he had received such orders and we were kept in the city under arms not knowing but all was well." (Orrin Porter Rockwell; Man of God, Son of Thunder, 1966, p. 130)

20. The Virgin Birth

Brigham Young, the second President of the Mormon Church, once stated:

Now, remember from this time forth, and for ever, that Jesus Christ was not begotten by the Holy Ghost. (Journal of Discourses, vol. 1, p. 51)

This statement is in conflict with both the Bible and the Book of Mormon. In Matthew 1:18 and 20 we read: “Now the birth of Jesus Christ was on this wise: When as his mother Mary was espoused to Joseph, before they came together, she was found with child of the Holy Ghost . . . for that which is conceived in her is of the Holy Ghost.” The Book of Mormon agrees with the Bible on this point, for in Alma 7:10 we read: “And behold, he shall be born of Mary, at Jerusalem which is the land of our fore-fathers, she being a virgin, a precious and chosen vessel, who shall be overshadowed and conceive by the power of the Holy Ghost, and bring forth a son, yea, even the Son of God.”

In spite of these plain statements, Joseph Fielding Smith, the tenth President of the Mormon Church, has denied that the Book of Mormon and the Bible teach that Christ was begotten by the Holy Ghost. He stated as follows:

They tell us the Book of Mormon states that Jesus was begotten of the Holy Ghost. I challenge that statement. The Book of Mormon teaches no such thing! Neither does the Bible. (Doctrines of Salvation, vol. 1, p. 19)

The reason that Joseph Fielding Smith objects to the teaching that Jesus was begotten by the Holy Ghost is that, according to Mormon theology, this would make Jesus the son of the Holy Ghost rather than the Son of God. This idea arises from an improper understanding of the term Holy Ghost. The term Holy Ghost means exactly the same as the term Holy Spirit. The American College Dictionary defines the term Holy Spirit as the Holy Ghost. Now, the Bible tells us that God is a Spirit, and that he is holy; therefore, God himself must be the Holy Spirit. So we see that there is no contradiction in saying that Jesus was begotten by the Holy Ghost and also is the Son of God.

Since Mormon theology teaches that God himself is a man instead of a spirit and is the literal father of Christ, the birth of Christ is considered a natural, rather than miraculous occurrence. Joseph Fielding Smith, Jr., stated:

The birth of the Savior was a natural occurrence unattended with any degree of mysticism, and the Father God was the literal parent of Jesus in the flesh as well as in the spirit. (Religious Truths Defined, p. 44)

President Joseph Fielding Smith made this statement:

Christ was begotten of God. He was not born without the aid of man, and that man was God! (Doctrines of Salvation, Salt Lake City, 1959, vol. 1, p. 18)

Bruce R. McConkie, who is a member of the First Council of the Seventy, makes the following statements:

These name-titles all signify that our Lord is the only Son of the Father in the flesh. Each of the words is to be understood literally. Only means only; Begotten means begotten; and Son means son. Christ was begotten by an Immortal Father in the same way that mortal men are begotten by mortal fathers. (Mormon Doctrine, 1966, pp. 546-547)

And Christ was born into the world as the literal Son of this Holy Being; he was born in the same personal, real, and literal sense that any mortal son is born to a mortal father. There is nothing figurative about his paternity; he was begotten, conceived and born in the normal and natural course of events, . . . Christ is the Son of Man, meaning that his Father (the Eternal God!) is a Holy Man. (Ibid., p. 742)

The Mormon writer Carlfred B. Broderick made these comments:

There are two basic elements in the Gospel view of sexuality as I interpret it from the scriptures. The first is that sex is good—that sexuality, far from being the antithesis of spirituality, is actually an attribute of God. . . .

In the light of their understanding that God is a procreating personage of flesh and bone, latter-day prophets have made it clear that despite what it says in Matthew 1:20, the Holy Ghost was not the father of Jesus. . . . The Savior was fathered by a personage of flesh and bone, and was literally what Nephi said he was, “Son of the Eternal Father.” (Dialogue: A Journal of Mormon Thought, Autumn, 1967, pp. 100-101)

Brigham Young, the second President of the Church, had this to say concerning the birth of Christ:

The man Joseph, the husband of Mary, did not, that we know of, have more than one wife, but Mary the wife of Joseph had another husband. (Deseret News, October 10, 1866)

This same type of reasoning led the Mormon Apostle Orson Pratt to say:

The fleshly body of Jesus required a Mother as well as a Father. Therefore, the Father and Mother of Jesus, according to the flesh, must have been associated together in the capacity of husband and wife; hence the Virgin Mary must have been, for the time being, the lawful wife of God the Father: we use the term lawful Wife, because it would be blasphemous in the highest degree to say that He overshadowed her or begat the Saviour unlawfully. It would have been unlawful for any man to have interfered with Mary, who was already espoused to Joseph; for such a heinous crime would have subjected both the guilty parties to death, according to the law of Moses. But God having created all men and women, had the most perfect right to do with His own creation, according to His holy will and pleasure: He had a lawful right to overshadow the Virgin Mary in the capacity of a husband, and beget a Son, although she was espoused to another; for the law which He gave to govern men and women was not intended to govern Himself, or to prescribe rules for his own conduct. It was also lawful in Him, after having thus dealt with Mary, to give her to Joseph her espoused husband. Whether God the Father gave Mary to Joseph for time only, or for time and eternity, we are not informed. Inasmuch as God was the first husband to her, it may be that He only gave her to be the wife of Joseph while in this mortal state, and that He intended after the resurrection to again take her as one of his own wives to raise up immortal spirits in eternity. (The Seer, p. 158)

Brigham Young explained the birth of Christ in the following manner:

The birth of the Saviour was as natural as are the births of our children; it was the result of natural action. He partook of flesh and blood—was begotten of his Father, as we were of our fathers. (Journal of Discourses, vol. 8, p. 115)

Heber C. Kimball, who was a member of the First Presidency, made this statement:

In relation to the way in which I look upon the works of God and his creatures, I will say that I was naturally begotten; so was my father, and also my saviour Jesus Christ. According to the Scriptures, he is the first begotten of his father in the flesh, and there was nothing unnatural about it. (Journal of Discourses, vol. 8, p. 211)

In a sermon delivered in the Tabernacle on April 9, 1852, Brigham Young made the following statements:

I have given you a few leading items upon this subject, but a great deal more remains to be told. Now remember from this time forth, and for ever, that Jesus Christ was not begotten by the Holy Ghost. I will repeat a little anecdote. I was in conversation with a certain learned professor upon the subject, when I replied, to this idea—“if the Son was begotten by the Holy Ghost, it would be very dangerous to baptize and confirm females, and give the Holy Ghost to them, lest he should beget children to be palmed upon the elders by the people, bringing the elders into great difficulties.” (Journal of Discourses, vol. 1, p. 51)

Conclusion

The Mormon Church leaders have taught that Jesus Christ “was not begotten by the Holy Ghost”; they have also stated that “Mary the wife of Joseph had another husband,” and that was “God the Father.” They have also taught that Mary and God the Father “associated together in the capacity of husband and wife,” and that there was “nothing unnatural about” the way Christ was begotten.

A careful examination of this teaching reveals that it is far closer to paganism than it is to Christianity!

pure, and sublime attributes which are perfected in all their fulness in themselves.

If none but Gods will be permitted to multiply immortal children, it follows that each God must have one or more wives. God, the Father of our spirits, became the Father of our Lord Jesus Christ according to the flesh. Hence, the Father saith concerning him, “Thou art my Son, this day have I begotten thee.” We are informed in the first chapter of Luke, that Mary was chosen by the Father as a choice virgin, through whom He begat Jesus. The angel said unto the Virgin Mary, “The Holy Ghost shall come upon thee, and the power of the Highest shall overshadow thee: therefore, also, that holy thing which shall be born of thee shall be called the Son of God.” After the power of the Highest had overshadowed Mary, and she had by that means conceived, she related the circumstance to her cousin Elizabeth in the following words: “He that is Mighty hath done to me great things; and holy is His name.” It seems from this relation that the Holy Ghost accompanied “the Highest” when He overshadowed the Virgin Mary and begat Jesus; and from this circumstance some have supposed that the body of Jesus was begotten of the Holy Ghost without the instrumentality of the immediate presence of the Father. There is no doubt that the Holy Ghost came upon Mary to sanctify her, and make her holy, and prepare her to endure the glorious presence of “the Highest,” that when “He” should “overshadow” her she might conceive, being filled with the Holy Ghost; hence the angel said, as recorded in Matthew, “That which is conceived in her is of the Holy Ghost;” that is, the Holy Ghost gave her strength to abide the presence of the Father without being consumed; but it was the personage of the Father who begat the body of Jesus; and for this reason Jesus is called “the Only Begotten of the Father;” that is, the only one in this world whose fleshly body was begotten by the Father. There were millions of sons and daughters whom He begat before the foundation of this world, but they were spirits, and not bodies of flesh and bones; whereas, both the spirit and body of Jesus were begotten by the Father—the spirit having been begotten in heaven many ages before the tabernacle was begotten upon the earth.

The fleshly body of Jesus required a Mother as well as a Father. Therefore, the Father and Mother of Jesus, according to the flesh, must have been associated together in the capacity of Husband and Wife; hence the Virgin Mary must have been, for the time being, the lawful wife of God the Father: we use the term lawful Wife, because it would be blasphemous in the highest degree to say that He overshadowed her or begat the Saviour unlawfully. It would have been unlawful for any man to have interfered with Mary, who was already espoused to Joseph; for such a heinous crime would have subjected both the guilty parties to death, according to the law of Moses. But God having created all men and women, had the most perfect right to do with His own creation, according to His holy will and pleasure: He had a lawful right to overshadow the Virgin Mary in the capacity of a husband, and beget a Son, although she was espoused to another; for the law which He gave to govern men and women was not intended to govern Himself, or to prescribe rules for his own conduct. It was also lawful in Him, after having thus dealt with Mary, to give her to Joseph her espoused husband. Whether God the Father gave Mary to Joseph for time only, or for time and eternity, we are not informed. Inasmuch as God was the first husband to her, it may be that He only gave her to be the wife of Joseph while in this mortal state, and that He intended after the resurrection to again take her as one of his own wives to raise up immortal spirits in eternity.

As God the Father begat the fleshly body of Jesus, so He, before the world began, begat his spirit. As the body required an earthly Mother, so his against him, and he should be frowned upon by all high-minded and virtuous persons. Wealth, influence and position should not screen him from their righteous indignation. His sin is one of the blackest in the calendar of crime, and he should be cast down from the high pinnacle of respectability and consideration, to find his place among the worst of felons.

Every virtuous woman desires a husband to whom she can look for guidance and protection through this world. God has placed this desire in woman's nature. It should be respected by the stronger sex. Any man who takes advantage of this, and humbles a daughter of Eve to rob her of her virtue, and cast her off dishonored and defiled, is her destroyer, and is responsible to God for the deed. If the refined Christian society of the nineteenth century will tolerate such a crime, God will not; but he will call the perpetrator to an account. He will be damned; in hell he will lift up his eyes, being in torment, until he has paid the uttermost farthing, and made a full atonement for his sins. It is this very class of men, though not all of them, who have set up such a howl against the doctrine of polygamy, which is so much despised and which was believed in and practiced by the ancients—by the very men who are held up to us as patterns of all the piety that was ever exhibited through man upon the face of the earth.

This matter was a little changed in the case of the Savior of the world, the Son of the living God. The man Joseph, the husband of Mary, did not, that we know of, have more than one wife, but Mary the wife of Joseph had another husband. On this account infidels have called the Savior a bastard. This is merely a human opinion upon one of the inscrutable doings of the Almighty. That very babe that was cradled in the manger, was begotten, not by Joseph, the husband of Mary, but by another Being. Do you inquire by whom? He was begotten by God our heavenly Father. This answer may suffice you—you need never inquire more upon that point. Jesus Christ is the only begotten of the Father, and he is the Savior of the world, and full of grace and truth. It is not polygamy that men fight against when they persecute this people; but, still, if we continue to be faithful to our God, he will defend us in doing what is right. If it is wrong for a man to have more than one wife at a time, the Lord will reveal it by and by, and he will put it away that it will not be known in the Church. I did not ask Him for the revelation upon this subject. When that revelation was first read to me by Joseph Smith, I plainly saw the great trials and the abuse of it that would be made by many of the Elders, and the trouble and the persecution that it would bring upon this whole people. But the Lord revealed it, and it was my business to accept it.

Now, we as Christians desire to be saved in the kingdom of God. We desire to attain to the possession of all the blessings there are for the most faithful man or people that ever lived upon the face of the earth, even him who is said to be the father of the faithful, Abraham of old. We wish to obtain all that father Abraham obtained. I wish here to say to the Elders of Israel, and to all the members of this Church and kingdom, that it is in the hearts of many of them to wish that the doctrine of polygamy was not taught and practiced by us. It may be hard for many, and especially for the ladies, yet it is no harder for them than it is for the gentlemen. It is the word of the Lord, and I wish to say to you, and all the world, that if you desire with all your hearts to obtain the

21. The Negro in Mormon Theology

NOTE: Since this chapter was written before Mormon President Spencer W. Kimball gave a revelation which granted blacks the priesthood, it reflects Mormon teachings prior to June 9, 1978. Although this should be kept in mind, this chapter is still extremely important because it lays out the development of the anti-black doctrine and shows the pressures which led to its demise. The material we have added at the end of the chapter brings the reader right up to date. It should be noted also that had this chapter been written at the present time we would have used the word “blacks” instead of “Negroes.”

In his book, A Marvelous Work And A Wonder, the Mormon Apostle LeGrand Richards made the following statements:

. . . the Lord has made it plain that all male members of the Church, who live worthily, may receive the priesthood . . . (A Marvelous Work And A Wonder, Salt Lake City, 1966, pp. 91-92)

. . . the Latter-day Saints, . . . have a “royal priesthood,” where every worthy male member of the Church over twelve years of age may be a bearer thereof, . . . (Ibid., pp. 163-164)

These statements by the Apostle Richards are actually very misleading, for Negroes are not allowed to hold the Priesthood or go through the Temple no matter how they live. The Mormon leaders teach that Negroes are cursed by God, and therefore they are not entitled to receive the Priesthood. The Mormon position concerning the Negro was clearly stated in a letter written by the First Presidency of the Mormon Church in 1947. In this letter the following appears:

From the days of the Prophet Joseph even until now, it has been the doctrine of the Church, never questioned by any of the Church leaders, that the Negroes are not entitled to the full blessings of the Gospel. (Letter from the First Presidency of the Mormon Church, July 17, 1947, quoted in Mormonism and the Negro, by John J. Stewart and William E. Berrett, 2nd edition, 1960, pp. 46-47)

Bruce R. McConkie, of the Council of the Seventy, made this statement:

Negroes in this life are denied the priesthood; under no circumstances can they hold this delegation of authority from the Almighty. The gospel message of salvation is not carried affirmatively to them . . .

Negroes are not equal with other races where the receipt of certain spiritual blessings are concerned . . . (Mormon Doctrine, 1958, p. 477)

Black Skin

In Mormon theology a black skin is a sign of God’s displeasure. In the Mormon publication, Juvenile Instructor, the following statement appeared:

We will first inquire into the results of the approbation or displeasure of God upon a people, starting with the belief that a black skin is a mark of the curse of heaven placed upon some portions of mankind. Some, however, will argue that a black skin is not a curse, nor a white skin a blessing. In fact, some have been so foolish as to believe and say that a black skin is a blessing, and that the negro is the finest type of a perfect man that exists on the earth; but to us such teachings are foolishness. We understand that when God made man in his own image and pronounced him very good, that he made him white. We have no record of any of God’s favored servants being of a black race . . . every angel who ever brought a message of God’s mercy to man was beautiful to look upon, clad in the purest white and with a countenance bright as the noonday sun. (Juvenile Instructor, vol. 3, October 15, 1868, p. 157)

The Book of Mormon tells of a people being cursed with a black skin:

. . . wherefore, as they were white, and exceeding fair and delightful, that they might not be enticing unto my people the Lord God did cause a skin of blackness to come upon them. (Book of Mormon, 2 Nephi 5:21)

And the skins of the Lamanites were dark, according to the mark which was set upon their fathers, which was a curse upon them because of their transgression . . . (Ibid., Alma 3:6)

In Mormon 5:15 of the Book of Mormon the following statement is made concerning the Indians:

. . . for this people shall be scattered, and shall become a dark, a filthy, and a loathsome people, beyond the description of that which ever hath been amongst us, . . .

The Book of Mormon, however, predicts that the Indians will repent of their sins and become white:

. . . and many generations shall not pass away among them, save they shall be a white and delightful people. (Book of Mormon, 2 Nephi 30:6)

The Juvenile Instructor suggested that the Polynesians were also cursed with a dark skin:

We are asked if the natives of New Zealand and of the Samoan, Society and Sandwich Islands are descendants of the Nephites or of the Lamanites. . . .

It is plain from the history which the Lord has given us in the Book of Mormon that this dark skin has been brought upon them by transgression. Whether this transgression occurred before they left this continent or afterwards, is not clear. (Juvenile Instructor, vol. 30, p. 129)

In another article in the Juvenile Instructor it was taught that even apostates in “our day” have turned dark:

From this it is very clear that the mark which was set upon the descendants of Cain was a skin of blackness, and there can be no doubt that this was the mark that Cain himself received; in fact, it has been noticed in our day that men who have lost the spirit of the Lord, and from whom his blessings have been withdrawn, have turned dark to such an extent as to excite the comments of all who have known them. (Juvenile Instructor, vol. 26, p. 635)

Although Mormon theology teaches that anyone who is born with a dark skin is inferior, the Negro is considered the most inferior of all. Joseph Fielding Smith, who became the tenth President of the Mormon Church in 1970, once made this statement concerning the Negro:

Not only was Cain called upon to suffer, but because of his wickedness he became the father of an inferior race. (The Way to Perfection, p. 101)

President Smith has even stated that the Negro’s dark skin is emblematical of eternal darkness: “. . . we will also hope that blessings may eventually be given to our Negro brethren, for they are our brethren—children of God—notwithstanding their black covering emblematical of eternal darkness" (The Way to Perfection, p. 102).

The following statement concerning the "pure Negro" is found in the Juvenile Instructor: "Their skin is quite black, their hair woolly and black, their intelligence stunted, and they appear never to have arisen from the most savage state of barbarism" (The Juvenile Instructor, vol. 3, p. 157).

Although all dark-skinned people are considered inferior, the Negroes are the only people who cannot hold the Priesthood. The Mormon writer John L. Lund states: "The Church leaders from the earliest times up to and including the present have never changed their position concerning the Negro. Simply stated, no one who is a descendant of Cain may function in any capacity requiring Priesthood" (The Church and the Negro, 1967, p. 111).

Wallace Turner, a correspondent for the New York Times, made this statement:

The Negro Mormon can hold no office whatsoever in a church which offers some office to every one of its male members at some time in his life. A gray-haired Negro Mormon who may have spent his adult life in the careful practice of all the complicated and demanding rules set down by the LDS church stands disenfranchised before the altar where a youth whose beard is just beginning to fuzz may preside. A twelve-year-old boy may become a member of the Aaronic priesthood, more than this Negro man has been able to achieve through a lifetime of devotion. To hold any church office, a Mormon must be a member of the priesthood. (The Mormon Establishment, pp. 243-244)

Some Mormons who have questioned this doctrine have found themselves in serious trouble with the church. Grant Syphers wrote a letter in which he stated:

In all humility I must say that God has not inspired me to feel good about the Church's practices regarding Negroes. In fact, I have come to feel very strongly that the practices are not right and that they are a powerful hindrance to the accepting of the gospel by the Negro people.

As a result of my belief, when my wife and I went to San Francisco Ward's bishop to renew our temple recommends, he told us that anyone who could not accept the Church's stand on Negroes as divine doctrine was not supporting the General Authorities and could not go to the temple. Later, in an interview with the stake president we were told the same thing: if you express doubts about the divinity of this "doctrine" you cannot go to the temple. (Dialogue: A Journal of Mormon Thought, Winter 1967, p. 6)

Pre-Existence

To understand the Mormon attitude concerning the Negro, a person must first understand the Mormon doctrine of pre-existence. One of the basic doctrines of the Mormon Church is that the spirit of man existed before the world was created. Joseph Smith once stated:

... the soul, the mind of man, the immortal spirit. All men say God created it in the beginning. The very idea lessens man in my estimation; I do not believe the doctrine, I know better . . . I am going to tell of things more noble . . .

The mind of man is as immortal as God himself . . . God never did have power to create the spirit of man at all. (Times and Seasons, vol. 5, p. 615; reprinted in the History of the Church, vol. 6, pp. 310-311)

From this doctrine of the pre-existence of the soul, came the idea of some spirits being more noble than others. The Apostle Orson Pratt expressed this idea as follows:

I have already told you that the spirits of men and women, all had a previous existence, thousands of years ago, in the heavens, in the presence of God; and I have already told you that among them are many spirits that are more noble, more intelligent than others, . . . (Journal of Discourses, vol. 1, p. 62)

The following is taken from Joseph Smith's Book of Abraham:

Now the Lord had shown unto me, Abraham, the intelligences that were organized before the world was; and among all these there were many of the noble and great ones;

And God saw these souls that they were good, and he stood in the midst of them, and he said: These I will make my rulers; . . . and he said unto me: Abraham, thou art one of them; thou wast chosen before thou wast born. (Pearl of Great Price, Book of Abraham 3:22-23)

The Mormon leaders teach that the "more noble" or choice spirits are to be born as Mormons. The Apostle Pratt said:

... among the Saints is the most likely place for these spirits to take their tabernacles, through a just and righteous parentage. They are sent to that people that are the most righteous of any other people upon the earth; . . . this is the reason the Lord is sending them here. . . The Lord has not kept them in store for five or six thousand years past, and kept them waiting for their bodies all this time to send them among the Hottentots, the African Negroes, the idolatrous Hindoos, or any other of the fallen nations that dwell upon the face of the earth. They are not kept in reserve in order to come forth to receive such a degraded parentage upon the earth; . . . (Journal of Discourses, vol. 1, p. 63)

As we have already shown in another chapter, Joseph Fielding Smith, the tenth President of the Church, still maintains that the Mormons "are, notwithstanding our weaknesses, the best people in the world. I do not say that boastfully, for I believe that this truth is evident to all who are willing to observe for themselves. We are morally clean, in every way equal, and in many ways superior to any other people" (Doctrines of Salvation, vol. 1, p. 236). President Smith also maintains that the spirits who were not valiant in their "first estate" are born with a dark skin:

There is a reason why one man is born black and with other disadvantages, while another is born white with great advantages. The reason is that we once had an estate before we came here, and were obedient; more or less, to the laws that were given us there. (Doctrines of Salvation, vol. 1, p. 61)

The Negro is considered to have been more unfaithful than any of the spirits who were allowed to take a body. In a letter dated April 10, 1963, Joseph Fielding Smith said:

According to the doctrine of the church, the Negro, because of some condition of unfaithfulness in the spirit—or pre-existence—was not valiant and hence was not denied the mortal probation, but was denied the blessings of the priesthood.

Bruce R. McConkie, of the First Council of the Seventy, stated:

Those who were less valiant in pre-existence and who thereby had certain spiritual restrictions imposed upon them during mortality are known to us as the Negroes. Such spirits are sent to earth through the lineage of Cain, the mark put upon him for his rebellion against God and his murder of Abel being a black skin. (Mormon Doctrine, pp. 476-477)

The Mormon historian B. H. Roberts made this statement concerning the "rebellion in heaven":

Only those, however, who wickedly rebelled against God were adjudged to deserve banishment from heaven, and become the devil and his angels. Others there were, who may not have rebelled against God, and yet were so indifferent in their support of the righteous cause of our Redeemer, that they forfeited certain privileges and powers granted to those who were more valiant for God and correct principles. We have, I think, a demonstration of this in the seed of Ham... I believe that race is the one through which it is ordained those spirits that were not valiant in the great rebellion in heaven should come; who through their indifference or lack of integrity to righteousness, rendered themselves unworthy of the Priesthood and its powers, and hence it is withheld from them to this day. (The Contributor, vol. 6, pp. 296-297)

Is there reason then why the type of birth we receive in this life is not a reflection of our worthiness or lack of it in the pre-existent life? . . . can we account in any other of way for the birth of some of the children of God in darkest Africa, or in flood-ridden China, or among the starving hordes of India, while some of the rest of us are born here in the United States? We cannot escape the conclusion that because of performance in our pre-existence some of us are born as Chinese, some as Japanese, some as Indians, some as Negroes, some as Americans, some as Latter-day Saints. These are rewards and punishments, fully in harmony with His established policy in dealing with sinners and saints, rewarding all according to their deeds. . . .

Let us consider the great mercy of God for a moment. A Chinese, born in China with a dark skin, and with all the handicaps of that race seems to have little opportunity. But think of the mercy of God to Chinese people who are willing to accept the gospel. In spite of whatever they might have done in the pre-existence to justify being born over there as Chinamen, if they now, in this life, accept the gospel and live it the rest of their lives they can have the Priesthood, go to the temple and receive endowments and sealings, and that means they can have exaltation. Isn't the mercy of God marvelous?

Think of the Negro, cursed as to the priesthood . . . This Negro, who, in the pre-existence lived the type of life which justified the Lord in sending him to the earth in the lineage of Cain with a black skin, and possibly being born in darkest Africa—if that Negro is willing when he hears the gospel to accept it, he may have many of the blessings of the gospel. In spite of all he did in the pre-existent life, the Lord is willing, if the Negro accepts the gospel with real, sincere faith, and is really converted, to give him the blessings of baptism and the gift of the Holy Ghost. If that Negro is faithful all his days, he can and will enter the celestial kingdom. He will go there as a servant, but he will get celestial glory. (Race Problems—As They Affect The Church, Address by Mark E. Petersen at the Convention of Teachers of Religion on the College Level, Brigham Young University, Provo, Utah, August 27, 1954)

In 1845 the Mormon Apostle Orson Hyde explained that the Negroes were inferior spirits who lent an influence to the devil in the pre-existent state:

At the time the devil was cast out of heaven, there were some spirits that did not know who had authority, whether God or the devil. They consequently did not take a very active part on either side, but rather thought the devil had been abused, and considered he had rather the best claim to the government. These spirits were not considered bad enough to be cast down to hell, and never have bodies; neither were they considered worthy of an honourable body on this earth: but it came to pass that Ham, the son of Noah, saw the nakedness of his father while he lay drunk in his tent, and he with “wicked joy,” ran like Rigdon, and made the wonderful disclosure to his brethren; while Shem and Japheth took a garment, with pity and compassion, laid it upon their shoulders—went backwards and covered their father, . . . The conduct of the former brought the curse of slavery upon him, while that of the latter secured blessings, jurisdiction, power and dominion. . . . Canaan, the son of Ham, received the curse; for Noah wished to place the curse as remote from himself as possible. He therefore placed it upon his grandson instead of his son. Now, it would seem cruel to force pure celestial spirits into the world through the lineage of Canaan that had been cursed. This would be ill appropriate, putting the precious and vile together. But those spirits in heaven that rather lent an influence to the devil, thinking he had a little the best right to govern, but did not take a very active part any way were required to come into the world and take bodies in the accursed lineage of Canaan; and hence the Negro or African race. (Speech of Elder Orson Hyde, delivered before the High Priests' Quorum, in Nauvoo. April 27th, 1845, printed in Liverpool, p. 30)

The Mormon writer John J. Stewart claimed that the Negro was lucky to even receive a body:

In our society today, from which situation is the Negro suffering most: (1) In not being permitted to hold the Priesthood in the LDS Church, or (2) in having a black skin and other Negroid features, which stigmatize him in the eyes of most Whites?

The answer is obvious.

And who controls the fact of his having these Negroid features? His Creator, of course.

When God allows a spirit to take on a Negroid body, do you suppose He is unaware of the fact that he will suffer a social stigma?

Therefore, if you say this Church is unjust in not allowing the Negro to bear the Priesthood, you must, to be consistent, likewise say that God is even more unjust in giving him a black skin. . . . Is it not possible to see an act of mercy on the part of God in not having the Negro bear the Priesthood in this world, in view of his living under the curse of a black skin and other Negroid features? . . . With the social prejudice against him, imagine the obstacles that the Negro would encounter in attempting to honor and magnify his Priesthood.

I believe that we should recognize the mercy as well as the justice of God in all things. The very fact that God would allow those spirits who were less worthy in the spirit world to partake of a mortal body at all is further evidence of his mercy. (Mormonism and the Negro, part I, pp. 48-50)

Alvin R. Dyer, a General Authority who served in the First Presidency under President McKay, made these statements in a talk given to a group of missionaries in 1961:

We have talked a lot about missionary work and heard the testimonies of those who have spoken. I want to talk to you a little bit now about something that is not missionary work, and what I say is not to be given to your investigators by any matter of means. . . . Why is it that you are white and not colored? Have you ever asked yourself that question? Who had anything to do with your being born into the Church and not born a Chinese or a Hindu, or a Negro? Is God such an unjust person that He would make you white and free and make a Negro cursed under the curse of Cain that he should not hold the Priesthood of God? . . .

I want to talk to you just briefly about this, not with any information that you would convey to your investigators, but that you, yourselves, may have a better understanding of what we are doing in the mission field today . . . There were three divisions of mankind in the pre-existence, and when you are born into this life, you are born into one of these three divisions of people. There is an imposed judgment placed upon everyone who leaves the Spirit World just the same as there will be when they leave this life and go into one of three places. When they left the Spirit World, they had already been judged by what they had done in the Spirit World and in their previous life. From what judgment is determined how they shall be born in this life? When you understand that, you know that God is not unjust to cause a righteous spirit to be born as a cursed member of the black race or to be cursed as one of the other people who have been cursed. Everything is in order. The procreation of man is orderly and in accordance with the plan of life and salvation.

In keeping with this thought, when Noah went into the Ark, here again he took with him his three sons—one representing the cursed lineage. . . . Those who have been cursed in the pre-existence were born through this lineage of Ham.

I suppose, and you may have often heard missionaries say it or have asked the question: Why is a Negro a Negro?

And, you have heard this answer. “Well, they must have been neutral in the pre-existence or they must have straddled the fence.” That is the most common saying—they were neither hot nor cold, so the Lord made them Negroes. This, of course, is not true. The reason that spirits are born into Negro bodies is because those spirits rejected the Priesthood of God in the pre-existence. This is the reason why you have Negroes upon the earth.

You will observe that when Cain was influenced by the power of Lucifer to follow him . . . Cain rejected the counsel of God. He rejected again the Priesthood as his forebearers had done in the pre-existence. Therefore, the curse of the pre-existence was made institute through the loins of Cain. Consequently, you have the beginning of the race of men and women into which would be born those in the pre-existence who had rejected the Priesthood of God. . . . Ham reinstated the curse of the pre-existence when he rejected the Priesthood of Noah, and in consequence of that he preserved the curse on the earth. Therefore, the Negroes to be born thereafter, or those who were to become Negroes, were to be born through the loins of Ham.

All of this is according to a well worked-out plan, that these millions and billions of spirits awaiting birth in the pre-existence would be born through a channel or race of people. Consequently, the cursed were to be born through Ham. . . . The cursed people are the descendants of Ham. The chosen people are the descendants of Shem . . . Through these lineages the spirits that compare with their station are born in this life. This is why you have colored people, why you have dark people and why you have white people. . . .

I don't know whether the knowledge or the revelation of these things will have an effect upon you as a missionary, but I know that it has an effect upon me, . . . the day will come when you know who you are, because you are a person of nobility. You may not fully know that now, but you were a person of nobility in the pre-existence. If you were not, you would have been born into one of these other channels, and you would not have been born in this day and age, because the Lord has withheld the choice spirits of the pre-existence to come forth in this, the last dispensation, . . . I wanted you to know the reason why you are preaching the Gospel. There is a purpose behind it and knowing this as you do and knowing your nobility—what kind of a missionary are you going to be from this day to the end of your mission? . . .

I have always thought and have proven the point many times that if you will place into the mind of a boy or a girl, firmly, that they are noble persons born of noble heritage in the pre-existence, they will never stoop to anything that is sordid. . . . I have made known to you today something you may not have known before, but you know them now because the Spirit bears record.

May the Lord bless you in it and bless you with this knowledge. I bear record of its truthfulness in the name of Jesus Christ, Amen. (“For What Purpose?,” a talk given by Alvin R. Dyer at the Missionary Conference in Oslo, Norway, March 18, 1961, printed in The Negro in Mormon Theology, Jerald and Sandra Tanner, 1967, pp. 48-58)

The Mormon writer John L. Lund gives this information:

It is the Mormon belief that in our pre-mortal state there were a large number of individuals who, due to some act or behavior of their own in the pre-existence, forfeited the right to hold the Priesthood during their mortal lives, . . . The Negro is thus denied the Priesthood because of his own behavior in the pre-existence. (The Church and the Negro, pp. 42-43)

Melvin J. Ballard, who was an Apostle in the Mormon Church, made this statement:

Of the thousands of children born today, a certain proportion of them went to Hottentots of South Africa; thousands went to Chinese mothers; thousands went to Negro mothers; thousands to beautiful white Latter-day Saint mothers. Now you cannot tell me that all these spirits were just arbitrarily designated, marked, to go where they did, . . .

Why is it in this Church we do not grant the Priesthood to the Negroes? . . . I am convinced it is because of some things they did before they came into this life that they have been denied the privilege. (Melvin J. Ballard—Crusader for Righteousness, p. 218, as quoted in The Church and the Negro, p. 98)

Sons of Cain

Joseph Smith definitely taught that Negroes are the descendants of Cain. Under the date of January 25, 1842, we find this statement in Joseph Smith's History:

In the evening debated with John C. Bennett and others to show that the Indians have greater cause to complain of the treatment of the whites, than the Negroes, or sons of Cain. (History of the Church, vol. 4, p. 501)

Bruce R. McConkie, of the First Council of Seventy, explains the curse which was put on Cain as follows:

Though he was a rebel and an associate of Lucifer in pre-existence, and though he was a liar from the beginning whose name was Perdition, Cain managed to attain the privilege of mortal birth. Under Adam's tutelage, he began in this life to serve God. . . . he came out in open rebellion, fought God, worshiped Lucifer, and slew Abel. . . .

As a result of his rebellion, Cain was cursed with a dark skin; he became the father of the Negroes, and those spirits who are not worthy to receive the priesthood are born through his lineage. He became the first mortal to be cursed as a son of perdition. As a result of his mortal birth he is assured of a tangible body of flesh and bones in eternity, a fact which will enable him to rule over Satan. (Mormon Doctrine, p. 102)

In the Book of Moses, a revelation given to Joseph Smith in December 1830, it is stated that the “children of Canaan” were black:

For behold, the Lord shall curse the land with much heat, and the barrenness thereof shall go forth forever; and there was a blackness came upon all the children of Canaan, that they were despised among all people. (Pearl of Great Price, Book of Moses 7:8)

Brigham Young, the second President of the Mormon Church, declared that the flat nose and black skin were part of the mark put upon the descendants of Cain:

Cain slew his brother . . . and the Lord put a mark upon him, which is the flat nose and black skin . . . (Mormonism and the Negro, Part 2, p. 14; taken from Journal of Discourses, vol. 7, pp. 290-291)

The following is taken from the Mormon publication, the Millennial Star, vol. 14, page 418:

For instance, the descendants of Cain cannot cast off their skin of blackness, at once, and immediately, although every soul of them should repent, . . . Cain and his posterity must wear the mark which God put upon them; and his white friends may wash the race of Cain with Fuller's soap every day, they cannot wash away God's mark; . . .

Wilford Woodruff, who became the fourth President of the Mormon Church, made this statement:

What was that mark? It was a mark of blackness. That mark rested upon Cain, and descended upon his posterity from that time until the present. To day there are millions of the descendants of Cain, through the lineage of Ham, in the world, and that mark of darkness still rests upon them. (Millennial Star, vol. 51, p. 339)

The Mormon writer John L. Lund states:

Frankly, sincerely, and somewhat abruptly, President Brigham Young has told us that the mark of Cain was a “black skin.” For the Latter-day Saint no further explanation is required. . . . The question as to what the mark of Cain was, and is, is thus answered—a black skin for him and his posterity. (The Church and the Negro, 1967, pp. 13-14)

Through the Flood

The Mormon Apostle Erastus Snow said that “the offspring of Ham inherited a curse, and it was because, as a revelation teaches, some of the blood of Cain became mingled with that of Ham's family, and hence they inherited that curse" (Journal of Discourses, vol. 21, p. 370).

John Taylor, the third President of the Mormon Church, stated that a descendant of Cain came through the flood so that the devil might be properly represented upon the earth:

Why is it, in fact, that we should have a devil? Why did not the Lord kill him long ago? Because he could not do without him. He needed the devil and a great many of those who do his bidding just to keep men straight, that we may learn to place our dependence upon God, and trust in Him, and to observe his laws and keep his commandments. When he destroyed the inhabitants of the antediluvian world, he suffered a descendant of Cain to come through the flood in order that he might be properly represented upon the earth. (Journal of Discourses, vol. 23, p. 336)

The Mormon leaders teach that it was Ham's descendants who were "cursed as to the priesthood." They claim that Ham married a Negro woman named Egyptus, and that the curse was continued "through Ham's wife." Bruce R. McConkie says that "Noah's son Ham married Egyptus, a descendant of Cain, thus preserving the Negro lineage through the flood" (Mormon Doctrine, p. 477).

John Taylor, the third President of the Mormon Church, made this statement:

And after the flood we are told that the curse that had been pronounced upon Cain was continued through Ham's wife, as he had married a wife of that seed. And why did it pass through the flood? because it was necessary that the devil should have a representation upon the earth as well as God; . . . (Journal of Discourses, vol. 22, p. 304)

In the Book of Abraham—the Book of Abraham is found in the Pearl of Great Price which is one of the four standard works—the following appears:

Now this king of Egypt was a descendant from the loins of Ham, and was a partaker of the blood of the Canaanites by birth.

From this descent sprang all the Egyptians, and thus the blood of the Canaanites was preserved in the land.

The land of Egypt being first discovered by a woman, who was the daughter of Ham, and the daughter of Egyptus, which in the Chaldean signifies Egypt, which signifies that which is forbidden.

When this woman discovered the land it was under water, who afterward settled her sons in it; and thus, from Ham, sprang that race which preserved the curse in the land.

Now the first government of Egypt was established by Pharaoh, the eldest son of Egyptus, the daughter of Ham, and it was after the manner of the government of Ham, which was patriarchal.

Pharaoh, being a righteous man, . . . seeking earnestly to imitate that order established by the fathers in the first generations, in the days of the first patriarchal reign, even in the reign of Adam, and also of Noah, his father, who blessed him with the blessings of the earth, and with the blessings of wisdom, but cursed him as pertaining to the priesthood. (Pearl of Great Price, Book of Abraham 1:21-26)

In the Juvenile Instructor this statement appeared:

When God cursed Cain for murdering his brother Abel, He set a mark upon him that all meeting him might know him. No mark could be so plain to his fellow-men as a black skin. This was the mark God placed upon him, and which his children bore. After the flood this curse fell upon the seed of Ham, through the sin of their father, and his descendants bear it to this day. The Bible tells us but little of the races that sprung from Ham, but from that little, and from the traditions of various tribes, we are led to believe that from him came the Canaanites, the Philistines, the Egyptians and most of the earliest inhabitants of Africa. (Juvenile Instructor, vol. 3, p. 157)

The Mormon writer Arthur M. Richardson made this statement concerning the Negro:

Referring to Elder Hyde's statement we find, then, that those assigned to a dishonorable body on this earth came through the accursed lineage of Canaan through Ham's wife who was a descendant of the first murderer Cain, . . . (That Ye May Not Be Deceived, pp. 6-7)

Briefly stated, then, the Mormon doctrine concerning the Negro is this: In the "pre-existence" the Negroes "lent an influence to the devil." Because of their "unfaithfulness in the spirit world," they were "assigned to a dishonorable body on this earth." They come through "the accursed lineage of Canaan," and are "marked" with a "flat nose" and a "black covering" which is "emblematical of eternal darkness." They are a "vile" and "inferior" race. In fact, they are a "representation" of the "devil" upon the earth. They are "not equal with other races where the receipt of certain spiritual blessings are concerned," and they are "not entitled to the full blessings of the gospel." They are "denied the priesthood," and they cannot be married in a Mormon temple. But, "in spite" of all they "did in the pre-existence," they can be baptized and receive the Holy Ghost. If a Negro is faithful all his life he will enter the celestial kingdom. The Apostle Mark E. Petersen says the Negro will be only a "servant" there, but he will get a "celestial glory."

One Drop Disqualifies

The Mormon leaders have been very opposed to intermarriage with the Negro. The following appeared in the Juvenile Instructor, vol. 3, page 165:

In fact we believe it to be a great sin in the eyes of our Heavenly Father for a white person to marry a black one. And further, that it is a proof of the mercy of God that no such race appear able to continue for many generations.

Brigham Young, the second President of the Church, stated that if a person who belongs to the chosen seed mixes his blood with the Negro the penalty is death on the spot:

Shall I tell you the law of God in regard to the African race? If the white man who belongs to the chosen seed mixes his blood with the seed of Cain, the penalty, under the law of God, is death on the spot. This will always be so. (Journal of Discourses, vol. 10, p. 110)

One reason the Mormon leaders are so opposed to intermarriage is that they teach that "one drop of Negro blood" would prevent a person from holding the priesthood. The Mormon Apostle Mark E. Petersen explained as follows:

Now what is our policy in regard to inter-marriage? As to the Negro, of course, there is only one possible answer. We must not inter-marry with the Negro, Why? If I were to marry a Negro woman and have children by her, my children would all be cursed as to the priesthood. Do I want my children cursed as to the priesthood? If there is one drop of Negro blood in my children, as I have read to you, they receive the curse. There isn't any argument, therefore, as to inter-marriage with the Negro, is there? There are 50 million Negroes in the United States. If they were to achieve complete absorption with the white race, think what that would do. With 50 million Negroes inter-married with us, where would the priesthood be? Who could hold it, in all America? Think what that would do to the work of the Church! (Race Problems—As They Affect The Church, Address by Mark E. Petersen at the Convention of Teachers of Religion on the College Level, Brigham Young University, Provo, Utah, August 27, 1954)

Brigham Young, the second President of the Church, stated:

Any man having one drop of the seed of Cain in him cannot receive the priesthood; . . . (Wilford Woodruff, by Mathias F. Cowley, p. 351, quoted in That Ye May Not Be Deceived, p. 8)

In his address, "Race Problems—As They Affect The Church,” the Apostle Mark E. Petersen stated:

President Woodruff added, “The Lord said, ‘I will not kill Cain, but I will put a mark upon him, and that mark will be seen upon every face of every Negro . . . that mark shall remain upon the seed of Cain, until the seed of Abel shall be redeemed, and Cain shall not receive the Priesthood until the time of that redemption. Any man having one drop of the blood of Cain in him cannot receive the priesthood.’”

Joseph Fielding Smith, who is now President of the Mormon Church, made this statement in a letter to Morris L. Reynolds, dated May 9, 1966:

The descendants of Cain were barred from the blessings of the Priesthood . . . It would be a serious error for a white person to marry a Negro, for the Lord forbid it.

David L. Brewer interviewed several church leaders. He quoted one of these leaders as saying:

What can a Negro definitely want that I can’t give him? He may want to go into the temple. He’ll tell us we’re discriminating, and I suppose we are, aren’t we? Any red blooded American doesn’t want his children to marry Negroes. (Utah Elites and Utah Racial Norms, Ph.D. dissertation, University of Utah, August, 1966, p. 148)

The Mormon writer John L. Lund makes these statements:

A second reason for the mark of a black skin deals specifically with the problems of intermarriage. The Lord did not want the seed of Cain to intermingle with the rest of Adam’s children. (The Church and the Negro, 1967, p. 15)

. . . intermarriage with the Negro means the loss of Priesthood blessings. . . .

Brigham Young made a very strong statement on this matter when he said, “. . . Shall I tell you the law of God in regard to the African race? If the white man who belongs to the chosen seed mixes his blood with the seed of Cain, the penalty under the law of God, is death on the spot. This will always be so.” God has commanded Israel not to intermarry. To go against this commandment of God would be to sin. Those who willfully sin with their eyes open to this wrong will not be surprised to find that they will be separated from the presence of God in the world to come. This is spiritual death. . . .

The reason that one would lose his blessings by marrying a Negro is due to the restriction placed upon them. “No person having the least particle of Negro blood can hold the Priesthood.” It does not matter if they are one-sixth Negro or one-one hundred and sixth, the curse of no Priesthood is still the same. If an individual who is entitled to the Priesthood marries a Negro, the Lord has decreed that only spirits who are not eligible for the Priesthood will come to that marriage as children. To intermarry with a Negro is to forfeit a “Nation of Priesthood holders.” (Ibid., pp. 53-55)

Outwardly the Mormon doctrine concerning the Negro seems to be firm and absolute. “One drop of Negro blood,” the Mormon leaders declare, would prevent a man from holding the priesthood. The truth is, however, that some people with Negro blood are being ordained to the priesthood in the Mormon Church, in spite of the fact that the Mormon leaders have tried to prevent it. John M. Whitaker related in his journal the struggle he had when a man he suspected of having Negro blood applied for a Temple Recommend. It is interesting to note that Joseph F. Smith, the sixth President of the Mormon Church, was unable to help him decide whether the man was part Negro:

On the 10th, had a long conversation with brother Nelson Holder Ritchie, father of 12 children and living in the Pleasant View ward. As soon as he crossed the threshold of the front door, I felt that he had Negro blood in him. He came for a recommend to go through the temple and I asked him many questions concerning his birth. He told me his father was a pure blooded Cherokee Indian and that he never knew his mother, but was told by some friends she was very dark, Creole or mulatto, and a woman by the name of Nancy McNeal raised him. He told me he explained to his present wife before he married her all he knew of his genealogy and they want to go temple. He has been faithful and a good provider and saw no reason why he could not; but that feeling still persisted and I had many conversations with him on the matter and finally sent for his wife and learned all the facts she knew, still I felt the same and told them how I felt. They were really disturbed over the matter and I told them I would take their genealogy and all the facts and submit the case to the First Presidency of the Church. I did and they held several meetings with the Twelve and finally President Smith sent for me and said: “Johnny (he always called me by that name for years) We have fully considered the case of Brother Ritchie, and have concluded that as you are common judge in Israel, we return the case to you to decide.” That was a terrible responsibility, but I again had several meetings with the Richies and finally told them I still felt the same, that I appreciated they were good saints, and that feeling as I did, I dare not issue a recommend to the temple unless my feelings changed; that if they remained faithful and true, if they did not go to the Temple and died without getting in the Temple, the Lord would give them all that they were entitled to, but according to my understanding of the gospel anyone with Negro blood was not entitled to the Temple rights. They said their children, at least some of them had already been to the Temple for their marriage. So I told them to be faithful and no one could eventually hinder them from receiving all blessings earned by them, but not to think I had any personal feelings in the least, but must not go against my continued impressions. I made them feel that I was responsible also for anything I did to hinder good people from going to the Temple, that thus far, no one has been given a recommend to go the Temple by me unless my blessing went also. This case was a source of considerable sorrow to me for I believe they were good saints but [I] never gave the recommend. (“John M. Whitaker Journal,” vol. 2, p. 625, typed excerpts)

Negroes in the Priesthood

In the anti-Mormon book, Mormon Portraits, we read that a “colored man” by the name of Elijah Abel was ordained to the Priesthood in the Mormon Church in the days of Joseph Smith. Strange as it may seem, Andrew Jenson, who was the Assistant Church Historian, admitted that Elijah Abel was a Negro and that he had been ordained to the Priesthood:

Abel, Elijah, the only colored man who is known to have been ordained to the priesthood, . . . he was ordained an Elder March 3, 1836, and a Seventy April 4, 1841, an exception having been made in his case with regard to the general rule of the Church in relation to colored people. . . . In Nauvoo he was intimately acquainted with the Prophet Joseph Smith. . . . In 1883, as a member of the Third Quorum of Seventy, he left Salt Lake City on a mission to Canada, during which he also performed missionary labors in the United States. Two weeks after his return he died, Dec. 25, 1884, of debility, consequent upon exposure while laboring in the ministry in Ohio. He died in full faith of the gospel. (L.D.S. Biographical Encyclopedia, vol. 3, p. 577)

In a meeting held May 31st, 1879, Zebedee Coltrin was reported as saying: “. . . Brother Abel was ordained a Seventy because he had labored on the Temple, . . .” (“Journal History,” as quoted in Mormonism and the Negro, part 2, p. 10).

In 1884 the Mormon newspaper Deseret News printed Elijah Abel’s obituary:

ABLE.—In the 13th Ward, December 25th 1884, of old age and debility, consequent upon exposure while laboring in the ministry in Ohio, Elijah Able. Deceased was born in Washington County, Maryland, July 25, 1810; joined were destroyed by the Indians. That unfortunate affair has been laid to the charge of the whites. A certain judge that was then in this Territory wanted the whole army to accompany him to Iron county to try the whites for the murder of that company of emigrants. I told Governor Cumming that if he would take an unprejudiced judge into the district where that horrid affair occurred, I would pledge myself that every man in the regions round about should be forthcoming when called for, to be condemned or acquitted as an impartial, unprejudiced judge and jury should decide; and I pledged him that the court should be protected from any violence or hindrance in the prosecution of the laws; and if any were guilty of the blood of those who suffered in the Mountain Meadow massacre, let them suffer the penalty of the law; but to this day they have not touched the matter, for fear the Mormons would be acquitted from the charge of having any hand in it, and our enemies would thus be deprived of a favorite topic to talk about, when urging hostility against us. "The Mountain Meadow massacre! Only think of the Mountain Meadow massacre!" is their cry from one end of the land to the other.

"Come, let us make war on the Mormons, for they burnt government property." And what was the government doing there with their property? They were coming to destroy the Mormons, in violation of every right principle of law and justice. A little of their property was destroyed, and they were left to gnaw, not a file, but dead cattle's bones. I was informed that one man brought five blood hounds to hunt the Mormons in the mountains, and that the poor devil had to kill them and eat them before spring to save himself from starving to death, and that he was fool enough to acknowledge it afterwards in this city. This is the kind of outside pressure we have to meet with. Who wanted the army of 1857 here? Who sent for them? Liars, thieves, murderers, gamblers, whoremasters, and speculators in the rights and blood of the Mormon people cried to government, and government opened its ears, long and broad, saying, "I hear you, my children, lie on, my faithful sons Broccus, Drummond and Co.," and so they did lie on until the parent sent an army to use up the Mormons. Now I say, for the consolation of all my brethren and sisters, they cannot do it; and that is worse to them than all the rest; they cannot do it.

The rank, rabid abolitionists, whom I call black-hearted Republicans, have set the whole national fabric on fire. Do you know this, Democrats? They have kindled the fire that is raging now from the north to the south, and from the south to the north. I am no abolitionist. neither am I a pro-slavery man; I hate some of their principles and especially some of their conduct, as I do the gates of hell. The Southerners make the negroes, and the Northerners worship them; this is all the difference between slaveholders and abolitionists. I would like the President of the United States and all the world to hear this.

Shall I tell you the law of God in regard to the African race? If the white man who belongs to the chosen seed mixes his blood with the seed of Cain, the penalty, under the law of God, is death on the spot. This will always be so. The nations of the earth have transgressed every law that God has given, they have changed the ordinances and broken every covenant made with the fathers, and they are like a hungry man that dreameth that he eateth, and he awaketh and behold he is empty.

The following saying of the prophet is fulfilled: "Now also many nations

ABEL, Elijah, the only colored man who is known to have been ordained to the Priesthood, was born July 25, 1810, in Maryland. Becoming a convert to "Mormonism" he was baptized in September, 1832, by Ezekiel Roberts and, as appears from certificates, he was ordained an Elder March 3, 1836, and a Seventy April 4, 1841, an exception having been made in his case with regard to the general rule of the Church in relation to colored people. At Nauvoo, Illinois, where he resided, he followed the avocation of an undertaker. After his arrival in Salt Lake City he became a resident of the Tenth Ward, and, together with his wife, he managed the Farnham Hotel in Salt Lake City. In Nauvoo he was intimately acquainted with the Prophet Joseph Smith and later in life was the especial friend of the late Levi W. Hancock. In 1883, as a member of the Third Quorum of Seventy, he left Salt Lake City on a mission to Canada, during which he also performed missionary labors in the United States. Two weeks after his return he died, Dec. 25, 1884, of debility, consequent upon exposure while laboring in the ministry in Ohio. He died in full faith of the gospel.

ADAIR, Thomas Jefferson, an Elder who died away from home, filling a mission for the Church, was born May 28, 1884, at Nutrioso, Apache county, Arizona, the son of Samuel Newton Adair and Helen J. Brown. His grandparents on his father's side were among the noted residents of Nauvoo, Illinois, and his grandparents on his mother's side were associated with the Church in Kirtland, Ohio, where his grandfather Brown assisted in the erection of the Kirtland Temple. His parents were among the early settlers in Apache county, Arizona, and were staunch Latter-day Saints. Thomas J. was baptized Sept. 1, 1892, by his father and was ordained successively to the offices of Priest and Elder. He was set apart for a mission to the Southwestern States April 1, 1904, and was appointed to labor in Arkansas, where he spent twenty-eight months as a faithful, energetic missionary. While thus engaged he contracted a disease and being released from his mission he started for home and arrived at St. Johns, Arizona, July 23, 1904. His parents, who lived about seventy-five miles from St. Johns, were notified, but when they arrived at his bedside he was unable to travel further, and getting gradually worse, he died Aug. 1, 1906, at St. Johns. Elder Adair was greatly respected by all who knew him. He had received a good education, had attended the Stake academy at St. Johns, and taken the missionary course prior to going on his mission. He was noted for his exceptionally energetic and lively disposition and ever showed the greatest loyalty and devotedness to the Church.

ADAMS, Barnabas L., one of the original Utah pioneers of 1847, was born August 28, 1812, near Pearth, Upper Canada, of Vermont parents and was educated in the Methodist faith, several of his immediate relatives being preachers in that denomination. He became a convert to "Mormonism" when about twenty-three years of age and afterwards gathered to Missouri, traveling to that State in what was known as the Canada Camp, led by Elder John E. Page. Together with his co-religionists he was expelled from the State of Missouri by mobocratic violence, and settled with the Saints in Illinois. There he afterwards became subject once more to the ruthless hand of persecution, and during the general exodus in 1846 he came west, having lived for some time in Montrose, Lee county, Iowa. In June, 1846, he married Julia Ann Bawker at Montrose. She was a native of the State of New York. When President Brigham Young made the Church and was ordained an Elder as appears by certificate dated March 3d, 1836; was subsequently ordained a Seventy as appears by certificate dated April 4, 1841; labored successfully in Canada and also performed a mission to the United States, from which he returned about two weeks ago. He died in full faith of the Gospel.

Funeral at 16th Ward Assembly Rooms Saturday, Dec. 27th, at 10 a.m. Friends invited. (Deseret News, December 26, 1884)

At the funeral of Eugene Burns, who was Elijah Abel's grandson, a Patriarch by the name of Miner spoke of Elijah Abel's "loyalty and service to Joseph the Prophet." The following appeared in the Salt Lake Tribune:

Eugene Burns, colored, died last week . . . He was 24 years of age and was to have been married on the day on which his funeral occurred.

. . . At the request of the family Rev. D. A. Brown, pastor of the First Baptist church conducted the services. Following his remarks of condolence and sympathy to the bereaved friends who had gathered, Patriarch Miner, president of one of the quorums of the seventies of the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-Day Saints, made a few remarks. In the course of the dissertation he stated in substance that all that ever existed of the dead man lay in the casket before the altar.

Soul Was Doomed.

He further said that an Ethiopian could not reach the state of exaltation necessary to entrance into heaven. His soul was doomed before his birth. The patriarch's remarks caused awe and consternation among the hearers and precipitated an ecclesiastical scrimmage. The Rev. Mr. Brown replied to the remarks of the patriarch, . . .

Burns was a grandson of Abel, the body servant of Joseph the Prophet. Abel was a Negro, and, according to the remarks of Patriarch Miner, is the only one of his race who ever succeeded in gaining entrance within the pearly gates. The reason he was so successful in accomplishing that feat, according to the patriarch, was his loyalty and service to Joseph the Prophet, and his belief that the Mormon religion is the only one that ever happened. . . .

Abel, the son of Ham and body servant of Joseph the Prophet, died and was translated. The children whom he left in this world may never be exalted to that state, according to the patriarch. The reason assigned by the patriarch for the non-admission of Ethiopians to the other side is the fact of their dusky skins. No man with black skin may enter the gates of heaven, said the patriarch. . . .

"This is hardly the place to bring forth matters of truth," said the venerable patriarch as he ascended the pulpit after Mr. Brown had concluded his remarks, "but the truth ought always to be told. The truth never hurts." . . .

"I repeat, the truth must be told," continued the aged man in continuing the strange panegyric. He quivered and shook in the throes of intense excitement. "I am president of a quorum of seventies of the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-Day Saints. I am here to bear testimony not to the man who is dead, but to his Grandfather, Abel". . .

"I cannot refrain from speaking of the exceptional qualification of Abel, the body servant of Joseph the Prophet. His loyalty to the prophet was wonderful. He stayed constantly at his side until the prophet was translated. He believed implicitly in the Mormon faith and was rewarded for that belief. For his services to the Prophet and his faith in our religion he was raised to the order of the Melchisedek Priesthood. He was the only colored man who ever lived that belonged to that order. . . .

"It is not to be wondered at, too, when you consider the teachings of our church in relation to the colored people. We believe that there are three orders of spirits. In the first class are included the spirits that have never been incarnated. Having never been given a human body they are doomed to grope in darkness throughout eternity. There is no redemption for them.

"The second class includes the spirits which have been incarnated. They have been given the privilege of coming into the world and being redeemed through the plan of salvation that is open to us. That class is the whites.

"The third and last class of spirits is the class that fell. Because of their fall they are compelled to reside in bondage. They are given carnate bodies, but can never lift the yoke of bondage. That class of spirits includes the Negroes.

"Abel, the body servant of the prophet believed in Joseph Smith as a prophet and the latter-day dispensation. Hence he was exalted, and, so far as is known, he is the only one of his race who ever overcame the conditions of his bondage. . . .

"For the colored race, however, there is an exalted state in the next world into which they may go. Provision has been made in the teachings of the Prophet Joseph so that the negro may step up into that preliminary state of exaltation, and when he gets there a chance is given him to accept redemption, according to the teachings of Joseph Smith." . . .

Mr. Brown immediately arose and declared that no such teachings existed in the Bible. In refutation of the assertions of the patriarch he read several selections from the Bible, citing instances where men with black skins had been saved. He attempted to calm the feelings that had been aroused by the remarks of the patriarch. He offered assurances of hope and salvation to the friends of the dead man.

Bishop N. A. Empey then attempted to gain the attention of the audience to reply to Mr. Brown. He was refused the privilege of speaking by those in charge of the services.

Burns's family are Mormons, though the young man is said to have never affiliated himself with the church. (The Salt Lake Tribune, November 1, 1903, p. 8)

Although we were aware of the fact that Elijah Abel held the Priesthood in the Mormon Church, we were very astonished to learn that his descendants have also been ordained to the Priesthood.

The information concerning the ordination of Elijah Abel's descendants was found by Bob Phillips—Mr. Phillips has done a tremendous job of tracing Elijah Abel's descendants. The following is a copy of a chart, given to us by Mr. Phillips, showing that Elijah Abel and his descendants were ordained to the priesthood.

ORDINATIONS TO PRIESTHOOD

Elijah Able	Ordained an Elder March 3, 1836. Ordained a Seventy April 4, 1841 Nauvoo, Illinois
Enoch Able (son of Elijah)	Ordained an Elder November 10, 1900. by John Q. Adams Logan 5th Ward, Utah
Elijah Able (grandson of Elijah) son of Enoch	Ordained a Priest July 5, 1934. by J. C. Hogenson Ordained an Elder September 29, 1935 by Reuben L. Hill Logan 10th Ward, Utah

After receiving this chart we began to search through the records in the Genealogical Society—which is owned by the Mormon Church—to see if we could confirm the statement that Elijah Abel's descendants have been ordained to the Priesthood. With the help of Bob Phillips, we were able to find information that proves that the Negro blood in the Abel family has not prevented some of them from holding the Priesthood. In fact, we have obtained an actual photograph of Elijah Abel's grandson's ward membership record, which proves beyond all doubt that he was ordained to the Priesthood. The Genealogical Library would not make a photocopy of this record. After a great deal of trouble, however, we found a way to get one. We have reproduced this photocopy at the bottom of this page. Enoch Abel (Elijah's son) evidently married a "white" woman by the name of Mary Jordi. The people in Enoch Abel's ward must have known that he was a Negro, for when the local newspaper announced his death it called him a "colored" man:

Enoch Able, a colored resident of the Fifth ward, died at noon on Thursday, of pneumonia. Able left a wife and large family in destitute circumstances. (The Journal, Logan City, Utah, February 23, 1901)

Enoch Abel had a son that he named Elijah. Sometime between 1917 and 1925 he was ordained to the Priesthood, for the Church Census Records for 1925 list him as a Deacon. The photograph printed below shows that he was ordained a Priest in 1934 and an Elder in 1935. This definitely proves that the Negro blood in the Abel family has not prevented some of them from being ordained.

Bob Phillips says that there are at least sixty descendants of Elijah Abel (not to be confused with his grandson who was also named Elijah) in the Mormon Church. At least forty of these live within a radius of 100 miles of Salt Lake City, and, of course, some of them hold the Priesthood and are doing missionary work for the Church. Elijah Abel had six daughters. Therefore, many of his descendants do not have the name of Abel. Some of their children were apparently adopted into "white" families in Utah. It is evident, then, that some members of the Mormon Church who believe that they are "white" are in reality part Negro. Bob Phillips claims that some of Elijah Abel's descendants think he was an "Indian." Perhaps some of the very people who are defending the Mormon doctrine concerning the Negro are themselves descendants of Elijah Abel. For more information on Elijah Abel and his descendants see our book, Mormons and Negroes, pages 13-18.

There have been other Negroes, who were not related to the Abel family, who have held the Priesthood in the Mormon Church. The Mormon writer William E. Berrett tells of a Negro who was ordained to the Priesthood:

It appears that one person of Negro blood had been ordained an Elder by William Smith while he was on his mission in New York State as evidence by a letter appearing in Journal History, June 2, 1847:

At this place (Batavia, New York) I found a colored brother by the name of Lewis, a barber and an Elder in the Church ordained by William Smith. This Lewis, I am also informed, has a son who is married to a white girl and both are members of the Church.

(Mormonism and the Negro, part 2, p. 7)

Another Negro who was apparently ordained to the Priesthood was Edward Leggroan. In the 1914 Church Census the Leggroans are listed as "Colored." Kate B. Carter reproduces the following letter from Sarah Leggroan:

Dear Mrs. Carter:

Edward Leggroan lived in the 9th Ward. He was a deacon. In those days the deacons cleaned the church, looked after the lamps and fire. . . .

Sincerely

Sarah Leggroan

(The Negro Pioneer, Daughters of Utah Pioneers, Lesson For May, 1965, p. 547)

L. H. Kirkpatrick stated: "The reason there might have been other colored members in full standing is that some of the first converts and branches of the Church were long on faith, but short on records" (Pen, Winter, 1954, p. 12).

Joseph Fielding Smith, who became President of the Church in 1970, has done his best to cover up the fact that Negroes have been ordained. On June 8, 1960, a woman, who is a member of the Mormon Church, wrote a letter to Joseph Fielding Smith asking him concerning the ordination of Negroes. In this letter she stated:

Last night at our Mutual class we were studying the 38 Sec. of Doctrine and Covenant[s] verse 16, where in—All flesh is mine and I am no respecter of persons.

This led on to discussion and some one remarked that negroes were ordained Elders in the early church.

Will you please tell me who the man was, at what time did this happen, and who ordained him? . . . Was more than one negro ordained an Elder? . . .

The answer she received was postmarked June 10, 1960, and read: "Negroes were not ordained in the early Church."

Lately the truth about Elijah Abel has become more generally known, and in a letter dated April 10, 1963, Joseph Fielding Smith stated: ". . . this statement that Elijah Abel was so ordained has traveled to the end of the earth." In the same letter Joseph Fielding Smith admitted that Elijah Abel was ordained: "It is true that

A photograph from the records of members of the Logan Tenth Ward for the years 1927-1943. This photograph proves that Elijah Abel (the grandson of the Negro Elijah Abel) was ordained to the priesthood. Notice that he was ordained a priest July 5, 1934, and an Elder September 29, 1935. This photograph was obtained with great difficulty from a microfilm in the Genealogical Library in Salt Lake City, Utah. The serial number for this microfilm is 6360 and the part number is 22.

elders of the church laid hands on a Negro and blessed him 'apparently' with the priesthood, but they could not give that which the Lord had denied. It is true that Elijah Abel was so 'ordained.'

In less than three years Joseph Fielding Smith had to change his story from "Negroes were not ordained in the early Church" to "It is true that elders of the church laid hands on a Negro and blessed him 'apparently' with the Priesthood, . . . It is true that Elijah Abel was so 'ordained.'"

It is very interesting to note that President Joseph Fielding Smith has criticized the Reorganized Church for ordaining a "few" Negroes: "In the 'Reorganized' Church they have a few, at least, of the Negro race, that they have been 'ordained to the priesthood' but it is contrary to the word of God" (Origin of the Reorganized Church and the Question of Succession, p. 130).

The Mormon apologist William E. Berrett admitted that two Negroes were ordained; however, he stated that in a meeting held May 31, 1879, the "leaders of the Church reapproved" that Negroes could not hold the Priesthood. Mr. Berrett states that Elijah Abel was "light of color," and he implies that the man who ordained him may not have known that he was a Negro. He quotes Zebedee Coltrin as making this statement: "Brother Coltrin further said Brother Abel was ordained a seventy . . . and when the Prophet Joseph learned of his lineage he was dropped from the Quorum, and another was put in his place" (Mormonism and the Negro, part 2, p. 10). This argument is absolutely ridiculous, for even Zebedee Coltrin admits that he knew that Elijah Abel was a Negro:

In the washing and anointing of Brother Abel at Kirtland, I anointed him and while I had my hands upon his head, I never had such unpleasant feelings in my life. And I said, "I never would again anoint another person who had Negro blood in him unless I was commanded by the Prophet to do so." (Mormonism and the Negro, part 2, p. 11)

If Zebedee Coltrin knew that Elijah Abel was a Negro, is it possible to believe that Joseph Smith did not know? It should be remembered that Joseph Smith lived in Kirtland at the time Elijah Abel was there.

Arthur M. Richardson uses the same type of argument as William E. Berrett. He states that Elijah Abel was ordained "without the Prophet Joseph's knowledge and that when he found out he had Elijah Abel dropped from the quorum (Church Library)" (That Ye May Not Be Deceived, p. 8).

Notice that the only source Mr. Richardson gives for this statement is the "Church Library." Since the Church Library has thousands of books and manuscripts, we feel that Mr. Richardson should have been more specific in his reference. In his other references he tells the name of the book and the page number. Perhaps he was referring to the statement by Zebedee Coltrin; if so, it must be remembered that this statement was made at least thirty years after the event was supposed to have occurred. But even if it were possible for Mr. Richardson to prove that Elijah Abel was "dropped from the quorum," how would he explain the fact that "In 1883" Elijah Abel was a "member of the Third Quorum of Seventy?"

The Mormon writer John L. Lund admits that Elijah Abel was ordained: "History records an incident of Elijah a Negro, being given the Priesthood" (The Church and the Negro, p. 76). Nevertheless, Mr. Lund argues that Elijah Abel was later dropped from his Priesthood Quorum:

. . . when the Church leaders became aware that this man had Negro blood, his Priesthood was suspended.

That Elijah Abel was a good man is not in question. The fact that he held the Priesthood is also a matter of record. . . . Once it was discovered that Elijah Abel was of Negroid ancestry, he was dropped from his Priesthood Quorum (1879) . . . he did have Negro blood and was therefore not eligible for the Priesthood. (The Church and the Negro, pp. 76-77)

Like Mr. Richardson, John L. Lund's only source for this statement is listed as: "Record in Church Historian's office." And, strange as it may seem, on the same page that Mr. Lund states that Elijah Abel was dropped from his quorum, he quotes Andrew Jenson (who was Assistant Church Historian) as saying that Elijah Abel was still a member of the "Third Quorum of Seventy" in "1883." On the next page, Mr. Lund makes his argument even weaker, for he admits that Elijah Abel's descendants were apparently ordained:

It is also apparently true that several other Negroes, including some of Elijah Abel's descendants, have been ordained to the Priesthood. It is the policy of the Church in these and other cases to suspend the Priesthood from those who are known to be of the seed of Cain. It is admitted that the Priesthood has been mistakenly given to some Negroes who are light of color. However, the Church wishes to follow the order of heaven and the commandments of God; therefore, when Negro ancestry is discovered in a man who holds the Priesthood, he is suspended in the use of that Priesthood. (The Church and the Negro, p. 78)

It is not possible for us to believe that the Mormon leaders ordained Elijah Abel by mistake, took his Priesthood away and then "mistakenly" ordained his descendants. Mr. Lund claims that the policy of the church is to "suspend the Priesthood" from those who have Negro blood, yet he furnishes no evidence to show that Elijah Abel's descendants have been suspended in the use of their Priesthood. We do not believe that the Mormon leaders will suspend the Priesthood from Elijah Abel's descendants. We feel that they would rather keep the matter quiet. If they really believe that it is "contrary to the word of God" to ordain Negroes (as Joseph Fielding Smith claims) why don't they search out the descendants of Elijah Abel and take away their Priesthood? Of course they will not do this because they know that there are many other people in the church who have Negro blood in them. According to an article in Time Magazine, almost all white people have at least a small amount of Negro blood in them:

A glance tells that many Americans who are classified as Negro have plenty of European "blood"; white people with Negro blood are harder to distinguish, their African genes may not affect their appearance and they usually do not know that some of the ancestors "passed." In the Ohio Journal of Science, Sociologist Robert P. Stuckert of Ohio State University attempts to estimate how many white Americans have some African ancestry. . . . When Dr. Stuckert has constructed his table for each census year, he reaches the conclusion that of 135 million Americans classified as white in 1950, about 28 million (21%) had some African ancestry. Of the 15 million classified as Negro, slightly more than 4,000,000 (27%) were of pure African descent. During 1941-50, he estimates, about 155,000 Negroes moved into the white category . . . people with ancestors who lived in the Roman Empire, including England and part of Germany, are descended from a broad cut of the empire's population.

The Roman Empire had no color line, and streams of people moved through it for centuries in every direction. Africans including those with Negro ancestry, fought in the legions, traveled as merchants or seamen. Everywhere they went they left their immortal genes; so few white Americans can claim to have none of them, and none can prove it. (Time Magazine, June 30, 1958, p. 47)

If Brigham Young's statement that even one drop of Negro blood would exclude a person from the Priesthood were true, many of the Mormons would have to relinquish their Priesthood. It would be impossible to do as much missionary work in the South as the Mormon Church does and not convert many people who have Negro ancestry.

The Mormon writer Armand L. Mauss made the following statements in an article published in Dialogue: A Journal of Mormon Thought, Winter 1967, page 24:

One wonders, for example, why the Lord permitted the ordination of Elijah Abel (and I have even heard it claimed that Church records would show Abel's sons and grandsons to have been ordained too, . . .) One wonders also how we can be sure that all who are given the priesthood are free of even remote Hamitic lineage, especially in such ethnically mixed areas as Latin America and Fiji. . . . In cases of ordinations which seem to constitute "exceptions," or are otherwise questionable, it is not my responsibility to offer "explanations"; these must come, if they are to come, from the Prophets themselves, who, we must presume, know what they are doing. Nothing is to be gained, it seems to me, by nit-picking about occasional exceptions to Church policies anyway, as long as these are rare; . . .

The Mormon writer Lester Bush is willing to admit that a number of Negroes have been ordained:

Elijah Abel, . . . was . . . ordained a Seventy . . . There have been numerous subsequent cases of men of Negro ancestry reportedly receiving the priesthood. The most commonly cited include a "colored" Elder in Batavia, N.Y., . . . Samuel Chambers, a prominent Salt Lake Negro reportedly active in the Eighth Ward Deacon's Quorum in 1873-74 . . . two unnamed Negro Elders reported in South Carolina (Journal History, August 18, 1900); Eduard Leggroan, a "deacon" in Salt Lake City's Ninth Ward . . . and several of Elijah Abel's descendants, e.g., his son Enoch and grandson Elijah, both reportedly Elders . . . Some of Abel's children, themselves with light complexions, married into "white" families, and the descendants of these marriages have largely "passed over" from Negro to white. The problem of what policy to follow in cases such as this, where a priesthood holder finds unexpected Negro ancestry, has not been resolved consistently by the Church. Though Brigham Young is said to have excluded anyone with as much as "one drop of the seed of Cain" in his blood, occasional exceptions are reported more recently, particularly if the individual was assigned a lineage other than Cain, Ham or Canaan in his patriarchal blessing. (Dialogue: A Journal of Mormon Thought, Winter 1969, pp. 91-92, n. 30)

Wallace Turner gives this information:

The continual LDS insistence on racial bigotry has another serious, defect, too, since it assumes that the prohibition is equal to all Negroes and always has been. This is untrue. All Mormons who have ever studied the matter know that Elijah Abel, . . . was a full member of the Mormon priesthood for almost a half century, . . . (The Mormon Establishment, pp. 241-242)

One indication of potential change is the astounding fact that in the past year or so the Mormons have been ordaining Fiji islanders into the priesthood. It came about gradually. For many years the church maintained missions among the Polynesians, . . .

The Mormon mission worked through the Polynesians on Tonga and then moved to the Melanesians on Fiji. The Melanesians are black—very black—and are described in reference works as Negroid in appearance except that their noses are not so flat as African Negroes and their hair is more inclined to stand out from their heads than to be coiled closely to it it is obvious that someone advanced the argument successfully that they were not African Negroes and therefore—whatever their skin color—were not the bearers of the curse of Cain.

A different thing is going on in South America where the Mormon missionaries are pushing ahead full throttle. There the former careful selection to keep out "white Negroes" has been allowed to slide a little.

But, sadly, sometimes the missionaries get orders from Salt Lake City to go to a new elder and tell him that he should not try to exercise his priestly authorities, that he has a Negro ancestor and everything was a big mistake.

"There is no question but that in Brazil they have been ordaining priests who are part Negro," said one careful observer. (Ibid., pp. 262-263)

Speaking of Brigham Young's statement that one drop of Negro blood would exclude a person from the Priesthood, Jim Todd made these observations:

Sweeping as this statement is, it can have no literal meaning without causing great, if not total reduction, in the numbers holding the LDS priesthood.

Of course Brigham Young made his statement a long time ago, and did not have access to later scientific concepts. . . .

It has been claimed that probably no European is totally free of Negro genes . . . they do have some, certainly more than the "one drop" mentioned by Brigham Young.

Obviously, few if any Eu[r]opeans are barred from the LDS priesthood. Yet do not Brigham Young's words require they should be so barred? Where, then, could the line be drawn?

What possible method could be used to detect a person who had a single Negro ancestor as few as four generations ago? Furthermore, what if the colored ancestor was eight or ten generations back?

. . . Therefore, unless drastically modified, there is no way Brigham Young's statement can have any real meaning.

Yet just what are the reasons that the Negro is denied the LDS priesthood? Are they only trivial and unimportant? An apparent injustice such as this which moves against the winds of change merits a reasonable and public explanation. Why is there at present no convincing, or even any official, explanation?

Perhaps sooner rather than later, the LDS hierarchy will consider this an issue of the times, and either resolve it or clarify it. (The Daily Utah Chronicle, University of Utah, November 22, 1966)

Mormons claim that the "mark of Cain" was a "black skin," yet they admit that all Negroes are not black. John L. Lund makes these statements:

Therefore, no one who is a descendant of Cain, regardless of whether he is black, brown, red, yellow, or white is allowed to hold the Priesthood. (The Church and the Negro, pp. 101-102)

Some have believed that the mark and the curse of Cain were one and the same. The mark of a dark skin was separate from the curse although generally the two are found together. It is possible to have a light-colored skin and still carry the curse of no Priesthood. (Ibid., p. 106)

In a letter published in Dialogue: A Journal of Mormon Thought, Gary Lobb wrote the following:

We must therefore ask, "Just who is a Negro?" We, as a Church, have decided that the Melanesian Fiji Islanders are not while the Papuans of neighboring New Guinea are. In some of the branches of the Church which my wife and I have attended here in Brazil, there appear to be priesthood bearers who possess the essential characteristics of the Negroid races. I am reminded that someone of authority decided that these people are not.

These, I believe, are some legitimate questions for us as individuals within the Church to examine, and we should examine them within a context of our testimonies and with the assurance of the divine mission of Joseph Smith. (Dialogue: A Journal of Mormon Thought, Autumn 1967, p. 8)

Negroes Unhappy

President Joseph Fielding Smith would have us believe that the Negroes who are in the church accept their position without question:

Fortunately for the Negro, he is not denied entrance into the Church. . . . We have in the Church many good, honest, faithful Negroes who fully understand. (Answers to Gospel Questions, vol. 2, p. 178)

This statement is in direct contradiction to a statement made by a Negro member of the church by the name of Monroe Fleming. In a letter to us Mr. Fleming stated:

Dear brother Tanner:

I wish to state that the statement that the Negro is contented as a member in the church without the priesthood, is not true. I know most of the members of the Negro race in the Church and know that they feel that they should have the priesthood if they live a life based upon the principles of the Gospel.

Sincerely,
M. H. Fleming

Kate B. Carter made this statement concerning a Negro woman who was a member of the Mormon Church:

She had a great desire to go to the temple, and when she found that the temple was closed to Negroes, she scratched her arm until it bled and said: "See, my blood is as white as anyone's." (The Negro Pioneer, p. 523)

On page 535 of the same book, Mrs. Carter quoted Mary Lee Bland Ewell as saying:

Mammy Chloe loved the Gospel. I taught her to read, and she often remarked: "I'd be willen, honey, to be skinned alive if I could jus' go in dat Temple."

Edgar Whittingham, a Negro member of the Mormon Church, made these statements:

When I made it known that I had decided to take steps to become a member of the Church, my friend, the person who actually taught me the Gospel or discussed it with me . . . very hesitatingly approached me one day and said that he had something very special to tell me. Then he proceeded to explain the curse on the Negroes. Naturally I was deeply hurt and greatly upset about it. I guess my emotions got the best of me. I didn't do anything irrational, but having been deeply wounded in the house of my friends, I left the Church and stayed away for approximately a year. . . . In time I gradually overcame the emotional hurt and after much reflective thinking, I returned to the LDS branch. . . . Up until the time I was told that because I was a Negro I could not hold the Priesthood, my knowledge of Christianity in the Methodist Church had persuaded me to believe that regardless of color we would all have the opportunity to do the same things or acquire the same glories. My reaction to being told I could not hold the priesthood was that it was a stigma of discrimination. Now this is the general belief that I think most Negroes hold today. Perhaps the only reason I am a member of the Church today is that I heard the Gospel before I had known of this particular curse. . . .

I've had contact with many Negroes since joining the Church who have not pursued their interests in the Church because they were repelled by awareness of inability to acquire full Priesthood fellowship. Even as a member of the Church, I still find the "curse" very difficult to understand. I find others also have difficulty understanding this problem. . . . I believe that through revelation a change may be made. . . . Whether or not Negroes will receive the Priesthood during my life I don't know, . . . ("Is the Negro My Brother?," unpublished paper of Dr. Wilford S. Smith, as cited in The Church and the Negro, pp. 70-72)

Objections to Doctrine

Many objections can be found to the Mormon doctrine concerning the Negro. One of the most important is that it is not in harmony with the Bible. In Acts 10:34 we read: "Then Peter opened his mouth, and said, Of a truth I perceive that God is no respecter of persons; but in every nation he that feareth him, and worketh righteousness, is accepted with him." In Acts 10:28 Peter said, ". . . God hath showed me that I should not call any man common or unclean." William E. Berrett admits that the Bible does not lend much support to the idea that the Negro should be forbidden any rights in the church:

While the Bible contains no account of a Negro bearing the Priesthood of God, one would find rather scant materials upon which to base any policy limiting the rights and participation of the Negro in God's Church. (Mormonism and the Negro, part 2, p. 3)

Although the Book of Mormon states that the Indians were cursed with a dark skin, it does not say anything concerning the Negro. In fact, it states that "all men are privileged the one like unto the other and none are forbidden" (Book of Mormon, 2 Nephi 26:28). In 2 Nephi 26:33 this statement appears:

. . . he inviteth them all to come unto him and partake of his goodness; and he denieth none that come unto him, black and white, bond and free, male and female; and he remembereth the heathen; and all are alike unto God, both Jew and Gentile.

David O. McKay, who was the ninth President of the Mormon Church, made the following statement:

I know of no scriptural basis for denying the Priesthood to Negroes other than one verse in the Book of Abraham (1:26); however, I believe, as you suggest that the real reason dates back to our pre-existent life. (Mormonism and the Negro, part 2, p. 19)

Joseph Fielding Smith, the tenth President of the Church, admits that he has not found any scriptural basis for not allowing the Negro to hold the Priesthood other than the statement in the Book of Abraham, which is part of the Pearl of Great Price:

It is true that the negro race is barred from holding the Priesthood, and this has always been the case. The Prophet Joseph Smith taught this doctrine, and it was made known to him, although we know of no such statement in any revelation in the Doctrine and Covenants, Book of Mormon, or the Bible. (The Improvement Era, vol. 27, p. 565)

For Cain's Sins

The second Article of Faith of the Mormon Church reads as follows: "We believe that men will be punished for their own sins, and not for Adam's transgression" (Pearl of Great Price, p. 60).

To avoid the idea that Cain's descendants were punished for his "transgression," the Mormon leaders have taught that the Negroes were "indifferent in their support of the righteous cause" in the pre-existence. Gaylon L. Caldwell made the following statement:

This doctrine is not without logical difficulties, however. Considering the Latter-day Saint dictum that "man is punished for his own sins" the curse on Cain is understandable and consistent with Mormon philosophy, since the Mormon scripture insists that he sinned knowingly and wilfully. But how is one to account for the penalty on all his alleged descendants? An arbitrary God who would permit millions of people to be deprived of the priesthood, and hence its concomitant blessings, by accident of birth simply does not fit into the Mormon theology. As would be expected, this problem has led to the formulation of several theses. One of the most popular was framed by B. H. Roberts from a suggestion by Orson Hyde, early Apostle. Roberts suggested that since all spirits before living in the flesh had an opportunity to prove their fidelity to God and His laws during the "war in heaven" some of them might have been neutral, or proved less valiant than others, and thus lost the right of priesthood during their earthly sojourn. (Western Humanities Review, Winter 1959, p. 105)

The Mormon writer John J. Stewart stated:

Note, also, that part of Cain's curse was to have as his posterity those spirits unable to bear the Priesthood in this life. . . .

To suppose that the Negroes, the descendants of Cain, are born with black skins and are denied the Priesthood merely to perpetuate God's curse upon Cain, is alike an affront to reasoning man and to the justice and mercy of God. (Mormonism and the Negro, part 1, pp. 44-45)

Strange as it may seem, however, the idea that the Negroes did something wrong in the pre-existence (which the Mormon Church leaders now teach) is contradicted by a statement which Brigham Young attributes to Joseph Smith:

President Brigham Young, answering a question put to him by Elder Lorenzo D. Young . . . said that Joseph Smith had declared that the negroes were not neutral in heaven, for all the spirits took sides, but "the posterity of Cain are black because he (Cain) committed murder. He killed Abel and God set a mark upon his posterity. But the spirits are pure (i.e. innocent). See

D.C. 93:38.) that enter their tabernacles and there will be a chance for the redemption of all the children of Adam, except the sons of perdition. (The Way to Perfection, by Joseph Fielding Smith, pp. 105-106)

To show how confused the Mormon writers are concerning the pre-existence, we need only compare two statements they have made concerning Cain. John J. Stewart implies that Cain was “valiant” in the pre-existence and did not fall to the temptations of Satan until he came to this earth:

Cain, a son of Adam and Eve, apparently had quite a different record in the Spirit world. He was likely one of the valiant one there, and thus was born into this world under the most favorable circumstances, of a noble sire and mother, and was even privileged to walk and talk with God. (Mormonism and the Negro, part 1, p. 39)

Bruce R. McConkie, on the other hand, states:

Though he was a rebel and an associate of Lucifer in pre-existence, and though he was a liar from the beginning whose name was Perdition, Cain managed to attain the privilege of mortal birth. (Mormon Doctrine, 1958, p. 102)

Negroes and the Gospel

The Bible teaches that the Gospel is to be carried to all people. Jesus is recorded as saying: “. . . go ye into all the world, and preach the gospel to every creature” (Mark 16:15). Jesus also said: “Go ye therefore, and teach all nations, baptizing them in the name of the Father and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost;” (Matthew 28:19).

Philip was actually commanded to preach the gospel to an Ethiopian; see Acts 8:26-39. An Ethiopian is defined in the dictionary as a Negro. Jeremiah asks, “Can the Ethiopian change his skin” (Jeremiah 13:23). In Acts 8:38 it tells us that Philip baptized the Ethiopian.

Although the Bible teaches that the Gospel is to be carried to all people, including the Negro, the Mormon Church has tried to avoid doing missionary work among the Negro people. Bruce R. McConkie, of the Council of the Seventy, stated: “The gospel message of salvation is not carried affirmatively to them . . .” (Mormon Doctrine, p. 477)

William E. Berrett stated: “. . . no direct efforts have been made to proselyte among them” (Mormonism and the Negro, part 2, p. 5).

The Mormon writer Arthur M. Richardson very bluntly stated: “. . . The Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints, has no call to carry the gospel to the Negro, and it does not do so” (That Ye May Not Be Deceived, p. 13).

The Mormon publication, The Pearl of Great Price, is used by Mormon writers to justify not taking the Gospel to the Negro. In the Book of Moses, which is part of the Pearl of Great Price, we read:

. . . and there was a blackness came upon all the children of Canaan, that they were despised among all people. . . .

And it came to pass that Enoch continued to call upon all the people, save it were the people of Canaan, to repent; (Pearl of Great Price, Book of Moses 7:8, 12)

President Joseph Fielding Smith stated: “The Canaanites before the flood preserved the curse in the land; the Gospel was not taken to them, and no other people would associate with them” (The Way to Perfection, p. 108).

The Mormon Apostle Mark E. Petersen made this statement: “When he told Enoch not to preach the gospel to the descendants of Cain who were black, the Lord engaged in segregation” (Race Problems as They Affect the Church, Address by Mark E. Petersen, August 27, 1954).

The Mormon writer Arthur M. Richardson made this statement:

Also, the gospel was not carried to this segregated black group.

And it came to pass that Enoch continued to call upon all the people, save it were the people of Canaan, to repent.

These quotations so far point out that the Negroes tread the earth with black dishonorable bodies as a judgment of God because at the time of decision in the pre-existence they were faint-hearted and exhibited an infirmity of purpose—they were not valiant in the cause of the Lord Jesus Christ. Therefore, they were entitled to no better earthly lineage than that of the first earthly murderer, Cain. They were to be the “servant of servants.” They were to be segregated. No effort was made to carry the gospel to them as a people. (That Ye May Not Be Deceived, pp. 9-10)

In 1947 the Mormon Church was considering doing missionary work in Cuba. On June 20, 1947, a Mission President wrote Lowry Nelson, a “nationally prominent sociologist” (who was also a member of the Mormon Church) desiring to know whether missionary work could be done in Cuba without bringing people with Negro blood into the church. In this letter he stated:

A short time ago at the request of the First Presidency I visited Cuba in view of doing missionary work on that island. While there I met Mr. Chester W. Young . . . He was very helpful to us and in the course of our conversation I learned that he was very well acquainted with and wished to be remembered to you. . . .

He advised me that you spent some two years in Cuba making a study of rural communities. Your study there would be very helpful to us. I would appreciate your opinion as to the advisability of doing missionary work particularly in the rural sections of Cuba, knowing, of course, your concept of the Negro and his position as to the Priesthood.

Are there groups of pure white blood in the rural sections, particularly in the small communities? If so, are they maintaining segregation from the Negroes? The best information we received was that in the rural communities there was no segregation of the races and it would be difficult to find, with any degree of certainty, groups of pure white people. (Letter dated June 20, 1947, typed copy)

On June 26, 1947, Lowry Nelson replied. In this reply he stated:

The attitude of the Church in regard to the Negro makes me very sad. . . . I do not believe that God is a racist. But if the Church has taken an irrevocable stand, I would dislike to see it enter Cuba or any other island where different races live and establish missionary work. The white and colored people get along much better in the Caribbean and most of Latin-America than they do in the United States. . . . For us to go into a situation like that and preach a doctrine of “white supremacy” would, it seems to me, be a tragic disservice. . . . I am sad to have to write you and say, for what my opinion is worth, that it would be better for the Cubans if we did not enter their island—unless we are willing to revise our racial theory. To teach them the pernicious doctrine of segregation and inequalities among races where it does not exist, or to lend religious sanction to it where it has raised its ugly head would, it seems to me, be tragic. It seems to me we just fought a war over such ideas. (Letter dated June 26, 1947, typed copy)

On October 8, 1947, Lowry Nelson wrote to the First Presidency protesting the church’s doctrine concerning the Negro. On November 12, 1947, the First Presidency—i.e. George A. Smith, J. Reuben Clark and David O. McKay—wrote him a letter in which they stated:

We feel very sure that you understand the doctrines of the Church. They are either true or not true. Our testimony is that they are true. Under these circumstances we, may not, permit ourselves to be too much impressed by the reasonings of men, however well-founded they may seem to be. We should like to say this to you in all kindness, and in all sincerity, that you are too fine a man to permit yourself to be led off from the principles of the Gospel by worldly learning. You have too much of a potentiality for doing good and we therefore prayerfully hope that you can re-orient your thinking and bring it in line with the revealed word of God.

Twenty years later Lowry Nelson wrote a letter which shows that he was not satisfied with the answer given by the First Presidency. In this letter he stated:

... it is twenty years ago this summer that I was first shocked into a realization of the implications of the present policy and began a "dialogue" with the First Presidency. I had spent twelve months beginning in September, 1945, making a study of rural life in Cuba for the Department of State. The following year, 1947, a friend of college days was sent by the Church Authorities to investigate the possibility of establishing mission work there. Upon learning of my having been in Cuba, he wrote me to inquire if I had found many white people there. In retrospect, I realize that I was very naive. But the truth is, that it was my first real confrontation with this question. Inevitably, in growing up in a Mormon Utah village, I had become familiar with such phrases as "white and delightsome," "cursed with a dark skin," the "third who sat on the fence," but they were just "phrases" that went in one ear and out the other. The Negro never came to our village. In my correspondence with the First Presidency, I was truly troubled to find myself in opposition to a fixed dogma. ... mission work among the blacks has been studiously avoided. Witness my Cuban inquiry. ... Since we claim to be a universal church whose message is to go to "every kindred, tongue, and people," how can we justify the exclusion of over 100 million human beings? (Letter by Lowry Nelson, published in Dialogue: A Journal of Mormon Thought, Autumn 1967, pp. 8-9)

Nigerian Mission

On January 11, 1963, the President of the Mormon Church surprised the world by announcing that the church was going to send a mission to Nigeria. Wallace Turner made this statement in the New York Times:

The Mormons are vigorous proselyters, maintaining missions all over the world, except in the Negro nations in Africa. They have a mission among the whites in the Union of South Africa.

Earlier this year a plan was announced to send a mission to Nigeria, but the mission has not left Salt Lake City. (New York Times, Western edition, June 7, 1963)

A few months after the church announced the mission it became apparent that something was wrong. On August 7, 1963, we called the Mormon Church offices and asked if there was still going to be a mission to Nigeria. The woman in the Missionary department stated that conditions were "unsettled." Then she stated: "We have been asked not to give out any information about it."

It has now been more than nine years since the church announced this mission, but the mission has still "not left Salt Lake City." It appears that before the Mormon Church was able to establish their mission, Ambrose Chukwu—a Nigerian student who was attending college in California—wrote an article which was published in the Nigerian Outlook. In this article he warned the Nigerians of the Mormon doctrine concerning the Negro (see our book Mormons and Negroes, p. 29). In another article in the same paper, the Editor of the Nigerian Outlook promised to help keep the Mormon Church out of Nigeria:

Elsewhere on this page we publish an article by a Nigerian in the United States on a new but dangerous religious organisation known as Latter Day Saints. The formation of a religious body in far away America should not have been the concern of any Nigerian but for the fact that this sect, otherwise known as Mormons, believe as a cardinal of their faith that the Negro race is not equal to any other race in the eyes of God, as a result of which Negroes who are foolish enough to choose Mormonism as their religion can never be ordained priests.

Our correspondent has gone into great pains to expose this organisation because he fears it may come to Nigeria thoroughly disguised. . . . These so-called Latter Day Saints must be recognised for what they are—godless Herrenvolkism—and must not be allowed into this country. . . . Since the United States Government preaches the equality of all races, Mr. Kennedy must ban this anti-Negro organisation that preaches heretic doctrines.

We must congratulate our correspondent for having the courage of warning us in good time and we would like to assure him that he has our full support in his campaign against this evil body. (Nigerian Outlook, March 5, 1963, published in Enugu, Nigeria)

Ambrose Chukwu was successful in his attempt to keep the Mormon missionaries out of Nigeria. The Nigerian government has refused to give resident visas to the Mormon missionaries. This has caused the Mormon Church leaders a real problem. The following appeared in Time Magazine:

... 7,000 Ibibio, Ibo and Efik tribesmen in eastern Nigeria, . . . have gone ahead to organize their own branch of the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints. . . . Fascinated by the dramatic life of the Mormon prophet, Anie Dick Obot of Uyo decided to form a branch of the church in Nigeria, . . . Mormon leaders sent back books explaining their laws and doctrines, and in 1959 dispatched to Africa Elder Lamar Williams, who was much impressed by the Nigerian's zeal and orthodoxy. Since then, the Nigerian Saints, governed by Obot and a council of 75 Elders, have established branches in six cities.

Church chiefs are somewhat at a loss on how to deal with their new African converts, especially since the Nigerian government will not give resident visas to any missionaries from the U.S. "This is quite a unique situation," admits Hugh D. Brown, Mormon first counselor. One problem now is that in the absence of supervision from Utah the Nigerian Saints appear to be deviating somewhat from strict adherence to revelation. Some Nigerian Mormons practice polygamy—forbidden in the U.S. church since 1890—and the converts already seem to have established their own black hierarchy, priests and all. "I don't have to wait for revelation to know that I am the natural head in Nigeria," snaps Obot, who is accepted by his elders as their bishop. "Nigerian priests will run their own branch. This is their creation, and they are in their own country." (Time Magazine, June 18, 1965, p. 56)

Dr. Glen W. Davidson made this statement concerning the failure of the Nigerian mission:

Most of the Mormon hierarchy did not regret their inability to send missionaries into "black Africa" nearly as much as they regretted the unfavorable publicity. (The Christian Century, September 29, 1965, p. 1184)

Rooted in Prejudice

An examination of early Mormon history plainly reveals that the doctrine concerning the Negro grew out of prejudice. At the time the Mormon leaders were formulating their doctrine concerning the Negro, slavery was an accepted practice in the southern part of the United States and other parts of the world. In many places Negroes were treated as animals. Some people thought they were "without souls and made only to serve the white man."

The Mormons, of course, would not want us to believe that their leaders were influenced by the prejudice of their time. John J. Stewart stated:

The Prophet's whole life shows beyond doubt that he was not afraid of persecution nor public censure nor ridicule. He openly taught his convictions of truth, no matter how much trouble and hardship it brought upon him. He even gave his life rather than yield to such pressure or to compromise on truth.

To suppose that he would curry the favor of the world by manifesting a prejudice against the Negro is an affront to this courageous man, and to the known facts of history. (Mormonism and the Negro, part 1, p. 15)

In the Utah Chronicle for April 7, 1965, the following statement appeared in a letter to the editor:

... Joseph Smith and other church leaders brought upon themselves the wrath of the non-Mormons in the communities where they lived by denouncing slavery and the suppression of human rights and dignity. This has been a consistent and unwavering stand by church leaders throughout the history of the church.

Actually, the truth of the matter is that the leaders of the Mormon Church did show prejudice against the Negro, and some of them declared that slavery was a divine institution.

It would appear that at first the Mormon Church had no doctrine concerning the Negro. By the year 1833, however, some members of the Mormon Church began to compromise with regard to the Negroes to appease their slave holding neighbors. In the Mormon paper, The Evening and the Morning Star, July 16, 1833, the following appeared:

Having learned with extreme regret, that an article entitled, "Free People of Color," in the last number of the Star, has been misunderstood, we feel in duty bound to state, in this Extra, that our intention was not only to stop free people of color from emigrating to this state, but to prevent them from being admitted as member of the Church. (Reprinted in the History of the Church, vol. 1, pp. 378-379)

John J. Stewart claimed that Joseph Smith invited an abolitionist to speak in Kirtland:

In the early 1830's he wrote and published in the Messenger and Advocate, the Church newspaper at Kirtland, Ohio, an editorial suggesting that leading men in the southern states should take measures to liberate the slaves, so that the Negro could enjoy the blessings of a free nation. He also invited an abolitionist to give a public speech in Kirtland, at a time when abolitionists were generally hated in the North as well as in the South. (Mormonism and the Negro, part 1, p. 16)

Mr. Stewart does not tell which issue of the Messenger and Advocate contains this information, however, there is an article written by Joseph Smith for the Messenger and Advocate (later reprinted in the History of the Church) which shows that he favored the practice of slavery and was very opposed to abolitionists. Joseph Smith stated:

Dear Sir:—This place (Kirtland) having recently been visited by a gentleman who advocated the principles or doctrines of those who are called abolitionists, and his presence having created an interest in that subject, if you deem the following reflections of any service, or think they will have a tendency to correct the opinions of the Southern public, . . . you are at liberty to give them publicity . . . I fear that the sound might go out, that "an Abolitionist" had held forth several times to this community, . . . all, except a very few, attended to their own vocations, and left the gentleman to hold forth his own arguments to nearly naked walls. I am aware that many, who profess to preach the Gospel, complain against their brethren of the same faith, who reside in the South, and are ready to withdraw the hand of fellowship, because they will not renounce the principle of slavery, and raise their voice against every thing of the kind. This must be a tender point, and one which should call forth the candid reflections of all men, and more especially before they advance in an opposition calculated to lay waste the fair states of the South, and let loose upon the world a community of people, who might, peradventure, overrun our country, and violate the most sacred principles of human society, chastity and virtue. . . . I do not believe that the people of the North have any more right to say that the South shall not hold slaves, than the South have to say the North shall.

How any community can ever be excited with the chatter of such persons, boys and others, who are too indolent to obtain their living by honest industry, and are incapable of pursuing any occupation of a professional nature, is unaccountable to me; and when I see persons in the free states, signing documents against slavery, it is no less, in my mind, than an army of influence, and a declaration of hostilities, against the people of the South. What course can sooner divide our union?

After having expressed myself so freely upon this subject, I do not doubt, but those who have been forward in raising their voices against the South, will cry out against me as being uncharitable, unfeeling, unkind, and wholly unacquainted with the Gospel of Christ. . . . the first mention we have of slavery is found in the Holy Bible, . . . And so far from that prediction being averse to the mind of God, it remains as a lasting monument of the decree of Jehovah, to the shame and confusion of all who have cried out against the South, in consequence of their holding the sons of Ham in servitude. . . . I can say, the curse is not yet taken off from the sons of Canaan, neither will be until it is affected by as great a power as caused it to come; and the people who interfere the least with the purposes of God in this matter, will come under the least condemnation before him; and those who are determined to pursue a course, which shows an opposition, and a feverish restlessness against the decrees of the Lord, will learn, when perhaps it is too late for their own good, that God can do his own work, without the aid of those who are not dictated by His counsel. (History of the Church, by Joseph Smith, vol. 2, pp. 436-438)

In the same issue of the Messenger and Advocate (April, 1836) in which Joseph Smith defended slavery, this statement by W. Parrish appeared:

Not long since a gentleman of the Presbyterian faith came to this town (Kirtland) and proposed to lecture upon the abolition question. Knowing that there was a large branch of the church of Latter Day Saints in this place, . . . he no doubt anticipated great success in establishing his doctrine among us. But in this he was mistaken. The doctrine of Christ and the systems of men are at issue and consequently will not harmonize together. . . . we stand aloof from abolition societ[e]s. . . .

And although political demagogues, and religious fanatics, in their blind zeal, may bustle and rage, . . . yet God's curse pronounced by his servant Noah will remain upon them; and Canaan must dwell in the tents of Shem and be his servant until He, who pronounced it shall order it otherwise. And all the abolition societies that now are or ever will be, cannot cause one jot or tittle of the prophecy to fail. . . . We would ther[e]fore be distinctly understood, that we do not countenance the abolition system, nor fellowship those who advocate it principles: . . . (Messenger and Advocate, vol. 2, pp. 295-296)

In the same issue another article appeared that denounced the abolitionists. In this article we find the following:

What benefit can the slave derive from the long harrangues and discussions held in the north? Certainly the people of the north have no legal right to interfere with the property of the south, neither have they a right to say they shall, or shall not, hold slaves. . . .

Where can be the common sense of any wishing to see the slaves of the south set at liberty, . . . Such a thing could not take place without corrupting all civil and wholesome society, of both the north and the south! Let the blacks of the south be free, and our community is overrun with paupers, and a reckless mass of human beings, uncultivated, untaught and unaccustomed to provide for themselves the necessities of life—endangering the chastity of every female who might by chance be found in our streets—our prisons filled with convicts, and the hang-man wearied with executing the functions of his office! This must unavoidably be the case, every rational man must admit, who has ever travelled in the slave states, or we must open our houses unfold our arms, and bid these degraded and degrading sons of Canaan, a hear[t]ly welcome and a free admittance to all we possess! A society of this nature, to us, is so intolerably degrading, that the bare reflection causes our feelings to recoil, and our hearts to revolt . . . the project of emansipation is destructive to our government, and the notion of amalgamation is devilish!—And insensible to feeling must be the heart, and low indeed must be the mind, that would consent for a moment, to see his fair daughter, his sister, or perhaps, his bosom companion, in the embrace of a Negro! . . .

There is a strange mysteriousness over the face of the scripture with regard to servitude. The fourth son of Ham was cursed by Noah, . . . When it will be removed we know not, and where he now remains in bondage, remain he must till the hand of God interposes. As to this nation his fate is inevitably sealed, so long as this form of government exists. (Messenger and Advocate, vol. 2, pp. 299-301)

In 1838 Joseph Smith answered the questions “which were frequently” asked him. Question number thirteen was concerning slavery:

Thirteenth—“Are the Mormons abolitionists?”

No, unless delivering the people from priestcraft, and the priests from the power of Satan, should be considered abolition. But we do not believe in setting the Negroes free. (History of the Church, vol. 3, p. 29)

Toward the end of his life Joseph Smith seemed to change his mind somewhat concerning the Negro and even spoke against slavery. Under the date of January 2, 1843, Joseph Smith was supposed to have recorded the following in his history:

Had I anything to do with the negro, I would confine them by strict law to their own species, and put them on a national equalization. (History of the Church, vol. 5, p. 218)

In a letter dated January 2, 1844, Joseph Smith spoke of the “rebellious Niggers in the slave States, . . .” (Millennial Star, vol. 22, p. 602)

Thus, while Joseph Smith may have mentioned setting the slaves free toward the end of his life, he was basically a racist. Marvin Hill, who teaches History at Brigham Young University, made these interesting comments:

Even Joseph’s “calling for the end of slavery by 1850” in his Presidential campaign is not so liberal as Brodie supposes. . . .

Joseph Smith was, therefore, to some degree a racist, a segregationist, a colonizer, and only incidentally a supporter of abolition. He had some elements of liberalism in his thinking, but these had definite limits. His record, . . . is marked by ambiguity. (Dialogue: A Journal of Mormon Thought, Autumn, 1970, p. 99)

Slavery in Utah

After Joseph Smith’s death the Mormon leaders continued to speak against the Negro. The following appeared in the April 1, 1845, issue of the Mormon publication, Times and Seasons—the Times and Seasons was edited by John Taylor who later became President of the Church:

The descendants of Ham, besides a black skin which has ever been a curse that has followed an apostate of the holy priesthood, as well as a black heart, have been servants to both Shem and Japheth, and the abolitionists are trying to make void the curse of God, but it will require more power than man possesses to counteract the decrees of eternal wisdom. (Times and Seasons, vol. 6, p. 857)

Because the Mormon Church believed the Negroes were an “inferior race” it was easy for them to accept the practice of slavery. Slavery was an accepted practice in the territory of Utah. The following appeared in the Millennial Star in 1851:

We feel it to be our duty to define our position in relation to the subject of Slavery. There are several men in the Valley of the Salt Lake from the Southern States, who have their slaves with them. (Millennial Star, 1851, p. 63)

Stanley P. Hirshon cites the New York Herald for May 4, 1855. In this issue Brigham Young was quoted as saying that the Negro “is dammned”:

Like many defenders of slavery, Young considered Negroes the children of Canaan, who in the Bible had been made a “servant of servants” to his brothers. “The Negro is dammed.” Young preached in 1855, “and is to serve his master till God chooses to remove the curse. . . . These are my views—and, consequently, the views of all the saints—on abolitionism.” (The Lion of the Lord, by Stanley P. Hirshon, New York, 1969, p. 256)

In his Master’s thesis, James Boyd Christensen wrote:

In 1850 Utah was the only western territory which had Negro slaves. It was one of the few places in the United States where Negro and Indian Slavery occurred in the same locale in the same period. It is interesting to draw a parallel between the attitudes of the Mormon colonizers toward the Negro slavery and the Indian slave trade. In short, they countenanced slavery of Negroes among them while they abhorred the slave traffic among the Indians and legislated against it. (“A Social Survey of the Negro Population of Salt Lake City, Utah,” Unpublished Master’s thesis, University of Utah, pp. 11-12)

The slaves were held primarily by converts to the Mormon Church from the South. According to the compromise of 1850, Utah was left open to slavery, and by the compromise of 1859 it was to be a slave state when admitted to the Union. (Ibid., p. 98)

It is logical to assume that the slaves desired their freedom in Utah as much as they did in California, but after 1850, Utah was open to slavery, and they could legally be held as slaves, while California was free territory.

During the period from 1850 until the Emancipation Proclamation of President Lincoln, Negro slave trading was carried on to a small extent in the territory. (Ibid., pp. 8-9)

The following appeared in the Utah State Historical Quarterly:

According to Dr. John Z. Brown, his father obtained Betsy Brown, a 16 year old mulatto girl from St. Louis and brought her to Lehi, Utah, in 1848. At the time of the emancipation she married a colored barber, Fleweller . . .

Monroe Perkins owned another negro slave named Ben, whom he sold in Utah to Sprouse, a southerner . . .

I have been informed by Atty. Benjamin L. Rich of Salt Lake City that his grandfather Charles C. Rich, in whose honor Rich County, Utah, was named, owned three pairs of slaves that were later liberated in California when Rich went there in 1851. . . . A few of the slave-owners went with Amasa M. Lyman to San Bernardino, California, in 1851, to establish an L.D.S. colony; among these were Charles C. Rich, William Mathews, Daniel M. Thomas, William Crosby and William Smith. Their slaves were liberated in California as that State was then free soil. Mr. Lyman, Jr. relates that when William Smith realized that his slaves would become free in California, he tried to take them to Texas, but his slaves desiring freedom, refused to go with him . . . According to the U.S. census of 1850, Utah was the only western state or territory having slaves.

The U.S. census for 1860 gives the number of colored persons in the Territory of Utah as 59, 30 free colored and 29 slaves. Of the slaves, Davis County had 10 and Salt Lake County 19. (“Negro Slaves in Utah,” by Jack Beller, Utah State Historical Quarterly, vol. 2, pp. 124-126)

The Salt Lake Tribune gives definite proof that slave trading was carried on in the Utah territory:

Patrick J. Sullivan, employee of a Salt Lake Abstract firm, while searching the records for real estate information, came across the copy of a bill of sale for a Negro boy named “Dan” in a book containing transactions for the year 1859.

The slave was sold by Thomas S. Williams of “Great Salt Lake City” to William H. Hooper, same address, for $800. . . . (Salt Lake Tribune, May 31, 1939)

On January 8, 1857, John Brown “consecrated and deeded to the Church” property which he listed as worth $3,038.50. Among the items listed we find an “African servant girl” (Autobiography of John Brown, as cited in The Negro Pioneer, Daughters of Utah Pioneers, Lesson For May, 1965, p. 528).

Brigham Young, the second President of the Mormon Church, taught that slavery was a “divine institution” and that the Civil War could not free the slaves. He stated:

Ham will continue to be servant of servants, as the Lord decreed, until the curse is removed. Will the present struggle free the slave? No; but they are now wasting away the black race by thousands. . . .

Treat the slaves kindly and let them live, for Ham must be the servant of servants until the curse is removed. Can you destroy the decrees of the Almighty? You cannot. Yet our Christian brethren think that they are going to overthrow the sentence of the Almighty upon the seed of Ham. They cannot do that, though they may kill them by thousands and tens of thousands. (Millennial Star, vol. 25, p. 787; also published in Journal of Discourses, vol. 10, p. 250)

In other sermons Brigham Young made the following statements:

We knew that the children of Ham were to be the “servant of servants,” and no power under heaven could hinder it, so long as the Lord should permit them to welter under the curse, and those were known to be our religious views concerning them. (Journal of Discourses, vol. 2, p. 172)

The seed of Ham, which is the seed of Cain descending through Ham, will, according to the curse put upon him, serve his brethren, and be a “servant of servants” to his fellow-creatures, until God removes the curse; and no power can hinder it. These are my views upon slavery. (Ibid., vol. 2, p. 184)

. . . the Lord put a mark upon him, which is the flat nose and black skin. Trace mankind down to after the flood, and then another curse is pronounced upon the race—that they should be the “servant of servants;” and they will be, until that curse is removed; and the abolitionists cannot help it, nor in the least alter that decree. (Ibid., vol. 7, p. 290)

If Utah was admitted into the Union as a sovereign State, and we chose to introduce slavery here, it is not their business to meddle with it; and even if we treated our slaves in an oppressive manner, it is none of their business and they ought not to meddle with it. (Ibid., vol. 4, p. 40)

In his book History of Utah, A. L. Neff gives us some very interesting information concerning Brigham Young’s viewpoints on slavery:

The Mormon viewpoint with reference to the peculiar institution of the South was admirably set forth in the famous interview between abolitionist Horace Greeley, editor of the New York Tribune, and President Brigham Young, at Salt Lake City, July 13, 1859:

H.G.—What is the position of your church with respect to slavery?

B.Y.—We consider it of divine institution, and not to be abolished until the curse pronounced on Ham shall have been removed from his descendants.

H.G.—Are any slaves now held in this territory?

B.Y.—There are.

H.G.—Do your territorial laws uphold slavery?

B.Y.—Those laws are printed—you can read for yourself. If slaves are brought here by those who owned them in the states, we do not favor their escape from the service of those owners. (History of Utah, by A. L. Neff, 1940, p. 618)

Horace Greeley was disturbed because the Mormon people did not seem to be opposed to slavery. The Mormon historian B. H. Roberts made this statement concerning Mr. Greeley’s visit to Salt Lake City:

Mr. Greeley was disappointed in the lack of abolition sentiment in Salt Lake City, which he resented by saying at a banquet given in his honor: “I have not heard tonight, and I think I never heard, from the lips of the journals of your people, one word in reprehension of that national crime and scandal, American chattel slavery. * * * This obstinate silence, this seeming indifference on your part, reflects no credit on your faith and morals, and I trust they will not be persisted in.” (Comprehensive History of the Church, vol. 4, p. 533)

John Taylor, who became the third President of the Mormon Church, made this statement concerning Horace Greeley:

. . . I would not talk to him: I felt myself superior to such a mean contemptible cur. I knew he was not after truth, but falsehood.

This Greeley is one of their popular characters in the East, and one that supports the stealing of Niggers and the underground railroad. . . . he is one of the prominent newspaper editors in the Eastern country, and he is a poor, miserable curse. (Journal of Discourses, vol. 5, p. 119)

Catharine V. Waite claims that in a speech delivered March 3, 1863, Brigham Young made these comments about Governor Harding:

Man, did I say?—thing, I mean,—a Nigger worshipper,—a black-hearted abolitionist is what he is, and what he represents; and that I do naturally despise. (The Mormon Prophet, pp. 90-91)

In a sermon delivered August 31, 1856, Brigham Young stated:

Brother Robbins also spoke of what they term the “Nigger drivers and Nigger worshippers” and observed how keen their feelings are upon their favourite topic slavery. (Journal of Discourses, vol. 4, p. 39)

In another sermon Brigham Young said: “The rank, rabid abolitionists, whom I call black-hearted Republicans, have set the whole national fabric on fire” (Journal of Discourses, vol. 10, p. 110).

Stanley P. Hirshon quotes Heber C. Kimball, a member of the First Presidency, as saying:

“The Abolitionists of the North stole the Niggers and caused it all. The Nigger was well off and happy. How do you know this, Brother Heber? Why God bless your soul, I used to live in the South, and I know! Now they have set the Nigger free; and a beautiful thing they have done for him, haven’t they?” (Lion of the Lord, p. 267)

The Territory of Utah gave up the practice of slavery along with the slave-holding states, however, the fact that they countenanced it when it was being practiced shows how insensitive they were to the feelings of the Negro people. Even after the slaves were set free the Mormons continued to talk against the Negro. John Taylor, the third President of the Mormon Church, said that the Negroes are a “representation” of the “devil” upon the earth. In the year 1884 Angus M. Cannon stated that the Negroes could not enter the highest celestial glory of the kingdom of God. The Salt Lake Tribune reported him as saying the following:

I feel it an insult heaped upon Mr. Caine to ask him to go to Washington as our Delegate, because hr [he?] will have to tell Congress that he believes in the highest law known to God and man, but has not had courage to live up to it. . . . I had rather see a colored man, who is my friend here, sent to Washington, because he is not capable of receiving the priesthood, and can never reach the highest celestial glory of the kingdom of God. This colored man could go and stand upon the floor of Congress as the peer of every man there, and would be able to say conscientiously that he had not accepted the doctrine of plurality, because he could not. This man could not, of course, represent the kingdom of God in these valleys of the mountains, but would be a consistent Delegate. (The Salt Lake Tribune, October 5, 1884)

The information which we have presented clearly shows that Joseph Smith, Brigham Young, John Taylor and other Mormon leaders did “curry the favor of the world by manifesting a prejudice against the Negro,” and their doctrine concerning the Negro grew out of the prejudice that they had in their own hearts.

Civil Rights

The Mormon Church has been very slow in allowing the Negroes equal rights. In the First Year Book in the Seventy's Course in Theology, written by the Mormon historian B. H. Roberts, and published in 1931, the idea of integration and social equality for the Negro is condemned. Mr. Roberts stated:

Perhaps the most convincing book in justification of the south in denying to the Negro race social equality with the white race is the one written by William Benjamin Smith, entitled The Color Line, A Brief in Behalf of the Unborn, from which the following is a quotation:

Here, then, is laid bare the news of the whole matter: Is the south justified in this absolute denial of social equality to the Negro, no matter what his (personal) virtues or abilities or accomplishments?

We affirm, then that the south is entirely right in thus keeping open at all times, at all hazards, and at all sacrifices an impassible social chasm between black and white. This she must do in behalf of her blood, her essence, of the stock of her Caucasian race. . . . The moment the bar of absolute separation is thrown down in the south, that moment the bloom of her spirit is blighted forever, . . . That the negro is markedly inferior to the Caucasian is proved both craniologically and by six thousand years of planet-wide experimentation; and that the commingling of inferior with superior must lower the higher is just as certain as that the half-sum of two and six is only four. (The Color Line, pp. 7-12)

(First Year Book in the Seventy's Course in Theology, pages 231-233)

Mark E. Petersen, a present-day Apostle in the Mormon Church, made these statements:

The discussion on civil rights, especially over the last 20 years, has drawn some very sharp lines. It has blinded the thinking of some of our own people, I believe. They have allowed their political affiliations to color their thinking to some extent, and then, of course, they have been persuaded by some of the arguments that have been put forth. . . . We who teach in the Church certainly must have our feet on the ground and not be led astray by the philosophies of men on this subject. . . .

I think I have read enough to give you an idea of what the Negro is after. He is not just seeking the opportunity of sitting down in a cafe where white people eat. He isn't just trying to ride on the same streetcar or the same Pullman car with white people. It isn't that he just desires to go to the same theater as the white people. From this, and other interviews I have read, it appears that the Negro seeks absorption with the white race. He will not be satisfied until he achieves it by intermarriage. That is his objective and we must face it. We must not allow our feeling to carry us away, nor must we feel so sorry for Negroes that we will open our arms and embrace them with everything we have. Remember the little statement that we used to say about sin, “First we pity, then endure, then embrace.”. . .

Now let's talk segregation again for a few moments. Was segregation a wrong principle? When the Lord chose the nations to which the spirits were to come, determining that some would be Japanese and some would be Chinese and some Negroes and some Americans, He engaged in an act of segregation. . . . When he told Enoch not to preach the gospel to the descendants of Cain who were black, the Lord engaged in segregation. When He cursed the descendants of Cain as to the Priesthood, He engaged in segregation. . . .

Who placed the Negroes originally in darkest Africa? Was it some man, or was it God? And when He placed them there, He segregated them. . . . The Lord segregated the people both as to blood and place of residence. At least in the cases of the Lamanites and the Negroes we have the definite word of the Lord Himself that He placed a dark skin upon them as a curse—as a punishment and as a sign to all others. He forbade intermarriage with them under threat of extension of the curse. (2 Nephi 5:21) And He certainly segregated the descendants of Cain when He cursed the Negro as to the Priesthood, and drew an absolute line. You may even say He dropped an Iron curtain there. . . . Now we are generous with the Negro. We are willing that the Negro have the highest kind of education. I would be willing to let every Negro drive a Cadillac if they could afford it. I would be willing that they have all the advantages they can get out of life in the world. But let them enjoy these things among themselves, I think the Lord segregated the Negro and who is man to change that segregation? It reminds me of the scripture on marriage, “what God hath joined together, let not man put asunder.” Only here we have the reverse of the thing—what God hath separated, let not man bring together again. (Race Problems as They Affect the Church, an address by Apostle Mark E. Petersen, delivered at the Convention of Teachers of Religion on the College Level, Brigham Young University, August 27, 1954)

Bruce R. McConkie, of the First Council of the Seventy, stated:

Certainly the caste systems in communist countries and in India, for instance, are man made and are not based on true principles.

However, in a broad sense, caste systems have their root and origin in the gospel itself, and when they operate according to the divine decree, the resultant restrictions and segregation are right and proper and have the approval of the Lord. To illustrate: Cain, Ham, and the whole negro race have been cursed with a black skin, the mark of Cain, so they can be identified as a caste apart, a people with whom the other descendants of Adam should not intermarry. (Mormon Doctrine, 1958, pp. 107-108)

This teaching has deeply affected the attitude of the Mormon people toward the Negro. George A. Meyer made the following criticism of this teaching:

“The saddest part about holding to, and teaching such a doctrine, is not that it keeps Negroes from a position of honor in the Church . . . The tragedy consists in what the doctrine does to the minds of church people who accept it. Psychologists know that it is practically impossible for a person who has been taught in childhood that God put a curse on certain people to be able to accept those people in normal, civilized, unselfconscious association. If, in addition, the curse is related to a black skin, certain prominent facial features, the impossibility is heightened. Add to that, the denial of the right of such people to perform what the child's religion tells him is the most lofty privilege, that of being a priest in his God's service, and the Child's mind is filled with a subtle kind of poison.”

“A person who has been taught such ideas in Sunday School, during his most impressionable years, can scarcely avoid becoming insensitive to the many injustices and discriminations that exist in our society for the people he believes his God has cursed. This insensitivity towards the pain and hurt and indignity inflicted upon fellow human beings, is one of the hardest things to understand about Mormon people, who themselves know that they too, in times past, were a minority that received harsh and discriminatory treatment from fellow citizens. . . .” (A Critique of Mormonism and the Negro, by George A. Meyer, quoted in A Negro on Mormonism, pp. 23-24)

Jim Todd made this observation:

The tragedy of this denial of the LDS priesthood is not that it is unfair to the handful of Negroes actually in the LDS church. The odious part of this doctrine is that it serves to rationalize all other forms of temporal discrimination. Therefore, this denial indirectly affects all Negroes who come in contact with members of the LDS Church. . . .

The indirect cost of this doctrine in human misery and wasted potential can only be guessed at. (The Daily Utah Chronicle, University of Utah, November 22, 1966)

Wallace Turner makes these interesting observations concerning this matter:

The most serious problem facing the LDS church today is the Negro question. . . . Priesthood membership is a requisite for an office in management of the church's temporal affairs. So Negroes are barred from office. As we will understand in the unraveling of the theology, the Mormon discrimination against the Negro is the ultimate that can be had on racial grounds. (The Mormon Establishment, pp. 218-219)

The LDS church practices racial discrimination. It clings to that practice in a nation which is going through terrible struggles to overcome the pernicious influence of other organizations with anti-Negro bias. . . .

So long as the LDS church clings to this racist practice, it is a political and social cancer . . . the overwhelming Mormon response to the current drive by Negroes to better their condition in American life has been indifference, inattention, irritation and smug self-satisfaction that few Negroes live in the Mormon centers. (Ibid., pp. 228-229)

So the ultimate effect of this aspect of LDS doctrine is as racist as anything asserted by the Theodore Bilbos and Robert Sheltons in the bigoted corners of the southern states. . . . the LDS church actually is one of the most influential organs of racial bigotry in the United States. . . . there exists a current of powerful strength that for generations has carried racial bigotry wherever the missionaries carried the Restored Gospel of Joseph Smith.

True, this is all done in a cloak of Christian piety and concern for the brotherhood of man. Seldom is there any surface cruelty. Yet until the federal government outlawed slavery, the Mormons bought and sold Negroes in Salt Lake City. (Ibid., pp. 244-245)

David L. Brewer made this comment: “. . . the Utah situation has become significant for two reasons: (1) Before 1964, the year this study began, Utah was the only ‘Northern’ state without civil rights legislation. (2) The Mormon church, which prevails in Utah, does not accord religious equality to Negroes” (Utah Elites and Utah Racial Norms, University of Utah, 1966, p. 160).

The Pearl of Great Price is sometimes quoted in justification of segregation. The Mormon writer Arthur M. Richardson states:

That the seed of Cain were black and segregated is verified from the writings of Moses, as revealed through the Prophet Joseph Smith.

And Enoch also beheld the residue of the people . . . save it were the seed of Cain, for the seed of Cain were black, and had not place among them.

Segregation of the Blacks from the Whites has a very ancient, honorable and authoritative history behind it. (That Ye May Not Be Deceived, page 9)

D. H. Oliver, who was a Negro attorney in Utah for many years, made this statement:

In medicine, the cause of a disease is first determined and then the proper remedy prescribed for the cure. This same principle is true in the economic life of society.

We all know that racial discrimination does exist in Utah as indicated above and the problem is to determine the cause of such and apply the appropriate remedy. . . .

We all know that the major cause of discrimination against the Negro in Utah springs from a doctrine of the LDS Church which holds that the Negro is cursed and not entitled to the blessings of the Priesthood. (A Negro on Mormonism, by David H. Oliver, p. 14)

By reason of their numerical strength the Mormons elect most of the public officials, throughout the entire state, and here is where conflict begins. In most instances these elected public officials, conscious of the spirit concealed behind the walls of the Temple, adhere strictly to the doctrines of their church in the performance of their public duty and thereby refuse to employ or appoint any Negroes in any position of authority or trust. . . . it is claimed that the failure of the 35th session of the Utah Legislature to pass any Civil Rights legislation was due to hidden and behind the scenes opposition from the Mormon Church. . . . Some of our ardent and staunch supporters insist that the Mormons have as much right to their religious beliefs as any, or all, other church groups, and, therefore, should not be censored for what they honestly believe. . . . every man has a right to believe in, and exercise his muscles by swinging his fists in the open air but his right ceases at the point where the other man's nose begins. . . . Any church has a right to believe what it will but it has no right to impose those beliefs on others against their will, and when those beliefs are detrimental to the welfare of others to the extent of infringing on their right to earn a decent living, such a church has no right to use the machinery of the state to enforce those beliefs. (Ibid., pp. 30-31)

During World War II the . . . University of Utah invited Dr. Ralph Bunce to Salt Lake City for a lecture. Reservations were made for him at the Utah Hotel, a Mormon owned enterprise. Upon his arrival, the Hotel refused to accept him, but after much pressure, from high places, he was allowed to stay in the hotel on condition that he have his meals in his room and not come to the dining room. Marian Anderson had the same experience at the same hotel . . .

Congressman Adam Clayton Powell and his wife, Hazel Scott Powell, had a similar experience at the Temple Square Hotel in Salt Lake City. . . . in recent years, the Utah, Newhouse and Temple Square Hotels and many other places of public accommodations in and around Salt Lake City have changed their policy in this respect, for which they are to be congratulated. (Ibid., p. 23)

Dr. Glen W. Davidson gives this information:

The campaign in California last fall to strike down legislation which would bar discrimination in housing was openly supported from the pulpit by a number of local Mormon bishops and stake (district) presidents. This came as a shock to the liberals of the church. It is an even greater embarrassment for them to learn that until the California mission headquarters was moved to Oakland in 1964, the church went to court on several occasions to block Negroes from moving into the San Francisco neighborhood in which the headquarters was located. (The Christian Century, September 29, 1965, p. 1184)

A Negro by the name of Daily Oliver wrote the following letter which was published in the Utah Chronicle on May 28, 1965:

Dear Editor:

In answer to Mr. Johnson:

I am a Negro who has lived in Salt Lake City for several years too long. Why am I still here? I don't know!!!

The purpose of this letter is to inform you of an experience I had with the LDS Church.

When I was a Boy Scout my troop was located in a local LDS Ward. It was necessary for me to attend meetings in order for me to be a Boy Scout.

Making a long story short, I was in the recreation hall one day when the Bishop called me to the side and told me that I could not come to the recreation hall again. The reason being I was a Negro.

With this experience and many others with the LDS Church, I have formed negative attitudes toward your Church. Subjectively, then, my views of the LDS Church cannot be false.

Daily Oliver

The Mormon Apostle Mark E. Petersen related the following:

Some years ago, back in 1936 to be exact, I became acquainted with a Negro family in Cincinnati, Ohio. . . . I went to Church there and became acquainted with the family of a Negro man named Len Hope. Accidentally he had found some of our tracts when he lived down in Mississippi. He read them and became interested. He wrote to the mission headquarters for a Book of Mormon, and by his own study, converted himself. . . . Then they moved up to Cincinnati to escape the "Jim Crow" law.

Up in Cincinnati, some of the members of the Church became extremely prejudiced against this Negro family. They met in a group, decided what to do and went to the Branch President, and said that either the Hope family must leave or they would all leave. The Branch President ruled that Brother Hope and his family could not come to church meetings. It broke their hearts. But, the missionaries went out to the Hope home and there conducted Sunday School every Sunday, and served them the Sacrament. (Race Problems As They Affect The Church, 1954, p. 6)

On February 9, 1972, Student Life, published at Utah State University, printed the following:

What are black students reaction to living in Logan and attending USU?

"Logan, Utah isn't better or worse than anyplace else. I have complaints about Logan, but then I have complaints about other places . . ." Malcom Wharton stated. . . .

Leonard Milliam says that the majority of whites and blacks on this campus don't like each other. "One of the major contributors is the Mormon religion. I think that every single black on this campus resents this."

Bruce Scott said, "As far as my education and football are concerned, I'm glad I came, but as far as being accepted as a person and as a minority person I'm not . . . It's worse than in the South . . . I'm confronted in more ways than I ever would be in the South . . . Here I'm confronted with the 'Religion.' The 'Religion' is an excuse for resenting blacks. It's so different from what I've been used to, where there isn't a majority that doesn't associate with you."

The Mormon Church has found itself in trouble with the NAACP. Dr. Glen W. Davidson relates the following:

Throughout the spring and summer of 1963 the Salt Lake chapter of the N.A.A.C.P. tried unsuccessfully to meet with the members of the first presidency in regard to civil rights matters. Frustrated in its efforts, the chapter decided to picket Temple Square during the 133rd semiannual L.D.S. General Conference in October of that year unless the first Presidency made known its stand on civil rights. . . . The N.A.A.C.P. chapter, which includes a number of Mormons, knew it would need the support of the L.D.S. Church if legislation were ever to be passed guaranteeing basic civil rights for minority groups in Utah. Utah had become the only western state without such laws. (The Christian Century, September 29, 1965, p. 1185)

On October 5, 1963, the following statement appeared in the Deseret News:

Albert B. Fritz, NAACP branch president, said at a civil rights meeting Friday night that his organization promised not to picket the 133rd Semi-Annual General Conference of the Church on Temple Square.

He added, however, that the NAACP will picket Temple Square, next Saturday if the Church does not present an "acceptable" statement on civil rights before that day. (Deseret News, October 5, 1963)

The Mormon leaders apparently feared the bad publicity that would result from this demonstration, for on October 6, 1963, Hugh B. Brown, a member of the First Presidency, made a statement to the effect that the church supported civil rights. In 1965, however, the Mormon leaders again found themselves in trouble with the NAACP. Dr. Glen W. Davidson made this statement:

Discussion of the race issue was stymied in the Council of Apostles until the spring of 1965. The Utah state legislature had before it several civil rights bills. Rumor fanned speculation that the church was working behind the scenes for defeat of the bills. . . . Again, after great difficulty representatives of the local chapter of the N.A.A.C.P. were allowed to meet with the first presidency. Again, McKay was absent. . . .

As a compromise—and to get the delegation out of their office—the two counselors agreed to place an unsigned editorial in the Deseret News supporting a fair employment and housing bill. Though the editorial was to be unsigned, readers of the church-owned daily would understand it to have the support of the first presidency. But no editorial appeared. Asked why, President Tanner replied, "We have decided to remain silent." . . .

Next day, Sunday, the N.A.A.C.P. organized and led a prayer march which called on Mormon leaders to use their influence in behalf of moral justice. Approximately 300 people participated in the march from the federal office building to the steps of the church administration building. (The Christian Century, September 29, 1965, pp. 1185-1186)

This demonstration did not end the Mormon leaders' troubles with the NAACP. On May 3, 1966, this article appeared in the Deseret News:

The Salt Lake City board and membership of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People issued a sharply worded resolution Monday night attacking The Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints.

The resolution charged that the Church "has maintained a rigid and continuous segregation stand."

The resolution also charged that the Church has made "no effort to counteract the widespread discriminatory practices in education, in housing, in employment, and other areas of life." The statement said the discrimination was due, in part, to the "official race policy of the LDS Church."

The statement ended by warning all branches of the NAACP to "be skeptical concerning any favorable support for civil rights by Church members." . . . (Deseret News, May 3, 1966)

The Genesis Group

The Mormon leaders are not only having trouble with the NAACP, but there is reason to believe that some of the blacks within the church itself are at the point of rebellion. Recently a group has been organized which is known as the "Genesis Group." Michael Marquardt has interviewed a member of the Genesis Group and has obtained some important information concerning this group. In his notes of an interview held November 7, 1971, we find the following concerning the Genesis Group:

Set up for Black missionary work. There are at present about 240 baptized members of the Church in the Salt Lake area who are Black. Of these 40 are active. The Group hopes to reactivate Black members in the Salt Lake Area. Main objective is to get the Priesthood and then do missionary work among the Black both in America and throughout the world. . . .

The Genesis Group meets in the same chapel with the Danish and Norwegian Branches of Liberty Stake. June 24, 1971 was the first time that the First Presidency and Twelve have prayed in the Temple about whether Black members of the Church should hold the Priesthood. The First Presidency and Twelve were not in agreement on the question. But they did agree that the Genesis Group should be formed.

Michael Marquardt's notes of an interview with a member of the Genesis Group, held November 14, 1971, contain the following:

Meeting with the Apostles Monson, Hinckley and Packer took place on June 8, 1971 at 8 a.m. The cards were laid on the table and the Apostles were told that the Blacks in the Church wanted the Priesthood. The group who went fasted and prayed before going and wanted to see the "Prophet" but they were told that the Prophet had appointed the three of them as a committee on the Blacks in the Church.

An article concerning the Genesis Group which appeared in the Salt Lake Tribune has caused some confusion among members of the church. This article was entitled, "Stake Organized for Black LDS in S.L.," and reads as follows:

A stake for black members of the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints has been formed in Salt Lake City. The organization, called Genesis Group, is part of the auxiliary program of the Liberty Stake.

Ruffin Bridgeforth Jr., president of the group, said the stake was in total concordance with the Mormon Church. Gordon B. Hinckley, Thomas S. Monson and Boyd K. Packer, members of the Council of Twelve Apostles, set the stake apart Oct. 19.

Darius Gray will serve as first counselor and Eugene Orr as second counselor of the stake

The Liberty Stake has similar programs for Danish, Norwegian, Chinese and Japanese members. Mr. Bridgeforth said there are 25 members in the newest group. He said there are about 200 Negro members of the church in the Salt Lake Valley. (The Salt Lake Tribune, October 24, 1971, p. 22B)

This article did not appear in all of the copies of the Tribune printed that morning. At any rate, the article caused confusion because it referred to the group as a "stake." Now, if the group were actually a "stake," this would mean that the blacks had received the Priesthood, and that Ruffin Bridgeforth is a stake president—a stake president, of course, has to hold the Priesthood.

That the church did not give the Priesthood to the blacks is very plain from an article which appeared in the Church Section of the Deseret News. This article does not use the word "stake" or even the word "branch" when referring to the Genesis Group:

An organization for black members of the Church, called the Genesis Group, was formed as part of the auxiliary program of Liberty Stake in Salt Lake City. Designed to serve all black members in the Salt Lake Valley, the group will meet and conduct Relief Society, Primary and MIA for the benefit and enjoyment of their members, but will attend their respective Sunday School and sacrament meetings in their home wards, where they will retain their membership.

The group will meet in the Third Ward facility at 119 E. 7th South.

A group presidency was called, sustained and set apart as follows: President Ruffin Bridgeforth, Darius Gray, first counselor, and Eugene Orr, second counselor.

Some of the officers and teachers for the auxiliaries were also called and set apart.

The group will work with the auxiliaries of Liberty Stake. Liberty Stake also has the Danish, Norwegian, Chinese and Japanese branches as part of the stake. (Deseret News, Church Section, October 23, 1971, p. 13)

The reader will notice that the Genesis Group is never referred to in this article as a "stake." It is referred to only as a "part of the auxiliary program of Liberty Stake." While the article speaks of the "Danish, Norwegian, Chinese and Japanese branches," the word branch is not used with regard to the Genesis Group. It is only a "group." It has a "group presidency," not a Stake Presidency nor even a Branch Presidency. This "group presidency" has no Priesthood authority and can only preside over meetings for the women and young people. They must return to their home wards for "their respective Sunday School and sacrament meetings."

The reason that the black people have to return to their own wards for the meetings on Sunday is very clear: these meetings require someone who has the Priesthood. The sacrament is passed twice on Sunday, and black people can neither bless nor pass it. Therefore, they have to return to their "home wards" on Sunday so that the white boys can serve them the sacrament!

At first glance, it would appear that the Genesis Group is moving in the wrong direction—i.e., they seem to be moving toward segregation. As we examine the matter more closely, however, we see that segregation could actually be a victory for the black people. The Mormon Church cannot allow the blacks to become completely segregated because this would mean they would have to give them the Priesthood. Other churches which discriminate against blacks at least allow them to have their own congregations and perform their own ordinances. The Mormon leaders, however, say that the ordinances of the Mormon Church cannot be performed without their Priesthood, and since blacks cannot have the Priesthood they cannot even achieve segregation! If they could perform ordinances for their own people, it would actually be a step toward equality. It is reported that the Genesis Group will soon ask for its own Sunday School. While this appears to be another move in the direction of segregation, it probably should be interpreted as just another step towards the goal of obtaining the Priesthood.

It is reported that the Genesis Group is friendly toward white people and that they are welcomed into the services. From all this we conclude that the Genesis Group really wants Priesthood, and that they are only using segregation as a means of obtaining it.

Athletes Protest

On April 14, 1968, The Arizona Daily Star contained the following statements:

SALT LAKE CITY, Utah (AP)—A Mormon Church leader said Saturday that a boycott by eight Negroes of a Brigham Young University track and field meet "is the action by some extremists who have gotten the wrong idea of what the church position is."

The University of Texas—El Paso athletes stayed away from Saturday's competition at the church-operated BYU at Provo, Utah. They said there was a belief on the campus "that the blacks are inferior and that we are disciples of the devil." . . .

President Hugh B. Brown, a member of the First Presidency of the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints Mormon, said the athletes apparently are unclear on the church's doctrine denying Negroes membership in the Mormon priesthood.

"At the present time we do not give Negroes the priesthood. Priesthood, in our view, is leadership. There is not enough leadership among Negroes to warrant establishing him as a member of leadership," President Brown said. (The Arizona Daily Star, April 14, 1968)

In December 1968, the Brigham Young University was again in trouble with the Negroes. The following is taken from the Salt Lake Tribune:

SAN JOSE, CALIF. (UPI) — San Jose State's black athletes voted Monday to turn in their scholarships because of the revocation of scholarships of seven football players who did not play in Saturday's game against Brigham Young University.

The football players protested what they called the "racist philosophy" of BYU. The Provo, Utah, university is operated by the Mormon Church which the Negroes said is discriminatory in its tenets. (The Salt Lake Tribune, December 3, 1968)

The year 1969 brought even more serious trouble for the BYU football team. Steve Rudman gives this information in an article published in the Salt Lake Tribune:

The sleek jet bounced down the runway on the outskirts of Phoenix, screaming to a halt near a modernistic terminal surrounded by palm and eucalyptus trees.

Someone muttered that a protest march would be held before the football game that night. . . .

That evening 250 Arizona State University students, most of them black, marched militantly under torchlight, wearing black armbands and carrying placards protesting the allegedly racist policies at BYU. . . . BYU players were called "racist" by demonstrators on their way to the dressing room, with Mask leading the verbal assault.

"The thing is," Mask said adamantly as he wiped the sweat from his face, "we know BYU is a racist school and we know the Mormons who run it are racist."

"BYU and the Mormons believe we are second-class citizens," echoed Dave Edhoms, another black demonstrator. "It says so in their scripture."

. . . it was a disheartened BYU team that flew back into Salt Lake City later that night. . . . the incident under Arizona's midnight sun on the evening of Oct. 4 was only the beginning of a full-scale racial upheaval and a bitter autumn of discontent. . . . the BYU team bus rolled toward Laramie on a chilling Friday afternoon, Oct. 17, . . . at that moment in Laramie a crisis of intense magnitude was developing. Fourteen black football players, six of whom were starters, had been dismissed from the team by Coach Lloyd Eaton.

Sympathizing with a Black Students Alliance protest of BYU, the players wished to wear black armbands in their game with the Cougars. Eaton had informed his players any open demonstration would not be tolerated.

Early Friday morning, wearing armbands, the players entered Memorial Fieldhouse to discuss the matter with Eaton. When he saw the blacks he threw them off the team. . . .

Two hours before game time the BSA began its boycott. An original estimate of 50 to 60 students began to protest, but as kickoff time neared the number swelled despite cold weather and a blanket of snow on the ground. . . .

"We know BYU and the Mormons demean a person on the basis of skin color. We can join their church but we can't advance because we are black. Now is that discrimination, or not?" Black asked.

The effect of this second protest was obvious in the Cougars' performance against the depleted Cowboys. Wyoming wiped out BYU, 40-7. (Salt Lake Tribune, November 30, 1969)

On October 29, 1969, this information appeared in the Salt Lake Tribune:

PHOENIX, ARIZ. (AP)—Several Western Athletic Conference athletic directors Tuesday warned of a possible break-up of the conference because of racial policies at Brigham Young University, The Arizona Republic reported.

"There is a distinct possibility that this could break up the WAC," Sports Editor Verne Boatner said he was told by a "prominent" athletic director. . . . A telephone survey of seven on the eight ADs indicated BYU will be on the spot at the meeting, Boatner said. . . .

One AD reportedly said he'd "just as soon see" BYU withdraw from the conference.

Steve Rudman gives this interesting information in his article:

. . . tension festered around the Western Athletic Conference to the point that WAC Commissioner Wiles Hallock was forced to admit: "I think this thing is growing to crisis proportions." . . .

But while the winds of discord swirled through the league, the BYU campus remained unaffected. . . .

"Most students are unconcerned. They look at it as a matter that the church will have to decide. You have to understand we are taught unquestioning obedience," said Jim Briedl, a BYU junior. . . .

Two days before facing BYU, San Jose State, with the backing of Coach Joe McMullen, unanimously voted to wear armbands in the game with the Cougars. . . .

Some irate BYU students decided black armbands were nonsense and voted to wear red armbands because San Jose does not actively recruit Indians. BYU has a large Indian population.

So the Spartans played BYU wearing black armbands, and in the stands BYU students wore red ones.

"I think it's a shame San Jose doesn't have Indians," a BYU sophomore, Joe Detral, said. "I think it's stupid that other schools protest against us because we don't have blacks when those schools don't have Indians like we do." . . .

But BYU's dean of students, J. Elliott Cameron, had a different opinion: "I think these BYU kids are real naive. They don't realize what this means elsewhere." . . .

But the biggest blow occurred the following week when Stanford, a member of the Pacific-8 Conference, severed all relations with BYU. (Salt Lake Tribune, November 30, 1969)

On November 13, 1969, the Salt Lake Tribune announced that Stanford University had decided not to play Brigham Young University in any games after December 1970. In this issue we find the following statements:

STANFORD, CALIF. (UPI)—Stanford University announced Wednesday it will schedule no new athletic or other competitions with Brigham Young University because of alleged racial discrimination by the Mormon Church. . . .

President Kenneth Pitzer said Stanford . . . will not schedule any further meetings, including debates and other non-athletic competition.

"It is the policy of Stanford University not to schedule events with institutions which practice discrimination on a basis of race or national origin, or which are affiliated with or sponsored by institutions which do so," he said.

Top officials of the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints, which sponsors BYU, have told Stanford University officials that the church currently has policies stating that no Negro of African lineage may have the right of priesthood. (Salt Lake Tribune, November 13, 1969)

Obert C. Tanner, professor of philosophy at the University of Utah, called Stanford's action "easily the sharpest criticism of the Mormon religion in this century" (Salt Lake Tribune, January 7, 1970).

Ernest L. Wilkinson, who was President of BYU at that time, was very disturbed with Stanford's action. In a speech delivered in the Devotional Assembly at BYU, Dr. Wilkinson stated:

During the past year or two, Brigham Young University has received national attention because of protests and boycotts involving our athletic teams. . . . we have never refused to play any team regardless of the race, religion, or color of the opposing team members and have never attempted to dictate the racial composition of opposing teams. . . . students from every state in the nation and 56 foreign countries have selected BYU as the university of their choice.

Their color ranges from black to brown to yellow to white. Every race and so-called minority group is represented. . . . True, there are not many black students on our campus. Just how many there are I do not know . . . as far as we know there is not a single negro family residing in the entire county in which BYU is located, and this we are told by Negroes is an important factor in the decision black students make in not coming to BYU.

You should be informed that we have had Negro athletes. . . . we welcome black athletes at BYU provided they satisfy our entrance requirements and are willing to abide by our standards.

We shall continue to try to bring them to BYU, . . . (The Daily Universe, Brigham Young University, December 15, 1969)

While it is true that the BYU has had black athletes, the record for recruiting them in the past has not been too impressive. The Salt Lake Tribune gave this information concerning this subject: "BYU has had no varsity black athletes since the late 1950s when two Negroes were on the track team. No Negroes have ever played on the varsity football or basketball teams, school officials have said. (Salt Lake Tribune, November 26, 1969)

Since the demonstrations in 1969, Brigham Young University has recruited a few black athletes.

At any rate, many people felt that Dr. Wilkinson had misrepresented the situation at BYU. The following appeared in the Salt Lake Tribune on January 7, 1970:

In an open letter to the presidents of Stanford and Brigham Young universities, Obert C. Tanner, professor of philosophy at the University of Utah, criticized both university administrations. . . .

In a comment directed toward the Brigham Young University president, he said, "You should not say there is no discrimination at BYU. There is, and especially so, since it would attempt to identify God with this discrimination."

We have quoted President Wilkinson as saying that BYU welcomed black athletes "provided they satisfy our entrance requirements and are willing to abide by our standards." Tom Hudspeth, who was head football coach at BYU, has made some very revealing statements concerning this matter. He admits that in the past Negro athletes have been discouraged from coming to BYU and that one of the "rules" was that there was to be no "inter-racial dating." The following appeared in the Daily Herald, published at Provo, Utah:

SPRINGVILLE—The protests and demonstrations which are being launched against BYU are just an easy entrance into other problems the Negroes feel they have, Tom Hudspeth, head BYU football coach, told the Springville Chamber of Commerce recently at an early morning breakfast meeting.

"The shame of all this is that these young men are victims of circumstance. The shame of it is that many of these young men are being forced into the situation. The only answer is to stand fast, and we are going to do that. We will not change our policies," he declared.

Negro Here

Coach Hudspeth pointed out that he has a young Negro man on the campus now, and they feel this is the time to bring him into the athletic program. "In the past we felt we should discourage the Negroes because we felt they would not be happy in the social situation here. We have certain rules and regulations which we won't change. They must meet academic standards. We will not allow inter-racial dating. We are only 35 minutes from Salt Lake City where there is a Negro community, and we are setting up appointments and introductions there."

"If this doesn't work out, we won't have to hang our heads; it wasn't meant to be," he declared. . . .

Coach Hudspeth declared that the young Negro man is from a junior college in Oklahoma. He was located through relatives of the Hudspeths who are on the staff there. "We felt we could work out something to relieve a little of the pressure. This is the only way we have changed our policy," he said. . . .

Coach Hudspeth indicated that "a lot of people are mad at me right now because they feel we are giving in." . . . "When we played Arizona State, they had to pay an extra $5800 for control. You can't take this out of a tight athletic budget and survive. We are trying to show the other universities that we want to cooperate with them." . . .

Coach Hudspeth reviewed the football team's experiences, telling how they had to be escorted by the police when they played at San Jose. (The Daily Herald, Provo, Utah, February 16, 1970)

A Serious Situation

In 1970 there were a number of protests against BYU. On January 10, 1970, the Deseret News reported:

TUCSON, ARIZ. (AP)—Two top student body officers at the University of Arizona were charged Friday with inciting to riot in connection with a violent protest during the Arizona-Brigham Young basketball game Thursday night.

Student Body President Mark Ginsbert and Student Vice President Bill White were among nine students charged in connection with a demonstration . . .

In a statement released late Friday, Harvill said charges will be filed against about a dozen persons.

The demonstration was the latest in a series [of] protests against The Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints (Mormon) because the church bars Negroes from its priesthood. (Deseret News, January 10, 1970)

Just five days later the Deseret News carried these statements:

TUCSON, ARIZ. (UPI)—Some 3,000 University of Arizona students participated Wednesday in a two-hour rally, demanding that the school sever relations with fellow Western Athletic Conference member Brigham Young University. (Deseret News, January 15, 1970)

On February 6, 1970, the Salt Lake Tribune reported that at Fort Collins, Colorado, the BYU team was met with the "most violent demonstration" it had ever encountered:

FORT COLLINS, COLO.—The most violent demonstration yet against Brigham Young University by black students protesting the Provo school's allegedly racist policies took place here Thursday night . . .

The protest of BYU by the blacks was expected to be peaceful, but it quickly turned into something much more as black students scuffled with Colorado State University police . . .

The real violence, however, erupted at halftime when approximately 100-150 black students shuffled out of the stands and walked out on the court.

The violence occurred as campus police tried to remove the blacks from the floor.

During the scuffle, a photographer from the Rocky Mountain News in Denver was struck on the head with a metal object and was taken to a Fort Collins hospital. . . .

Fighting erupted in one corner of the court and shortly before the two teams were scheduled to come back on the floor to resume the game, an object described as a Molotov Cocktail, huge and flaming, was tossed on the court. . . .

Fans kept the players on their toes by tossing eggs onto the court at various times during the game. This required official time-outs, during which attendants were out to clean up the mess. (The Salt Lake Tribune, February 6, 1970)

On March 9, 1970, the Deseret News contained an article which stated:

SEATTLE (UPI)—The University of Washington announced late Sunday night athletic relations with Brigham Young University would be dropped when present contracts run out in 1972. . . .

When informed of the action, President Ernest L. Wilkinson of BYU said the University of Washington had apparently broken its promise to take no action without conferring with BYU.

The next day the Deseret News printed an article in which we find the following:

The Black Students Union pressed the administration of the University of Washington for more concessions today, demanding that athletic ties with Brigham Young University be severed immediately. . . .

"If there is good reason to end the contract in 1972 there is good reason to end it now," a Black Student Union spokesman said.

Some 3,000 students, led by the BSU, paraded peacefully on the school's campus in Seattle Monday over the issue of alleged racism at BYU. (Deseret News, March 10, 1970)

Just two days later, March 12, 1970, the Salt Lake Tribune reported:

SEATTLE—Fourteen persons were injured Wednesday as demonstrators swarmed through University of Washington buildings, using hit-and-run tactics that disrupted campus offices and classrooms.

It was the fourth day of demonstrations, supporting a Black Student Union demand that the university immediately sever all relations with Mormon operated Brigham Young University. . . .

Newsmen estimated the size of the crowd at 500-700 persons but a UW spokesman placed it at 200-300.

Nearly 2,000 other students milled around the area where demonstrators had assembled. . . . A university spokesman said some of the injured were being treated for possible fractures.

On May 27, 1970, the Salt Lake Tribune reported:

SEATTLE (AP)—The University of Washington’s human Rights Commission has recommended ending present athletic contracts with Brigham Young University, . . .

The 18-member commission, which includes members of the faculty, staff and students, was formed about two months ago follows a series of demonstrations on the campus in response to a Black Student Union demand that relations with the Mormon-operated Utah school be terminated immediately.

In April of 1970, Harry Edwards warned the Mormon leaders that they must change the anti-Negro doctrine or there would be even more trouble for BYU:

Harry Edwards, the man most responsible for mounting discontent against Brigham Young University athletic teams, vowed in Salt Lake City Friday that “Things will get worse unless Mormon (Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints) doctrine is changed.” . . .

“A change of doctrine which forbids Blacks to hold the priesthood and places them in an inferior human role, is the only action by Mormon authorities which will prevent escalation of activity against BYU,” Edwards challenged. . . .

“If the doctrine were changed—even on the installment plan—I think the problem could be settled before next fall. I started this thing against BYU, and I think I could go on national television and have it stopped.”

Referring to members of the press, Edwards said: “If things don’t get better by next fall, those who travel with BYU should invest in hard hats and asbestos suits.” . . .

“Unless the Mormon dogma is changed, we are dedicated to force athletics to go completely under at BYU. And whatever conference BYU is in will be destroyed.” (Deseret News, April, 4, 1970)

Officials at BYU have done everything they could to prevent demonstrations, and so far they have been rather successful. Nevertheless, many black students still feel that the protests should continue. The following information appeared in the Casper Star-Tribune on January 19, 1972:

LARAMIE—A protest by the Black Students Alliance at the University of Wyoming against alleged “racist” policies of the Mormon church, took a new twist Tuesday with the issuing of four different leaflets attacking the church. . . .

The leaflets attacked the alleged racist policies of the Mormons, claiming that the blacks could not become priests. . . .

Page Three declared the necessity of demonstrating at sporting events with Brigham Young University, the Mormon-run university at Provo, Utah. It asks rhetorically, “Why should an institution of higher learning play host to a known racist opponent at the cost of all students at the University of Wyoming.”

In another article in the same issue we find the following:

“If it wasn’t this (attacks against the LDS Church), they’d be attacking somebody else,” commented W. Reed Green, president of the Casper Stake of the Mormon Church.

Commenting on the favorite charge of the BSA that blacks are prohibited from becoming priests, Green told the Star-Tribune, “We accept it that way, they’re going to have to accept it that way, too

“It may change in time, but the Black Students Alliance pressure isn’t going to change it.”

Church Rejects Violence

In 1970 the tense situation with regard to the Negroes caused a great deal of fear among the people of Salt Lake City. On February 22, 1970, the Salt Lake Tribune reported: “Chief Deputy Andrus said that communications have been intercepted which indicate that at least two militant groups are planning violence in the Salt Lake area. . . .

The following day the Tribune contained an editorial in which these statements appeared:

A movement to organize church groups and even entire parts of the city into “vigilante strike-forces” has been reported in Salt Lake City. Just what or whom this bungalow brigade is planning to “strike” isn’t clear, one of the main reasons the idea of such a people’s posse is so dangerous. . . . No matter what kind of patriotic sounding name is tacked on a group of citizen enforcers, it is still a common mob that flows as passion directs without reason and without jurisdiction.

Persons attempting to expand the vigilante-type movement in the Salt Lake area apparently are using scare tactics in an effort to create a threat that is long on fear but short on fact. (Salt Lake Tribune, February 23, 1970)

On March 3, 1970, the Salt Lake Tribune reported the following:

FARMINGTON—Use of scare tactics, emotionalism and doctrine of The Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints [sic] as a means of forming neighborhoods into “vigilante strike-forces” was labeled dangerous and inadvisable by Davis County officials Monday.

The action followed a briefing by Salt Lake County Civil Defense officials on the activities of a group known as Neighborhood Emergency Teams (NET).

Davis County Sheriff Kenneth Hammon denounced formation of any neighborhood security forces, saying “no vigilante groups of any type are needed in Davis County to assist law enforcement officers”. . . .

NET groups, apparently forming statewide within the last few weeks, have been claiming association with Civil Defense and law enforcement agencies and the LDS Church, said Walter J. Michelsen, Salt Lake County Civil Defense director.

Alvin Britton, Salt Lake County Civil Defense information officer, said 90 percent of the NET programs are well intentioned, but the advocating of turning neighborhoods into armed fortresses with security forces is inadvisable. . . .

Mr. Britton said NET leaders have claimed local government is no longer reliable for protection and for citizens to protect themselves by whatever means necessary.

“Though weapons are never advocated,” Mr. Britton said, “The group ends with that as an end product.” (Salt Lake Tribune, March 3, 1970)

The same day the Tribune published this information concerning the Neighborhood Emergency Teams, the Mormon leaders decided to issue a statement concerning this matter. Fortunately, the church leaders chose to dissociate themselves from this organization. The Deseret News reported:

The First Presidency of The Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints today stated that the Church has no connection with the Neighborhood Emergency Teams (NET), nor does it approve of its members being active in such vigilante groups. . . .

Salt Lake County Civil Defense officials said at a briefing in Farmington Monday night that the NET group was using scare tactics, emotionalism and references to the Church as a means of organizing neighborhoods into vigilante strike forces. . . . (Deseret News, March 3, 1970)

The Mormon leaders are certainly to be commended for not endorsing any of the vigilante groups which were founded at this time. Had they done so, it probably would have led to serious problems with the black people.

For more information on the demonstrations and vigilante groups see our book, Mormons and Negroes.

Appeasement

Instead of resorting to violence, the Mormon leaders seem to be choosing a course of appeasement. For instance, the following appeared in the Denver Post on November 15, 1969:

The Rev. Roy Flournoy . . . called for reform of the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints (Mormon) in what he alleged is a practice of racism against blacks. . . .

The Church of the Black Cross, . . . is calling for:

—Boycott of Mormon goods, such as record albums of the Mormon Tabernacle Choir.

—Discouraging tourist travel to Utah, home state of the church.

—Taxpayer petitions to the government asking that the Mormon church's tax-exempt status be abolished. . . .

Flournoy added that he believes the average member of the Mormon Church would willingly remove such doctrines from his religion and would welcome outside pressure to do so. . . .

"I believe racism has been forced upon Mormons by its leaders, and isn't the philosophy of the people," Flournoy said. (Denver Post, November 15, 1969)

The reader will notice that the Church of the Black Cross called for a boycott "of Mormon goods, such as record albums of the Mormon Tabernacle Choir." Shortly after this article appeared the Mormons decided to bring some Negroes into their choir. Wallace Turner states:

Recently the Mormon Tabernacle Choir took in two Negro women as second sopranos, and reportedly, is about to welcome a Negro tenor. (The New York Times, January 25, 1970)

Almost a month after Wallace Turner published his article in the New York Times, the Salt Lake Tribune reported:

Black faces are among the sea of white ones in the 375-voice Mormon Tabernacle Choir.

The two new members of the 122-year-old choir are Negroes Wynetta Martin and Marilyn Yuille. . . . Mrs. Martin . . . and her two daughters, came to Salt Lake City in 1967 "because my stake president in San Diego said that I had a mission to do here, in his words 'to teach love among all people.' I sold everything I had and flew to Salt Lake," she said.

She first applied for membership in the choir after she arrived but her dream wasn't realized until last month. . . .

Miss Yuille just happened into the Tabernacle Choir. . . . she came to Utah last summer and the group's conductor, Dr. Jay E. Welch, also assistant Tabernacle Choir director, encouraged her to audition . . .

"I thought he was kidding but when he cornered me at a fireside and I discovered he was serious, I decided to audition," she explained. She auditioned for choir director Richard P. Condie on Dec. 2 and sang at her first performance Dec. 4. (Salt Lake Tribune, February 21, 1970)

It is interesting to note that Mrs. Martin waited two or three years to get into the choir, whereas Miss Yuille was singing in the choir only two days after her audition. This whole matter looks especially strange when we consider the fact that Miss Yuille was put in the choir less than three weeks after the Denver Post announced that the Church of the Black Cross was calling for a boycott of "Mormon goods, such as record albums of the Mormon Tabernacle Choir."

On June 13, 1970, the Deseret News reported the following:

The bonds of brotherhood between members of the Church and a Negro congregation in Salt Lake City were fastened this week with a plea "to let all America see that blacks and whites can live peacefully together."

Some 500 persons representing the leadership of the Church, including President Joseph Fielding Smith, and of the Church of God in Christ participated in a banquet Wednesday night, climaxing the month-long "Operation Good Samaritan."

The project started when Rev. M.A. Givens Jr., minister of Deliverance Temple, Church of God in Christ, asked officials of the LDS Church to assist his congregation in raising funds to complete construction of their church building in Salt Lake City.

The Presiding Bishopric accepted the opportunity as a challenge to the Mormon youth to raise at least $30,000 for the building. Youths in 566 wards of the 71 stakes in the Salt Lake and Bountiful areas accepted the challenge and went to work on a variety of fund-raising projects.

Presiding Bishop John H. Vandenberg told the banquet-goers that with 14 more stakes to report, the youths have already raised $32,949. He said that 28,000 young men and women participated in the project. . . .

Music for the banquet was provided by Mrs. Jessie Evans Smith, wife of President Smith, who sang two solo numbers, and the all-Negro Utah Community Choir, which also preformed two selections. (Deseret News, Church Section, June 13, 1970)

Although we feel that this was a good move and that many members of the Mormon Church participated in this project in a sincere effort to help the Negroes, the deed would have been more impressive if it had been performed ten or twenty years ago. Even some members of the church felt that their leaders were trying to buy off the Negro people. In a letter to the editor of the Salt Lake Tribune, Bill Morrison stated:

Editor, Tribune: I noticed with incredulity an article in The Salt Lake Tribune (June 10) entitled "Negro Faith, LDS Join In 'Deliverance' Fund." The substance of the article was that the LDS Church was aiding in the construction of the Deliverance Temple, a building owned by the Church of God in Christ, a Negro denomination.

Since I am LDS and take my religion seriously, I question the wisdom of my church leaders giving material or other aid for the purpose of building up another church. A fundamental concept of any religion is that the reason for its existence is that it, and it alone, harbors the truth necessary for salvation. The Mormon Church adheres to this, but is engaging in support of the growth of another religion. . . . the LDS Church should focus on consolidating its position rather than being concerned with building up the congregations of other churches. The money raised for building Deliverance Temple could have gone to a non-sectarian use such as aid for the mentally retarded or those physically unable to help themselves.

The question appears to be one of aiding the Negro rather than one of aiding a different religion. Would the Mormon Church give $32,000 for construction of a Catholic cathedral? A Jewish synagogue? Probably not.

Why the Negro? The Mormon Church has discriminated against the Negro since its inception. Let's drop all the rhetoric excusing this and admit it. The aid therefore appears to be a case of LDS Church leaders, in their weakness, attempting to placate the Negro.

If the purpose of this aid isn't tacit support of another religion but rather an expression of guilt or an attempt at placation, does this mean that the general authorities believe God has erred in not allowing the Negro to hold the priesthood in the LDS Church? (Salt Lake Tribune, June 23, 1970)

On December 5, 1970, the Deseret News, Church Section, printed an article which contained the following:

Members of the Fresno Stake continue to lead out in programs to strengthen relationships between themselves and Negro congregations of churches in the Merced area.

Last year, members of two of the Merced wards spent many hours working with Negro members of the New Hope Greater Baptist Church in remodeling a Baptist chapel which had been 17 years in building.

This month, the stake members joined with the Mt. Pisgah A.M.E. Zion Church (Methodist) in a benefit concert for the members of the Mt. Pisgah Church congregation. . . .

All proceeds from the concert went to the Mt. Pisgah Church. (Deseret News, Church Section, December 5, 1970, p. 15)

Regardless of the motives of the Mormon leaders in performing this deed, we feel that it is a step in the right direction.

It would appear, then, that the Mormon leaders have recently made a number of concessions to avoid trouble with the black people. While these actions are to be commended, they have still not come to grips with the real problem. Until the church allows the Negro to hold the Priesthood the situation remains very explosive.

Dissatisfaction

That many members of the Mormon Church are dissatisfied over the doctrine is very evident. The Mormon writer John J. Stewart stated:

Yet, because of the popular beliefs and traditions of the world, there are at least two points of doctrine and history of this Church about which many LDS themselves—to say nothing of many non-members—feel ill at ease or critical. One of these is its doctrine regarding the Negro. (Mormonism and the Negro, part 1, p. 7)

On March 8, 1960, Sterling McMurrin gave a speech at the Trinity A.M.E. Church in Salt Lake City. In this speech he stated:

I am a member of the Mormon Church, and though I am not especially orthodox in the Mormon religion, I feel very close to my church and have a great love for my people. I feel very keenly the situation in which the Mormon people find themselves, entertaining a religious doctrine of racial discrimination, which certainly is unworthy of a Church and unworthy of a religion and, I believe myself, unworthy of what is in many respects the praiseworthy and great tradition of the Mormon Church. I frankly deplore the entertainment of such a doctrine and the attitudes that may accompany it in my Church. I have a very sincere hope that in some way or another this belief will eventually be dissolved in the teachings of the Mormon Church and the beliefs of the Mormon Church, and whatever practical attitudes that are conducive to what I would regard as immoral in our social life may result from this doctrine be thereby overcome.

... One of the difficulties, I think, is that the Mormon Church has always been involved in the notion of revelation, and it is one thing to have an interpretation of the Bible changed after 50 years or so if you decide some other interpretation is more satisfactory and thus change the picture and belief, but it is another thing to be a Mormon and some way or other get it established that this is a divine revelation. We don't change revelation in the same manner than (that?) you change Bible interpretation. I say this in spite of the fact that I really believe, if I don't die in the very near future, I will live to see the time when this doctrine is dissolved. I don't mean repudiated. The Mormon Church is like the Catholic Church, it doesn't repudiate doctrines that at one time or another were held to be revelation or absolute truth. They didn't repudiate the doctrine of polygamy. I use the word dissolve, and I imagine by some technique they will dissolve the doctrine on the Negro, rather than repudiate it. . . . I have discussed this with some of the leading officials of the Mormon Church and I find very often there is far more of a liberal attitude in the matter than many people would suspect, and one of the leading officials of the Church told me not very long ago (and by a leading official I mean a general authority, not a bishop or a stake president)—he told me not very long ago that he did not believe that the Negroes were under any kind of curse and as far as he was concerned this was not a doctrine of the Church, and never was, but certainly a number of people believe that it is and was. This is not a kind of solid front being set up by an institution against the Negroes, but it is a situation which is shot through with all kinds of ambiguities with regard to the problem and an institution in which there are many people of very liberal attitudes who simply do not believe the doctrine and who are embarrassed by it. To them it is a problem to be got rid of. I am not speaking for the heretics and the liberals, nor the occasional liberal Mormons who may affiliate with the N.A.A.C.P., but that is the attitude of a very great number of orthodox Mormons who have a moral feeling that dictates that this kind of theological nonsense should not be palmed off on the people. It is not only nonsense, but bad nonsense; it is immoral. ("The Mormon Doctrine and the Negro," a speech by Sterling McMurrin, March 8, 1960)

The November 1, 1963, issue of Time Magazine contained a letter by Donald Ira French, Jr. In this letter Mr. French stated:

Sir: As an elder in the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints, it has long seemed incredible to me that a church with so much forward vision in social welfare and higher education can be so backward in its outlook on a segment of the human race that is also supposed to be among our brothers. . . .

The revelation that the church is talking about with respect to the Negro and the priesthood should have been sought 50 years ago—not now when we are forced into looking for one. Even if a revelation should come now, we have compromised our position because it looks as if we have been forced into seeking it, which will be true.

On December 30, 1963, a newspaper reported that the President of the Mormon branch in Eccles, England, had resigned his position because of the Mormon Church's policy of discrimination against the Negroes:

EXETER, England, Dec. 30 (UPI)—A 25-year-old elder of the Mormon church said today he resigned because of a "color bar" operating within the church.

Richard Riley said he quit as president of the Mormon branch at Eccles, England, and no longer attended meetings. . . .

Riley said Pacific islanders with dark skins can "enjoy full privileges of the church because they have no Negro blood," but Africans are barred from these privileges.

"How they can make an exception in one case but not in the other stuns me," he said. "Quite simply it is a color bar."

Wallace Turner observed:

A ferment is working in the Mormon community over the Negro question, particularly among the intellectual element. The mistreatment of Negroes by the LDS church is the reason given by many intellectuals who candidly admit that they have become silent, concealed apostates.

Even among many who cling tenaciously to their belief, there is a swelling opinion that the church is dead wrong on this issue. . . .

J. D. Williams, . . . can swiftly announce his faithful adherence to the LDS church and just as swiftly reverse his position on the Negro matter. (The Mormon Establishment, p. 246)

Paul Hughes, publisher's consultant of Reveille Magazine, wrote an article in which he stated:

George Romney has precipitated a crisis in the Mormon Church that may well rank with the plague of the locusts, and this time there are no providential gulls in sight. . . . Romney can point to a commendable civil rights record. . . . As one of the Latter-day Saints, Romney is compelled at the same time to point to a church which officially sanctifies race prejudice and which declares today, as it has for over a century, that people with black skins are inferior creatures because that's just the way the Lord wants them.

This may eventually fragment Romney into warring halves. More important, it could thrust the Mormons, who have always referred proudly to themselves as a "peculiar people," completely outside the pale of American life. There is, however, a third threat which is not nearly as well known: Interior tensions, accelerating now for many years, may shatter the Church beyond all redemption. . . . the Mormons themselves do not know exactly how they painted themselves into this suffocating corner. They quote vague traditions. They refer to conflicting scriptural justifications. They consult their highest officers, and the truth is that they don't really know, either. (The Oregonian, Portland, Oregon, April 2, 1967)

In 1967, Interior Secretary Stewart Udall wrote a letter which was published in Dialogue: A Journal of Mormon Thought. The following statements appeared in this letter:

It was inevitable that national attention would be focused on what critics have called the “anti-Negro doctrine” of the L.D.S. Church. As the Church becomes increasingly an object of national interest, this attention certain to intensify, for the divine curse concept which is so commonly held among our people runs counter to the great stream of modern religious and social thought.

We Mormons cannot escape persistent, painful inquiries into the sources and grounds of this belief. Nor can we exculpate ourselves and our Church from justified condemnation by the rationalization that we support the Constitution, believe that all men are brothers, and favor equal rights for all citizens.

This issue must be resolved . . . It must be resolved because we are wrong and it is past the time when we should have seen the right. A failure to act here is sure to demean our faith, damage the minds and morals of our youth, and undermine the integrity of our Christian ethic. . . .

My fear is that the very character of Mormonism is being distorted and crippled by adherence to a belief and practice that denies the oneness of mankind. We violate the rights and dignity of our Negro brothers, and for this we bear a measure of guilt; but surely we harm ourselves even more.

What a sad irony it is that a once outcast people, tempered for nearly a century in the fires of persecution, are one of the last to remove a burden from the most persecuted people ever to live on this continent. (Dialogue: A Journal of Mormon Thought, Summer 1967, pp. 5-6)

A number of Mormons responded to Stewart Udall’s letter. Some were in agreement with him. For instance, Lowry Nelson stated: “Let nobody doubt that Stewart Udall has spoken for thousands upon thousands of his concerned and thoughtful fellow churchmen” (Ibid., Autumn 1967, p. 8).

On the other hand, a number were opposed to Udall’s statements. Paul C. Richards made these comments:

Mr. Udall must think the Church is made up of extremely gullible people. Otherwise he never would have set himself up as he did to try to influence the members.

The Church is either true or it isn’t. If it changes its stand on the strength of the “great stream of modern religious and social thought,” it will be proven untrue. If that happens, the more serious members would do well to join the Cub Scouts. It’s cheaper and there is less work and less criticism. . . .

If the Church is true, it will hold to its beliefs in spite of its members. If it is false, more power to the easy-way-out philosophers who claim to know the “imperious truths of the contemporary world.” (Ibid., p. 6)

On June 22, 1968, the Ogden Standard-Examiner printed an article in which the following appears:

SALT LAKE CITY (AP)—The Mormon Church will lose tens of thousands of members because it refuses to modify its “anti-Negro policies and practices,” a former U.S. Commissioner of Education predicted Friday evening. . . .

A Mormon himself, McMurrin spoke at a banquet of the Salt Lake City chapter of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People.

“In the future, if I read correctly the signs of the times, the Church will completely lose tens of thousands of its members who will refuse to identify with an institution which fails to come to grips with one of the foremost moral problems of our times,” the educator said. . . .

He expressed difficulty understanding “how people who are otherwise typically intelligent and moral can believe and defend such crude immoral nonsense.” . . .

He expressed belief the time would come when “the Mormon people for the most part will have to abandon their crude superstitions about Negroes because their children forced them to.”

But he said there will be those who will remember “with sadness and moral embarrassment the day when their Church could have done great things to hasten the achievement, but failed.” (Ogden Standard-Examiner, June 22, 1968)

In a letter published in Dialogue, Allen Sims made these comments:

This last General Conference stands as damning proof of the proposition that the Mormon Church stands impotent to face the great moral issues of our times . . .

I for one refuse to allow myself to be put at the mercy of events and history. I cannot wait for my Church to recognize the issues—it is too late for that. . . .

An undercurrent of racism finds welcome acceptance in this Church. A member unable to cure his tobacco habit will find himself subject to a number of formal and informal sanctions. But a member unable to kick the hate habit finds no sanctions or help. But he quickly finds that he now can hate and feel righteous about it through a number of thinly disguised myths, fairy tales, and rationalizations available for misuse in the Church. It is this adherence to this kind of priority scale and myth that insures the irrelevance and impotency of any action the Church takes. . . . If it is the case that the Church is to remain the captive of the disease that grows within it, then I must discard it as I would a garment that has long ceased to serve its purpose and usefulness. . . . (Dialogue: A Journal of Mormon Thought, Autumn 1968, pp. 6-8)

A Burning Issue

The Los Angeles Times for August 27, 1967, carried an article in which the following appeared:

The deeply rooted Mormon attitude apparently discriminating against Negroes because of their race is becoming a burning issue in that church—and beyond the church. . . .

The increasing heat of racial pressures in the country has brought it into focus as one of the few uncracked fortresses of discrimination.

Wallace Turner stated: “The bigots and race baiters who make up much of the radical right want to make common cause with the LDS church in regard to the Negro” (The Mormon Establishment, p. 324).

The Mormon Apostle Ezra Taft Benson has openly opposed the civil rights movement. The Deseret News reported him as saying:

LOGAN, UTAH—Former agriculture secretary Ezra Taft Benson charged Friday night that the civil rights movement in the South had been “fomented almost entirely by the Communists.”

Elder Benson, a member of the Council of the Twelve of the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints, said in a speech at a public meeting here that the whole civil rights movement was “phony.” . . .

“The whole slogan of ‘civil rights’ as used to make trouble in the South today, is an exact parallel to the slogan of agrarian reform which they used in China,” he added. . . .

“The pending ‘civil rights’ legislation is, I am convinced, about 10 per cent civil rights and 90 per cent a further extension of socialistic federal controls,” Elder Benson said, “It is part of the pattern for the Communist take-over of America.” (Deseret News, December 14, 1963)

At the 135th annual conference of the Mormon Church, April 1965, Ezra Taft Benson made the following statement:

“What are we doing to fight it? Before I left for Europe I warned how the communists were using the civil rights movement to promote revolution and eventual takeover of this country. When are we going to wake up? What do you know about the dangerous civil rights agitation in Mississippi! do you fear the destruction of all vestiges of state government?”

“Now brethren, the Lord never promised there would not be traitors in the Church.”

We have the ignorant, the sleepy and the deceived who provide temptations and avenues of apostasy for the unwary and the unfaithful. but we have a prophet at our head and he has spoken. Now what are we going to do about it?

Do Homework

“Brethren, if we had done our homework and were faithful we could step forward at this time and help save this country.” (Salt Lake Tribune, April 7, 1965, p. A-5)

This speech evidently caused the Mormon leaders a great deal of trouble. A member of the Mormon Church wrote a letter to the editor of the Utah Chronicle stating that Ezra Taft Benson had told a “lie” and that he was “no longer worthy of his high office, . . . and should be removed” (The Daily Utah Chronicle, April 12, 1965). When the Apostle Benson’s speech was reprinted in the Improvement Era (the Official organ of the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints), 112 words were deleted without any indication. It reads as follows:

What are you doing to fight it?

Brethren, if we had done our homework and were faithful, we could step forward at this time and help save this country. (The Improvement Era, June 1965, p. 539)

The leaders of the Mormon Church are beginning to realize they are faced with a serious dilemma. Even though the church is winning friends among the segregationists, this is no real consolation since segregation is losing ground throughout the nation. Jan Shippis stated:

Understandably, with the pressure on the South for integration, an increasing number of Southerners have turned to the Mormon Church with its belief in the inferiority of the Negro race in order to try to shore up and preserve lifelong emotional beliefs. (The Colorado Quarterly, Autumn 1962, p. 189)

Dr. Glen W. Davidson stated:

A second reason President Brown feels that the Church of the Latter-day Saints needs to change its practice is to offset the influx of die-hard segregationists into the church in this country. From interviews with recent converts in the south, and to a degree in the rest of the nation as well, I have found his fears well founded. A number of former Presbyterians, Methodists and Baptists confess to becoming Mormons because, as one woman put it, “I’m fed up with being told by some preacher that these nigras are equal to me.” A number of missionaries working in the south this summer claim that there has never been more interest in Mormonism and that “our race doctrine is of the greatest interest.” Conversion statistics from the area confirm this claim. (The Christian Century, September 29, 1965, p. 1184)

A New Revelation?

If the Mormon Church should decide to give the priesthood to the Negro they will be making a doctrinal change which could cause dissension within the church (especially among the segregationists who have been drawn to the church because of its doctrine of discrimination against the Negro). To make a doctrinal change of this magnitude would be to place all of the other doctrines of Mormonism in question.

On October 28, 1865, the Mormon Church paper Millennial Star printed an article which stated that “Mormonism is that kind of religion the entire divinity of which is invalidated, and its truth utterly rejected, the moment that any one of its leading principles is acknowledged to be false, . . .”

The Mormon writer John J. Stewart stated:

If we as members of the Church are going to pick and choose among the Prophet’s teachings, and say “this one is of God, we can accept it, but this one is of man, we will reject that,” then we are undermining the whole structure of our faith, . . . (Mormonism and the Negro, p. 19)

Regardless of the consequences, it would appear that at least some of the Mormon Church leaders have felt that a change must be made. In the Western Edition of the New York Times for June 7, 1963, Wallace Turner stated that the Mormon Church leaders were seriously considering the consequences of making a change:

SALT LAKE CITY, June 3—The top leadership of the Mormon church is seriously considering the abandonment of its historic policy of discrimination against Negroes. . . .

One of the highest officers of the church said today that the possibility of removing this religious disability against Negroes has been under serious consideration.

“We are in the midst of a survey looking toward the possibility of admitting Negroes,” said Hugh B. Brown, one of the two counselors serving President David O. McKay in the First Presidency of the Mormon church.

“Believing as we do in divine revelation through the President of the church, we all await his decision,” Mr. Brown said.

Mr. Brown, a 79-year-old former attorney, said he believed that if the change were made, it would be a doctrinal revision for Mormonism of a magnitude matching the abandonment of polygamy in 1890.

“The whole problem of the Negro is being considered by the leaders of the church in the light of racial relationships everywhere,” Mr. Brown said. “We don’t want to go too fast in this matter. We want to be fair.” (Western Edition of the New York Times, June 7, 1963)

In a telephone conversation, June 7, 1963, Mr. Brown stated that he was misquoted in the part concerning the change in policy, however, he expressed approval of the article by saying it was “on the whole very fair.” In our book Mormons and Negroes, pages 58-59, we present evidence to show that Hugh B. Brown was not misquoted.

On October 27, 1963, the following appeared in the Arizona Star:

At least one Negro leader, Charles Nabors, feels Utah “has potentially the worst race problem in the United States.” . . .

“If a state of one million people can’t include 5,000 Negroes in its social, economic and political structure in a Christian, democratic, civilized way,” he says, “the state is in a completely deplorable condition.” . . . Many Mormons believe the Negro is a descendant of Cain and therefore carries the curse of God put on Cain for slaying his brother Abel.

There are some references to this in Mormon literature.

However, Hugh B. Brown, 79-year-old counselor to Church President David O. McKay and one of the three top officials of the church, said he knows of no firm church doctrine that prevents the Negro from having right of the priesthood.

“He simply is not in sufficient numbers in the church and is not advanced to the position where he could assume leadership,” Brown said.

Just when the Negro will be ready, he said, “we have no way of knowing on earth. Any change has to come as the result of revelation from God. And revelation doesn’t come on request.” (Arizona Daily Star, October 27, 1963)

Wallace Turner gives the following information:

Every scrap of information I’ve gathered about Mormons and Negroes points to Hugh Brown as the liberal voice at the top of the church. I suspect that when he told me those things in that interview in 1963, he hoped the change was to come.

However, the odds are all against its coming anytime soon in the terms he described—a revelation by the president of the church. David O. McKay is the most liberal LDS president in sight for a long time to come. Yet, he made it plain in 1964 that he felt it unlikely that any revelation would come . . . the question was asked directly, in the proper words to discover whether the prophet, seer, and chief revelator thought doctrine on Negroes would be changed to allow them to hold the priesthood. He said: “Not while you and I are here.” (The Mormon Establishment, pp. 261-262)

Actually, there is good reason to believe that David O. McKay did not really believe that Negroes were cursed by God, although this was not publicly known until just before his death. On August 26, 1968, Sterling McMurrin wrote a letter to Llewelyn R. McKay, David O. McKay's son, in which he stated:

I am writing this letter, with copies to your brothers Lawrence, Edward, and Robert, to tell you of a conversation with your father in the Spring of 1954. He had requested the meeting, which was in the Auerbach building of the University. . . .

I recall telling you of this conversation not long after it took place, but I'm interested now in detailing a small part of it in writing, as I believe it is of such importance that it should be part of your family record. . . .

Our discussion centered on the question of orthodoxy and heresy and the general problem of dissent in the Church. The views which President McKay expressed to me on these matters were remarkably liberal and deserve to be known by the general membership of the Church.

At one point in the conversation I introduced the subject of the common belief among the Church membership that Negroes are under a divine curse. I told him that I regarded this doctrine as both false and morally abhorrent and that some weeks earlier, in a class in my own Ward, I had made it clear that I did not accept the doctrine and that I wanted to be known as a dissenter to the class instructor's statements about "our beliefs" in this matter.

President McKay replied that he was "glad" that I had taken this stand, as he also did not believe this teaching. He stated his position in the matter very forcefully and clearly and said with considerable feeling that "there is not now, and there never has been, a doctrine in this Church that the Negroes are under a divine curse." He insisted that there is no doctrine of any kind pertaining to the Negro. "We believe," he said, "that we have scriptural precedent for withholding the priesthood from the Negro. It is a practice, not a doctrine, and the practice will some day be changed. And that's all there is to it." He made it clear what scripture he had in mind by mentioning the well known passage in the Pearl of Great Price, Abraham 1:26-27. He made no reference to the Bible or the Cain and Able Story.

I told President McKay that I thought his statement on the Negro issue was of major importance and that it should be made public both in print and in a Conference statement in order to clear up the confusion of thousands of people in the Church believing in the "divine curse" teaching. To this he gave no reply except to reiterate his position, saying, "There is no such doctrine and as far as I am concerned there never was."

I am able to report your father's words with near accuracy because they were strongly impressed upon my memory and because within a few hours after our meeting I made a detailed recording of the entire discussion.

This matter, of course, is of very great importance to the Church and its future, considering not only the moral quality of our religion, which is relieved of a great burden if there is no official doctrine, but also the problem of eventual change in the practice of withholding full fellowship from Negroes. Such a change could be somewhat difficult if there were an official doctrine.

Your father showed great wisdom in taking this position and it has been a disappointment to me that the Church has not clarified the issue on the terms which he stated. . . . I frankly wish I could feel free to make President McKay's statement to me on this subject a matter of public record, as I believe this would be a very good thing for the Church and would help to clear up a great deal of confusion in the minds of many of its members.

You know of my sincere esteem and affection for your father. I hope that you will express them to him. I leave to your own good judgment whether or not you show him this letter. (Letter written by Sterling M. McMurrin to Llewelyn R. McKay, dated August 26, 1968, typed copy)

In an article published in the Salt Lake Tribune, January 15, 1970, David O. McKay's son, Dr. Llewelyn R. McKay, confirmed the fact that his father had made the statements Sterling McMurrin attributed to him:

President David O. McKay of the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints was quoted Wednesday as saying as early as 1954 that "There is no doctrine in this church and there never was a doctrine in this church to the effect that the Negroes are under any kind of a divine curse."

Dr. Sterling M. McMurrin, former U.S. Commissioner of Education and now E. E. Erickson Distinguished Professor of Philosophy and dean of the Graduate School at the University of Utah, recalled a conversation in which President McKay also said, "As a matter of fact, there is no doctrine in this church whatsoever that pertains to the Negroes." . . .

The philosophy professor, himself a Mormon, emphasized that he made detailed notes immediately following the 1954 conversation. And on Aug. 26, 1968, he wrote a three-page letter to President McKay's son, Dr. Llewelyn R. McKay, recalling the church leader's belief that Negroes were not cursed by God.

Copies of the letter were sent to President McKay's three other sons, David Lawrence McKay, Dr. Edward R. McKay and Robert R. McKay.

Dr. Llewelyn McKay "told me later that he read the letter to his father, and that his father told him that it was an entirely reliable report of what happened and what he said," Dr. McMurrin stated.

Letter Confirmed

This was confirmed Wednesday by Dr. McKay, who said there is "nothing contrary to what President McKay said," in the letter. (Salt Lake Tribune, January 15, 1970)

Three days after this statement was published President McKay died. It is strange that David O. McKay chose to remain silent on such an important subject. We must remember, however, that it was McKay who announced the mission to Nigeria in 1963. If this mission had been successful, the entire doctrine concerning the Negro would probably have been changed. This matter was still troubling the Mormon leaders in 1966, for Hugh B. Brown, David O. McKay's first counselor, wrote a letter in which he stated:

I understand your anxiety in these matters, sympathize with your view point, but can only say that the discussions had by the General Authorities of the Church have not yet brought a satisfactory answer to the vexing problems to which you refer. . . .

The specific question to which you refer, having to do with the giving the priesthood to the Negro, is one which must be resolved by the spirit of revelation, and I am convinced that that will come in the own due time of the Lord. . . . Postponing of the granting of the priesthood to the Negro while here on earth may seem to be unjust, but there are problems involved affecting many nations which, if we let down the bars now, might involve us in international complications which we would not be able to handle. . . . We, of course, must not attempt to regulate His time piece by ours, and though we become impatient at His reticence, we must continue to believe that He is all-powerful, all-wise and is the Father of all mankind.

We are just now wrestling with the problems in Nigeria, where some five thousand people have applied for baptism into the Church but where the government officials are opposing us and where, if we should baptize them, we would involve ourselves in financial problems which could very well bankrupt the Church. . . . Conditions in the southern part of the United States, in fact, all over the United States, affecting the Negro are such that for us to take positive action might involve us in controversies to which as yet there seems to be no definite inspired answer. (Letter by Hugh B. Brown, dated February 10, 1966) for the presidency of the United States, national attention was focused on the Mormon leaders to see if they would have a new revelation concerning the Negro. Under these circumstances it would have been almost impossible for David O. McKay to have changed the Negro doctrine. In 1967 Life Magazine gave this information:

It would require a revelation through the present Prophet, David O. McKay, to open the priesthood to the few Negro Mormons who presently exist, and First Counselor Brown warns, "I think it would be detrimental to him for the Church to come out with a revelation right now. It would have a reverse effect"—i.e., that of appearing to revise God's word to assist a possible candidacy. (Life Magazine, May 5, 1967, p. 92)

By this time David O. McKay was well into his nineties, and many people began to give up all hope for a revelation under his leadership. On December 15, 1969, the Mormon Church leaders issued a statement in which the following appeared:

In view of confusion that has arisen, it was decided at a meeting of the First Presidency and the Quorum of the Twelve to restate the position of the Church with regard to the Negro both in society and in the Church. . . . we believe the Negro, as well as those of other races, should have his full Constitutional privileges . . . Joseph Smith and all succeeding presidents of the Church have taught that Negroes, while spirit children of a common Father, and the progeny of our earthly parents Adam and Eve, were not yet to receive the priesthood, . . .

Were we the leaders of an enterprise created by ourselves and operated only according to our own earthly wisdom, it would be a simple thing to act according to popular will. But we believe that this work is directed by God and that the conferring of the priesthood must await His revelation. . . .

This statement was signed by Hugh B. Brown and N. Eldon Tanner of the First Presidency and was sent to "General Authorities, Regional Representatives of the Twelve, Stake Presidents, Mission Presidents, and Bishops."

By December 25, 1969, less than two weeks after the above statement was prepared, Hugh B. Brown, first counselor to President McKay, had made a statement which seems to contradict the one sent to Church officials. The following is taken from an article which appeared in the Salt Lake Tribune:

SAN FRANCISCO—The Mormon Church's denial of its priesthood to Negroes of African lineage "will change in the not too distant future," according to Hugh B. Brown, one of the highest ranking officials of the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints. Lester Kinsolving, religious columnist for the San Francisco Chronicle reported Wednesday.

Pres. Brown, who is first counselor to Pres. David O. McKay, told Mr. Kinsolving that admission of Negroes to the priesthood will come about "in the ordinary evolution of things as we go along, since human rights are basic to the church."

Cause of Rift

When asked if he thought that this change would come about during Pres. McKay's presidency, he replied:

"Well, that's impossible to predict. He's ill right now." . . . Pres. Brown disclosed Wednesday that Willard Wyman, . . . had contacted him . . . Pres. Brown also disclosed that he had told Wyman that "The church is not prejudiced in any way but this one, but I think that will change." (The Salt Lake Tribune, December 25, 1969)

The Mormon writer John L. Lund argues that the Mormon Church cannot have a revelation to change the Negro doctrine:

Brigham Young revealed that the Negroes will not receive the Priesthood until a great while after the second advent of Jesus Christ, whose coming will usher in a millennium of peace.

Revelation?

In view of what President Young and others have said, it would be foolish indeed to give anyone the false idea that a new revelation is immediately forthcoming on the issue of the Negroes receiving the Priesthood. . . . our present prophets are in complete agreement with Brigham Young and other past leaders on the question of the Negro and the Priesthood. . . .

Social pressure and even government sanctions cannot be expected to bring forth a new revelation. This point is mentioned because there are groups in the Church, as well as out, who feel that pressure on the Prophet will cause a revelation to come forth. It would be wise to emphasize that all the social pressure in the world will not change what the Lord has decreed to be. Let those who would presume to pressure the Prophet be reminded that it is God that inspires prophets, not social pressure. . . . It is not the responsibility nor the stewardship of any person on earth to dictate to the Lord or the Lord's servants when a revelation should be given. . . .

The prophets have declared that there are at least two major stipulations that have to be met before the Negroes will be allowed to possess the Priesthood. The first requirement relates to time. The Negroes will not be allowed to hold the Priesthood during mortality, in fact, not until after the resurrection of all of Adam's children. The other stipulation requires that Abel's seed receive the first opportunity of having the Priesthood. . . . the last of Adam's children will not be resurrected until the end of the millennium. Therefore, the Negroes will not receive the Priesthood until after that time. . . . this will not happen until after the thousand years of Christ's reign on earth. (The Church and the Negro, 1967, pp. 45-48)

All the social, political, and governmental pressure in the world is not going to change what God has decreed to be. (Ibid., p. 109)

If Mr. Lund would take a closer look at the history of the Mormon Church, he would find that social pressure has brought a number of changes in church doctrine. On November 23, 1969, the New York Times carried an article in which the following appears:

Reed Durham, a Mormon historian, noted last week that Mormon revelation, like biblical dietary laws, has always been "bound up in history and the needs of particular times."

The revelation on Negroes, for instance, came to Joseph Smith at a time when Mormons in Missouri were under pressures from local slave owners. Polygamy was abandoned when President Wilfred Woodruff had a vision of the disasters that would befall the church if it held on to the practice.

A new revelation on the race issue under social pressure therefore, would not be seen as a repudiation of the divine origins of doctrine but confirmation that truth continually unfolds itself in response to changing conditions and the spiritual fidelity of the Mormon faithful.

"The Mormon who sees revelation as coming out of the clear blue sky," said Dr. Durham, "simply doesn't understand his own history." (New York Times, November 23, 1969)

If the Mormon Church should decide to change its policy and allow Negroes to hold the priesthood, it will not be the first time that Mormon doctrine has been revised to fit a changing world.

Twenty-five years before the Mormon Church gave up the practice of polygamy they were declaring that no such change could be made. In the Millennial Star, October 28, 1865, the following appeared:

We have shown that in requiring the relinquishment of polygamy, they ask the renunciation of the entire faith of this people. . . .

There is no half way house. The childish babble about another revelation is only an evidence how half informed men can talk.

As the pressure increased against polygamy, Wilford Woodruff issued the Manifesto (now claimed to be a revelation) which suspended the practice of polygamy. In the National Observer for June 17, 1963, the following statement appeared:

As Federal pressure enforced a major doctrinal change in polygamy, many Mormons consider it inevitable that the pressures of the present day will force a major change in the doctrine about the Negro.

One Mormon scholar stated:

It would be inaccurate to contend that the church is not deeply concerned about this problem or attempting to do something. However, since its resolution requires serious examinations of fundamental claims, it is not going to be easy. No matter how the problem is resolved, many people will be offended.

If the pressure continues to increase on the Negro question, the leaders of the Mormon Church will probably have another revelation, or (as Sterling McMurrin said) “by some technique” they “will dissolve the doctrine on the Negro.”

Joseph Fielding Smith

David O. McKay died on January 18, 1970. He was 96 years old at the time. On January 24, 1970, the Salt Lake Tribune reported: “President Joseph Fielding Smith, 93-year-old president of the Council of Twelve Apostles, Friday became the tenth President of the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints.”

The chances for a new revelation on the Negro under the leadership of Joseph Fielding Smith appear very slim indeed, for he is the man who has been responsible for much of the anti-Negro feelings in the church. In his book, The Way To Perfection, Joseph Fielding Smith made these statements:

We have learned through the word of the Lord to Abraham that spirits in the pre-existence were graded. That is, some were more intelligent than others, some more faithful, . . . others among the two-thirds did not show the loyalty to their Redeemer that they should. . . . They were not denied the privilege of receiving the second estate, but were permitted to come to the earth-life with some restrictions placed upon them. That the Negro race, for instance, have been placed under restrictions because of their attitude in the world of spirits, few will doubt. It cannot be looked upon as just that they should be deprived of the power of the Priesthood without it being a punishment for some act, or acts, performed before they were born. (The Way To Perfection, Salt Lake City, 1931, pp. 42-43)

Not only was Cain called upon to suffer, but because of his wickedness he became the father of an inferior race. A curse was placed upon him and that curse has been continued through his lineage and must do so while time endures. Millions of souls have come into this world cursed with a black skin and have been denied the privilege of Priesthood and the fulness of the blessings of the Gospel. These are the descendants of Cain. Moreover, they have been made to feel their inferiority and have been separated from the rest of mankind from the beginning. Enoch saw the people of Canaan, descendants of Cain, and he says, “and there was a blackness came upon all the children of Canaan, that they were despised among all people” . . .

But what a contrast! The sons of Seth, Enoch and Noah honored by the blessings and rights of Priesthood! . . . And the sons of Cain, denied the Priesthood; not privileged to receive the covenants of glory in the kingdom of God! . . . we will also hope that blessings may eventually be given to our Negro brethren, for they are our brethren—children of God— notwithstanding their black covering emblematical of eternal darkness. (Ibid., pp. 101-102)

The name of Ham is also rather significant, for it means “swarthy” or “black.” It is possible that this is an appellation given to the third son of Noah because of the part he played in preserving through his lineage—and that most likely, as we have tried to show, through his wife Egyptus—the race of blacks upon whom the curse was placed. . . . Ham, through Egyptus, continued the curse which was placed upon the seed of Cain. Because of that curse this dark race was separated and isolated from all the rest of Adam’s posterity before the flood, and since that time the same condition has continued, and they have been “despised among all people.”

This doctrine did not originate with President Brigham Young but was taught by the Prophet Joseph Smith. . . . we all know it is due to his teachings that the Negro today is barred from the Priesthood. (Ibid., pp. 110-111)

Since the church has run into trouble because of the anti-Negro doctrine, Joseph Fielding Smith has become more guarded in his statements. Notice that in his book, The Way To Perfection, page 101, Joseph Fielding Smith plainly stated that Negroes are “an inferior race,” yet when the church was in serious trouble because of George Romney’s political ambitions, Joseph Fielding Smith stated that the Mormons have never described the Negro as “belonging to an ‘inferior race’”:

“The ignorance on the part of writers who do not belong to The Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints in relation to the view of the ‘Mormons’ on the status religiously or otherwise of the Negro is inexcusable. . . .

“The Latter-day Saints, so commonly called ‘Mormons’ have no animosity towards the Negro. Neither have they described him as belonging to an ‘inferior race.’” (Deseret News, Church Section, July 14, 1962)

Although Joseph Fielding Smith has had to compromise his position somewhat in public statements, he still “insists the Negro cannot be ordained into the priesthood because he is a child of Cain whom god cursed and marked with a black skin for killing his brother Abel” (The Nashville Tennessean, May 3, 1965, p. 18).

Wallace Turner made this observation concerning Joseph Fielding Smith:

SALT LAKE CITY, Jan. 24—When the Mormon presidency passed this week to Joseph Fielding Smith, a 93-year-old strict theologian, it ended for a time the hope of church liberals for a change in the practice of refusing membership in the priesthood to Negroes.

Mr. Smith is known throughout the Mormon world for his writings that justify the church policy of limiting Negro participation. . . . (New York Times, January 25, 1970)

In the same article Wallace Turner stated:

Among the first acts taken by the new president was the selection of a set of councillors who do not include Hugh B. Brown, a councillor to Mr. McKay and the liberal voice in the hierarchy. This was seen by liberals here as notice that there would be no change in the Negro doctrine.

But other observers, within and without the church, caution that this may not be so.

Joseph Fielding Smith did retain N. Eldon Tanner as his second counselor. This may not be a good sign, however, for in 1967 Tanner was quoted as saying that the anti-Negro doctrine could not be changed:

Even such harsh criticism has done nothing to budge Mormon officials from their adamant position. “The church has no intention of changing its doctrine on the Negro,” N. Eldon Tanner, counselor to the First President, told Seattle during his recent visit here. “Throughout the history of the original Christian church, the Negro never held the priesthood. There’s really nothing we can do to change this. It’s a law of God.” (Seattle Magazine, December, 1967, p. 60)

On January 24, 1970, the First Presidency of the Church held a press conference, but they refused to discuss the anti-Negro doctrine. The following statement appeared in the Salt Lake Tribune:

Newsmen were advised in advance that the leaders would not consider any questions regarding the Church’s position on Negroes. (The Salt Lake Tribune, January 25, 1970)

It is very obvious that the Mormon leaders are trying to hide from this important question. They will probably find, however, that they will have to face this issue. We know that the pressure from within the church for a change has been increasing through the years. Several years ago Joseph Fielding Smith admitted that the church leaders had received “a flood of correspondence” from church members asking why the policy cannot be changed:

During the past decade there has arisen in this country, the United States, a wave of “non-segregation,” that is, that there should be an equality in all things between the white races and the black or Negro race. . . . This matter of amalgamation to a great degree has been enforced by the Supreme Court of the United States. This tendency for “equality” in all things, has brought a flood of correspondence from all parts of the Church asking how it is that The Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints stands out in opposition and teaches a doctrine of segregation denying the Negro the right to hold the priesthood. Some of these letters border on a spirit of resentment and claim the Church is guilty of a great injustice, since “all men were created free and equal.” (Answers to Gospel Questions, vol. 2, p. 184)

In a letter, dated February 14, 1963, Joseph Fielding Smith declared: “I am getting a little fed up on the idea that so many people think I am responsible for the Negro not holding the priesthood.”

An Honest Solution

The honest solution to the problem facing the Mormon leaders is not to have another “revelation,” but to repudiate the doctrine. They should admit that Joseph Smith, Brigham Young and other Mormon leaders taught doctrines that cannot be accepted as coming from God.

The reader will remember that Brigham Young, the second President of the Mormon Church, said that slavery was a “divine institution,” and that the Civil War could not free the slaves (see Journal of Discourses, vol. 10, p. 250); however, the Civil War did free the slaves, and Brigham Young was wrong. If Brigham Young was wrong when he said this, what assurance can we have that he was not also wrong when he said the Negroes could not receive the Priesthood?

Brigham Young said that if a person who belongs to the chosen seed mixes his blood with the Negro the penalty is “death on the spot” (Journal of Discourses, vol. 10, p. 110). Obviously, the Mormons do not believe this statement by Brigham Young or they would be putting many people to death. Brigham Young called this the “law of God” and said that “this will always be so.” Now, if Brigham Young was wrong about this, what assurance have we that he was right when he said that the Negro could not hold the Priesthood? Why should we disregard this teaching, which Brigham Young called the “law of God,” and yet hold to his teaching that the Negro can not have the Priesthood?

Brigham Young’s statement that “any man having one drop of the seed of Cain in him cannot receive the priesthood,” is as impossible to believe as his other two statements. At the very time Brigham Young said this Elijah Able (a Negro) was holding the Mormon priesthood. Elijah Able lived longer than Brigham Young, and was still “a member of the Third Quorum of Seventy” in 1883. Thus we see that all during the time Brigham Young was President of the Mormon Church there was a Negro in the priesthood. And at the very time the Mormon Apostle Mark E. Petersen gave the speech in which he stated that a person with “one drop of Negro blood” could not hold the priesthood, Elijah Able’s grandson was an Elder in the Mormon Church.

We are told that 28 million Americans who are classified as white have some Negro ancestry. How would it be possible for the Mormon Church to keep these people out of the priesthood?

Conclusion

While the Mormon leaders claim that the church is led by revelation, many people are beginning to realize that this claim cannot be substantiated. To accept their “revelation” concerning the Negro, it is necessary to reject the Spirit of God which works within us. The Lord plainly reveals to us, as he did to Peter many years ago, that “God is no respecter of persons” (Acts 10:34). To accept the anti-Negro doctrine is to deny the spirit of revelation. If we allow others to do our thinking on this vital issue it could lead to violence or bloodshed.

In this chapter we have shown that even the Mormon leaders admit that there is no real basis for denying Negroes the priesthood other than Joseph Smith’s Book of Abraham. Since this is the case, it behooves us to examine this book with a very critical eye. In the next chapter we prove beyond all doubt that the Book of Abraham is a spurious work, and therefore there is no basis for the anti-Negro doctrine.

President Kimball Gives a New “Revelation” on the Blacks

On June 9, 1978, the Mormon Church’s Deseret News carried a startling announcement by the First Presidency which said that a new revelation had been given and that blacks would be allowed to hold the priesthood:

... We have pleaded long and earnestly in behalf of these, our faithful brethren, spending many hours in the upper room of the Temple supplicating the Lord for divine guidance.

He has heard our prayers, and by revelation has confirmed that the long-promised day has come when every faithful, worthy man in the church may receive the holy priesthood, with power to exercise its divine authority, and enjoy with his loved ones every blessing that flows therefrom, including the blessings of the temple. Accordingly, all worthy male members of the church may be ordained to the priesthood without regard for race or color. (Deseret News, June 9, 1978, p. 1A)

Since we have probably printed more material critical of the Mormon anti-black doctrine than any other publisher, the new revelation comes as a great victory and a vindication of our work. We printed our first criticism of this doctrine in 1959. This was certainly not a popular cause to espouse in those days. (In fact, at one time a Mormon threatened to punch Sandra in the nose over the issue.) Those of us who have criticized the Mormon Church for its racial teachings have been ridiculed for attempting to change the doctrine. Mormon apologist Armand L. Mauss wrote:

My plea, then to the civil rights organizations and to all the critics of the Mormon Church is: get off our backs! ... agitation over the “Negro issue” by non-Mormon groups, or even by Mormon liberals, is likely simply to increase the resistance to change. (Dialogue: A Journal of Mormon Thought, Winter 1967, pp. 38-39)

John L. Lund said that “Those who believe that the Church ‘gave in’ on the polygamy issue and subsequently should give in on the Negro question are not only misinformed about Church History, but are apparently unaware of Church doctrine. ... Therefore, those who hope that pressure will bring about a revelation need to take a closer look at Mormon history and the order of heaven” (The Church and the Negro, 1967, pp. 104-5). On page 109 of the same book, Mr. Lund emphasized that “those who would try to pressure the Prophet to give the Negroes the Priesthood do not understand the plan of God nor the order of heaven. Revelation is the expressed will of God to man. Revelation is not man’s will expressed to God. All the social, political, and governmental pressure in the world is not going to change what God has decreed to be.”

Brigham Young Misrepresented

We feel that the Mormon Church’s change on the doctrine concerning blacks is a very good move because it will undoubtedly help blacks obtain equality in Utah and will probably prevent much bloodshed and trouble. Nevertheless, we must point out that Brigham Young and other leaders have been misrepresented in order to make the change palatable to the Mormon people. For instance, the church’s Deseret News would have us believe that the change was a fulfillment of a prophecy uttered by Brigham Young:

The announcement Friday fulfilled statements made by most LDS Church presidents since Joseph Smith that blacks would one day obtain the full blessings of the church, including the priesthood. Speaking against slavery, Brigham Young once told the Utah Legislature, “. . . the day will come when all that race (blacks) will be redeemed and possess all the blessings which we now have.” (Deseret News, June 10, 1978, p. 1A).

While it is true that Brigham Young believed that blacks would eventually receive the priesthood, he made it clear that this was not to happen until after the resurrection. The context of the speech which the Deseret News cites reveals that Brigham Young believed it would be a sin for the church to give blacks the priesthood before the “last of the posterity of Able” had received it. He went on to say that if the church gave “all the blessings of God” to the blacks prematurely, the priesthood would be taken away and the church would go to destruction. This address is preserved in the Church Historical Department. Michael Marquardt has provided a typed copy (which retains the spelling errors of the original). We extract the following from Brigham Young’s speech:

What is that mark? you will see it on the countenance of every African you ever did see upon the face of the earth, . . . the Lord told Cain that he should not receive the blessings of the priesthood nor his seed, until the last of the posterity of Able had received the priesthood, until the redemption of the earth. If there never was a prophet, or apostle of Jesus Christ spoke it before, I tell you, this people that are commonly called negroes are the children of old Cain . . . they cannot bear rule in the priesthood, for the curse on them was to remain upon them, until the resedue of the posterity of Michal and his wife receive the blessings, . . . until the times of the restitution shall come . . . Then Cain’s seed will be had in remembrance, and the time come when that curse should be wiped off. . . .

I am as much opposed to the principle of slavery as any man in the present acceptance or usage of the term, it is abused. I am opposed to abusing that which God has decreed, to take a blessing, and make a curse of it. It is a great blessing to the seed of Adam to have the seed of Cain for servants. . . . Let this Church which is called the kingdom of God on the earth; we will summons the first presidency, the twelve, the high counsel, the Bishoprick, and all the elders of Israel, suppose we summons them to appear here, and here declare that it is right to mingle our seed, with the black race of Cain, that they shall come in with us and be pertakers with us of all the blessings God has given to us. On that very day, and hour we should do so, the preisthood is taken from this Church and kingdom and God leaves us to our fate. The moment we consent to mingle with the seed of Cain the Church must go to desstruction,—we should receive the curse which has been placed upon the seed of Cain, and never more be numbered with the children of Adam who are heirs to the priesthood untill that curse be removed. (Brigham Young Addresses, Ms d 1234, Box 48, folder 3, dated February 5, 1852, located in the LDS Church Historical Department)

The Mormon people are now faced with a serious dilemma; if they really believe Brigham Young was a prophet, then it follows from his statement that the church has lost the priesthood, been put under “the curse” and is going to destruction! In spite of Brigham Young’s emphatic warning against giving blacks “all the blessings God has given us,” the present leaders have announced that blacks will now receive “all of the privileges and blessings which the gospel affords” (Deseret News, June 9, 1978).

After the First Presidency made their statement, many people became confused over the church’s position on interracial marriage. It soon became apparent, however, that the church’s ban on marriage to blacks had been lifted. Joseph Freeman, the first black man ordained to the priesthood after the change, indicated that he wanted to be sealed in the temple to his wife who was not of African descent. Church spokesman Don LeFevre said that such a marriage would be possible and that although the church did not encourage interracial marriage, there was no longer a ban on whites marrying blacks:

That is entirely possible, said Mr. LeFevre. . . . “So there is no ban on interracial marriage. If a black partner contemplating marriage is worthy of going to the Temple, nobody’s going to stop him—if he’s marrying a white, an Oriental . . . if he’s ready to go to the Temple, obviously he may go with the blessings of the church.” (Salt Lake Tribune, June 14, 1978)

On June 24, 1978, the Tribune announced that “Joseph Freeman, 26, the first black man to gain the priesthood in the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints, Friday went in the Salt Lake Temple with his wife and sons for sacred ordinances . . . Thomas S. Monson, member of the church’s Quorum of Twelve Apostles, conducted the marriage and sealing ceremonies [sic].”

In allowing temple marriage between whites and blacks, the church is completely disregarding what President Young referred to as “the law of God in regard to the African race.” The reader will remember that President Young taught that the “penalty” for interracial marriage “under the law of God, is death on the spot. This will always be so” (Journal of Discourses, vol. 10, p. 110). Since Brigham Young taught that this “law of God” could never be changed, the new policy will present a serious problem for some Mormons.

Although we have no way of knowing exactly how many interracial temple marriages have been performed since the change in policy, there is reason to believe that a number have taken place. As early as June 8, 1978, Brigham Young University newspaper, The Universe, reported that “Debbie Hall, an elementary education staff member from Seattle, Wash., said a good friend of hers, who is black, is a member of the church and married a white girl. ‘It’s going to be neat to see them go through the temple,’ she said.” In the same issue we find the following: “Mrs. Frazier, and her five children are all black but her husband John is white and an Elder in the church. . . . One event that Mrs. Frazier said she has long yearned for is temple marriage and the chance to see her children be able to pass the sacrament.”

On page 4 of the same issue of The Universe, we find that a black Mormon by the name of Robert L. Stevenson “married Susan V. Bevan about six weeks ago. She is white and also LDS.” The BYU paper quoted Stevenson as saying: “We are already planning our temple marriage.”

At any rate, the Church Section of the Deseret News for June 17, 1978, says that “former presidents of the Church have spoken of the day when the blessings of the priesthood would come to the blacks.” A quotation from a sermon by Brigham Young which appeared in the Journal of Discourses, vol. 7, is cited, but when we go to the original book we find that it has been taken out of context. In this sermon Brigham Young plainly taught that blacks could not receive the priesthood until all of Adam’s other children received it:

Cain slew his brother . . . and the Lord put a mark upon him, which is the flat nose and black skin. . . . How long is that race to endure the dreadful curse that is upon them? That curse will remain upon them, and they never can hold the Priesthood or share in it until all the other descendants of Adam have received the promises and enjoyed the blessings of the Priesthood and the keys thereof. Until the last ones of the residue of Adam’s children are brought up to that favourable position, the children of Cain cannot receive the first ordinances of the Priesthood. They were the first that were cursed, and they will be the last from whom the curse will be removed. When the residue of the family of Adam come up and receive their blessings, then the curse will be removed from the seed of Cain, and they will receive the blessings in like proportion. (Journal of Discourses, vol. 7, pp. 290-291)

Brigham Young also taught this doctrine in other published sermons:

When all the other children of Adam have had the privilege of receiving the Priesthood, and of coming into the kingdom of God, and of being redeemed from the four quarters of the earth, and have received their resurrection from the dead, then it will be time enough to remove the curse from Cain and his posterity . . . he is the last to share the joys of the kingdom of God. (Journal of Discourses, vol. 2, p. 143)

They will go down to death. And when all the rest of the children have received their blessings in the Holy Priesthood, then that curse will be removed from the seed of Cain, and they will then come up and possess the priesthood, and receive all the blessings which we now are entitled to. (Ibid., vol. 11, p. 272)

In 1949 the First Presidency of the Mormon Church issued a statement in which they cited Brigham Young’s teaching that blacks cannot receive the priesthood until after the resurrection (see Mormonism and the Negro, by John J. Stewart and William E. Berrett, 1960, part 2, p. 16). Joseph Fielding Smith, who served as the tenth president of the Mormon Church in the early 1970s, taught that blacks would never hold the priesthood as long as “time endures” (The Way to Perfection, p. 101).

In a meeting held in Barratt Hall on October 11, 1958, Joseph Fielding Smith commented that “the Lord will, in due time, remove the restrictions. Not in this world but the time will come. . . .” N. Eldon Tanner, a member of the First Presidency who finally signed the statement granting blacks the priesthood, was completely opposed to the idea in 1967:

“The church has no intention of changing its doctrine on the Negro,” N. Eldon Tanner, counselor to the First Presidency told Seattle during his recent visit here. “Throughout the history of the original Christian church, the Negro never held the priesthood. There’s really nothing we can do to change this. It’s a law of God.” (Seattle Magazine, December 1967, p. 60)

Mormon writer John L. Lund claimed that if the president of the Mormon Church gave a revelation that blacks were to hold the priesthood, members of the church would accept it, but he emphasized that such a revelation would not be forthcoming because “present prophets are in complete agreement with Brigham Young and other past leaders on the question of the Negro and the Priesthood”:

Brigham Young revealed that the Negroes will not receive the Priesthood until a great while after the second advent of Jesus Christ, whose coming will usher in a millennium of peace. . . .

In view of what President Young and others have said, it would be foolish indeed to give anyone the false idea that a new revelation is immediately forthcoming on the issue of the Negroes receiving the Priesthood. . . . our present prophets are in complete agreement with Brigham Young and other past leaders on the question of the Negro and the Priesthood. President McKay was asked by a news reporter at the dedication of the Oakland Temple, “When will the Negroes receive the Priesthood?” He responded to the question over a national television network saying, “Not in my lifetime, young man, nor yours” . . .

Social pressure and even government sanctions cannot be expected to bring forth a new revelation...all the social pressure in the world will not change what the Lord has decreed to be. . . .

The prophets have declared that there are at least two major stipulations that have to be met before the Negroes will be allowed to possess the Priesthood. The first requirement relates to time. The Negroes will not be allowed to hold the Priesthood during mortality, in fact, not until after the resurrection of all of Adam’s children. The other stipulation requires that Abel’s seed receive the first opportunity of having the Priesthood. . . . Negroes must first pass through mortality before they may possess the Priesthood (“they will go down to death”). Reference is also made to the condition that the Negroes will have to wait until after the resurrection of all of Adam’s children before receiving the Priesthood . . . the last of Adam’s children will not be resurrected until the end of the millennium. Therefore, the Negroes will not receive the Priesthood until after that time . . . this will not happen until after the thousand years of Christ's reign on earth. . . .

The second major stipulation that needs to be met . . . is the requirement that Abel's seed receive the opportunity of holding the Priesthood first. . . .

The obvious question is, "When will Abel's seed be redeemed?" It will first of all be necessary that Abel marry, and then be resurrected, and ultimately exalted in the highest degree of the Celestial Kingdom so that he can have a continuation of his seed. It will then be necessary for Abel to create an earth for his spirit children to come to and experience mortality. These children will have to be "redeemed" or resurrected. After the resurrection or redemption of Abel's seed, Cain's descendants, the Negroes, will then be allowed to possess the Priesthood. (The Church and the Negro, pp. 45-49)

On pages 109-110 of the same book, John L. Lund reiterates:

First, all of Adam's children will have to resurrect and secondly, the seed of Abel must have an opportunity to possess the Priesthood. These events will not occur until sometime after the end of the millennium.

As late as 1974 Apostle Bruce R. McConkie questioned the spirituality of church members who believed it was time for a new revelation on the blacks. In a conference message delivered October 4, 1974, Apostle McConkie said:

Am I valiant in the testimony of Jesus if my chief interest and concern in life is laying up in store the treasures of the earth, rather than the building up of the kingdom? . . .

Am I valiant if I am deeply concerned about the Church's stand on who can or who cannot receive the priesthood and think it is time for a new revelation on this doctrine? . . .

Am I valiant if I engage in gambling, play cards, go to pornographic movies . . . (The Ensign, November 1974, p. 35)

It is interesting to note that after the revelation was given Apostle Bruce R. McConkie actually gave a speech in which he chastised those "disbelieving people" who were reluctant to accept the new revelation because it contradicted things taught in the past:

There are statements in our literature by the early brethren which we have interpreted to mean that Negroes would not receive the priesthood in mortality. I have said the same things, and people write me letters and say, "You said such and such, and how is it now that we do such and such?" And all I can say to that it is time disbelieving people repented and got in line and believed in a living, modern prophet. Forget everything that I have said, or what President Brigham Young or President George Q. Cannon or whomsoever has said in days past that is contrary to the present revelation. We spoke with a limited understanding and without the light and knowledge that now has come into the world. . . . We have now had added a new flood of intelligence and light on this particular subject, and it erases all the darkness. . . . It doesn't make a particle of difference what anybody ever said about the Negro matter before the first day of June of this year (1978). ("All Are Alike Unto God," by Elder Bruce R. McConkie of the Council of the Twelve, pp. 1-2)

Even though most Mormons claim they are happy with the doctrinal change with regard to blacks, there is evidence that the "revelation" came as a real shock. A class at Brigham Young University which conducted a "random telephone Survey" of Utah County residents found that 79 percent of those interviewed did not expect a change at this time. Furthermore, many people compared the news to an announcement of some kind of disaster or death:

Some 45 percent of those who heard of the doctrine from personal sources expressed doubt that the news was true. This compares with only 25 percent of those who learned from media sources. Sixty-two percent of the former group expressed shock, compared with 52 percent of the latter. . . .

Those surveyed appeared surprised by the announcement, Haroldsen said. Thirty-nine percent said they did not think "it would ever happen"—that the priesthood would ever be given to blacks.

Another 40 percent expected it years in the future, after Christ's return, during the Millennium, or "not in my lifetime." . . .

In trying to explain how they reacted to the news, 14 persons compared its impact with that of the assassination of President John F. Kennedy. Another 13 compared it to the news of the death of an LDS Church president. Eight compared it to a natural disaster, especially the Teton dam break.

Others compared the news with the death of a family member or friend, with a declaration of war, or other major political event. (The Daily Universe, June 22, 1978)

The Mormon people apparently realized the deep doctrinal implications this change involved, and therefore they associated it with death or disaster. If they were really pleased with the change, why did they not relate it with a happy event like marriage, the birth of a child or the end of a war? We feel that this survey unwittingly reveals what church members really thought of the change.

After the "revelation" was announced a number of Mormons who could not accept the new teaching left the church. A full-page advertisement attacking the change was published in the Salt Lake Tribune on July 23, 1978, by a group calling themselves "Concerned Latter-day Saints." From this article it would appear that members of this group are also disturbed because of the earlier doctrinal change relating to plural marriage.

Better Late Than Never

Writing in the New York Times, June 11, 1978, Mario S. DePillis observed: "For Mormonism's antiblack policy a revelation was the only way out, and many students of Mormonism were puzzled only at the lateness of the hour." That the Mormon Church was forced into the revelation is obvious to anyone who seriously examines the evidence. We have already pointed out that athletic teams from the church's Brigham Young University were the target of very serious protests and that in 1969 Stanford University announced it would "schedule no new athletic or other competitions with Brigham Young University." Immediately following the announcement of the new "revelation," Gary Cavalli, athletic director for Stanford University, said, "I think the ban will be lifted" (Salt Lake Tribune, June 21, 1978).

In 1974 the Mormon doctrine of discrimination against blacks brought the Boy Scouts into a serious confrontation with the NAACP. The Boy Scouts of America do not discriminate because of religion or race, but Mormon-sponsored troops did have a policy of discrimination. On July 18, 1974, the Salt Lake Tribune reported:

A 12-year-old boy scout has been denied a senior patrol leadership in his troop because he is black, Don L. Cope, black ombudsman for the state, said Wednesday. . . . Mormon "troop policy is that in order for a scout to become a patrol leader, he must be a deacon's quorum president in the LDS Church. Since the boy cannot hold the priesthood, he cannot become a patrol leader."

Mormon leaders apparently realized that they could never prevail in this matter and a compromise was worked out:

Shortly before Boy Scout officials were to appear in Federal Court Friday morning on charges of discrimination, the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints issued a policy change which will allow black youths to be senior patrol leaders, a position formerly reserved for white LDS youths in troops sponsored by the church. . . . An LDS Church spokesman said Friday under the “guidelines set forth in the statement, a young man other than president of the deacons quorum could (now) become the senior patrol leader if he is better qualified.” (Salt Lake Tribune, August 3, 1974)

Since 1976 the Mormon Church was repeatedly embarrassed by one of its own members who became alienated over the anti-black doctrine and decided to take matters into his own hands. On April 3, 1976, the Salt Lake Tribune reported that Douglas A. Wallace “ordained a black into the priesthood Friday, saying he did so in an attempt to force a revision in Mormon doctrine about the Negro race. . . . Wallace said he has long been bothered by the Mormon Church’s bias against blacks, and he feels the time has come to challenge it. He said often all that is required to change a policy is for someone to break out of tradition . . . he hopes there are no recriminations against him for his action, such as excommunication.”

On April 13, 1976, the Salt Lake Tribune revealed that “Douglas A. Wallace was excommunicated from the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints Sunday for ordaining a black man into the church’s priesthood.” After a confrontation with church personnel at an April conference session, Mr. Wallace was ejected from the Tabernacle. Later he was served with “a court order barring him from attending conference” (Ibid., October 4, 1976).

Although we did not agree with some of Mr. Wallace’s ideas on religion, we did not consider him to be dangerous and we were rather surprised to notice the close surveillance the police kept him under when he walked along the public sidewalk outside of Temple Square. The fear of the threat Mr. Wallace presented to the church seems to have led to a tragic incident where a policeman was accidentally shot and permanently paralyzed. This occurred at the time of the church’s conference held in April, 1977. The Salt Lake City police had placed a stakeout around a home where Wallace was staying and at 4:20 A.M. on a Sunday morning one of the policemen accidentally shot his partner. At first the police “denied” that they had Mr. Wallace under surveillance (see Salt Lake Tribune, April 5, 1977), but when Wallace pressed for an investigation the police were forced to admit the truth about the matter:

Salt Lake City police officers admitted Thursday that the accidental wounding of an undercover officer occurred during surveillance of Mormon dissident Douglas A. Wallace. . . . Reports released Thursday by both the county sheriff’s office and the county attorney show that six officers were on stakeout around the John W. Fitzgerald home . . . where Mr. Wallace was staying. (Salt Lake Tribune, April 8, 1977)

Douglas Wallace claimed that the Mormon Church “was behind April police surveillance . . . that led to the accidental shooting of a Salt Lake City police officer” (Ibid., September 17, 1977). Finally, David Olson, the disabled police officer, took exception to a press release issued by the church. In a letter to the editor of the Salt Lake Tribune, January 18, 1978, Mr. Olson attacked President “Spencer W. Kimball for his incorrect press release concerning the police involvement combined with the LDS church’s efforts to restrict Douglas A. Wallace from the temple grounds, specifically the Tabernacle, on April 3, 1977. His denial of these actions is wrong. Any man who can take such actions and still call himself a prophet deserves more than I to be confined to this wheelchair.”

Officer Olson apparently could not face the thought of being paralyzed for the rest of his life, and on March 25, 1980, the Salt Lake Tribune reported that he “committed suicide early Sunday morning, according to Murray Police.”

Douglas Wallace filed lawsuits amounting to millions of dollars against the Mormon Church, and although he was not able to prevail against the church in the courts, the publicity surrounding the suits caused the church no end of trouble. We feel that his actions and the embarrassment they caused the church played a part in bringing about the decision to have a new “revelation.”

Another Mormon who put a great deal of pressure on the church is Byron Marchant. Mr. Marchant took a very strong stand against racism in the church. The Dallas Morning News for October 20, 1977, reported: “The man who cast the first vote in modern history against a leader of the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints was excommunicated and fired as chapel janitor.” When Mr. Marchant tried to distribute literature at Temple Square at the next conference he was arrested “on charges of trespassing” (Salt Lake Tribune, April 3, 1978). Mr. Marchant published a sheet in which he called for a demonstration against the church’s policy: “Next October Conference (1978) I will join all interested in a march on Temple Square in Salt Lake City. . . every person and/or group concerned about Utah Racism is encouraged to speak out and attend the October protest.” Mr. Marchant’s threat of a demonstration at the next conference may have caused Mormon leaders to think more seriously about having a new revelation. We feel that the church was wise to change its policy before the demonstration because the issue was so explosive that the slightest incident could have touched off a riot where innocent people could have been injured.

However this may be, when the Mormon Church yielded, Mr. Marchant dropped a civil suit filed “against Church President Spencer W. Kimball” (Salt Lake Tribune, June 10, 1978). Another article in the same issue of the Tribune observed that “the last three years have also seen repeated attempts by church dissidents to subpoena Mormon leaders into court proceedings, with the central issue often related to the church’s belief about blacks.”

Besides all the problems the church was having with dissidents, it was faced with an impossible situation in Brazil. Even the church’s own Deseret News admitted that “a major problem the church has faced with its policy regarding blacks was in Brazil, where the church is building a temple. Many people there are mixed [mixed?] racially, and it is often impossible to determine whether church members have black ancestry” (Deseret News, June 10, 1978).

Mormon leaders have been aware of this problem for some time. Lester E. Bush, Jr., gave this revealing information in an article published in Dialogue: A Journal of Mormon Thought, Spring 1973, p. 41:

The decision to deny the priesthood to anyone with Negro ancestry (“no matter how remote”), had resolved the theoretical problem of priesthood eligibility, but did not help with the practical problem of identifying the “blood of Cain” in those not already known to have Negro ancestry. . . .

The growth of the international Church was clearly bringing new problems. Brazil was particularly difficult. . . . J. Reuben Clark, First Counselor to George Albert Smith, reported that the Church was entering “into a situation in doing missionary work...where it is very difficult if not impossible to tell who has negro blood and who has not. He said that if we are baptizing Brazilians, we are almost certainly baptizing people of negro blood, and that if the Priesthood is conferred upon them, which no doubt it is, we are facing a very serious problem.”

The hypocrisy of the situation in South America was pointed out in 1966 by Wallace Turner:

A different thing is going on in South America where Mormon missionaries are pushing ahead full throttle. There the former careful selection to keep out “white Negroes” has been allowed to slide a little. . . . “There is no question but that in Brazil they have been ordaining priests who are part Negro,” said one careful observer. (The Mormon Establishment, 1966, p. 261)

With the opening of the new temple in Brazil, the situation would have turned into a real nightmare. Actually, the church has had the same problem in the United States. Patriarch

Eldred G. Smith remarked:

I had a young lady who was blonde a[n]d no sign or indications visibly of the Negro line at all, but yet she was deprived of going to the Temple. . . . We have these conditions by the thousands in the United States today and are getting more of them. If they have any blood of the Negro at all in their line, in their veins at all, they are not entitled to the blessings of the Priesthood. . . . No limit as to how far back so far as I know. (Patriarchal Blessings, Institute of Religion, January 17, 1964, p. 8)

The reader will remember that Time Magazine for June 30, 1958, page 47, pointed out Dr. Robert P. Stuckert reached the conclusion that of 135 million Americans classified as white in 1950, about 28 million (21 percent) had some African ancestry. The church's stress on genealogical research placed many members of the church in a very embarrassing position when they discovered they had black ancestors. Such information, of course, had to be covered up. This situation caused a great deal of unnecessary guilt among members of the church who diligently followed the teaching concerning the necessity of genealogical research.

New "Revelation" Evades the Real Issues

O. Kendall White, Jr., made these interesting observations several years before the revelation was given:

Since they believe in "continuing revelation," Mormons have a mechanism that enables them to reverse previous positions without repudiating the past. . . . That the church will invoke such a mechanism to resolve the racial issue is not too unlikely. . . . this approach has a serious drawback. It is the tendency not to acknowledge the errors of the past. While revelation could be used to legitimate a new racial policy and to redefine Mormon relations with black people, Mormons might still be unwilling to condemn the racism involved in their history. They might be inclined to argue that Mormons in earlier periods were under a different mandate than the one binding them. This obviously implies that the church is never wrong. Thus, change may come through the notion of continuing revelation, but the racist aspects of Mormon history will not necessarily be condemned. (The Journal of Religious Thought, Autumn-Winter, 1973, pp. 57-58)

It would appear that church leaders have done exactly what Mr. White warned against; they have used revelation as a means of side-stepping the real issues involved. Mario S. DePillis pointed out that "the revelation leaves unsolved other racist implications of the Book of Mormon and the Pearl of Great Price—scriptures that are both cornerstones and contradictions" (New York Times, June 11, 1978).

One issue that Mormon leaders now seem to be dodging is that concerning skin color. As we have pointed out earlier, Mormon theology has always taught that "a black skin is a mark of the curse of heaven placed upon some portions of mankind" (Juvenile Instructor, vol. 3, p. 157). The Book of Mormon itself is filled with the teaching that people with dark skins are cursed (see our discussion of this matter on page 262 of this book).

Another matter which the new revelation allowing blacks to hold the priesthood does not resolve is the teaching concerning pre-existence. In the past Mormon leaders have stressed that blacks were cursed as to the priesthood because of "unfaithfulness in the spirit—or pre-existence." Should a faithful Mormon continue to believe that blacks were unrighteous in a pre-existent state? It will be especially interesting to see how church leaders explain this matter to blacks in the church. Monroe Fleming, for instance, was converted to the church many years ago. President Joseph Fielding Smith explained to him why he could not hold the priesthood, but since the new "revelation" he is being encouraged to be ordained. Now, was Mr. Fleming really unfaithful in a pre-existent state or did church leaders just make a mistake in the past when they said he could not hold the priesthood? Church leaders should explain if they believe black babies born after the new "revelation" was given were inferior spirits in a preexistent state.

Now that they have abandoned the idea that blacks cannot hold the priesthood, they should explain if they are giving up some of their teachings on the pre-existence. They should also explain if they are repudiating the Book of Mormon teaching that a dark skin is given by God as a "curse." By giving a "revelation" on the blacks without explaining its implications, the Mormon leaders are leaving their people in a dense doctrinal fog. If the church continues to hide behind a purported revelation on the blacks and fails to come to grips with its racist doctrines, thousands of people are going to continue believing these doctrines and the church will be plagued with racism for many years to come.

Does the Revelation Really Exist?

One thing that should be noted about the new "revelation" is that the church has failed to produce a copy of it. All we have is a statement by the First Presidency which says a revelation was received. Joseph Smith, the first Mormon prophet, printed many of his revelations in the Doctrine and Covenants and other church publications, and the early Mormon Church even mocked the Catholics because they did not allow the revelations given by their popes to enter the "sacred canon." In refusing to canonize or even make public the new "revelation" on blacks, the Mormon leaders are now practicing the very thing the Catholics were accused of doing. The Salt Lake Tribune for June 13, 1978, reported:

Kimball refused to discuss the revelation that changed the church's 148-year-old policy against ordination of blacks, saying it was a "personal thing." . . . Kimball said the revelation came at this time because conditions and people have changed. "It's a different world than it was 20 or 25 years ago. The world is ready for it," he said.

We seriously doubt that President Kimball will ever put forth a written revelation on the bestowal of priesthood on blacks. We doubt, in fact, that any such document exists. What probably happened was that the leaders of the church finally realized that they could no longer retain the anti-black doctrine without doing irreparable damage to the church. Under these circumstances they were impressed with the fact that the doctrine had to be changed and this impression was referred to as a revelation from God. In a letter to the Editor of the Salt Lake Tribune, June 24, 1978, Eugene Wagner observed:

. . . was this change of doctrine really a revelation from the Lord, or did the church leaders act on their own? Why don't they publish that revelation and let the Lord speak in his own words? All we saw was a statement of the First Presidency, and that is not how a revelation looks.

When God speaks the revelation starts with the words: "Thus sayeth the Lord . . ." It seems when the Lord decides to change a doctrine of such great importance he will talk himself to the people of his church. If such a revelation cannot be presented to the members it is obvious that the first presidency acted on its own, most likely under fear of public pressure to avoid problems of serious consequences and to maintain peace and popularity with the world.

At the 148th Semiannual Conference of the Mormon Church, members of the church were asked to "accept this revelation as the word and will of the Lord," but the only document presented to the people was the letter of the First Presidency, dated June 8, 1978 (see The Ensign, November 1978, p. 16).

Some Mormons have put forth the rumor that the power of God was manifested as on the day of Pentecost when President

Kimball gave the “revelation.” Kimball himself seems to be trying to dispel this idea. The following statement about the “revelation” appeared in Time on August 7, 1978, page 55:

In other renditions it came complete with a visitation from Joseph Smith. . . . In an interview, his first since the announcement, Kimball described it much more matter of factly to Time staff writer Richard Ostling: “I spent a good deal of time in the temple alone, praying for guidance, and there was a gradual and general development of the whole program, in connection with the Apostles.”

For some time after the anti-black doctrine was changed, Mormon leaders were reluctant to inform their own people of the details surrounding the giving of the “revelation.” Finally, six months after the event, the church news staff asked President Kimball if he would “care to share with the readers of the Church News any more of the circumstances under which that was given?” President Kimball’s answer is very revealing. He makes no reference to a voice or any written revelation; in fact, his statement gives the impression that it was only a feeling or an assurance that he received:

It went on for some time as I was searching for this, because I wanted to be sure. We held a meeting of the Council of the Twelve in the temple on the regular day. We considered this very seriously and thoughtfully and prayerfully.

I asked the Twelve not to go home when the time came. I said, “Now would you be willing to remain in the temple with us?” And they were. I offered the final prayer and I told the Lord if it wasn’t right, if He didn’t want this change to come in the Church that I would be true to it all the rest of my life, and I’d fight the world against it if that’s what He wanted.

We had this special prayer circle, then I knew that the time had come. I had a great deal to fight, of course, myself largely, because I had grown up with this thought that Negroes should not have the priesthood and I was prepared to go all the rest of my life till my death and fight for it and defend it as it was. But this revelation and assurance came to me so clearly that there was no question about it. (Deseret News, Church Section, January 6, 1979, p. 4)

In his speech “All Are Alike Unto God,” pages 2-3, Apostle Bruce R. McConkie told how the “revelation” was received. His description indicates that there was no spoken or written revelation—only a very good “feeling”:

The result was that President Kimball knew, and each one of us knew, independent of any other person, by direct and personal revelation to us, that the time had now come to extend the gospel . . . to . . . the black race. . . . The Lord could have sent messengers from the other side to deliver it, but he did not. He gave the revelation by the power of the Holy Ghost. Latter-day Saints have a complex: many of them desire to magnify and build upon what has occurred, and they delight to think of miraculous things. And maybe some of them would like to believe that the Lord himself was there, or that the Prophet Joseph Smith came to deliver the revelation . . . which was one of the possibilities. Well, these things did not happen. The stories that go around to the contrary are not factual or realistic or true, . . . I cannot describe in words what happened; I can only say that it happened and that it can be known and understood only by the feeling that can come into the heart of man. You cannot describe a testimony to someone.

In putting forth his new “revelation” on blacks, President Kimball will not admit to any wrongdoing on the part of the church: “There are members of the Church who had brought to President David O. McKay their reasons why it should be changed. Others had gone to Joseph Fielding Smith and Harold B. Lee and to all the former presidents and it had not been accepted because the time had not come for it” (Deseret News, Church Section, January 6, 1979, p. 15). We feel that it is wrong to fail to accept any blame and to attribute such a “revelation” to God. It makes it appear that God has been a racist for thousands of years, and that Mormon leaders by “pleading long and earnestly in behalf of these, our faithful brethren, spending many hours in the upper room of the Temple” have finally persuaded God to give blacks the priesthood. The truth of the matter, however, is that “God is no respecter of persons: but in every nation he that feareth him, and worketh righteousness, is accepted with him” (Acts 10:34-35). It is the Mormon leaders who have kept blacks under a curse. They have continually and stubbornly opposed the advancement of black people, threatening and excommunicating those who differed with them on the matter. Finally, when their backs were to the wall, the Mormon leaders were forced to change their position.

Impact of Revelation

Some people believe the Mormon Church is not sincere in opening priesthood advancement to blacks. We feel, however, that even though the Mormon leaders have failed to face some important issues, they have made a major concession which will gradually weaken racism throughout the church. The Deseret News, Church Section, January 6, 1979, reported that “Brother (Helecio) Martins (a black member) is now a member of the stake presidency.”

We feel that one of the important reasons the church decided to confer priesthood on blacks was that the anti-black doctrine was hurting missionary work. With a change in this policy, we anticipate that the church will make many more converts. On the other hand, many members of the church have become disillusioned because of the church’s handling of the racial issue, and the new “revelation” has tended to confirm in their minds that the Lord had nothing to do with the whole matter. For those Christians working with Mormons, this may really prove to be an opening for effective witnessing.

22. Fall of the Book of Abraham

The Book of Abraham was supposed to have been written on papyrus by Abraham about 4,000 years ago. According to Mormon writers, this same papyrus fell into Joseph Smith's hands in 1835. He translated the papyrus and published it under the title, "The Book of Abraham." The Book of Abraham was accepted by the Mormon Church as scripture and is now published as part of the Pearl of Great Price—one of the four standard works of the church.

If the papyrus were really written by Abraham, as the Mormons claim, its discovery was probably one of the most important finds in the history of the world. To say that the papyrus would be worth a million dollars would be greatly underestimating its value, for it would be older than any portion of the Bible. Dr. Sidney B. Sperry, one of the church's most noted scholars, commented:

The Mormon people are especially blessed with scriptures that have a very interesting archaeological background. . . . If a manuscript were to be found in the sands of Egypt written in Egyptian characters with the title of "The Book of Abraham," it would cause a sensation in the scholarly world. Our people do profess to have such a scripture containing but five chapters which was written by Abraham who came from Ur of the Chaldees and eventually went down into the land of Egypt. (Ancient Records Testify in Papyrus and Stone, by Dr. Sidney B. Sperry, 1938, Salt Lake City, p. 39)

On page 83 of the same book, Dr. Sperry states:

The little volume of Scripture known as the Book of Abraham will some day be reckoned as one of the most remarkable documents in existence. . . . the author or editors of the book we call Genesis lived after the events recorded therein took place. Our text of Genesis can therefore not be dated earlier than the latest event mentioned by it. It is evident that the writings of Abraham while he was in Egypt, of which our printed Book of Abraham is a copy, must of necessity be older than the original text of Genesis. I say this in passing because some of our brethren have exhibited surprise when told that the text of the Book of Abraham is older than that of Genesis.

From this it is plain to see that if the Book of Abraham is an authentic record of Abraham its value to the world could not be estimated. If, on the other hand, the papyrus was not really written by Abraham, then Joseph Smith was guilty of misrepresentation, and a shadow of doubt is cast upon the Book of Mormon and other writings which he claimed were scripture.

The Papyri Rediscovered

For many years Joseph Smith's collection of papyri were lost, but on November 27, 1967, the Mormon-owned Deseret News announced:

NEW YORK—A collection of pa[p]yrus manuscripts, long believed to have been destroyed in the Chicago fire of 1871 was presented to The Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints here Monday by the Metropolitan Museum of Art. . . .

Included in the papyri is a manuscript identified as the original document from which Joseph Smith had copied the drawing which he called "Facsimile No. 1" and published with the Book of Abraham. (Deseret News, Nov. 27, 1967, p. 1)

The Mormon scholar Hugh Nibley made this statement concerning the papyri:

On November 27, 1967, the Metropolitan Museum of Art presented to the Church as a gift certain Egyptian papyri once owned by the Prophet Joseph Smith. This was a far more momentous transaction than might appear on the surface, for it brought back into play for the first time since the angel Moroni took back the golden plates a tangible link between the worlds. What we have here is more than a few routine scribblings of ill-trained scribes of long ago; at least one of these very documents was presented to the world by Joseph Smith as offering a brief and privileged insight into the strange world of the Patriarchs. (Brigham Young University Studies, Winter 1968, p. 171)

The importance of this find cannot be overemphasized, for now Joseph Smith's ability as a translator of ancient Egyptian writing can be put to an absolute test.

The pages which follow contain pictures of all eleven pieces of papyri which were given to the Mormon Church by the Metropolitan Museum. They are taken from the Brigham Young University Studies, Winter, 1968.

"Caught Flat-Footed"

In February, 1968, the Improvement Era announced that there was an "unprecedented interest generated throughout the church by the recovery of 11 pieces of papyrus that were once the property of the Prophet Joseph Smith." Many members of the Mormon Church felt that Joseph Smith's work had been vindicated. Dr. Sidney B. Sperry, however, warned his people to be cautious:

We ought to be very careful in our estimation of these things. I[t] would be better for us to take a conservative view now, than go out on a limb and say they prove more than they actually do. . . . we ought not to overrate the importance of this discovery. It would be better to be conservative, then [than?] to be overly expansive in our estimate of the value of the papyrus sheets. (Newsletter and Proceedings of the Society for Early Historic Archaeology, Brigham Young University, March 1, 1968, pp. 6-8)

Dr. Hugh Nibley, who is supposed to be the Mormon Church's top authority on the Egyptian language, warned his people that there was trouble ahead. On December 1, 1967, the Daily Universe, published at Brigham Young University, reported these statements by Dr. Nibley:

"The papyri scripts given to the Church do not prove the Book of Abraham is true," Dr. Hugh Nibley said in an academics Office-sponsored assembly Wednesday night. "LDS scholars are caught flat footed by this discovery," he went on to say.

According to Dr. Nibley, Mormon scholars should have been doing added research on the Pearl of Great Price years ago. Non-Mormon scholars will bring in questions regarding the manuscripts

Photos No. 5 and 6 —These two fragments are part of the same scene. Dr. Nibley labels them "III A. Court of Osiris (on throne)" and "III B. Court of Osiris (Thoth recording)". (Improvement Era, February, 1968, pages 40-B and 40-C.)

which will be hard to answer because of lack of scholarly knowledge on the subject. . . . Dr. Nibley said worldly discoveries are going to “bury the Church in criticism” if members of the Church don’t take it upon themselves to become a people of learning. . . . Mormons ought to know as much or more as others, “but they don’t,” Dr. Nibley said, quoting Brigham Young. (Daily Universe, Brigham Young University, December 1, 1967)

Dr. Nibley also made this remark:

. . . a few faded and tattered little scraps of papyrus may serve to remind the Latter-day Saints of how sadly they have neglected serious education. . . . Not only has our image suffered by such tragic neglect, but now in the moment of truth the Mormons have to face the world unprepared, after having been given a hundred years’ fair warning. (Brigham Young University Studies, Winter 1968, pp. 171-172)

Although these are strange words to be coming from the man whom the Mormon leaders have chosen to defend the “Book of Abraham,” they are certainly the truth.

In order to understand the problems involved it is necessary to give a history of the papyri.

History of Papyri

Joseph Smith’s History of the Church contains the following account of the discovery of the papyri:

The records were obtained from one of the catacombs of Egypt, . . . by the celebrated French traveler, Antonio Sebolo, . . . He entered the catacomb June 7, 1831, and obtained eleven mummies. . . . Previous to his decease, he made a will of the whole, to Mr. Michael H. Chandler, . . . they were received at the Custom House, in the winter or spring of 1833. . . . On opening the coffins, he discovered that in connection with two of the bodies, was something rolled up with the same kind of linen, saturated with the same bitumen, which, when examined, proved to be two rolls of papyrus, previously mentioned. Two or three other small pieces of papyrus, with astronomical calculations, epitaphs, & c., were found with others of the mummies. (History of the Church, vol. 2, pp. 348-349)

Although there are errors in this statement, it gives the Mormon account of the origin of the papyri.

After receiving the mummies, Mr. Chandler traveled about exhibiting them. According to the History of the Church, Mr. Chandler arrived in Kirtland, Ohio, on July 3, 1835. Joseph Smith became interested in the papyri, but Mr. Chandler refused to sell the manuscripts unless he could also sell the mummies. The Apostle Orson Pratt stated:

. . . Mr. Chandler told him that he would not sell the writings, unless he could sell the mummies, . . . Mr. Smith inquired of him the price which was a considerable sum, and finally purchased the mummies and the writing, . . . (Improvement Era, January 1968, p. 16)

After the Mormons purchased the papyri, Joseph Smith examined them and declared that they were the writings of Abraham and Joseph of Egypt:

Soon after this, some of the Saints at Kirtland purchased the mummies and papyrus, . . . I commenced the translation of some of the characters or hieroglyphics, and much to our joy found that one of the rolls contained the writings of Abraham, another the writings of Joseph of Egypt, etc.,—a more full account of which will appear in its place, as I proceed to examine or unfold them. (History of the Church, vol. 2, p. 236)

In 1842 Joseph Smith published his translation of the “Book of Abraham” in the Times and Seasons. Three drawings from the Book of Abraham were included in this work.

While Joseph Smith had the papyri many people were allowed to see them. On February 19, 1843, Charlotte Haven wrote the following to her mother:

From there we called on Joseph’s mother, . . . she lit a candle and conducted us up a short, narrow stairway to a low, dark room under the roof. On one side were standing half a dozen mummies, to whom she introduced us, King Onitus and his royal household,—one she did not know. Then she took up what seemed to be a club wrapped in a dark cloth, and said “This is the leg of Pharaoh’s daughter, the one that saved Moses.” . . . Then she turned to a long table, set her candlestick down, and opened a long roll of manuscript, saying it was “the writing of Abraham and Isaac, written in Hebrew and Sanscrit,” and she read several minutes from it as if it were English. It sounded very much like passages from the Old Testament . . . she said she read it through the inspiration of her son Joseph, . . . in the same way she interpreted to us hieroglyphics from another roll. One was Mother Eve being tempted by the serpent, who—the serpent, I mean—was standing on the tip of his tail, which with his two legs formed a tripod, and had his head in Eve’s ear. I said, “But serpents don’t have legs.”

“They did before the fall,” she asserted with perfect confidence. (Overland Monthly, December 1890, pp. 623-24)

Josiah Quincy, who visited Joseph Smith at Nauvoo, gave this information:

The prophet referred to his miraculous gift of understanding all languages, . . .

“And now come with me,” said the prophet “and I will show you the curiosities.” . . . There were some pine presses fixed against the wall of the room. These receptacles Smith opened, and disclosed four human bodies, shrunken and black with age. “These are mummies,” said the exhibitor. “I want you to look at that little runt of a fellow over there. He was a great man in his day. Why, that was Pharaoh Necho, King of Egypt!” Some parchments inscribed with hieroglyphics were then offered us. They were preserved under glass and handled with great respect. “That is the handwriting of Abraham, the Father of the Faithful,” said the prophet. “This is the autograph of Moses, and these lines were written by his brother Aaron. Here we have the earliest account of the Creation, from which Moses composed the First Book of Genesis.” The parchment last referred to showed a rude drawing of a man and woman, and a serpent walking upon a pair of legs. I ventured to doubt the propriety of providing the reptile in question with this unusual means of locomotion. “Why, that’s as plain as a pikestaff,” was the rejoinder. “Before the Fall snakes always went about on legs, just like chickens. They were deprived of them, in punishment for their agency in the ruin of man.” We were further assured that the prophet was the only mortal who could translate these mysterious writings, and that his power was given by direct inspiration. . . . “Gentlemen,” said this bourgeois Mohammed, as he closed the cabinets, “those who see these curiosities generally pay my mother a quarter of a dollar.” (Among the Mormons, edited by William Mulder and Russell Mortensen, New York, 1958, pp. 136-137)

For other interesting statements by those who saw the papyri see our Case Against Mormonism, vol. 2, pages 121-122.

Deciphering Egyptian

In Joseph Smith’s time the science of Egyptology was in its infancy. Therefore, Joseph Smith’s work as a translator could not be adequately tested. The knowledge of hieroglyphic, hieratic and demotic Egyptian writing had been lost many centuries before, and it was not until the beginning of the nineteenth century that there appeared much hope of deciphering these strange writings. Just before the turn of the century (1799) some French soldiers found a stone with Greek, demotic and hieroglyphic writings upon it. Alan Gardiner makes this statement concerning it:

Such a clue was at last provided when some French soldiers, working on the foundations of a fortress at Rosetta, came across a trilingual inscription in Greek, demotic, and hieroglyphic (1799).

This inscription ever since famous under the name of the Rosetta stone, proved from its Greek portion to be a decree in honour of the young king Ptolemy Epiphanes, which the priests of Egypt caused to be erected in all the temples of the land (196 B.C.). (Egyptian Grammar, by Sir Alan Gardiner, London, 1964, p. 12)

Dr. Sidney B. Sperry made this comment concerning the Rosetta stone:

A knowledge of Greek has never been lost to mankind and for that reason scholars could easily decipher the Greek portion of the stone. . . . It was soon recognized by scholars that what was said in Greek was also repeated in the hieroglyphic and demotic columns just above it. Thus it was thought that the Egyptian characters could be compared with the Greek and the general sense of them made out. In other words it was recognized that the Greek portion of the Rosetta Stone was a key which could help unlock the meaning of the Egyptian characters. (Ancient Records Testify in Papyrus and Stone, by Sidney B. Sperry, pp. 32-33)

Although others had worked with the Rosetta stone, Jean Francois Champollion was the man who was “destined to win immortal fame as the decipherer of the hieroglyphs” (Egyptian Grammar, p. 13).

E. A. Wallis Budge gives us this information:

The progress of Egyptology suffered a severe set-back by the death of Young on May 10th, 1830, and by the death of Champollion on March 4th, 1832, and there was no scholar sufficiently advanced in the science to continue their work. (An Egyptian Hieroglyphic Dictionary, E. A. Wallis Budge, New York, vol. 1, p. xii)

In 1837, . . . Birch . . . decided to attempt to publish a “Hieroglyphical Dictionary.” . . . publishers were not eager to spend their money on a dictionary of a language of which scarcely a dozen people in the whole world had any real knowledge. (Ibid., p. xvii)

From the information given above it is plain to see that there was little chance of Joseph Smith’s work coming into conflict with the science of Egyptology during his lifetime. There was one purported test of Joseph Smith’s ability in 1835. B. H. Roberts stated:

The Prophet translated some of the hieroglyphics Mr. Chandler submitted to him, whereupon that gentleman certified as to the agreement of the Prophet’s translation with that which had been made by scholars in other places where the mummies and papyrus rolls had been exhibited. (A Comprehensive History of the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints, by B. H. Roberts, vol. 2, p. 126)

Mr. Chandler’s certificate reads as follows:

Kirtland, July 6, 1835

This is to make known to all who may be desirous, concerning the knowledge of Mr. Joseph Smith, Jun., in deciphering the ancient Egyptian hieroglyphic characters in my possession, which I have, in many eminent cities, showed to the most learned; and, from the information that I could ever learn, or meet with, I find that of Mr. Joseph Smith, Jun., to correspond in the most minute matters.

Michael H. Chandler, . . .

(History of the Church, vol. 2, p. 234)

This statement by Mr. Chandler does not amount to much when we consider the fact that he was not an Egyptologist himself. It is very unlikely that he had any reliable information concerning the meaning of the Egyptian hieroglyphs. Mormon scholar Sidney Sperry made this interesting comment: “Now I do not know how Mr. Chandler could possibly know whether the Prophet’s translation was correct or not” (Pearl of Great Price Conference, BYU, December 10, 1960, 1964 ed., p. 4).

The Mormon Apostle Orson Pratt admitted that Mr. Chandler could not have known much about the Egyptian language:

Mr. C. had also obtained from learned men the best translation he could of some few characters, which however, was not a translation, but more in the shape of their ideas with regard to it, their acquaintance with the language not being sufficient to enable them to translate it literally. (Journal of Discourses, vol. 20, p. 65)

Thus we see that Chandler’s endorsement of Smith’s work is of no real value, especially when we consider the fact that he was the man who sold the Mormons the mummies and papyri for “a large sum of money.”

Joseph Smith was murdered in 1844, and within a few years the Mormons came out west. Joseph Smith’s mother as well as his widow refused to go west, and therefore the Mormon Church lost control of the collection of papyri. Nevertheless, Joseph Smith had included three drawings in his Book of Abraham, and also gave an interpretation of much of the material which appeared in these drawings.

By the year 1860 the science of Egyptology had advanced to the point where some people felt that it could be used to test Joseph Smith’s ability as a translator. The Mormon historian B. H. Roberts related the following:

It is due to the reader to say that fragments of the Book of Abraham, the facsimiles published with this chapter, were submitted to a young French savant in 1860, . . . The young French savant of the Museum of the Louvre, to whom the facsimiles of the fragments of the Book of Abraham were submitted, was M. Theodule Deveria. His explanations differ from the translations made by Joseph Smith, but of the merits of M. Deveria’s translation the writer can form no judgment. . . . (A Comprehensive History of the Church, B. H. Roberts, vol. 2, p. 130, footnote)

Deveria not only accused Joseph Smith of making a false translation, but also of altering the scenes shown in the facsimiles. Actually, Deveria must have done a good job, for an Egyptologist made this statement in a letter dated August 29, 1967; “. . . I made a translation of as much as I could read of the facsimiles in the PGP; it is no great improvement on that published by Deveria about 100 years ago.”

Spalding’s Attack

Deveria’s work on the Book of Abraham seemed to have little influence on the Mormons. In 1912, however, another attack was made on the Book of Abraham. The Mormon historian B. H. Roberts explains:

In 1912 a widespread interest was awakened in the Book of Abraham by the publication of a brochure, by Rt. Rev. F. S. Spalding, D.D. Episcopal Bishop of Utah, under the title Joseph Smith, Jun., as a Translator. The bishop submitted the facsimiles of some of the parchment pages from which the Book of Abraham had been translated, . . . to a number of the foremost of present day Egyptian scholars. (A Comprehensive History of the Church, vol. 2, p. 138)

Dr. Hugh Nibley admitted that Spalding “enlisted the services of the most formidable roster of scholars that have ever declared against Joseph Smith as a prophet, . . .” (Improvement Era, January 1968, p. 20)

On page 23 of Joseph Smith, Jr., As a Translator, F. S. Spalding reproduced a letter from Dr. A. H. Sayce of Oxford, England. In this letter Dr. Sayce commented: “It is difficult to deal seriously with Joseph Smith’s impudent fraud . . . Smith has turned the Goddess into a king and Osiris into Abraham.”

Dr. W. M. Flinders Petrie of the London University stated:

To any one with knowledge of the large class of funeral documents to which these belong, the attempts to guess a meaning are too absurd to be noticed. It may be safely said that there is not one single word that is true in these explanations. (Joseph Smith, Jr., As a Translator, p. 24)

James H. Breasted, Ph.D., Haskell Oriental Museum, University of Chicago, stated:

To sum up, then, these three fac-similes of Egyptian documents in the “Pearl of Great Price” depict the most common objects in the mortuary religion of Egypt. Joseph Smith’s interpretations of them as part of a unique revelation through Abraham, therefore, very clearly demonstrates that he was totally unacquainted with the significance of these documents and absolutely ignorant of the simplest facts of Egyptian Writing and civilization. (Ibid., pp. 26-27)

Dr. Arthur C. Mace, who was the Assistant Curator, Metropolitan Museum of Art, New York, Dept. of Egyptian Art, stated:

I return herewith, under separate cover, the “Pearl of Great Price.” The “Book of Abraham,” it is hardly necessary to say, is a pure fabrication. . . . Joseph Smith’s interpretation of these cuts is a farrago of nonsense from beginning to end. Egyptian characters can now be read almost as easily as Greek, and five minutes’ study in an Egyptian gallery of any museum should be enough to convince any educated man of the clumsiness of the imposture. (Ibid., p. 27)

Rev. Prof. S.A.B. Mercer, Ph.D., Western Theological Seminary, Custodian Hibbard Collection, Egyptian Reproductions, stated:

. . . the author knew neither the Egyptian language nor the meaning of the most commonplace Egyptian figures; neither did any of those, whether human or Divine, who may have helped him in his interpretation, have any such knowledge. . . . the explanatory notes to his fac-similes cannot be taken seriously by any scholar, as they seem to be undoubtedly the work of pure imagination. (Ibid., p. 29)

When Spalding’s pamphlet first appeared the Mormon leaders were very upset. Dr. Sidney B. Sperry relates:

I well remember when that attack came out, and to say that it stirred up our general authorities is to put it mildly. The brethren were very much concerned about the faith of our young people, . . . I well remember at the time how, in my religion class, Dr. John A. Widtsoe’s brother, Osborne J. B. Widtsoe—a great man—tried to tell the young people about the situation, and attempted to save us from leaving the Church. (Pearl of Great Price, December 10, 1960, Brigham Young University, 1964 edition, p. 2)

Dr. Sperry also gave this information concerning the attack by Spalding:

When the latter appeared it literally produced a sensation in the Church. The writer well remembers how as a student then in high school all the teachers and brethren generally were talking about it. In the excitement many of them stated that they felt it was impossible to answer Mr. Spalding because he had made out such a good case against Joseph Smith as a translator. (Ancient Records Testify in Papyrus and Stone, p. 73)

In the Pearl of Great Price Conference, December 10, 1960, page 2, Dr. Sperry made this comment:

Well as I look back on this experience, I have to smile quite a little, because frankly we were more interested in the girl we were going to date the next Friday night for the dance than we were about losing our faith. I think very few of us lost our faith for a moment because of that attack made upon the Pearl of Great Price.

“Dr. Webb”

The Mormon leaders did not know how to deal with Spalding’s pamphlet. Mormon historian B. H. Roberts admitted that there “were no Egyptian scholars in the church of the Latter-day Saints who could make an effective answer to the conclusions of the eight scholars who in various ways pronounced against the correctness of Joseph Smith’s translation of the Egyptian parchments that so strangely fell into his hands; . . .” (A Comprehensive History of the Church, vol. 2, p. 139).

The Mormons, however, did receive help from a man who called himself “Robert C. Webb, Ph.D.” Fawn M. Brodie claimed that Robert C. Webb’s real name was “J. E. Homans,” and that he was “neither an Egyptologist nor a Ph.D.” (No Man Knows My History, 1957, p. 175). It is rather obvious that if Mrs. Brodie is correct in this matter, the Mormon leaders were guilty of deception. Strange as it may seem, Dr. Sidney B. Sperry, of Brigham Young University, confirmed the fact that Robert C.

Webb was “no Ph.D.” In the Pearl of Great Price Conference, held in 1960, Dr. Sperry answered a number of questions. At one point in the discussion he was asked about Robert C. Webb:

Question: What did Mr. Webb do for the Church? He was not a member?

Answer: He was not a member of the Church. We had him at Brigham Young University to lecture, in old Room 260 in the Joseph Smith building. I might state that that man was converted to the Church. However, there were certain things that held him back. The elders in New York on one occasion were going to baptize him on a Saturday afternoon. Dr. Talmage arrived in town on Wednesday, and he told the elders: “You leave him alone.” So, he did not come into the Church, but he did do a great job of defending our cause. I think in many respects that he did the best job of any one in defending the Church’s interests at that particular time.

He wrote a wonderful book, Case Against Mormonism, under the name of Robert C. Webb, Ph.D. I regret that the brethren let him put down Robert C. Webb, Ph.D., because he was no Ph.D. (Pearl of Great Price Conference, December 10, 1960, 1964 ed., p. 9)

On page 6 of the same publication, Dr. Sperry stated that Dr. Webb’s “real name was J. C. Homans.”

M. Wilford Poulson, who was on the faculty at the Brigham Young University, related the following to us: At one time “Dr. Webb” attended a meeting at the BYU. After the meeting was over, Mr. Poulson asked “Dr. Webb” if he would like to see the fine collection of books in the Brigham Young University Library. “Dr. Webb,” however, indicated that he was much more interested in having a smoke. Since smoking is frowned upon at the BYU, they had to take a walk away from the campus. Mr. Poulson was able to learn a great deal about “Dr. Webb.” He found out that he was in reality a professional writer who was hired to defend various causes. One of his books was in defense of the liquor industry. This book, of course, was written under another assumed name.

The Mormon historian B. H. Roberts admitted that “‘Dr. Webb’ was an assumed name,” but he defended his work (see A Comprehensive History of the Church, vol. 2, p. 139).

Although “Dr. Robert C. Webb” was able to quote from several different languages and make a great display of knowledge, from the viewpoint of an Egyptologist his arguments are very weak. Samuel A. B. Mercer made this comment concerning one of “Dr. Webb’s” interpretations: “His whole symbolical statement is full of errors and is its own refutation. To the layman it is unintelligible and to the expert it is ridiculous” (The Utah Survey, September 1913, p. 27).

It is interesting to note that Hugh Nibley is still using R. C. Webb’s material. He refers to him as “the outsider, R. C. Webb” (Improvement Era, January 1968, p. 20). In just five articles published in the Improvement Era (January to May, 1968) Hugh Nibley refers to R. C. Webb or his work at least 23 times.

The Mormon Church was able to survive Spalding’s attack upon the Book of Abraham because the Mormon people felt that “Dr. Webb” had answered the critics. Prof. N. L. Nelson made these statements in a letter to Spalding:

The fog your critics spread did not hang long. Dr. Robert C. Webb’s masterly explication of these plates restored to me more than your destructive criticisms took away . . .

Dr. Webb has, indeed, vindicated the prophet better than he knew himself. . . . (Improvement Era, April 1913, pp. 604-605)

In 1964 we reprinted F. S. Spalding’s pamphlet in a work entitled Why Egyptologists Reject the Book of Abraham. Since the Joseph Smith Papyri have been rediscovered they have tended to vindicate Spalding’s work and it may yet get the serious attention it deserves.

Tragic Neglect

After the excitement over Spalding’s pamphlet died down, the Mormons took little interest in the science of Egyptology. Jean

Capheart, an Egyptologist who visited Salt Lake City, noticed this lack of interest: “Dr. Capheart lauded the Latter-day Saints for their study of Egyptian, wondering at the same time why there is not a greater study of the science as a result of the foundation that their religion has in the authenticity of their Book of Abraham.” (Deseret News, as cited in Pearl of Great Price Conference, 1964 ed., p. 60)

Actually, Mormon scholars have had a strange attitude about the science of Egyptology. There has been a great deal of pretense, but very little attempt to get down to the basic issues involved. Dr. Nibley admits that this is true:

To this day no one has engaged in the type of study necessary to come to grips with the Pearl of Great Price, . . . all studies of the Pearl of Great Price without exception have been in the nature of auxiliary studies—compendiums, historical background, etc.—or preliminary surveys. . . .

Full-scale college and extension courses, graduate seminars, Churchwide lecture series, stately public symposiums, books, pamphlets, monographs, newsletters, and articles, all done up in fancy bindings usually adorned with reproductions of the Facsimiles from the Pearl of Great Price or with faked Egyptian symbols to intrigue and beguile the public, have all failed to get beyond the starting point of the race, which after all must be run on the long hard obstacle course of Egyptian grammar and epigraphy and not on the lecture platform. The Mormons, it seems, have gone all out for the gimmicks and mechanics of education, but have never evinced any real inclination to tackle the tough, basic questions of evidence raised by the Pearl of Great Price. (Improvement Era, January 1968, p. 24)

In an article published in Brigham Young University Studies, Dr. Nibley stated:

There is no shortage of people publishing books and articles, holding learned symposiums, and giving classes and lectures in the mysteries of the Pearl of Great Price, but the precious papyri themselves, the subject of so much wise discourse through the years, are greeted with an abashed silence. It is said that when the Chinese in their first naval encounters with Europeans found their ships no match for steamboats, they proceeded to erect funnels on the decks of their junks, in which they would burn straw, thus rivaling the formidable appearance of the enemy. The mock steamboats no doubt satisfied the Chinese and made a fine impression as long as they did not have to come up against real steamboats, and such has been their way of our Mormon scholarship, assiduously aping the learning of the world in its safe and comfortable isolation. It would have been possible through the years to have obtained from time to time the services of the world's best Egyptologists and archaeologists for but a fraction the cost of, say, a local billboard campaign to add luster to the image of the University. Not only has our image suffered by such tragic neglect, but now in the moment of truth the Mormons have to face the world unprepared, after having been given a hundred years' fair warning. (Brigham Young University Studies, Winter 1968, pp. 171-72)

It is interesting to note that the Brigham Young University had copies of “Joseph Smith’s Egyptian Alphabet and Grammar” for over 30 years. This work includes pages of Egyptian characters copied from the original papyrus. Yet, strange as it may seem, no one from the BYU has published a translation of this material! On December 11, 1967, Dr. Sidney B. Sperry made this comment about this work:

DR. SPERRY: One of the things that strikes me about this whole business is the importance of our discovery, some 30 years ago, of Joseph Smith’s Egyptian Alphabet and Grammar. When we first opened it we found numerous pages of Egyptian material.... There must be a hundred times more material in this volume than there is in the whole of the Pearl of Great Price. (Newsletter and Proceedings of the Society for Early Historic Archaeology, B.Y.U., March 1, 1968, p. 8)

At a “Pearl of Great Price Conference” held in December of 1960, Dr. Sperry stated:

We have a hundred times more Egyptian material than you have in the entire book of Abraham as it is presently printed. Here is another piece of translation. Notice this page, a whole page of Egyptian material. . . . we have an exciting job, brethren and sisters, ahead of us in translating, if it is possible these characters, part of which are hieratic and part hieroglyphic. (Pearl of Great Price Conference, 1964 ed., pp. 8-9)

On pages 10-11 of the same book, Dr. Sperry answered a number of questions. Some of his answers are very revealing:

Question: Is there any of the “one hundred times more material” translated, and if so, who has it?

Well, Dr. Clark and I have it. We have not translated it. That is going to be a terrific job, believe me.

. . . .

Question: Does it seem at all likely to you, after the searches you have already conducted, that the manuscript of Joseph and Abraham may still be somewhere, or may still be found?

Answer: That is quite a problem. I think that the record of Joseph, or at least parts of it, are in this material. What a thrill it would be if we could get it translated!

Question: What is the current attitude of the Church leaders toward the translating of this additional information you have found?

Answer: I do not know. I suppose the brethren might let it be published, but that is doubtful at the present time.”

Dr. Sperry had taken some courses in Egyptian at the University of Chicago. If he really felt that these texts supported Joseph Smith’s work, why did he not devote himself to the work of translating them? Dr. Nibley had also taken courses in Egyptian, yet in 1968 he frankly admitted that he “has never spent so much as five minutes with the Egyptian Grammar [i.e., Joseph Smith’s Egyptian Alphabet and Grammar], and does not intend to unless he is forced into it” (Brigham Young University Studies, Winter 1968, p. 176).

Hugh Nibley and Sidney Sperry spent years working on books and articles in defense of the Mormon Church. Why did they not invest this time in working on these important documents? Could it be that they suspected that this material would not vindicate Joseph Smith’s work?

Not Out of Date

Marvin Cowan, a Baptist missionary working among the Mormons, was told by different Mormons that the pamphlet by F. S. Spalding was out-dated and that the Egyptologists today would probably give a different opinion concerning Joseph Smith’s translation. After obtaining the names of prominent Egyptologists from the Smithsonian Institution, he sent them the facsimiles from the Pearl of Great Price along with a letter in which he asked if the Egyptian language was “completely decipherable,” and if the facsimiles enclosed were “true Egyptian writing or characters?” He also asked if Joseph’s explanations were “true interpretations of the pictures if they are Egyptian” and if the explanations are incorrect, “what do the three pictures mean?”

In a letter dated March 16, 1966, John A. Wilson, Prof. of Egyptology at the University of Chicago, replied as follows:

We have had previous occasion to comment on the illustrations in Joseph Smith, “The Pearl of Great Price.” Two or three documents are in question as the two oblong illustrations show pictures from the Egyptian Book of the Dead. Whether this is one papyrus or two is immaterial. In illustration No. 1, the god Anubis is preparing a mummified body on a bed. The head of the god has been miscopied as human and should be that of a jackal. Beside the head of the mummy there is a flying bird which represents the Egyptians soul. Under the bed there are four jars into which the soft inner parts of the body were placed by the ancient Egyptians. Figure 3 is even more common, showing the dead Egyptian led into the presence of the god Osiris for judgment as to his moral character in life. In these the hieroglyphs have been very sketchily copied, and probably could have been read on the original.

Figure 2 is a round disk made of cloth and jesso to be placed under the head of a mummy in the late period of Egyptian culture (after 900 B.C.). It shows the scene customarily on such magical protection for the dead. In this the hieroglyphs can in part be checked and do correspond to those on such pieces as known in various museums. In fact the name of the dead appears as the same as that of Shishak in the Bible.

From the standpoint of the Egyptologist the explanations given with these illustrations are incorrect. The Egyptian language on such documents is decipherable and has appeared in translation in various books. If these copies were more accurate, one could probably read connected texts from them. (Letter from Prof. John A. Wilson, University of Chicago, March 16, 1966, to Marvin Cowan)

In a letter dated March 22, 1966, Richard A. Parker, of the Department of Egyptology at Brown University, replied:

To answer your questions: (1) The ancient Egyptian language can be called completely decipherable. There are some words in the vocabulary whose specific meaning is still undetermined but there are very few whose general meaning remains uncertain. We can read almost any text with a high degree of confidence.

(2) (a) The pictures you sent me are based upon Egyptian originals but are poor or distorted copies. Many of the hieroglyphs are recognizable but so many others have been so poorly copied that the illustrations cannot be read. (b) The explanations are completely wrong insofar as any interpretation of the Egyptian original is concerned.

(c) Number 1 is an altered copy of a well known scene of the dead god Osiris on his bier with a jackal-god Anubis acting as his embalmer. The four jars beneath the couch are four canopic jars with the heads of a human, baboon, jackal and falcon. The bird over Osiris is a ba or soul-bird. There are many variations of this scene in Egyptian monuments.

Number 3 is a poor copy from a scene from some funerary papyrus in which the dead person is conducted by the goddess of truth and another unknown figure into the presence of Osiris seated on his throne with presumably Isis standing behind him. The hieroglyphs are so badly copied that nothing can be made out but this also is a very common scene. (Letter by Richard A. Parker, Dept. of Egyptology, Brown University, March 22, 1966)

After the papyri were turned over to the church by the Metropolitan Museum, Marvin Cowan sent pictures from the Deseret News to these same Egyptologists and asked if the photographs of the original papyri would cause them to change their opinions.

In a letter, dated January 5, 1968, John A. Wilson, of the University of Chicago, stated: “. . . as far as I am concerned I see pieces of two or possibly three different papyri and every one of them looks like a traditional Book of the Dead.”

Marvin Cowan asked Dr. Parker these questions concerning the papyrus Joseph Smith reproduced as Facsimile No. 1 in the Book of Abraham:

1. On page seven of the enclosed article is a picture of the papyrus from which Joseph Smith drew facsimile #1. (a) Would you still say this is the god anubis preparing a mummified body? (b) Do you see anything in the picture that would change what you previously told me?

In a letter dated January 9, 1968, Dr. Parker replied:

1. (a) Yes.
- (b) No.

John A. Wilson also continued to maintain that the picture showed “Anubis and the corpse.” (Letter dated Jan. 5, 1968)

Marvin Cowan asked Richard A. Parker this question:

“3. The papyrus pictured at the top of page seven has what appears to be three columns of writing on the right hand side. Smith did not put these on his facsimile. Can you tell me what they are?” Professor Parker replied: “3. The fragments of hieroglyphic texts are clearly funerary. Study of them could no doubt identify their source in the Book of the Dead.”

Thus we see that the Egyptologists have not changed their opinions concerning this matter.

A Suspicious Discovery

Until 1967 Mormon writers claimed that all of the original papyri Joseph Smith used in his production of the Book of Abraham had been destroyed in the Chicago fire of 1871. William E. Berrett stated:

They were considered as the property of the Smith family and, after the Prophet’s martyrdom, were retained by his wife, Emma. They were later sold by her to a museum at St. Louis, from whence they found their way into a Museum of Chicago. In the great Chicago fire the museum was totally destroyed and with it the precious ancient manuscripts. (The Restored Church, p. 144)

While some of the mummies and papyri may have been placed in museums, it now appears that after Smith’s death his widow sold at least part of the papyri to Mr. A. Combs. Eleven pieces from the collection eventually ended up in the Metropolitan Museum. Dr. Fischer, of the Metropolitan Museum, explains how this happened:

FISCHER: Our first knowledge of them goes back to 1918 when our first curator, Dr. A. M. Lythgoe, was shown these fragments by a Mrs. Alice Heusser, a woman who lived in Brooklyn. . . . Her mother had been housekeeper to a person named Combs, and Combs had bought them from the family of Joseph Smith. It is that sale which is mentioned in the letter I referred to. On the death of Mr. A. Combs, they were left to Mrs. Heusser’s mother. . . . they were offered to us by the widower of Mrs. Heusser, Mr. Edward Heusser. We acquired them then in 1947. (Dialogue: A Journal of Mormon Thought, Winter, 1967, p. 56)

According to the Improvement Era, the church became aware that Joseph Smith’s papyri were still in existence in 1966. Dr. Aziz S. Atiya, a non-Mormon, was supposed to have discovered the papyri at the Metropolitan Museum in the spring of 1966. Dr. Atiya states:

“I was writing a book at the time, . . . It must have been in the early spring of 1966. I really forget the date. . . . I was looking for supplementary material.

“While I was in one of the dim rooms where everything was brought to me, something caught my eye, and I asked one of the assistants to take me behind the bars into the storehouse of document so that I could look some more. While there I found a file with these documents. I at once recognized the picture part of it. When I saw this picture I knew that it had appeared in the Pearl of Great Price.” (Improvement Era, January, 1968, p. 13)

Dr. Fischer, however, made it sound like Dr. Atiya’s “discovery” was planned. In an interview with Dialogue, he commented:

FISCHER: Frankly, we didn’t know what the Mormon Church’s wishes were. It wasn’t until we discussed the matter with Professor Atiya, who teaches in Salt Lake City at the University of Utah, that we had a possibility of finding out how they felt about it. . . .

DIALOGUE: At what time did Dr. Atiya become aware of the existence of the scrolls?

FISCHER: I would say about a year ago. We know him well; . . . He had come to our department and was looking for illustrations for one of his books. This matter came up in the course of giving him this help. We knew, since he worked in Salt Lake City and was acquainted with leaders of the Mormon Church, that he might very tactfully find out how they felt about it. So we simply informed him about this in confidence, and I think he handled the matter very nicely. (Dialogue: A Journal of Mormon Thought, Winter, 1967, pp. 56-58)

In a letter dated April 5, 1968, Henry G. Fischer stated:

The moment I found, in Professor Atiya, a means of determining the Church's interest in our papyri, we explored the possibilities of transferring them. I cannot speak for my predecessors, but the reason I "suppressed" information concerning the papyri prior to their transference was simply to avoid involving my institution in doctrinal controversy.

The Mormon writer Jay M. Todd makes these interesting comments in his book, The Saga of the Book of Abraham, page 333:

The announcement on that long-to-be-remembered Monday, November 27, 1967, literally stunned and surprised countless hundreds of thousands of Latter-day Saints: . . .

And indeed, there is much more to the story than has been reported. More than even I will report. There are some aspects of the story—due to reasons of propriety and personalities—that should remain out of public discourse for some years yet, simply because it is the wisest course to do so.

Obviously, there exist two different stories—Dr. Atiya's and Dr. Fischer's—about who motivated whom to inform the Church. (Ibid., p. 346)

Although Dr. Atiya is not a Mormon, he is very friendly to the Mormon people. Dr. James R. Clark, of the BYU, stated: "I have learned from conversations that Dr. Atiya knows the Pearl of Great Price thoroughly. In fact my informant indicated that he has the entire volume memorized" (Newsletter and Proceedings of the S.E.H.A., March 1, 1968). Dr. Atiya, speaking of the rediscovery of the papyri, referred to himself as "the humble impliment directed by the Lord to open this discovery" (Book of Abraham Symposium, April 3, 1970, Salt Lake Institute of Religion, p. 36).

At any rate, Dr. Atiya stated that he contacted the church leaders. Glen Wade gives this information:

Dr. Atiya obtained photographs of the material in the file and returned to his home in Salt Lake City. He immediately got in touch with his good Mormon friend, Taza Peirce, and told her in confidence what he had discovered. A few days later the two of them met with President N. Eldon Tanner and the photographs were displayed. Later, the photographs were sent to Brigham Young University for inspection by Professor Hugh Nibley, who confirmed that the papyri were from the Mormon collection. (Dialogue: A Journal of Mormon Thought, Winter 1967, p. 53)

Although the Mormon leaders tried to keep it secret, the fact that the papyri were still in existence began to leak out. In a letter dated August 9, 1966, an Egyptologist stated: ". . . there is good reason to think that some, at least, of the papyri are still in existence, despite the persistent stories about their having been destroyed in a fire around 1871."

A year later this same Egyptologist revealed the following in a letter:

As usual, reality was improved somewhat in the retelling of facts. Joseph Smith's collection of papyri (I would guess it at about 30 items, including the three from which the woodcuts in the Pearl of Great Price were made) was disposed of after his death. The official version, that the whole lot was destroyed in a fire in a private museum in the 1870's is certainly false (I suspect consciously so). I do not know what happened to about two thirds of the collection, though I would not be surprised if they are in the LDS archives in Salt Lake (or at BYU?), but obviously no one will ever know. About 10 or 11 pieces passed through several hands and eventually ended up in a museum, which, however, has never put them on exhibit, though a few professionals have been told about them in confidence and have been shown photographs, but not sufficiently long to study and translate them. In the summer of 1966, Prof. Nibley showed me enlargements of the photographs; they had been obtained by a third party and passed on to Prof. Nibley, who was evidently interested in purchasing the papyri, which included the embalming scene reproduced (with many imaginative restorations since the original is badly damaged) in the PGP. The published woodcuts are execrable, but the handwriting on the originals is bad enough, though there is no question that they are late (probably Roman Period) MSS of the Book of the Dead and similar funerary literature, and Prof. Nibley, who had already had the time to study the photographs, had identified several chapters of the BD (unfortunately I can't remember the numbers off hand). (Letter dated August 29, 1967)

Dr. Nibley claims that it is the non-Mormons who have suppressed the truth about the papyri:

At no time have the manuscripts not been just as available to Egyptologists as they are now to members of the Church. Since the Church obtained them, they have been made available to everyone. It is not the Mormons who have kept the documents out of the hands of the scholars but the other way around. (Improvement Era, April 1968, p. 65)

As far as we can determine, the Egyptologists who knew about the papyri seemed to feel that they were doing the Mormons a favor by keeping the facts about the papyri secret. When one Egyptologist was pressed for information on this subject, he wrote:

If it keeps the Mormons happy to hide a few papyri that are probably of interest to no one but themselves, why not? . . . I regret that my position in this matter must be essentially frustrating and seem stubbornly pigheaded to those to whom combatting the Mormons is a matter of great importance. (Letter dated September 2, 1967)

A man who talked with this Egyptologist claimed that he "does not like to talk about the Mormons and claims that for the last year will not even talk about the subject since everyone wants to quote him. This he absolutely refuses to have happen, since Nibley is a close friend" (Letter dated October 10, 1967). This Egyptologist had apparently been aware of the existence of the papyri even prior to the time Dr. Atiya made his purported "discovery." In a letter written in January, 1968, he remarked:

You must understand that the photographs are not new to me. I saw them originally a number of years ago in the Metropolitan Museum, then again in the summer 1965. . . . The newspaper article contains little that is new and a number of details about the discovery and donation that I am a little suspicious of.

According to Jay M. Todd, Dr. Nibley now claims that some Egyptologists were aware of the papyri as early as 1902:

Dr. Hugh Nibley has said in private discussion that as early as 1902 some Egyptologists in America have known about the location of some papyri owned by the Prophet Joseph Smith.

Apparently in 1902 some persons from the Midwest came to the University of Chicago and either showed the papyri to or informed Dr. James Henry Breasted, professor of Egyptology and Oriental history, about the papyri. Since then, the identity and location of the papyri were rather common knowledge among the scholars at the Oriental Institute at Chicago, but a subject which no one would consider passing on to members of the Church. (The Saga of the Book of Abraham, pp. 347-348)

While Dr. Nibley was willing to admit that Egyptologists have known about the papyri for many years and to accuse them of suppressing these documents, he claimed that "no Latter-day Saint was even aware of their existence until about two years ago. . . . If it had not been for Professor Aziz S. Atiya, we should still know nothing about the papyri; he is in a very real sense their discoverer" (Improvement Era, April 1968, p. 65).

We now have evidence to show that some of the Mormons were aware of the existence of the papyri prior to Dr. Atiya's "discovery." One Mormon now admits that he knew of the papyri as early as 1962. In the book, From the Dust of Decades, we find the following information:

One student persisted in searching . . . Then one day in 1962 he found what he had been seeking. He did little with his discovery and is now at a loss as to why.

For five years he let this remarkable information virtually rest in his study. Then one day, nearly five years later, another man, not a member, nor a student of Church history, hit the front pages of even the Egyptian capital's greatest daily newspaper, through his discovery of the same documents in the same museum. (From the Dust of Decades, Salt Lake City, 1968, p. 104)

The Museum certainly kept an accurate file on the papyri and their origin, for in 1962 it was one of the authors of this book (Whipple) who wrote to the Museum in search of the papyri or information pertaining to parts of the Joseph Smith collection. He quickly received word that the Museum did have some papyri from the Smith collection.

This was the first major breakthrough since the Chicago fire. He asked the Museum for a photo of the material they had. They photographed the now famous original to facsimile No. 1 and sent it to his home in southern California. He opened the manila envelope to discover a copy of the same papyrus Dr. Atiya was to see four years later. The author compared the photo of the Museum original with that in the book of Abraham and declared it authentic. For some inexplicable reason, and perhaps because of a "stupor of thought," he did not feel to contact the proper authorities.

Actually he hoped to go to New York and confirm his find further before announcing it to the general public. It was never a secret. On a number of occasions he showed the slick photo to fireside and seminary groups throughout the southern California region, mentioning only that he had found it in an eastern museum. Excitement resulted at each showing, but no one pressed him for the exact location of the record. He later came to realize that the finding of the material by Dr. Atiya, who is a non-Mormon and a known scholar, gave more meaning and better publicity to the discovery than would have been generated on the basis of the author's discovery. (Ibid., pp. 113-114)

Jay M. Todd admits that Walter Whipple knew of the papyri for about five years before Dr. Atiya's "discovery":

Apparently, as early as 1962 a Latter-day Saint who knew the import and value of the papyri learned of their location . . .

Brother Whipple is a master's degree graduate from Brigham Young University and received his degree on the Book of Abraham some years ago. Normally, few people in the world would know the import of such a find more than such a person. However, in hindsight, perhaps it is better that a scholar such as Dr. Atiya made the discovery. Certainly his name has opened many doors and lent much respect to the discovery. (The Saga of the Book of Abraham, pp. 350-351)

Although Dr. Nibley said that "no Latter-day Saint was even aware" of the existence of the papyri prior to Atiya's discovery in 1966, we now have evidence to show that Dr. Nibley himself was told that the papyri were still in existence about three years before Atiya's purported "discovery," and that Nibley already knew from another source that some of Joseph Smith's papyri had been located. A friend of Dr. Nibley's gave us this information in a letter dated August 13, 1968:

I saw photographs of them for the first time in 1963, I believe, . . . I wrote to Nibley that some of the Joseph Smith papyri still existed but that I was not at liberty to say where, and he wrote me about the same time that someone in Utah had located a pile of unpublished Joseph Smith papyri.

This letter proves that Dr. Nibley was aware of the fact that some of Joseph Smith's papyri were still in existence years before Dr. Atiya made his "discovery," although it does not prove that he knew the exact location of the papyri. We have already shown that Dr. Nibley had photographs of the papyri in his possession in 1966. In a letter dated June 27, 1967, however, Nibley claimed he did not know where the original papyri were located. He stated: "I actually don't know where the original PGP Mss are, though I could find out easily enough; so far my ignorance has served me well" (Letter from Hugh Nibley to Dee Jay Nelson, dated June 27, 1967).

Glen Wade says that on August 11, 1967, Dr. Nibley "indicated that he personally did not know their location or ownership but that he was quite certain of their preservation" (Dialogue: A Journal of Mormon Thought, Winter 1967, p. 54). It is certainly odd that Nibley would not know the location of the papyri at that time. Dr. Atiya was supposed to have discovered them in the spring of 1966, and they were turned over to the church on November 27, 1967. Dr. Nibley apparently received photographs of the papyri right after the "discovery," for he had them in his possession in the "summer of 1966."

Now that we know more of the facts concerning the discovery of the papyri, we see that Dr. Nibley's statement that "no Latter-day Saint was even aware of their existence" prior to the time Atiya discovered them is untrue. Walter Whipple had found them in 1962, and Dr. Nibley himself was told that the papyri were in existence about three years before the purported discovery, though he may not have known the exact location at that time. The statement that "he [Nibley] wrote me about the same time that someone in Utah had located a pile of unpublished Joseph Smith papyri" may refer to the fragments found in the Metropolitan Museum, or it could be possible that more of Joseph Smith's collection has been located in another place. The more we learn about this whole transaction the more suspicious we become of Dr. Atiya's purported discovery.

Be this as it may, by October 1967 a number of people were searching for the papyri. Finally, one of Dr. Nibley's friends revealed some numbers that had to do with an indexing system to a friend of ours. This information was sent to us in a letter dated October 10, 1967. According to this same letter, Dr. Nibley's friend claimed that "Nibley got these photos about two years ago through the intermediary of a Prof. Aryah (?), Arabic Studies, at the U. Of Utah." It did not take long to figure out that "Prof. Aryah" was probably Dr. Atiya. A friend of ours called Dr. Atiya, read him the numbers and asked him if he knew where the papyri were located. Dr. Atiya pretended that he did not. He stated that a university in the eastern part of the United States might be able to help us. This statement was evidently an attempt to throw us off the track. This university, of course, answered that they knew nothing about the papyri.

We do not know whether Dr. Atiya told the Mormon leaders that we had access to the numbers, but by this time they must have been well aware that we were about to find out where the papyri were located. We turned the numbers over to Wesley P. Walters—one of the best authorities on Mormon history. It did not take him long to figure out that the indexing numbers were those of a large museum. By November 23, 1967, Wesley P. Walters had written to the Metropolitan Museum. On November 28, 1967, Henry G. Fischer answered his letter:

In reply to your letter of November 23, the first column of numbers (155434-44) refers to our photograph negatives, while the others (47.102.1-11) are accession numbers.

It is curious that you should inquire about these fragments just now, for they were turned over to the Mormon Church yesterday. As you probably know, they once belonged to Joseph Smith and the vignette of one of them appears in his Pearl of Great Price. (Letter from Henry G. Fischer, dated November 28, 1967)

The reader will notice that Fischer refers to Walters' "letter of November 23." Now, we may never know just which day Walters' letter was received, but it was only four days later that the Metropolitan Museum presented the papyri to the church. While we cannot prove that Walters' letter forced the transaction, it is logical to assume that neither the church nor the Metropolitan Museum would have wanted the opponents of Mormonism to have been the first to announce the discovery.

Many people have wondered how the church leaders were able to persuade the Metropolitan Museum of Art to give them the papyri. Although the whole transaction is shrouded in secrecy, a few clues have begun to leak out.

Dr. Atiya states that after he learned of the papyri he met with N. Eldon Tanner, a member of the First Presidency of the Mormon Church. According to Atiya, President Tanner stated that the church “would do anything or pay any price for them” (Improvement Era, January 1968, p. 14). In a speech delivered at the University of Utah on May 20, 1968, Dr. Atiya stated: “. . . I tried to persuade the Egyptian people, the Egyptologists, in the Museum of Art to accept a nice little statue which I would buy for them—$15,000, $25,000, whatever the price.” In the same speech, Dr. Atiya admitted that “the whole discovery was kept in secret.” In another speech on April 3, 1970, Dr. Atiya remarked:

I said to the fellows in the Egyptological Department, “What do you want to do with these papyri? You’ve mountains of other papyri . . . How about me trying to persuade the Church . . . to give you a nice bust or statue of artistic value from the Dynastic age, in exchange for these worthless things.” . . . I said, “Would you give me permission and authority to play the game on the First Presidency and get you that statue in exchange for these worthless documents?” They said, “Oh yes, yes indeed . . . on the one condition, that you should not divulge the whereabouts of these documents until the whole deal is concluded.”

This . . . put me in the limelight in spite of my own volition. I didn’t want to be in the limelight, but there it is, you see. (Book of Abraham Symposium, April 3, 1970, Salt Lake Institute of Religion, pp. 40-41)

Glen Wade made this statement concerning Dr. Atiya’s attempt to get the papyri from the Metropolitan Museum:

His approach included avoiding publicity at all costs. Only Mrs. Peirce had been told of the actual location of the papyri, and she kept the secret well. . . . He first suggested to museum officials that an exchange of gifts might be appropriate, . . . The museum officials soon agreed that the proper home for the collection was with the Church and that even an exchange of gifts would be unnecessary. (Dialogue: A Journal of Mormon Thought, Winter 1967, p. 53)

Henry G. Fischer, Curator of Egyptian Art at the Metropolitan Museum, stated that someone made “an anonymous donation” to the Museum, and because of this donation they were able to give the papyri to the church:

DIALOGUE: Is this a standard practice to give such documents to interested private institutions such as the Church?

FISCHER: I am glad you asked that question, since, technically, we have not given the documents to the Church. As far as the Church is concerned, it is a gift, of course, but it was made possible by an anonymous donation which covered the cost to the Museum. We have not set a precedent for giving away an object; we cannot be in that position.

DIALOGUE: Would you say that the Church does not have complete ownership? Is there a way by which these documents could be called back?

FISCHER: No, absolutely not. They are a gift from the Museum, but the gift was made possible because of an anonymous donation from a friend of ours. (Dialogue: A Journal of Mormon Thought, Winter 1967, p. 64)

We feel that there is probably much more to this story; the whole matter needs to be clarified.

Other Papyri Suppressed

Another thing that casts a shadow of doubt on Dr. Atiya’s purported discovery is the fact that the Mormon Church itself has an actual piece of papyrus from Joseph Smith’s collection which they suppressed for 130 years. In 1966 we printed Joseph Smith’s Egyptian Alphabet and Grammar, which included a photograph of this fragment. Grant Heward identified it as an actual fragment of papyrus, and in our paper, The Salt Lake City Messenger, for April, 1966, we stated that the Egyptian Alphabet and Grammar included a “photograph of an actual piece of papyrus which may be part of the ‘Book of Abraham’ or the ‘Book of Joseph!’” After suppressing the fragment for so many years the Mormon leaders have finally decided to make it available. Dr. Hugh Nibley made this comment concerning it: “This fragment has been preserved in the Church Historian’s Office through the years among Joseph Smith’s papers, including the so-called Egyptian Alphabet and Grammar” (Brigham Young University Studies, Winter 1968, article by Hugh Nibley).

Below is a photograph of this fragment as it appeared in the Brigham Young University Studies.

A good photograph of this fragment was also published in the Improvement Era, February 1968, page 40-H. The Church Section of the Deseret News carried this statement on February 10, 1968:

An interesting development in the work going on at BYU by Dr. Hugh Nibley on the papyri fragments turned over to the Church by the New York Museum of Art is the locating of another fragment in the vaults at the Church Historian’s office.

The latest “find” has been in the vaults as long as A. William Lund and Earl E. Olson, assistant Church historians, can remember. Mr. Lund has been in his post since 1911 and worked in the office since 1908. Mr. Olson has been in the historian’s office since 1934.

The fragment is part of a collection the Church has regarding the Egyptian Alphabet and Grammar prepared by the Prophet Joseph Smith. (Deseret News, Church Section, February 10, 1968, p. 5)

It is strange that the Mormon leaders had to wait for almost two years after we published a photograph of this fragment to announce their important “find.” The reader may wonder why the church leaders did not announce this “find” at the time of the Spalding controversy. The answer now becomes rather obvious, it is in reality a fragment from the Egyptian “Book of the Dead” and has nothing to do with Abraham or Joseph. According to Jay M. Todd, Dr. Nibley admits that it is from the Book of the Dead: “. . . Hugh Nibley asserts that the Church Historian’s fragment is from the Book of the Dead” (Improvement Era, February 1968, p. 40-B).

That the Mormon leaders were deliberately suppressing this fragment is very obvious. An Egyptologist told us that a number of years ago he wrote to the Historian’s Office and asked them if they had any of Joseph Smith’s papyri. They replied that they did not.

It is interesting to note that the Mormon writer Jay M. Todd now admits that Dr. James R. Clark, of Brigham Young University, knew about this fragment for thirty years but was told to suppress this information:

Outside of a few associates, Dr. Clark had kept the fragment a matter of confidence, under instructions from the

Historian's Office, for over 30 years. (The Saga of the Book of Abraham, p. 364)

We feel that this may throw a great deal of light upon the reason Walter Whipple did not publicly announce his discovery of the papyri at the Metropolitan Museum in 1962. He had studied under James R. Clark at Brigham Young University, and Dr. Clark had even signed his thesis. Now, if Dr. Clark ever discussed the fragment in the Historian's Office with Walter Whipple, he would have probably told him to keep the matter quiet—that the church did not want critics to learn that any of Joseph Smith's papyri were still in existence. With this type of training at BYU, it is easy to understand that when Walter Whipple later discovered the papyri at the Metropolitan Museum, he had a "stupor of thought" and did not announce the discovery to the world. He probably reasoned that if the church would go to such lengths to hide the small fragment of papyrus which they possessed, they certainly would not want photographs of the 11 fragments to fall into the hands of the critics.

Walter Whipple claims his discovery "was never a secret. On a number of occasions he showed the slick photo [of the original of Fac. No. 1] to fireside and seminary groups throughout the southern California region. . . ."

Mr. Whipple says nothing about contacting his former instructors at BYU or the Church Historian's Office, but even if he had, he probably would have been advised to keep the discovery a "matter of confidence."

However this may be, the Church Historian's Office may still be suppressing important information with regard to the Book of Abraham controversy. It is possible that they have more papyri, drawings of the papyri or other related material. The following is found in the book, From the Dust of Decades, page 86:

At least most of the papyri was held by the prophet's widow. A recent article in the Era tells of one papyrus fragment held in the Church Historian's office for longer than anyone can remember. A few years ago one visitor to the Church Historian's office was shown two or three other fragments of hieroglyphic drawings. What relationship they have with the one spoken of in the Era is unknown. These fragments, with the other one, have a very obscure history.

In a footnote on page 177 of this same book, we learn that it was "Walter Whipple" himself who "viewed these." On page 116 of the same book we find this statement:

Confident that only a portion of the original Smith collection had been retrieved with the Atiya find, scholars have kindled much enthusiasm to search out the remainder of the papyri. Some feel there are possibly 19 pieces, others maintain there are 22 fragments yet to be found.

The reader will remember that we cited the following letter written by a friend of Dr. Nibley's:

I saw photographs of them [i.e., the fragments in the Metropolitan Museum] for the first time in 1963, I believe, . . . I wrote to Nibley that some of the Joseph Smith papyri still existed but that I was not at liberty to say where, and he wrote me about the same time that someone in Utah had located a pile of unpublished Joseph Smith papyri.

Some people feel that the "pile of unpublished papyri" may refer to another discovery which has not been made public. Dr. Nibley himself has hinted on a number of occasions that more papyri have been rediscovered. So far, however, we have not been able to track anything down. It could be, as one Egyptologist has intimated, that the rest of the papyri are already "in the LDS archives in Salt Lake."

No Gift to Translate

After receiving the papyri from the Metropolitan Museum, the Mormon leaders turned them over "to Dr. Hugh Nibley, scholar, linguist at Brigham Young University, . . . for further research and study" (Improvement Era, February 1968, p. 13). This turned out to be a very serious mistake.

To begin with, the fact that the papyri were turned over to Dr. Nibley is almost an admission that the church leaders are not led by revelation as they have claimed. The reader will remember that the church is led by a man who is sustained by the people as "Prophet, Seer, and Revelator." The Book of Mormon states that a "seer" can translate ancient records: ". . . he has wherewith that he can look, and translate all records that are of ancient date; and it is a gift from God. And the things are called interpreters, . . . And whosoever is commanded to look in them, the same is called seer" (Mosiah 8:13). According to Joseph Fielding Smith, who became the tenth President of the Church in 1970, the "seer stone which was in the possession of the Prophet Joseph Smith in early days . . . is now in the possession of the Church" (Doctrines of Salvation, vol. 3, p. 225). The Apostle John A. Widtsoe said that if "records appear needing translation, the President of the Church may at any time be called, through revelation, to the special labor of translation" (Evidences and Reconciliations, vol. 1, p. 203). Since the church claims to have the "seer stone" and is supposed to be led by a "Prophet, Seer, and Revelator," we might expect a translation by this means. Instead, however, the papyri were sent to Dr. Nibley to be translated by "the wisdom of the world." Thus, it appears that the church does not have the gift to translate languages as it has claimed. It is interesting to note that the Mormon leaders have criticized other churches because they did not have this gift.

In 1878 the Mormon Apostle Orson Pratt stated:

The Prophet translated . . . the Book of Abraham. Thus you see one of the first gifts bestowed by the Lord..the gift to translate, by the aid of the Urim and Thummim, the gift of bringing to light old and ancient records. Have any of the other denominations got this gift among them? Go and inquire through all of Christendom... "Can you translate ancient records written in a language that is lost to the knowledge of man?" "No," . . . the universal reply of the Christian denominations, numbering some 400,000,000, would be that they have not the power to do it. . . . you must give us credit of at least professing to have these great and important gifts, . . . any consistent religious man..would say in his own mind, it is more consistent for us to have Revelators, Prophets, Seers and Translators . . . than to depend upon Revelators and Seers of former ages. (Journal of Discourses, vol. 20, pp. 65-67)

Since the Mormon leaders did not seem to have the gift to translate the papyri themselves, they should have turned the job over to qualified Egyptologists. Both Dr. Sperry and Dr. Clark, of the Brigham Young University, had recommended that the church get a noted Egyptologist to work with the papyri (see our Case, vol. 2, p. 139). The General Authorities did not follow this recommendation by their own scholars. Instead they turned the whole matter over to Dr. Nibley of Brigham Young University. Now there is little doubt that Dr. Nibley is a brilliant man, and that he knows several different languages. The Editor of the Improvement Era claimed that he "actively uses the Latin, Greek, Hebrew, Syriac, Babylonian, Russian, French, German, Arabic and Coptic languages" (Improvement Era, January 1968, p. 19). While it may be true that Dr. Nibley knows several different languages, this did not qualify him to deal with the Egyptian language. Samuel A. B. Mercer, who knew several different languages himself, stated that "Egyptian is difficult" (An Egyptian Grammar, New York, 1961, Preface). It takes many years of experience for a person to become skilled in working with the Egyptian language. Dr. Nibley has taken some classes in the Egyptian language. In fact, after he received photographs of the papyri, he went back to the University of Chicago to study under Dr. Wilson. He was evidently trying to get a lead over his opponents before the existence of the papyri became generally known. Unfortunately for the Mormon position, however, even this special training was not sufficient to qualify him for the job of translating the papyri.

Nibley Not An Egyptologist

In the Improvement Era for February, 1968, p. 40, the Editor stated that Dr. Hugh Nibley "has been assigned by the Church to direct the investigation and research being done on the material." In the January issue we were assured that Dr. Nibley "is eminently qualified for the project he has undertaken." In the February issue of the same publication we were told that Dr. Nibley was going to unfold “the meaning of the hieroglyphics and illustrations on these valuable manuscripts” (p. 40-H). In a letter to the Editor of the Deseret News, December 27, 1976, Julian R. Durham boasted: “Today the papyri are in the hands of one of the best qualified Egyptologists in the world, Hugh Nibley, a foremost church scholar who has demonstrated on an intellectual basis the capabilities of Joseph Smith in language studies.”

Before Egyptologists published translations of the Mormon Papyri, Dr. Nibley gave only one public demonstration of his ability to unfold the meaning of the Egyptian writing on the papyri. It appears in Brigham Young University Studies, Winter 1968, p. 246:

This fragment, . . . belongs to the same roll as the other hieratic papyri, as is apparent from recurring elements of the owner’s name, that appears a number of times in full in the other fragments . . . which may be “translated” as something like “The Osiris Daughter of Min, true of word (or justified, deceased, triumphant, etc., i.e., tested and found true and faithful), declared blessed (as a dead person, the word being written merely by a stroke, since the proper hieroglyph was considered magically dangerous), belonging to Khons (or in the company of Khons, the moon-god), justified.” Or, simply as a name, something like Taimin Mutninesikhonsu.

Dr. Nibley’s translation is used in an article in the Improvement Era, February 1968, page 40: “The writings on the recently recovered fragment show that all of these Book of the Dead papyri belonged to the lady Taimin Mutninesikhonsu.”

After Egyptologists published their translations of the papyri, it became apparent that Dr. Nibley had made a serious error with regard to the name. He had actually combined two names—i.e., a mother and her daughter—into one name. In addition, he had included characters separating the two names which should have been translated as “born to” or “daughter of” as part of the name. According to Richard A. Parker, Chairman of the Department of Egyptology at Brown University, the characters which Nibley “translated” should actually be read: “Ta-sherit-Min, daughter of Neskhons” (Dialogue: A Journal of Mormon Thought, Summer 1968, p. 87). Dr. Nibley, however, has combined the whole thing into one giant name—“Taimin Mutninesikhonsu.” The Egyptologist John A. Wilson, of the University of Chicago, agreed with Richard Parker on the translation of these characters. He also renders them as two separate names: “Document B is a Book of the Dead composed for a lady named Ta-shere-Min (the Daughter of the god Min’), born to the lady Nes-Khonsu (‘She Belongs to the god Khonsu’)” (Dialogue: A Journal of Mormon Thought, Summer 1968, p. 71).

Although Dr. Nibley has never publicly admitted this mistake, an article by Carma de Jong Anderson makes it clear that by June 1968, Nibley had come to accept the fact that the characters should be translated as two names: “According to Dr. Nibley, the princess’ actual given name was Ta-Sherit-Min; she was a daughter of Nesikhonsu” (The Instructor, an LDS Church magazine, June 1968, p. 248, footnote).

Although Dr. Nibley had taken some classes in the Egyptian language, he was not qualified to translate the papyri. He admitted this in a letter to Dee Jay Nelson that was dated just a few months before the discovery of the papyri was announced (see photograph on page 308 of this book):

I don’t consider myself an Egyptologist at all, and don’t intend to get involved in the P.G.P. business unless I am forced into it—which will probably be sooner than that. . . . As you know, this is a happy hunting ground for crackpots, and not being certified in anything in particular I only rush in where fools fear to tread. . . . As you know, there are parties in Salt Lake who are howling for a showdown on the P.G.P.; . . . the nice thing about discussion is that one never knows where it is going to lead—that is why the experts are avoiding it as much as I am; . . . (Letter written by Dr. Hugh Nibley, dated June 27, 1967)

When Dr. Nibley speaks of the “P.G.P.” he is referring to the Pearl of Great Price which, of course, contains the Book of Abraham. Even though Nibley claimed that he was not an Egyptologist and that he did not intend to get involved in the argument concerning the authenticity of the Book of Abraham, he allowed himself to become more deeply involved defending the Book of Abraham than anyone else in the church. He has written articles for the Improvement Era, Brigham Young University Studies, Dialogue: A Journal of Mormon Thought and Sunstone.

Dr. Nibley began a series of articles for the Improvement Era in January, 1968. This series ran for over two years, and was finally brought to a conclusion with the issue published May, 1970. Although Nibley was supposed to unfold “the meaning of the hieroglyphics” in this series of articles, no translation of the Joseph Smith Papyri ever appeared. It is very obvious that Nibley’s main objective in this series was to blind the eyes of his fellow church members so that they could not see the real issues involved in this matter. Although he used almost 2,000 footnotes, he never did deal with the main problem.

Dr. Nibley gave this excuse for not translating the papyri in an article published in Brigham Young University Studies, Spring 1968, page 251:

We have often been asked during the past months why we did not proceed with all haste to produce a translation of the papyri the moment they came into our possession. Well, for one thing others are far better equipped to do the job than we are, and some of those early expressed a willingness to undertake it. But, more important, it is doubtful whether any translation could do as much good as harm.

In the Salt Lake Tribune for November 11, 1973, we criticized Dr. Nibley for not producing a translation of the papyri. He replied that he had prepared a book which “is 800 pages long, but that is not enough to account for keeping the impatient Tanners waiting for six years. What took up all that time was having to find out about a lot of things” (Salt Lake Tribune, November 25, 1973). This book, which many people believed would answer the objections of the critics and save the Book of Abraham, was finally published by the church’s Deseret Book Company in 1975 under the title, The Message of the Joseph Smith Papyri: An Egyptian Endowment. Although the First Presidency of the Church assigned Dr. Nibley to work on the papyri, they were reluctant to give his work any real official endorsement. When John L. Smith asked about Nibley’s new book, Francis M. Gibbs, secretary to the First Presidency, sent him a reply in which he stated: “. . . the writings of Dr. Hugh Nibley concerning the papyri scrolls have been done entirely on his own responsibility and do not have the official approval and sanction of the Church” (Letter dated August 22, 1975).

Although Hugh Nibley’s book is nicely printed and bound, the contents are very disappointing. Of the eleven fragments of papyrus which were discovered, ten of them contain significant Egyptian messages which can be translated. We would expect that any book about the papyri would at least have a translation of all these pieces. Dr. Nibley’s book, however, only contains a translation of two fragments! Nibley’s work on these two fragments does not provide us with any real test of his ability as a translator, since they were already translated by noted Egyptologists seven years prior to the time he published his book. It is interesting to note that Dr. Nibley had previously condemned the Egyptologist Samuel A. B. Mercer for passing up the opportunity of translating a text before other scholars worked on it:

. . . here was his first great chance to shine as a linguist and a scholar. . . . But never a word of translation or commentary from Mercer. . . . as to the linguistic aspects of the thing—complete silence. . . . Indeed, we have been unable to find a translation by Mercer of any Egyptian writing that had not already been translated and published by someone else. (Improvement Era, June 1968, p. 18)

Dr. Nibley has given almost a perfect description of his own situation. He has had all the advantages—i.e., classes in Egyptian at the University of Chicago; photographs of the papyri long before the others; and even the original papyri to work with. Yet, up until 1975, he did not contribute anything except a name which proved to be wrong. Finally, after the papyri had “already been translated and published by someone else,” he brought forth his own “translation” of just two of the ten translatable fragments. Among the fragments which Dr. Nibley has not translated is the original of “Facsimile No. 1” in the Book of Abraham. This fragment contains a number of lines of hieroglyphs which relate to the meaning of the drawing. The reason Dr. Nibley has not translated these lines seems obvious: they show that “Facsimile No. 1” is not a picture of “Abraham fastened upon an altar” as Joseph Smith proclaimed, but rather a picture of an Egyptian by the name of Hor being prepared for burial. We will have more to say about this later.

Those of us who have purchased Dr. Nibley’s writings in the Improvement Era, the BYU Studies and now his new book, which sells for $14.95, have spent at least $30.00. What do we have to show for this investment? We have hundreds of pages of material with thousands of footnotes, but we have a translation of only two of the fragments of papyrus and no answer to the main problems about the Book of Abraham. To say the least, Dr. Nibley’s book contains some very serious errors (see the Salt Lake City Messenger, April 1976). Michael Marquardt has prepared a good rebuttal entitled, The Book of Abraham Papyrus Found: An Answer to Dr. Hugh Nibley’s Book ‘The Message of the Joseph Smith Papyri: An Egyptian Endowment.’

As we have already shown, Dr. Nibley’s book was published in 1975. In 1979, however, he spoke at the Sunstone Theological Symposium and his statements seem to discredit his own book:

I refuse to be held responsible for anything I wrote more than three years ago. For heaven’s sake, I hope we are moving forward here. After all, the implication that one mistake and it is all over with—how flattering to think in forty years I have not made one slip and I am still in business! I would say that about four fifths of everything I put down has changed, of course. (Sunstone, December 1979, p. 49)

Dr. Nibley’s attempt to back off from things he had written before 1976 was the result of criticism he received in a paper written by Edward H. Ashment, a Mormon Egyptologist who works for the Translation Department of the church. A person who carefully examines this article—especially the footnotes—will find that it is actually a devastating attack on the work of Hugh Nibley. For example, in BYU Studies, Autumn 1968, page 95, Nibley claimed that “no clear instances” of restoration have been demonstrated in Facsimile No. 1. To this Ashment responds:

In relation to the lion-couch scene of Facsimile 1 (Plate 1) it has been claimed that “no clear instances” of restoration “have been demonstrated.” However, close examination of the evidence leads to the conclusion that such instances indeed are demonstrable. (Sunstone, December 1979, p. 33)

It seems that Ashment has demolished Nibley’s arguments at every turn. In his reply to Ashment Nibley conceded:

Since hearing Brother Ashment I have to make some changes in what I have said already. Do I have to hang my head and go hide or something like that because I have been discredited? These things are being found out all the time. There are lots of things that Brother Ashment pointed out that I should have noticed; but I notice I could point out a lot of things that he has not noticed.... the main thing is to move on into unexplored territory, and go into it with the careful, meticulous examination that he has. (Ibid., p. 51)

Dr. Nibley would have us believe that the science of Egyptology is in a constant state of upheaval. Now, while it is true that there will always be refinements, the basic principles remain the same. We feel that the constant state of confusion that Nibley finds himself in is caused by his attempt to defend a work of Joseph Smith’s own imagination. While our case against the Book of Abraham stands on the same unshakable foundation it did 13 years ago, Dr. Nibley has to constantly change his ideas. First, he was going to answer the critics in the Improvement Era. When this did not work, he prepared a book which “is 800 pages long”—actually 305 large

ERNEST L. WILKINSON, PRESIDENT

COLLEGE OF RELIGIOUS INSTRUCTION

June 27, 1967

Dear Bro. Nelson,

Brother, you HAVE been around! But I am willing to bet you that you have reach<sup>d</sup> premature conclusions about the hypocephalus. The Church has actually been able to procure some jars and other artifacts from Qumran, and there MAY be some Ms fragments in the collection: there are complications there that I can't go into. I don't consider myself an Egyptologist at all, and don't intend to get involved in the P.G.P. business unless I am forced into it--which will probably be sooner than that. I actually don't know where the original PG P<sup>r</sup>Ms are, though I could find out easily enough; so far my ignorance has served me well. I see no reason in the world why you should not be taken into the confidence of the Brethren if this thing ever comes out into the open; in fact, you should be enormously useful to the Church. I have an enormous collection of notes which has been building up through the years, and I think there is stuff in it that would surprise and even convince you. As you know, this is a happy hunting-ground for crackpots, and not being certified in anything in particular I only rush in where fools fear to tread. I would like very much to see you (I was in Billings last Thursday!) and hope that we may collide before too long: this is the sort of thing that has to be discussed ~~makshufan wa maktuman~~ <sup>in one place together</sup>. As you know, there are parties in Salt Lake who are howling for a showdown on the P.G.P.; if they have their way we may have to get together. Well, the nice thing about discussion is that one never knows where it is going to lead--that is why the experts are avoiding it as much as I am; what is even more wholesome, all discussion quickly discloses interesting gaps and defects in the knowledge of even the total authority. What have we to lose?

Yours,

printed pages. Four years later, however, he says that “I refuse to be held responsible for anything I wrote more than three years ago.” After all this one would think that Dr. Nibley would give up, but instead he threatens the critics with the possibility of still another book: “Of these things and much, much more we speak in what we hope is a forthcoming book” (Ibid., p. 51).

At any rate, the Mormon leaders evidently did not want non-Mormon Egyptologists to translate the papyri. They could have sent the original papyri to the University of Chicago so that Dr. Wilson could have worked with them, but instead they brought them to the Brigham Young University. In a letter written December 4, 1967, Henry G. Fisher, of the Metropolitan Museum, stated: “We have not been commissioned to translate the papyri, nor do I know of anyone else who has been asked to do so.”

One of the editors of Dialogue: A Journal of Mormon Thought told us that he feared an open confrontation with the Mormon leaders because of the plan to publish the translations. The General Authorities of the church, however, must have realized that it would not be wise to oppose the publication and therefore let the matter pass in silence.

Dr. Nelson?

Since the Mormon leaders did not want to entrust the papyri to non-Mormon scholars for translation, they dropped them in the lap of Hugh Nibley. Nibley realized that he was not really qualified to make a translation and that he was faced with a serious problem. He sought help, therefore, from a Mormon elder by the name of Dee Jay Nelson. In a letter dated June 27, 1967, he told Nelson that he could “see no reason in the world why you should not be taken into the confidence of the Brethren if this thing ever comes out into the open; in fact, you should be enormously useful to the Church . . . there are parties in Salt Lake who are howling for a showdown on the P.G.P.; if they have their way we may have to get together.”

On January 4, 1968, Dee Jay Nelson visited with Dr. Nibley at Brigham Young University and examined the original papyri. Dr. Nibley agreed that Nelson should translate the papyri, and he sent a note to N. Eldon Tanner, a member of the First Presidency, stating that “it would be a good idea to let Prof. Dee J. Nelson have copies” of the papyri. This was before the Mormon leaders allowed photographs of all the papyri to be published. Mr. Nelson translated the papyri, but he was unable to find any mention of Abraham or his religion in any portion of the papyri. He found the names of many pagan gods who were worshiped by the Egyptians but nothing concerning the God of Abraham. After completing his translation, Mr. Nelson contacted us and asked if we wanted to print it. Since the translation proved unfavorable to the church, it was obvious that the church would not print it. When we completed the publication we tried to advertise it in the Deseret News but church leaders would not allow the ad to be run.

At the time Nelson made his translation he did not claim to have a doctor’s degree in Egyptology, but stated that he learned the ancient language in Egypt while working under Zakaria Goneim, keeper of antiquities at the Necropolis of Saqqara. Since we knew that Dee Jay Nelson did not have a doctor’s degree, we never referred to him as “Dr. Nelson.” Because of Nelson’s ability, however, some people began to assume that he had such a degree. In 1970 the Mormon scholar Richley H. Crapo, a student of the Book of Abraham controversy, referred to “Dr. D. J. Nelson, a philologist and member of the L.D.S. Church . . .” (Book of Abraham Symposium, April 3, 1970, p. 27). In the same symposium, the Mormon scholar John Tvedtnes corrected the error. He said that Mr. Nelson “has no doctorate,” although he maintained that his “competence in both Egyptian and Semitic languages is unquestioned . . .” (Ibid., p. 70). At least one anti-Mormon writer fell into the error of giving Nelson a doctorate, and in answer to him even N. Eldon Tanner, a member of the First Presidency of the Mormon Church, replied: “. . . you go to rather extensive means to prove this point by referring to translations made by Dr. Nelson . . .” (Letter dated July 22, 1977).

At first Dr. Nibley endorsed Dee Jay Nelson’s work. In a letter dated October 1, 1968, he referred to Nelson’s “admirable work.” In Brigham Young University Studies, Spring 1968, page 247, Nibley claimed that Nelson’s study was “a conscientious and courageous piece of work . . . a usable and reliable translation of the available papyri . . .” As time went on, however, it became evident that Nelson was moving further from the church. In 1975 he completely left the church. This put Nibley in a difficult position because he had already endorsed his translation of the Joseph Smith Papyri. Any attack on Nelson’s ability to translate Egyptian would have reflected on Nibley’s own knowledge of the subject since he had already said that Nelson’s work was “admirable,” “conscientious,” “courageous,” “usable and reliable.” Furthermore, Nibley would have found it hard to make an issue over Nelson’s lack of a degree in Egyptology. In defending Dr. Robert C. Webb, the phony Egyptologist who fought for the Mormons, Nibley had written that such things were of no real importance in determining truth:

Thus reassured, Bishop Spalding proceeded to demolish R. C. Webb: “We feel that we should be in a better position to judge the value of the opinions of Robert C. Webb, PhD . . . if we were told definitely who he is . . . If Dr. Talmage . . . would inform us what the author’s real name is, where he received his degree, and what academic position he holds, we should be better able to estimate the value of his opinions.” Here it is again: The bishop is not interested in Webb’s arguments and evidence, but in his status and rank—considerations that are supposed to bear no weight whatever with honest searchers after truth—Nullus in verba! What on earth have a man’s name, degree, academic position, and, of all things, opinions, to do with whether a thing is true or not? (Improvement Era, January 1968, p. 22)

As the contention between Nibley and Nelson became more heated, Nibley finally decided to make an issue over his opponents qualifications:

During the past year a large number of people have written me asking me to throw some light on the accusations of fraud and falsification brought against the Book of Abraham by various parties in Salt Lake, and in particular by one D. J. Nelson, a self-styled Egyptologist . . . I say “Self-styled Egyptologist” because I have never been able to discover where Mr. Nelson studied Egyptian, if and where he got his degree, where he has taught, excavated, and above all published. He rightly charges me with being an amateur (so was Edward Meyer), but if that is so fundamental to the question, where are his credentials? (Letter from Hugh Nibley to Pres. Rector, July 22, 1977)

This letter by Dr. Hugh Nibley, which was widely circulated among the Mormon people, had a devastating effect on Dee Jay Nelson. Nelson was already sensitive about the fact that he did not have a degree. Finally, on May 10, 1978, Nelson made a very serious error—he purchased a doctor’s degree from a diploma mill known as Pacific Northwestern University.

On February 13, 1980, we attended a lecture in Brigham City, Utah where we heard Mr. Nelson proclaim he had a Ph.D. in anthropology. We became a little suspicious, however, when he failed to give the name of the school. A few weeks later a woman called us from Arizona and said that Nelson had claimed the school he had attended was in Seattle. When she called information, however, she was unable to locate it. On March 11-12, 1980, we wrote to Nelson asking for documentation which would prove he had a doctor’s degree. Mr. Nelson did send us a photograph of what purports to be his diploma from Pacific Northwestern University. After examining this document and another paper he sent, we became very suspicious that Pacific Northwestern University was not a legitimate university. We contacted a noted educator from the University of Utah who in turn checked with Dr. James Bemis, Executive Director of the Higher Commission of the Northwest Association of Schools and Colleges, and found that Pacific Northwestern University was only a “diploma mill of the worst kind.” We confirmed this report by calling the U.S. Postal Department in Seattle and the King County Attorney’s Office.

In the letter of March 11-12, 1980, we made it clear to Mr. Nelson what we would do if his claim concerning a doctor’s degree could not be substantiated:

It is with great sorrow that I sit down to write this letter to you. I feel, however, as the publisher of four of your booklets I am obligated to find out the truth about certain matters. . . . While it is true that I have never published anything about you having a Dr.'s degree, any statements you have made about this matter subsequent to the translation of the Joseph Smith Papyri could have a tendency to reflect upon my integrity in the eyes of many people.

If I were to overlook misrepresentation on the part of non-Mormon writers I would be operating on a double standard. You will no doubt remember what we wrote about "Dr. Webb"—the great defender of the Mormon faith. . . .

If it turns out that you do not have a Dr.'s degree, honesty would demand that I make a public statement to that effect. Otherwise, I would find myself in the same position as the Mormon leaders who concealed the true identity of "Dr. Webb." It is my firm belief that "there is nothing covered, that shall not be revealed; and hid, that shall not be known." (Matthew 10:26) I feel that the Lord wants Christians to be honest even though it costs us a great deal.

I doubt that the Mormon Church leaders will ever have the courage to directly attack you concerning the issue of credentials because of their use and support of "Dr. Webb." Even Dr. Hugh Nibley defended "Dr. Webb" in the Church's own publication, Improvement Era, . . .

At any rate, even though the Mormon Church will probably remain officially silent concerning your credentials, I feel that my conscience will not allow me to keep silent if there is a problem. I realize, of course, that the question of your credentials does not affect the validity of your translation, and that the Church is in a real bind with regard to the matter since its chief defender, Dr. Hugh Nibley, has written that your work is reliable:

The publication of the Joseph Smith Egyptian Papyri has now begun to bear fruit. Two efforts at translation and commentary have already appeared, the one an example of pitfalls to be avoided, the other a conscientious piece of work for which the Latter-day Saints owe a debt of gratitude to Mr. Dee Jay Nelson. . . . This is a conscientious and courageous piece of work—. . . Nelson has been careful to consult top-ranking scholars where he has found himself in doubt. He has taken the first step in a serious study of the Facsimiles of the Pearl of Great Price, supplying students with a usable and reliable translation of the available papyri that once belonged to Joseph Smith. (Brigham Young University Studies, Spring 1968, pp. 245, 247)

Although we have used your translation of the Joseph Smith Papyri in a number of publications, we do not feel that our case against the Book of Abraham rests upon it. We have the testimony of some of the world's greatest Egyptologists—i.e., Professor Richard Parker of Brown University and Professors Klaus Baer and John A. Wilson (now deceased) of the University of Chicago's Oriental Institute. Even before you came on the scene our friend Grant Heward had identified the papyrus Joseph Smith used in the production of the Book of Abraham as the "Book of Breathings"—a pagan funerary document (see Salt Lake City Messenger, March 1968). I had studied the Egyptian language on my own before you came to Salt Lake and was able to test your work at various points. I knew therefore that it was generally a "reliable translation" as Dr. Nibley has admitted. . . .

Now, concerning your work at Rocky Mountain College: I have called the school and confirmed that you teach "Egyptology" in the "New Horizons" continuing education program. Lorri Keck, the director of this program, informs me that no credit is given for these classes. (I do not accuse you of hiding this fact, because you previously sent me a "Course Schedule" for Spring, 1976, which said the classes were "non-credit.") Mrs. Keck, however, is disturbed because you have been calling yourself a Professor of Egyptology at Rocky Mountain College. . . . Since the classes you teach are "non-credit," this appears to be somewhat misleading. . . .

I must confess that I feel disappointed and sad because of this whole matter—somewhat like the feeling I had when I realized the Book of Mormon was not an authentic ancient document but rather a product of the 19th century. In any case, I feel it is my obligation to make this information available to the public. . . . I am convinced that our case against the Book of Abraham is absolutely devastating, and I would not want to weaken it in any way by trying to cover up or remain silent concerning such an important matter. (Letter from Jerald Tanner to Dee Jay Nelson, March 11-12, 1980)

On March 29, 1980, the Ogden Standard-Examiner printed an article by Charles F. Trentelman which contains the following:

An investigation of the credentials of Dee Jay Nelson . . . shows he does not hold a doctor's degree from a university . . .

The discovery has caused considerable consternation among his supporters in Salt Lake City. . . . Jerald and Sandra Tanner, publishers of numerous books and papers attacking the LDS Church, say they are concerned by claims made by Nelson in recent months.

Mrs. Tanner said they investigated the claims and found Nelson's diploma was from . . . a diploma mill, an operation that sells diplomas without requiring any schooling . . .

Efforts by the Standard-Examiner to contact Nelson have been unsuccessful. His wife says Nelson is in Egypt doing more study. She declined to comment on her husband's credentials except to say Nelson had written a letter to the Tanners, explaining the whole situation . . .

The Standard-Examiner . . . was referred to Dr. Klaus Baer, University of Chicago Oriental Institute, as the leading Egyptologist in the country and the man who, if anyone, would know of Nelson . . .

There are two aspects to the question of Nelson, Baer said. One is Nelson's credentials. The other is the translation of the Book of Abraham papyri and Nelson's ability to prepare it.

Baer said that, so far as he knew, Nelson had no formal education in Egyptian, although "he has certainly learned Egyptian somewhere."

"I describe him as having a good amateur knowledge of Egyptian," Baer said, adding that that does not mean Nelson has a poor knowledge. It is just not professional quality, he said.

"He can translate hieroglyphics, but not without error," Baer said. As to the papyri in question, Baer said Nelson's translation is "essentially" correct.

Baer said he prepared a translation of the same papyri, after being contacted by Nelson in 1968, and the translation says basically the same thing. . . .

In his letter to the Tanners, Nelson describes contacting Pacific Northwestern University in 1977 and inquiring about obtaining a doctorate.

The degree was granted after taking some courses and submitting a thesis, Nelson says in the letter. But the school, Nelson admitted, was not accredited.

Mrs. Tanner told the Standard-Examiner she and her husband tried to find out about Pacific Northwestern University and learned from federal authorities in Seattle that it had been ordered to shut down, although no charges were brought against it.

But, she said, the Tanners are cutting themselves loose from Nelson, stopping sales of his pamphlets and discontinuing all support of him or his lectures.

Although we quoted Nelson's work rather extensively in the 1972 edition of this book, we believe that it would be unwise to continue quoting him in this edition. This is not to say that his work is without merit. On the contrary, Dr. Baer has been quoted in the Ogden Standard-Examiner as saying his translation is "essentially" correct, and in 1968 he remarked:

So far as I know, Nelson, The Joseph Smith Papyri, p. 42, was the first to point out that the bird above the head of Osiris clearly has a human head and therefore must be his ba [spirit]. In "Facsimile No. 1," it is drawn with a falcon's head, and I must confess with some embarrassment that I also "saw" the falcon's head before reading Nelson's study. (Dialogue: A Journal of Mormon Thought, Autumn 1968, p. 118, n. 34)

We have also quoted Dr. Nibley as saying that Nelson produced a “reliable translation.” Although we generally agree with Dr. Nibley’s statement on the reliability of Nelson’s translation, we believe he has dishonored himself by falling into the footsteps of “Robert C. Webb,” the fake “Ph.D.” who defended the church. As we have already pointed out, our case is certainly not based on any one man but stands firmly on the science of Egyptology and on the work of some of the world’s greatest Egyptologists.

Source of Book of Abraham

As we have previously shown, when the papyri were located many members of the Mormon Church felt that Joseph Smith’s work had been vindicated. We quoted Dr. Hugh Nibley, however, as stating that the papyri “do not prove the Book of Abraham is true” and that LDS scholars are “caught flat footed” by the discovery. In an article published in Dialogue: A Journal of Mormon Thought, Dr. Nibley said:

When I first saw photos of the papyri I made myself disagreeable by throwing a great deal of cold water around. For publicity they were great, and as far as I can see their main value is still in calling the attention of Latter-day Saints to the existence of scriptures which they have studiously ignored through the years. (Dialogue, Summer 1968, p. 102)

While Dr. Nibley and a few others may have realized that the papyri could not be used to prove Joseph Smith’s work true, they evidently were not aware of the devastating blow that the papyri were about to deal to the “Book of Abraham.” Within six months from the time the Metropolitan Museum gave the papyri to the church, the Book of Abraham had been proven untrue!

The fall of the Book of Abraham has been brought about by the identification of the fragment of papyrus from which Joseph Smith “translated” the Book of Abraham. Below is a photograph of the right side of this fragment of papyrus.

The identification of this fragment as the original from which Joseph Smith translated the Book of Abraham has been made possible by a comparison with Joseph Smith’s Egyptian Alphabet and Grammar—a document published by Modern Microfilm Company in 1966. Dr. James R. Clark, of the Brigham Young University, gives this information:

... there are in existence today in the Church Historian’s Office what seem to be two separate manuscripts of Joseph Smith’s translations from the papyrus rolls, ... One manuscript is the Alphabet and Grammar ... Within this Alphabet and Grammar there is a copy of the characters, together with their translation of Abraham 1:4-28 only. The second and separate of the two manuscripts contains none of the Alphabet and Grammar but is a manuscript of the text of the Book of Abraham as published in the first installment of the Times and Seasons, March 1, 1842. (The Story of the Pearl of Great Price, Salt Lake City, 1962, pp. 172-173)

The Mormon leaders were either not aware of the fact that the gift of papyri included the fragment which was the basis for the text of the Book of Abraham, or they hoped no one else would notice it. The following statement appeared in the Mormon paper, Deseret News: “As far as has yet been determined, the papyri do not contain any of the original material translated as the Book of Abraham itself” (Deseret News, November 28, 1967).

When the Mormon magazine, Improvement Era, printed photographs of the papyri, the fragment of papyrus from which Joseph Smith translated the Book of Abraham was printed as the very last photograph. It is found on page 41 of the February, 1968, issue, and is labeled: “XI. Small ‘Sensen’ text (unillustrated).”

All of the first two rows of characters on the papyrus fragment can be found in the manuscript of the Book of Abraham that is published in Joseph Smith’s Egyptian Alphabet and Grammar. Below (to the left) is a photograph of the original fragment of papyrus from which Joseph Smith was supposed to have translated the Book of Abraham. To the right is a photograph of the original manuscript of the Book of Abraham as it appears in Joseph Smith’s Egyptian Alphabet and Grammar. We have numbered some of the characters on the first line of the fragment of papyrus so that the reader can compare them with the characters found in the handwritten manuscript.

Above is a photograph of the right side of the original fragment of papyrus from which Joseph Smith was supposed to have translated the Book of Abraham.

To the right is a photograph of the original manuscript of the Book of Abraham as it appears in Joseph Smith’s Egyptian Alphabet and Grammar.

The reader will probably be startled at the large number of English words which Joseph Smith “translated” from each Egyptian character. We will have more to say about this later.

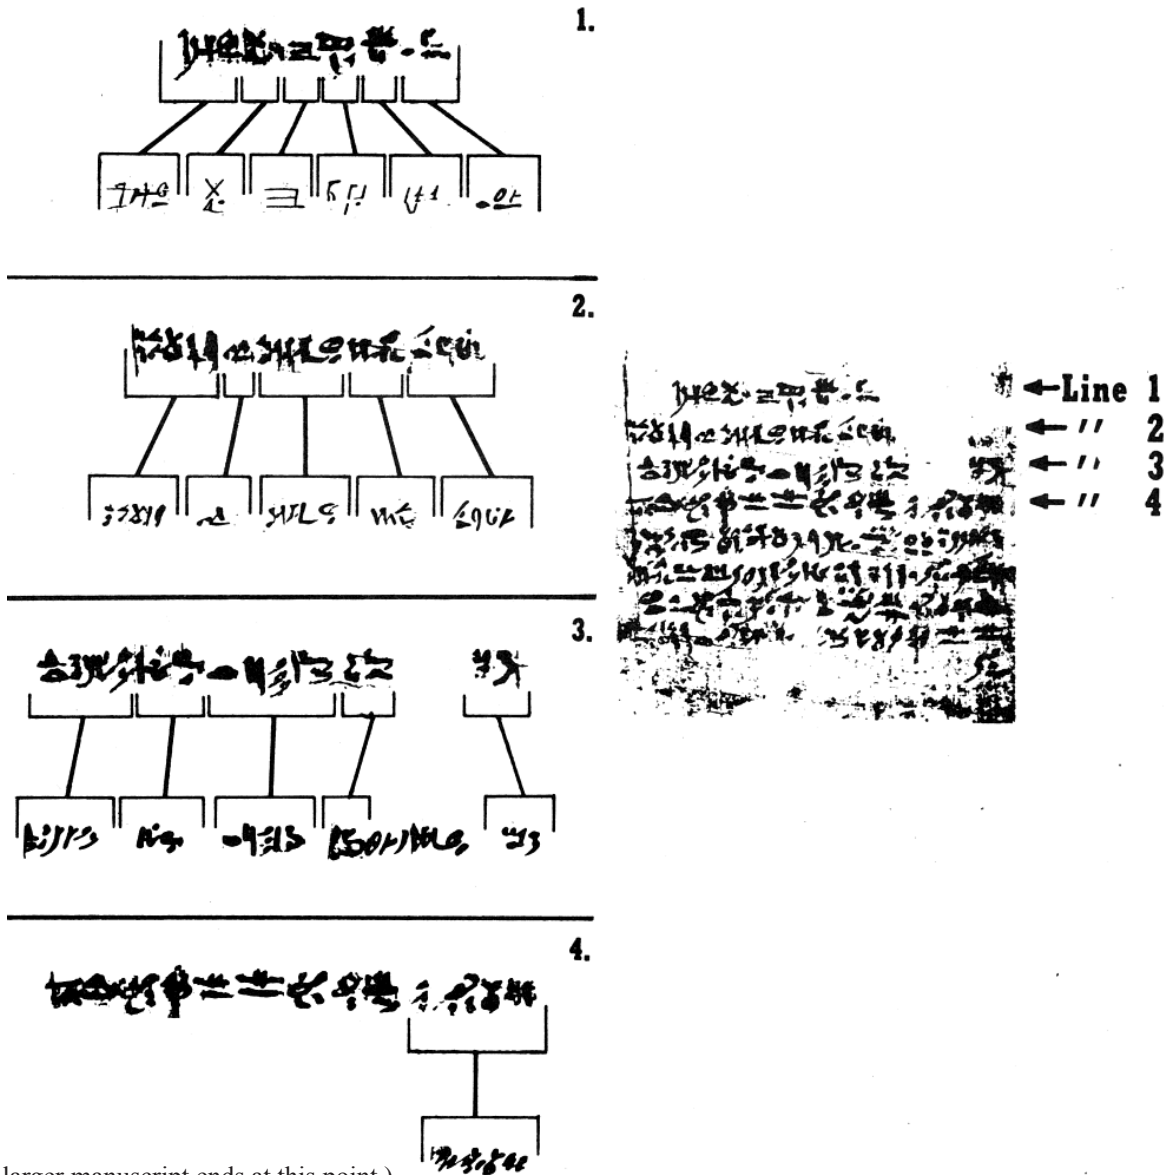

As James R. Clark indicated, there is another manuscript copy of the Book of Abraham in the church Historical Department. Dr. Clark has given this information about this manuscript:

I have in my possession a photostatic copy of the manuscript of the Prophet Joseph Smith’s translation of Abraham 1:1 to 2:18. This manuscript was bought by Wilford Wood in 1945 from Charles Bidamon, son of the man who married Emma after the death of the Prophet. The original of this manuscript is in the Church Historian’s Office in Salt Lake City. The characters from which our present book of Abraham was translated are down the left-hand column and Joseph Smith’s translation opposite, so we know approximately how much material was translated from each character. (Pearl of Great Price Conference, December 10, 1960, 1964 ed., pp. 60-61)

The Brigham Young University had photographs of this manuscript which Grant Heward was able to examine and copy by hand. This manuscript goes further than the one in the “Alphabet and Grammar,” and Mr. Heward has found that the characters on this manuscript continue in consecutive order into the fourth line of the papyrus. This brings the text to Abraham 2:18. This is very interesting because when Joseph Smith printed the first installment of the Book of Abraham in the Times and Seasons, he ended it at this point. We have been able to obtain photographs of this manuscript and can confirm Grant Heward’s statements concerning it. Although a photograph of the first page of this manuscript was published in the Improvement Era, September 1937, page 543, the remaining pages were suppressed, and we had a hard time obtaining photographs of them.

In the illustration below we have taken the characters from the handwritten manuscripts of the Book of Abraham and compared them with the characters which appear on the actual papyrus. The first two lines of the papyrus are compared with characters from Joseph Smith’s Egyptian Alphabet and Grammar. The third and fourth lines are compared with characters from the longer manuscript which we have printed in its entirety in our Case, vol. 2, pp. 147-151 (see photograph of four pages on page 312 of this book). This illustration proves beyond all doubt that Joseph Smith “translated” the Book of Abraham from this fragment of papyrus.

The reader will notice that Joseph Smith used less than four lines from the papyrus to make 49 verses in the Book of Abraham. These 49 verses are composed of more than 2,000 English words! In his book, Ancient Records Testify in Papyrus and Stone, page 79, Dr. Sidney B. Sperry informs us that there are “5,470 words” contained in the text of the Book of Abraham. If Joseph Smith continued to translate the same number of English words from each Egyptian character, then the text for the entire Book of Abraham is probably contained on this one fragment of papyrus.

Klaus Baer, an Egyptologist at the University of Chicago, made this comment concerning the “Sensen” fragment:

Joseph Smith thought that this papyrus contained the Book of Abraham. (Dialogue: A Journal of Mormon Thought, Autumn 1968, p. 111)

In footnote 11 of the same article Klaus Baer asserts:

This identification is now certain. It was immediately evident that “Facsimile From the Book of Abraham No. 1” of the PGP was copied from P. JS I. The interpretation proposed by Joseph Smith for the first two lines of text in P. JS XI corresponds to Abraham 1:4-2:6, see Heward and Tanner, Dialogue, 3 No. 2 (Summer 1968), 93-96, and the discussion on page 129. The fact that the name of the owner is identical in both papyri, and that the left edge of the P. JS I appears to fit the right edge of P. JS XI (see N. 15) — that is, that they are parts of the same scroll — confirms this.

The Mormon scholar Richley Crapo made this observation:

In December of 1967, I was able to examine the original papyri in the vaults of the BYU library and obtain one of the first released sets of photographic copies for extended study. A more careful examination of these revealed the startling fact that one of the papyri of the Church collection, known as the Small Sen-Sen Papyrus, contained the same series of hieratic symbols, which had been copied, in the same order, into the Book of Abraham manuscript next to verses of that book! In other words, there was every indication that the collection of papyri in the hands of the Church contained the source which led to a production of the Book of Abraham. It was naturally this document which I immediately began to translate. (Book of Abraham Symposium, April 3, 1970, p. 27)

In a letter dated March 10, 1971, the noted Mormon scholar Thomas Stuart Ferguson frankly admitted that the source for the text of the Book of Abraham had been identified among the papyrus fragments found at the Metropolitan Museum:

We have now published copies of Joseph Smith’s working notebook that he made up during his struggle with the Egyptian papyrus, the notebook having been published under the title, Joseph Smith’s Alphabet & Grammar. . . . By study of the Grammar, the recovered papyrus, and the illustrations, it is perfectly obvious that we now have the original [sic] manuscript material used by Jos. Smith in working up the Book of Abraham. . . . Since 4 scholars, who have established that they can read Egyptian, say that the manuscripts deal with neither Abraham nor Joseph—and since the 4 reputable men tell us exactly what the manuscripts do say—I must conclude that Joseph Smith had not the remotest skill in things Egyptian—hieroglyphics. To my surprise, one of the highest officials in the Mormon Church agreed with that conclusion when I made that very statement to him on Dec. 4, 1970—privately in one-to-one [c]onversation. . . . Of course the dodge as to the Book of Abraham must be: “We don’t have the original manuscript from which the Book of Abraham was translated.” I conclude that we do have it and have translations of it.

Although Dr. Hugh Nibley later reversed his position in an attempt to save the “Book of Abraham,” in 1968 he admitted that the papyrus which Joseph Smith used for the text of the Book of Abraham had been located. He wrote the following for the Improvement Era, May 1968, p. 54:

. . . the presence on the scene of some of the original papyri, including those used by the Prophet in preparing the text of the Book of Abraham and the Facsimiles with their commentaries, has not raised a single new question, though, as we shall see, it has solved some old ones.

Dr. Nibley made this admission in Dialogue: A Journal of Mormon Thought, Summer 1968, p. 102:

But after all, what do the papyri tell us? That Joseph Smith had them, and that the smallest and most insignificant-looking of them is connected in some mysterious way to the Pearl of Great Price.

At a meeting held at the University of Utah, Dr. Nibley remarked:

Within a week of the publication of the papyri students began calling my attention, in fact, within a day or two, I think it was Wittorf, called my attention to the fact that, the very definite fact that, one of the fragments seemed to supply all of the symbols for the Book of Abraham. This was the little “Sensen” scroll. Here are the symbols. The symbols are arranged here, and the interpretation goes along here and this interpretation turns out to be the Book of Abraham. Well, what about that? Here is the little “Sensen,” because that name occurs frequently in it, the papyrus, in which a handful of Egyptian symbols was apparently expanded in translation to the whole Book of Abraham. This raises a lot of questions. It doesn’t answer any questions, unless we’re mind readers. (Speech given by Hugh Nibley, University of Utah, May 20, 1968)

Book of Breathings

In the Salt Lake City Messenger for March, 1968, we stated that Grant Heward felt that the fragment of papyrus Joseph Smith used as the basis for his Book of Abraham was in reality a part of the Egyptian “Book of Breathings.” This identification has now been confirmed by several prominent Egyptologists.

In order to understand what the “Book of Breathings” is about we must have some understanding of the Egyptian “Book of the Dead.” E. A. Wallis Budge, who was Keeper of the Egyptian and Assyrian Antiquities in the British Museum, explained:

From first to last throughout the Book of the Dead, with the exceptions of Kings Senti and Men-Kau-Ra, and . . . the son of Khufu, the name of no man is mentioned as the author or reviser of any part of it. Certain Chapters may show the influence of the cult of a certain city or cities, but the Book of the Dead cannot be regarded as the work of any one man or body of men, . . . the beliefs of many people and periods are gathered together in it. As a whole, the Book of the Dead was regarded as the work of the god Thoth, the scribe of the gods, . . . in the Book of Breathings, in an address to the deceased it is said, “Thoth, the most mighty god, the lord of Khemenu (Hermopolis), cometh to thee, and he writeth for thee the Book of Breathings with his own fingers.” Copies of the Book of the Dead, and works of a similar nature, were placed either in the coffin with the deceased, or in some part of the hall of the tomb, or of the mummy chamber, generally in a niche which was cut for the purpose. Sometimes the papyrus was laid loosely in the coffin, but more frequently it was placed between the legs of the deceased, . . . before the swathing of the mummy took place. (The Book of the Dead, An English Translation of the Chapters, Hymns, Etc., Of The Theban Recension, With Introduction, Notes, Etc., London, 1901, vol. 1, pp. 50-51 of Introduction)

The Egyptologist James Henry Breasted said that “The magical formulae by which the dead are to triumph in the hereafter become more and more numerous, so that it is no longer possible to record them on the inside of the coffin, but they must be written on papyrus and the roll placed in the tomb. . . . the ‘Book of the Dead’ began to take form. All was dominated by magic; by this all-powerful means the dead might effect all that he desired” (A History of Egypt, New York, 1967, pp. 205-206).

In his book, Development of Religion and Thought in Ancient Egypt, New York, 1969, pages 281-282, Breasted gives this information:

A tendency which later came fully to its own in the Book of the Dead is already the dominant tendency in these Coffin Texts. It regards the hereafter as a place of innumerable dangers and ordeals, . . . The weapon to be employed and the surest means of defence available to the deceased was some magical agency, usually a charm to be pronounced at the critical moment. . . . There was, therefore, a chapter of “Becoming a Magician,” addressed to the august ones who are in the presence of Atum the Sun-god.

On pages 293-296 of the same book, James Henry Breasted makes these comments:

There were sumptuous and splendid rolls, sixty to eighty feet long and containing from seventy-five to as many as a hundred and twenty-five or thirty chapters. . . . The Book of the Dead itself, as a whole, is but a far-reaching and complex illustration of the increasing dependence on magic in the hereafter. . . . Besides many charms which enabled the dead to reach the world of the hereafter, there were those which prevented him from losing his mouth, his head, his heart, others which enabled him to remember his name, to breathe, eat, drink, avoid eating his own foulness, to prevent his drinking-water from turning into flame, to turn darkness into light, to ward off all serpents and other hostile monsters, and many others. The desirable transformations, too, had now increased, and a short chapter might in each case enable the dead man to assume the form of a falcon of gold, a divine falcon, a lily, a Phoenix, a heron, a swallow, a serpent called “son of earth,” a crocodile, a god, and, best of all, there was a chapter so potent that by its use a man might assume any form that he desired.... To call it the Bible of the Egyptians, then, is quite to mistake the function and content of these rolls.

On page 308, Breasted tells us that the “Book of the Dead” is “chiefly a book of magical charms.” Those who have studied the “Book of the Dead” know that it was written by a very superstitious people and is quite different from the religion taught in the Bible. Mormon writers have admitted that this is the case. On page 9 of the Newsletter and Proceedings of the Society for Early Historic Archaeology, Brigham Young University, March 1, 1968, we find this statement:

The Book of the Dead is a collection of ancient Egyptian funerary texts consisting of spells and incantations understood to assist the soul of the departed dead during his perilous journey through the afterlife. It would thus presumably be pagan in spirit and have nothing to do with any scripture written by Abraham.

The “Book of Breathings” is an outgrowth of the Egyptian “Book of the Dead.” It did not appear until the later stages of Egyptian history—just a few centuries before the time of Christ. E. A. Wallis Budge gives this information concerning the “Book of Breathings”:

The “Book of Breathings” is one of a number of short funeral works, . . . it was addressed to the deceased by the chief priest conducting the funeral service. . . . The “Book of Breathings” represents the attempt to include all essential elements of belief in a future life in a work shorter and more simple than the Book of the Dead.... To give the work an enhanced value it was declared to be the production of Thoth, the scribe of the gods. (The Book of the Dead, Facsimiles of the Papyri of Hunefer, Anhai, Kerasher and Netchemet, by E. A. Wallis Budge, London, England, 1899, p. 33)

The fact that the papyrus Joseph Smith used as the basis for his “Book of Abraham” is in reality the “Book of Breathings” cannot be disputed because the name “Book of Breathings” appears clearly on the fourth line of the fragment. Even Dr. Hugh Nibley has translated the words “Book of Breathings” from this fragment of papyrus (see The Message of the Joseph Smith Papyri, p. 20).

In 1968 two Egyptologists from the University of Chicago’s Oriental Institute, Professors John A. Wilson and Klaus Baer, identified the papyrus as the “Book of Breathings.” Professor Richard A. Parker of Brown University also confirmed the fact that what Joseph Smith claimed was the “Book of Abraham” was in reality the “Book of Breathings.” The editors of Dialogue: A Journal of Mormon Thought wrote the following about this matter:

Richard A. Parker is the Wilbour Professor of Egyptology at Brown University. His primary interest is in the later stages of Egyptian language and history. He remarks that the Book of Breathings is a late (Ptolemaic and Romans periods) and greatly reduced version of the Book of the Dead. No comprehensive study of it has yet been undertaken and no manuscript has yet been published adequately. He would provisionally date the two Book of Breathings fragments in the Church’s possession to the last century before or the first century of the Christian era; . . . (Dialogue: A Journal of Mormon Thought, Summer 1968, p. 86)

Written in Hieratic

Before we speak of the actual translation of the “Sensen” fragment, it might be helpful to explain a few things about Egyptian writing.

The “Sensen” fragment is written in a script known as hieratic. Hieratic is a very common form of Egyptian writing which Egyptologists are able to translate. The hieratic writing evolved out of a more ancient system of writing known as hieroglyphic. Hieroglyphic writing was a beautiful method of writing, but it took a great deal of time to make each character and was therefore rather impractical.

In his book, Egyptian Grammar, pages 442-543, Alan Gardiner shows hundreds of hieroglyphs which the Egyptians used in their system of writing. Some of them are very difficult to draw, and it must have required a great deal of patience to chisel them into stone. Because the hieroglyphic system was so difficult to use, the hieratic system began to evolve. James Henry Breasted says:

. . . elaborate hieroglyphic with its numerous animal and human figures, . . . was too slow and labourious a method . . . The attempt to write these figures rapidly with ink upon papyrus had gradually resulted in reducing each sign to a mere outline, much rounded off and abbreviated. This cursive business hand, which we call “hieratic,” . . . developed into a graceful and rapid system of writing, which showed no nearer resemblance to the hieroglyphic than does our own hand-writing to our print. (A History of Egypt, p. 83)

The following are examples of how some of the letters of the Egyptian alphabet were written in hieroglyphs. Directly below each we have shown how they would appear in hieratic, and below this we show how an Egyptologist would transliterate them. The Egyptian letters read from right to left—opposite to English.

The reader will notice that there is a definite relationship between hieroglyphic and hieratic writing. When Egyptologists are working with hieratic writing they convert it into hieroglyphs before attempting to translate.

Egyptian writing is composed of both phonograms and ideograms. Phonograms are “sound-signs,” and ideograms are “signs that convey their meaning pictorially” (Egyptian Grammar, by Alan Gardiner, pp. 25, 30). Usually a word is composed of one or more phonograms (sound-signs) followed by an ideogram. Alan Gardiner states that in such cases the ideogram “is called a determinative, because it appears to determine the meaning of the foregoing sound-signs and to define that meaning in a general way” (Egyptian Grammar, p. 31). The word “sensen” which appears in the text Joseph Smith used for his Book of Abraham will serve to illustrate this matter. (The following is a photograph of it as it appears in the fourth line of this fragment of papyrus.

When this word is converted to hieroglyphs it appears as follows.

In order to read this word we must start at the right side and work to the left. The first letter we find is written in this manner:

⊕ An Egyptologist would transliterate this as s. The next letter is found directly below the first and is written as follows: ~~~~~ This is transliterated as n. Next we find another s and below it another n. Thus we have snsn. The Egyptians did not write the vowels, and therefore we have to supply them. Egyptologists usually insert the English vowel e in these areas. When the vowels are inserted we have the word “sensen,” which means “breathe.” In line four of the fragment of papyrus it is used as part of the name of the book—i.e., “Book of Breathings.”

The last part of this word is the “determinative.” In this case it is a sail. Although it does not enter into the sound of the word, it shows that the word has something to do with wind, breath or air.

While some Egyptian words do not have a determinative, many contain more than one. In fact, there are some words that have three determinatives. Although hieratic writing was easier to use than hieroglyphic, it was still inferior to Greek or Hebrew writing.

Finding the Key

After Mr. Heward identified the “Sensen” fragment as part of the “Book of Breathings,” he began to translate some of the words found in the text. This was a difficult task because the writing is coarse and somewhat damaged. Nevertheless, he was rather successful in his endeavor. In a letter to Henry G. Fischer, dated March 5, 1968, Grant Heward stated:

On the right side of the fragment . . . I seem to find what my dictionary calls “Lake of Honsu” plus ???! Perhaps “born to” on the right end of the second; “Limbs, heart and funerary wrappings” on the third, and going on to the fourth; It looks like the Book of Breathings in the fourth; I think I see “royal linen and give” in the fifth; “Heart” again on the sixth; “Funerary wrapping and book” on the next; and eternity on the last.

We tried to find the exact location of the text in the papyrus of Kerasher, but we were unsuccessful. Although Dr. Nibley had had photographs of the Mormon Papyri since 1966, he was unable to find the location of the text. He stated:

It has long been known that the characters “interpreted” by Joseph Smith in his Egyptian Alphabet and Grammar are treated by him as super-cryptograms; and now it is apparent that the source of those characters is the unillustrated fragment on which the word Sen-sen appears repeatedly. This identifies it as possibly belonging to those writings known as The Book of Breathings, though that in turn is merely “compilations and excerpts from older funerary spells and burial formulas.” This particular excerpt, if it is such, has still not been located among known versions of the mysterious book. (Brigham Young University Studies, Spring 1968, p. 249)

On the same page of his article, Nibley commented: “And that is the story—still a lock without a key.”

Fortunately, the key to this story was found just a few months after the papyri were rediscovered. It was not long after Grant Heward started working on this text that he was able to identify enough of the words that we began to get some idea of what the papyrus is about. A man who was familiar with Mr. Heward’s work, found a rendition of a text which contained words similar to the ones Mr. Heward had translated from the Mormon Papyrus. Encouraged by this find, Mr. Heward went to the Brigham Young University Library and found a facsimile of a text which closely resembles the Book of Abraham fragment. He found this text in Bibliothèque Egyptologique publiée sous la Direction de G. Maspero, vol. 17, plate XI. This is a copy of Papyrus No. 3284, located in the Museum of the Louvre in Paris. After examining this text we were confident that Mr. Heward had found the key to the Book of Abraham fragment. Since that time Mr. Heward’s work has been verified by prominent Egyptologists. For more information concerning this matter see our Case, vol. 2, pp. 157-158.

Dr. Hugh Nibley now acknowledges the fact that Papyrus No. 3284 contains the same basic material as Joseph Smith’s “Book of Breathings” fragments, but he tries to make it appear that the “Book of Breathings” is something special:

Upon their publication in 1967, the Joseph Smith Papyri Nos. X and XI were quickly and easily identified as pages from the Egyptian “Book of Breathings.” . . . its contents closely matched that of other Egyptian writings bearing the title . . . commonly translated “Book of Breathing(s).” A most welcome guide to the student was ready at hand in J. de Horrack’s text, translation, and commentary on a longer and fuller version of the same work (Pap. Louvre 3284) which he published in 1878 along with another version of the text (Louvre No. 3291) and variant readings from a half dozen other Paris manuscripts. . . . the Book of Breathings is before all else, as Bonnet observes, a composite, made up of “compilations and excerpts from older funerary sources and mortuary formulas.” . . . The Book of Breathings is the great time-binder; it comes towards the end of Egyptian civilization and so wraps everything up, right back to the beginning. . . .

The lateness of the “Breathing” documents, instead of detracting from their value actually enhances it. For it not only gives them a chance to embrace the entire funerary literature of the past, but places them in that critical moment of transition in which they are able to transmit much ancient Egyptian lore to early Jewish and Christian circles. . . . The Book of Breathings is not to be dismissed, as it has been, as a mere talisman against stinking corpses; it is a sermon on breathing in every Egyptian sense of the word. (Brigham Young University Studies, Winter 1971, pp. 153, 158, 159, 166)

While it is strange that Dr. Nibley would try to make special claims for the value of the “Book of Breathings,” we are happy to see that he is willing to admit that Joseph Smith’s fragment of papyrus is in reality from that work.

Three Witnesses Against Book

In the Book of Mormon we find this statement:

And in the mouth of three witnesses shall these things be established; . . . (Ether 5:4)

Joseph Smith’s witnesses to the Book of Mormon were not trained in the science of Egyptology, and therefore they could not possibly know whether Joseph Smith’s “gold plates” were authentic or whether he translated them correctly. Richard L. Anderson gives this information about Book of Mormon witness John Whitmer:

From this peak of conviction, the same man descended to the depths of doubt within three years. . . . Answering in the presence of his anti-Mormon friends, the Book of Mormon witness made two revealing statements. First, he admitted, “I now say, I handled those plates; there were fine engravings on both sides. I handled them.” When Turley next asked bluntly why Whitmer now doubted the work, the witness indicated his inability to translate the characters on the plates: “I cannot read it, and I do not know whether it is true or not.” From the strict point of view of evidence, this report is most impressive. (Investigating the Book of Mormon Witnesses, 1981, pp. 130-131)

While no qualified translator ever examined the “gold plates” of the Book of Mormon, in the case of the Book of Abraham we have a different story. Three men who have had extensive training in the science of Egyptology have examined the text Joseph Smith used as a basis for the Book of Abraham and have declared that it is in reality the “Book of Breathings”—a pagan text having nothing at all to do with Abraham or his religion. (Actually, to be more precise we should say that it is the instructions for wrapping up the “Book of Breathings” with the mummy.)

The first witness against the Book of Abraham is Dr. John A. Wilson. The New York Times, August 31, 1976, gave this information about him:

Dr. John A. Wilson, professor emeritus of Egyptology at the University of Chicago, died yesterday. . . . Dr. Wilson succeeded Dr. James H. Breasted in 1936 as director of the university’s Oriental Institute, holding the post for a decade and later serving as director again in 1960-61.

Although Dr. Wilson did not publish a translation of the Book of Abraham Papyrus, he did examine it, and indicated it was only a “mortuary text” known as the “Book of Breathings”:

Document D is a related mortuary text of late times, the so-called Book of Breathings, in a hieratic hand coarser than that of Document B. (Dialogue: A Journal of Mormon Thought, Summer 1968, p. 68)

The second witness is Klaus Baer. Dialogue: A Journal of Mormon Thought gave this information concerning him:

Klaus Baer is Associate Professor of Egyptology at the University of Chicago’s Oriental Institute, and was one of Professor Hugh Nibley’s primary tutors in the art of reading Egyptian characters. (Dialogue, Autumn 1968, p. 109)

Klaus Baer’s translation of the Book of Abraham papyrus appears on pages 119-20 of the same issue:

Osiris shall be conveyed into the Great Pool of Khons—and likewise Osiris Hor, justified, born to Tikhebyt, justified—after his arms have been placed on his heart and the Breathing Permit (which [Isis] made and has writing on its inside and outside) has been wrapped in royal linen and placed under his left arm near his heart; the rest of his mummy-bandages should be wrapped over it. The man for whom this book has been copied will breathe forever and ever as the bas of the gods do.

The third witness against the Book of Abraham is Professor Richard A. Parker, chairman of the department of Egyptology at Brown University. Dr. Hugh Nibley had a copy of Richard Parker’s translation of the “Sensen” text before it appeared in Dialogue, and in a speech delivered at the University of Utah on May 20, 1968, he stated:

Professor Parker has translated that controversial little thing called the “Sensen” papyrus, the little section, that text that matches up with some of the Book of Abraham.

Instead of attacking Professor Parker’s translation, as we might have expected him to do, Dr. Nibley praised it:

. . . here is Parker’s translation of the “Sensen” papyrus. . . . Parker being the best man in America for this particular period and style of writing. And Parker agreed to do it and he’s done it. So it’s nice . . . it will be available . . . in the next issue of the Dialogue.

Professor Richard A. Parker’s translation was published in Dialogue: A Journal of Mormon Thought, Summer 1968, p. 98, and reads as follows:

1. [.....] this great pool of Khonsu
2. [Osiris Hor, justified], born of Taykhebyt, a man likewise.
3. After (his) two arms are [fast]ened to his breast, one wraps the Book of Breathings, which is
4. with writing both inside and outside of it, with royal linen, it being placed (at) his left arm
5. near his heart, this having been done at his
6. wrapping and outside it. If this book be recited for him, then
7. He will breath like the soul[s of the gods] for ever and
8. ever.

The reader will notice that these translations bear absolutely no resemblance to Joseph Smith’s purported translation of the same text. The Book of Abraham, therefore, has been proven to be a spurious work. The Egyptologists find no mention of Abraham or his religion in this text. The average number of words used to convey the message is only 87, whereas Joseph Smith’s rendition contained thousands of words. The renditions by Parker and Baer are essentially in agreement, although there are a few minor variations. Some of these variations can be explained without too much difficulty. For more information on the reconciliations of minor differences in the translation of this text see our Case, vol. 2, page 160.

As we closely examine the translations it is plain to see that they are basically in agreement with each other. Consequently, it is almost impossible to escape the conclusion that the Book of Abraham is a false translation. The Egyptologist Klaus Baer made this comment:

This is as far as an Egyptologist can go in studying the document that Joseph Smith considered to be a “roll” which “contained the writings of Abraham.” The Egyptologist interprets it differently, relying on a considerable body of parallel data, research, and knowledge that has accumulated over the past 146 years since Champollion first deciphered Egyptian—none of which had really become known in America in the 1830’s. At this point, the Latter-day Saint Historian and theologian must take over. (Dialogue: A Journal of Mormon Thought, Autumn 1868, p. 133)

Besides the renditions given by Professors Parker and Baer, a number of others have translated the text and obtained similar results. Seven years after the translations were published, even Dr. Hugh Nibley set his hand to translate this text. His rendition was published in The Message of the Joseph Smith Papyri: An Egyptian Endowment, 1975, pages 19-23:

- [Line 1] inside (of) the lake great (of) Chonsu
 [Line 2] born of Taykhebyt justified likewise
 [Line 3] after clasp - ed (two) arms his upon breast his being as wrap-
 [Line 4] ped like a book (or roll, WB II, 192, 16); the Book of Breathings (Wb III, 419) being written according-to-what is (see next line)
 [Line 5] in (the sacred) writings (books) on both inside and outside in linen (of) the king One places (or, is placed) arm [Line 6] left his vicinity of heart his, having-been-done this for his [Line 7] wrapping on (the) side outer If makes one for him book this, then [Line 8] breathes he like souls (of the) gods for time and eternity

Although Dr. Nibley finally gave his rendition of the text, he tried to cloud the issue by saying:

To the often-asked question, “Have the Joseph Smith Papyri been translated?” the answer is an emphatic no! What, then, is the foregoing? A mechanical transcription, no more. . . . What we have is a transmission rather than a translation of the text, and such transmission, as G. Santillana notes, “need in no way imply understanding.” . . . The hardest question of all for the Egyptologist, according to W. Schenkel, is whether Egyptian writings can really be understood by anyone but an Egyptian. Go up to the man in the car . . . when he stops at a red light and deliver this sober message to him: “Osiris shall be towed toward the interior of the great Pool of Khonsu,” which is the first line of the Joseph Smith Papyrus No. XI. If the man gives you a blank look or starts an ominous muttering, explain to him that the great Lake of Khonsu is “probably a liturgical designation of the portion of the Nile that has to be crossed in order to reach the Theban cemetery on the west bank,” and that Khonsu or Khons is a youthful moon-god. When the light changes your new friend may proceed on his way knowing as much about the first line of our Book of Breathings as anybody else does, namely, nothing at all. Though as correct and literal as we can make it, the translation in the preceding chapter is not a translation. It is nonsense . . . there is still an unbridged gulf, broad and deep, between the real message of the Joseph Smith Papyri and what purports to be translations of them. (The Message of the Joseph Smith Papyri, pp. 47, 49)

Dr. Nibley Confused

As time passes it becomes increasingly apparent that Dr. Nibley is totally unprepared to deal with the problems related to the translation of the Book of Abraham, and that he has no real answers to give his people. In an article published in Dialogue: A Journal of Mormon Thought, he stated:

Since the Sen-Sen business makes very little sense to anybody, while the Book of Abraham makes very good sense, one might suppose that Smith could have produced the latter without any reference to the former—that he could have written the Book of Abraham more easily, in fact, without having to bother himself with those meaningless squiggles. But if the Sen-Sen symbols are expendable, why does he use them at all? His only purpose would have been to impress others, but he keeps the whole operation strictly to himself and never circulates the Sen-Sen papyrus as he did the Facsimiles. And why on earth would he fasten on this particularly ugly little piece and completely by-pass the whole collection of handsome illustrated documents at his disposal? Did he really think he was translating? If so he was acting in good faith. But was he really translating? If so, it was by a process which quite escapes the understanding of the specialists and lies in the realm of the imponderable.

No one has begun to look into the Sen-Sen problems seriously. . . . Today nobody claims that Joseph Smith got his information through ordinary scholarly channels. In that case one wonders how any amount of checking along ordinary scholarly channels is going to get us very far. (Dialogue: A Journal of Mormon Thought, Summer, 1968, p. 101)

When Dr. Nibley spoke at the University of Utah on May 20, 1968, he admitted that if Joseph Smith was “really translating the papyri,” he did it in a way that is unknown to Egyptologists:

By what process could the Book of Abraham have been squeezed out of a few dozen brief signs? Nobody has told us yet. Was Joseph Smith really translating the papyri? If so, it was not in any way known to Egyptology. Was he then merely pretending to translate them? But he never really put these symbols forth as his source. He published the facsimiles, but these always remained among his private papers. These were not for circulation. He’s not pretending to be doing anything here. He’s not seeking to impress anyone at all. Nobody knew about this little work he was carrying on. He never published them as he did the facsimiles. Did he really need these symbols? This is a funny thing. Are they actually the source upon which he depended? Well, if he really depended on them, he must really have been translating them. But, you say, he couldn’t possibly have been translating. Could he have used this as a source at all? These questions arise. If he was merely faking, of course, pretending to be translating them, well, he wouldn’t need the Egyptian text at all. Yet he used one, and he used it secretly. Why would he secretly make use of a text he didn’t need at all? This was just a nuisance, really, all these symbols. Let’s just forget about them, and just write the story. Why did he need to tie up with these, and how does he tie up? Why does he ignore the wealth of handsome illustrated texts at his disposal to concentrate only on the shortest and ugliest and most poorly written of the lot? Why does he choose just this particular one when he had all these beautiful manuscripts. And they were all [just as?] meaningless to everybody. Why would he do that? Well, all sorts of questions arise. (Speech by Hugh Nibley, University of Utah, May 20, 1968)

Hugh Nibley made these statements in the Improvement Era:

We cannot pretend to understand how the Book of Abraham was translated, but that should not seriously disturb us, since nobody understands the method by which some of the greatest scholars were able to translate texts that no one else could read . . . In their case, it was the result that justified the intuition, and not the other way around. So let it be with Joseph Smith: we must still take his word for it that he was actually translating, but the result of his efforts is a different matter—could such a monument be the result of trickery and deceit? (Improvement Era, August 1968, p. 56)

In a footnote on page 64 of the same article, Nibley remarked: “. . . the connection between the Book of Abraham and the ‘Sen-sen’ papyrus remains a mystery: . . .” To give the reader an idea of just how confused Dr. Nibley became on this issue, we have only to compare two statements which he has made. In the Improvement Era, May 1968, page 54, he wrote:

. . . the presence on the scene of some of the original papyri, including those used by the Prophet in preparing the text of the Book of Abraham . . . has not raised a single new question, though, as we shall see, it has solved some old ones.

It was only a few weeks after this statement was printed that Dr. Nibley said:

Here is the little “Sen-sen,” . . . the papyrus, in which a handful of Egyptian symbols was apparently expanded in translation to the whole Book of Abraham. This raises a lot of questions. It doesn’t answer any questions, unless we’re mind readers. (Speech by Hugh Nibley, University of Utah, May 20, 1968)

At one point Dr. Nibley became so zealous to establish Joseph Smith’s work that he wrote:

The evidence supporting the Book of Abraham is simply overpowering . . . Joseph Smith or anyone else could not possibly have faked the Book of Abraham, which I am perfectly convinced is a true record. Some of our ideas about it may call for rectification from time to time, but of the authenticity of the book there can be no doubt. . . . I have studied with both Prof. Baer and Wilson, who translated some of the Mss.; they are splendid men but they have no idea of what these particular manuscripts are about. . . . Before long you will see that the Book of Abraham furnishes some of the best evidence for the divine mission of the Prophet Joseph. . . . I must ask you to be patient until this can be demonstrated more fully. (letter from Hugh Nibley, dated December 11, 1970)

This letter would lead a person to believe that Dr. Nibley now feels that he is a greater Egyptologist than the very men he studied under. Those who followed Nibley’s articles in the Improvement Era may remember that in the issue for August 1968, page 51, he was finally forced to admit that he was “anything but an Egyptologist.” In a letter dated Feb. 8, 1968, Dr. Nibley said that his “professors at Chicago”—Wilson and Baer—are “infinitely my betters.” At a meeting held at the University of Utah on May 20, 1968, Dr. Nibley admitted he was not qualified to make an accurate translation of the papyri:

. . . I would make mistakes like mad . . . I studied just a year ago with Dr. Wilson. Now, of course, he’s the master, and so when I heard that he was going to translate it [I] let him do it, of course, because if I did it he’d just have to correct what I did anyway.

In the same speech, Dr. Nibley said that the “excellent work of John Wilson will be coming out in the next issue of Dialogue. He has translated the Book of the Dead sections . . . He spent many weeks on it. He’s done a marvelous piece of work . . .”

It is almost impossible to believe that after making these statements that Hugh Nibley could turn right around and say that “Baer and Wilson . . . have no idea of what these particular manuscripts are about.”

In the Improvement Era, August 1969, page 75, Dr. Nibley made this fantastic statement:

From here on the reader might as well know that this writer intends to show that the Book of the Dead fragments, the Breathing Papyrus, and the three facsimiles, that is, all the available Egyptian materials that were once in the possession of Joseph Smith, contain the elements of a single story, which happens to be the story of Abraham as told in the Book of Abraham and the early Jewish legends.

Professor Nibley’s concluding article for the Improvement Era, however, made it very clear that he was unable to demonstrate any relationship between the papyri and the Book of Abraham. Nevertheless, he encouraged members of the Mormon Church to go on stalling lest they be accused of “forfeiting the game”:

Since the basic charges against Joseph Smith emerging from the study of the newly found papyri have not been discussed in the pages of the Era, it may be well to review them briefly here. Two documents of the Joseph Smith Papyri were identified and translated in 1967/8, the one comprising sections from the Book of the Dead, the other being the much rarer but still not unknown “Sen-sen” Papyrus or “Book of Breathings.” Neither of these texts contained the same reading matter as the Book of Abraham, but who said they should? . . .

What supports the idea that the Book of Abraham was thought by Joseph Smith to be a translation of the Breathing Certificate? . . . the symbols from the “Breathing text” are interpreted bit by bit in a writing known as “the Egyptian Alphabet and Grammar” in which the interpretation turns out to be the same as the text of the English Book of Abraham. . . . No slightest knowledge of Egyptian is necessary to convince anybody that when a symbol as brief as cat is “translated” by an involved paragraph of over one hundred words, we are not dealing with a “translation” in any accepted sense of the word. . . . in 1968 priority went to the newly found papyri, . . . But when it soon became apparent that those documents did not contain any of the text of the Book of Abraham as we have it, it was time for the Egyptologists, having done their work and done it well, either to bow out of the scene or to go on to the more important and essential problems of the facsimiles. . . . The hopes for a quick decision with the finding of the Joseph Smith Papyri were blasted when it became apparent on the one hand that those documents do not contain the Book of Abraham, and on the other that the connection between the so-called Egyptian Alphabet and Grammar and the Book of Abraham is anything but clear. The work has hardly begun, but people still seek the safe and easy solution of authority and ask with impatience, “Can’t you spare us all that speculation and surmising and comparing and illustrating and simply give us the results?”. . .

Many Latter-day Saints have not been too happy with the Joseph Smith Papyri, which instead of giving them all the answers only set them to work on a lot of problems with which none of this generation is prepared to deal. But it was the Mormons who started this game, and it is their responsibility to keep it going. They can never again leave the field without forfeiting the game. . . . We have dealt entirely in possibilities, never in certitudes, possibilities being all we need to keep the door open. . . . As long as a single aspect of any problem raised by the Book of Abraham remains unexamined, as long as there is the remotest possibility that any slight detail of any significance may have been overlooked, as long as a single possible relevant text remains unread, we must hold our final word in abeyance. . . . You scholars have spoken; why don’t you do the honest thing and admit that you don’t know a blessed thing about the facsimiles, that you haven’t made even a superficial study of them . . . Why not admit that . . . the test of the Book of Abraham lies in what it says, not in the manner in which it may have been composed, and that a thorough test of its contents would require a scope of research that no scholar today has any intention of undertaking, a scope of knowledge that few if any scholars today possess? . . .

Until now, no one has done much more than play around with the bedizening treasury of the Pearl of Great Price. “They” would not, we could not make of the Book of Abraham an object of serious study. The time has come to change all that. (Improvement Era, May 1970, pp. 82, 83, 93, 94)

In Brigham Young University Studies for Autumn 1968, page 71, Dr. Nibley declared:

Whatever translation comes by the gift and power of God is certainly no translation in the ordinary sense, and Joseph Smith never put forth the translation of the Book of Abraham as an exercise in conventional scholarship. . . . In every case in which he has produced a translation, Joseph Smith has made it clear that his inspiration is by no means bound to any ancient text, but is free to take wings at any time.

Hugh Nibley’s conflicting statements caused one Mormon to write the following in a letter to the Editors of Dialogue:

Dr. Nibley is indeed walking a tightrope, praising conscientious scientific work of scientists on the one hand and accepting their conclusions, and upholding the contradictory beliefs of the Church on the other by looking for explanations in the field of “translated” revelation. Whatever the answers may be, he is either becoming a “split personality” or he is unsuccessfully trying to “serve two masters.” (Dialogue: A Journal of Mormon Thought, Autumn 1968, p. 9)

In 1879 the Mormon writer George Reynolds tried to refute Deveria’s work against the Book of Abraham by claiming that “the Egyptian hieroglyphics had at least two (but more probably three) meanings, the one understood by the masses—the other comprehended only by the initiated, the priesthood and others; which latter conveyed the true though hidden intent of the writer.” (Are We of Israel? and The Book of Abraham, fifth edition, p. 128)

That George Reynolds would make such a suggestion in 1879 is not too surprising, but when we found Dr. Nibley using the same type of reasoning in 1968 we were rather amazed. In his desperation to save the Book of Abraham, Nibley went so far as to state that the “Sensen” text may have a second meaning unknown to Egyptologists:

. . . you very often have texts of double meaning. . . . it’s quite possible, say, that this “Sensen” Papyrus, telling a straight forward innocent little story or something like that, should contain also a totally different text concealed within it. . . . they [the Egyptians] know what they’re doing but we don’t. We don’t have the key. (Speech by Hugh Nibley, University of Utah, May 20, 1968)

In the same meeting Dr. Nibley was asked “if the key to this concentrated language is not had by the Egyptologists, do we have any hope of having the Book of Abraham ever translated?” Nibley replied: “I don’t know. That’s an interesting thing. We don’t know what may turn up in another manuscript or something like that.”

The reader will remember that Dr. Nibley stated that Joseph Smith treated the characters as super-cryptograms—that is, writing with a hidden meaning:

It has long been known that the characters “interpreted” by Joseph Smith in his Egyptian Alphabet and Grammar are treated by him as super-cryptograms; and now it is apparent that the source of those characters is the unillustrated fragment on which the word Sen- Sen appears repeatedly. This identifies it as possibly belonging to those writings known as the Book of Breathings, . . . (Brigham Young University Studies, Spring 1968, p. 249)

We feel that Dr. Nibley's suggestion that the Sensen text might have a "different text concealed within it" which is unknown to Egyptologists is absolutely ridiculous. When Marvin Cowan asked Professor Richard Parker if the papyri could have a second meaning, he replied that he knew of "no Egyptologist who would support such a claim." (Letter dated January 9, 1968)

Nibley Reverses His Position

Although Dr. Nibley gave some support to the theory that the papyrus might have a second or hidden meaning, he seems to have come to his senses and now realizes that such an idea cannot be successfully maintained. Unfortunately, however, he has come up with another theory which is as fantastic as the first: that the "Sensen" papyrus has no relationship to the Book of Abraham. It is, in fact, "the directions for wrapping up the Joseph Smith papyri with the mummy" (The Message of the Joseph Smith Papyri, p. 6). In other words, Nibley claims the true source of the Book of Abraham is still lost. According to his new theory, Joseph Smith's scribes mistakenly copied the characters from the "Sensen" papyrus into the three handwritten manuscripts of the Book of Abraham:

Is the Book of Abraham a correct translation of Joseph Smith Papyri X and XI? No, the Book of Breathings is not the Book of Abraham! . . . Doesn't the text of the Book of Abraham appear in a number of manuscripts in columns running parallel with characters from the Book of Breathings? Yes, the brethren at Kirtland were invited to try their skill at translation; in 1835 the Prophet's associates, . . . made determined efforts to match up the finished text of the Book of Abraham with characters from the J.S. Papyrus No. XI . . . (The Message of the Joseph Smith Papyri, p. 2)

Professor Nibley's suggestion that Joseph Smith's scribes added the wrong characters in the translation manuscripts is certainly preposterous. That Joseph Smith would allow his scribes to copy the characters from the wrong papyrus into three different manuscripts of the Book of Abraham is really beyond belief. A person might almost as reasonably conclude that the Book of Abraham itself was made up by Joseph Smith's scribes. Dr. Nibley's attempt to separate the "Sensen" papyrus from the Book of Abraham cannot be accepted by those who honestly examine the evidence. The reader should keep in mind that Nibley himself originally accepted the "Sensen" text as the source of the Book of Abraham.

Nibley, of course, now has to maintain that the rediscovered papyri do not contain the portion which Joseph Smith translated as the Book of Abraham. A number of Mormon apologists have blindly followed Dr. Nibley into this grave error. Caleb A. Shreeve, Sr., for instance, wrote the following in an advertisement which appeared in the Ogden Standard-Examiner on March 24, 1980:

Joseph Smith (Dec. 31, 1835) describes the writing of Abraham Papyri as, "Beautifully written on papyrus, with black and small part red, ink or paint, in perfect preservation" (HC. 2:348). To date, (1980) a papyrus fitting Joseph's description has not been found.

If Mr. Shreeve had cited the first part of the quotation from the History of the Church, vol. 2, page 348, it would have changed the whole meaning of the statement:

The record of Abraham and Joseph, found with the mummies [sic], is beautifully written on papyrus, with black, and a small part red, ink or paint, in perfect preservation.

The reader will notice that when the entire statement is quoted it becomes plain that it is referring to the records of both Joseph and Abraham. In other words, it is a statement about Joseph Smith's Papyri collection in general, not just the one roll which Joseph Smith called the Book of Abraham. This is made very clear in another entry in Joseph Smith's History:

. . . I commenced the translation of some of the characters or hieroglyphics, and much to our joy found that one of the rolls contained the writings of Abraham, another the writings of Joseph of Egypt, etc., . . . (History of the Church, vol. 2, p. 236)

Now, when we understand that Joseph Smith believed the Book of Abraham was written on a different roll of papyrus than the Book of Joseph, it becomes clear that he was referring to the collection of papyri in general and not specifically to the Book of Abraham. Among the papyri that were rediscovered in 1967 there are pieces which contain rubrics—i.e., portions written in red ink. Later on in this chapter we prove conclusively that they are from the roll of papyrus the early Mormons designated as the "Book of Joseph." When they are translated, however, they turn out to be nothing but portions of the Egyptian Book of the Dead.

At any rate, the fact that Joseph Smith chose the papyrus identified as the "Book of Breathings" as the source for his Book of Abraham is established by irrefutable evidence. To begin with, Joseph Smith used the drawing at the beginning of the Book of Breathings roll as Facsimile No. 1 for his Book of Abraham. It does not contain red ink and the workmanship appears to be no better or well-preserved than that found on Papyrus XI. This in itself would completely destroy the argument advanced by Shreeve and Nibley, but the evidence becomes even stronger as we look into the matter. The writing in the columns to the side of the fragment used for Fac. No. 1, which Dr. Nibley does not dare to translate, mentions that the papyrus was made for Hor, and this is the same name mentioned in the Book of Breathings text which follows on Papyrus XI. Second, even Dr. Nibley has to admit that before the papyrus was cut up by the early Mormons, Papyrus XI followed immediately after Fac. No. 1 on the roll: "It can be easily shown by matching up the cut edges and fibres of the papyri that the text of the Joseph Smith 'Breathing' Papyrus (No. XI) was written on the same strip of material as Facsimile No. 1 and immediately adjoining it" (The Message of the Joseph Smith Papyri, p. 13). On page 3 of the same book, Nibley concedes that even Joseph Smith's scribes felt that the text of the Book of Abraham followed right after Fac. No. 1: "Since this is an illustration to the Book of Abraham, it has naturally been assumed that the text that follows the drawing could only be that of Abraham—even the brethren at Kirtland assumed that."

The strongest evidence that Joseph Smith believed that Papyrus XI was the Book of Abraham is found in the fact that the characters from this fragment were used in the translation manuscripts. Hugh Nibley's suggestion that this was only the work of his scribes cannot be accepted. All evidence, then, points to one unmistakable conclusion: Joseph Smith believed that Papyrus No. XI was the Book of Abraham.

As we have already shown, although Dr. Nibley does not dare give a translation of the writing on the papyrus fragment used for Fac. No. 1, he has given a rendition of Papyrus XI (the "Sensen" text). His work agrees in substance with the other translations we have published. In fact, he includes the names of many pagan gods in his translation of the Book of Breathings. He cannot find anything about Abraham in this text, but to soften the disappointment he tries to relate it to the Mormon temple ceremony. Why he would want to equate the Egyptian religion with Mormonism is really a mystery to us. The Egyptian religion is dominated with magic and other pagan practices.

Abraham's Signature

To begin with the Mormon leaders claimed that Joseph Smith had the original papyri which Abraham and Joseph wrote upon. Egyptologists, however, claimed that the facsimiles proved that the papyri were of a later date. Dr. Nibley tries to bring the church's position into line with the opinions expressed by Egyptologists by stating:

The commonest objection to the authenticity of the Facsimiles is that they are of too late a date to have been drawn by Abraham. But Joseph Smith never claimed that they were autographic manuscripts or that they dated from the time of Abraham. (Improvement Era, February 1968, p. 20)

Professor Nibley is certainly wrong about this matter; Joseph Smith did claim that they were autographic manuscripts. Josiah Quincy maintained that Joseph Smith himself told him the following:

“That is the handwriting of Abraham, the Father of the Faithful,” said the prophet. “This is the autograph of Moses, and these lines were written by his brother Aaron.” (Figures of the Past, as cited in Among the Mormons, pp. 136-37)

In 1840 Joseph Smith was quoted as making this statement:

“These ancient records,” said he, “throw great light on the subject of Christianity. . . . I will show you how I interpret certain parts. There,” said he, pointing to a particular character, “that is the signature of the patriarch Abraham.” (Quincy Wig, October 17, 1840, p. 1, as quoted in Ancient Records Testify in Papyrus and Stone, by Sidney B. Sperry, p. 52)

At the beginning of the manuscript of the Book of Abraham (see photograph on page 312 of this book) we find this statement by Joseph Smith: “Translation of the Book of Abraham written by his own hand upon papyrus and found in the catacombs of Egypt.” In the introduction to the Book of Abraham as it is now published by the Mormon Church we find this statement: “A Translation of some ancient Records, . . . The writings of Abraham while he was in Egypt, called the Book of Abraham, written by his own hand upon papyrus” (Pearl of Great Price, p. 29). The following statement appears in Progress in Archaeology, Brigham Young University, 1963, pages 24-25:

To assign a date to the scroll of Abraham is a difficult problem. For one thing, the patriarch himself is believed to have lived in the twentieth century B.C. . . . although the original composition of the Book of Abraham may date to the twentieth century B.C., the final disposition of the mummies in connection with which his scroll was found apparently dates to some 1400 years later. (sixth century B.C.) and possibly as much as 1900 years later (first century B.C.).

Evidently what happened was that the scroll was passed from Abraham through a line of persons who respected its sanctity, including his descendants Joseph, Moses, and Aaron, who added their own writing to it. Later possessors of the scroll, . . . need not have been able to read its script nor understand its contents, but only desired to own it and be buried with it for the supposed magical power of so ancient an object.

Ross T. Christensen, of the Brigham Young University, wrote:

Abraham wrote in the twentieth century B.C.; his scroll was added to in the seventeenth and thirteenth centuries B.C., . . .

Apparently after Abraham wrote on his scroll, it was handed down through a line of successors. I do not know who they were, though some of them were his descendants, Joseph, Moses, and Aaron. (Pearl of Great Price Conference, December 10, 1960, 1964 ed., p. 23)

Wilford Woodruff, who later became the fourth President of the Church, made this comment in his journal:

The Lord is blessing Joseph with power to reveal the mysteries of the Kingdom of God, to translate through the Urim and Thummim ancient records and hieroglyphics as old as Abraham and Adam. Joseph the Seer has presented us some of the book of Abraham... which was written upon his own hand but hid from the knowledge of man for the last four thousand years, but has now come to light through the mercy of God. (Personal Diary of Wilford Woodruff, as quoted by James R. Clark in Pearl of Great Price Conference, p. 58)

George Q. Cannon declared:

This book was written by the hand of Abraham while he was in Egypt, and was preserved by the marvelous dispensation of Providence through all the mutations of time and the dangers of distance, to reach the hand of God’s Prophet in this last dispensation. (The Life of Joseph Smith the Prophet, 1888, pp. 187-188, as quoted in Joseph Smith, Jr., As A Translator)

Now that we have the original papyrus Joseph Smith “translated” the Book of Abraham from we can be absolutely certain that it was not written by Abraham’s “own hand.” In fact, it probably was not written until about the time of Christ, which would be almost two thousand years after Abraham’s time. Mr. Heward has done some work on the dating of the “Sensen” papyrus by comparing it with other samples of hieratic writing. His research led him to believe that it probably was not written until about the time of Christ or even later. The Egyptologist Richard A. Parker has come to the same conclusion. According to the Editors of Dialogue, Professor Parker stated that he “would provisionally date the two Book of Breathing’s fragments in the Church’s possession to the last century before or the first century of the Christian era; . . .” (Dialogue: A Journal of Mormon Thought, Summer 1968, p. 86). Klaus Baer, of the University of Chicago, also seems to agree on the dating of this fragment: “The handwriting is of the last Ptolemaic or early Roman Period, about the time of Christ” (Ibid., Autumn 1968, p. 111).

The Mormon scholar John Tvedtnes is willing to concede that “The papyri themselves are from Ptolemaic or early Christian times, and thus follow Abraham by about two millennia. Abraham could therefore not be the author of the papyri” (Book of Abraham Symposium, April 3, 1970, p. 72).

Dr. Hugh Nibley seems willing to admit that the papyri do not date back to the time of Abraham, but he is not willing to face the serious implications of this matter. In his book, The Message of the Joseph Smith Papyri, page 3, he writes:

. . . it has now become apparent, thanks to the diligent researches of the Dutch scholar B. H. Stricker, that our Joseph Smith Book of Breathing’s is one of a very special and limited and uniquely valuable class of documents clustering around a single priestly family of upper Egypt in the first century A.D.

Nibley would have us believe that Joseph Smith claimed that the papyri were only copies and not the original documents. We have shown, however, that Joseph Smith maintained that the papyri contained the very “handwriting of Abraham.” In fact, he showed one man “a particular character” and told him that it was “the signature of the patriarch Abraham.” Although Dr. Nibley is trying very hard to bring the church’s position into line with the opinions expressed by Egyptologists, such a reconciliation is impossible.

A False Translation

More than fifty years ago the Egyptologist Samuel A. B. Mercer made this observation concerning Joseph Smith’s work in the Egyptian language:

All the scholars came to the same conclusion, viz: that Smith could not possibly correctly translate any Egyptian text, as his interpretation of the facsimiles shows. Any pupil of mine who would show such absolute ignorance of Egyptian as Smith does, could not possibly expect to get more than zero in an examination in Egyptology. . . .

I speak as a linguist when I say that if Smith knew Egyptian and correctly interpreted the facsimiles which you submitted to me, then I don’t know a word of Egyptian, and Erman’s Grammar is a fake, and all modern Egyptologists are deceived. (Improvement Era, vol. 16, p. 615)

As we have shown, Mormon writers claimed that the original papyrus from which the Book of Abraham had been translated was destroyed in the Chicago fire, and since Egyptologists only had the facsimiles which were published in the Pearl of Great Price, they were not in a position to judge the text of the book itself even if Joseph Smith’s work on the facsimiles were incorrect. Mormon writer John Henry Evans made these comments in an article written in 1913:

Bishop Spalding submits to eight Egyptologists the three facsimiles . . . The scholars answer substantially that they were not correctly translated. . . . Before they would be warranted in saying that the entire Book of Abraham was not properly translated, they would have to examine the original papyrus, or a copy of it, from which the Book of Abraham was translated. . . . Now, as a matter of fact, the hieroglyphics submitted to the scholars constitute less than one-seventh of the Book of Abraham and that only an accompaniment of the text. The question therefore, becomes, "Is any one justified in drawing a conclusion respecting an entire manuscript from a statement which was made with respect only to a very small part of that manuscript?" (Improvement Era, vol. 16, p. 343)

In 1938 the church leaders allowed Dr. Sperry to publish two pages of the original manuscript of the Book of Abraham which is found in the collection known as the Egyptian Alphabet and Grammar. The photographs are so poor, however, that the Egyptian characters are not readable. Dr. Sperry made this comment concerning these pages:

Many persons have supposed that it was impossible to get back of the Times and Seasons text. We are now glad to say that we can go back of that source to a limited degree and produce what seem to be the original copies made of the Prophet's translation. The finding of several pages of "copy" in different handwritings is an important announcement that we can make for the first time. For the benefit of our readers we are presenting in this chapter photographs of two pages of the original text. The reader may note with considerable interest certain characters on the left-hand side of the manuscript. The paper upon which the translation was written is rough, of a poor quality and has many deep brown stains that make the manuscript at times hard to read. The dimensions of the sheets are approximately eight by twelve inches. (Ancient Records Testify in Papyrus and Stone, Salt Lake City, 1938, pp. 69-72)

In 1937 Wilford Wood purchased the longer manuscript of the Book of Abraham from Charles Bidamon (see photographs on page 312 of this book). The most surprising event of all, however, was when the original papyrus was found in the Metropolitan Museum. Mormon writers can no longer claim the original papyrus is not available. Actually, we now have everything necessary to test Joseph Smith's ability as a translator of ancient Egyptian writings. We have the original papyrus from which Joseph Smith "translated" the text of the Book of Abraham, and we also have the original handwritten manuscripts which show the characters Joseph Smith used to make different portions of the Book of Abraham.

Since the original papyrus has been located, it has been suggested that perhaps Joseph Smith obtained the Book of Abraham "by way of direct revelation" and not from the papyrus. The person who tries to use this escape will find himself trapped by the words of Joseph Smith. At the beginning of the handwritten manuscript Smith stated that it was a "Translation of the Book of Abraham written by his own hand upon papyrus and found in the catacombs of Egypt." The introduction to the Book of Abraham still maintains that it was "translated from the papyrus, by Joseph Smith" (Pearl of Great Price, p. 29). Joseph Smith not only claimed that he translated it from the papyrus, but he also stated that his translation was correct. The following is attributed to him in the History of the Church, vol. 2, pages 350-351:

Thus I have given a brief history of the manner in which the writings of the fathers, Abraham and Joseph, have been preserved, and how I came in possession of the same—a correct translation of which I shall give in its proper place.

As we look at Joseph Smith's translation, we note that he read the papyrus in the correct direction—i.e., from right to left. Since Smith was a student of Hebrew (which also reads in this direction) and since the last line in the first column ends on the right side, he probably did not have much difficulty figuring this out.

The most startling thing about Joseph Smith's purported translation is that he made so many English words out of such a small number of Egyptian characters. The reader can see this by looking at the photographs of the handwritten manuscript on page 312 of this book. We find that in one instance only one set makes 121, another set makes 177, and still another set makes 234 words! One simple looking character makes 76 words in the Book of Abraham. Below is a photograph of this character as it appears in one of the handwritten manuscripts set to the side of the words it makes in the Book of Abraham 1:13-14.

Notice that the Egyptian character is not much more complex than our letter E, yet it makes 76 words in English. These 76 words are composed of 334 letters. Now, is it really possible to imagine that one character (almost as simple as the English letter E) could be translated to make 76 words containing 334 letters? Dr. Nibley states that a person "does not have to be a meteorologist to report that the sky is clear or that it is snowing." We feel that this is true, and we also believe that a person doesn't have to be an Egyptologist to know that it would be impossible to translate thousands of words from a few Egyptian characters. Just common sense should tell a person that this would be absolutely impossible. Brigham Young University scholar James R. Clark, however, maintains that the characters Joseph Smith "translated" the Book of Abraham from were very condensed: "These symbols, judging from their translation, were a highly specialized type of ideograph where a few strokes of the pen or brush conveyed an entire concept" (Progress in Archaeology, Brigham Young University, 1963, p. 32).

In an article which was published in Dialogue: A Journal of Mormon Thought, we (Heward and Tanner) stated:

. . . the small piece of papyrus pictured in illustration No. 1 appears to be the whole Book of Abraham!

This evidence raises several problems. One is that the Egyptian characters cannot conceivably have enough information channels (component parts) to convey the amount of material translated from them. Another is that the papyrus fragment in question dates from long after Abraham's time, much nearer, in fact, to the time of Christ. But most important, the Egyptian has been translated, and it has no recognizable connection with the subject matter of the Book of Abraham. . . . the papyrus fragment has been identified by reputable Egyptologists as a portion of the "Book of Breathings," a funerary text of the late Egyptian period. (Dialogue: A Journal of Mormon Thought, Summer 1968, pp. 95-96)

In Dr. Nibley's rebuttal to this article, he commented:

Take the Sen-Sen papyrus itself, for instance. Messrs Heward and Tanner raise three objections to it while completely overlooking their significance. The first is the comical disproportion between the Egyptian symbols and the English text which they suppose to be derived from them. They have left the phenomenon completely unexplained. The second is that the papyrus is too late to belong to Abraham, but we have already shown that the expression “by his own Hand” was understood to mean that Abraham and no other wrote the book, and cannot serve as a criterion for dating the papyrus . . . (Dialogue: A Journal of Mormon Thought, Summer 1968, page 103)

On page 101 of the same article, Nibley says:

Those who insist that “the Egyptian characters cannot conceivably have enough information . . . to convey the amount of material translated from them,” are the very parties who do conceive of just that, and insist that Joseph Smith did derive all that stuff from them. They can’t have it both ways.

We feel that Dr. Nibley is trying to transfer his own problem onto us. We did not mean to imply that Joseph Smith actually translated any of the characters. Our contention, in fact, is that he only pretended to translate the characters on the “Sensen” papyrus, and that the text of the Book of Abraham is a work of his own imagination. How could we make our position clearer?

Grant Heward has written a paper in which he shows that the character from which Joseph Smith “translated” Abraham 1:13-14 could not possibly have contained enough component parts to convey the 76-word message:

Let’s start with an illustration. Supposing someone showed you a round black dot on a piece of paper and said that it was writing. That it told the story of “Little Red Riding Hood”; the whole story—Little Red Riding Hood, her mother, her grandmother, the wolf, the woodcutter, the forest, the basket of cookies and all—everything! Could a single round dot carry that much meaning? Wouldn’t you have to already know the story and the dot simply be a reminder? Each thought requires at least one mark to express it. Other wise, the thought isn’t written. Any writing must contain enough symbols to reveal the meaning of each and every thought. Writing must be able to bring forth the meaning of a story one hasn’t heard before...

No one need understand Egyptian, however, to realize something is wrong with Joseph’s translations. Apply the “little-black-dot” method to the translated material found in the Grammar. (It’s part of the Book of Abraham included in the Pearl of Great Price.) If you’re willing to allow honesty and truth to determine the results of your own personal desires and fears, you will find you run out of Egyptian marks long before you run out of English thoughts. Take for example . In Egyptian, this could be no more than a single Egyptian word. However, we will number the strokes and divide up the character thus: . Giving more than the benefit of the doubt, we will assign thoughts to the dissected strokes. Of course, it is too much to hope this character could carry the meaning of even one-half of the first line, let alone the remaining lines. 1.  It, 2.  was made, 3.  after —.

Mr. Heward distributed this paper at the April, 1967, conference of the Mormon Church. Because of this “offense” he found himself in trouble with the church, and on June 21, 1967, he was excommunicated from the Mormon Church.

Dr. Hugh Nibley made this statement concerning Mr. Heward’s paper:

The attempt to give one’s own interpretation to picture writing is hard to resist. At the general conference in April 1967, for example, somebody circulated a mimeographed document bearing the frank and forthright title, “Why Would Anyone Want to Fight the Truth?” The “truth” in this case consisted of the author’s common-sense observations on the nature of Egyptian, such as, that an Egyptian symbol written with four elements “could be no more than a single Egyptian word.” But ancient languages have a way of ignoring our modern common-sense rules; the Egyptian in particular had an incurable weakness for abbreviations, omissions, transpositions, puns, and cryptograms, and their writings are full of signs which, even when we know their meaning (which is by no means always the case), require at least a sentence or two to explain them. (Improvement Era, February, 1968, pp. 14-15)

Although the Egyptians did use some abbreviations, we do not know of any case where one Egyptian character could be expanded to make 76 English words. (In our Case Against Mormonism, vol. 2, page 168, there are a few examples of words that are sometimes abbreviated in Egyptian writing.)

Dr. Nibley’s statement that the Egyptians had “an incurable weakness for abbreviations” does not explain how 76 words can be derived from one character. Now that we have the original papyrus that Joseph Smith used as a basis for his Book of Abraham, the meaning of the character Nibley chooses to argue about is clear. It means “water,” and in hieroglyphic writing is as follows:

In hieratic writing the Egyptians did not take the time to make the lines wavy. Sometimes the lines curved down at the end of the stroke so that the character had the appearance of a backwards E.

While this character means water when it stands alone, it can also be used as a “generic determinative.” This means that in many cases it is used as only a part of one word. Its presence helped the Egyptians to know that the words it appeared in had some relationship to water. Below are some examples—written from left to right.

In the fragment of papyrus Joseph Smith used for his Book of Abraham this character is only a part of an Egyptian word which means “pool” or “lake.” Below is a photograph of it as it appears on the first line of the papyrus.

Thus we see that Joseph Smith “translated” 76 words out of an Egyptian character which is only a part of one word. The other part of the word was used to make 59 additional words (Pearl of Great Price, Book of Abraham 1:11-12). This makes a total of 135 words from one Egyptian word!

In another case Joseph Smith “translated” 177 words from just one Egyptian word. Below is a photograph of this word (as it appears in one of the handwritten manuscripts) and the words Joseph Smith derived from it. The words are taken from the Pearl of Great Price, Book of Abraham 1:16-19.

	16 And his voice was unto me: Abraham, Abraham, behold, my name is Jehovah, and I have heard thee, and have come down to deliver thee, and to take thee away from thy father’s house, and from all thy kinsfolk, into a strange land which thou knowest not of;	king of Egypt; therefore I have come down to visit them, and to destroy him who hath lifted up his hand against thee, Abraham, my son, to take away thy life.
	17 And this because they have turned their hearts away from me, to worship the god of Elkenah, and the god of Libnah, and the god of Mahmackrah, and the god of Korash, and the god of Pharaoh,	18 Behold, I will lead thee by my hand, and I will take thee, to put upon thee my name, even the Priesthood of thy father, and my power shall be over thee.
	19 As it was with Noah so shall it be with thee; but through thy ministry my name shall be known in the earth forever, for I am thy God.

The Egyptian word which Joseph Smith pretended to translate 177 words from (found in the first line of the papyrus) is “Khons” —the name of an Egyptian moon-god. The fact that Joseph Smith would make 177 English words from one Egyptian word is absolutely astounding! It shows very clearly that he did not understand the Egyptian language and that the Book of Abraham is a work of his own imagination.

As we have already shown, even Dr. Hugh Nibley finds the name of the Egyptian moon-god on this fragment of papyrus:

... “Osiris shall be towed toward the interior of the great pool of Khonsu,” which is the first line of the Joseph Smith Papyrus No. XI. (The Message of the Joseph Smith Papyrus, p. 47)

There is another word on the first line of the “Sensen” papyrus from which Joseph Smith “Translated” most of Abraham 1:11 in the Pearl of Great Price. Below is a photograph of this word as it appears in the handwritten manuscript set to the side of the words it makes in the Book of Abraham 1:11.

	11. Now, this priest had offered upon this altar three virgins at one time, who were the daughters of Onitah, one of the royal descent directly from the loins of Ham. These virgins were offered up because of their virtue; they would not bow down to worship gods of wood or of stone, therefore they were killed upon this altar, and it was done after the manner of the Egyptians.
---	---

An Egyptologist would translate this as either “the” or “this.” Joseph Smith, however, makes 59 words out of this one Egyptian word.

Abraham 1:29, 30 and most of verse 31 were also “translated” from a few characters. Below is a photograph of these characters as they appear in the handwritten manuscript set to the side of the words which they make in the Book of Abraham.

	29. Now, after the priest of Elkenah was smitten that he died, there came a fulfilment of those things which were said unto me concerning the land of Chaldea, that there should be a famine in the land.	the evil which he had determined against me, to take away my life.
	30. Accordingly a famine prevailed throughout all the land of Chaldea, and my father was sorely tormented because of the famine, and he repented of	31. But the records of the fathers, even the patriarchs, concerning the right of Priesthood, the Lord my God preserved in mine own hands; therefore a knowledge of the beginning of the creation, and also of the planets, and of the stars, as they were made known unto the fathers, have I kept even unto this day,

These characters appear on the second line of the papyrus. When they are translated they make two English words, “born to” or “born of.” In his book, The Message of the Joseph Smith Papyrus, page 20, Dr. Nibley transliterates these characters as ms n and translates them into English as “born of.” The Egyptologist Klaus Baer reads “born to” (Dialogue: A Journal of Mormon Thought, Autumn 1968, p. 132). Joseph Smith, however, “translates” 130 words from these characters!

The next word to the left on the papyrus is the name of one of the parents of the deceased. Professor Nibley renders it as “Taykhebyt,” and Klaus Baer reads “Tikhebyt.” Joseph Smith, however, broke this name into three different parts and translated a number of words from each part. The first part of this name he used to make part of Abraham 1:31.

	and I shall endeavor to write some of these things upon this record, for the benefit of my posterity that shall come after me.
---	--

The second part of the name he used to make Abraham 2:1 and most of verse 2.

	1. Now the Lord God caused the famine to wax sore in the land of Ur, insomuch that Haran, my brother, died; but Terah, my father, yet lived in the land of Ur, of the Chaldees.
	2. And it came to pass that I, Abraham, took Sarai to wife, and Nahor, my brother, took Milcah to wife, who was the daughter of Haran.

The last part of the name Joseph Smith used to make the rest of Abraham 2:2.

---	--------------------------------

The fact that Joseph Smith uses the last part of the name to make six words is especially interesting, for it does not have any phonetic value in the name itself. Klaus Baer says that it is a “sign indicating a woman’s name” (Dialogue: A Journal of Mormon Thought, Autumn 1968, p. 132). The entire name is written on the papyrus as follows:

When we count the total number of words which Joseph Smith “translated” from this one Egyptian name we find that it amounts to 85. Among these 85 words we find all kinds of proper nouns: Ur (twice), Haran (twice), Terah, Chaldees, Abraham, Sarai, Nehor, Milcah and Lord God.

The last few characters on the left side of the second line were used by Joseph Smith to make Abraham 2:3-5. Below is a photograph of these characters as they appear in the handwritten manuscript (we are using one of the manuscripts in the Egyptian Alphabet and Grammar in this case because the longer manuscript is not as clear at this point) set to the side of the words which they make in the Book of Abraham.

	3. Now the Lord had said unto me: Abraham, get thee out of thy country, and from thy kindred, and from thy father’s house, unto a land that I will show thee.	Sarai my wife; and also my father followed after me, unto the land which we denominated Haran.
	4. Therefore I left the land of Ur, of the Chaldees, to go into the land of Canaan; and I took Lot, my brother’s son, and his wife, and	5. And the famine abated; and my father tarried in Haran and dwelt there, as there were many flocks in Haran; and my father turned again unto his idolatry, therefore he continued in Haran.

Joseph Smith made 109 English words out of these Egyptian characters. The first two characters are poorly written on the original papyrus, but they probably mean “justified” or “true of word.” The last characters make the word “likewise.”

Abraham 2:12-14 is made from less than one Egyptian word which is found on line 3 of the papyrus. Below is a photograph of the characters as they appear in the handwritten manuscript set to the side of the words which they make in the Book of Abraham.

	12. Now, after the Lord had withdrawn from speaking to me, and withdrawn his face from me, I said in my heart: Thy servant has sought thee earnestly; now I have found thee;	Elkenah, and I will do well to hearken unto thy voice, therefore let thy servant rise up and depart in peace.
	13. Thou didst send thine angel to deliver me from the gods of	14. So I, Abraham, departed as the Lord had said unto me, and Lot with me; and I, Abraham, was sixty and two years old when I departed out of Haran.

To an Egyptologist this Egyptian word means “heart” or “breast.” When Joseph Smith or his scribe copied these characters from the papyrus the last part of this word was left off. It is a representation of a “piece of flesh.” It helped the Egyptian to know that this word was in some way connected with one of the “parts of the body” (Egyptian Grammar, by Allan Gardiner, 3rd Edition, p. 467). It is written as follows:

This character was included with the next set of characters which Joseph Smith “translated,” but this left the word “heart” incomplete. Thus we find that Joseph Smith “translated” 95 words from a group of characters which did not even make one complete word!

Basis of Anti-Black Doctrine

As we have already shown, the Mormon Church leaders used to teach that Africans were “cursed” with “a black skin,” and therefore could not hold the priesthood or receive equal treatment in the church. The basis for this anti-black doctrine is found in the pages of the Book of Abraham. The Mormon historian B. H. Roberts wrote:

This work [the Book of Abraham] is rich both in doctrine and in historical incidents. . . . the descent of the black race (Negro) from Cain, the first murderer; the preservation of that race through the flood by the wife of Ham—"Egyptus," . . . "which signifies that which is forbidden"—the descendants of "Egyptus" were cursed as pertaining to the priesthood—. . . are contained in the book. (Comprehensive History of the Church, vol. 2, p. 128)

The Book of Abraham, chapter 1, verses 21-27 all seem to relate to the anti-black doctrine, but verse 26 is the most important. David O. McKay, the ninth President of the Church, stated that this is the only "scriptural basis" for the anti-black doctrine. In a letter dated November 3, 1947, he said:

I know of no scriptural basis for denying the Priesthood to Negroes other than one verse in the Book of Abraham (1:26); however, I believe, as you suggest, that the real reason dates back to our pre-existent life. (Mormonism and the Negro, Part 2, p. 19)

From a Hole in the Papyrus

A man who spent a good deal of time examining this question stated that "Abr. 1:26 corresponds to what now and was in 1835 a hole in the papyrus." It is obvious that the characters from which the anti-black doctrine was "translated" are not now on the papyrus. They should appear on the right side of line 2, but the reader will see from the photograph below that the papyrus has been damaged and that this area is entirely missing.

In the handwritten manuscripts of the Book of Abraham there are four sets of characters used by Joseph Smith to establish the anti-black doctrine. Below is a photograph of these characters set to the side of the words they make in the Book of Abraham.

20. Behold, Potiphar's Hill was in the land of Ur, of Chaldea. And the Lord broke down the altar of Elkenah, and of the gods of the land, and utterly destroyed them, and smote the priest that he died; and there was great mourning in Chaldea, and also in the court of Pharaoh; which Pharaoh signifies king by royal blood.

21. Now this king of Egypt was a descendant from the aloins of Ham, and was a partaker of the blood of the Canaanites by birth.

22. From this descent sprang all the Egyptians, and thus the blood of the Canaanites was preserved in the land.

23. The land of Egypt being first discovered by a woman, who was the daughter of Ham, and the daughter of Egyptus, which in the Chaldean signifies Egypt, which signifies that which is forbidden;

24. When this woman discovered the land it was under water, who afterward settled her sons in it; and thus, from Ham, sprang that race which preserved the curse in the land.

25. Now the first government of Egypt was established by Pharaoh, the eldest son of Egyptus, the daughter of Ham, and it was after the manner of the government of Ham, which was patriarchal.

26. Pharaoh, being a righteous man, established his kingdom and judged his people wisely and justly all his days, seeking earnestly to imitate that order established by the fathers in the first generations, in the days of the first patriarchal reign, even in the reign of Adam, and also of Noah, his father, who blessed him with the blessings of the earth, and with the blessings of wisdom, but cursed him as pertaining to the Priesthood.

27. Now, Pharaoh being of that lineage by which he could not have the right of Priesthood, notwithstanding the Pharaohs would fain claim it from Noah, through Ham, therefore my father was led away by their idolatry;

28. But I shall endeavor, hereafter, to delineate the chronology running back from myself to the beginning of the creation, for the records have come into my hands, which I hold unto this present time.

The fact that the original papyrus is damaged in the area from which these characters were supposed to have been taken raises a number of questions. Was the papyrus damaged in Joseph Smith's time? Are the characters which appear in the handwritten manuscript the same ones which were written on the original papyrus? Could it be possible that these characters are the work of Joseph Smith's own imagination or that they were derived from another source?

The Egyptologist Klaus Baer feels that the papyrus was damaged when Joseph Smith worked with it and that three of the four groups of characters are "Incorrectly restored" (Dialogue: A Journal of Mormon Thought, Autumn 1968, pp. 131-132). He feels that the first group forms the name "Osiris"—the name of the Egyptian god of the dead—and that it is "still visible in traces" at the start of line two. We are inclined to agree with Baer concerning this matter because the characters copied in the handwritten manuscript do resemble the name "Osiris" (even though they are poorly written) and because the word "Osiris" would fit logically into the context of that which follows. However this may be, Klaus Baer feels that the other three groups of characters in the handwritten manuscript are not copies of the characters which appeared on the original papyrus. He observed:

. . . the three mounted pieces of the papyrus (PJS I, X, XI) are probably in about the same condition as in Joseph Smith's time, except that the places where the surface is now rubbed away, . . . were still in better condition. The photographs (especially of P. JS X) also show places where papyrus have parted company with the paper backing; . . . But apart from this, the lacunae [i.e., gaps in the papyri] evidently existed at the time the papyri were mounted, and Joseph Smith's copies indicate that they were already damaged at these points when he began to study them. . . . Joseph Smith drew four groups, of which the first . . . has the expected shape and is still visible in traces at the beginning of the line, while the remaining three (including the one corresponding to Abraham 1:26) are clearly proposed restorations that bear no resemblance to the signs that certainly were on the papyrus before it was damaged; note also the difference in general appearance or style. Our conclusion is essentially the same as before: The papyrus was slightly better preserved at the beginning of the line but otherwise broke off at the same point it does now. (Dialogue: A Journal of Mormon Thought, Autumn 1968, pp. 127-130)

Dr. Hugh Nibley claimed that "There is ample evidence that all the papyri though very fragile were in excellent condition when Joseph Smith worked with them—the clumsy patching, gluing, and sketching came later" (Brigham Young University Studies, Winter 1968, p. 181). In our Case, vol. 2, page 173, we demonstrated that Dr. Nibley was wrong about this matter. Nibley seems to have realized his error, and in his book, The Message of the Joseph Smith

Papyri, pages 2-3, he contradicts his former statement:

... our Book of Brethings is the most badly damaged of all the papyri. That it was already damaged in Joseph Smith's day is indicated by a number of things. For example, four large pieces are missing; ... chunks containing sizeable portions of several lines each, such as could have broken off only before the document was mounted. If they had broken off after the mounting, why were not the precious pieces returned to their proper place? Instead of that, they were used to fill in gaps in another damaged papyrus, J.S. No. IV, three of them being glued in upside down! ... the paper on which the latter was mounted bears the handwriting of Joseph Smith, and the drawings, maps, and texts on the back of the mounting papers of all the papyri surviving clearly indicates that the work was done in Kirtland, where Wilford Woodruff reports in 1836 the papyri were on display in the temple ... The damage could have been done during Chandler's frantic search for "diamonds or valuable metal" in the New York Customs House. ...

When in 1835 the brethren made attempts to "translate" the first two lines in terms of the Book of Abraham (if that is what they were doing, though it is exceedingly doubtful), they had the characters copied out for them by a single scribe in a bold and rather skillful hand, ... it is significant that when this scribe comes to those places in the manuscript which are today a blank, he also leaves a blank in his copy which has been filled out by another hand with thin and awkward characters which are far too many for the spaces indicated and definitely the wrong characters. This is another indication that the text was damaged from the first.

Actually, there is a great deal of evidence to show there were gaps in the papyri when they were in Joseph Smith's possession. William S. West, for instance, made this comment in 1837—just two years after Joseph Smith obtained the papyri:

These records were torn by being taken from the roll of embalming salve which contained them, and some parts entirely lost, but Smith is to translate the whole by divine inspiration and that which is lost, like Nebuchadnezzar's dream, can be interpreted as well as that which is preserved. (A Few Interesting Facts Respecting the Rise, Progress and Pretensions of the Mormons, as quoted in Pearl of Great Price Conference, 1964 ed., p. 55)

James R. Clark, of the BYU, made this comment concerning the statement by William West:

West represents, in his pamphlet, that in the process (and this very often happens) of unrolling these papyrus rolls, in order to get them out of the embalming sap or bitumin, there were little parts torn and perhaps lost. This has happened with the Dead Sea Scrolls, incidentally, and many others, but he represents that the claim was made that it would not make any difference that part of the record was lost, that Joseph Smith could get that part by direct revelation, whereas he would get the rest of it by translation. (Pearl of Great Price Conference, 1964 ed., pp. 55-56)

We feel that we can show that the "Sensen" papyrus was damaged at the time Joseph Smith worked with it and that the missing portion extended down into the third line of the papyrus by comparing the characters on the third line with the ones that appear in the handwritten manuscript. Below we have placed the characters from the handwritten manuscript directly above a photograph of the third line of the papyrus.

The reader will notice that as we go from left to right the characters line up with each other until we arrive at the break in the papyrus. At this point, however, there is a problem; there are too many characters in the handwritten manuscript to fit in the space from which they were supposed to have been taken. We feel that this shows that the gap in the papyrus existed in Joseph Smith's day and that he tried to supply some characters to fill the gap but misjudged the distance across and supplied too many.

Klaus Baer demonstrates from the handwritten manuscripts in the "Egyptian Alphabet and Grammar" that there was also a gap in the first line of the papyrus at the time Joseph Smith worked with it. He makes this comment concerning Joseph Smith's "proposed restoration":

He gives three groups of which no trace now exists. Are they a copy or a proposed restoration of an already existing lacuna? There can be little doubt that they are the latter, since the parallel manuscripts of the Breathing Permit tell us what the missing signs were: ... this is not what Joseph Smith drew, and it follows that the three groups in question are only his suggested restoration. (Dialogue: A Journal of Mormon Thought, Autumn 1968, p. 129)

Since part of lines 1 and 3 were apparently missing in Joseph Smith's time, it is logical to assume that part of line two—the line which was supposed to have contained the portion concerning blacks—was also missing. We feel that this can be verified by comparing the characters on the second line of the papyrus with the characters from the handwritten manuscript. In the illustration below we have placed the characters from the handwritten manuscript above the characters which are found on the papyrus.

The reader will note that we obtain the same result as we did in line 3. As we go from left to right the characters line up with each other until we arrive at the break in the papyrus. At that point there are too many characters to fit into the space from which they were supposed to have been taken. Thus, it appears that Joseph Smith's proposed restoration is incorrect. We do not know where Smith derived these characters, but they are not the characters which appeared upon the original papyrus. We must remember that he had manuscripts with hieratic, hieroglyphic and Arabic writing on them. He could have derived the characters from any of these manuscripts, or it is possible that they are the work of his own imagination. At any rate, they certainly were not found in this area of the "Sensen" papyrus.

Both Klaus Baer and Richard A. Parker fill in the missing area with the words "Osiris Hor, justified." There is very good reason to believe that their restoration is correct, for not only does it fit the context of the words which follow, but the characters which form the words "Osiris Hor, justified" fit exactly in this area. Below we have taken these words as they appear on the left side of the fragment and put them above the damaged area on the second line of the right side of the fragment.

The reader will see that the characters would fit perfectly into this area. Thus it would appear that the Egyptologists are correct with regard to this matter. The statement that "Abr. 1:26 corresponds to what now and was in 1835 a hole in the papyrus" seems to have been established, and the Mormon doctrine concerning blacks has been proven untrue.

An Unfinished Work

Mormon writer James R. Clark remarks: "... Joseph Smith did not translate all of the record of the Book of Abraham and he did not publish all he translated" (The Story of the Pearl of Great Price, p. 113). On page 98 of the same book, James R. Clark writes:

This point of view that we do not have at present the records in their complete form is born out by a published statement of John Taylor ... Joseph Smith not only translated more of the records of Abraham and Joseph than we now have in print, but ... he fully intended to continue the publication of his translation in the Times and Seasons.

The statement by John Taylor which James R. Clark refers to is found in the Times and Seasons, vol. 4, page 95: “We would further state that we had the promise of Br. Joseph, to furnish us with further extracts from the Book of Abraham.” This statement was printed February 1, 1843, but the last extract from the Book of Abraham was printed May 16, 1842. Therefore, the Book of Abraham as it is presently printed in the Pearl of Great Price is incomplete. James R. Clark once stated: “To the question of whether these records are lost forever or whether they will some day be re-discovered and the translation completed as Joseph Smith intended, we can only answer ‘God’s ways are not man’s ways’” (The Story of the Pearl of Great Price, p. 99).

Since Joseph Smith was working on the right side of the fragment, it would seem logical that if he had continued he would have “translated” the left side of the small “Sensen” papyrus (see photograph on page 297 of this book) and then started on the larger “sensen” papyrus.

These fragments have now been translated by Egyptologists, and their translations give additional proof that Joseph Smith was working with a pagan document.

Richard Parker has translated the left side of the small “Sensen” papyrus. His translation includes restorations from the Louvre Papyrus No. 3284. These restorations are marked with brackets. His translation reads as follows:

1. The beginning [of the Book of Breathings made by Isis for her brother Osiris, to make his soul live, to make his body live, to make young his members]
2. again, [so that he may attain the] horizon with his father Re’ (the sun), [so that his soul may appear in glory in the sky in the disk of Yah (the moon), so that his body may shine as Sah (Orion) on the body of Nut (the sky), and to]

Klaus Baer has translated the same text, and his rendition is basically the same (see Dialogue: A Journal of Mormon Thought, Autumn 1968, pp. 120-21).

Dr. Hugh Nibley seems to want us to believe that this has some connection to the Book of Abraham:

... the main point the critics wish to make is that, “most important, the Egyptian has been translated, and it has no recognizable connection with the subject matter in the Book of Abraham.” With what subject matter does it have recognizable connection, bearing in mind that “. . . the underlying mythology . . . must be largely inferred?” (e.g. B.D., p. 6). Even the casual reader can see that there is cosmological matter here, with the owner of the papyrus longing to shine in the heavens as some sort of physical entity along with the sun, moon and Orion; also he places great importance on his patriarchal lineage and wants to be pure, nay baptized, so as to enter a higher kingdom, to achieve, in fact, resurrection and eternal life. And these teachings and expressions are secret, to be kept scrupulously out of the hands of the uninitiated. And all these things have nothing to do with the subject matter of the Pearl of Great Price? . . . let’s not get ahead of the game, or overlook any possibility that there might be something there after all—“If it looks like an elephant,” Professor Popper used to say, “call it an elephant!” (Dialogue: A Journal of Mormon Thought, Summer 1968, pp. 103-104)

The fact that Dr. Nibley would try to make parallels between this pagan text and the Book of Abraham shows how desperate he is to make a case for the Book of Abraham.

The Egyptologist Klaus Baer has translated the larger “Sensen” fragment. It is likewise filled with pagan material. We highly recommend Baer’s rendition because he is very precise in his work and has spent a great deal of time with this fragment. His translation appears in Dialogue: A Journal of Mormon Thought, Autumn 1968, pp. 121-124.

The names of at least fifteen Egyptian gods or goddesses are mentioned on the two “Sensen” fragments, but not a word about Abraham.

Complete Confusion

It has been thirteen years since Egyptologists translated the fragment of papyrus Joseph Smith used as the basis for his “Book of Abraham,” yet Mormon apologists have not been able to explain how Joseph Smith derived the Book of Abraham from this pagan text. The fact that Mormon writers are in a real dilemma over this matter is very evident from their writings. The following statements appear in Jay M. Todd’s book:

In the Church Historian’s Office are four handwritten copies of parts of our present Book of Abraham. . . .

Down the left-hand margin of the pages on copies 1, 3, 4 are some symbols, apparently Egyptian. Interestingly enough, the symbols, appear to have been taken from the right-hand side of fragment “XI. Small ‘Sensen’ Text,” recently found by Dr. Atiya. The symbols appear in order on the handwritten copies, right to left, as they appear in the first several lines of the papyrus fragment. (The Saga of the Book of Abraham, pp. 318-319)

The scroll, according to Dr. Baer, was made for a priest named Hor, for his death and mummification ceremonies.

Obviously, if this report by Dr. Baer is accurate, it suggests more than ever that either the papyrus “translated” by the Prophet is still unavailable or that the seer stone provided the actual text of which only a shadow and much corrupted version might have been on the papyri fragments. . . .

As readers are already aware, the relationship—if any—between the Egyptian symbols on some of the handwritten copies of parts of the Book of Abraham and the text of the Book of Abraham and the appearance of these same Egyptian symbols on one of the papyrus fragments found in New York City is a most intriguing concern. Indeed, some critics of the Church are attempting to discredit the Book of Abraham and the Prophet by claiming that no relationship could exist between the symbols, and the Prophet was merely trying to deceive those around him when he permitted the symbols to be placed alongside the English text. Dr. Nibley has suggested, however, that if there is no relationship between the symbols and the text, then Joseph Smith would have seen none either, nor, from our knowledge of the Prophet’s character and personality, would he have attempted to deceive anyone by suggesting a relationship where he knew none existed. Indeed, Dr. Nibley has intimated that there still could be a relationship between the symbols and the English text of the Book of Abraham. Obviously, the matter of identifying the actual source of the Book of Abraham is still unresolved, . . . (The Saga of the Book of Abraham, pp. 377-380)

However, if Joseph Smith did turn to the seer stone to read that which appeared, one wonders what—if anything—the Prophet received from the papyri in his possession. Perhaps the rolls contained a perverted and corrupt version of Abraham's thought, and consequently, it was necessary to turn to the seer stone for the original writings. Perhaps the Prophet did indeed have some papyri that miraculously had been preserved, papyri that contained the record of Abraham. . . . He apparently regarded the records with some respect. Whatever, it is true that as a result of his experience with the Egyptian mummies and records, whether they served as a catalyst for further revelations or whether he was able to receive an English version of some symbols on a fragment in his possession through the seer stone, the Prophet Joseph was able to produce a new volume of scripture that was and is regarded as holy and sacred. (Ibid., pp. 223-224)

Was it really the handwriting of Abraham, as Josiah Quincy reported, or was it a rewrite of a rewrite of something that originally had been said by Abraham? . . . Did the papyri indeed contain the present Book of Abraham, or was it a much corrupted version of what originally had been written by Abraham, and thus, for his purpose also, the Prophet had to receive the original version through the seer stone? These are major questions. . . . Perhaps some of the papyri actually did contain the actual transcript of our Book of Abraham. It may be that the Prophet had told no one from which actual fragment had come the Book of Abraham, and because of this no one recognized the importance of any or all of the pieces. In time perhaps we shall know. But this much we do know—we do not know the answer now. (Ibid., pp. 288-290)

At the Book of Abraham Symposium, the Mormon scholar Dr. Henry Eyring made these strange comments:

Now, the Lord didn't need the Book of Abraham—those scrolls. He was pretty well clear on everything without that. So whatever was on them wouldn't have helped him much, I suspect, and so the essential ingredient in the Book of Abraham is whatever the Prophet was inspired to write down. . . .

To me, it's very exciting to study the Book of Abraham itself to find out how the Lord works. . . . I wouldn't look in it to find out whether He does work or not—I already know that. I also wouldn't look into the matter to find out whether I thought Joseph Smith was a Prophet, because I think there are a hundred things—in fact, to anyone who is curious, I would be glad to enumerate them—where it seems to me evident that he was much more than that. . . . I don't like to say it in this crude way, but I think it's quite an interesting way, maybe a shocking way: it wouldn't make a bit of difference to me if the scholars, studying the scrolls that led the Prophet to think about the problem of Abraham and write about it—it wouldn't make a bit of difference to me if they discovered that it was a bill of lading for wheat in the lower Nile. You see, some people don't feel that way about it. But I think the Lord actually inspired Joseph. (Book of Abraham Symposium, April 3, 1970, p. 3)

Just a Memory Device?

The Mormon scholars John Tvedtnes and Richley H. Crapo wrote an article in which the following appeared:

In two different sections of the "Alphabet and Grammar," hieratic symbols taken in order from the "Small Sen-Sen Fragment" (Improvement Era, February, 1968) have been juxtaposed to English symbols (i.e. words) comprising the text of the Book of Abraham (see Fig. 1 and 2). This correlation was pointed out by certain nonmembers of the Church shortly after the publication of photographs of the papyri. These same persons believed that the juxtaposition of small groups of hieratic symbols with English symbols in the "Alphabet and Grammar" implies a relationship of translation. At first sight, this appears to be a reasonable assumption. Four points of fact support it:

1. Joseph Smith, according to his own testimony, was working on a translation.

2. This translation was later published as the Book of Abraham, the text of part of which appears in English symbols or writing in the "Alphabet and Grammar."

3. The Book of Abraham was supposedly being translated from the Egyptian papyri. Historical documentation found with the recently-acquired papyri prove that the "Small Sen-Sen Fragment" was among those used by Joseph Smith.

4. The "Small Sen-Sen Fragment" attaches to and follows (as described in Abraham 1:12-14) the papyrus fragment which depicts "Facsimile 1" (see Fig. 3).

This led to an objection on the part of the non-members: the size of the English text as opposed to that of the Egyptian text (i.e. the 25:1 ratio of the words) seems unbelievably high. Recently, Dee Jay Nelson, a member of the Church and a philologist of the Egyptian language, has accepted this view.

We should therefore reply to these objections if we wish to continue to maintain that the Book of Abraham is scripture, the more so because some respected members of the Church are beginning to accept the rationale behind the argument presented.

If the Book of Abraham is to be presented as authentic, there are two possible directions which can be taken:

A. We can simply discount the objection to the ratio of English to Egyptian symbols, which implies proving that the Book of Abraham text does indeed come from the Sen-Sen text.

B. We can show that there is a relationship between the juxtaposed symbols other than that of translation; we must find some other reason why Joseph Smith put them in juxtaposition.

As previously indicated, assumption "A" seems to be the more desirable, especially in the apparent absence of a reasonable substitute explanation for the juxtaposition. But this possibility appears to have been ruled out by the scholarly translations of the Sen-Sen text by Mr. Nelson, Dr. Richard A. Parker, and Dr. Klaus Baer, showing it to be a normal Egyptian funerary document.

Dr. Nibley, however, still seems to agree with us that possibility "A", a relationship of translation, is the more desirable explanation, for in recent articles he places emphasis on the possibility of a "supercryptogram," i.e. a deeper level of hidden translation. But no one has yet suggested what such a supercryptogram might be. . . .

Although it is true, as pointed out by the non-member critics, that the English text contains many principal words and ideas not reflected in the Egyptian hieratic symbols, we recognized some months ago certain cases in which the hieratic words are found in the corresponding English text.

There was clearly some connection, but its exact nature was not apparent. We theorized that perhaps each set of Egyptian symbols represented merely a "key-word" which would bring to mind a certain memorized set of phrases, which was part of a longer oral tradition. . . .

We propose, therefore, as a working hypothesis: either (1) that the Sen-Sen Papyrus was used as a memory device by Abraham (and perhaps by his descendants), each symbol or group of symbols bringing to mind a set number of memorized phrases relating to Abraham's account of his life, or (2) that the hieratic words in the "Alphabet and Grammar" are simply related to core-concepts in the corresponding English story of Abraham. Either hypothesis requires that Joseph Smith had a working knowledge of the hieratic words on the papyrus. In the second case, much of the English text may have been supplied by Joseph Smith as an inspired commentary on the hieratic words.

Viewed in this light, the Book of Abraham seems not to be a direct translation of the Egyptian text appearing on the Sen-Sen papyrus. Indeed, since the oral tradition itself would have long since disappeared with the death of Abraham or the last of his descendants acquainted with the story, the Book of Abraham would have had to be revealed to Joseph

Smith, perhaps in connection with the use of the Egyptian symbols, inasmuch as the Prophet does relate long English passages to single Egyptian words or short phrases. (Newsletter and Proceedings of the Society for Early Historic Archaeology, Brigham Young University, October 25, 1968, pp. 1-4)

The authors of this article have prepared a chart which they feel shows a relationship between the “Sen-sen” fragment and the text of the Book of Abraham. Most of their parallels are very weak. For instance, they note that an Egyptian word meaning “in” or “inside of” was used as the basis for Abraham 1:7b-10. Joseph Smith “translated” 122 words from this one Egyptian word. Because they find the word “in” among these words they feel that they have a parallel. We feel that it is just a coincidence, for Joseph Smith used the word “in” frequently in his Book of Abraham. In fact, it is found at least sixteen times in the first chapter of the Book of Abraham alone!

On page 324 of this book, we pointed out that Joseph Smith “translated” most of Abraham 1:11 (59 words) from one Egyptian word meaning “the” or “this.” The authors of the article cited above also state that the Egyptian word means “this, the, (a specific thing),” but because the word “this” is found among the 59-word “translation,” they feel they have evidence that Joseph Smith understood the hieratic writing. They find the word “this” toward the beginning of verse 11: “Now this priest . . .” (previously mentioned.) Actually, we find the words “this” or “the” six times in this 59-word “translation.” These words are used at least 130 times in the first chapter of the Book of Abraham. We feel that it would be unusual if they did not appear in the 59-word “translation.”

Perhaps the best parallel they are able to find is that Joseph Smith “translated” the words “who were the daughters of Haran” out of a “determinative for woman” (see page 324 of this book).

In their article Tvedtnes and Crapo argued that when Joseph Smith transcribed Egyptian words from the papyri he usually took complete words and this showed that he had a knowledge of Egyptian:

. . . when he transcribed a word composed of five hieratic symbols, he never made the mistake (statistically inevitable for anyone to whom the sign symbols are only a meaningless jumble of lines) of transcribing only three or four of the word’s five signs, or of transcribing six or seven by including elements of the preceding or following words. . . . The transcription of only three of the words involved breaking them in two, and the breaks were always made at valid morpheme boundaries. . . . a person with no insight into the meaning of the symbols would have been bound to make a false division. (Newsletter and Proceedings of the S.E.H.A., October 25, 1968, p. 4)

The claim that the transcription of the words showed that Joseph Smith had a knowledge of Egyptian could not stand up under investigation, and in 1970, Richley Crapo had the honesty to admit that he had been mistaken:

It has been pointed out that Joseph Smith transcribed individual words from the Egyptian papyrus as only one who understood the language could do: . . . An emic test of this probability . . . involved simply the asking of persons untrained in the Egyptian language or script and uninfluenced by an appeal to inspiration to mark hypothetical divisions between the symbols on a copy of this papyrus. The results were that every person requested marked acceptable divisions between words or morphemes. Thus, the conclusions reached by an emic study are the same as those of Dr. Nelson: Joseph Smith’s handling of the Egyptian words was unremarkable; he did nothing in this respect that others could not do. (Book of Abraham Symposium, April 3, 1970, p. 31)

Another serious defect in the argument advanced by Tvedtnes and Crapo is that they based part of their parallels on the meanings of the names “Hor” and “Taykhebyt.” This would mean that it would have been impossible to have used the “Book of Breathings” papyrus until the time that “Taykhebyt” lived and had a son by the name of “Hor,” and this would have been sometime around the time of Christ. Even John Tvedtnes admits that the papyri date “from Ptolemaic or early Christian times, and thus follow Abraham by about two millennia” (Book of Abraham Symposium, p. 72).

While the text of the Book of Breathings might remain the same for many years, the names would have to be changed for each mummy. Therefore, even if the text of the Book of Abraham had been memorized to or concealed in the Book of Breathings, the changing of the names would have completely fouled up the system.

At any rate, the fact that The Society For Early Historic Archaeology at Brigham Young University would use the article cited above in defense of the Book of Abraham reveals the weakness of their case. Even Dr. Nibley was influenced by this theory. In Brigham Young University Studies, Autumn 1968, pages 101-102, he made this statement about the relationship between the “Sensen” text and the Book of Abraham:

We still suspect that there is a relationship between the two documents, but we don’t know what it is. . . . R. Crapo and J. A. Tvedtnes, presented an interesting hypothesis to explain the relationship between the Breathing Certificate and the Book of Abraham. . . . it seems that the idea is that if one takes the actual meaning of the hieratic signs in the order in which they occur, they can be roughly matched up with certain general themes of the Book of Abraham which occur in the same order. . . . This would make the “Sensen” papyrus a sort of prompter’s sheet. True, the document tells a connected and consistent story, but then it would have to do that in order to serve as an effective aid to memory by itself being easily memorized.

Far-fetched as it may seem, there are many ancient examples of this sort of thing, the best-known of which is the alphabet itself. . . . We are now being advised that “if we are to understand the Jewish authors correctly, we must examine their work carefully to see whether they contain a gematria,” that is, condensed and hidden code-writing, which turns up in the most surprising places. . . . In a preliminary statement in Dialogue it was suggested that the hieratic symbols placed over against the long sections of the Book of Abraham might be viewed not as texts but as topic headings. We still don’t know what the connection is, but one thing is certain—that the relationship between the two texts was never meant to be that of a direct translation.

The following appeared in the LDSSA Commentary, published by the Latter-day Saint Student Association, Institute of Religion:

. . . Richley Crapo and John Tvedtnes, have instituted a new approach to the study of Joseph Smith Papyri. This approach, which is quickly gaining support from LDS scholars, was prompted by the discovery by several leading Egyptologists that the translation of the Egyptian Sensen fragment, which Joseph Smith directly connected to the Book of Abraham text, does not correspond to the Abrahamic story as we have it in the Pearl of Great Price, nor does it deal with Abraham.

Crapo and Tvedtnes theorize that, while Abraham had nothing to do with the production of the Sen-sen text, the papyrus may have been used as a mnemonic device to support an oral tradition. (LDSSA Commentary, February 24, 1969)

In the March 27, 1969, issue of the same paper Crapo and Tvedtnes wrote:

The rediscovery of the Joseph Smith Papyri . . . has made it possible to reformulate entirely our concepts about the process by which Joseph Smith produced the Book of Abraham. . . .

Lacking the original papyri or any significant amount of information about the materials which stimulated the writing of the Book of Abraham, the members of the Church have always assumed that book to have been a literal translation of a document written by the hand of Abraham himself. Now it is possible to supersede this naive view with a deeper understanding of the origins of that book. . . . One of the recently acquired papyri, it seems, is directly related to the Book of Abraham. . . . It appears, therefore, that Joseph Smith connected the Book of Abraham to the Small Senses Fragment. . . .

Our own translation and those of several Egyptologists of the Small Senses Fragment have demonstrated that this papyrus is part of an Egyptian funerary document. Its relationship to the Book of Abraham must, then, be something other than has long been thought. The possibility of its use as a mnemonic device in connection with an Abrahamic oral tradition was suggested by our further studies.

Jay M. Todd reproduces the study by Richley Crapo and John Tvedtnes; however, he asked Klaus Baer, the Egyptologist from the University of Chicago, for his opinion of it. In his reply Klaus Baer stated:

The English passages in the Book of Abraham corresponding to the Egyptian signs are long, and the parts cited by Crapo, in which he finds similarities to the Egyptian, are related to the whole by no visible principle—often they are a very secondary part of the text. This is most extreme in the case of the section corresponding to the Egyptian py (“the” or “this”); you are hardly going to find an English sentence without an article or a demonstrative, so what does the coincidence signify? Nothing. . . . By that method similarities can be uncovered between any two texts so long as one is willing to look long enough and you’re willing to use your imagination. The important thing: Unless we can show, in detail, how Joseph Smith obtained the Book of Abraham from the Egyptian text, applying a rational method that others could follow, we cannot speak of “translation” in any ordinary sense of the word, and this Crapo has not succeeded in doing, nor do I see how it can be done. Even if the signs were just key words somehow suggesting the text, the choice would be most strange, and one would expect, at the very least, to find Abraham mentioned, something to connect the Egyptian with the Book of Abraham. (Statement by Dr. Klaus Baer, as quoted in The Saga of the Book of Abraham, p. 386)

Jay M. Todd seems to have great respect for Dr. Baer’s opinion and refers to him as “an internationally regarded Egyptologist . . . an honest non-Mormon—one of genuine good will . . .” (Ibid., p. 384).

Benjamin Urrutia wrote the following in an attempt to explain why Joseph Smith’s translation differs from that given by Egyptologists:

In this essay my main objectives shall be to prove that the two titles that have been ascribed to PJS (“The Breathing Permit of Hor” and “The Book of Abraham”) are both correct, and that the two translations . . . are both good and acceptable translations, each in its own way. . . .

The reasons that make the scholars “rage” and “imagine a vain thing” are that; a) Joseph’s translations of PJS is very different from their own; and b) the Book of Abraham is disproportionately long (136 very long verses) as contrasted to column I of PJS (less than 70 characters), the ground it covers.

These people obviously think they can have their cake and eat it, but they can’t have it both ways. . . .

Abraham, . . . wrote the book that bears his name. This document was brought back to Egypt by Abraham’s grandson, Israel.

But when “there arose up a new king over Egypt who knew not Joseph” (Ex. 1:8), what became of the sacred book? . . .

The best way to save the book would have been to camouflage it to look like an Egyptian document instead of a Semitic one. Most likely it was already written in Egyptian characters, but that wasn’t enough.

An enterprising Hebrew, whom we shall call X, conceived a code in which every character of a Mizraite funerary inscription, with only a few minor (though significant) changes, was the equivalent of two verses, more or less, of the book he was trying to save, the original of which no longer exists. There even exists the possibility (it would be more farfetched, but also more logical) that X actually created “The Breathing Permit of Hor” (B P H), to suit his purposes, and later the Egyptians accepted it as sacred, without suspecting its origin. . . . the Book of Abraham plus X’s manipulations equals the Papyrus Joseph Smith.

But once the BA was rendered into code, what chance was there of ever decoding it again? X being dead, the secret was lost, and not a convention of all the world’s cryptographers could find it again. The book was in all appearance, and even in reality, “The Breathing Permit of Hor.” What was there to be done? What was the key to the lost code? The answer: the Urim and Thummim: . . .

When Moses left Egypt, he took a copy of the B P H with him. Since he had the Urim and Thummim, the Book of Abraham was brought to light a second time. (It must have helped Moses in the writing of his own books) . . .

Of course, the papyrus we have is not the original, but a late copy of Saitic times. Mormon and Gentile agree on this. . . . it should also be clear that this “translation” was not a translation in the usual sense of the word (as that of the Inspired Version was not, either), and that no man, no matter how wise or imaginative, could have done it by any normal means. . . . Therefore, my friends, cease raging, cease imagining vain things. Joseph was a prophet, not a linguist. Dr. Baer is a linguist, not a prophet. Each of these men did what he could do, and admirably well, but he could not have done the same kind of translation the other did (even from the same document). (Dialogue: A Journal of Mormon Thought, Summer 1969, pp. 130, 131, 134)

Richley H. Crapo and John A. Tvedtnes wrote an article in which they stated:

There is no evidence of the Sen-Sen text having existed prior to 600 BC. Considering all logical possibilities, one could contend that the non-existence of the document prior to that date is unprovable, lack of evidence not being a proof. . . . True, the lack of an example of the Sen-Sen text of age greater than 600 BC does argue against any direct contact between Abraham himself and this text. On the other hand, it is possible to consider Abraham as having authored his own story in oral form, and this oral tradition, after being passed down, as having been adapted (ca. 600 BC) to the Egyptian document by a follower of Abraham, for mnemonic purposes. At this period of history, many Jewish colonies are known to have existed in Egypt.

Considering Abraham, then, as the author of the Book of Abraham, we have the following as possible relationships of the Sen-Sen text to that book:

- a. Abraham wrote the Sen-Sen text as a mnemonic device
- b. Abraham used the already extant Sen-Sen text as a mnemonic device.
- c. Abraham wrote his story and others adapted the written account to the Sen-Sen text, thus making Abraham’s story an oral account.

Another approach would be to attribute authorship of the Abraham story, as we know it, not to Abraham himself, but to his followers of a later date, on the basis of preexisting traditions regarding Abraham. Though a logical possibility, one need not in this case attribute authorship of the Sen-Sen text (with its pagan content) to these followers who used it. Two possible relationships would fit this situation:

- a. The followers composed the Sen-Sen text for use as a mnemonic device in connection with an oral account passed down from Abraham himself.
- b. The followers composed the Abraham story, based on oral traditions passed down to them (and perhaps some sayings actually attributed to Abraham), building it around the already extant Sen-Sen text.

Finally, exhausting the logical possibilities, one may consider Joseph Smith as the “author” of the Abraham story, on the basis of inspiration rather than translation. In this case, the Sen-Sen document would be a purely Egyptian one, never having even been seen by Abraham himself, but a document which did provide a message which acted as a “springboard” for the mind of the Prophet to seek inspiration about the meanings of the individual words, which, as we have shown, he must have understood, and the relationship of these to the story of Abraham, with which the Prophet felt them to be connected. And, of course, a logical (though improbable) possibility is a purely modern uninspired authorship. (Newsletter and Proceedings of the S.E.H.A., BYU, June 2, 1969, pp. 11-12)

In 1970 John Tvedtnes wrote an article in which he stated:

It should, first of all, be made clear that Abraham (or whoever actually composed the text of the Book of Abraham—presumably in the Hebrew language) made use of an already extant Egyptian text, in all probability . . . the person using the Egyptian text as a mnemonic device would have been required to know the Hebrew (?) text of the Book of Abraham by heart (or, at least well enough so that the key-words would bring it to mind and fill any gaps in the memory). . . .

Moreover, the key-word in the Egyptian text need not represent the key thought in the oral text—and, indeed, probably will not so represent it, if the written text used as a mnemonic device predates the oral text. . . .

There remain two questions of major importance to be answered:

(1) Why was the text orally transmitted? (2) How did Joseph Smith come by the text if, indeed, it was not written on any document that he possessed.

(1) The answer to the first question is, simply, that portions of Abraham’s record dealt with the Temple ceremony (see Joseph Smith’s explanations of Figs. 7 through 20 of Facsimile 2), and could therefore not be committed to writing. Additionally, we cannot be certain that the composer of the text knew how to write. . . .

I propose that the Book of Abraham was just such an esoteric oral tradition, passed down by word of mouth by the righteous descendants of Abraham until it was eventually lost.

(2) This being the case, we now come to the question of how Joseph Smith came into possession of the Abrahamic story. Here, I propose that he received it by direct revelation or inspiration, possibly even from a heavenly messenger, who, during his lifetime, was one of the transmitters of the tradition. (Newsletter and Proceedings of the S.E.H.A., BYU, April 1970, pp. 7-9)

These statements clearly demonstrate the great lengths Mormon writers will go to in their attempt to save the Book of Abraham. It seems they will propose almost any fantastic thesis rather than accept the simple truth that the Book of Abraham is a spurious work. These new theories certainly are not in harmony with Joseph Smith’s statements concerning the papyrus and the translation. Joseph Smith never mentioned anything about a “mnemonic device” or “super-cryptograms”; instead, he clearly stated: “. . . I commenced the translation of the characters or hieroglyphics, and much to our joy found that one of the rolls contained the writing of Abraham. . . .” (History of the Church, vol. 2, p. 236)

In one of Joseph Smith’s speeches he definitely claimed that he received information by translating the papyri: “I learned it by translating the papyrus which is now in my house. I learned a testimony concerning Abraham . . .” (History of the Church, vol. 6, p. 476)

On still another occasion Joseph Smith claimed that the Book of Abraham was “a correct translation” (History of the Church, vol. 2, p. 351). If the Book of Abraham is not a literal translation of the papyrus, then the introduction to it which appears in the Pearl of Great Price is a misrepresentation, for it plainly states:

TRANSLATED FROM THE PAPYRUS, BY JOSEPH SMITH.

A Translation of some ancient Records, that have fallen into our hands from the catacombs of Egypt.—The writings of Abraham while he was in Egypt, called the Book of Abraham, written by his own hand, upon papyrus. (Pearl of Great Price, p. 29)

“Bushels of Nonsense”

It would appear that Professor Nibley wants us to forget about the papyri and judge the Book of Abraham by its similarity to a number of old apocryphal writings. He wrote the following in an article published in Dialogue: A Journal of Mormon Thought:

But after all, what do the papyri tell us? That Joseph Smith had them, that he studied them, and that the smallest and most insignificant-looking of them is connected in some mysterious way to the Pearl of Great Price. There is really very little new here to shed light on the Book of Abraham. We must look elsewhere for further light and knowledge . . . We are completely in the dark as to how it was produced, but we are anything but helpless with the wealth of detailed material it offers us to test it by. The strange history, the strange rites, the strange doctrines all meet us again and again in ancient sources far removed from Egypt but all connected with the name of Abraham. . . . No Egyptian evidence, perhaps, but then Egyptian sources are not the only sources, and it is folly to come out with a verdict about the Book of Abraham until we have studied fully and carefully the great and growing corpus of ancient Abrahamic literature, even if it takes us years to get through it.

For after all, the Book of Abraham itself is a book of legends about Abraham which can at least give us hints as to whether Joseph Smith was making it all up or not. . . .

Now the Abraham literature is of course a great hodge-podge of stuff coming from many different sources and many different centuries. But because of the ways in which legends and traditions were swapped around anciently, with very ancient and authentic bits sometimes turning up in the most unlikely places, often buried in bushels of nonsense, we cannot escape the obligation of reading everything. . . .

So now it is time to hear the other side of the story, for after all it is just possible that there are things that might be said in favor of the Book of Abraham. (Dialogue: A Journal of Mormon Thought, Summer 1968, pp. 102-105)

It has become very obvious to many people that Dr. Nibley is just stalling. He has no answers to give his people, and he is trying to make the issue as confused and drawn out as possible.

It should be noted that in the article cited above, Hugh Nibley says that “the Book of Abraham itself is a book of legends about Abraham . . .” Now, what does Nibley mean by this statement? How could it be a “book of legends about Abraham” unless it was written after Abraham was dead? If Professor Nibley is claiming that the Book of Abraham was composed after Abraham’s death, he is certainly denying the traditional view regarding this matter. Not only does the Introduction to the Book of Abraham state that it was written by Abraham’s “own hand upon papyrus,” but the text of the book itself is in the first person:

. . . I Abraham, saw that it was needful for me to obtain another place of residence; (Pearl of Great Price, Abraham 1:1)

At any rate, Dr. Nibley wants us to ignore the evidence which the “Sensen” fragment furnishes and wait for “years” while he searches through bushels of nonsense” and “legends” hoping that he may find something that may be used as evidence for the Book of Abraham. Such a suggestion is absurd. Why should we ignore the evidence furnished by the original papyrus and judge the Book of Abraham by its similarity to a number of old Apocryphal writings? The Mormon people cannot afford to wait for “years” while Dr. Nibley searches through this “great hodgepodge of stuff.” Now is the time to face this problem. The evidence furnished by the original papyrus is very clear. The Book of Abraham is a spurious work. It has no historical basis, and it is plain to see that it is a work of Joseph Smith’s own imagination!

Facing the Truth

After we published Grant Heward’s work on the papyri in the Salt Lake City Messenger, we received a letter in which the following appeared:

I’ve read your articles and in spite of everything you said I testify I know the Book of Abraham is the Word of God. If I was President McKay I would order Grant S Heward be assassinated.

In a letter dated July 20, 1968, this same man stated: “God knows I don’t really want the murder of Mr. Heward.” Instead, he had another solution. He felt that the President of the Church should order that the papyrus be destroyed:

I’ve come to the conclusion that the manuscript found was not the manuscript the Prophet Joseph Smith used. I think it is a forgery to force the Church to give the Negroes the priesthood. If I was President McKay I would have the manuscript destroyed.

We do not feel that this man is typical of the Mormon people. In fact, his letters show evidence that he is not a well adjusted person. Nevertheless, his thinking concerning the Book of Abraham is somewhat similar to that of many other Mormons. They would not go so far as to suggest that the papyrus or Grant Heward be destroyed, but they feel that the Book of Abraham is the “Word of God” and that any evidence to the contrary must be ignored. Some of Dr. Nibley’s suggestions concerning this matter are almost as ridiculous as the idea that the papyrus is a “forgery.”

The Mormon writer Klaus Hansen makes these observations in an article published in Dialogue: A Journal of Mormon Thought, Summer 1970, page 110:

To a professional historian, for example, the recent translation of the Joseph Smith papyri may well represent the potentially most damaging case against Mormonism since its foundation. Yet the “Powers That Be” at the Church Historian’s Office should take comfort in the fact that the almost total lack of response to this translation is an uncanny proof of Frank Kermode’s observation that even the most devastating acts of disconfirmation will have no effect whatever on true believers. Perhaps an even more telling response is that of the “liberals,” or cultural Mormons. After the Joseph Smith papyri affair, one might well have expected a mass exodus of these people from the Church. Yet none has occurred. Why? Because cultural Mormons, of course, do not believe in the historical authenticity of the Mormon scriptures in the first place. So there is nothing to disconfirm.

Marvin S. Hill, who teaches history at Brigham Young University, seems to feel that the church can survive the attack on the Book of Abraham by appealing to the fact that it is led by revelation at the present time:

While Mormons venerate their sacred books...the final word comes not from any scriptural passage but from the living oracles. The Saints hang more upon the words of their prophets than upon the canons of the written law. This is one reason it may make little difference to them if they are told that some of the divine books have been altered, or even that the accepted view of the origin of one of their books might have to be revised. . . . Yesterday’s mistakes and revisions seem insignificant when compared with the advantage of social stability which derives from waiting upon the word of the Lord. (Dialogue: A Journal of Mormon Thought, Autumn 1970, p. 96)

Our observations lead us to believe that there are a growing number of Mormons who are rejecting the Book of Abraham. Grant Heward was one of the first to openly attack its authenticity, and for this offense he was called in by church leaders to stand trial for “alleged circulation of literature challenging the validity of the translation of a standard work of the Church” (Letter dated June 14, 1967). He was excommunicated from the church on June 21, 1967. Naomi Woodbury, another Mormon who has studied Egyptology, also came out against the divinity of the Book of Abraham. In a letter published in Dialogue: A Journal of Mormon Thought, Autumn 1968, page 8, she made these comments:

I myself studied Egyptian hieroglyphics at UCLA several years ago in the hope of resolving some of the problems connected with the “Book of Abraham” in Joseph Smith’s favor. Unfortunately, as soon as I had learned the language well enough to use a dictionary I was forced to conclude that Joseph Smith’s translation was mistaken, however sincere it might have been. Facsimile No. 2 in the Pearl of Great Price contained enough readable writing to convince me that it had purely Egyptian significance. This was a disappointment to me, but the discovery has given me more time to restructure my thinking about Joseph Smith and the Book of Abraham than most of your readers will yet have had. My faith in the Church rests on personal feelings, but it has to find a place for historical facts as well.

After the appearance of the photographs of the papyri . . . I made some attempt to translate the “Book of Breathing[s]” text, with the help of . . . a book which included . . . a fairly good text of the “Book of Breathings”. . . It belongs to a kind of literature which is alien to Christianity and to our Church. . . .

Let us not lose sight of what I think is the primary importance of this papyri find. It can free us from our dilemma about excluding Negroes from the Priesthood. Perhaps our Father in Heaven intended the papyri to come to light now for just this purpose.

The rediscovery of the papyri was probably one of the most important factors in causing Thomas Stuart Ferguson to lose his faith in Joseph Smith’s work. As we indicated earlier, Ferguson has devoted a great deal of his life in trying to prove the Book of Mormon by archaeology and is recognized by the Mormon people as a great defender of the faith. He is the founder of the New World Archaeological Foundation and has written many articles and books defending the church’s position.

When the papyri were first discovered Thomas Stuart Ferguson submitted them to a test. In the Newsletter and Proceedings of the Society For Early Historic Archaeology, Brigham Young University, March 1, 1968, we find the following:

Thomas Stuart Ferguson, an Orinda, California, attorney and one-time general officer of the SEHA, has written the following, dated December 28:

Yesterday, I spent an hour and a half with Professor Emeritus Henry Lutz, an Egyptologist of the University of California. . . . At my request he looked at the Egyptian glyphs found at the Metropolitan Museum of Art in New York City as published in the Church Section of the Deseret News the first week of December. I had clipped them from the paper, and he had no notice as to where they came from or that they had any significance to the LDS people. He gave me a perfectly candid and honest opinion that all are from the Book of the Dead.

On November 12, 1968, Thomas Stuart Ferguson wrote us a letter in which he remarked: “You are doing a great thing—getting out some truth on the Book of Abraham.” On December 2, 1970, he paid us a visit and among other things he told us that he had given up the Book of Abraham.

It seems that after showing the photographs clipped from the church’s Deseret News to Professor Lutz, Thomas Stuart Ferguson obtained enlarged photographs of the papyrus fragments. He consulted with both Professor Lutz and Professor Lesko of the University of California. Both these Egyptologists agreed that the “Sensen” text was the Book of Breathings made for a man by the name of Hor. As we have already shown, Mr. Ferguson’s examination of Joseph Smith’s Egyptian Alphabet and Grammar convinced him that the “Sensen” text was the one Joseph Smith used in producing the Book of Abraham. Therefore, he came to the inevitable conclusion that the Book of Abraham was a spurious production.

Thomas Stuart Ferguson felt that Dr. Nibley's articles on the papyri were worthless because Nibley "is not impartial" and "because he could not, he dared not, he did not, face the true issue: 'Could Joseph Smith translate Egyptian?'" (Letter dated March 13, 1971).

The Facsimiles

Although Professor Nibley was later forced into publishing a translation of the "Sensen" text, at first he tried desperately to divert attention from the papyri and deal only with the facsimiles found in the Book of Abraham:

From the very beginning this writer has been rightly accused of an almost callous unconcern for the newly located papyri (all excepting the one matching Facsimile 1) as evidence for or against the authenticity of the Book of Abraham. . . . in the following articles we are going to discuss only the facsimiles and the interpretation thereof, passing by in silence those writings which do not belong to the Book of Abraham, even though that book may have been the end product of a process in which they had a part. . . .

For those who wish to attack or defend the Pearl of Great Price, there is quite enough material contained in the facsimiles to keep things lively for sometime to come, without having to wrangle about hypothetical claims while the clear-cut claims of the facsimiles go unheeded. (Improvement Era, Nov. 1968, pp. 36-38)

It certainly appears that Ferguson was right when he said Nibley "dared not . . . face the true issue." He evidently wants us to forget that the papyrus from which Joseph Smith "translated" the Book of Abraham has been located and judge the Book of Abraham by the facsimiles. This suggestion is almost as ridiculous as his suggestion that we judge the Book of Abraham by its similarity to a number of old apocryphal writings. The facsimiles are very important, of course, and we do intend to deal with them, but we feel that the most important thing is that the original fragment which Joseph

Smith used as the text of the Book of Abraham has been translated by Egyptologists and found to be nothing but an appendage to the "Book of Breathing." What better evidence could there be than that furnished by the translation of the original text? To ignore this evidence, as Nibley suggests, is to ignore the truth entirely.

Even though we can not accept Nibley's suggestion that we ignore the "Sensen" text, we feel that a very good case can be made against the Book of Abraham on the basis of the facsimiles alone. Facsimile No. 1, for instance, has now been identified as a part of the same scroll from which the "Sensen" text was taken. In other words, Facsimile No. 1 is in reality an illustration for the Book of Breathing. It was very providential that the original papyrus from which Facsimile No. 1 was copied is among the eleven fragments rediscovered at the Metropolitan Museum of Art. Professor Richard Parker comments concerning this papyrus:

This is a well-known scene from the Osiris mysteries, with Anubus, the jackal-headed god, on the left ministering to the dead Osiris on the bier. The pencilled (?) restoration is incorrect. Anubus should be jackal-headed. (Dialogue: A Journal of Mormon Thought, Summer 1968; p. 86)

Professor Klaus Baer gives this information:

The vignette on P.JS I is unusual, but parallels exist on the walls of the Ptolemaic temples of Egypt, the closest being the scenes in the Osiris chapels on the roof of the Temple of Dendera. The vignette shows the resurrection of Osiris (who is also the deceased owner of the papyrus) and the conception of Horus. Osiris (2) is represented as a man on a lion-couch (4) attended by Anubis (3), the jackal-headed god who embalmed the dead and thereby assured their resurrection and existence in the hereafter. (Ibid., Autumn 1968, pp. 117-18)

Klaus Baer, of the University of Chicago, has proved beyond all doubt that this is part of the same scroll which contained the small "Sensen" papyrus that Joseph Smith used as the basis for the text of the Book of Abraham. He has shown that when the two fragments are placed together they match perfectly (see photograph below).

Small "Sensen" Text

Original of Facsimile No. 1

This illustration shows that the small "Sensen" text which Joseph Smith used as a basis for the text in the Book of Abraham, joins with the fragment from which Facsimile No. 1 was drawn.

Writing in Dialogue: A Journal of Mormon Thought, Autumn 1968, page 112, Professor Baer explains:

They seem to have been cut apart after being mounted. The edges match exactly in the photograph, and the pattern of vertical lines drawn on the backing about 2 cm. apart continues evenly from P. JS XI onto the left end of P. JS I when the two are placed in contact.

Just before his article was printed in Dialogue, Klaus Baer went to Brigham Young University and examined the original papyrus fragments. His work with the original manuscripts confirmed the research he had done with photographs of the papyri. In an addendum to his article he gave the following information:

The reverse of the backings of both P. JS I and XI contains parts of the plan mentioned in n. 117, and they clearly adjoin as proposed in n. 15; matching upper and lower parts of handwriting are on the two pieces of paper with the cut going through the letters. The fiber patterns show that the papyri were adjoining parts of the same scroll and not simply mounted on adjoining pieces of paper. Papyrus fibers are always irregular and can be used (much like fingerprints) to check whether fragments come from the same sheet; in this case, the horizontal fibers on the left and right edges of P. JS I and XI, respectively, match exactly. (Dialogue: A Journal of Mormon Thought, Autumn 1968, pp. 133-134)

Dr. Hugh Nibley has conceded that Facsimile No. 1 was part of the same scroll:

Of particular interest to us is the close association of the Book of Breathings with the Facsimiles of the Book of Abraham. It can be easily shown by matching up the fibers of the papyri that the text of Joseph Smith Pap. No. XI was written on the same strip of material as Facsimile Number 1, the writing beginning immediately to the left of the “lion-couch” scene. The British Museum Book of Breathing, “the Kerasher Papyrus,” has both the “lion-couch” scene (Budge, Vignette No. 2b), and a scene resembling our Facsimile Number 3, though representing a patently different situation albeit with the same props and characters (Vignette No. 1). This last stands at the head of the “Kerasher” text, and suggests that our Fac. No. 3 was originally attached at the other end of the Joseph Smith Papyrus, coming after the last column, which is missing.

. . . Thus our “Sensen” Papyrus is closely bound to all three facsimiles by physical contact, putting us under moral obligation to search out possible relationships between the content of the four documents. (Brigham Young University Studies, Winter 1971, pp. 160-161)

In a caption for a picture of Facsimile No. 1 in Hugh Nibley’s book, The Message of the Joseph Smith Papyri, page 184, we find the following information:

The “Lion Couch” scene lies at the very heart of the Egyptian mysteries set forth in the Book of Breathings. Facsimile I from the Book of Abraham was the frontispiece to the Joseph Smith Book of Breathings, Pap. X and XI.

The text of the Book of Abraham itself reveals that the drawing shown as Facsimile No. 1 was supposed to be at the beginning of the scroll. In Abraham 1:12 we read:

And it came to pass that the priests laid violence upon me, that they might slay me also, as they did those virgins upon this altar; and that you may have a knowledge of this altar, I will refer you to the representation at the commencement of this record.

As we have already shown, Joseph Smith was “translating” from the small “Sensen” text. Since he was working from right to left, the drawing would have to appear on the right side of the scroll to be at the “commencement of this record.” The illustration shown on the last page proves that the drawing was found on the right side of the “Sensen” text, which is consistent with the statement found in Abraham 1:12. It is also consistent with a statement in Abraham 1:14 which speaks of Facsimile No. 1 as being “at the beginning” of the record.

Klaus Baer carries the matter a step further and shows that the name Hor, which is found in the “Sensen” text and on the fragment Joseph used for Facsimile No. 1, is also found on Facsimile No. 3. He comments:

Even though Hor is a relatively common name in Greco-Roman Egypt, this does suggest that “Facsimile No. 3” reproduces a part of the same manuscript that “Facsimile No. 1” does. Hor’s copy of the Breathing Permit would then have had two vignettes, one at the beginning and another (“Facsimile No. 3”) at the end, an arrangement that is found in other copies of the same text. . . . a comparison with the photograph shows that “Facsimile No. 1” was originally printed actual size, so the fact the “Facsimiles Nos. 1 and 3” are about the same height may well be significant. It is what would be expected if they came from the same scroll. (Dialogue: A Journal of Mormon Thought, Autumn 1968, p. 127)

Klaus Baer reads the name Hor from the hieroglyphs that appear at the bottom of the scene shown in Facsimile No. 3. These hieroglyphs are very unclear in most modern editions of the Pearl of Great Price, but in the first printing which appeared in the Times and Seasons in 1842 they are readable.

Facsimile No. 2 was not part of the papyrus roll written for “Osiris Hor”; nevertheless, Joseph Smith added writing from the “Sensen” fragment onto Facsimile No. 2. Among the words which he added we find the Egyptian words which mean “Book of Breathings.” We will have more to say about this later.

At the bottom of this page the reader will find a rough sketch of how the papyrus roll probably fits together.

A FACSIMILE FROM THE BOOK OF ABRAHAM

No. 2

EXPLANATION OF THE FOREGOING CUT

Fig. 1. Kolob, signifying the first creation, nearest to the celestial, or the residence of God. First in government, the last pertaining to the measurement of time. The measurement according to celestial time, which celestial time signifies one day to a cubit. One day in Kolob is equal to a thousand years according to the measurement of this earth, which is called by the Egyptians Jah-oh-eh.

Fig. 2. Stands next to Kolob, called by the Egyptians Oliblish, which is the next grand governing creation near to the celestial or the place where God resides; holding the key of power also, pertaining to other planets; as revealed from God to Abraham, as he offered sacrifice upon an altar, which he had built unto the Lord.

Fig. 3. Is made to represent God, sitting upon his throne, clothed with power and authority; with a crown of eternal light upon his head; representing also the grand Key-words of the Holy Priesthood, as revealed to Adam in the Garden of Eden, as also to Seth, Noah, Melchizedek, Abraham, and all to whom the Priesthood was revealed.

Fig. 4. Answers to the Hebrew word Raukeyang, signifying expanse, or the firmament of the heavens; also a numerical figure, in Egyptian signifying one thousand; answering to the measuring of the time of Oliblish, which is equal with Kolob in its revolution and in its measuring of time.

Fig. 5. Is called in Egyptian Enish-go-on-dosh; this is one of the governing planets also, and is said by the Egyptians to be the Sun, and to borrow its light from Kolob through the medium of Kae-e-vanrash, which is the grand Key, or, in other words, the governing power, which governs fifteen other fixed planets or stars, as also Floeese or the Moon, the Earth and the Sun in their annual revolutions. This planet receives its power through the medium of Kli-flos-is-es, or Hah-ko-kau-beam, the stars represented by numbers 22 and 23, receiving light from the revolutions of Kolob.

Fig. 6. Represents this earth in its four quarters.

Fig. 7. Represents God sitting upon his throne, revealing through the heavens the grand Key-words of the Priesthood; as, also, the sign of the Holy Ghost unto Abraham, in the form of a dove.

Fig. 8. Contains writings that cannot be revealed unto the world; but is to be had in the Holy Temple of God.

Fig. 9. Ought not to be revealed at the present time.

Fig. 10. Also.

Fig. 11. Also. If the world can find out these numbers, so let it be. Amen.

Figures 12, 13, 14, 15, 16, 17, 18, 19, and 20, will be given in the own due time of the Lord.

The above translation is given as far as we have any right to give at the present time.

Egyptologists have always claimed that this is a hypocephalus—a disk placed under the head of the mummy. Their argument is very convincing because there are several hypocephali which are almost identical to the facsimile in the Pearl of Great Price.

On the next page we show a number of hypocephali that are similar to the one found in the Pearl of Great Price. According to the New York Times, Dr. Albert M. Lythgoe, who was Curator of the Egyptian Department of the Metropolitan Museum, made some interesting comments about Facsimile No. 2:

The third piece of writing published with the Mormon “Pearl of Great Price” was a circular disk, and this disk Dr. Lythgoe went over carefully.

“Egyptian scholars give this particular disk a name,” he said. “They call it a ‘hypocephalus,’ which means literally ‘under the head.’ Like the length of garments on the figures and the kinds of lids on the stone jars this disk shows that the Mormons gained possession of a mummy and papyrus from the comparatively late Egyptian period. During our work in Egypt last Winter we obtained some of those disks that were nothing but slabs of Nile mud.

“Here is a disk of exactly the same sort,” Dr. Lythgoe remarked, as he turned to a volume of Egyptian religion by Adolf Erman.

On page 188 of this volume a drawing was found of a circular disk, which was almost exactly a duplicate of the disk from which the Mormon prophet took a record of Abraham in the act of receiving God’s word. (The New York Times, Magazine Section, Part 5, Dec. 29, 1912)

Dr. Hugh Nibley says there are “about a hundred” hypocephali known today (Speech given at University of Utah, May 20, 1968). Mormon writer George Reynolds tried to explain the presence of the other disks by stating:

It has been urged as an argument against the veracity of the translation by the Prophet Joseph Smith, of the circular cut or disc, . . . that numerous copies of it exist, scattered among the museums of Europe. These copies have been found buried with mummies . . . Instead of being an argument against the truthfulness of the translation given by Joseph Smith, we consider it a very strong one in its favor. For this reason, Egyptologists acknowledge that some peculiar potency was ascribed to it by the ancient Egyptians, but their ideas are very vague as to in what that power consisted. . . . Accompanying the mummy is also often found this sacred disc, or hypociphilas, as the learned term it, which if we mistake not, was usually placed under or near the head of the mummy. . . . The Egyptians buried this disc containing these sacred words with their dead, for very much the same reason that the Saints bury their dead in the robes of the holy priesthood. No doubt the true meaning of these key words were soon lost from amongst the Egyptians, but they knew enough to understand something of their value, and as ages rolled on, their apostate priesthood doubtlessly invented some myth to take their place. (Are We of Israel? and The Book of Abraham, pp. 94-95)

Falsification Proven

For over a hundred years Egyptologists have claimed that the Facsimiles in the Book of Abraham were altered before publication. Deveria was probably the first Egyptologist to charge that the Mormons had altered the Facsimiles. He stated:

It is evident to me that several of the figures to be found in these various manuscripts have been intentionally altered. (A Journey to Great Salt Lake, vol. 2, as quoted in Deseret News, January 4, 1913, p. 4)

In rebuttal to Deveria’s charge, George Reynolds made this statement: “. . . what earthly reason there could be for the ‘Mormons’ attempting to alter them, is beyond our comprehension” (Are We of Israel? and The Book of Abraham, p. 131). The Mormon historian B. H. Roberts said that the idea that the Mormons would have purposely changed the figures or altered the text was “out of the question” (Improvement Era, vol. 16, p. 314). When Prof. Edgar J. Banks charged that Joseph Smith had altered the drawings, Sterling B. Talmage replied:

. . . this author shows his lack of careful study by boldly asserting, on no authority but his own, that Joseph Smith has “altered the drawings to suit his purpose,” an accusation that has not been made before, on account of its palpable absurdity. (Ibid., p. 771)

Now that some of the original papyri have been located we have definite proof that the drawings in the Book of Abraham have been altered and that they cannot be relied upon. The evidence of falsification is irrefutable.

Although the original hypocephalus from which the Mormons copied Facsimile No. 2 has not been located, the papyri that have been found prove that the drawing which appears in the Pearl of Great Price has been falsified. Evidently the original hypocephalus which Joseph Smith had was damaged. Portions of it were either unreadable or they had fallen away. When the Mormons made the woodcut for Facsimile No. 2, they falsely inserted writing from other papyri which was not on the hypocephalus. The fact that part of the hypocephalus was either missing or damaged is proven by a drawing which appears in Joseph Smith's Egyptian Alphabet and Grammar. This drawing was suppressed for 130 years. The reader will find a photograph of this drawing in Example No. 1 which is printed at the bottom of this page. Notice the missing areas on this drawing.

In Example No. 2 the reader will find a photograph of Facsimile No. 2, as it was first published in the Times and Seasons in 1842. Notice that the missing areas have been filled in.

In the study which follows we will use photographs of Facsimile No. 2 as it appears in the church's first publication of it in Times and Seasons, vol. 3, between pages 721 and 722. It is important that we do this because there have been many additional changes made since 1842. Dr. James R. Clark, of Brigham Young University, makes these comments about the changes:

It is necessary to raise a caution against using any printing of these facsimiles except that prepared by Joseph Smith. Later plates made of these cuts or facsimiles show some marked changes in the form and completeness of the symbols. Failure to use these original printings has been a serious weakness of all subsequent criticisms of Joseph Smith as a translator. To the investigator's knowledge there has never been an appraisal of Joseph Smith's ability as a translator which has been based on these original printings done under his personal supervision, by any scholar or linguist, and subsequent printings that have been used in such criticism can be demonstrated to be defective printings. (Progress in Archaeology, B.Y.U. Archaeological Society, 1963, p. 30)

Mormon writers have criticized F. S. Spalding for using the 1907 printing of the Pearl of Great Price, instead of the 1842 printing in the Times and Seasons. James R. Clark charged:

An additional damaging reflection on Bishop Spalding's "competent" investigation is the demonstrable fact that the facsimiles that Bishop Spalding used contained printer's errors. If he was so competent or if his scholars were competent, why did they not bother to even know that the 1842 printing of the facsimiles done under Joseph Smith's personal supervision are far more accurate than the 1907 printing which he submitted to his "world's greatest Egyptologists." (The Story of the Pearl of Great Price, pp. 59-61)

Speaking of the facsimiles that Spalding sent to the Egyptologists, Dr. Hugh Nibley wrote:

... the miserable copies that Bishop Spalding circulated among his jury of experts made a very poor impression, and their raw clumsiness was in every case attributed to the Prophet himself. ... It makes all the difference in the world what particular text a scholar has to work with, as a comparison of the recently discovered original of Facsimile 1 with the copies of it that Spalding sent to the critics should make clear to anyone. (Improvement Era, February 1968, pp. 20-21)

Because Nibley does not clarify who was responsible for the "miserable copies," the reader might get the impression that Spalding altered the copies that he sent to the Egyptologists. Now, what was it that Spalding sent to the Egyptologists anyway? It was the Pearl of Great Price—the official publication of the Mormon Church—which contains the facsimiles. Dr. James R. Clark says that it was the "1907 printing" of the Pearl of Great Price that the Egyptologists examined (Story of the Pearl of Great Price p. 61).

Now, why should Hugh Nibley make a point out of the fact that Spalding submitted "miserable copies" to the Egyptologists, when it was the Mormons themselves who made the changes and alterations in the facsimiles?

In the Brigham Young University Studies, Professor Nibley admits that the facsimiles which the church published in the Pearl of Great Price were not accurate:

The Pearl of Great Price itself admirably illustrates the issue. The Facsimiles now in use are extremely bad reproductions, far inferior to the first engravings published in 1842. Am I, then, as a member of the Church bound to consult the present official edition and that only, and regard it as flawless, bad as it is, because it is the official publication of the Church? (Brigham Young University Studies, Winter 1968, p. 177)

EXAMPLE NO. 1—A drawing of the Mormon Hypocephalus which appears in Joseph Smith's Egyptian Alphabet and Grammar. The drawing was suppressed for 130 years. The reader will notice missing areas on this drawing.

EXAMPLE NO. 2—A photograph of Facsimile No. 2 as it was first published in the Times and Seasons in 1842. Notice that the areas that are blank in the drawing to the left have been filled in.

We are glad that Dr. Nibley has made this statement, for it is certainly the truth. But, we ask, why did he not include it in his article in the Improvement Era? As his article stands in the Era the reader might get the impression that F. S. Spalding made the changes, whereas the truth is that the Mormon leaders were responsible. In the Improvement Era, April 1968, page 65, Nibley said that Spalding was “way out of bounds” when he sent “by far the worst copies of all to his eight judges . . .” If Bishop Spalding was “way out of bounds” when he submitted these copies to Egyptologists, weren’t the Mormon leaders “way out of bounds” when they allowed them to be printed that way? In the 1972 edition of this book we wrote: “We would think that the Mormon leaders would have the best and most accurate copies of the Facsimiles in modern editions, but such is not the case.” Since this statement was printed, the Church has returned to the Times and Seasons engravings in some printings of the Pearl of Great Price. A copy we purchased in 1978 still has the “extremely bad reproductions” in it, but it is rumored that all copies will eventually be changed so that they contain the engravings from the Times and Seasons.

From the information given above the reader will see that it is important that we use a photograph of the 1842 printing of Facsimile No. 2.

In order to make a detailed study of Facsimile No. 2 it is necessary that we dissect it into several parts and assign a letter to each part. Below (to the left) the reader will find a photograph of Facsimile No. 2 which we have dissected and labeled for this study.

Part A

Grant Heward has been convinced for sometime that Facsimile No. 2 contains portions that have been falsified. He finally came to the conclusion that the damaged or missing areas around the edge of Facsimile No. 2 had been filled in with hieratic characters. (The hypocephalus is supposed to be written in hieroglyphic characters.) Working on this theory he made an astounding discovery. He found that the characters had been copied from the same piece of papyrus Joseph Smith used as a basis for the text in the Book of Abraham.

Below is a photograph of the right side of Facsimile No. 2 as it appears in Joseph Smith’s Egyptian Alphabet and Grammar. Below this is a photograph of Part A from the first printing in the Times and Seasons. Notice that the missing areas have been filled in with characters from the fragment of papyrus Dr. Nibley labeled “XI. Small ‘Sensen’ text (unillustrated).” One group of characters from line two of the “Sensen” fragment was copied twice along the edge of Facsimile No. 2. The characters which follow were taken from line 3. The remaining characters were probably taken from line 4, but they are poorly copied.

The characters which were used to fill in the blank area were added in upside down, so that they read in the opposite direction to the rest of the text.

Part B

After Grant Heward told us of his discovery concerning the characters that were inserted around the outer edge, we examined the hypocephalus and found the word “Sensen” written in Figure 14. A more careful check revealed that the entire name of the “Book of Breathings” had been written in Figures 14 and 15. These characters were taken from the fourth line of the fragment which has been identified as the one used for the Book of Abraham text. The remaining part of the fourth line is written in Figure 13. Other characters have been added in Figure 12. We do not know exactly where these characters were taken from, but Wesley Walters has found them written at the bottom of the same sheet of paper that contains the piece of papyrus which was included in Joseph Smith’s Egyptian Alphabet and Grammar. These characters also appear to be written in hieratic. The characters which are added in Figures 12-15 are written in the areas that were damaged or missing on the original disk. Below is a comparison of this portion of the drawing as it appeared in the “Egyptian Alphabet and Grammar” (to the left) with the way it appeared in the Times and Seasons (to the right). We have turned Part B upside down, so that the numbers 12-15 are facing up. When we do this, however, it makes the hieroglyphics upside down. The hieratic writing that is added in is right side up to the numbers, but upside down to the hieroglyphic writing.

“Egyptian Alphabet and Grammar”

Times and Seasons

In the photograph below we have dissected Figures 13-15 and placed them in a line so that we can compare them with characters from the fourth line of the fragment of papyrus which has been identified as the source of the text of the Book of Abraham.

The Egyptologist M. Theodule Deveria examined these lines more than a hundred years ago and made this comment:

12-15. Four lines of writing similar to the former, of which they are the pendant. They appear to be numbered upside-down, and are illegibly copied. (Journey to Great Salt Lake City, vol. 2, as quoted in Deseret News, January 4, 1913)

Now that we know the truth about these lines it is easy to understand why Deveria was unable to read them. Who would suspect the lines are part hieratic writing and part hieroglyphic writing and that the hieratic has been added in upside down to the hieroglyphic?

Dr. Hugh Nibley was willing to admit that changes were made in the facsimiles after Joseph Smith’s death. In fact, he went so far as to state:

... we shall have occasion to note what drastic alterations they have suffered through the years at the hands of their various copyists.

... It is as if the Mormons had felt that these drawings, since they are mere symbols anyway, may be copied pretty much as one pleases. (Improvement Era, April 1968, p. 65)

Nevertheless, he was unwilling to admit that the 1842 printing of the facsimiles contained falsifications. In the face of documented proof that Facsimile No. 2 has been falsified, Dr. Nibley stated:

Then too, we must recognize that there are sections of hieroglyphic text in Facsimile 2 that present-day Egyptologists read without too much trouble: since these legible portions are found to be correct and conventional Egyptian, it is perfectly plain that nobody has falsified or jumbled them, as was charged. That is to say, whenever the text can be checked, everything is found to be in order. (Improvement Era, September 1968, p. 74)

We had presented the evidence of falsification in the Summer 1968 issue of Dialogue: A Journal of Mormon Thought, and therefore we were very disturbed to find Nibley would deny these false restorations. We reprinted the evidence in the November 1968 issue of the Salt Lake City Messenger and were able to distribute thousands of copies. It seems that truth has prevailed, for Professor Nibley now admits that “restorations” were made in Facsimile No. 2 during Joseph Smith’s lifetime:

(4) The Hedlock engraving when compared with an early sketch showing parts of Facsimile No. 2 to be missing shows definite signs of attempted restoration.

(5) The restoration was not as extensive as the other sketch would indicate, and no clear instances of such have been demonstrated on Facsimile No. 1.

(6) The restorations of Facsimile No. 2 are limited to the filling in of gaps, not the alteration of existing symbols. (Brigham Young University Studies, Autumn 1968, page 95)

Even though Dr. Nibley now admits that restorations were made, he seems unwilling to face the implications:

They: Let’s turn to Facsimile No. 2, where we have much clearer evidence of restoration. In the Church Historian’s Office among the papers of the EAG is a rather well-done pen-and-ink sketch of the facsimile made by some Mormon at an early date. This, we believe, is the way the hypocephalus looked when it came into Joseph Smith’s hands; and in it there are certain parts missing and we are shown exactly what they are. Now these parts are not missing in the official engraving of the hypocephalus, Facsimile No. 2, which can only mean that they have been later supplied. You will notice that a large part of the inscription around the rim is missing, and this has been filled in with hieratic characters from other papyri definitely known to have been in the possession of Joseph Smith. So there you have it.

We: Since the restored portions of the rim with their crude repetitions (hardly an attempt to be subtle) are not a subject of inspired commentary, we don’t think that is too important. (BYU Studies, Autumn 1968, pp. 86-87)

Although Joseph Smith does not try to translate the writing around the rim, he states that it “will be given in the own due time of the Lord” (Pearl of Great Price, Book of Abraham, p. 35). We feel that this matter cannot be as easily dismissed as Dr. Nibley would have us believe. To begin with, it shows that Joseph Smith knew absolutely nothing about the Egyptian language, for the portion which is added from the “Book of Breathings” is written in hieratic, whereas the writing that appears on Facsimile No. 2 is hieroglyphic writing. Also, the characters that were added into the blank area were added upside down, so that they read in the opposite direction to the rest of the text.

We feel that this matter also reflects seriously upon Joseph Smith’s honesty. Scholars, of course, do not object to restorations in a text if they are sincere attempts to restore a missing portion. For instance, in 1961 a stone inscription was found at Caesarea. The second line was damaged, but scholars were able to read: “. . . tius Pilate” (The Biblical World, edited by Charles E. Pfeiffer, p. 156). Since Pontius Pilate had resided in Caesarea, they felt that it was reasonable to restore “Pon” to complete the name “Pontius Pilate.” This type of restoration is reasonable. In Joseph Smith’s case, however, it seems to be an attempt to deceive rather than to restore what was on the original document. No one who is honest with himself could approve of these false restorations. How can we possibly trust the rest of Joseph Smith’s Book of Abraham after seeing what he did with Facsimile No. 2?

At the Book of Abraham Symposium, the Mormon scholar Richley Crapo was very honest with regard to the falsification of Facsimile No. 2:

An examination of the hypocephalus from the point of view of expectations based upon the normal makeup of such documents reveals that there are several anomalous figures in Facsimile Number 2. . . . the etic investigator is forced to ask himself if, perhaps, the original document from which the facsimile was copied was damaged at the time the wood-cut was made, the figures in question having been missing and merely filled in on the wood-cut from elsewhere. The probability of the damaged state of the original document—and thereby of the “restored” nature of the facsimile—is further enhanced when one discovers that a hand-drawn copy of this hypocephalus is to be found in Joseph Smith’s “Valuable Discovery Notebook”—. . . this hand-drawn copy of Joseph Smith is incomplete, and interestingly the sections which were left undrawn in his copy are exactly those which contain unexpected or anomalous figures in the facsimile! Unless this is an extreme coincidence, this seems to confirm the idea that these anomalous areas of the facsimile were actually missing from the papyrus when Joseph copied it . . . an examination of the dozen available papyri reveals possible sources for most of the figures in question. . . . all the blank space of Joseph Smith’s copy of the hypocephalus—the right rim and half of the right-hand quadrant—is filled, the facsimile, with hieratic symbols which are upside down with respect to the hieroglyphic signs of the rest of the rim and lines on which they are found. Thus, these lines begin in hieroglyphic writing and change, mid-line into upside-down hieratic with a different message content. Finally, it is found that these added hieratic words are taken verbatim and in order—with a repetition of one phrase—from another of the papyri, the important Small Sen-Sen Papyrus itself! This seems to clinch the matter, since these signs are not just unexpected, but inconsistent in both positioning and nature of writing as well as meaning content from the rest of the hypocephalus. It would seem indisputable that the Facsimile Number 2 is indeed a copy of a damaged hypocephalus and has been incorrectly “restored” from other of the Joseph Smith Papyri. This is another ethically discovered fact which must be dealt with by L.D.S. scholars in arriving at a satisfactory analysis of the papyri and their significance for L.D.S. scriptures and doctrines. (Book of Abraham Symposium, April 3, 1970, pp. 28-29)

The Mormon Egyptologist Michael Dennis Rhodes concedes that Facsimile No. 2 was falsely reconstructed with part of the “Book of Breathings” added upside down to the rest of the text:

When perusing Facsimile 2, one is immediately struck by the contrast between most of the hieroglyphic signs, which are readily recognizable, and the signs of the right third of the figure on the outer edge as well as the outer portions of the sections numbered 12-15. On closer examination, these prove to be hieratic and inverted (that is, upside down to the rest of the text). And, most surprising of all, these hieratic characters are recognizable as a fairly faithfully rendered copy of lines 2, 3, and 4 of the Church papyrus XI, which contains a portion of the Sensen papyrus or Book of Breathings. Especially clear is the actual word, snsn, in section 14, . . . Why this was done I am not sure. I can only postulate that these portions of the hypocephalus were damaged (a common enough occurrence because of the extremely fragile condition of these documents), and someone (the printer, one of the Prophet’s associates, or Joseph Smith himself) copied these characters off the Sensen papyrus so that the facsimile would look complete. In support of this view is an ink drawing of Facsimile 2 in the Church Historian’s Office which shows blanks in these sections. (Brigham Young University Studies, Spring 1977, p. 263)

Edward H. Ashment, a Mormon Egyptologist who demonstrated that Hugh Nibley made grave errors in his work, has also admitted that Facsimile No. 2 has suffered from “conjectural restorations”:

The Church Historian’s (CH) facsimile is different from the Hedlock version (Plate 5) in one very important way: it reveals that the original papyrus was damaged in the very areas in which Hedlock’s version radically differs from other Egyptian hypocephali . . .

Finally, attention must be given to the hieroglyphic texts of Facsimile 2 even though they “are not a subject of inspired commentary” and have been considered as not being “too important.” On the contrary, they are very important in that they help to conclusively identify the damaged areas in the Hedlock woodcut (which are already outlined in the CH copy), as well as to provide information about the “instruction [Joseph Smith gave to Reuben Hedlock] concerning the arrangement of the writing on the large cut, illustrating the principles of astronomy [i.e., Facsimile 2].”

It comes as no surprise then, that the areas in which the Prophet conceivably could have given “instruction” to Reuben Hedlock “concerning the arrangement of the writing” are those where lacunae exist in the CH document but in which the Hedlock version has material, mostly written upside down and backwards in a different script, the subject matter of which radically differs from that of the rest of the texts on the hypocephalus. (Plates 5 and 6) Otherwise the CH copy and the Hedlock version are virtually the same, with the exception that the writing is much clearer on the former.

The basic document with all of the conjecturally restored material reveals, in addition to the vignettes already discussed, many signs that have come from the small snsn text (or Papyrus Joseph Smith XI, which was originally attached to Papyrus Joseph Smith I— see Plate 8); they appear along the right side of the rim panel and are interspersed on the right side of panels 12-15. As already noted, these texts are part of a different contextual unit, written upside down and backwards in the hypocephalus, and are in a different script from the rest of its texts. Why those characters were chosen, apparently by the prophet, to fill in the lacunae is not exactly known, for other signs written in hieroglyphic instead of hieratic were available and their style would have more closely approximated that of the hypocephalus. One possibility may be that those particular signs may have been well-known to the prophet in relation to the Book of Abraham manuscripts (Plate 9), with the result that he “gave instruction” to Hedlock to arrange them within the hypocephalus. Consequently, the fact that the prophet “gave instruction [sic] concerning the writing of the large cut,” together with the fact that that same writing is connected with the Book of Abraham manuscripts, implies that the prophet had some positive connection with the production of the Joseph Smith Egyptian Papers. Therefore, even though involvement with them on his part has been disputed, thoughtful reexamination of the evidence leads to the conclusion that the prophet was connected with the entire project.

In another location where the CH copy shows a lacuna, signs appear out of context in the Hedlock version. On the left side of the rim text of the latter, a group of signs appears which is virtually the same as a group in Fig. 22 from the CH copy (Illustration 38), and in the lacuna on the left side of Fig. 9 another group appears which is virtually identical to parts of a group on the left of Fig. 2 of the CH copy—the same group of signs (minus a stroke) that has been added at the left of Fig. 1. (Illustration 39) All of these represent apparent conjectural restorations. (Sunstone, December 1979, pp. 38, 42)

Edward H. Ashment does not try to dodge the issue; instead, he frankly admits that Joseph Smith was connected with the inaccurate reconstruction of the facsimiles:

It can be clearly ascertained that portions of Reuben Hedlock’s

Facsimiles 1 and 2 were conjecturally restored. Moreover, according to the diary entry for Friday, March 4, 1842, in the History of the Church, it is apparent that the prophet was connected with their production. . . . he probably was not as concerned with having historically accurate restorations of Facsimiles 1 and 2 as he was with having complete pictures to publish in the Times and Seasons. Neither he nor Reuben Hedlock would have known that a standing human body would have a dog's head (Facsimile 1, Fig. 3), nor that a bird would have a human head (Facsimile 1, Fig. 1). . . . It seems that they completed each damaged section with what was to them logical or important for whatever reason: a man's head on a man's body . . . a bird's head on a bird's body . . . (Ibid., p. 44)

Part C

The area at the top of Facsimile No. 2 (Part C) showing a god in a boat was evidently copied from the fragment of papyrus which Dr. Nibley labeled "IV. Framed ('Trinity') papyrus."

Below is a photograph of Part C as it appears in the drawing in Joseph Smith's Egyptian Alphabet and Grammar. Below this (to the left we have placed Part C as it was printed in the Times and Seasons. To the right of this we have placed the portion of "IV. Framed ('Trinity') papyrus" which we feel was added to Part C.)

Alphabet and Grammar

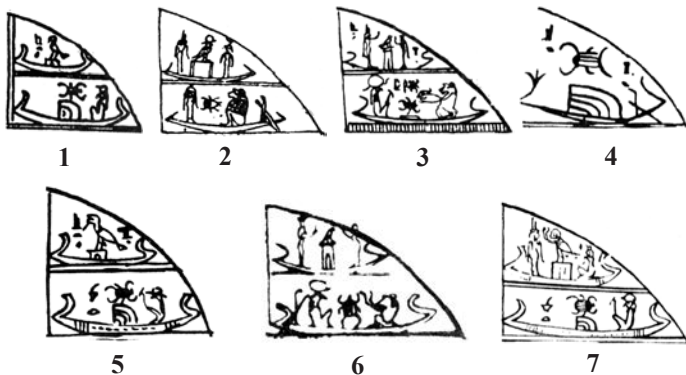

Times and Seasons

Framed ('Trinity') Papyrus

In all but one of our samples of hypocephali we find this area filled with two boats, and the one which has only one boat does not resemble Part C of Facsimile No. 2.

In the Improvement Era, vol. 17, page 333, R. C. Webb stated that "this figure differs from the representations found in the general run of hypocephali." Now that we have evidence that Joseph Smith added this portion from the "Trinity" papyrus, we understand why it differs from other hypocephali.

The Mormon Egyptologist Edward H. Ashment makes this comment concerning the matter:

Fig. 3 is almost entirely missing in the CH copy, the small trace possibly indicating the prow of a boat. At any rate, a falcon-headed figure in a boat was apparently copied from Papyrus Joseph Smith IV and inserted into this spot . . . (Sunstone, December 1979, p. 40)

Joseph Smith gave this interpretation of Part C:

Fig. 3 is made to represent God, sitting upon his throne, clothed with power and authority; with a crown of eternal light upon his head; representing also the grand Key-words of the Holy Priesthood, as revealed to Adam in the Garden of Eden, as also to Seth, Noah, Melchizedek, Abraham, and all to whom the Priesthood was revealed. (Pearl of Great Price, p. 35)

Joseph Smith would have us believe that this is a representation of the God of Abraham. Actually, it represents the Egyptian Sun-god. Dr. Albert M. Lythgoe, who was head of the Dept. of Egyptian Art at the Metropolitan Museum, made this statement concerning Part C:

And when it comes to the Mormon picture of "God on His Throne, signifying the Grand Key-Words of the Holy Priesthood as revealed to Adam in the Garden of Eden," why that is a sad joke.

The representation is the most common of all in Egyptian papyri. It is the view of the "Sun god in his boat." The Mormon version is right in that this is the picture of a god, but it is the chief god of a polytheistic people instead of God, who was worshipped by monotheistic Abraham, and pictures of him were among the widely distributed pictures in Egypt. (The New York Times, December 29, 1912)

Part D

Below is a comparison of Part D as it appears in the "Egyptian Alphabet and Grammar" (to the left) with the way it was printed in the Times and Seasons (to the right).

The reader will note that part of the drawing which appears in the Times and Seasons is a work of the imagination, for this area was missing in the drawing in the "Egyptian Alphabet." Notice that Joseph Smith reconstructed the one figure as a dove. This is not correct. The Egyptologist Deveria stated that it is supposed to be an "ithyphallic serpent," and that it "has certainly been altered in the hypocephalus of the Mormons." When we compare Part D on other hypocephali, we see that Deveria was correct. R. C. Webb's photographs have been "doctored" in Part D, but we have been able to obtain accurate photographs of two of these, plus the one that was published in the New York Times, December 29, 1912.

Joseph Smith gave this interpretation of Part D:

Fig. 7. Represents God sitting upon his throne, revealing through the heavens the grand Key-words of the Priesthood; as, also, the sign of the Holy Ghost unto Abraham, in the form of a dove. (Pearl of Great Price, p. 35)

After examining other hypocephali, we are convinced that what Joseph Smith claimed was “God” upon His throne and “the sign of the Holy Ghost” in the “form of a dove” is in reality a pagan drawing which is extremely crude in appearance. It would appear that the Mormon leaders have been trying to keep their people in the dark concerning this pornographic representation, for when they published pictures of different hypocephali in the book, Joseph Smith As a Translator, by R. C. Webb, the pictures were altered so that they did not have the same crude appearance. This book was printed by “The Deseret News Press”—a Mormon publishing company—in 1936. Below are two examples of Part D from accurate photographs compared with the same portions as they appear in Webb’s book:

We feel that five of “Dr. Webb’s” pictures, shown on page 336 of this book, have been altered in Part D.

The Mormon leaders apparently feared that the seated god in Facsimile No. 2 was also shown as ithyphallic, for in modern editions of the Pearl of Great Price, Part D has been altered. Below is a photograph of Part D as it was first published in the Times and Seasons in 1842 and the way it appears in editions of the Pearl of Great Price prior to 1981.

As noted earlier, in some recently printed copies of the Pearl of Great Price, the Times and Seasons’ engravings have been used, and there is a rumor that the church will eventually return to the original engravings in all of its printed copies. While scholars would welcome such a move, it would be obvious that the church was forced into the change by its critics and even some of its own scholars who are disturbed by the inaccurate reproductions which have appeared in the Pearl of Great Price.

In any case, we have been informed that the Mormon Apostle James E. Talmage spoke of this change and the reason for it in some of his papers, but since we were denied access to manuscripts in the LDS Church Library we were unable to confirm this.

The Mormon Egyptologist Michael Dennis Rhodes freely admits that Part D shows an ithyphallic god known as “Min”:

7. A seated ithyphallic god with a hawk’s tail, holding aloft the divine flail. Several gods of similar appearance are found on the Metternich Stela mentioned above. Before him is what appears to be a bird of some sort, presenting him with an Udjat-eye. In most other hypocephali it is a snake or an ape that is presenting the eye, but often this snake seems to have a hawk’s head. This snake is thought to be Nehebka, a snake god and one of the assessors in the 125th chapter of the Book of the Dead. Nehebka was considered a provider of nourishment, and as such was often shown presenting a pair of jars or the Udjat-eye, the symbol of all good gifts. . . .

The seated god is clearly a form of Min, the god of the regenerative, procreative forces of nature, perhaps combined with Horus as the hawk’s tail would seem to indicate.

Joseph Smith mentions here the Holy Ghost in the form of a dove and God “revealing through the heavens the grand key-words of the priesthood.” The procreative forces, receiving unusual accentuation throughout the representation, may stand for many divine generative powers, not least of which might be conjoined with the blessings of the Priesthood in one’s posterity eternally. (Brigham Young University Studies, Spring 1977, p. 273)

Even though the pictures are censored in R. C. Webb’s book, he gives a great deal of information which we would not expect in a book published by the Mormon Church:

Our study of the figures shown on the hypocephalus concludes with that numbered “7.” This includes a seated figure, opposite to which is another, apparently bird-headed, and with arms extended, as if in adoration, holding a sacred eye. A very similar group appears on nearly all known examples of hypocephalus; varying from that shown in our Facsimile No. 2, in the fact that the figure offering the sacred eye appears with an attenuated body—apparently a serpent, but with legs of human description. . . .

Of the seated figures very much more may be asserted with confidence. Evidently it is a composite of two figures as indicated by the body of a bird (the tail extending downward at the rear) with human head, legs and one arm, bent and held to the rear, supporting a bent object. In these signs, we have the distinctive marks of two separate “gods,” or “avatars”—to wit, Horus (with the hawk-body) and Min supporting a flail or whip upon the tip of his right-hand middle finger. . . . Of Min, it is correct, probably, to state that he was a conspicuous ba, or “soul,” of the Supreme—which is to say, that he was in origin, apparently a local deity, subsequently identified with the Supreme Godhead. He appears first as a phallic god of desert lands and of husbandry, . . . In any event, as is agreed generally, his significance is that of Creator, or Amon-Generator, the Father of the world. (Joseph Smith As a Translator, pp. 202-203)

In the Improvement Era, “Dr. Webb” made these comments:

The analysis of this group is very nearly the most interesting of any of the entire plate. In virtually all ‘hypocephali’ examined the space corresponding to this group is occupied by a seated winged figure, before which, in general, stands the phallic serpent “Nehebka,” as already suggested, holding the Uzat eye in outstretched hands. The figure called “Nehebka,” however, is radically different from the one shown in the present plate, the common point, in addition to the position, is the sacred eye held before the face of the seated figure. . . .

The group shown in the common run of hypocephali is evidently entirely phallic, the seated figure being usually identified with the dual god, Horus-Min, who, in certain local cults, combines the offices and functions of Horus and a deity known as Min. This latter was, according to Egyptologists, originally a local god of the desert, and of strangers, in general. He is also identified with a deity called Amsu. By other, or later, ascriptions, he becomes identified with the creative principle of nature, or the universal generative power typified in phallic symbols. . . .

There may be allowed to be a difference of opinion, as to whether the group here is the original form, or whether it is merely a variation of the usual, as shown on the common hypocephalus. There is, however, no obvious reason for changing from the phallic to the non-phallic character, if we consider this only one of a general run of Egyptian documents. On the other hand, there is a very good and sufficient reason for making the change from such a group as this to the phallic character, if the interpretation offered by Joseph Smith is in any sense correct. Smith called this seated figure “God sitting upon his throne,” hence the Creator of the universe. According to the conception evidently held by him, and, presumably also, by the original compiler of this group, the Almighty Creator operates by virtue of a word of power. To the Egyptian artist, the symbol of creative power is the phallic symbol. Hence, knowing, perhaps, that the group represented God, he embellished it according to one of the most popular of Egyptian concepts, relating to the beginning of things. The familiar variation of this group adds strong presumption in favor of the description given in Smith’s caption. (Improvement Era, vol. 16, p. 447)

It is strange that the Mormon leaders would allow “Dr. Webb” to tell so much, especially since they found it necessary to use altered pictures in his book. They probably felt that most people would not understand what he was talking about. R. C. Webb also discusses Part D in the Improvement Era, vol. 17, pages 333-334.

Part E

Part E of Facsimile No. 2 closely resembles at least two of our samples of hypocephali. Below is a comparison.

The reader will note that all of our samples shown at the beginning of this study are somewhat similar to Facsimile No. 2 in the area designated as Part E.

The four standing figures to the right in Part E are the four sons of Horus. The images of these gods are also carved on the canopic jars found beneath the bier in Facsimile No. 1. Professor Richard A. Parker identifies them as “human-headed Imseti, baboon-headed Hapy, jackal-headed Duamutef and falcon-headed Kebehsenuf” (Dialogue: A Journal of Mormon Thought, Summer 1968, p. 86).

Dr. Petrie gives this interesting information concerning the cow found on the hypocephalus:

“The hypocephalus appears to have had its origin in connection with Chapter clxii. of the Book of the Dead. From the rubric of this chapter we learn that the figure of the Cow Hathor was to be fashioned of gold, and placed upon the neck of the mummy; and that another was to be drawn upon papyrus, and placed under the head, the idea being to give ‘warmth’ to the deceased in the Underworld. After the Eighteenth Dynasty the cow-amulet fell into disuse, and the drawing upon papyrus developed into the hypocephalus, upon which the cow always remained an important figure.” (Statement by Dr. Petrie, as quoted in Joseph Smith As a Translator; by R. C. Webb, p. 155)

Part F

Part F is similar to several of our samples of hypocephali. Below is a comparison.

It is interesting to note that the lower portion of Part F is blank in the drawing in Joseph Smith’s Egyptian Alphabet and Grammar. In our Case Against Mormonism, vol. 3, p. 23, we show that the offering table was probably added from Facsimile No. 1.

The reader will note that the feet of the standing figure in all samples of hypocephali except the Mormon one face toward the right. Dr. Hugh Nibley has noticed this and admits that Facsimile No. 2 is incorrectly restored in this area: “The feet of Figure 2, on the other hand, facing as they do in the wrong direction, we agree to call a restoration” (BYU Studies, Autumn 1968, p. 92).

The Mormon Egyptologist Michael Dennis Rhodes comments concerning Part F: “2. A two-headed deity wearing the double-plumed crown of Amen, . . . That the deity is a form of Amen is clear from the fact that he is wearing the double plume crown mentioned in chapter 162 of the Book of the Dead, . . .” (BYU Studies, Spring 1977, pp. 268, 270). On page 260 of the same article, Rhodes cites the relevant portion from chapter 162 of the Book of the Dead: “1. To be recited: Greeting to you, mighty Par of the lofty Double plumes, possessor of the White crown [of Upper Egypt], equipped with the flail. You are Lord of the Phallus.”

Part G

From the drawing in the “Egyptian Alphabet” it would appear that a portion of Part G was missing on the original hypocephalus. Below is a comparison of Part G as it appears in Joseph Smith’s Egyptian Alphabet and Grammar (to the left) and as it appears in the Times and Seasons (to the right).

In other hypocephali the figure in the center seems to have four heads. Below is a comparison.

The Egyptologist M. Theodule Deveria made this comment concerning Part G of the Mormon hypocephalus:

The God is always represented with four rams’ heads, and his image has certainly been altered here. They have also evidently made a very clumsy attempt at copying the double human head of the god figured above, fig. 2, instead of the four rams’ heads. . . . (A Journey to Great Salt Lake City, vol. 2, as quoted in Deseret News, January 4, 1913)

We feel that Deveria’s theory that the Mormons filled in this area with the same “double human head of the god figured above” is probably correct. Below is a comparison of Part F and Part G.

The Mormon scholar Richley Crapo observes that the “seated two-faced god in the center of the hypocephalus has a head which corresponds remarkably to the head of the god Par, standing directly above it” (Book of Abraham Symposium, p. 28).

Part H

Part H on the Mormon hypocephalus (Fac. No. 2) is similar to our examples of other hypocephali found on page 366 of this book. Below is a comparison of Part H of Facsimile No. 2 with the samples of other hypocephali.

Part I

Part I of the Mormon Hypocephalus is similar to the “Leyden Hypocephalus.” They both have four lines of writing in this area. Below is a comparison of the two.

Joseph Smith has numbered this portion upside down. Samuel A. B. Mercer made this comment concerning this matter:

Figs. 8-11. Here indeed the Prophet’s inspiration gave out. It does not even save him the blunder of numbering the hieroglyphics upside down. . . . his numbering the hieroglyphic lines upside down shows that the Prophet did not know Egyptian. (The Utah Survey, September 1913 p. 24)

The last line of Part I of the Mormon Hypocephalus gives the name of the person for whom it was made. The Egyptologist John A. Wilson informs us that “A hypocephalus was a cartonnage disk which was placed under the head of a mummy toward the end of ancient Egyptian history. I think that the name of the owner appears as Sheshonk” (Dialogue: A Journal of Mormon Thought, Summer 1968, p. 68). Mormon Egyptologist Michael Dennis Rhodes likewise says that “From the text of the hypocephalus itself, it seems that the owner’s name was Sheshonk” (Brigham Young University Studies, Spring 1977, p. 263). It is interesting to note that the Egyptian name Sheshonk appears as Shishak in the Bible, 1 Kings 14:25-26. The Shishak mentioned there, however, is an enemy to the Lord’s people: “. . . Shishak king of Egypt came up against Jerusalem: . . . he took away the treasures of the house of the Lord, . . .” While the Mormon Hypocephalus bears the name Shishak, Egyptologists do not believe that the man mentioned there is the Shishak found in the Bible. According to The Biblical World, p. 527, Pharaoh Shishak dates from “940-915 B.C.” (about a thousand years after Abraham). The drawing shown in Facsimile No. 2 apparently dates from an even later period, and Egyptologists do not feel that it was prepared for a king.

Dr. W. M. Flinders Petrie read the name Shishak on Facsimile No. 2 in 1912. The presence of this name on Facsimile No. 2 seems to have troubled Dr. James R. Clark, and he suggested that it may have been added by a later scribe:

Could Dr. Petrie have been correct in reading the name of Shishak on Facsimile No. 2 and still not invalidate the translation of Joseph Smith? . . . Since the scholars have found these hypocephalli in late dynasty burials only, they have concluded that Joseph Smith’s papyrus must be from the late dynasties also. Two other possibilities exist, however, to explain the similarities. One is that not all of the inscription on Facsimile No. 2 from the Book of Abraham was written at Abraham’s time. The Facsimile may have been added to by some later scribe . . . is there a chance of some later inscriptions being added to the record after it left the hands of Abraham? . . .

If Dr. Petrie reads the name Shishak (or its equivalent) on Facsimile No. 2 of the Book of Abraham and Shishak lived between 950 and 750 B.C., while Abraham, on whose record his name is recorded lived around 2000 B.C. does that invalidate the record? Must we assume that the whole papyrus would have to be written either at 2000 B.C. or at 750 B.C.? Is it not possible that a scribe around 950-750 B.C. might have added this name and perhaps other names to the original record started but not finished by Abraham? . . . that Dr. Petrie may have recognized some of the forms of the characters on the facsimiles and even some of the words as having been of a later date need not invalidate the record as a whole as being the writings of Abraham and his patriarchal successors. (The Story of the Pearl of Great Price, pp. 119, 121-123)

Parts J and K

We have compared Parts of J and K with other hypocephali in our Case, vol. 3, page 27, but since these areas are not of any real importance we will not take the room to deal with them here.

Joseph Smith Responsible

In our examination of Facsimile No. 2 we have found that it was reconstructed in a most peculiar way. First, areas that are blank in the “Egyptian Alphabet and Grammar” have been filled in with characters and drawings from other documents. Second, lines of hieratic and hieroglyphic writing are joined together in a strange way—introducing foreign and unrelated thoughts. Third, to add to the confusion, the hieratic writing is inserted upside down in relation to the hieroglyphic text on the same lines.

The information presented above shows beyond all doubt that Joseph Smith did not have the slightest idea of what the Egyptian language or drawings were all about. He did not even seem to know when the Egyptian writing was upside down. The most serious indictment against him, however, is that he falsified the documents and made many imaginative additions to the drawings.

Dr. Hugh Nibley claims that Joseph Smith cannot be held responsible for mistakes in the Facsimiles:

First of all, Joseph Smith did not draw the Facsimiles; they were the work of a professional wood engraver, Reuben Hedlock, . . . Some critics have noted that some of the numbers that have been added to Facsimile 2 are upside down, and have again assumed that Joseph Smith put them that way; but as R.C. Webb points out, “There is no evidence before us that Smith is responsible for it.” (Improvement Era, February, 1968, p. 20)

It is true that Hedlock made the engravings, but we feel that Joseph Smith was responsible for what appeared in the Facsimiles. While he cannot be held responsible for any changes made after his death, he is certainly responsible for the falsifications that were made when the Book of Abraham was first published in 1842. Actually, Joseph Smith was the Editor of the Times and Seasons at the time the Facsimiles were published. Under the date of March 1, 1842, we find this statement in his History:

During the forenoon I was at my office and the printing office, correcting the first plate or cut of the records of Father Abraham, prepared by Reuben Hedlock, for the Times and Seasons, . . . (History of the Church, vol. 4, p. 519)

Under the date of March 4, 1842, we find this entry in Joseph Smith’s History:

Friday, 4.—At my office exhibiting the Book of Abraham in the original to Brother Reuben Hedlock, so that he might take the size of the several plates or cuts, and prepare the blocks for the Times and Seasons; and also gave instructions concerning the arrangement of the writing on the large cut, illustrating the principles of astronomy, with other general business. (Ibid., p. 543)

The “large cut” refers to the hypocephalus. The Mormon historian B. H. Roberts made this statement in a footnote at the bottom of the same page: “This refers to Facsimile No. 2, . . . which was published in the Times and Seasons in double page size.”

Joseph Smith’s statement that he “gave instructions concerning the arrangement of the writing” on this cut becomes much more significant now that we know that portions were added from other documents.

The Mormon apologist James R. Clark certainly felt that Joseph Smith was responsible for the accuracy of the work on the facsimiles:

It is significant and reassuring to us that Joseph Smith personally corrected the illustrations or Facsimiles and read the proof of the text of his translation of the Book of Abraham before he would allow copies of the Times and Seasons containing it to be circulated. (The Story of the Pearl of Great Price, p. 170)

Thus we see that Joseph Smith would have been aware of the falsifications made in the facsimiles, and therefore he stands responsible for the fraudulent reconstruction. While Dr. Hugh Nibley tried to pass the blame onto Hedlock, the Mormon Egyptologist Edward H. Ashment conceded that Smith was “connected” with the inaccurate reconstruction (see his statement on page 341 of this book).

“Cannot Be Revealed”

Although Joseph Smith gave his interpretation of the drawings on Facsimile No. 2, he did not attempt to read the hieroglyphic writing which appears upon it. He said that this information was not to be given to the world at that time:

Fig. 8. Contains writing that cannot be revealed unto the world; but is to be had in the Holy Temple of God.

Fig. 9. Ought not to be revealed at the present time.

Fig. 10. Also.

Fig. 11. Also. If the world can find out these numbers, so let it be. Amen.

Figures 12, 13, 14, 15, 16, 17, 18, 19, and 20, will be given in the own due time of the Lord.

The above translation is given as far as we have any right to give at the present time. (Pearl of Great Price, Book of Abraham, p. 35)

The science of Egyptology was in its infancy when Joseph Smith published these statements. Today it is possible for Egyptologists to read much of the writing which appears on Facsimile No. 2. The drawing which appears in the “Egyptian Alphabet and Grammar” and the original “Sensen” papyrus have helped scholars to read this writing. Even Dr. Nibley admits that Egyptologists are able to read at least some of the writing on the Mormon Hypocephalus:

Then too, we must recognize that there really are sections of hieroglyphic text in Facsimile 2 that present-day Egyptologists read without too much trouble: . . . (Improvement Era, September 1968, p. 74)

The translation of the hieroglyphic writing on Facsimile No. 2 deals another devastating blow to the Book of Abraham, for it does not contain a word about Abraham or his religion. In fact, it proves beyond all doubt that Facsimile No. 2 is a pagan document. In 1977 the Mormon Egyptologist Michael Dennis Rhodes published a translation of Facsimile No. 2 in Brigham Young University Studies. Since we feel that Rhodes has made a real contribution to the understanding of this facsimile, we are reproducing his translation in this book. Following it we have placed a photograph of Facsimile No. 2 (as it appears in the 1978 Pearl of Great Price) for easy reference purposes. Rhodes translates the Mormon Hypocephalus as follows:

Edge: I am Djabty in the House of the Benben in Heliopolis, so exalted and glorious. [I am] a copulating bull without equal. [I am] that Mighty God in the House of the Benben in Heliopolis . . . that Mighty God . . .

Left Middle: O God of the Sleeping Ones from the time of the creation. O Mighty God, Lord of Heaven and Earth, the Netherworld and his Great Waters, grant that the soul of the Osiris Sheshonk, may live.

Bottom: May this tomb never be desecrated, and may this soul and its possessor never be desecrated in the Netherworld.

Upper Left: You shall be as that God, the Busirian.

To the Left of the Standing Two-headed God: The name of this Mighty God. (Brigham Young University Studies, Spring 1977, p. 265)

While Dr. Nibley has not translated the writing on Facsimile No. 2, he has made some admissions which tend to confirm Michael Dennis Rhodes’ work. The following statements appear in the Improvement Era:

We must not overlook the fact that the name Iwnw or Heliopolis, occurring twice in the inscription around the rim of Facsimile No. 2, definitely associates the facsimile with the Heliopolitan cult. (Improvement Era, March 1969, page 80)

It is an interesting coincidence that the name Sheshonk (or Shishaq) is the one hieroglyphic word readily identified and unanimously agreed upon by the Egyptologists who have commented on Facsimile No. 2, where the name appears as Figure 8. How all this fits into the picture remains to be seen. (Ibid., April 1969, p. 72)

The reader will notice that Rhodes read the name “Sheshonk” in Figure 8 of Facsimile No. 2. He also found the word “Heliopolis” twice in Figure 18.

A Pagan Object

While Joseph Smith claimed that Fac. No. 2 was “A Facsimile From The Book of Abraham,” Michael Dennis Rhodes failed to find anything about the ancient patriarch. For many years we have maintained that it is nothing but a hypocephalus—an Egyptian funerary document filled with pictures and information about pagan gods and practices. Rhodes confirms that it is indeed a “hypocephalus” and that “The text of the hypocephalus itself seems to be an address to Osiris, the god of the Dead, on behalf of the deceased, Sheshonk” (Brigham Young University Studies, Spring 1977, p. 274). On page 260 of the same article Rhodes says that “Hypocephali first appeared during the Saite Dynasty (663-525 B.C.) and their use continued down at least to the Christian era. It is in the Saite recension of the Book of the Dead, chapter 162, that directions for the construction and use of the hypocephalus are given. . . . the meaning of the hypocephalus is intimately connected with chapter 162 of the Book of the Dead, . . .” This is certainly an astonishing admission to find in a publication printed by the Mormon Church’s own university. One would think that if it is a “Fac-simile From the Book of Abraham,” it would be “intimately connected with the Book of Abraham—not the Book of the Dead. In any case, Rhodes goes on to point out that the cow found in Facsimile No. 2 is in reality a pagan goddess:

This is the cow Ihet, mentioned in chapter 162 of the Book of the Dead, which should be drawn on a piece of new papyrus. This picture of a cow is common to almost all hypocephali. Ihet is a form of Hathor, the personification of the power of nature. She is also connected with Mehweret (Greek Methryr), another cow goddess who symbolized the sky. (Ibid., p. 272)

The relationship of the Mormon Hypocephalus to paganism becomes clearer as a person studies into the matter. For instance, Michael Dennis Rhodes reads these words on the edge of the facsimile: "I am Djabty in the House of the Benben in Heliopolis, . . ." (Ibid., p. 26) In footnotes 31-32 on the same page, Rhodes explains that "Djabty" is "an epithet of Osiris" and that the "House of the Benben" is "the name of the sun sanctuary in Heliopolis." On another part of the hypocephalus, Rhodes translates: "You shall be as that God, the Busirian." In footnote 43 he explains that "Busiris" is "a cult center of Osiris in the Delta, and thus used as an epithet of Osiris."

While Rhodes does not try to read the hieratic writing falsely inserted into the hypocephalus from the Sensen Papyrus, it has been translated by other Egyptologists and also bears witness of the pagan origin of the documents. As we have already pointed out, the words "Book of Breathings" stand out like a sore thumb.

Mormon apologists have searched in vain for any evidence that Facsimile No. 2 came from the hand of Abraham. All evidence points to the unmistakable conclusion that this is a pagan object and has nothing to do with Abraham or his religion.

Facsimile No. 1

Joseph Smith claimed that Facsimile No. 1 was a picture of an idolatrous priest trying to sacrifice Abraham on an altar. At the top of the next column is a photograph of Facsimile No. 1 as it is printed in the Pearl of Great Price, Book of Abraham, page 28. This is followed by Joseph Smith's interpretation of the drawing.

James R. Clark made this statement concerning Facsimile No. 1:

Another thing to be noticed about the Book of Abraham is that the Facsimiles are intended to serve as illustrations of the text. When Joseph Smith translated the text of Abraham 1:10-12 the whole idea of the altar and the sacrifice was contained in a single character.

But he, Abraham, wanted to make sure that his reader would clearly understand what the altar actually looked like so he "drew a picture" for his reader. That picture or illustration is Facsimile No. 1. (The Story of the Pearl of Great Price, p. 119)

Abraham himself was supposed to have made this statement concerning the drawing which appears in Facsimile No. 1:

And it came to pass that the priests laid violence upon me, that they might slay me also, as they did those virgins upon this altar; and that you may have a knowledge of this altar, I will refer you to the representation at the commencement of this record.

It was made after the form of a bedstead, such as was had among the Chaldeans, and it stood before the gods of Elkenah, Libnah, Mahmackrah, Korash, and also a god like unto that of Pharaoh, king of Egypt.

That you may have an understanding of these gods, I have given you the fashion of them in the figures at the beginning, which manner of the figures is called by the Chaldeans Rahleenos, which signifies hieroglyphics. (Pearl of Great Price, Book of Abraham, 1:12-14)

Egyptologists maintain that this scene is from funeral papyri and does not have anything to do with Abraham.

A FACSIMILE FROM THE BOOK OF ABRAHAM

No. 1

EXPLANATION OF THE ABOVE CUT

Fig. 1. The Angel of the Lord. 2. Abraham fastened upon an altar. 3. The idolatrous priest of Elkenah attempting to offer up Abraham as a sacrifice. 4. The altar for sacrifice by the idolatrous priests, standing before the gods of Elkenah, Libnah, Mahmackrah, Korash, and Pharaoh. 5. The idolatrous god of Elkenah. 6. The idolatrous god of Libnah. 7. The idolatrous god of Mahmackrah. 8. The idolatrous god of Korash. 9. The idolatrous god of Pharaoh. 10. Abraham in Egypt. 11. Designed to represent the pillars of heaven, as understood by the Egyptians. 12. Rau-keeyang, signifying expanse, or the firmament over our heads; but in this case, in relation to this subject, the Egyptians meant it to signify Shaumau, to be high, or the heavens, answering to the Hebrew word, Shaumahyeem.

Now that the original papyrus from which Joseph Smith copied Facsimile No. 1 has been located we know that it is a scene from the "Book of Breathings."

Unfamiliar Writing

The original fragment has several rows of hieroglyphs which were not included in the printed facsimile. This writing becomes very significant when we try to determine what the drawing is about. Below is a photograph which shows the hieroglyphs which appear at the two sides of the drawing. There is another row just above the arm of the standing figure, but most of it has broken off.

Dr. Hugh Nibley has claimed that "the inscriptions on the Mormon papyrus are completely different" from those found on a scene which is parallel in several respects to the "Book of Abraham" scene (Improvement Era, October 1968, page 79). On page 81 of the same article, Nibley stresses:

. . . our manuscript is different. . . we are impressed by the rather massive additions—the unfamiliar writing that frames the scene on either side, and the stage-like foundation of elements found in none of the other papyri. True, every individual sign and figure can be matched rather easily somewhere else, just as every word on this page can be found in almost any English book, but it is the combination of perfectly ordinary signs that makes extraordinary compositions, . . . the combination here is different.

As we have already pointed out, Dr. Nibley has not unfolded the unique message he claims is found on the fragment of papyrus used for Facsimile No. 1. He has prepared a large book dealing with the Joseph Smith Papyri, yet he has failed to provide a translation of this important papyrus! Nibley seems to have realized that a translation of these lines would undermine his entire effort to rescue the Book of Abraham. We are certain that Nibley would have furnished a complete translation of the text if it had mentioned "The idolatrous priest of Elkenah attempting to offer up Abraham as a sacrifice." It is obvious that the reason he has decided to remain silent is that the text is concerning the burial of an Egyptian named Hor. This, of course, makes it part of the Book of Breathings. Since the discovery of the papyri, some Mormons have been fearful that the message contained on this papyrus would not support the Book of Abraham. One man, for instance, wrote a letter which was published in the Newsletter and Proceedings of the Society for Early Historic Archaeology at the Brigham Young University, March 1, 1968, page 9. In this letter he warned:

What was discovered at the Metropolitan Museum is largely standard Egyptian writing such as may be found with most of the mummies gotten from Egyptian tombs. . . . Some claim that Joseph did not know what he was doing, to explain Facsimile No. 1 as he did. Actually, the writing which surrounds this picture on the original papyrus has no connection with either the illustration or the Prophet's "explanation."

We cannot accept this statement, for we feel that the writing and the illustration are indissolubly interwoven. If the drawing had been done by Abraham, the lines of writing would, no doubt, have had something to say about Abraham or his religion. We feel, therefore, that this writing deals a fatal blow to the authenticity of the Book of Abraham. It does not relate in any way to Abraham, and it proves conclusively that the scene is from the "Book of Breathings."

Fortunately, Klaus Baer, of the University of Chicago, has made a translation of this fragment:

Lines 1-3 give the titles, name, and parentage of the man for whose benefit the Breathing Permit was written:

. . . the prophet of Amonrasonter, prophet[?] of Min Bull-of-his-Mother, prophet [?] of Khons the Governor . . . Hor, justified, son of the holder of the same titles, master of secrets, and purifier of the gods Osorwer, justified [?] . . . Tikhebyt, justified. May your ba live among them, and may you be buried in the West . . .

Too little is left of line 4 to permit even a guess at what it said. Insofar as I can make it out, line 5 reads:

May you give him a good, splendid burial on the West of Thebes just like...

(Dialogue: A Journal of Mormon Thought, Autumn 1968, pp. 116-117)

The reader will notice that Klaus Baer reads the names "Hor" and "Tikhebyt" on this fragment. These, of course, are the same names that appear in the text of the "Sensen" fragments. This establishes beyond all doubt that the fragment is part of the pagan funeral text known as the "Book of Breathings." The names of Egyptian gods are written on the fragment, and the word "burial" appears twice on this piece of papyrus. It is interesting to note that Klaus Baer translates the word "Thebes" from the fifth line of the fragment. Dr. Nibley says that the Pearl of Great Price mummies were "found in Thebes" (Improvement Era, Feb. 1968, p. 21), and Klaus Baer informs us that "all the known copies" of the Book of Breathings "seem to come" from Thebes (Dialogue: A Journal of Mormon Thought, Autumn 1968, p. 111). Furthermore, the gods mentioned in the text are the very gods that were worshipped at Thebes. All evidence, therefore, points to the inescapable conclusion that this is a pagan document and that it could not have been written by Abraham.

Not Unique

Dr. Hugh Nibley would have us believe that the fragment of papyrus from which Joseph Smith copied Facsimile No. 1 is "A Unique Document." Professor Richard Parker on the other hand, claims this is a "well-known scene from the Osiris mysteries, with Anubus, the jackal-headed god, on the left ministering to the dead Osiris on the bier" (Dialogue, Summer 1968, p. 86).

The following scenes are similar to Fac. No. 1. They are taken from several books. The reader will find most of them in Osiris—The Egyptian Religion of Resurrection, by E. A. Wallis Budge, New York, 1961, vol. 1, p. 280 and vol. 2, pp. 21-48.

Mormon Papyrus

The Interpretation

Egyptologists who have examined the papyrus fragment that Facsimile No. 1 was copied from feel that Joseph Smith's interpretation of it is incorrect. What Joseph Smith called "Abraham fastened upon an altar" is in reality Osiris lying upon his bier. The "idoltrous priest of Elkenah" is the god Anubis ministering to Osiris. Klaus Baer says that the identification of Anubis "is assured by the black color of the body and many parallels, e.g., Mariette, Denderah, IV, pl. 70-71 and the countless examples of Anubis attending a mummy on a lion-couch (BD 151 and often elsewhere). He is, of course, not holding a knife" (Dialogue: A Journal of Mormon Thought, Autumn 1968, p. 118).

The Egyptians believed that Osiris was killed by his brother Set. The body was found by Isis, and he was embalmed by Anubis. Osiris was resurrected and became the God of the Dead.

The four jars which appear below the bier in Facsimile No. 1 prove that it is a funerary scene. These canopic jars were used to hold the soft parts of the body that were removed during the embalming process. (Notice that they appear in some of the other scenes we have shown.) Joseph Smith's statement that they are the gods of Elkenah, Libnah, Mahmackrah, and Korash is completely wrong. Professor Richard A. Parker comments:

Beneath the bier are the four canopic jars with heads representative of the four sons of Horus, human-headed Imseti, baboon-headed Hapy, jackal-headed Duamutef and falcon-headed Kebehefnuf. (Dialogue: A Journal of Mormon Thought, Summer 1968, p. 86)

Klaus Baer agrees with Parker:

Below the couch are the canopic jars for the embalmed internal organs. The lids are the four sons of Horus, . . . who protect the liver, lungs, intestines, and stomach, respectively. (Ibid., Autumn 1968, p. 118)

These are the same four gods found in Part E of Facsimile No. 2. The Mormon Egyptologist Michael Dennis Rhodes states:

. . . the four Sons of Horus, . . . also were guardians of the viscera of the dead, and their images were carved on the four canopic jars into which the internal organs were placed. (Brigham Young University Studies, Spring 1977, pp. 272-73)

R. C. Webb, who defended the Mormon position concerning the Book of Abraham, admitted that the four jars resembled canopic jars used in the embalming process:

. . . these figures, both in shape and position accord with those of the "Canopic vases," containers for the viscera of mummified deceased. In fact, they have contributed the most cogent evidence, in the eyes of Egyptological critics, that we have here only a variation of such familiar funerary scenes as have been specified already. (Joseph Smith as a Translator, Salt Lake City, 1936, p. 141)

Changes in Facsimile

Egyptologists have always claimed that the Mormons altered the scene shown in Facsimile No. 1. They claim that the standing figure (Anubis) should have a jackal's head instead of a human head. Some Egyptologists claim that the knife has been added into the hand of Anubis and that the bird should have a human head. The charge that the Mormons altered this scene was made a century ago by Theodule Deveria. In his interpretation of Facsimile No. 1 he stated:

Fig. 1. The soul of Osiris, under the form of a hawk (which should have a human head).

Fig. 2. Osiris coming to life on his funeral couch, which is the shape of a lion.

Fig. 3. The god Anubis (who should have a jackal's head) effecting the resurrection of Osiris. (A Journey to Great Salt Lake City, vol. 2, as quoted in Deseret News, January 4, 1913)

In 1912 Dr. Albert M. Lythgoe, head of the Department of Egyptian Art of the Metropolitan Museum, made a similar charge:

Dr. Lythgoe . . . expressed the wish that he might see the original papyrus that the Prophet Smith translated or a photograph of it, instead of drawings made from it. In the first of the Mormon figures the god Anubis, bending over the mummy, was shown with a Human and a strangely un-Egyptian head, instead of the jackal's head usual to such a scene. And a knife had been drawn into the god's hand. (New York Times, Magazine Section, December 29, 1912)

In 1966 the Egyptologists John A. Wilson and Richard A. Parker still maintained that Facsimile No. 1 had been altered. John A. Wilson charged: "The head of the god has been miscopied as human and should be that of a jackal" (Letter dated March 16, 1966). Richard A. Parker stated: "Number 1 is an altered copy of a well known scene of the dead god Osiris on his bier with a jackal-god Anubis acting as his embalmer" (Letter dated March 22, 1966).

R. C. Webb, the apologist for the Mormons, wrote the following:

. . . unless these drawings have been altered in several essential particulars, . . . they do not represent the common run of illustrations in the Book of the Dead, . . . If there is no evidence that they were not altered in copying, there is also no evidence that they were so altered. . . . There are numerous representations of Anubis, "protector of the dead," standing beside the corpse or mummy on its bier. It may be safe to assert, however, that, in all such drawings, Anubis is shown in the conventional manner, having a jackal's head with elongated snout, never with a human head. (Improvement Era, vol. 16, p. 437)

In the Improvement Era, vol. 17, p. 319, "Dr. Webb" commented:

Thus, Dr. Petrie calls the standing figure "Anubis," but he does not refer us to genuine examples in which that god is shown with a human, instead of a jackal's head. Dr. Breasted's note on the attempted 'reconciliation' between the diverse judgments, "Anubis" and "priest," stating that "the officiating priest wears the head of a wolf or jackal to impersonate Anubis," adds nothing to our enlightenment, because the figure in question is wearing no such head.

The Mormon historian B. H. Roberts made these sarcastic comments concerning the charge that the Mormons had altered the facsimiles:

To these diverse interpretations of this figure 1, I add that of M. Deveria: "The soul of Osiris, under the form of a hawk." He also adds, in parenthesis, that the hawk "should have a human head." Yes, or the head of an ass, then it could be made to mean something else than what these other learned men describe it as meaning. . . . Petrie makes no complaint against the form of "figure 3," but Deveria insists that he "should have a jackal's head." Yes, or some other change might be suggested, and by such process some other meaning may be read into the plate and make it different from the translation of Joseph Smith. (Improvement Era, vol. 16, p. 321)

At the time these comments were written, the original papyrus from which Facsimile No. 1 was drawn was not available. Therefore, B. H. Roberts and "Dr. Webb" were able to criticize the Egyptologists for claiming that alterations had been made. Now that the papyrus has been located, the entire picture has changed. The Mormon position has been considerably weakened because the portions of the papyrus which have been in question—i.e., the parts that would have contained the head of Anubis, the head of the bird, and the knife—are missing! (See photograph below.)

Dr. Aziz S. Atiya, the man who found the papyri, made this comment about the papyrus:

" . . . I went to the Metropolitan Museum of Art looking for documents, . . . While there I found a file with these documents . . . When I saw this picture, I knew that it had appeared in the Pearl of Great Price. . . the head had fallen off, and I could see that the papyrus was stuck on paper, nineteenth century paper. The head was completed in pencil, apparently by Joseph Smith, who must have had it when that part fell off. He apparently drew the head in his own hand on the supplementary paper. . . .

"In order to protect the papyrus, which becomes brittle with age—for instance, the head of the person fell off simply because the papyrus was brittle—Joseph Smith probably thought that the best thing for its protection was to glue it on paper." (Improvement Era, January 1968, pp. 13-14)

Below is a photograph of the top part of Facsimile No. 1. The reader will see that whoever drew the missing portions of the papyrus on the paper beneath reconstructed the scene in a different manner than it appears in the Book of Abraham.

The reader will notice that the head appears to be off to one side and facing forward, and the knife seems to be in the other hand, up by the head. This would seem to show that the reconstruction was merely guesswork.

Dr. Nibley tries to show that the "pencilled restoration" was done by a non-Mormon (Improvement Era, Sept. 1968, pp. 72, 80), but his arguments are very weak.

The Egyptologist Klaus Baer makes this interesting statement concerning the condition of the papyrus at the time Joseph Smith worked with it:

Is there any evidence for the condition of the vignette of "Facsimile No. 1" in Joseph Smith's time? The cut shows it complete, but we have already seen that Joseph Smith attempted to fill lacunae [blank portions] in his copy of the texts. Is this the case here also? There is no direct evidence, but line 4 is an indication. One would have expected it to appear in the "Facsimile" and in the copies in EAG if more had existed than the insignificant remnant now visible—the hieroglyphs are included in "Facsimile No. 3."

The sketch in the lacuna is a stronger argument. The head and shoulders of the standing figure (3) are quite different in “Facsimile No. 1” and on the backing of P.JS I. Neither can be a copy of the other, and they diverge too much to be copies of the same original. If the sketch were later than the cut in PGP, one would expect it to resemble the “Facsimile”; if, on the other hand, Joseph Smith had drawn it himself (or had it drawn) in order to replace a part of the papyrus that had been damaged after it came into his possession, one would still expect the two versions to resemble each other. The likeliest interpretation of the difference is that the sketch on the backing fills an already existing gap in a manner that Joseph Smith himself rejected as unsatisfactory. In addition, as we have already seen, the Egyptian parallels to the missing portions of the vignette resemble neither the sketch nor “Facsimile No. 1.” The human-headed bird (1) would hardly have been drawn with a bird’s head in PGP if more of the papyrus had been preserved when the woodcut was made. (Dialogue: A Journal of Mormon Thought, Autumn 1968, pp. 132-133)

On page 118, footnote 31, of the same article, Klaus Baer states:

... the vignette was probably in essentially the same condition in 1835 that it is now, and the restorations, both that sketched on the backing and that in “Facsimile No. 1” in the PGP, are not copies of the missing parts.

Dr. Hugh Nibley makes this comment concerning the charge that Facsimile No. 1 has been altered:

1. It is significant that the charge of false copying today centers on those parts of the document which happen to be missing, and thus offends the first principle of textual criticism, which is, always to give a document the benefit of the doubt. If the copyist is perfectly reliable in the four-fifths of the sketch that have survived, why should he go berserk in the particular fifth that is missing? (Improvement Era, September 1968, p. 74)

We feel that Dr. Nibley is overlooking important evidence concerning Joseph Smith’s method of working with these documents. We have already shown that the portions of Facsimile No. 2 which were missing on the original document were filled in from other documents and that false restorations were made in the “Sensen” papyrus. Since Joseph Smith was responsible for falsification in the other documents, why should we believe that he would perform differently with regard to Facsimile No. 1? We have quoted William S. West as stating that the papyri “were torn by being taken from the roll of embalming salve which contained them, and some parts entirely lost . . .” This statement was printed just two years after Joseph Smith obtained the papyri. We must remember, too, that the Egyptologists made their charges long before the papyri were rediscovered. It seems very significant that the very parts they charged were altered are the portions that are missing on the original papyrus fragment.

In a desperate attempt to save the Book of Abraham, Dr. Nibley claimed that an “old portrait” of Joseph Smith’s mother proves that Facsimile No. 1 was not altered. Dr. Nibley was basing his conclusions on a photograph of this portrait. Wesley P. Walters, however, rediscovered the original portrait, and Dr. Nibley was forced to admit that he had made a mistake concerning this matter. For more information about this see our Case, vol. 3, pages 40-43, 72-73.

The Egyptologist Richard A. Parker has suggested that there was originally a second bird shown in Facsimile No. 1, but that it has broken away. He feels that what Joseph Smith thought was the upper hand of Abraham is in reality the wingtip of the second bird (see Dialogue: A Journal of Mormon Thought, Summer 1968, p. 86). According to his interpretation, the bird is “hovering over the erect phallus of Osiris (now broken away).” He explains that Isis takes the form of a bird and “is magically impregnated by the dead Osiris and then later gives birth to Horus who avenges his father and takes over his inheritance.” Klaus Baer says:

There are some problems about restoring the missing parts of the body of Osiris. He was almost certainly represented as ithyphallic, ready to beget Horus, as in many of the scenes at Dendera. (Dialogue: A Journal of Mormon Thought, Autumn 1968, p. 119)

If it could be established that Osiris was originally “represented as ithyphallic” in this drawing, it would be very embarrassing for the church. This is a possibility that has to be considered since Facsimile No. 2 shows the ithyphallic god Min. Dr. Hugh Nibley says that there are “a number of procreation scenes in which the mummy is begetting his divine successor or reincarnation” (Improvement Era, October 1968, p. 78), but he argues vigorously against the idea that Facsimile No. 1 was originally such a scene:

We must bear in mind that the alterations that Professor Parker’s interpretation requires—the jackal’s mask of the priest, the hovering bird, and the reproductive activities indicated—not only occupy the most conspicuous position, front and center, on the Number 1 papyrus, but by their unusual, not to say shocking nature (and many visitors to Nauvoo were looking for something shocking), would be most certain to command the attention of any observer. How does it happen that during all the years when the papyri were being shown by old Sister Lucy Mack Smith for a small admission fee to any interested parties, nobody ever noticed that they differed drastically from the well-known printed copies that the visitor was invited to take away with him? (Improvement Era, September 1968, p. 77)

The answer to Nibley’s question is very simple: if it was really a procreation scene, as some Egyptologists maintain, the papyrus was probably damaged in this area before Joseph Smith obtained it, and therefore visitors wouldn’t see anything “shocking” about the drawing.

The Mormon Egyptologist Edward H. Ashment seems to be unsure of exactly how this portion of the papyrus should be reconstructed:

The direct evidence is meager about whether the upper “hand” of the recumbent figure is really a hand or the tip of a bird’s wing. Except for some slight indications, it could be seen to be either one. . . . given its general resemblance to the lower hand and the fact that it is not drawn in a manner similar to the wing of the bird on its right it is plausible to consider the upper “hand” as a hand. However, the two little blotches within the “hand” present a problem, in that they resemble the mottling technique used to portray feathers on the bird on the right. The blotches appear to be intentional and not remnants of a solid line, in that no damage to the papyrus has occurred immediately around them. This indicates that the upper “hand” may have been something other than a hand—such as the tip of one of the wings of Isis hovering over Osiris, just as she does in other scenes depicting the same event. . . . As for the upper ‘hand’ there are parallels for having a bird hovering over the recumbent figure, but there are no parallels for a recumbent figure with two arms raised, so taking into account the otherwise inexplicable blotches it seems that the upper “hand” may be a wing, although direct evidence from the papyrus cannot strongly support that conclusion. (Sunstone, December 1979, pp. 36-38)

However this may be, Mormon scholars were probably very disappointed to find that the head of the standing figure was missing on the original papyrus. They had made such a point of the fact that Facsimile No. 1 was different from other Egyptian scenes in that it had a human head rather than the head of a jackal. Egyptologists, on the other hand, are now more confident than ever that the standing figure is Anubis. John A. Wilson, who had stated that “the head of the god has been miscopied as human and should be that of a jackal,” made this comment after he saw a photograph of the original papyrus:

Finally, you want to know about the embalming scene and I am comforted to see that the standing figure has no head. I am sure that it never had a human head, as all of these illustrations show an animal head. In Ryerson, Pl. XLVIII, the vignette for B.D. 151 shows the jackal-god Anubis bending over a couch, with his hands on a recumbent human figure. (Letter from John A. Wilson, dated January 5, 1968)

Dr. Nibley is now willing to admit that the human head on the standing figure in Facsimile No. 1 is an error, but he tries to blame it onto the Egyptian artist:

They [Nibley]: Well, you do go so far as to assume without question that the priest in Facsimile No. 1 should have a jackal's mask. And you are quite right—he should have, and the human head is an error. But whose error?

They [Critics]: Whose could it be but Smith's?

We [Nibley]: Smith didn't need an unmasked priest—a mask would have been just as impressive perhaps. But let us call your attention to at least three Ptolemaic lion-couch scenes closely paralleling this one in which the artist has deliberately drawn the embalming priest without a jackal mask. (Brigham Young University Studies, Autumn 1968, p. 98)

The Mormon scholar Richley Crapo made this observation concerning the charge that Facsimile No. 1 has been altered:

As early as 1860, T. Deveria noted a number of similar anomalies on Facsimile Number 1. (See Figure 3) Since he also noted the irregularities of the central two-headed god of the hypocephalus and the serpent-dove figure, his comments concerning Facsimile Number 1 may well be considered with some respect.... Now, although this case lacks the conclusiveness of that for Facsimile Number 2, one does wonder if it be mere coincidence that the recovered papyrus original of Facsimile Number 1 is missing exactly these purportedly anomalous features: the head of the priest, the knife, and the head of the bird. (Book of Abraham Symposium, April 3, 1970, p. 29)

Edward H. Ashment, the Mormon Egyptologist, has carefully examined the evidence concerning Facsimile No. 1 and has concluded that Joseph Smith was probably in error in his reconstruction of both the human figure and the bird:

Thus it is apparent that the upper edge of Papyrus Joseph Smith I was virtually the same in 1835 as it is today, indicating that any material above it constitutes restoration. (See Plate 1)

It is just that material which has been controversial. Parenthetically, it is significant that those are the very items that should be expected to differ from the usual couch motifs if the restoring artist(s) had no knowledge of ancient Egyptian religious art . . . upon close examination of the upper torso of the black standing figure (Illustration 9) two important differences appear between the original and Hedlock's woodcut: the angle of ascent of the Hedlock shoulder is not nearly as vertical as that on the original, and on the original, parts of the shoulder consist of narrow vertical stripes which again do not appear in the Hedlock version. The second difference is small but very important. In the Hedlock copy a white line proceeds up the trunk of the standing figure to his shoulder and then turns sharply to the left. However on the original, where the entire top third of the line is intact, there is no sharp turn to the left, indicating that Hedlock utilized artistic license there.

Those traces are significant in that they are a clear indication of the god Anubis who is closely associated with the Osiris mysteries. The narrow stripes clearly are the bottom edge of Anubis' headdress. (Illustration 10) The white line represents part of Anubis' clothing, as does the rest of the black figure's clothing such as the vest and kilt. (Illustration 11) In addition, the very color of the figure—black is another indication of Anubis, as is the arm band which Hedlock failed to include in his woodcut. With high probability, Fig. 3 should be restored as Anubis and not as a human-headed individual. . . .

The final controversial item from Facsimile 1 to be considered here is what type of head should be on the bird . . .

As with the representation of Anubis, there are small but important clues where the bird intersects the upper edge of the papyrus which tend to support the conclusion that it originally had a man's head, thus representing a b3. . . the traces of the bird's head at the broken edge of the papyrus represent clear indications of a human head. (Illustration 23)

It is apparent that Reuben Hedlock's Facsimile 1 is a conjecturally-restored copy of Papyrus Joseph Smith I . . . significant traces at the upper edge of Papyrus Joseph Smith I where the standing black figure and the bird intersect it definitely indicate a jackal-headed Anubis for one, and a human-headed b3 bird for the other." (Sunstone, Dec. 1979, pp. 34, 36, 38)

For more information on the false reconstruction of Facsimile No. 1 see our Case, vol. 3, pages 38-45.

Facsimile No. 3

Joseph Smith claimed that Facsimile No. 3 showed "Abraham sitting upon Pharaoh's throne." Below is a photograph of Facsimile No. 3 as it is printed in the Pearl of Great Price [1978], Book of Abraham, page 42. This is followed by Joseph Smith's interpretation of the drawing, and below the explanation is a photograph of this drawing as it first appeared in the Times and Seasons in 1842.

EXPLANATION OF THE ABOVE CUT

1. Abraham sitting upon Pharaoh's throne, by the politeness of the king, with a crown upon his head, representing the Priesthood, as emblematical of the grand Presidency in Heaven; with the scepter of justice and judgment in his hand.
2. King Pharaoh, whose name is given in the characters above his head.
3. Signifies Abraham in Egypt—referring to Abraham, as given in the ninth number of the Times and Seasons. (Also as given in the first facsimile of this book.)
4. Prince of Pharaoh, King of Egypt, as written above the hand.
5. Shulem, one of the king's principal waiters, as represented by the characters above his hand.
6. Olmlah, a slave belonging to the prince.
Abraham is reasoning upon the principles of Astronomy, in the king's court.

1842 — Times and Seasons

As we examine the cut which appears in printings of the Pearl of Great Price prior to 1981, we are amazed at the extremely poor quality of the reproduction. We have previously quoted Dr. Hugh Nibley as stating that "careless changes occurred in later editions" of the Pearl of Great Price. He also said that the facsimiles have suffered "drastic alterations" at the "hands of their various copyists." He admits that "The Facsimiles now in use are extremely bad reproductions, far inferior to the first engravings published in 1842." In Brigham Young University Studies, Autumn 1968, p. 73, he makes this statement:

But the Mormons have never displayed any particular reverence or awe for the facsimiles. Whereas the editing of the standard works has ever been an object of meticulous care, even a cursory examination of successive reproductions of the plates of the Book of Abraham shows the work to be amazingly slapdash and slipshod, as if a mere approximation of the general idea were quite enough to satisfy the brethren.

These are certainly strange statements to be coming from the man whom the Mormon leaders chose to defend the Book of Abraham. We must agree with Dr. Nibley that “drastic alterations” have been made in the facsimiles. These alterations are very evident in the hieroglyphs which appear on Facsimile No. 3 (see previous page for a photographic comparison of the 1842 printing with that found in the Pearl of Great Price). The reader will notice that the line of hieroglyphs which appears at the bottom of the facsimile is almost completely unreadable in modern editions of the Pearl of Great Price. Many of the hieroglyphs which appear at the top of the facsimile have also been altered. It would appear that the Mormon leaders did not want accurate reprints of the facsimiles. We feel that the alterations in the facsimiles were a deliberate attempt to obscure the writing so that Egyptologists would be unable to read it. (As we indicated earlier, there has been a great deal of criticism concerning the printed facsimiles and there is a rumor to the effect that the church will soon return to the use of the Times and Seasons’ engravings in all copies of the Pearl of Great Price.)

In any case, the Egyptologist Klaus Baer has carefully examined the original 1842 printing of Facsimile No. 3. He used the Times and Seasons because “The cuts that appear in modern, cheap editions of the PGP have lost too much detail to be of use and appear to have been touched up slightly” (Dialogue: A Journal of Mormon Thought, Autumn 1968, p. 126, n. 106).

On pages 126-127 of the same article, Klaus Baer gives this important information about Facsimile No. 3:

“Facsimile No. 3” shows a man (5), his hand raised in adoration and a cone of perfumed grease and a lotus flower on his head (ancient Egyptian festival attire), being introduced by Maat (4), the goddess of justice, and Anubis (6), the guide of the dead, into the presence of Osiris (1), enthroned as king of the Netherworld. Behind Osiris stands Isis (2), and in front of him is an offering-stand (3) with a jug and some flowers on it. Over the whole scene is a canopy with stars painted on it to represent the sky.

The scene comes from a mortuary papyrus and is similar to, but not identical with scenes showing the judgment of the deceased before Osiris such as P. JS III. It is a summary in one illustration of what the Breathing Permit promised: The deceased, after successfully undergoing judgment is welcomed into the presence of Osiris.

The texts, poorly copied as they are, carry us one step further. As far as it can be made out, the line of hieroglyphs below the scene reads:

O gods of . . . , gods of the Caverns, gods of the south, north, west, and east, grant well-being to Osiris Hor, justified, . . .

The characters above and to the left of the man are probably to be read: “Osiris Hor, justified forever.” Even though Hor is a relatively common name in Greco-Roman Egypt, this does suggest that “Facsimile No. 3” reproduces a part of the same manuscript that “Facsimile No. 1” does. Hor’s copy of the Breathing Permit would then have had two vignettes, one at the beginning and another (“Facsimile No. 3”) at the end, an arrangement that is found in other copies of the same text.

When naming their children the Egyptians often used the names of their gods. The man mentioned in the Mormon Papyrus was named after the god Horus. This was a common name toward the end of ancient Egyptian history. The Egyptologists who have translated Joseph Smith’s papyri render the name “Hor,” but they realize that it is the name of the god Horus. Klaus Baer makes this statement concerning the name Hor: “The name means ‘[the god] Horus’” (Dialogue: A Journal of Mormon Thought, Autumn 1968, p. 111, n. 8).

Now that we know that the name “Hor” is the same as “Horus,” we find that the Egyptologist M. Theodule Deveria correctly identified the name in Facsimile No. 3 more than a hundred years ago! He stated:

5. The deceased led by Ma into the presence of Osiris. His name is Horus, as may be seen in the prayer which is at the bottom of the picture, and which is addressed to the divinities of the four cardinal points. (A Journey to Great Salt Lake, vol. 2, as quoted in Deseret News, January 4, 1913)

The appearance of the name Hor on both Facsimile 3 and on the original papyrus used for Facsimile No. 1 is absolutely devastating because it shows that they are both part of a pagan document. (For more information about the translation of the name “Hor” see our Case, vol. 3, page 7.) It is also interesting to note that Klaus Baer reads the words “gods of the Caverns” from the line of hieroglyphs at the bottom of Facsimile No. 3. These same words are found toward the end of the hieratic text in other copies of the Book of Breathings. From “parallel manuscripts,” Klaus Baer reads: “Let him accompany Osiris together with the gods of the Caverns, . . .” (Dialogue: A Journal of Mormon Thought, Autumn 1968, p. 126)

Dressed Like Women

In his booklet, Joseph Smith Among the Egyptians, pages 29-30, Wesley P. Walters writes:

Facsimile No. 3 shows the deceased being led before Osiris, god of the dead, and behind the enthroned Osiris stands his wife Isis. Joseph identified the figure on the throne as Abraham, and the figures behind and in front of him as Pharaoh and his son respectively, failing to recognize that these figures are wearing women’s dresses and headdresses.

The arrows below point to the two goddesses whom Joseph Smith mistakenly identified as men.

This mistake was pointed out in Spalding’s pamphlet published in 1912. Dr. A. H. Sayce wrote:

Number 3 is a representation of the Goddess Maat leading the Pharaoh before Osiris, behind whom stands the Goddess Isis. Smith has turned the Goddess into a king and Osiris into Abraham. (Joseph Smith, Jr., As A Translator, p. 23)

James H. Breasted commented:

Fac-simile Number 3: This scene depicts the god Osiris enthroned at the left, with a goddess, probably Isis, behind him and before him three figures. The middle one, a man, led into the presence of Osiris by the goddess Truth, . . .

Writing in The Utah Survey, page 26, the Egyptologist Samuel A. B. Mercer remarked:

Isis carries a star in her right hand which indicates life. The Prophet calls this figure “King Pharaoh”—a very womanly king!

Concerning the personage Joseph Smith identifies as “Prince of Pharaoh,” Mercer declared: “The Prophet again makes a male out of a female” (Ibid., p. 28).

Robert C. Webb, apologist for the Mormons, conceded that “the figure seated on the throne—and called Abraham, or even some earthly king—is drawn after the usual fashion of the god Osiris, while those called ‘Pharaoh’ and ‘prince’ are given the kind of representations familiar with Egyptian goddesses, rather than contours definitely masculine” (Joseph Smith As a Translator, p. 149).

Even Dr. Nibley admits the personages Joseph Smith identified as men seem to look more like women:

If “Pharaoh” and “the Prince of Pharaoh” in Facsimile 3 were being drawn to order, why on earth were they not drawn as princes or at least as men instead of being so very obviously women—is this cunning alteration to suit Joseph Smith’s interpretation? (Improvement Era, September 1968, p. 76)

A Common Scene

Although “Dr. Webb” claimed that Facsimile No. 3 was unique in some respects, he did admit there was a resemblance between this scene and those found in the Book of the Dead. In fact, he even mentioned the Book of Breathings:

We must admit the close resemblance of the seated figure to the traditional representations of Osiris, wearing the double plumed crown, and holding the flail, or scourge, and the hook, or crook, in either hand. The figures before and behind him also closely suggest the goddesses mentioned by our critics . . . the scene differs in several important details from the common run of representations of Osiris judging the dead . . . there are variations in some other books of the same import, particularly in later ages. Among such later may be mentioned the papyrus, or [of?] Kerasher, or Kersher—containing the so-called “Book of Breathings.” This papyrus, . . . shows the deceased. . . led before Osiris by . . . Anubis, . . . (The Improvement Era, vol. 16, pp. 450-451)

Grant Heward has located two copies of the Book of Breathings which have judgment scenes that resemble Facsimile No. 3. They are located in the Berlin Museum and are identified as Papyrus No. 3135 and Papyrus No. 3154. At the bottom of the page the reader will find drawings of these papyri compared with Facsimile No. 3—we have not attempted to make accurate copies of the hieroglyphs as this would take many hours of tedious work and would serve no purpose for the average reader. Notice that in both papyri Isis wears the “sun orb” between “two cow horns” and stands behind Osiris as in Facsimile No. 3.

Not Abraham’s Drawings

Dr. Nibley’s defense of the facsimiles has been almost as pathetic as his work with regard to the “Sensen” text. In an article published in Brigham Young University Studies, Autumn 1968, pages 95 and 99, he remarks:

The scholar is not alive today who can tell us all there is to be known about the facsimiles, and until we know that the game must still go on. . . .

The facsimiles were originally intended as visual aids for an unspecified audience. Nothing supernatural, inspired, or sacrosanct is claimed for them . . . we cannot answer the question, “What are the facsimiles?” until we know everything there is to know about them.

At times Dr. Nibley has seemed to realize the problems connected with the Facsimiles and has tried to play down their importance. He goes so far as to state that the three facsimiles are “not an integral part of the Book of Abraham” (see Improvement Era, March 1968, p. 18). The text of the Book of Abraham, however, bears witness to the fact that Joseph Smith intended people to believe that Abraham himself made the drawings. Abraham was supposed to have said:

. . . that you may have a knowledge of this altar, I will refer you to the representation at the commencement of this record. . . .

Facsimile No. 3

Papyrus No. 3135

That you may have an understanding of these gods, I have given you the fashion of them in the figures at the beginning, . . . (Pearl of Great Price, Book of Abraham, 1:12, 14)

Faced with this evidence which ties the facsimiles to the text, Dr. Nibley goes so far as to suggest that the statement attributed to Abraham may have been an interpolation by a later scribe:

And when Abraham tells us, “That you may have an understanding of these gods, I have given you the fashion of them in the figures at the beginning,” we do not need to imagine the patriarch himself personally drawing the very sketches we have before us. In fact, the remark may well be the insertion of a later scribe. (Brigham Young University Studies, Autumn 1968, p. 78)

With such a liberal interpretation of the Book of Abraham, a Mormon who does not believe certain doctrines taught in that book might just as reasonably argue that they were added by a later scribe.

While Dr. Nibley does not provide a translation of the writing found on the papyrus used for Facsimile No. 1, he does include J. de Horrack’s translation of a Book of Breathings papyrus known as Louvre Papyrus No. 3284 in his book. When verses 66-67 of this translation are compared with Klaus Baer’s rendition of the writing on the papyrus used for Facsimile No. 1, it becomes evident that Facsimile No. 1 is a part of the pagan Book of Breathings. The reader will remember that Baer reads the following from Joseph Smith Papyrus No. 1: “. . . the prophet of Amonrasonter, prophet [?] of Min Bull-of-his-Mother, . . .” (Dialogue: A Journal of Mormon Thought, Autumn 1968, p. 116). In footnote 20, Baer reveals that Amonrasonter means “Amon-Re King of the Gods.” If we substitute these words for Amonrasonter, we would read:

. . . the prophet of Amen-Re King of the Gods, prophet [?] of Min Bull-of-his-Mother, . . .

Now, it is extremely interesting to note that Professor Nibley includes almost exactly these same words from the Book of Breathings’ translation (Papyrus 3284) he has published in his book:

. . . the Servant (Prophet) of the God Amon-Re King of the Gods, Prophet of Min-Amon-Re, Bull of His Mother . . . (The Message of the Joseph Smith Papyri, p. 62)

At any rate, we feel that it is not possible to divorce the facsimiles from the text of the Book of Abraham, and that the text and the facsimiles stand or fall together. The Mormon writer William E. Berrett boasted:

The translation made by Joseph Smith, and facsimiles of some of the engravings, remain as one of the greatest contributions to the field of religion. . . .

No prophet ever gave to the world a stronger challenge of his divine calling than did Joseph Smith in his publication of the Book of Abraham. (The Restored Church, p. 144)

This challenge has been accepted, and it has been shown that Joseph Smith had absolutely no understanding of the Egyptian language. His interpretations of both the text and the facsimiles have been proven untrue; therefore, it is clear to see that the Book of Abraham is a spurious production.

Book of Joseph

The reader will probably remember that when Joseph Smith examined the papyrus rolls, he claimed that “one of the rolls contained the writings of Joseph of Egypt, . . .” (History of the Church, vol. 2, p. 236).

An examination of the eleven fragments of papyrus which the Metropolitan Museum gave to the Mormon Church reveals that some of them are probably from the roll which the Mormon Prophet classified as the “Book of Joseph.” Fortunately, Oliver Cowdery, one of the three witnesses to the Book of Mormon, described the drawings contained in the “Book of Joseph.” Some of the fragments seem to contain pictures that match Cowdery’s description. This description of the “Book of Joseph” appeared in the Messenger and Advocate in December, 1835:

The representation of the god-head—three, yet in one, is curiously drawn to give simply, though impressively, the writers views of that exalted personage. The serpent, represented as walking, or formed in a manner to be able to walk, standing in front of, and near a female figure, is to me, one of the greatest representations I have ever seen upon paper, or a writing substance; and must go so far towards convincing the rational mind of the correctness and divine authority of the holy scriptures, . . . as to carry away, with one mighty sweep, the whole atheistical fabric, . . . Enoch’s Pillar, as mentioned by Josephus, is upon the same roll. . . . The inner end of the same roll, (Joseph’s record,) presents a representation of the judgment: At one view you behold the Savior seated upon his throne, crowned, and holding the sceptres of righteousness and power, . . . (Messenger and Advocate, vol. 2, p. 236)

Below we have compared some of Cowdery’s statements with some of the Metropolitan Museum papyrus fragments.

“The representation of the god-head—three, yet in one, is curiously drawn . . .”

← “The serpent, represented as walking, or formed in a manner to be able to walk, standing in front of, and near a female figure, is to me, one of the greatest representations I have ever seen upon paper. . . .”

← “Enoch’s Pillar, as mentioned by Josephus, is upon the same roll. . . .”

The Mormon writer Jay M. Todd has also noticed the similarity between the fragments and Oliver Cowdery's description of the Book of Joseph:

... scenes somewhat similar to these verbal descriptions seem to be on the papyri rediscovered by Dr. Atiya, papyri which have already been reported to be of the Book of the Dead. In fact, Dr. Hugh Nibley, Brigham Young University scholar and linguist appointed by the First Presidency to interpret and explain the papyri, titled Fragment IV the "Framed Trinity" papyrus. Fragment V, he titled "The Serpent with Legs," and on this same fragment appears a scene which Oliver apparently described verbally as Enoch's Pillar. Perhaps Oliver's representation of the judgment, with the Savior on the throne, is depicted by fragment's III A III B, which Dr. Nibley titled "Court of Osiris," in which Osiris sits on the throne, and Thoth is recording. Osiris was the Egyptian god of the underworld and the judge of the dead. (The Saga of the Book of Abraham, p. 194)

Joseph Smith and his scribes evidently considered the drawing of the serpent with legs to be of importance, for a copy of it was included in Joseph Smith's Egyptian Alphabet and Grammar. Dr. James R. Clark, of Brigham Young University, stated:

There is a reproduction of that serpent with legs in the Egyptian Grammar as Joseph Smith or Oliver Cowdery copied it from the papyrus of Abraham or of Joseph. (The Story of the Pearl of Great Price, p. 114)

Dr. Sidney B. Sperry made this remark with regard to some of the material found in Joseph Smith's Egyptian Alphabet and Grammar:

Some of this material may be from the book of Joseph. Here Eve is apparently talking to the serpent. Notice, the serpent is on legs! Well, I am sure Dr. Clark can bring out more of this material. (Pearl of Great Price Conference, Dec. 10, 1960, 1964 edition, p. 8)

Egyptologists who have examined the Joseph Smith Papyri feel that "The fragment with the snake walking on two legs is surely from some chapter of the Egyptian Book of the Dead" (Letter from Richard A. Parker, January 9, 1968). Below is an example of a snake on legs from The Book of the Dead, by E. A. Wallis Budge, vol. 2, page 277.

[From Papyrus of Nu (Brit. Mus. No. 10,477, sheet 11).]

Vignette: The serpent Sata with human legs.

In a letter to the Egyptologist John A. Wilson, Marvin Cowan asked this question: "Mormon sources claim that the papyrus showing a snake walking on two legs toward a man is the 'Book of Joseph.' Do you agree?" Dr. Wilson replied:

You ask about one of the illustrations which shows a walking snake. It is just above three other illustrations all of which occur in regular order in late Books of the Dead. Papyrus Ryerson . . . and Papyrus Milbank . . . both in the Oriental Institute, published by T. George Allen, . . . with the texts here noted on Plates XXIV-XXV and LXVIII.

In each papyrus, vignette of a man with a stick, along with a snake walking on two legs—vignette for Book of Dead, Chapter 72.

In each papyrus, next vignette in order shows a man with a stick, facing a column—vignette for B.D. 73.

In Ryerson only, next vignette in order shows a man with a stick—vignette for B.D. 74.

In each papyrus, next vignette shows a bird with a sceptre projecting from its back—vignette for B.D. 75. (Letter from John A. Wilson, January 5, 1968)

Evidently the Mormon leaders have chosen to repudiate Joseph Smith's identification of the scroll of Joseph, for in the Improvement Era, February 1968, page 40, they admit that the drawing of the snake on legs is "from the Book of the Dead."

When Dr. Nibley was asked if the papyri contained the Book of Joseph, he replied: "If the papyri contain any of the Book of Joseph it is not a part that has been translated" (Letter dated February 8, 1968).

On March 1, 1968, Sidney B. Sperry, James R. Clark and Ross T. Christensen discussed the "Book of Joseph":

DR. CHRISTENSEN: Personally, I wonder whether the seven sheets I said looked to me like hieratic, are connected with the Book of Abraham or the Book of Joseph at all.

DR. SPERRY: It is just possible that out of the 11 papyri we now have, there is little or nothing of the Book of Joseph. However, it would seem to me, from my study of what the Prophet did, that he had translated that record and knew what was in it. There are references in the History of the Church which indicate the Prophet told other people something about its contents. I hope within my heart that some day the Book of Joseph will be found and acquired by the Church.

DR. CLARK: You are undoubtedly referring, Dr. Sperry to Oliver Cowdery's letter to William Frye, published in the Latter-day Saints Messenger and Advocate of December, 1835, which definitely gives a brief description of the Book of Joseph. (Newsletter and Proceedings of the S.E.H.A., Brigham Young University, March 1, 1968, p. 8)

While it is probably true that we do not have all of the roll which the Mormon leaders described as the "Book of Joseph," it is very obvious that we have part of it. Since the part which we have is found to be nothing but the Egyptian Book of the Dead, it is evident that Joseph Smith was mistaken when he stated that it contained "the writings of Joseph of Egypt."

Joseph's Egyptian Alphabet

For 130 years the church suppressed a document which absolutely proves that Joseph Smith did not understand the Egyptian language. This document is known as the "Egyptian Alphabet and Grammar." Joseph Smith recorded the following in the History of the Church for the month July, 1835:

The remainder of this month, I was continually engaged in translating an alphabet to the Book of Abraham, and arranging a grammar of the Egyptian language as practiced by the ancients. (History of the Church, vol. 2, p. 238)

After Joseph Smith's death the "Egyptian Alphabet" was brought to Utah. Little was known about it however until the year 1935. James R. Clark reported:

Your author was from 1932 to 1936 a student of Dr. Sperry's at Brigham Young University and was in "on the ground floor" of this research with Dr. Sperry. This included our "discovery," with the assistance of A. William Lund, assistant Church Historian, in February, 1935 of Joseph Smith's translation of Abraham's Alphabet and Grammar to accompany his (Abraham's) record which we discussed in Chapter 8. (The Story of the Pearl of Great Price, by James R. Clark, p. 156)

Dr. Sidney B. Sperry made this statement about the “Egyptian Alphabet”:

I went up to the Church Historian’s office and lo and behold we found this old Egyptian grammar in the archives of the Church. . . . I am amazed even to this day how we managed to persuade the Church authorities to let us bring that Egyptian grammar down here to the B.Y.U. to have Dr. Hales photograph it for us. Here is the book. You will notice it says, “Egyptian Alphabet.” (Pearl of Great Price Conference, December 10, 1960, 1964 ed., p. 7)

The Mormon Apostle John A. Widtsoe probably knew that the “Egyptian Grammar” was in existence prior to the “discovery,” for Dr. Sperry stated:

In July, 1835, the Prophet had written, “The remainder of this month I was continually engaged in translating the alphabet to the Book of Abraham, and arranging a grammar of the Egyptian language as practiced by the ancients” . . .

Since I had been studying ancient Semitics, particularly Bible languages, I was very much intrigued by this statement and wondered why the church authorities during the Spalding incident hadn’t brought out the grammar which the Prophet said he was making. I quite naturally concluded that the Church didn’t have it. So I set out to do two main things: (1) find evidence of the papyri which we knew were once in the hands of Joseph Smith and (2) find the Prophet’s “alphabet and grammar of the Egyptian language as practiced by the ancients.” . . . After this, I tried once more to find the Egyptian Alphabet and Grammar but finally had to give it up. I thought perhaps the boat containing the church records had overturned in the Missouri River and that they had thus been lost.

But I was mistaken in this, for some years later I was taking Dr. John A. Widtsoe . . . to his Salt Lake City home. As we arrived outside the town of Lehi, it suddenly dawned on me that the grammar and alphabet was in the LDS Church Historian’s Office. Lo and behold, when we made a search in that place, there it was! (Newsletter and Proceedings of the S.E.H.A. BYU, March 1, 1968)

Dr. Sperry anticipated that the “Egyptian Alphabet” would help the Mormon Church to “answer more specifically the accusations that had been made by the Egyptologists who had made their pronouncements upon the material supplied by the Reverend Mr. Spalding of Salt Lake City.” Instead of helping Mormons answer the “accusations” made by Egyptologists, the “Egyptian Alphabet” has turned out to be a source of embarrassment. Dr. Clark, in fact, said that he was not in favor of submitting it to scholars:

Many people have asked me, “Well, why don’t they submit the grammar and alphabet to scholars?” Well, my answer is this, that the Prophet didn’t complete it. They have already disagreed with him, most of the scholars, on his translation. I’m wondering if there would be any change in their approach to it now to what it has been, and so I’m not personally in favor of submitting it. . . . I’m not in favor of re-opening the question. I’m in favor of doing what we’ve done with the Book of Mormon. Let the thing keep rolling and depend on our testimonies of the gospel. (Prophets and Problems of the Pearl of Great Price, BYU, p. 75)

Even though the Church Historian’s Office had the original document and also a microfilm copy, members of the church were required to get special permission from Joseph Fielding Smith to even see the film. Although the Mormon leaders did their best to prevent it, we obtained a microfilm copy of this document, and in 1966 we made a photo-reprint of it. Richard P. Howard, who is Church Historian of the Reorganized LDS Church, made this comment:

Until recently this document was available to only a few scholars at the Archives of the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints, . . . However, Jerald Tanner of Salt Lake City managed to obtain a microfilm of this document and published enlarged prints from this film. (Dialogue: A Journal of Mormon Thought, Summer 1968, p. 91)

In the preface to Joseph Smith’s Egyptian Alphabet and Grammar and in a number of our other publications we have told how the Mormon leaders suppressed this important document. Dr. James R. Clark charges that we have not told the truth about this matter:

. . . Jerald Tanner has charged, in his publication of the Grammar and Alphabet and in the Salt Lake Messenger, that this has been kept a deep, dark secret all these years. . . . I have had copies of these manuscripts—most of the manuscripts—since 1935, and so has Dr. Sperry and Dr. Hyrum Andrus. The Church Historian’s Office is always willing to make materials available to responsible scholars. I claim to be a responsible scholar. That may sound egotistical, but I think my record shows it. And I have found that these things are always available to responsible scholars. They are not available to irresponsible scholars and the most irresponsible piece of work—I am not speaking as an historian—that I have ever seen is Jerald Tanner’s publication of the Egyptian Alphabet and Grammar, because he didn’t check his sources and he didn’t know what he was publishing. (Book of Abraham Symposium, April 3, 1970, p. 22)

These statements by Dr. Clark cannot be taken very seriously, for the reader will remember that this is the same man who suppressed the fact that the Egyptian Alphabet and Grammar contains an actual fragment of papyrus. The Mormon writer Jay M. Todd revealed:

Outside of a few associates, Dr. Clark had kept the fragment a matter of confidence, under instructions from the Historian’s Office, for over 30 years. (The Saga of the Book of Abraham, p. 364)

We feel that a truly “responsible scholar” would not have suppressed this important evidence from his own people. Actually, Dr. Clark’s own statements make it clear that Joseph Smith’s Egyptian Alphabet and Grammar was suppressed, and that our statements concerning it are true.

Evidence shows that the Mormon leaders were well aware of the existence of the Grammar and papyrus fragment long before James R. Clark and Sidney B. Sperry made their “discovery” in 1935. The LDS Church Section of the Deseret News for February 10, 1968, seems to indicate that the Assistant Church Historian A. William Lund knew about the Egyptian Alphabet and Grammar as early as 1908:

The latest fragment “find” has been in the vaults as long as A. William Lund and Earl E. Olson, assistant Church historians, can remember. Mr. Lund has been in his post since 1911 and worked in the office since 1908. Mr. Olson has been in the historian’s office since 1934.

The fragment is part of a collection the Church has regarding the Egyptian Alphabet and Grammar prepared by the Prophet Joseph Smith.

According to Dr. Clark’s own statements it would appear that on “a number” of occasions prior to the “discovery,” they had discussed the matter with the staff at the Historian’s Office only to be told that “perhaps the Grammar was lost”:

Dr. Sperry and I had previously discussed the problem of the apparent disappearance of the Egyptian Alphabet and Grammar many times, . . . On a number of previous occasions, we had consulted members of the Church Historian’s staff, including the Assistant Church Historian, and we had been told that perhaps the Grammar was lost with other Church records during the Mormon exodus period. Armed, however, with this additional information from the Deseret News, Dr. Sperry and I visited the Historian’s office again, during the week of February 18-22, 1935. We met with A. William Lund, Assistant Church Historian, in his office, and presented the problem of the location of the Grammar in light of the new evidence of its survival of the exodus and its location in the Historian’s office in 1855.

Elder Lund took us both back into the library to large tables by the east window and asked us to wait. As I recall, he came back to the table in about fifteen minutes and laid the Grammar in front of us on the table, . . .” (Book of Abraham Symposium, April 3, 1970, p. 21)

Dr. Clark admits that even after the “discovery,” they were not allowed to make a public announcement:

No public announcement was made of this find at the time. Later, Dr. Sperry and I secured permission from the Assistant Church Historian to have documents photographed for our own scholarly study. . . .

Dr. Sperry and I were not “cleared” for a public announcement of this discovery in 1935; however, we continued individually and cooperatively to work on the ramifications of this new find during 1935 and 1936. (Ibid., pp. 21-22)

Dr. Clark tries to make it appear that Dr. Sperry made a public announcement of the discovery of the Grammar in 1938:

In reality, there was a description of that Grammar given in that MIA manual in 1938. You will find it on page 69 of the Mutual manual, Ancient Records Testify. Sperry did describe it; he described it rather carefully. This, again, gives a lie to what some people have published with regards to the fact that there had been no public announcement of this, that the Church didn’t know about it; and if the adult department of the MIA followed the procedure of the Church, every MIA of the Church discussed that description on November 8, 1938, in their classrooms.

And so, this was known churchwide, through that manual. (Ibid., p. 22)

A careful reading of Dr. Sperry’s statements show that he did not announce the fact that the Egyptian Alphabet and Grammar had been discovered, but only that some pages of the original manuscript of the Book of Abraham had been located. In our Case, vol. 2, page 164, we stated:

In 1938 the Church leaders allowed Dr. Sperry to publish two pages of the original manuscript of the Book of Abraham which is found in the Egyptian Alphabet and Grammar. The photographs are so poor, however, that the Egyptian characters are not readable.

Dr. Sperry did discuss Joseph Smith’s statement that he prepared an Alphabet and Grammar, and what it may have looked like, but he never directly stated that it had been discovered. In fact, from the way his statement is written a person would be led to believe that he had not actually seen the document:

For many years the writer has been intrigued by the statement of the Prophet that he was “translating an alphabet to the Book of Abraham.” Just what is meant by this phrase? A little by way of explanation—evidence leads us to the conclusion that the Prophet found it anything but easy to translate the Abrahamic records . . . The Seer would of course receive the interpretation of all new and unknown signs or hieroglyphics, but after their meaning had been given to him it is not likely that the Lord would repeat the process when the same characters appeared again. Possibly for that reason the Prophet decided to make a sign list in which would be recorded the meanings of each new symbol as it appeared upon the papyrus of Abraham. Once recorded it could be consulted as often as the Prophet needed to refresh his mind. It seems therefore quite probable that the alphabet was arranged very much as follows. On the extreme left of the page the signs in question would be written down in a vertical column. To the right of this column would appear the sounds of the Egyptian sign or hieroglyphic in English letters together with an interpretation of the character in question. We can readily imagine that some grammatical phenomena of the language would be revealed in the notes which the Prophet wrote down. It would seem rational to suppose that after the Prophet had written down many pages of these signs with their meanings he would become more and more competent to read them as they appeared on the papyrus. (Ancient Records Testify in Papyrus and Stone, 1938, pp. 68-69)

Dr. Clark would have us believe that this was a public announcement of the discovery of the “Grammar,” but it is interesting to note that in 1960 Clark admitted that Dr. Sperry had only “hinted” of its existence in his statement:

His “Egyptian Alphabet and Grammar” survived his death and the Mormon exodus to the West. An entry in the L.D.S. Church Historian’s Office Journal under the date of October 17, 1855, states that the “Egyptian Alphabet” was among the early records of the L.D.S. Church when they were moved on that day into the fireproof vault of the new Historian’s Office in Salt Lake City.

Nothing more appears in L.D.S. literature so far as we are aware concerning Joseph Smith’s “Egyptian Alphabet” until 1938 when Dr. Sidney B. Sperry, in an M.I.A. course of study, hinted of its existence after having personally examined it in the Historian’s Office along with the present investigator.

After having had a photographic copy of this document for a number of years, the present investigator secured permission from the L.D.S. Church Historian to describe the document in brief and to publish photographs of the outside covers and label and of page one and to quote from other pages. (Progress in Archaeology, Brigham Young University, 1963, p. 27)

(The photographs James R. Clark speaks of are printed in his book, The Story of the Pearl of Great Price, pages 101, 103.)

On December 10, 1960, Dr. Sidney B. Sperry was asked if the “Egyptian Alphabet” could be published:

Question: Why not publish the Egyptian grammar?

Answer: Well, I do not know whether the Church authorities would let us do it now or not. (Pearl of Great Price Conference, 1964 ed., p. 9)

We published Joseph Smith’s Egyptian Alphabet and Grammar in 1966. Four years later Dr. Clark was still not sure whether the church would allow it to be printed by Mormon scholars. After Dr. Clark finished the speech in which he attacked us for saying the “Grammar” was suppressed, he was asked if the church would publish it. His reply was as follows:

Well, Dr. Sperry, I think, was asked that same question in 1960 and Tanner has published his reply. I think the answer is still the same one that Dr. Sperry gave. That is anyone’s guess, so far as I am concerned. The power is with the First Presidency . . . This whole problem, since the discovery of the Metropolitan Papyri, is in the hands of President Nathan Eldon Tanner, of the First Presidency. . . . I have talked with him about the relationship of the Grammar and the manuscripts, however, and that is still in abeyance, so far as I know, until further research and study and careful work is done, to collate all the manuscripts, before the publication takes place. I don’t know that there are any plans for publication to take place, but I do know that this is the point of view of both Howard W. Hunter, the present Church Historian, and Nathan Eldon Tanner, that more work, careful and scholarly work, needs to be done on the collation of the documents before we do anything about publication. (Book of Abraham Symposium, April 3, 1970, p. 23)

Although Dr. Clark would like us to believe that the Mormon leaders were not ashamed of Joseph Smith’s Egyptian Alphabet and Grammar, the evidence proves just the opposite. In a speech given on March 7, 1972, Reed Durham, who was then serving as Director of the L.D.S. Institute of Religion at the University of Utah, made it plain that the Grammar was suppressed prior to our publication:

All my life I’ve heard about it [Joseph Smith’s Egyptian Alphabet and Grammar]. I kept getting little snatches here and there from people. . . . Its been reproduced. Not only has it been reproduced, they photoed it for me. I can look at the very page myself. You couldn’t ever get that before. You had to be on the inner circle and then you couldn’t get it wholly. But now it was reproduced, and not only was it reproduced with the exact writing on the book of the Egyptian Alphabet and Grammar, but the Tanners went to the labor to type, in actual typing, each one of the writings. . . . they transliterated the manuscript for me. Such work! Bless their hearts! (Speech by Reed Durham, LDS Institute of Religion, University of Utah, March 7, 1972)

Even Dr. Hugh Nibley admitted that Joseph Smith's Egyptian Alphabet and Grammar "was hidden and suppressed . . . because it was nobody else's business" (Brigham Young University Studies, Winter 1968, p. 176).

Writing in BYU Studies, Summer 1971, page 398, Professor Nibley says that the Egyptian Alphabet and Grammar was "wisely kept out of circulation, for such things could easily be misinterpreted by malicious minds."

Grant Heward, who was excommunicated from the LDS Church because he challenged "the validity of the translation" of the Book of Abraham, made this statement about his experience with Joseph Smith's "Egyptian Alphabet and Grammar":

It was toward the end of my fourth local mission for the church that I received the shock that changed my entire life. The occasion appeared to be an opportunity to prove to the doubter once and for all that Joseph Smith was in fact a prophet of God. . . . Two of our investigators were giving us many difficult questions, but the challenge that the Egyptian problem offered, particularly caught my eye. James Wardle, a local supplier of hidden, forbidden, and unusual Mormon documents, told me that Joseph Smith himself had written an Egyptian Grammar—and that he had a copy—and that I might use it! What a windfall! Fortified with the Egyptian Grammar that Joseph Smith had written ought to make the job as certain as taking candy from a baby. My elated enthusiasm was born of complete confidence in Joseph Smith's claims to frequent revelation from God. Certainly God can read Egyptian, and the English He brought forth would, without a doubt, match the meaning of the Egyptian it was taken from. Just such a testing spot was to be found with the Egyptian Grammar: A scripture—The Book of Abraham—in English with English with the Egyptian to match! Everything pointed to success. The strength of the Mormon position to me was comparable to the strength of a hugh bull among young calves. My job was simply to gather up the proof.

I started studying the grammar, but to my utter dismay, I soon found it was full of nonsense and double-talk. Among my first reactions was the thought that it must not be authentic. Perhaps someone was trying to make Joseph Smith look bad. Most certainly the Lord and Joseph Smith could do better than this! I decided to check with the Church Offices and the Brigham Young University Library. I called the Church Offices and asked one of the highest officials in the Historian's Office about Joseph Smith's Egyptian Alphabet and Grammar. He denied ever having heard of it; In fact, when I told him I was studying a copy of it, he said I knew more about it than he did—it was all brand-new to him! I found that a professor at the BYU had written about it in his book: The Story of the Pearl of Great Price; So I called him up by long distance telephone. He told me that there was indeed such a document and that it was authentic. He named the goodly brother, who had denied any knowledge of it, as one of two who brought it to the Brigham Young University for photographing. I told him of the denial, but it didn't seem to surprise him. He merely suggested that I might possibly have obtained better results had I gone to the Church Historian's Office and talked to him in person. So I did just that. I asked a clerk there about seeing the document. He replied that I wouldn't be able to see the original, but they might let me look at a copy (microfilmed). First, I'd have to get permission from brother _____ (the one who denied ever having heard of it). As fate would have it, he was standing directly behind me. Under these circumstances he would have found it somewhat awkward to deny it again. In any event, he manifest a full knowledge of the document. However, he said I'd have to get permission from the Church Historian—who (according to him) happened to be out of town—in Chicago! At any rate, I met with both of them early the next morning. After a session of interrogation, I was granted the permission I sought; But their cynical questions left me with a dismal impression that they had no confidence in Joseph Smith's translating ability and a fear of honest open research.

The Church Office's copy of the Egyptian Alphabet and Grammar proved to me that the copy Mr. Wardle had was absolutely authentic. Authentic, yes—but nonsense nonetheless. It was difficult for me to believe that anything Joseph Smith did on Egyptian could be absurd. Yet, I knew it was so.

The intensive questioning of the brethren left me with the unavoidable conclusion that they were afraid that the contents of the Grammar might be made public. I realized then, that if they had anywhere near the confidence in Joseph Smith they pretended to have, they would have proudly published it years before instead of keeping it quietly hidden away. Obviously, I had just found out what they had already known for years. Their authoritarianism had a respectability that was above and beyond any facts. It was as though they had a correct and proper "righteous indignation" toward any truth that made them uncomfortable. The thought of having to face my friends and relatives with what I learned horrified me. However, the stifling opposition and deliberate misrepresentation from official sources made me feel obliged to try to bring what I learned out into the open. I therefore wrote up the facts as carefully and charitably as I knew how, and had it printed. Then I passed it out at the April Conference of 1967. That was probably the most difficult task I had ever tried to do in my life. The memory of it still makes me cringe.

As most everyone knows who grows up in the church, those out of harmony with the established thought are considered in a state of wickedness—just like that! It is apparently a sin to talk about such wrongs or perhaps even know about them until officially informed of them by those who have the "authority" to understand such matters. The church's official spokesman has reluctantly admitted everything I stated about the Book of Abraham and Joseph Smith's Egyptian Alphabet and Grammar. On June 21, 1967, I was excommunicated from the church for holding such views.

On June 14, 1967, Mr. Heward received a letter from his Stake Presidency which contained this statement:

"You are hereby requested to appear before a Stake High Council court of the Midvale Stake . . . on Wednesday the 21st day of June, 1967 at 8:00 p.m. for investigation of alleged circulation of literature challenging the validity of the translation of a standard work of the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints."

(A photograph of this letter is found in our Case, vol. 2, page 178.)

The Stake Presidency was apparently acting under orders from Joseph Fielding Smith, who later became the tenth President of the Mormon Church. Mr. Heward made this statement concerning his trial:

. . . the court was very kind and courteous. There was not so much as an unkind word spoken during the entire proceedings. The Stake President proved to be a kind and loving man. The Bishop, who held an inquiry some weeks previous, was also warm and friendly. I am grateful for their kindness. Both stated that the charge came from the office of Joseph Fielding Smith.

When asked if I had any witnesses, I replied that I brought none, but that truth itself and God were my witnesses. I later thought that if they really investigated the testimony of "Truth," they would find him a very faithful witness indeed. Most people simply refuse to examine the evidence.

In this case the truth did not seem to count. Mr. Heward was excommunicated from the Mormon Church on June 21, 1967.

Mr. Heward went on studying the Egyptian language, and made some of the most important discoveries concerning the papyri and the Book of Abraham.

The information which we have presented clearly shows that the Mormon leaders have suppressed Joseph Smith's "Egyptian

Grammar & Alphabet of the Egyptian Language

This is called Za Kiran hikh, or Chal sidion hikh. This character is in the fifth degree, independent and arbitrary. It may be increased in the fifth degree while it stands independent and arbitrary: that is, without a straight mark inserted above or below it. By inserting a straight mark over it thus (1) it increases its signification five degrees: by inserting two straight lines, thus (2) its signification is increased five times more. By inserting three straight lines thus (3) its signification is again increased five times more than the last. By counting the number of straight lines and passing them, or considering them as qualifying adjectives we have the degree of comparison. There are five connecting parts of speech in the above character, called Za Kiran hikh. These five connecting parts of speech, for verbs, participles, prepositions, conjunctions, and adverbs. In translating this character, the subject must be continued until there are as many of these connecting parts of speech used as there are connections or connecting parts found in the character. But when the character is found with one horizontal line, as (1) the subject must be continued until the number of connecting parts of speech are used; or, the full sense of the writer is not conveyed. When two horizontal lines occur, the number of connecting parts of speech are continued five times further - or five degrees. And when three horizontal lines are found, the number of connections are to be increased five times further. The character also has 5 parts of speech, increase by one straight line thus 5 x 5 = 25.

Alphabet and Grammar,” and that Dr. Clark’s charge that we misrepresented the facts with regard to this matter is without foundation.

“Mere Imagination”

The reader will remember that Dr. Clark said that he was “not personally in favor of submitting” Joseph Smith’s “Egyptian Alphabet and Grammar” to scholars. He went on to say that he was “in favor of doing what we’ve done with the Book of Mormon. Let the thing keep rolling and depend on our testimonies of the gospel.”

Grant Heward could not agree with Dr. Clark on this matter. He submitted the “Egyptian Alphabet and Grammar” to some of the world’s top Egyptologists and they have declared that it is fraudulent. After examining the Grammar, I.E.S. Edwards, Dept. of Egyptian Antiquities, British Museum, wrote a letter in which he declared: “The commentary, such as it is, shows that the writer could not possibly have understood ancient Egyptian. They simply do not deserve serious study” (Letter dated December 22, 1965). In a letter dated June 9, 1966, I.E.S. Edwards wrote that “Joseph Smith’s Egyptian Alphabet and Grammar . . . is largely a piece of imagination and lacking in any kind of scientific value. . . . The whole document reminds me of the writings of psychic practitioners which are sometimes sent to me.”

In 1966 Dr. Labib Habachi visited Salt Lake City. The Mormon leaders entertained him and even published an article about him, the title of this article read: “Egyptian Expert Sees Famed Vault in Canyon.” Grant Heward wrote to Dr. Habachi and sent him the facsimiles from the Book of Abraham and Joseph Smith’s Egyptian Alphabet and Grammar. Dr. Habachi examined the documents, and in a letter dated January 15, 1967, he commented:

I have been very late in answering your letters, but believe me, I have been hesitating to write the answer at all. The reason is that when I have been in Salt Lake City and saw the wonderful organisations of the Mormons, I could only admire them and their way of life. . . .

Now you are sending me a film, an Egyptian Grammar, some quotations about Egyptians and coloured people. These, I have to say, are simple imaginations and no scholar at all can ever approve anything in these documents of the Mormons. A long time ago, the Mormons were able to purchase some chapters of the Book of the Dead found everywhere in many tombs of the New Kingdom. These were interpreted in a rather funny way, not based on any scientific foundations. . . .

I would not like to shake your faith. There is no question that the Mormons have planned a wonderful organisation, but I have to tell you, as an Egyptologist, that their claim to understand hieroglyphics is mere imagination. So forget about that claim and go on with a true Christian spirit in the life you are leading. (Letter from Dr. Labib Habachi to Grant Heward, dated January 15, 1967)

Richard A. Parker, Dept. of Egyptology, Brown University, has also expressed an opinion concerning the Grammar:

5. I have seen Joseph Smith’s Egyptian Alphabet and Grammar. The interpretation of signs purported to be Egyptian have no resemblance to the meanings ascribed to them by Egyptologists. (Letter from Richard A. Parker to Marvin Cowan, dated January 9, 1968)

Thus we see that the “Egyptian Alphabet” proves that Joseph Smith did not understand Egyptian and that the Book of Abraham is a work of his own imagination. We feel that a person does not have to be an Egyptologist to see that Joseph Smith’s “Egyptian Alphabet” is not authentic. For instance, a person has only to compare the Egyptian system of counting as found in the Encyclopedia Britannica Junior; 1953 ed., page 350, with Joseph Smith’s purported system of counting found on page “G” of the “Egyptian Alphabet.” Above is a photograph of part of Joseph Smith’s purported system of Egyptian counting. The real system of Egyptian counting does not resemble the one we use in America today, but Joseph Smith’s purported system looks almost like our own.

The reader will notice that in Joseph Smith’s system the numbers 1, 4, 5, 7 and 8 are almost identical to our numbers. The number 9 looks like our 9 written backwards. The number 10 looks like our 10 except that it is written backwards with a small cross through the 1.

The Mormon scholar Dr. Sidney B. Sperry admitted that Joseph Smith’s system is not the conventional system of Egyptian counting:

Now, I might point out that this Egyptian counting shows that we are not dealing with Egyptian in the conventional sense. For example, here, counting from one up to ten. (Dr. Sperry counts, reading from the book the Egyptian words). Now that counting, so far as I am aware, is not used in conventional Egyptian. (Pearl of Great Price Conference, BYU, 1964 ed., p. 8)

Although the Mormon leaders would not allow the “Egyptian Alphabet and Grammar” to be published in its entirety, Mormon scholars have referred to it as the very key to the Book of Abraham. After the church obtained the papyri from the Metropolitan Museum of Art, the Deseret News, LDS Church Section, carried an article mentioning the Alphabet and Grammar:

Hyrum L. Andrus in his recently-published work, “Doctrinal Commentary on The Pearl of Great Price,” notes that a study of a handwritten document by Joseph Smith designated as the “Egyptian Alphabet and Grammar,” shows each page divided by three columns.

These columns have a copy of a character in the first column, the English pronunciation in the second, and the translation in the third.

“A study of the document suggests that it was formulated by an ancient writer, probably Abraham, to assist a translator in deciphering the language in which the record was written. If this conclusion is correct, Joseph Smith literally translated an alphabet to the Book of Abraham,” Dr. Andrus wrote. (Deseret News, LDS Church Section, December 2, 1967, p. 10)

The Improvement Era, January 1968, page 16, printed this statement about the “Egyptian Alphabet and Grammar”:

Some present-day scholars think that part of the papyri that Joseph had in his possession contained an actual primer in the Egyptian alphabet and grammar previously prepared by its ancient authors for the benefit of future translators.

Dr. Sidney B. Sperry related that he read Joseph Smith’s statement in the History of the Church, vol. 2, page 238, and decided that Joseph Smith probably used the Urim and Thummim to prepare the “Egyptian Grammar”:

Let me read that to you again: “I was continually engaged in translating an alphabet.” Now what did the Prophet mean by that, “translating an alphabet”? I pondered over this a great deal and finally came to the conclusion that what the Prophet meant by “translating an alphabet” was that as he copied the characters from the papyri which were in his possession, he would put down these characters, one after another, with the general meaning that he would get as he looked at them through the Urim and Thummim. I assume that he used the Urim and Thummim, in translating these materials, but I felt that the Lord never would condone laziness in a man or in a scholar, and that as the Prophet would go through these passages in Egyptian, he put down the meaning opposite the character. In so doing, then, it would not be necessary for him to call on the Lord, continually, to tell the meaning of a character. Well, that is the way I figured it out. (Pearl of Great Price Conference, December 10, 1960, 1964 ed., p. 4)

Dr. Clark made this statement in 1955:

By a more careful scrutiny of this Alphabet and Grammar than Dr. Sperry was able to give it at the time of his writing (1938) we have discovered some evidence which seems to indicate that it was Abraham not Joseph Smith who compiled the sign list to accompany his record and that Joseph Smith did literally translate this Alphabet to the Book of Abraham. . . . Evidently Abraham anticipated the difficulties that both ancient and modern readers would have in deciphering his script and provided a key to his language. (The Story of the Pearl of Great Price, by James R. Clark, 1955, pp. 109-110)

On December 10, 1960, Dr. Clark stated:

All of the characters that are in the Egyptian Alphabet and Grammar that Dr. Sperry mentioned have now been taken off onto cards. . . . We copied each character onto a 5 x 8 card and then typed Joseph Smith’s translation of the character, with the result that we have about 350 characters, with their translations. A study is in process on an analysis of these characters. . . . This project of research is now going on. I use these cards, get them all sorted and spread out on a big table and then I take the facsimiles from the Pearl of Great Price as printed in the Times and Seasons, because they are the only accurate ones—there have been printer’s errors in all the rest of them—and work from them. (Pearl of Great Price Conference, 1964 ed., pp. 60, 63)

The Mormon scholar William E. Berrett made the following statement about Joseph Smith’s “Grammar”:

Joseph Smith . . . did not expect the Lord to forever aid him in understanding ancient languages. He could learn many of these for himself and he set about to do so. He began a study of Egyptian, Hebrew and Greek . . . This study continued at intervals until his death. His most notable achievement was the development at Kirtland of a grammar for the Egyptian hieroglyphic form of writing. This was used by him, as well as divine aid, in translating ancient writings of the Patriarch Abraham, now published as the Book of Abraham in the Pearl of Great Price. This grammar was never published, and was perhaps never used by any one other than the Prophet. It was, however, the first Egyptian grammar in America and was developed entirely independent of Champollion’s Egyptian Grammar. (The Restored Church, 1956 ed., pp. 133-134)

At the time we published Joseph Smith’s Egyptian Alphabet and Grammar in 1966 we made this statement in the Salt Lake City Messenger:

Joseph Smith’s Egyptian Alphabet and Grammar suppressed for 130 years now comes to light. This document proves that Joseph Smith did not understand ancient Egyptian and that the Book of Abraham was a work of his imagination!

Nibley Repudiates Grammar

In 1968 we heard that Dr. Hugh Nibley (who was supposed to be the church’s top authority on the Egyptian language) had repudiated Joseph Smith’s Egyptian Alphabet and Grammar. We could hardly believe that Dr. Nibley would repudiate the document which was supposed to have been the very key to the translation of the Book of Abraham. This rumor, however, was confirmed in Brigham Young University Studies, Winter 1968. In this article Dr. Nibley makes some astonishing admissions:

Which brings us to the subject of Joseph Smith’s Egyptian Grammar, because a surprising number of people have recently undertaken studies of that remarkable work. This writer, however, has never spent so much as five minutes with the Egyptian Grammar, and does not intend to unless he is forced to it. When parties in Salt Lake procured and reproduced photographs of this document, they advertized it with the usual sensationalism as a “Hidden Document Revealed. Joseph Smith’s Egyptian Alphabet and Grammar suppressed for 130 Years Now Comes to Light. This document proves that Joseph Smith did not understand Egyptian and that the Book of Abraham was a work of his imagination!” Joseph Smith never pretended to understand Egyptian, nor that the Book of Abraham was a work of his scholarship: if this document as advertized proves anything it is that some people will go to any length of skulduggery to make a case out of nothing. For if the so-called Alphabet and Grammar were meant as an inspired communication it would have been published as such, not “hidden” or “suppressed for 130 years.” It was hidden and suppressed for the same reason that Brigham Young’s laundry lists are hidden and suppressed, because it was nobody else’s business. Let us allow Joseph Smith at least for the time being the luxury of a moment of privacy, of a little speculation on his own there on his hands and knees in the front room of the Mansion House, with papyri spread out around him on the floor. The fact that he kept his notes strictly to himself is evidence enough that they were his own private concern and were never meant as a message to the Church.

This is a very important point. The whole attack against the Book of Abraham in the past has been based on the perfectly false principle that whatever a prophet does must be of a supernatural nature and whatever he says must have the authority of scripture, and that hence if a prophet ever betrays the slightest sign of human weakness or any mortal limitation he must necessarily be a false prophet. . . . The sectarian world has never been able to see how it is possible to have revelations and still learn by trial and error: . . . it should be perfectly clear to all that no one is bound by anything outside of the four standard works, and that to make an issue of the so-called Egyptian Grammar is to insist on a doctrine of infallibility that is diametrically opposed to the teachings of the Church. (BYU Studies, Winter 1968, pp. 176-178)

This statement by Dr. Nibley must have come as a great shock to the Mormons. Notice that he admits that Joseph Smith’s Egyptian Alphabet and Grammar “was hidden and suppressed.” He also concedes that Joseph Smith did not understand Egyptian and that the “Egyptian Grammar” is not worth “five minutes” study. It seems, then, that Professor Nibley is willing to admit that the “Egyptian Grammar” is worthless, yet he still maintains that the Book of Abraham came by divine revelation. We feel that this is an impossible stand to maintain. If the “Egyptian Grammar” is worthless, then the Book of Abraham must also be rejected.

Dr. James R. Clark seems to realize that Joseph Smith's Egyptian Alphabet and Grammar cannot be repudiated without also repudiating the Book of Abraham, and he has publicly differed with Dr. Nibley concerning this matter:

Q. At least one other scholar has called the Egyptian Alphabet and Grammar speculation. What is your opinion, Dr. Clark?

A. I have been working with it for thirty-five years. I do not agree that it is speculation. Neither do I agree that it is "the equivalent of Brigham Young's laundry list." (Book of Abraham Symposium, April 3, 1970, p. 24)

In Brigham Young University Studies, Summer 1971, page 352, note 1, Dr. Nibley stated: "Clark's suggestion (pp. 109f) that this may be a translation of a grammar written by Abraham meets with many objections, . . ." On pages 350-352 of the same article, Professor Nibley made this critical statement about the work of Clark and Sperry:

When a bound manuscript captioned "Grammar and Alphabet of the Egyptian Language" was turned up in the Church Historian's Office in February 1935, the finders were understandably eager to claim the discovery of a major writing of Joseph Smith himself, and not only accepted the thing without question or examination as his work, but even went so far as to label it "Joseph Smith's Translation of Abraham's Alphabet and Grammar."

Hugh Nibley claims that this has "laid the foundation of a massive misunderstanding . . ." (Ibid., p. 350)

In a letter dated June 18, 1968, Dr. Nibley made these statements:

Joseph Smith speculated on various aspects of Egyptian writing and in the process left a number of documents which have been called "The Egyptian Alphabet and Grammar." The work was never completed or put into form for publication—it remained speculative and subject to change to the end. It is quite different from the Egyptian grammars we use today. . . . Since Joseph Smith's "Egyptian Grammar" has never had any official status in the Church it has not been used in the way of evidence. In the coming months I hope to go into the subject of the Prophet's interpretations of Egyptian writings in some detail. There is ample evidence that Smith did know what he was talking about, but the evidence is not at present to be found in the Grammar.

In the Improvement Era for March, 1968, page 18, Dr. Nibley made these comments:

Joseph Smith's work, here mentioned, on the Egyptian alphabet was never accepted or even presented to the Church as revelation, and no one is bound by it, but the zeal and application of the brethren was rewarded by a revelation that far transcended any intellectual efforts of man. It is this revelation that is comprised in the Pearl of Great Price, and it is by it and others like it that one may judge the Prophet Joseph, and not by such preliminary gropings as the so-called Egyptian Alphabet and Grammar, which was never completed, never released for publication, and, so far as we have been able to discover, never even mentioned in public. Granted that diligent searching and study may be a preliminary to receiving revelation, the revelation when it comes is certainly not to be judged by them. We are not only permitted but also instructed to cast about for possible solutions in our minds before the real solution is given us, and if we find Joseph Smith doing just that, we should not rush to point out possible flaws in his preliminary speculations as proof that he was not inspired.

Where translation is concerned, Joseph Smith also operated on two levels, with no danger of confusing the two. . . . we must allow him the luxury of having his own ideas about things, and making his own mistakes and his own translations as long as he plays the game fairly and never presents them as binding on others.

The Mormon writers Keith Terry and Walter Whipple accused Dr. Nibley of scoffing at Joseph Smith's translations:

The "Egyptian Alphabet and Grammar" is presently preserved in the Church Historian's office. . . .

The complexity of the alphabet of the ancient writers is explained with the following statements: "By inserting a straight mark over it . . . its signification is increased five times more." At this point his explanation becomes quite complex and loses all but the most astute grammarians in the lengthy commentary, . . .

This information presented in the "Alphabet and Grammar" concerning horizontal lines has no correlation to Champollion's hieroglyphic decipherments. Modern Egyptologists, including Mormon scholar Hugh Nibley, have scoffed at such methods of translating. (From the Dust of Decades, 1968, pp. 36-37)

Professor Nibley has certainly "scoffed" at Joseph Smith's method of translating. Writing in BYU Studies, he made these statements about the Egyptian Alphabet and Grammar:

5. Stranger still, the signs that are explained are not found in the real Egyptian documents, where no system is in evidence of the placing of one, two, or three strokes above a sign, for example, . . .

8. Because of the peculiar system of classes and degrees, almost every passage in the A. & G. appears more than once, and most of the symbols are given more than one interpretation. . . . it is of no help to a translator when any symbol can, without the slightest alteration, take on half-a-dozen different meanings. Which are we to take as the official translation? (Brigham Young University Studies, Summer 1971, pp. 368-369)

Dr. Nibley tries to cast doubt upon the importance of Joseph Smith's Egyptian Alphabet and Grammar by stating that most of it is in the handwriting of his scribes:

The interesting thing is the way the three men disagree in their interpretations, each going his own way. . . . Each of these in interpreting the same sign, with no sovereign master-mind to bring them to a unity of the faith. Cowdrey and Phelps hear different sounds and come up with different meanings. And Joseph freely lets them go their own way while he goes his, each under obligation to "study it out in your mind" before asking for revelation. (Ibid., pp. 364-365)

. . . the Kirtland Egyptian Papers were as much their baby as Smith's, but no matter who was responsible for them they contained nothing reprehensible, since no claims either of divine inspiration or of scholarly accuracy were made for them. (Ibid., p. 397)

Actually, most of Joseph Smith's work is in the handwriting of his scribes. According to the History of the Church, vol. 4, page 1, Joseph Smith stated:

I was dictating history, I say dictating, for I seldom use the pen myself. I always dictated all my communications, but employ a scribe to write them.

If the Mormons only accepted what is written in Joseph Smith's own handwriting they would have to give up the Book of Mormon, for the entire book was dictated to his scribes. It would be ridiculous to claim that it is "as much their baby" as his just because it is in their handwriting. We know that Joseph Smith was responsible for the contents of the Egyptian Alphabet and Grammar, for the History of the Church, vol. 2, page 238, related:

The remainder of this month, I was continually engaged in translating an alphabet to the Book of Abraham, and arranging a grammar of the Egyptian language as practiced by the ancients.

It is also interesting to note that Dr. Nibley has to admit that part of the Egyptian Alphabet and Grammar is actually in Joseph Smith's own hand: "Egyptian Mss. #4, . . . Manuscript entitled 'Egyptian alphabet,' in the handwriting of Joseph Smith" (BYU Studies, Summer 1971, p. 351). Nibley concedes that this portion of the manuscript "occupies four pages" (Ibid., p. 364).

Dr. Nibley must have received a great deal of criticism from members of the Church who felt that he had betrayed the church by rejecting Joseph Smith's Egyptian Alphabet and Grammar and claiming it was not worth five minutes study. While Nibley has never retracted his criticism of the Egyptian Alphabet and Grammar, in an article written in August 1968 he reversed his position about the importance of studying the document. He said that a student of the Book of Abraham should be thoroughly familiar with the "Alphabet and Grammar":

Consider for a moment the scope and complexity of the materials with which the student must cope if he would undertake a serious study of the Book of Abraham's authenticity. At the very least he must be thoroughly familiar with (1) the texts of the "Joseph Smith Papyri" identified as belonging to the Book of the Dead, (2) the content and nature of the mysterious "Sen-sen" fragment, (3) the so called "Egyptian Alphabet and Grammar" attributed to Joseph Smith, . . . (Improvement Era, August 1968, pp. 55-56)

This is certainly a strange statement to be coming from the man who had previously stated that he had "never spent so much as five minutes with the Egyptian Grammar, and does not intend to unless he is forced to it."

The Mormon scholar John Tvedtnes admitted that Joseph Smith's "Grammar" is not really a grammar of the Egyptian language:

I refer here to Joseph Smith's "Egyptian Alphabet and Grammar," which, in the light of what is known at present about the Egyptian language, clearly shows ignorance of that language on the part of Joseph Smith. . . . let us agree with the critic—e.g., the "Alphabet and Grammar" is not a grammar of the Egyptian language. . . . The "Alphabet and Grammar" seems to be, for the most part, speculative, . . . I suspect that he was attempting to historically analyze the origin and perhaps the development of symbols, without complete regard to the meaning of each. . . .

To summarize the matter of Joseph Smith's personal notes, then, it is my belief that, after having written down the Book of Abraham (or, at least, after having received it), the Prophet began to speculate on the nature of the language of the documents . . . His notes are evidence of his ignorance of that language, but also provide some evidence of rather educated guessing, . . . (Book of Abraham Symposium, April 3, 1970, pp. 72, 73, 74, 76)

Dr. Hugh Nibley made these confusing remarks concerning the Alphabet and Grammar:

From the very beginning this writer has been rightly accused of an almost callous unconcern for the newly located papyri (all except the one matching Facsimile 1) as evidence for or against the authenticity of the Book of Abraham. Equal indifference to the so-called Egyptian Alphabet and Grammar springs neither from misgivings nor indolence, but from a principle which has been taught in the Church from the beginning and which cannot be too strictly enjoined on all students of the gospel, namely, that a Latter-day Saint is bound to accept as true scriptures only the standard works of the Church. (Improvement Era, November 1968, p. 36)

Whether the "Sen-sen" Papyrus or the Egyptian Alphabet and Grammar (here-after cited as EAG) makes sense or not, the Book of Abraham makes very good sense, . . . There is every indication that the free-wheeling conjectures of the EAG were made after the Book of Abraham was completed, so that even the irrelevant argument of the book's dubious documentary background remains unfounded. (Brigham Young University Studies, Autumn 1968, pp. 71-72)

The Egyptian Alphabet and Grammar cannot be used as a close check on the Book of Abraham until a great deal more is known about both documents. We do not yet know just what the EAG is or in what light Joseph Smith regarded it. (Ibid., p. 95) state of confusion. The Mormon writer Jay M. Todd admits there is a division in the Church with regard to this matter:

In frank terms, no one seems to know the "grammar's" value. Dr. Hugh Nibley has suggested that the "grammar" represents the Prophet's personal "hobbying," personal ideas, and was never intended by the Prophet to represent revealed information. Other students, generally not familiar with Egyptian, however, have suggested that the "grammar" represents a major contribution in the cracking of an ancient language. (The Saga of the Book of Abraham, p. 314)

It is apparent that the Prophet projected confidence in his usage of Egyptian, as if he was quite familiar with the tongue. . . . What was this alphabet and grammar? Questions abound. All that is known at present is: Joseph Smith apparently felt quite confident about his Egyptian. . . . One wonders, after reading reports that the seer stone was the instrument for the reception of the Book of Abraham, if the Prophet was merely taking some of the information acquired from his experience in recording and viewing the translation and applying it to the papyri with the best ability and knowledge he had at the moment. If this were the case, such an alphabet and grammar would have the seeds of Joseph's personal notions as much as of inspired elements. Or, as is obvious, it could be the complete result of inspiration. It also could be the result of his own notions about cracking the Egyptian language. . . . The issue is a confusing one at present. (Ibid., pp. 252-253)

Master of All Languages

We feel that Dr. Nibley has put the Mormon Church in an embarrassing position, for it is impossible to repudiate Joseph Smith's Egyptian Alphabet and Grammar without also repudiating the Book of Abraham and casting a shadow of doubt upon the rest of Joseph Smith's works.

Nibley now claims that "Joseph Smith never pretended to understand Egyptian," and that the Book of Abraham came by revelation. In the Winter 1968 issue of Brigham Young University Studies, page 174, he claims that "Joseph Smith made no secret of his fallibility and claimed to know no language but English."

This statement is about as far from the truth as it is possible to get. Actually, Joseph Smith claimed to be a great linguist. Josiah Quincy related the following:

The prophet referred to his miraculous gift to understanding all languages, and took down a Bible in various tongues, for the purpose of exhibiting his accomplishments in this particular. (Figures of the Past, as quoted in Among the Mormons, 1958, p. 136)

Josiah Quincy told Henry Halkett of his visit with Joseph Smith. The following remark by Joseph Smith was found in Halkett's notes:

"These are hieroglyphics, nobody can read them but myself. I can read all writing and all hieroglyphics . . ." (As quoted in The Saga of the Book of Abraham, p. 257)

In his "King Follett Sermon" Joseph Smith boasted of his ability to translate different languages:

. . . I shall comment on the very first Hebrew word in the Bible; . . . Berosheit. I want to analyze the word; baith, in, by, through, in, and every thing else. Rosh, the head. Sheit, grammatical termination. When the inspired man wrote it, he did not put the baith there. A man, a Jew without any authority, thought it too bad to begin to talk about the head. It read first, "The head one of the Gods brought forth the Gods," that is the true meaning of the words, Baurau, signifies to bring forth. If you do not believe it, you do not believe the learned man of God. No man can learn you more than what I have told you. . . . I have an old book of the New Testament in the Hebrew, Latin, German and Greek. I have been reading the German and find it to be the most correct, . . . I know more than all the world put together, . . . The word create came from the word baurau; it does not mean so; it means to organize; the same as a man would organize a ship. . . . I have now preached a little Latin, a little Hebrew, Greek and German, and I have fulfilled all.—I am not so big a fool as many have taken me to be. The Germans know that I read the German correct. (Times and Seasons, vol. 5, pp. 614, 615, 617)

On another occasion Joseph Smith quoted from seventeen different languages:

Were I a Chaldean I would exclaim: Keed' nauh to-me-roon lehoam elauhayauh dey-ahemayaua veh aur'kau lau gnaubadoo, yabadoo ma-ar'gnau comeen tehoat sheamyauh allah. (Thus shall ye say unto them: The gods that have not made the heavens and the earth, they shall perish from the earth, and from these heavens.)

An Egyptian, Su-e-eh-ni. (What other persons are those?) A Grecian, Diabolos bssileuei. (The Devil reigns.) A Frenchman, Messieurs sans Dieu. (Gentlemen without God.) A Turk, Ain shems. (The fountain of light.) A German, sie sind unferstandig! (What consummate ignorance!) A Syrian, Zaubok! (Sacrifice!) A Spaniard, Il sabio muda conscio, il nescio no. (A wise man reflects, a fool does not.) A Samaritan: Saunau! (O stranger!) An Italian: Oh tempa! oh diffidenza! (O the times! O the diffidence!) A Hebrew: Ahtau ail rauy. (Thou God seest me.) A Dane: Hvad tidende! (What tidings!) A Saxon, Hwaet riht! (What right!) A Swede: Hvad skilia! (What skill!) A Polander: Nay-yen-shoo bah pon na Jesu Christus. (Blessed be the name of Jesus Christ.) A western Indian: She-mo-kah she-mo-keh teh oughne-gah. (The white man. O the white man, he very uncertain.) A Roman: Procul, O procul este profani! (Be off, be off ye profane!) But as I am I will only add; when the wicked rule the people mourn. (The Voice of Truth (1844), pp. 16-17, as quoted in No Man Knows My History, by Fawn M. Brodie, p. 292)

Dr. James R. Clark, of Brigham Young University, stresses: "Joseph Smith was no dilettante translator" (The Story of the Pearl of Great Price, p. 102).

Dr. Nibley claims that Joseph Smith's Egyptian Alphabet and Grammar "was never completed, never released for publication, and, so far as we have been able to discover, never even mentioned in public" (Improvement Era, March 1968, p. 18). Actually, Joseph Smith seemed to take his "Egyptian Alphabet and Grammar" very serious. The reader will remember that he made this statement in the History of the Church, vol. 2, page 238:

The remainder of this month [July, 1835], I was continually engaged in translating an alphabet to the Book of Abraham, and arranging a grammar of the Egyptian language as practiced by the ancients.

On October 1, 1835, we find Joseph Smith still working on the "Egyptian Alphabet and Grammar":

October 1.—This afternoon I labored on the Egyptian alphabet, . . . and during the research, the principles of astronomy as understood by Father Abraham and the ancients unfolded to our understanding, . . . (History of the Church, vol. 2, p. 286)

Joseph Smith publicly used material from his "Egyptian Alphabet." The reader will remember that when Smith quoted seventeen different languages, one of them was the Egyptian language: "An Egyptian, Su-eeh-ni. (What other persons are those?)" This is taken from Joseph Smith's Egyptian Alphabet and Grammar, page A: "Sue-e-eh-ni What other person is that? Who."

On November 13, 1843, Joseph Smith wrote a letter in which he stated: "Were I an Egyptian, I would exclaim Jah-oh-eh, Enish-go-ondosh, Flo-ees-Flos-is-is; [O the earth! the power of attraction, and the moon passing between her and the sun.]" (Times and Seasons, vol. 4, p. 373). Joseph Smith took this information from his "Egyptian Alphabet and Grammar," pages 29 and 30:

Jah-oh-eh The earth under the government of an other or the second of the fixed stars, which is called Enish-go-on-dosh or in other words the power of attra[c]tion it has with the earth.

Flo-ees: The moon-signifying its revolutions, also going between, thereby forming an eclipse

Flos-isis: The sun in its affinity with Earth and moon-signifying their revolutions showing the power, the one has with the other

The problem goes much deeper than Joseph Smith quoting from his "Egyptian Alphabet" in his speeches, for when we examine the Book of Abraham we find that Joseph Smith actually uses some of the material from his "Egyptian Alphabet." For instance, in his interpretation of Facsimile No. 2 Joseph Smith states:

Fig. 1. Kolob, signifying the first creation, nearest to the celestial, or the residence of God. First in government, the last pertaining to the measurement of time. The measurement according to celestial time, which celestial time signifies one day to a cubit. One day in Kolob is equal to a thousand years according to the measurement of this earth, which is called by the Egyptians Jah-oh-eh. (Pearl of Great Price, Book of Abraham, Facsimile No. 2, Fig. 1.)

When we compare Joseph Smith's Egyptian Alphabet and Grammar, page 26, we find that it is the source for the statement in the explanation of Facsimile No. 2:

Kolob signifies the first creation nearer to the Celestial, or the residence of God, first in government, the last pertaining to the measurement of time, the measurement according to Celestial time which signifies one day to a cubit which day is equal to a thousand years according to the measurement of this earth or Jah-oh-eh

In his interpretation of Facsimile No. 2, Figure 5, Joseph Smith uses the words "Enish-go-on-dosh," "Kae-e-van-rash," "Floeseese" and "Kliflos-is-es." These are all words taken from the "Egyptian Alphabet and Grammar." Richard P. Howard, Church Historian for the Reorganized LDS Church, makes these comments concerning this matter:

Therefore, since 1912 serious students of this subject have had to consider the probability that Joseph Smith had erred at many significant points in his interpretation of the drawings on the papyri, from part of which the text of the Book of Abraham itself was apparently derived. The implication of this is that if Joseph Smith erred in assessing the meanings of the papyri drawings, there is a strong likelihood that his interpretations of the ancient Egyptian language symbols on the papyri were inaccurate also.

A second development underscores this possibility: the publication in 1966 of a reproduction of a document known as Joseph Smith's "Grammar and Alphabet of the Egyptian Language." . . . This reproduction, if of an authentic original, demonstrates significant connections between some words in it and identical words used by Joseph Smith in his interpretations accompanying the three facsimiles as published in 1842. It follows that if modern Egyptologists have or might yet clearly establish the inaccuracy of Joseph's interpretations of the three facsimiles, and if further research confirms the link already observed between Joseph's facsimile interpretations and his "Grammar and Alphabet of the Egyptian Language," then the reliability of the Book of Abraham as a translation of ancient records could no longer safely be maintained. (Dialogue: A Journal of Mormon Thought, Summer 1968, p. 91)

Although Dr. Hugh Nibley does his best to separate Joseph Smith from the "Egyptian Alphabet and Grammar," the evidence shows that he must be held responsible. As we have already shown, the Mormon Egyptologist Edward H. Ashment feels that the evidence indicates that "the prophet has some positive connection with the production of the Joseph Smith Egyptian Papers. Therefore, even though involvement with them on his part has been disputed, thoughtful reexamination of the evidence leads to the conclusion that the prophet was connected with the entire project" (Sunstone, December 1979, p. 42).

The most devastating evidence against the Book of Abraham, of course, is found in the Book of Abraham manuscripts which are included in the collection of documents known as the “Egyptian Alphabet and Grammar.” As we have discussed these manuscripts earlier, we do not need to deal with this matter here.

From the evidence we have presented above, the reader will see that it is impossible to divorce Joseph Smith’s “Egyptian Alphabet and Grammar” from his Book of Abraham. They must stand or fall together.

Possible Sources

Now that Joseph Smith’s Book of Abraham has been proven false by the very papyrus upon which it was supposed to have been based, Mormon scholars are desperately searching for some way to keep from facing the serious implications of this matter. Although the Book of Abraham is a small book, it has a tremendous influence on Mormon doctrine. Jay M. Todd pointed out:

Few writers and historians of the Prophet’s life have noted the apparent influence that the Book of Abraham had upon the Prophet. But those who take the time to review his speeches, writings, and thought soon realize that for nine long years—from 1835 to his martyrdom in 1844—the Prophet Joseph Smith relied heavily upon that which he had learned from Abraham. . . . Although the Prophet continued to receive revelations and gain other knowledge, nothing could push aside the great truths he had learned from Abraham. (The Saga of the Book of Abraham, p. 264)

Because of the importance of the Book of Abraham to Mormon theology, Mormon writers are going to great lengths to find some way to save it.

Imitation Genesis

Besides the devastating evidence against the authenticity of the Book of Abraham that has been furnished by the translation of the papyrus, there is additional evidence which we should consider. For instance, it is plain to see that Joseph Smith borrowed heavily from the King James Version of the Bible. Below is a comparison of some verses from the Book of Abraham with some verses from Genesis.

These parallels should be sufficient to convince the reader that the two texts are closely related. We feel that the only logical explanation for this relationship is that Joseph Smith merely borrowed from the Bible, rewriting and adding to the text as he went along. Dr. Sidney B. Sperry, on the other hand, felt that the Book of Abraham was in existence before Genesis was written and that Genesis was taken from it! In his book Ancient Records Testify in Papyrus and Stone, 1938, page 81, he declared:

. . . this writer believes that the second chapter of Abraham is the original, of which Gen. 12:1-13 is an abridgment. This is a remarkable fact . . .

GENESIS

Now the Lord had said unto Abram, Get thee out of thy country, and from thy kindred, and from thy father’s house, unto a land that I will shew thee:

And I make of thee a great nation, and I will bless thee, and make thy name great; and thou shalt be a blessing:

And I will bless them that bless thee, and curse him that curseth thee: and in thee shall all families of the earth be blessed

So Abram departed, as the Lord had spoken unto him; and Lot went with him: and Abram was seventy and five years old when he departed out of Haran

And Abram took Sarai his wife, and Lot his brother’s son, and all their substance that they had gathered, and the souls that they had gotten in Haran; and they went forth to go into the land of Canaan; and into the land of Canaan they came.

And Abram passed through the land unto the place of Sichem, unto the plain of Moreh. And the Canaanite was then in the land

And the Lord appeared unto Abram, and said, Unto thy seed will I give this land: and there builded he an altar unto the Lord, who appeared unto him.

And he removed from thence unto a mountain on the east of Bethel, and pitched his tent, having Bethel on the west, and Hai on the east: and there he builded an altar unto the Lord, and called upon the name of the Lord.

And Abram journeyed, going on still toward the south.

And there was a famine in the land: and Abram went down into Egypt to sojourn there; for the famine was grievous in the land.

And it came to pass, when he was come near to enter into Egypt, that he said unto Sarai his wife, Behold now, I know that thou art a fair woman to look upon:

Therefore it shall come to pass, when the Egyptians shall see thee, that they shall say, This is his wife: and they will kill me, but they will save thee alive.

Say, I pray thee, thou art my sister: that it may be well with me for thy sake; and my soul shall live because of thee. (Genesis 12:1-13)

BOOK OF ABRAHAM

Now the Lord had said unto me: Abraham, get thee out of thy country, and from thy kindred, and from thy father’s house, unto a land that I will show thee.

And I will make of thee a great nation, and I will bless thee above measure, and make thy name great among all nations, and thou shalt be a blessing . . .

And I will bless them that bless thee, and curse them that curse thee; and in thee . . . shall all the families of the earth be blessed,

So I, Abraham, departed as the Lord had said unto me, and Lot with me; and I, Abraham, was sixty and two years old when I departed out of Haran.

And I took Sarai, whom I took to wife . . . and Lot, my brother’s son, and all our substance that we had gathered, and the souls that we had won in Haran, and came forth in the way to the land of Canaan, . . . to come to the land of Canaan

And then we passed from Jershon through the land unto the place of Sechem; it was situated in the plains of Moreh, . . . into the borders of the land of the Canaanites,

And the Lord appeared unto me . . . and said unto me; Unto thy seed will I give this land.

And I, Abraham, arose from the place of the altar which I had built unto the Lord, and removed from thence unto a mountain on the east of Bethel, and pitched my tent there, Bethel on the west, and Hai on the east; and there I built another altar unto the Lord, and called again upon name of the Lord.

And I, Abraham, journeyed, going on still towards the south; and there was a continuation of a famine in the land; and I, Abraham concluded to go down into Egypt, to sojourn there, for the famine became very grievous.

And it came to pass when I was come near to enter into Egypt, the Lord said unto me: Behold, Sarai, thy wife, is a very fair woman to look upon;

Therefore it shall come to pass, when the Egyptians shall see her, they will say— She is his wife; and they will kill you, but they will save her alive;

. . . say unto them, I pray thee, thou art my sister, that it may be well with me for thy sake, and my soul shall live because of thee. (Pearl of Great Price, Book of Abraham 2:3, 9, 11, 14, 15, 16, 18, 19-23, 25)

For a number of years I have strongly felt that chapter 2 of the Book of Abraham is the original account from which Gen. 12:1-13 was made. Putting it another way, the account in Genesis is nothing more or less than an abridgment of that in the Book of Abraham. . . . the writings of Abraham . . . must of necessity be older than the original text of Genesis. . . .

Let the reader make but a casual comparison of Gen. 12:1-13 and the second chapter of the Book of Abraham and he will discover that an apparently close relationship exists between them. . . . The similarity cannot be accidental. . . . a linguistic study of the Book of Abraham and of the parallel versions of the Bible points unmistakably to the independent character of the Egyptian record and to the conclusion that it is, at least, the possible original from whence the account in Genesis was taken. (Ibid., pp. 83-84)

Although Dr. Sperry's idea that Genesis was taken from the Book of Abraham may seem fantastic, it is the only answer he could give that would not undermine the Book of Abraham. To say that the Book of Abraham came from Genesis is to label it a fraud. Of course, now that we have the original papyrus from which the Book of Abraham was "translated," we know that it is in reality nothing but an Egyptian funerary document and has nothing to do with Abraham or his religion. But even if the original papyrus were not available, there would be sufficient evidence to prove that the Book of Abraham was written after Genesis.

While Dr. Sperry would like us to believe that Genesis was derived from the Book of Abraham, he points out that there are differences between the two texts. He states that the Book of Abraham calls the patriarch "Abraham," whereas Genesis refers to him as "Abram" until the seventeenth chapter. After comparing Genesis 12:4 and Abraham 2:14, Dr. Sperry states:

Three things are immediately apparent. In the first place the account in the Book of Abraham is written in the first person, that of Genesis in the third person. Secondly, the accounts do not agree as to the age of Abraham when he left Haran. Thirdly, the Book of Abraham writes the name of the great patriarch "Abraham" as against "Abram" in the Genesis version. It is self-evident that the Book of Abraham does not copy verbatim, if at all, from the King James version as some of its critics may presume. Had Joseph Smith been an impostor the chances are very good that he would have made Abraham's age agree with that given in Genesis. Furthermore, it is doubtful that he would have called the patriarch "Abraham" before the latter came to Egypt. The version in Genesis does not call him "Abraham" until he had long been back from that country. (See Gen. 17:5). (Ancient Records Testify in Papyrus and Stone, p. 84)

Actually, Dr. Sperry's point concerning "Abram" and "Abraham" becomes of little value when we compare the original handwritten manuscripts and the first printed version of the Book of Abraham with the way it is printed today. The manuscripts and the first printed version in the Times and Seasons show that Joseph Smith was very confused over the name and used both versions. Abraham 2:14 contains the name "Abraham" in modern editions, but the first printed version reads "Abram" just like the King James Version of the Bible. Below is a comparison showing the text as it appears in the Bible, the text as Joseph Smith first printed it in the Times and Seasons, and the altered version that appears in modern editions of the Pearl of Great Price.

GENESIS 12:4: So Abram departed, as the Lord had spoken unto him; and Lot went with him: and Abram was seventy and five years old when he departed out of Haran.

TIMES AND SEASONS, vol. 3, p. 706: So I, Abram, departed as the Lord had said unto me, and Lot with me, and I, Abram, was sixty and two years old when I departed out of Haran.

PEARL OF GREAT PRICE, Abraham 2:14: So, I, Abraham, departed as the Lord had said unto me, and Lot with me; and I, Abraham, was sixty and two years old when I departed out of Haran.

Dr. James R. Clark admits that the text of the Book of Abraham has been changed regarding this matter:

From the Times and Seasons printing of the translation it would seem that Abraham used the earlier form of his name—Abram—when he referred in his autobiography to events in his life preceding his offering of the sacrifice on the altar at Sechem or at Jershon. . . .

Our present text of the Book of Abraham loses this significance of the difference in the meanings of the two forms of Abraham's name by printing the name in one form only. This change in the text evidently came in England when Parley P. Pratt or Thomas Ward republished the Book of Abraham in the July and August, 1842 issues of the Millennial Star. . . .

It is the personal opinion of the author that for the very substantial reasons presented above, the Times and Seasons contains the correct translations or transliterations of the names for Abraham and that our present editions are in error on this point. (The Story of the Pearl of Great Price, p. 176, 178)

It is extremely interesting to note that the text of the Book of Abraham itself seems to catch Joseph Smith in the process of changing his doctrine concerning the Godhead. In the first part of the Book of Abraham we do not find the doctrine of a plurality of Gods. For instance, in Abraham 2:1 we read: "Now the Lord God caused the famine to wax sore . . ." This part of the Book of Abraham was probably written in 1835. The Mormon writer Jay M. Todd points out: "Another fact of relevance in the matter is the amount of present-day Book of Abraham in the hand of Warren Parrish: chapter 1:1-2:18. This is also the exact length of the first installment in the 1842 Times and Seasons. One tends to wonder if that is as far as the Prophet reached in his 1835 work" (The Saga of the Book of Abraham, by Jay M. Todd, p. 324). In 1842, however, Joseph Smith "translated" more of the Book of Abraham. Under the date of March 8, 1842, we find this statement in his History: "Recommended translating from the Records of Abraham for the tenth number of the Times and Seasons, . . ." Jay M. Todd makes this remark concerning the entry in Joseph Smith's History: "This is a very important entry, the first entry since November 1835 in which the Prophet is mentioned as 'translating.' Interestingly, it is after the publication of the first installment, which was up to Abraham 2:18" (The Saga of the Book of Abraham, p. 288). As we examine the text of the Book of Abraham we find that it is the part which was "translated" in March 1842 which contains the doctrine of a plurality of Gods. The words "the Gods" appear more than forty times in the fourth and fifth chapters of the Book of Abraham.

Actually, chapters four and five of the Book of Abraham appear to be nothing but the first part of Genesis rewritten to include a plurality of Gods. The word "God" is changed to "the Gods," and wherever the word "he" refers to God it has been changed to "they." It would appear, however, that in one instance Joseph Smith forgot to change the word "he" to "they" and that it had to be changed after his death. He was apparently copying from Genesis 1:16, which reads:

And God made two great lights; the greater light to rule the day, and the lesser light to rule the night; he made the stars also. (Genesis 1:16)

Joseph Smith rewrote this to read as follows:

And the Gods organized the two great lights, the greater light to rule the day, and the lesser light to rule the night; with the lesser light he set the stars, also; . . . (Times and Seasons, vol. 3, p. 721)

This was reprinted the same way in the Millennial Star, August 1842, vol. 3, p. 51. In the Pearl of Great Price, however, it has been changed to read:

And the Gods organized the two great lights, the greater light to rule the day, and the lesser light to rule the night; with the lesser light they set the stars also; (Pearl of Great Price, Book of Abraham 4:16)

Other Sources

Although the King James Version of the Bible was the primary source for Joseph Smith's Book of Abraham, he seems to have used other sources as well. It is very possible that the writings of the Jewish historian Josephus had some influence on the Book of Abraham. In Abraham 1:23 we read of "the daughter of Egyptus, . . ." This name is not found in the Bible, but in "Flavius Josephus Against Apion," we read: ". . . Manetho says that Sethosis himself was called Egyptus, . . ." (Josephus, Translated by William Whiston, Michigan, 1966, p. 612).

According to the Book of Abraham, the Lord revealed the principles of astronomy to Abraham before he went into Egypt. In Abraham 3:15 we read: "And the Lord said unto me: Abraham, I show these things unto thee before ye go into Egypt, that ye may declare all these words." At the bottom of the explanation to Facsimile No. 3 in the Book of Abraham we find this statement: "Abraham is reasoning upon the principles of astronomy, in the king's court." While the Bible does not even use the word "astronomy," Josephus claimed that Abraham taught the Egyptians "the science of astronomy":

. . . Abram conferred with each of them, . . . He communicated to them arithmetic, and delivered to them the science of astronomy; for, before Abram came into Egypt, they were unacquainted with those parts of learning; . . . (Josephus, p. 33)

The Mormon leaders must have been familiar with Josephus at the time the Book of Abraham was written, for in a letter, dated Dec. 22, 1835, Oliver Cowdery referred to the writings of Josephus (see Latter Day Saints' Messenger and Advocate, vol. 2, p. 236).

Another book which probably had an influence on Joseph Smith's "Book of Abraham" was Thomas Dick's Philosophy of a Future State. For more information on this matter see our Case, vol. 3, pages 83-83.

Fawn Brodie makes the following statement about Dick's book and its influence on Joseph Smith:

. . . Joseph created Abraham an eminent astronomer who penetrates all the mysteries of the universe. Abraham relates that there is one star, Kolob, lying near the throne of God, . . . Kolob and countless lesser stars are peopled by spirits that are eternal as matter itself. These spirits are not cast in the same mold, but differ among themselves in quality of intelligence as the stars differ in magnitude.

These concepts, which developed peculiar ramifications in Joseph's later teachings, came directly from Dick, who had speculated that the stars were peopled by "various orders of intelligences," and that these intelligences were "progressive beings" in various stages of evolution toward perfection. (No Man Knows My History, by Fawn Brodie, p. 172)

One of the most offensive doctrines contained in the Book of Abraham is that concerning blacks. The Book of Abraham, of course, teaches that all the descendants of Ham were cursed so that they could not hold the priesthood. Joseph Smith's doctrine of the curse on the blacks was obviously derived from the thinking of his time. In an article published in Dialogue: A Journal of Mormon Thought, Winter 1969, page 93, Lester Bush states that "the parallels between Mormon Scripture and the contemporary proslavery arguments are striking." He goes on to point out that even before Joseph Smith received the papyri, W. W. Phelps had published an article which contained ideas similar to the Book of Abraham. This article was published in the Messenger and Advocate in March, 1835, and contained these interesting statements:

Is or is it not apparent from reason and analogy as drawn from a careful reading of the Scriptures, that God causes the saints, or people that fall away from his church to be cursed in time, with a black skin? Was or was not Cain, being marked, obliged to inherit the curse, he and his children, forever? And if so, as Ham, like other sons of God, might break the rule of God, by marrying out of the church, did or did he not, have a Canaanite wife, whereby some of the black seed was preserved through the flood, and his son, Canaan, after he laughed at his grandfather's nakedness, heired three curses; one from Cain for killing Abel; one from Ham for marrying a black wife, and one from Noah for ridiculing what God had respect for? Are or are not the Indians a sample of marking with blackness for rebellion against God's holy word and holy order? And can or can we not observe in the countenances of almost all nations, except the Gentile, a dark, sallow hue, which tells the sons of God, without a line of history, that they have fallen or changed from the original beauty and grace of father Adam? (Messenger and Advocate, vol. 1, p. 82)

In his Book of Abraham, Joseph Smith seemed to follow the same argument used by Phelps—i.e., that Ham married a Canaanite woman and thus "the curse" was preserved in the land:

Now this king of Egypt was a descendant from the loins of Ham, and was a partaker of the blood of the Canaanites by birth.

From this descent sprang all the Egyptians, and thus the blood of the Canaanites was preserved in the land.

The land of Egypt being first discovered by a woman, who was the daughter of Ham, and the daughter of Egyptus, which in the Chaldean signifies Egypt, which signifies that which is forbidden.

When this woman discovered the land it was under water, who afterward settled her sons in it, and thus, from Ham, sprang that race which preserved the curse in the land. (Pearl of Great Price, Book of Abraham, 1:21-24)

James R. Harris, Assistant Professor of Religious Education at Brigham Young University, may have uncovered another source for some of the text of the Book of Abraham, although he does not seem to realize the serious implications of this important discovery. Mr. Harris has found that part of Abraham 1:2 seems to have a definite relationship to some material written by Oliver Cowdery. Cowdery, of course, was one of the witnesses to the Book of Mormon.

Below the reader will find a comparison of Oliver Cowdery's words with those found in the Book of Abraham.

Pearl of Great Price, Book of Abraham 1:2:

. . . I sought for the blessings of the fathers, and the right whereunto I should be ordained to administer the same; having been myself a follower of righteousness, desiring also to be one who possessed great knowledge, . . .

Oliver Cowdery ("Patriarchal Blessing Book," No. 1, pp. 8-9, as cited by Richard L. Anderson in The Improvement Era, September 1968, p. 20):

. . . we diligently sought for the right of the fathers, and the authority of the holy priesthood, and the power to administer in the same; for we desired to be followers of righteousness and the possessors of greater knowledge, . . .

James R. Harris makes these surprising comments concerning this matter:

A possibility that the text of the Book of Abraham may have been defective and therefore both inadequate and unnecessary to the production of a revealed translation is explored and proposed by [Jay M.] Todd. . . .

We may have observed additional support for this theory about a month before Todd went to press. The second article in a series on The Three Witnesses was published by Richard L. Anderson. In a quote from a patriarchal blessing recorded in 1833, December 13,

(Patriarchal Blessing Book, No. 1, pp. 8-9) Oliver Cowdery (recorder) added this comment: . . . [see above]

Comparing this quote with Abraham 1:2 would support the theory that a papyrus text in the hands of the prophet was not essential to production of the translation: . . .

The near identical wording of these passages would indicate that some of the text of the Book of Abraham was revealed and recorded before the Abraham papyri came into the possession of Joseph Smith. (Brigham Young University Studies, Autumn 1969, pp. 126-127)

From these comments it would appear that James R. Harris is willing to accept the idea that the Book of Abraham did not come from the papyrus. He would apparently have us believe that at least some of the text of the Book of Abraham was revealed to Joseph Smith before December 13, 1833, and that Oliver Cowdery borrowed his statements from there. While this would explain the “near identical wording,” it is not facing the reality of Joseph Smith’s statements that the Book of Abraham came from the papyrus. A much more logical explanation is that Joseph Smith’s Book of Abraham is a work of his own imagination, and that he derived his ideas from Oliver Cowdery and several other sources.

There seems to be some question as to when Cowdery’s statement was actually written. One scholar maintains that the blessings “that were given December 18, 1833 were not recorded until the latter part of September 1835 and early part of October 1838,” which would be after Joseph Smith obtained the papyri. Joseph Fielding Smith also gives the year as 1835: “We also have Oliver’s testimony, recorded by his own hand, as early as the year 1835. The account is quite interesting, and was recorded in the patriarchal blessing book of Patriarch Joseph Smith, Sen., by Oliver, . . .” (Doctrines of Salvation, vol. 3, p. 99).

The Mormon scholar Richard L. Anderson, however, maintains that the “entry originated December 13, 1833; . . .” (Improvement Era, September 1968, p. 24, n. 16). Perhaps Dr. Anderson means that the entry was originally written in 1833 but not copied into the Patriarchal Blessing Book until 1835.

However this may be, it is very likely that Joseph Smith read Oliver Cowdery’s statement before he dictated the handwritten manuscript of the Book of Abraham. That Joseph Smith may have borrowed ideas from W. W. Phelps or Oliver Cowdery is not too surprising, for both these men were good writers and worked with him on the papyri (see History of the Church, vol. 2, p. 236).

The Mormon Scholar Kirk Holland Vestal has recently written a defense of the Book of Abraham. In this unpublished paper he accepts James R. Harris’ argument that the text of the Book of Abraham came by revelation some two years before Joseph Smith received the papyri. Vestal seems to feel that Joseph Smith actually saw Abraham’s record in vision and that when he received the Book of Breathing papyrus it looked so much like what he had seen that he mistakenly identified it as the “very original manuscript of the Book of Abraham”:

Several years back James Harris pointed out that a significant portion of the text of the Book of Abraham had been translated by Joseph Smith before December 1833. . . . This would suggest that the translation of the Book of Abraham was a process [sic] prior to and independent of any “Egyptian papyri.” . . .

Phelps’ and Cowdery’s familiarity with the contents of the Book of Abraham prior to the arrival of the papyri demonstrate their keen interest in the production of this book. . . . Like Joseph Smith, these two may have been lead [sic] to believe that the papyri were the original sources of the Book of Abraham that Joseph had already translated by the Urim and Thummim. . . . Cowdery’s and Phelps’ close involvement with Joseph Smith and the Egyptian papyri strongly evidence that the Book of Abraham had been significantly translated well before the papyrus came into their hands in July 1835.

History supports the idea that the text of the Book of Abraham was translated by the Urim and Thummim—by revelation—soon after July 1833. . . . The Egyptian papyri that came into the hands of Joseph Smith in early July 1835 have been recognized as fairly common copies of the Egyptian “Book of the Dead.” Under the date of Sunday, the fifth of July 1835, Joseph reports that . . . the scrolls contained the records of Joseph and Abraham: “. . . much to our joy found that one of the rolls contained the writings of Abraham, another the writings of Joseph of Egypt. . . .”

However, when it came down to serious study, we observe that this initial enthusiasm wanes . . .

Joseph Smith had taken the already translated portion of the Book of Abraham, and had attempted to translate the newly found Egyptian Book of the Dead papyri by matching the two texts. It comes as little surprise that Joseph Smith may have indeed thought that what the papyri contained were the original Egyptian texts of the Book of Abraham. In Abraham 1:12 and 14, Abraham refers his readers to an illustration at the beginning of his record. The illustration at the beginning of the Egyptian papyri, as will be shown, is a copy of a scene which dates back to the time when Abraham was in Egypt and before. The scene Abraham placed at the beginning of his record which was translated by Joseph Smith could have and would have resembled the illustration found at the beginning of the papyrus, the latter finding its place at the fore of all present day publications of the Book of Abraham in the Pearl of Great Price. The striking similarity of the scenes in both documents would have led Joseph Smith to naturally assume that what he had in his hands in July 1835 was in fact the very original manuscript of the Book of Abraham. (“Approaching The Book Abraham,” by Kirk Holland Vestal, 1980, pp. 2, 4-6)

It would appear that Mr. Vestal would go to almost any length to escape the obvious conclusion that the Book of Abraham is spurious. Kirk Vestal and Arthur Wallace have written a book entitled, The Firm Foundation of Mormonism. In this book the authors admit that “Each of the three facsimiles are connected with ancient Egyptian funeral rites, and are associated with the Book of the Dead” (The Firm Foundation of Mormonism, Los Angeles, California, p. 183).

Vestal and Wallace would have us believe that the first and third facsimiles found in the Book of Abraham illustrate scenes of a ritual drama in which “various players assume the roles of the different Egyptian mythological gods” (Ibid., p. 184). These authors go on to claim that “Although this role of Osiris was at many other times assumed by other prominent individuals in Egypt, the Book of Abraham makes clear that at least once Abraham assumed the role, which is historically consistent” (Ibid., p. 189).

We find it incredible that the patriarch Abraham would participate in a pagan ritual in which he played the role of the Egyptian God of the Dead!

Vestal and Wallace have a strange method of trying to prove the Book of Abraham. They have taken carefully selected portions from the works of Dee Jay Nelson and other writers which they feel are favorable to Joseph Smith’s work and tried to use them to prove the Book of Abraham. Now, it is true that there are a few parallels, but anyone looking at the pictures shown in the facsimiles would get a few points right. And while Nelson went out of his way to point these out, his work is almost completely unfavorable to Joseph Smith’s interpretations. In spite of this, Vestal and Wallace have carefully selected out the points of agreement and tried to make a case. Their chapter on the Book of Abraham contains no less than nine footnotes referring to Nelson’s work—i.e., footnotes 23, 25, 41, 42, 43, 44, 48, 50, 54.

Another strange thing about the whole matter is that the man they refer to as the “Egyptologist Dee Jay Nelson” (The Firm Foundations of Mormonism, p. 189) is used extensively to prove the case, yet Vestal himself undercuts Nelson in his paper dated “December, January 1980.” (We feel that this date is probably a mistake and should read as follows: December 1980, January 1981.) Vestal charges:

A superficial glance at Nelson’s credentials, if indeed there were any to begin with, reveals a college drop-out . . . Nelson's lack of scholarly ability becomes visibly acute with his smug rejection of the Book of Abraham as translation material when one realizes that not one soul on earth has been able to present the original source of the translation to begin with! (Approaching the Book of Abraham, pp. 1-2)

Since Vestal was aware of this information when The Firm Foundations of Mormonism was published in 1981 (the Preface is dated April 1981), why is there no mention of "Nelson's lack of scholarly ability" in the chapter on the Book of Abraham in this book?

The Moment of Truth

We feel that we would be very ungrateful if we did not acknowledge the hand of God in bringing the truth about the Book of Abraham to light. He has blessed this work in a wonderful way. We are able to testify that God "is able to do exceeding abundantly above all that we ask or think, according to the power that worketh in us" (Ephesians 3:20).

In an article published in the New York Times, May 3, 1970, Wallace Turner wrote:

SAN FRANCISCO, MAY 2—The "Book of Abraham," which provides the theological basis for the Utah Mormon churches excluding Negroes from its priesthood, has been described as "simply the product of Joseph Smith Jr.'s imagination" by a leading scholar in a branch of the church Mr. Smith founded. . . .

The description of the Book of Abraham as the product of Joseph Smith's imagination is in an article . . . in the pilot issue of "Courage: A Journal of History, Thought and Action" issued for members of the Reorganized Church of Jesus Christ of Latter Day Saints.

The author is Richard P. Howard, historian for the church branch commonly called R.L.D.S., the largest of the groups that splintered away from the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-Day Saints . . .

Mr. Howard pointed out that the publication in 1966 by Modern Microfilm Company of Salt Lake City of Joseph Smith Jr.'s original "Egyptian alphabet and grammar" allowed scholars to discover how the prophet worked in producing the Book of Abraham. . . . He also suggested that the Prophet Joseph used the "curse of Ham" argument against Negroes as a means of reconciling differences that arose among his followers when Elijah Abel, was ordained into the priesthood March 3, 1836, . . .

"Whatever the intent of Joseph Smith in expounding this view of the Negro," Mr. Howard wrote, "it is clear that the ancient papyrus from Egypt contained no such information."

Mr. Howard wrote that "It may be helpful to suggest that the 'Book of Abraham' represents simply the product of Joseph Smith Jr.'s imagination, . . ." (The New York Times, May 3, 1970)

Although the RLDS Church seems to have come to grips with this important issue, the Utah Mormon leaders will not face the truth concerning this matter. In an article entitled "LDS Affirm 'Abraham'" we find the following:

The First Presidency of the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints accepts the "Book of Abraham" as "scripture given to us through the Prophet (Joseph Smith)," President N. Eldon Tanner said Sunday night. . . . Tanner . . . made the statement in response to an article saying the translation of the "Book of Abraham" was the product of Joseph Smith Jr.'s "imagination." (Salt Lake Tribune, May 4, 1970)

That the Utah Mormon leaders would continue to endorse the Book of Abraham in the face of the evidence which has been presented is almost beyond belief.

We feel that if any person will honestly examine this matter he will see that the evidence to disprove the "Book of Abraham" is conclusive. We have shown that the original papyrus fragment Joseph Smith used as the basis for the "Book of Abraham" has been identified and that this fragment is in reality a part of the Egyptian "Book of Breathings." It is a pagan text and contains absolutely nothing concerning Abraham or his religion.

Perhaps one reason the Mormon leaders refuse to face the facts concerning the Book of Abraham is that to do so would cast a serious shadow of doubt upon the authenticity of the Book of Mormon. Samuel A. B. Mercer concluded:

. . . both books were translated from the same Egyptian language, and if the translator failed in the translation of the one book, our faith in his translation of the other must necessarily be impaired . . . (The Utah Survey, September 1913, p. 5)

Some Mormons have maintained that Joseph Smith did not use the Urim and Thummim when he "translated" the Book of Abraham, and therefore any mistakes found in it would not reflect upon the Book of Mormon. Actually, the early Mormon leaders claimed that Joseph Smith did use the Urim and Thummim. Wilford Woodruff, who later became President of the Church, recorded this statement in his journal in 1842:

The Lord is blessing Joseph with power to reveal the mysteries of the Kingdom of God, to translate through the Urim and Thummim ancient records and hieroglyphics as old as Abraham and Adam. Joseph the Seer has presented us [with] some of the book of Abraham . . . (Pearl of Great Price Conference, December 10, 1960, 1964 ed., p. 58)

James R. Clark makes this observation concerning the Book of Abraham:

Well, Wilford Woodruff said he translated with the Urim and Thummim. Parley P. Pratt said he translated with the Urim and Thummim. Orson Pratt said he translated with the Urim and Thummim. He translated with a divine instrument. That was the only way he could translate this. (Pearl of Great Price Conference, 1964 ed., p. 62)

Thus we see that the Mormon leaders cannot repudiate the Book of Abraham without casting serious doubt upon the validity of the Book of Mormon.

Dr. Hugh Nibley has stated:

. . . a few faded and tattered little scraps of papyrus may serve to remind the Latter-day Saints of how sadly they have neglected serious education. . . . Not only has our image suffered by such tragic neglect, but now in the moment of truth the Mormons have to face the world unprepared, after having been given a hundred years' fair warning. (Brigham Young University Studies, Winter 1968, pp. 171-72).

Truly this is the moment of truth for the Mormon people. The Book of Abraham has been proven untrue, and even Dr. Nibley is unprepared to face the situation. For a number of years we have been calling upon the Mormon leaders to repudiate the Book of Abraham and the anti-black doctrine contained in its pages. They have finally yielded to pressure and allowed blacks to hold the priesthood. We feel, however, they should go one step further and admit the Book of Abraham is a work of Joseph Smith's imagination.

The Browns' Attack

In 1981 Robert L. and Rosemary Brown published the book, They Lie in Wait to Deceive. This book purports to tell "The amazing story of how "Dr." or "Prof." Dee Jay Nelson, Jerald and Sandra Tanner, and other anti-Mormons work to obstruct and distort the truth." Actually, this book is nothing but a smoke screen to divert attention from the Book of Abraham problem to Dee Jay Nelson. In this work Mr. and Mrs. Brown make a devastating attack on Nelson, the man who translated the Joseph Smith Papyri in 1968. The reader will remember that earlier in this chapter we have shown that Nelson made a false statement that he had obtained a doctor's degree in 1978—ten years after translating the Joseph Smith Papyri. After a careful examination of They Lie in Wait to Deceive, we concluded that the Browns did an excellent job of exposing some false claims made by Dee Jay Nelson. Unfortunately, however, in their zeal to destroy Mr. Nelson they have made a number of false statements concerning Dee Jay Nelson, their most flagrant violation of the principle of honesty occurs when they accuse us of being part of a cover-up. Those who are acquainted with the facts about the situation know that nothing could be further from the truth.

The Browns claim that “in the latter part of 1980,” they “sent information about Dee Jay Nelson to Moody Press”—the publishers of our book The Changing World of Mormonism. They go on to state that we were given “instructions to revise the section concerning Dee Jay Nelson. At this time they were also informed that no more copies of their just printed book would be released for sale, and all future editions must also be revised. In 1981, the new revised edition was printed . . . Between the Moody Press and us, it looks like the Tanners had no choice but to come clean” (They Lie in Wait to Deceive, p. 161).

While the Browns would have their readers believe that we covered up the situation until they and Moody Press forced us “to come clean,” the truth of the matter is that we commenced our own investigation into Nelson’s credentials as soon as we became convinced there was a problem. The results of that investigation were published immediately in the Salt Lake City Messenger. By March 20, 1980, we had learned that Pacific Northwestern University (the school from which Nelson claimed he received his degree) was really a diploma mill, and we wrote to Nelson that his “claim to a doctor’s degree in anthropology cannot be substantiated. Even though we have never made this claim, we feel that it would not be right for us to continue selling your booklets.” Just about one week after we wrote this letter to Nelson, we were contacted by Charles F. Trentelman of the Ogden Standard-Examiner. Mr. Trentelman had heard that Nelson’s credentials had been questioned and asked us if we could throw any light on the subject. We informed him of all we had learned about Pacific Northwestern University, and on March 29, 1980 he wrote the following:

Mrs. Tanner said they investigated the claims and found Nelson’s diploma was from a university that was shut down recently by the federal government as being a diploma mill, an operation that sells diplomas without requiring any schooling. (Standard-Examiner, March 29, 1980)

Immediately after Mr. Trentelman’s article appeared in the Standard-Examiner, we published the 42nd issue of the Salt Lake City Messenger. This was printed in April 1980 and fully exposed Nelson’s deception with regard to the doctor’s degree. A copy of this paper was mailed to the Moody Bible Library, and there was no attempt to hide the matter from anyone. As a matter of fact, we printed somewhere in the neighborhood of 10,000 copies of this issue!

In spite of these facts, the Browns try to make it appear that we were covering up the matter. To do this they had to entirely omit any reference to the fact that we published an expose of Nelson in the April 1980 issue of the Salt Lake City Messenger. Instead of telling the truth about the matter, they assert that “Between the Moody Press and us, it looks like the Tanners had no choice but to come clean” (They Lie in Wait to Deceive, p. 161). On the same page the Browns admit that they “sent information about Dee Jay Nelson” to Moody Press “in the latter part of 1980.” It should be obvious, then, that the Browns are completely misrepresenting the situation. Since we had already exposed Nelson in the April 1980 issue of the Salt Lake City Messenger, how could the Browns and Moody Press force us “to come clean” in the “latter part” of the same year? This, of course, just doesn’t make any sense.

In a new booklet entitled Can the Browns Save Joseph Smith? we deal with other false claims which the Browns have made concerning us and Dee Jay Nelson. For instance, the Browns accuse Nelson of lying when he said he went to President Tanner’s office to obtain photographs of the papyri which were being suppressed from the general public. In Can the Browns Save Joseph Smith? we quote from a letter written by N. Eldon Tanner himself which supports Nelson’s claim. Furthermore, we reproduce a photograph of a memorandum from President Tanner’s office which verifies Nelson’s visit. Robert L. Brown has charged that “the Tanners are being deceitful” with regard to this matter. The evidence, however, completely supports our statements regarding this incident.

In his booklet, Joseph Smith’s “Eye of Ra,” page 4, Dee Jay Nelson discussed the four standing figures in Facsimile No. 2, Fig. 6. As we have already pointed out, Egyptologists identify them as the four sons of Horus—an Egyptian god. (The heads of these same gods appear on the canopic jars in Facsimile No. 1.) Nelson gave the names of these pagan gods in his booklet. His identification agrees with the Egyptologist Richard A. Parker’s work and shows that Joseph Smith was completely wrong in his work on Fac. No. 1. Nelson commented, however, that in Fac. No. 2, “Joseph Smith correctly identified them as representing the four quarters of the earth!” Although Nelson’s work is almost completely unfavorable to Joseph Smith’s interpretations, he was a Mormon elder at the time and wanted his people to read his work. Therefore, he tried very hard to find anything that would support Smith’s claims. The quotation cited above is a good example. In any case, the Browns have seized upon this isolated example to try to make a case for Joseph Smith as an interpreter of Egyptian documents. The Browns accuse us of “deception” because we did not include Nelson’s statement about the four quarters of the earth in Mormonism—Shadow or Reality? It should be noted, however that we were the ones who published Nelson’s pamphlet in the first place. Furthermore, we reprinted another booklet which mentions this matter (see Why Egyptologists Reject the Book of Abraham, Part 2, p. 24). In this work the Egyptologist Samuel A. B. Mercer remarked that “credit must be given for a certain similarity, though it is merely a coincidence in number and in general treatment.” Taking Joseph Smith’s work as a whole, however, Professor Mercer maintained that he “failed completely in his attempt or pretense to interpret and translate Egyptian figures and hieroglyphics” (Ibid., p. 11).

It would appear that the Browns are clutching desperately to a straw in their attempt to save Joseph Smith’s work. The reader will remember that Joseph Smith identified the four gods shown in Facsimile No. 1 as the gods of Elkenah, Libnah, Mahmackrah and Korash. Egyptologists, however, identify them as Imseti, Hapy, Duamutef and Kebehsenuf (Dialogue: A Journal of Mormon Thought, Summer 1968, p. 86). It is evident, then, that Joseph Smith’s identification of the gods is totally incorrect. The Browns put forth the claim that the names which Joseph Smith gave in his explanation concerning the gods are really geographical regions. In the book Can the Browns Save Joseph Smith? we show that this fantastic theory is built on a very dubious foundation.

In our rebuttal to the Browns, we examine the charge that some of the information found in their book was obtained through secret tape-recording of telephone conversations. We also show that they have cut out a paragraph from a photograph of a letter written by the Egyptologist Klaus Baer, and that the other parts of the letter have been pasted back together to make it appear that nothing is missing! The Browns have also suppressed over 900 words from a letter which we wrote. The reason for the suppression of these words is very obvious: we tell that the Mormon Church itself used a fake Ph. D. (“Dr. Webb”) to defend the Book of Abraham at the time of Spalding’s attack. In their book, the Browns’ main thesis appears to be that the critics of the Mormon Church have been discredited because one of them used a fake Ph. D. The Browns, however, completely suppressed the fact that the church previously used a man with an assumed name as well as a fake doctor’s degree. We feel that Mr. and Mrs. Brown are operating under a double standard. They accuse us of deception, but the truth of the matter is that we were completely unaware of Nelson’s false claim to a Ph. D. As soon as we found out, we exposed him and quit selling his books. The Mormon Church leaders, on the other hand, allowed Mr. Homans to call himself “Robert C. Webb, Ph. D.” They engaged in a cover-up concerning this matter and continued to print his books for many years. As late as 1936 Church President Heber J. Grant took out a copyright on R. C. Webb’s book Joseph Smith As a Translator. Nothing was said in this book about Webb’s earlier claim to a Ph.D.

In any case, the Browns have tried to divert attention from the Book of Abraham problem. On the “Mormon Miscellaneous” radio program (KBBX), August 3, 1981, we challenged Robert L. Brown out that Dr. Nibley's book contains some very serious errors. Michael Marquardt has prepared a good rebuttal entitled, The Book of Abraham Papyrus Found: An Answer to Dr. Hugh Nibley's Book 'The Message of the Joseph Smith Papyri: An Egyptian Endowment.'

As we have already shown, Dr. Nibley's book was published in 1975. In 1979, however, he spoke at the Sunstone Theological Symposium and his statements seem to discredit his own book:

"I refuse to be held responsible for anything I wrote more than three years ago. For heaven's sake, I hope we are moving forward here. After all, the implication that one mistake and it is all over with—how flattering to think in forty years I have not made one slip and I am still in business! I would say that about four fifths of everything I put down has changed, of course." (Sunstone, December 1979, page 49)

Dr. Nibley would have us believe that the science of Egyptology is in a constant state of upheaval. Now, while it is true that there will always be refinements, the basic principles remain the same. We feel that the constant state of confusion that Dr. Nibley finds himself in is caused by his attempt to defend a work of Joseph Smith's own imagination—i.e., the Book of Abraham. While our case against the Book of Abraham stands on the same unshakeable foundation it did 12 years ago, Dr. Nibley has to constantly change his ideas. First, he was going to answer the critics in the Improvement Era. When this did not work, he prepared a book which "is 800 pages long"—actually 305 large printed pages. Four years later, however, he says that "I refuse to be held responsible for anything I wrote more than three years ago." After all this one would think that Dr. Nibley would give up, but instead he threatens the critics with the possibility of still another book: "Of these things and much, much more we speak in what we hope is a forthcoming book." (Ibid., p. 51)

Dr. Nelson?

Although Dr. Nibley was not able to translate the papyri at the time it came to light, there was an elder in the church who was qualified—Dee Jay Nelson. When Nibley learned of Nelson's ability as an Egyptologist, he wanted him to help defend the church. In a letter dated June 27, 1967, he told Nelson that he could "see no reason in the world why you should not be taken into the confidence of the Brethren if this thing ever comes out into the open; in fact, you should be enormously useful to the Church...there are parties in Salt Lake who are howling for a showdown on the P.G.P.; if they have their way we may have to get together."

On January 4, 1968, Dee Jay Nelson visited with Dr. Nibley at Brigham Young University and examined the original papyri. Dr. Nibley agreed that Nelson should translate the papyri, and he sent a note to N. Eldon Tanner, a member of the First Presidency, stating that "it would be a good idea to let Prof. Dee J. Nelson have copies" of the papyri. Mr. Nelson translated the papyri, but he was unable to find any mention of Abraham or his religion in any portion of the papyri. He found the names of many pagan gods who were worshiped by the Egyptians but nothing concerning the God of Abraham. After completing his translation, Mr. Nelson contacted us and asked if we wanted to print it. Since the translation proved unfavorable to the church, it was obvious that the church would not print it. When we completed the publication we tried to advertise it in the Deseret News but church leaders would not allow the ad to be run.

Unfortunately, about ten years after completing his translation of the Joseph Smith Papyri, Dee Jay Nelson put forth the claim that he had a doctor's degree from an institution he later identified as Pacific Northwestern University. On February 13, 1980 we attended a lecture in Brigham City, Utah where we heard Mr. Nelson proclaim he had a Ph. D. in anthropology. We became a little suspicious, however, when he failed to give the name of the school. A few weeks later a woman called us from Arizona and said that Nelson had claimed the school he had attended was in Seattle. When she called information, however, she was unable to locate it. We tried the same thing and obtained a similar result. On March 11-12, 1980 we wrote to Nelson asking for documentation which would prove he had a doctor's degree. Mr. Nelson did send us a photograph of what purports to be his diploma from Pacific Northwestern University. After examining this document and another paper he sent, we became very suspicious that Pacific Northwestern University was not a legitimate university. We contacted a noted educator from the University of Utah who checked with Dr. James Bemis, Executive Director of the Higher Commission of the Northwest Association of Schools and Colleges, and found that Pacific Northwestern University was only a "diploma mill of the worst kind." We confirmed this report by calling the U.S. Postal Department in Seattle and the King County Attorney's Office. (More information concerning this matter will be sent to the reader free upon request.)

In the letter of March 11-12, 1980 we made it clear to Mr. Nelson what we would do if his claim concerning a doctor's degree could not be substantiated:

"It is with great sorrow that I sit down to write this letter to you. I feel, however, as the publisher of four of your booklets I am obligated to find out the truth about certain matters that have recently come to my attention....While it is true that I have never published anything about you having a Dr.'s degree, any statements you have made about this matter subsequent to the translation of the Joseph Smith Papyri could have a tendency to reflect upon my integrity in the eyes of many people.

"If I were to overlook misrepresentation on the part of non-Mormon writers I would be operating on a double standard. You will no doubt remember what we wrote about 'Dr. Webb'—the great defender of the Mormon faith. It is summed up in our new book, The Changing World of Mormonism, page 333:

"The other Egyptologists whom Spalding contacted rendered a similar verdict—i.e., the 'Book of Abraham' was a work of Joseph Smith's imagination and had no basis in fact.... Mormon historian B.H. Roberts admitted that there 'were no Egyptian scholars in the church of the Latter-day Saints who could make an effective answer to the conclusions of the eight scholars who in various ways pronounced against the correctness of Joseph Smith's translation...' (A Comprehensive History of of [sic] the Church, vol.2, p. 139).

"The Mormons, however, did receive help from a writer who called himself 'Robert C. Webb, Ph.D.' Fawn M. Brodie claimed that Robert C. Webb's real name was 'J.E. Homans,' and that he was 'neither an Egyptologist nor a Ph.D.' (No Man Knows My History, 1957, p. 175). From this it is rather obvious that the Mormon leaders were guilty of deception. Strange as it may seem, Dr. Sidney B. Sperry, of Brigham Young University, confirmed the fact that Robert C. Webb was no Ph.D: 'He wrote a wonderful book,...under the name of Robert C. Webb, Ph.D. I regret that the brethren let him put down Robert C. Webb, Ph.D., because he was no Ph.D.' (Pearl of Great Price Conference, December 10, 1960, 1964 ed., p.9). On page 6 of the same publication, Dr. Sperry stated that Dr. Webb's 'real name was J.C. Homans.'

"At any rate, the Mormon church was able to survive Spalding's attack on the 'Book of Abraham' with very little injury because church members felt that 'Dr. Webb' had answered the critics. Writing in the Improvement Era, April 1913, N.L. Nelson stated: 'Dr. Webb has, indeed, vindicated the prophet better than he knew himself.'

to a public debate concerning the Book of Abraham, but he said he would only debate on the Dee Jay Nelson affair. We feel that this is just another attempt to avoid facing the real issue. As long as the Browns continue side-stepping the evidence against the Book of Abraham, their work will be of no real value.

Nibley's New Book

As we indicated earlier, in 1979 Dr. Hugh Nibley claimed he was working on a new book. This book, entitled Abraham In Egypt, was published by Deseret Book in 1981. As in all of his other works on the subject, Dr. Nibley skirts the main issue concerning the accuracy of the translation of the Book of Abraham and returns to his old theme that the Book of Abraham bears resemblance to apocryphal writings. On page 2 of his book, Nibley admits that the Egyptologist E. A. W. Budge pointed out a possible relationship in 1913 when he commented that the Book of Abraham "is clearly based on the Bible, and some of the Old Testament apocryphal histories." Nibley, however, maintains that Joseph Smith could not have had access to these writings. Now, while it is true that Smith would not have had access to all of the apocryphal writings available today, Wesley P. Walters points out there was structural material available to him in the "popular commentaries" and other writings of his day (see Joseph Smith Among the Egyptians, p. 39).

In his new book, Nibley has some interesting comments concerning the charge that Joseph Smith misidentified two women as men in Facsimile No. 3:

Anyone wishing to demolish Joseph Smith's interpretation of Facsimile No. 3 with the greatest economy of effort need look no further than his designating as "King Pharaoh" and "Prince of Pharaoh" two figures so obviously female that a three-year-old child will not hesitate to identify them as such. Why then have Egyptologists not simply pointed to this ultimate absurdity and dismissed the case? Can it be that there is something peculiarly Egyptian about this strange waywardness that represents human beings as gods and men as women? We have already hinted at such a possibility in the case of Imhotep in which, to carry further, we see both his wife and mother dressed up as goddesses, the latter as Hathor herself. . . . Even more surprising, Wildung notes an instance in which "we can identify Anat [the Canaanites' version of Hathor] as 'Anat of Ramses' as a divine form of Ramses [the king] himself in the shape of a goddess." . . . There you have it—the lady Hathor, who is Figure 2 in Facsimile No. 3, may be none other than Pharaoh himself. The two ladies in the Facsimile, Figures 2 and 4, will be readily identified by any novice as the goddesses Hathor and Maat. They seem indispensable to scenes having to do with the transmission of power and authority. The spectacle of men, kings and princes at that, dressed as women calls for a brief notice on a fundamental issue peculiar to the Egyptians and the Book of Abraham, namely, the tension between the claims of patriarchal vs. matriarchal succession. (Abraham In Egypt, p. 133)

But would "King Pharaoh" and the "Prince of Pharaoh" actually dress up as the goddesses who embodied their majesty at the moment of transition? Ask them . . . It was no doubt the worldwide "primitive" practice of masking and miming, as natural and as spontaneous as dancing, of which it was a part, that suggested such things. "Because there was no real identification or fusion," E. Hornung explains, "the god could with impunity take any form or sex he pleased without disturbing anyone." . . . Isis as Neith was "two-thirds man and one-third woman," making it possible for her to fuse with Chnum, the Creator, both male and female elements being indispensable to any act of creation. . . . This woman comes forth wearing the familiar white crown but adding a beard to her costume, thus "showing her androgenous character." (Ibid., pp. 139-40)

As far as translation is concerned, Dr. Nibley's Abraham In Egypt is very disappointing. He does confirm that the words "Grant that the Ba of the Osiris Sheshonq live" appear in Facsimile

No. 2 (p. 64), but he does not provide a translation of the important hieroglyphs found on the original papyrus used for Facsimile No. 1. After fourteen years he has still only provided a translation of two of the ten translatable fragments of the Joseph Smith Papyri.

In his booklet, What Mormonism Isn't—A response to the Research of Jerald and Sandra Tanner, Ian Barber leans heavily upon Dr. Nibley's research. He tries to excuse Nibley's errors by saying: "With a writer as prolific as Nibley, in fields where new information is constantly emerging, some of it involving certain aspects of near and contemporary historical processes which are not his forte, a somewhat uncrystallised position is understandable in preliminary analysis (Although some of the contradictions Walters and the Tanners suggest are pretty pedantic, and some are just plain misunderstandings of Nibley's often tongue-in-cheek style)" (p. G-1). Mr. Barber says that Nibley "admits that in initially dealing with the Joseph Smith papyri, 'I frankly skirmished and sparred for time,' while gathering further expertise." Barber, however, believes that Nibley "has certainly now arrived." We feel that since Nibley now admits that he "skirmished and sparred for time" when he was put forth as the church's great authority on the Egyptian language, there is no reason to trust his work today. There is, in fact, every reason to believe that he is still stalling and that his great display of learning is only a smoke screen to cover up his inability to face the real issues.

In any case, Ian Barber is very impressed with Nibley's research on apocryphal writings. His views on the Joseph Smith Papyrus seem to be very liberal, and he is even willing to concede that two of the facsimiles in the Book of Abraham are from the Book of Breathing:

Facsimiles 1 and 3 it is now known belong to a late Egyptian document, the English name of which is commonly translated as the Book of Breathing . . . while facsimile number 2 is an example of a literary document known as a hypocephalus. . . . facsimile number one was found to be a textual component of the Sensen Papyrus—a late Egyptian funerary document. . . . it is apparent that Joseph and his scribes quite arbitrarily attempted to restore missing portions of the facsimiles when copying them. This involved the insertion of writing (as in the hieratic in the rim of Facsimile 2) as well as at least one pictorial representation (ie. Re in the solar bark in Facsimile 3, Figure 2) from the Book of the Dead fragments also in Joseph's possession. . . . Along with the clear evidence that the facsimiles have been altered in copy, I submit that Joseph Smith did not believe that he possessed Abraham's original writings, but rather reproductions that had been altered and perhaps placed in an entirely new context. The story that the Egyptologists . . . have given us describes this new context and not necessarily Abraham's world view some 4000 years ago. . . .

In their form within the Sensen Papyrus Facsimiles 1 and 3 date to around the time of Christ. The Sensen papyrus is very correctly a funerary document often placed under the head of the deceased in the same manner as the rounded hypocephalus. In this context the theme of the facsimiles relates to the mysteries of the Egyptian God Osiris . . .

Facsimile 1 has the candidate (identified by the texts recovered in 1967 as Hor) pictured in the guise of Osiris, for each candidate to prove successful had to become identified with the God of the Underworld. Hor is being embalmed on the lion couch (figures 2 and 4) by Anubis (figure 3) the type of the priest, while underneath the four canopic deities (figures 5-8) in the form of vases await as repositories of the soft viscera of Hor. . . . Facsimile three is the end of the journey, as Hor (figure 5) is guided by Anubis (figure 6) into the presence of Osiris (seated on the throne, figure 1) with Hathor-Isis and Maat representing truth and justice, the principles by which Hor is to be judged.

Now let me hasten to add that this very same scene is absolutely unoriginal, being duplicated in hundreds of instances extending back to the time of Abraham, and although Hor has had the two facsimiles prepared for his "breathing permit" there is absolutely no reason to preclude their existence in different contexts and at different times, certainly extending back to 2000 BC. . . . (As I have already noted, the free manner in which Joseph Smith took Re in Figure 3 from the Book of the Dead fragments in his possession and placed the figure in what was a gap in the hypocephalus suggests that the prophet understood that the vignettes originally explaining aspects of the Book of Abraham had not all ended up in the same form after several thousand years). . . .

It is my personal opinion that Joseph didn't actually own the Abraham text, however. . . . I believe, that Joseph only refers to having the "writings of Abraham and Joseph" in his possession, and I believe that as with his 1842 comments, he is speaking broadly and referring to the facsimiles and not to an actual text. . . . I believe that God revealed to him further details (and the full name) of an Abraham text perhaps safely stored elsewhere. . . . In my opinion the facsimiles and Egyptian material served as revelatory aids for the prophet to prepare him intellectually and spiritually for the direct revelation of the Book of Abraham text. Apart from what was divinely revealed in this context, therefore I believe that Joseph Smith did not know Egyptian, as the Kirtland Egyptian alphabet document seems to prove. (What Mormonism Isn't, Auckland, New Zealand, 1981, pp. F-1, 2, 5, 8, 9)

While we are encouraged to find Mr. Barber admitting that the facsimiles are from the Book of Breathing, we do not understand how he can believe that "Joseph didn't actually own the Abraham text." We have previously shown that this idea is in direct contradiction to the statements of Joseph Smith himself (see History of the Church, vol. 2, pp. 236, 350-51; vol. 6, p. 476; Pearl of Great Price, p. 29).

Although we feel that Ian Barber has not really given an adequate answer to the problems we have raised, we feel that he has succeeded in his endeavor to "remain above vitriolic attack." In this regard his booklet stands in sharp contrast to the Browns' attempted rebuttal. The reader will remember that the Browns accused us of deception in the Dee Jay Nelson affair. Ian Barber, on the other hand, commended us for our actions in the matter:

To their credit, Jerald and Sandra Tanner have acknowledged such details in a publicly circulated letter, are not reprinting Nelson's titles, and have deleted references to him from current works (such as The Changing World of Mormonism). Such information is not directly relevant to the arguments for or against the Book of Abraham, of course, and is mentioned only because I have made the mistake of calling Nelson an Egyptologist as he had styled himself. (What Mormonism Isn't, p. F-15)

More on the God Min

On page F-5 of What Mormonism Isn't, Ian Barber concedes that the god shown in Facsimile No. 2, Figure 7, is an "ithyphallic deity":

The seated god Min in Figure 7, (Joseph Smith: "God sitting upon his throne.") revealing through the heavens "key words of the priesthood" (represented by the Udjat eye as I have suggested) is an ithyphallic deity. The Tanners call this "a pornographic representation," and remark that it is "hard to believe that Abraham would draw an obscene picture of God." (Answering Dr. Clendinning, pp. 19-20). However, as a careful analysis of Joseph's explanations to Facsimile 2 has indicated, such does not appear to be Abraham's work, but rather that which was "said by the Egyptians" with the figures being "made to represent God" after their unique understanding. For the Egyptians, the ritual portrayal of the phallus was not understood to be obscene, but rather symbolic of the divine, regenerative powers, and it was even respectfully mummified on occasion. The Tanners are correct in implying that such an emphasis would be inappropriate in our contemporary Western culture, and that the explicit portrayal offended Mormon sensibilities is evidenced by the fact that the phallus has been removed from several printings of the Pearl of Great Price, including current versions. In any case, this is clearly the work of someone with an Egyptian understanding trying to correlate Abraham's astronomical/theological truths with the most appropriate Egyptian deity and not to be credited (or blamed) on Abraham.

We do not feel that this facsimile can be divorced from the Book of Abraham. The title of it, which is printed in the Pearl of Great Price, Book of Abraham, page 34, reads as follows: "A Facsimile from the Book of Abraham."

In his new book Abraham In Egypt, Hugh Nibley has some interesting comments concerning the god Min:

As the supreme sex symbol of gods and men, Min behaves with shocking promiscuity, which is hardly relieved by its ritual nature. . . . But his promiscuity went far beyond that. "The Egyptians," wrote Plutarch, "are accustomed to call Horus 'Min' meaning visible," referring to the symbol of reproduction publicly paraded at his festival. . . . The Greeks identified him with the lustful Pan . . . His sacred plants were aphrodisiacal . . . and he is everywhere represented as indulging in incestuous relationships with those of his immediate family; he had the most numerous and varied religious entourage of all the gods, consisting mostly of his huge harem . . . (Abraham In Egypt, p. 210)

That Joseph Smith would identify this personage in Facsimile No. 2 as "God sitting upon his throne" shows a complete lack of inspiration. The reader will remember that the hieroglyphs which appear on the original papyrus which was printed as Facsimile No. 1 mention "Min Bull-of-his-Mother" (Dialogue: A Journal of Mormon Thought, Autumn 1968, p. 116). Dr. Nibley has never dared to translate these hieroglyphs, but on page 211 of his new book he speaks of Min's title, "Bull of his Mother":

The rites of Min were secret, and the Chief Priest was "the Director of the Mysteries of the god in his character of Kamutef," literally the Bull of His Mother. . . . His special bull titles always denote his too-intimate relationships with his mother. . . . For he is the divine beast, the irrepressible rampant bull ready for anything. In this regard he is the double of Seth, . . . Their outstanding characteristic, as Te Velde describes it, is their insistence on going "beyond the bounds" of discretion and morality, completely unrestrained in their appetites and passions. . . .

The whip that the Min-images hold with upraised arm is always viewed as a fertility symbol . . . some Egyptologists have maintained that it signifies that Min took advantage of his mother by brute force, seizing the matriarchal rule of the land by violence and incest—a tradition also associated with Ham and Nimrod on counts of both brutality and gross immorality. . . . What suggested that was his commonest epithet, Ka-mut-ef, "Bull of his Mother," the title that the youthful successor to the throne went by at the coronation, by virtue of which he mounts the throne with his mother's approval and as her champion.

Return to Old Facsimiles

For a number of years we criticized the Mormon Church for reproducing altered facsimiles in the Pearl of Great Price. Even Mormon scholars, including Dr. Hugh Nibley, were disturbed about this matter. Earlier in this chapter, we indicated that pressure had been exerted and that there was a rumor that the church would revert back to using the original woodcuts prepared for the Times and Seasons in 1842. In the new "triple combination" of the Book of Mormon, Doctrine and Covenants and Pearl of Great Price, which was just published in 1981, we find that the church has yielded to the criticism and has gone back to using the original facsimiles. The Ensign, October 1981, page 17, makes this comment about the change:

. . . the reproduction of the facsimiles in the Pearl of Great Price had lost some of their clarity over the years, so the reproductions in the new triple were made from earlier versions for improved accuracy.

An examination of Facsimile No. 2, Figure 7, reveals that what the Mormon apologist Ian Barber refers to as the "explicit portrayal" of the god Min, which "offended Mormon sensibilities," has been restored.

23. Old Testament Practices

There are several Old Testament practices that have found their way into Mormonism; one of these is the practice of cursing one's enemies. Both the Bible and the Book of Mormon state that this practice was to cease with the coming of Christ. Now that Christ has come, we are supposed to rely upon him and let him take all hate out of our hearts. If we have no hate in our hearts, we will have no desire to curse our enemies or wish any evil upon them. The words that Jesus spoke in the Sermon on the Mount are also recorded in the Book of Mormon:

And behold it is written also, that thou shalt love thy neighbor and hate thine enemy;

But behold I say unto you, love your enemies, bless them that curse you, do good to them that hate you, and pray for them who despitefully use you and persecute you; (3 Nephi 12:43-44)

In the Bible we read as follows:

Bless them which persecute you;

Bless, and curse not. (Romans 12:14)

In spite of these clear teachings in both the Bible and the Book of Mormon, Joseph Smith gave a revelation which sanctioned the cursing of ones enemies:

And inasmuch as mine enemies come against you . . . ye shall curse them:

And whomsoever ye curse, I will curse, and ye shall avenge me of mine enemies. (Doctrine and Covenants, Section 103:24-25)

Wine and Curses

The cursing of enemies was actually carried out in the Kirtland Temple. The Mormon Apostle George A. Smith gave this account:

Now I will illustrate this still further. The Lord did actually reveal one principle to us there, and that one principle was apparently so simple, and so foolish in their eyes, that a great many apostatized over it, because it was so contrary to their notions and views. It was this, after the people had fasted all day, they sent out and got wine and bread, and blessed them, and distributed them to the multitude, that is, to the whole assembly of the brethren, and they ate and drank, and prophesied, and bore testimony, and continued so to do until some of the High Council of Missouri stepped into the stand, and, as righteous Noah did when he awoke from his wine, commenced to curse their enemies. You never felt such a shock go through any house or company in the world as went through that. There was almost a rebellion because men would get up and curse their enemies; . . . Some of the brethren thought it was best to apostatize, . . . The Lord dared not then reveal anything more; He had given us all we could swallow; . . . (Journal of Discourses, vol. 2, p. 216)

One man, William Harris, who left the Mormon Church, made this comment concerning the cursing:

In the evening, they met for the endowment. The fast was then broken by eating light wheat bread, and drinking as much wine as they saw proper. Smith knew well how to infuse the spirit which they expected to receive; so he encouraged the brethren to drink freely, telling them that the wine was consecrated, and would not make them drunk. As may be supposed, they drank to the purpose. After this they began to prophecy, pronouncing blessings upon their friends, and curses upon their enemies. If I should be so unhappy as to go to the regions of the damned, I never expect to hear language more awful, or more becoming the infernal pit, than was uttered that night. The curses were pronounced principally upon the clergy of the present day, and upon the Jackson county mob in Missouri. After spending the night in alternative blessings and cursings, the meeting adjourned. (Mormonism Portrayed, by William Harris, Warsaw, Ill., 1841, pp. 31-32)

When Joseph Smith wrote the History of the Church, he told of the cursing in the Kirtland Temple; however, his words have been censored in modern editions of the History of the Church. In the Millennial Star, vol. 15, page 727, Joseph Smith's words were given as follows:

The brethren began to prophesy upon each other's heads, and cursings upon the enemies of Christ, who inhabit Jackson county, Missouri;

In modern editions of the History of the Church, Joseph Smith's words have been censored to read as follows:

The brethren began to prophesy upon each other's heads, and upon the enemies of Christ, who inhabited Jackson county, Missouri; . . . (History of the Church, vol. 2, p. 431)

Notice that the word "cursings" has been removed from this statement, making it appear that they just prophesied concerning the inhabitants of Jackson County, instead of cursing them.

Benjamin F. Johnson made this comment: "In Missouri we were taught to 'pray for our enemies, that God would damn them, and give us power to kill them'" (Letter from Benjamin F. Johnson to George S. Gibbs, 1903, mimeographed copy).

The Mormon Apostle George A. Smith stated: "As I remarked, we were then very pious, and we prayed the Lord to kill the mob" (Journal of Discourses, vol. 5, p. 107).

In the Millennial Star, vol. 19, page 360, Joseph Smith was quoted as saying: "Preached on the hill near the Temple, . . . and pronounced a curse on the merchants and the rich, who would not assist in building it." When this was reprinted in the History of the Church it was changed to read: "Preached on the hill near the Temple, . . . and reproved the merchants and the rich who would not assist in building it" (History of the Church, vol. 4, p. 601).

Some other statements concerning the cursing of enemies were left uncensored in modern printings of the History of the Church. Joseph Smith made the following statement in 1842: ". . . to the apostates and enemies, I will give a lashing every opportunity, and I will curse them" (History of the Church, vol. 5, p. 139).

In the History of the Church, vol. 6, page 346, we find the following:

President Brigham Young also spoke very pointedly and very truly about Dr. Foster and others. Dr. Foster was cursed, and the people cried "AMEN."

On September 20, 1846, Hosea Stout reported the following has devised for the good of man correspond with the plans and views which men devise for their own good. Now if the Lord had considered it wisdom, on the day of the Kirtland endowment and great solemn assembly, to come forward and reveal to the children of men the facts that are laid down plainly in the Bible, and had told them that, without the law of sealing, no man could be exalted to a throne in the celestial kingdom, that is, without he had a woman by his side; and that no woman could be exalted in the celestial world, without she was exalted with a man at her head; that the man is not without the woman, nor the woman without the man in the Lord; had He revealed this simple sentiment, up would have jumped some man, saying, "What! got to have a woman sealed to me in order to be saved, in order to be exalted to thrones, dominions, and eternal increase?" "Yes." "I do not believe a word of it, I cannot stand that, for I never intended to get married, I do not believe in any of this nonsense." At the same time, perhaps somebody else might have had faith to receive it. Again up jumps somebody else, "Brother Joseph, I have had two wives in my lifetime, cannot I have them both in eternity?" "No." If he had said yes, perhaps we should all have apostatized at once.

Now I will illustrate this still further. The Lord did actually reveal one principle to us there, and that one principle was apparently so simple, and so foolish in their eyes, that a great many apostatized over it, because it was so contrary to their notions and views. It was this, after the people had fasted all day, they sent out and got wine and bread, and blessed them, and distributed them to the multitude, that is, to the whole assembly of the brethren, and they ate and drank, and prophesied, and bore testimony, and continued so to do until some of the High Council of Missouri stepped into the stand, and, as righteous Noah did when he awoke from his wine, commenced to curse their enemies. You never felt such a shock go through any house or company in the world as went through that. There was almost a rebellion because men would get up and curse their enemies; although they could remember well that it is written that Noah cursed his own grandson, and that God recognized that curse to such an extent that, at this day, millions of his posterity are consigned to perpetual servitude.

Many men are foolish enough to think that they can thwart the power of God, and can liberate the sons of Ham from that curse before its time has expired. Some of the brethren thought it was best to apostatize, because the spirit of cursing was with men who had been driven from Missouri by mob violence. Yet every word that they prophesied has been fulfilled. They prophesied that the bones of many of those murderers should bleach on the prairie, and that birds should pick out their eyes, and beasts devour their flesh. Men who have traversed the plains of Mexico, California, Nebraska, and Kansas, have often seen the fulfilment of that prophecy in the most marvellous manner. We have seen their names upon trees, on the heads of old trunks, and bits of boards; the names of men that I knew, and I knew just as well, in the Kirtland Temple, what would be their fate, as I know now. But that tried us, some of us were awfully tried about it. The Lord dared not then reveal anything more; He had given us all we could swallow; and persecution raged around us to such an extent that we were obliged to forsake our beautiful Temple, and flee into the State of Missouri.

He there put us into another sieve, and sifted us good, and we were then composed of links; and is there not room to put on more links, to extend the chain, so as to reach to the bottom of the deepest waters? Yes. You must become a link on that chain and strengthen it, or you will be lost.

If you prefer the figure of a cable made of flax, sea-grass, or hemp, go to work and increase the strength of it, and tie yourselves to the Priesthood and to the man that you are connected with, or let there be a final conclusion to dissolve the partnership, and go somewhere else. I do not want half-hearted characters to labour with me. Poor miserable creatures; they are not fit for anything. Some of them have been in the house of Israel from fifteen to twenty years, and are following the Devil. Are there any such characters in this congregation? Yes, several, both men and women. There are men and women ready to oppose brother Brigham in what he said last Sunday. He told the truth of God in every word he spoke. Do you suppose that he is so unwise to say a thing which he does not know to be true? He understands what he speaks, and he looks before he jumps, and God Almighty will lead him straight, and he will never stumble—no, never, from this time forth; nor will you, brother Hyde, if you will follow him; neither will any other man.

There are poor, miserable curses in our midst; and there is not a thing spoken of but what there are men and women who will go and tell them every thing that is said, (thank God for that!) and tell more than what is true. There are men and women in this congregation of that stamp. I wish I had some stones; I want to pelt your cursed heads, for you lie like hell. Are you valiant to stand by the work of God, and by your brethren? If you are not, you had better put out, you poor curses.

There is a poor curse who has written the bigger part of those lies which have been printed in the States; and I curse him, in the name of Israel's God, and by the Priesthood and authority of Jesus Christ; and the disease that is in him shall sap and dry up the fountain of life and eat him up. Some of you may think that he has not the disease I allude to; but he is full of pox from the crown of his head to the point of its beginning. That is the curse of that man; it shall be so, and all Israel shall say, Amen. [The vast congregation of Saints said, "Amen."] He is laying plans to destroy us, and is striving with his might to stir up the Government of the United States and the President to send troops here to bring us into collision and destroy this pure people—man, woman, and child. May God Almighty curse such men, [Voices all through the congregation: "Amen!"] and women, and every damned thing there is upon the earth that opposes this people. I tell you I feel to curse them to-day. [Voice: "And they shall be cursed."] Yes, they will be; and the Devil shall have full possession of every man and woman that raises the tongue to sympathise with those poor curses. I ask no odds of them, no more than I do of the dirt I walk on; for if it was not there I could not walk upon it. Now, go home and sympathise, all of you who wish to.

I tell you that the most of this people are a God-blessed people, as Amasa says; and you shall ever be blessed, with your wives and children after you, for ever. And I bless you in the name of Israel's God, and you shall be blessed.

Are there any poor, miserable devils in our midst? I cannot step into the street but what some poor, miserable curse is ready to pounce on me if he dare. Tell about your religion! Shame on you! Go home and put on sackcloth and ashes, and repent of your meannesses. Are such kind of characters here? Yes, in this congregation.

in his diary:

Brigham said that he did not feel very religious now . . . he said that instead of praying for our enemies he would pray that our enemies & all dissenters might be sent to hell cross lots. (On the Mormon Frontier, The Diary of Hosea Stout, 1833-1861, vol. 1, 1964, p. 195)

John Taylor, who became the third President of the Mormon Church, made this statement in a sermon delivered in the Tabernacle in 1858:

. . . they were so damnable, mean, and cowardly as to make war on the sick and infirm that could not leave. The poor, miserable, cursed, damned scoundrels, I pray that they may go to hell. [The whole congregation shouted “Amen.”] (Journal of Discourses, vol. 7, p. 122)

Heber C. Kimball, First Councilor to Brigham Young, often cursed his enemies from the pulpit. He even went so far as to curse the President of the United States. Below are some extracts from his sermons:

There are men and women in this congregation of that stamp. I wish I had some stones; I want to pelt your cursed heads, for you lie like hell. . . .

There is a poor curse who has written the bigger part of those lies which have been printed in the States; and I curse him, in the name of Israel’s God, and by the priesthood and authority of Jesus Christ; and the disease that is in him shall sap and dry up the fountain of life and eat him up. Some of you may think that he has not the disease I allude to; but he is full of pox from the crown of his head to the point of its beginning. That is the curse of that man; it shall be so, and all Israel shall say, Amen. [The vast congregation of Saints said, “Amen.”] . . . May God Almighty curse such men, [Voices all through the congregation: “Amen!”] and women, and every damned thing there is upon the earth that opposes this people. I tell you I feel to curse them to-day. [Voice: “And they shall be cursed.”] Yes, they will be; and the Devil shall have full possession of every man and woman that raises the tongue to sympathise with those poor curses. (Journal of Discourses, vol. 5, p. 32)

Will the President that sits in the chair of state be tipped from his seat? Yes, he will die an untimely death, and God Almighty will curse him; and He will also curse his successor, if he takes the same stand; and he will curse all those that are his coadjutors, and all who sustain him. . . . God Almighty will curse them, and I curse them in the name of the Lord Jesus Christ, according to my calling; and if there is any virtue in my calling, they shall be cursed, every man that lifts his heel against us from this day forth. [Voices: “Amen.”] (Journal of Discourses, vol. 5, p. 133)

And may God Almighty curse our enemies. [Voices: “Amen.”] I feel to curse my enemies: and when God won’t bless them, I do not think he will ask me to bless them. If I did, it would be to put the poor curses to death who have brought death and destruction on me and my brethren . . . Poor rotten curses! And the President of the United States, inasmuch as he has turned against us . . . he shall be cursed, in the name of Israel’s God, and he shall not rule over this nation, . . . and I curse him and all his coadjutors in his cursed deeds, in the name of Jesus and by the authority of the holy priesthood; and all Israel shall say amen. (Journal of Discourses, vol. 5, p. 95)

I feel, in the name and by the authority of Jesus Christ and my calling, to curse that man that lifts his heel against my God and his cause and kingdom; and the curse of God shall be upon him; the angels of God shall chase him, and he shall have no peace. The President of the United States and his coadjutors that have caused this thing shall never rest again, for they shall go to hell. (Journal of Discourses, vol. 6, p. 38)

John D. Lee reported in his journal that Brigham Young made the following remarks:

. . . Pres. B. Young arose & said...that Miller, the Omaha & Ota agent was stirring them up to commit depredations on our cattle & for this he cursed him in the name of Iseral[s] god with curruption & rotenous of Bones & that he should go Down to Hell & all the Saints

Said Amen. . . . He then cu[r]sed all the gentiles that inhabited the Pottowatony Lands & that lived in the state of Mo. with the Same curse . . . (A Mormon Chronicle, The Diaries of John D. Lee, vol. 1, p. 27)

In Romans 12:20 we read: “Therefore if thine enemy hunger, feed him; . . .” According to Charles L. Walker, Brigham Young taught just the opposite:

Sun., Apr. 28. Went up to the Tabernacle . . . Bro. Brigham . . . said that those who sell their provisions to feed our enemies either man or women should be cursed, and said he, I curse them in the name of the Lord Jesus Christ and the congregation shouted, Amen. (“Diary of Charles L. Walker,” 1853–1902, Excerpts typed, p. 13)

Jesus said, “love your enemies,” but the Mormon Apostle George A. Smith remarked:

You must know that I love my friends, and God Almighty knows that I do hate my enemies. (Journal of Discourses, vol. 5, p. 110)

Jesus said that we should pray for our enemies. Heber C. Kimball prayed for his enemies in the following manner:

Pray for them? Yes, I pray that God Almighty would send them to hell. Some say across lots; but I would like to have them take a round about road, and be as long as they can be in going there. (Journal of Discourses, vol. 5, p. 89)

Animal Sacrifice

Animal sacrifice after the death of Christ is another Old Testament practice that has found a place in Mormon beliefs. It was Joseph Smith himself who taught this doctrine:

. . . it is generally supposed that sacrifice was entirely done away when the Great Sacrifice . . . was offered up, and that there will be no necessity for the ordinance of sacrifice in future: but those who assert this are certainly not acquainted with the duties, privileges and authority of the priesthood, or with the Prophets. . . .

These sacrifices, as well as every ordinance belonging to the Priesthood, will, when the Temple of the Lord shall be built, . . . be fully restored and attended to in all their powers, ramifications, and blessings. (History of the Church, vol. 4, p. 211)

In the Journal of Wandle Mace the following is found:

Joseph told them to go to Kirtland, and cleanse and purify a certain room in the Temple, that they must kill a lamb and offer a sacrifice unto the Lord which should prepare them to ordain Willard Richards a member of the Quorum of the Twelve Apostles. (“Journal of Wandle Mace,” page 32, microfilmed copy at the Brigham Young University Library)

Joseph Fielding Smith, the tenth President of the Mormon Church, still upholds the doctrine of animal sacrifice after the death of Christ. He states as follows:

Now in the nature of things, the law of sacrifice will have to be restored, . . . Sacrifice by the shedding of blood was instituted in the days of Adam and of necessity will have to be restored. (Doctrines of Salvation, vol. 3, p. 94)

It is interesting to note that even though the Mormon Church teaches animal sacrifice after the death of Christ, they cannot find any support for this doctrine in the Book of Mormon. In fact, the Book of Mormon condemns it in the strongest terms. In 3 Nephi 9:19 Jesus was supposed to have said the following:

And ye shall offer up unto me no more the shedding of blood; yea, your sacrifices and your burnt offerings shall be done away, for I will accept none of your sacrifices and your burnt offerings.

There are many other Old Testament practices in Mormonism. This should be sufficient, however, to convince the reader that the Mormon Church leaders have sometimes taken the teachings of the Old Testament in preference to the teachings of Christ.

24. Mormon Scriptures and the Bible

The Mormon Church accepts the Bible as one of its four standard works. The Book of Mormon quotes large portions of the King James Version of the Bible, and Joseph Smith's other revelations are filled with material from the Bible. Since the King James Version was printed about 200 years before Joseph Smith was even born, it is in no way dependent upon Mormon scriptures. Joseph Smith's works, on the other hand, could not stand if the Bible were proven false, for many of his revelations are built upon the historical accuracy of the Bible, even though they may differ in doctrinal content. Nevertheless, many Mormons, seemingly ignorant of the fact that they are undermining the whole foundation of their own church, have made some vicious attacks upon the Bible. Most of these attacks are not based upon sound historical evidence or methods. In fact, they reveal a lack of knowledge concerning Bible history and problems. Heber C. Snell, a former LDS Institute Director, has made these observations regarding the status of the Bible in the Mormon Church:

In 1830, when the Church was organized, it had two sacred books, the Bible and the Book of Mormon, . . .

From occupying the status of the first of two books of scripture in the Church the Bible became, in the course of about two decades, one of four. There are indications that it has now declined to the position of third or even fourth place among the Church's sacred books. . . .

This change of status of the Bible seems to be well attested by the relatively little attention given it by Church speakers and writers. . . . An examination of the Improvement Era Master Index, . . . gave thirty-six titles under Bible, or 137 pages as compared with 124 titles and 725 pages under Book of Mormon. . . . My work, as a teacher of the Bible in L.D.S. collegiate institutions over a period of a quarter of a century, has failed to convince me that our people have made much advancement in biblical knowledge. (Dialogue: A Journal of Mormon Thought, Spring 1967, pp. 56-57)

Paine's Influence

Davis Bitton has this to say concerning the "Mormonism of the nineteenth century":

For the Mormons the Bible was only one among several scriptures; its message was often described as applicable to a certain time and place in the past, with modern problems requiring new revelation; it was seen as having been corrupted, distorted, and inaccurately translated, . . . The Mormons could scarcely be charged with Bibliolatry, and it is perhaps understandable that Protestant ministers saw Mormon criticism of the Bible to be essentially the same as that of the rationalists. (Dialogue: A Journal of Mormon Thought, Autumn 1966, p. 113)

In a footnote on the same page, Davis Bitton states: "J. B. Turner, . . . argues rather convincingly that Mormons were so convinced of the inadequacy of the Bible and the apostate condition of Christianity that, if they ever abandoned Mormonism, they were almost inevitably agnostic toward all religion." Although Davis Bitton does not feel that Mormons were as radical in their criticism of the Bible as some others, he does feel that "rationalists such as Thomas Paine had furnished valuable ammunition" for the Mormon attack on the accuracy of the Bible.

Thomas Paine's book, The Age of Reason, undoubtedly had an influence on Mormon thinking. This book, written in the 1790's, caused a great deal of controversy and was therefore well known in Joseph Smith's time. While Paine was a brilliant man and raised a number of important questions in his book, he wrote with such sarcasm that his work was very offensive to a Christian. In one place he talks of "the stupid Bible of the church, that teacheth man nothing" (The Age of Reason, reprinted by The Thomas Paine Foundation, New York, p. 189).

Joseph Smith has been accused of reading Thomas Paine's book before he wrote the Book of Mormon. Now, while this is possible, it must be conceded that the Book of Mormon for the most part appears to be diametrically opposed to Paine's ideas. For instance, Paine claimed that the first five books of the Bible were not written by Moses. The Book of Mormon, on the other hand, states that they are "the five books of Moses, . . ." (1 Nephi 5:11). The Book of Mormon does contain a rather subtle attack upon the Bible, but whether this could be linked to Paine's book would be debatable.

Thomas Paine was very critical of the account of the creation found in Genesis. The first verse of this account reads: "In the beginning God created the heaven and the earth." Paine made this comment concerning this matter:

The manner in which the account opens shows it to be traditionary . . . Moses does not take it upon himself by introducing it with the formality that he uses on other occasions, such as that of saying, "The Lord spake unto Moses, saying."

Why it has been called the Mosaic account of the Creation, I am at a loss to conceive. (The Age of Reason, p. 20)

An examination of Joseph Smith's "inspired" translation of this portion of Scripture, leads us to believe that he was answering Thomas Paine's argument:

...the Lord spake unto Moses, saying: . . . in the beginning I created the heaven, and the earth upon which thou standest. (Pearl of Great Price, Book of Moses 2:1)

Notice that Joseph Smith adds the exact words that Thomas Paine said should be in Genesis to prove that it was written by Moses. The Mormon scholar Richard L. Anderson has recently brought forth some new information which shows that the Smith family were well aware of Paine's book. According to Dr. Anderson, Lucy Smith's manuscript for her book contained some information which never appeared in the published version. He states:

. . . about 1803 Asael strongly disapproved of Methodism, . . . Lucy Smith, Biographical Sketches, p. 54. Lucy's preliminary manuscript here adds the further detail of Asael Smith's demonstrating disapproval of the Methodist interest of his son Joseph Smith, Sr. Asael "came to the door one day and threw Tom Paine's Age of Reason into the house and angrily bade him read that until he believed it. (Joseph Smith's New England Heritage, 1971, p. 207)

Thomas Paine felt that the Bible could not be trusted as "the word of God" because of the problems involved in translation:

But how was Jesus Christ to make anything known to all nations? He could speak but one language, which was Hebrew, . . . and as to translations, every man who knows anything of languages knows that it is impossible to translate from one language to another, not only without losing a great part of the original, but frequently of mistaking the sense; . . . human language, . . . is incapable of being used as an universal means of unchangeable and uniform information, and therefore it is not the means that God useth in manifesting himself universally to man. (The Age of Reason, pp. 31-32)

It is interesting to note that Joseph Smith also cast doubt upon the translation of the Bible, for in “The Articles of Faith,” he wrote:

8. We believe the Bible to be the word of God as far as it is translated correctly; we also believe the Book of Mormon to be the word of God. (Pearl of Great Price, The Articles of Faith)

In his pamphlet, “Spiritual Gifts,” the Mormon Apostle Orson Pratt used arguments which resemble the ideas of Thomas Paine:

God gave many revelations to Hebrew Prophets, in the Hebrew language. . . . The same revelations have been translated many times by different authors: . . . These clashing translations are circulated among the people, as the words of God, when, in reality they are the words of translators; and words too, selected by their own human wisdom. . . . the Bible in English, French, German, Italian, Spanish, Danish, and indeed, in all the languages of the earth, except the original in which it was given, is not the word of God, but the word of uninspired translators. . . . so far as the uninspired translators and the people are concerned, no part of the Bible can, with certainty, be known by them to be the word of God.

23.—The Hebrew and Greek manuscripts of the Bible from which translations have been made, are evidently very much corrupted, . . . the learned are under the necessity of translating from such mutilated, imperfect, and, in very many instances, contradictory copies as still exist. This uncertainty, combined with the imperfections of uninspired translators, renders the Bibles of all languages, at the present day, emphatically the words of men, instead of the pure word of God. (Pamphlets by Orson Pratt, pp. 70-71)

It is very interesting to compare the words of Thomas Paine with those uttered by the Mormon Apostle Orson Pratt half a century later. In The Age of Reason, Thomas Paine wrote:

It is a matter altogether of uncertainty to us whether such of the writings as now appear under the name of the Old and New Testaments are in the same state in which those collectors say they found them, or whether they added, altered, abridged, or dressed them up. . . . they decided by vote which of the books out of the collection they had made should be the word of God, and which should not. (The Age of Reason, p. 18)

. . . the presumption is that the books . . . ascribed to Matthew, Mark, Luke and John, were not written by Matthew, Mark, Luke and John, and that they are impositions. . . . they have been manufactured, as the books of the Old Testament have been, by other persons than those whose names they bear. (Ibid., pp. 150-151)

There is not the least shadow of evidence of who the persons were that wrote them, nor at what time they were written; . . . They decided by vote, . . . which of those writings, out of the collection they had made, should be the word of God, and which should not. (Ibid., pp. 165-166)

The Mormon Apostle Orson Pratt made these comments in a pamphlet published in the 1850’s:

Many Protestants say they take the Bible as their only rule of faith: . . . What evidence have they that the book of Matthew was inspired of God, or any other of the books of the New Testament? The only evidence they have is tradition. . . . If it could be demonstrated by tradition, that every part of each book of the Old and New Testament, was, in its original, actually written by inspiration, still it cannot be determined that there is one single true copy of those originals now in existence. . . . What shall we say then, concerning the Bible’s being a sufficient guide? Can we rely upon it in its present known corrupted state, as being a faithful record of God’s word? We all know that but a few of the inspired writings have descended to our times, which few quote the names of some twenty other books which are lost, . . . What few have come down to our day, have been mutilated, changed, and corrupted, in such a shameful manner that no two manuscripts agree. Verses and even whole chapters have been added by unknown persons; and even we do not know the authors of some whole books; and we are not certain that all those which we do know, were wrote by inspiration. Add all this imperfection to the uncertainty of the translation, and who, in his right mind, could, for one moment, suppose the Bible in its present form to be a perfect guide? Who knows that even one verse of the whole Bible has escaped pollution, so as to convey the same sense now that it did in the original? . . . Who knows that even the ordinances and doctrine that seem to be set forth in the present English Bible, are anything like the original? The Catholics and Protestants do not know, because tradition is too imperfect to give this knowledge. There can be no certainty as to the contents of the inspired writings until God shall inspire some one to re-write all those books over again, . . . No reflecting man can deny the necessity of such a new revelation. (Orson Pratt’s Works, “The Bible Alone An Insufficient Guide,” pp. 44-47)

While we would expect an open enemy to Christianity like Thomas Paine to make the statements he did about the Bible, it is quite shocking to find a man who professed to be a Christian making such an attack upon the Bible. The Apostle Pratt’s statement that the Bible may have been changed so much that we can’t even rely upon one verse sounds very strange in light of the fact that the Book of Mormon quotes hundreds of verses from the Bible. In almost all cases these verses carry the same meaning as they do in the Bible. This alone should be sufficient evidence to show the Mormons that Orson Pratt was wrong in implying that we don’t know “that even one verse of the whole Bible has escaped pollution, so as to convey the same sense now” as it did in the original. Thus it is plain to see that the Bible cannot be discredited without casting a shadow of doubt on the Book of Mormon also. If the Bible is all wrong, then the Book of Mormon is also.

The Mormon Apostle Mark E. Petersen is more tactful than Pratt in his criticism of the Bible. Although he claims that portions were removed from the Bible, the identical wording of scriptures found in the King James Version and the Book of Mormon has forced him to believe that “the Lord did have a hand in the translation of the King James version”:

The Book of Mormon gives many detailed quotations from the records of Laban, incidentally, giving irrefutable evidence of the accuracy of the King James version, even though much of the scripture as given originally is now missing. . . .

Quotations from ancient Jewish prophets appearing in the Book of Mormon are the most correct Old Testament passages in existence today. They were copied onto the gold plates directly from the plates of brass, and translated by the gift and power of God as a part of the Book of Mormon.

And yet—these passages resemble the King James translation more than any other Bible version.

This gives reason to believe that indeed the Lord did have a hand in the translation of the King James version, . . .

The remainder of the Ten Commandments might be compared similarly. Almost word for word, the King James translation harmonizes with the Book of Mormon account, indicating that there was an element beyond scholarship attending the preparation of the King James translation. The guidance of the Almighty must have been there in rich measure. . . .

The harmony . . . is a great tribute to the accuracy of the King James Version. . . .

Is not this similarity of language on the part of the Lord, likewise a great tribute to the King James translation—not to suggest a divine endorsement of it? (As Translated Correctly, Salt Lake City, 1966, pp. 45, 49-53)

The Apostle Petersen feels that the quotations from Isaiah found in the Book of Mormon are “no doubt the only truly accurate quotations in existence today” (Ibid., p. 54). He even goes so far as to judge the text of the Bible by the text found in the Book of Mormon:

A direct reference to baptism was plainly deleted from Isaiah 48:1. In the Old Testament this reference reads:

Hear ye this, O house of Jacob, which are called by the name of Israel, and are come forth out of the waters of Judah, which sware by the name of the Lord . . .

And now note this same passage from the brass plates [the Book of Mormon]:

Hearken and hear this, O house of Jacob, who are called by the name of Israel, and are come forth out of the waters of Judah, or out of the waters of baptism, who sware by the name of the Lord. . . . (1 Nephi 20:1)

How many similar deletions were made, no one knows, because we have only fragments from the brass plates.

But the Bible as we know it is a different volume from what it was—and would have been—had it not been changed so much by those with selfish interests. (As Translated Correctly, p. 67)

The Apostle Petersen certainly picked a poor example to prove his charge, for there is definite proof that the change was made in the text of the Book of Mormon rather than in the text of the Bible. As we have already shown on page 91 of this book, the text of the original 1830 printing of the Book of Mormon did not have the clause concerning baptism in it. It followed the text of the Bible:

Hearken and hear this, O house of Jacob, which are called by the name of Israel, and are come forth out of the waters of Judah, which swear by the name of the Lord, . . . (Book of Mormon, 1830 edition, p. 52)

The clause “or out of the waters of baptism” was added in later editions. It did not appear in the original handwritten manuscript, and even Dr. Nibley has to admit that it is an interpolation:

It is said that Parley P. Pratt suggested the phrase, . . . Isaiah did not have to tell his ancient hearers that he had the waters of baptism in mind, but it is necessary to tell it to the modern reader . . . (Since Cumorah, p. 151)

We do not feel that it is right to condemn the text of the Bible on the basis of this verse from the Book of Mormon, especially since the evidence proves that the verse in the Book of Mormon has been falsified (for more information on this change in the Book of Mormon see page 91 of this book).

Evidence Compared

We have previously quoted the Mormon Apostle Orson Pratt as saying that “This generation have more than one thousand times the amount of evidence to demonstrate and for ever establish the Divine Authenticity of the Book of Mormon than they have in favor of the Bible!” On January 2, 1859, Orson Pratt spoke in the Tabernacle in Salt Lake City. In this discourse he stated:

. . . I will endeavor to bring forth some few of the evidences which establish the Divine authenticity of the Book of Mormon.

I shall compare this evidence with the evidence for the Divine authenticity of the Bible . . .

The oldest manuscripts of any of the books of the Old Testament at the present day date from the twelfth century of the Christian era. . . . We are informed by learned writers that about three centuries before Christ the Hebrew Scriptures were translated into Greek, called the Septuagint; but have we any copies of the Septuagint? No. You may search all the archives of the nations, and you cannot find one of these ancient copies. Fifteen hundred years after this supposed translation, you find some Greek and Hebrew manuscripts. . . . The oldest manuscripts of the New Testament which this age are in possession of are supposed to date from the sixth century of the Christian era. . . . We have five manuscripts in existence that were supposed to have been written as early as the sixth or seventh century after Christ. . . .

1st. The Vatican Manuscript, noted 1, 209. . . .

2nd. The Clermont or Regises Manuscript, 2, 245. This dates from the seventh century. . . .

3rd. The Ephrem Manuscript. This also is said to have been written in the seventh century. . . .

4th. The Alexandrian Manuscript. This was probably made in the sixth century; Cassimer Odin says the tenth. . . .

5th. The Cambridge Manuscript, or Codex Bezae . . . Bishop Marsh says—“Perhaps, of all the manuscripts now extant, this is the most ancient.” . . .

All the most ancient manuscripts of the New Testament known to the world differ from each other in almost every verse.

The learned admit that in the manuscripts of the New Testament alone there are no less than one hundred and thirty thousand different readings. . . . No one can tell whether even one verse of either the Old or New Testament conveys the ideas of the original author.

Just think! 130,000 different readings in the New Testament alone! . . . now let us turn to the Book of Mormon, . . .

The Book of Mormon professes to be translated not from manuscripts containing 130,000 different readings, nor by the learning of men who can render a translation as they please; neither does it profess to be translated from altered, mutilated manuscripts manufactured by monks or impostors upon Mount Athos to impose upon Christian credulity; but it was translated from the original plates themselves. . . . We defy the world to produce a true copy of the original of any book of the Bible, . . . they cannot find an original copy, or even a copy written centuries after the original writer was known to exist. . . . Cassimir Oudin says that the Alexandrian Manuscript, instead of being written in the sixth century, was made in the tenth. . . . There are men now living that have seen the original of the Book of Mormon—that have heard the voice of God. Where is there a man who has heard the voice of God testifying concerning the truth of King James’ translation? . . . the testimony establishing the truth of the Book of Mormon is far superior to that establishing the Bible in its present form. . . . any person who will carefully examine this subject will be obliged in their own hearts to say there is a hundredfold more evidence to prove the Divine authenticity of the Book of Mormon than what we have to prove the Palestine records. (Journal of Discourses, vol. 7, pp. 23, 24, 26, 27, 28, 29, 30, 36, 37)

The Apostle Pratt’s statement that there is “more than one thousand times” the amount of evidence to prove the Book of Mormon than to prove the Bible is certainly a misrepresentation. We have already shown that the only evidence for the Book of Mormon is the testimony of the witnesses and that this testimony can not be relied upon.

As far as historical and manuscript evidence is concerned Joseph Smith’s scriptures have absolutely no foundation. The “records of the Nephites,” for instance, were never cited by any ancient writer, nor are there any known manuscripts or even fragments of manuscripts in existence older than the ones dictated by Joseph Smith in the late 1820’s. Joseph Smith’s Book of Moses is likewise without documentary support. The only handwritten manuscripts for the Book of Moses are those dictated by Joseph Smith in the early 1830’s. Since Joseph Smith’s revelations in the Doctrine and Covenants do not purport to be translations of ancient records, we would not expect to find any ancient manuscript evidence concerning them. There is one revelation, however, which purports to be a translation of a “record made on parchment by John and hidden up by himself.” This revelation is found in the Doctrine and Covenants as Section 7. There is no documentary support for this revelation. The Book of Abraham purports to be a translation of an ancient Egyptian papyrus. We have already shown, however, that the original papyrus is in reality the Egyptian Book of Breathings and has nothing to do with Abraham or his religion. Therefore, we have no evidence for the Book of Abraham prior to the handwritten manuscripts dictated by Joseph Smith in the 1830's. It would appear, then, that there is no documentary evidence for any of Joseph Smith's works that dates back prior to the late 1820's.

When we turn to the Bible, however, we find a great deal of evidence—some of which dates back more than 2,000 years—showing that the Bible was known and used in early times. While this in itself does not prove that the Bible is divinely inspired, it does give a person a basis for faith.

Dead Sea Scrolls

The reader will remember that the Mormon Apostle Orson Pratt stated that the “oldest manuscripts of any of the books of the Old Testament at the present day date from the twelfth century of the Christian Era.” While this statement may have been true in Orson Pratt's time, the discovery of the Dead Sea Scrolls has changed the entire picture. We now have some manuscripts that date back prior to the time of Christ.

The Dead Sea Scrolls were discovered in 1947 when a boy threw a rock into a cave near the Dead Sea. He was startled by the sound of something breaking and later came back to find jars with ancient manuscripts in them. This was only the beginning, for further search by a number of people led to the discovery of many important manuscripts. When scholars learned of these manuscripts they were elated. In Compton's Encyclopedia we find these statements:

The Biblical manuscripts known as the Dead Sea Scrolls have been called by scholars “the greatest manuscript discovery of modern times.” They include Old Testament books and non-Biblical texts dating from 100 B.C. to A.D. 68. . . .

The Dead Sea Scrolls were written during one of the most decisive periods in the history of the Jewish people, on the eve of the birth of Christianity. When the tens of thousands of fragments have been pieced together and translated, scholars will have a mass of new material for the study of Biblical texts and the people who wrote them. The scrolls will shed new light on the foundations of Christianity and on the influence of Judaism on the Christian faith. (Compton's Encyclopedia, vol. 6, 1970, pp. 41a-41b)

Edmund Wilson gives this interesting information:

Dr. Trever at once sent off prints of columns of the Isaiah scroll to Dr. W. F. Albright of Johns Hopkins, one of the ablest living Biblical archaeologists and an authority on the Nash Papyrus, which he had studied intensively over a period of years. They heard from him by air mail on March 15. He had written the same day he received the letter: “My heartiest congratulations on the greatest manuscript discovery of modern times! There is no doubt in my mind that the script is more archaic than that of the Nash Papyrus. . . . I should prefer a date around 100 B.C. . . . What an absolutely incredible find! And there can happily not be the slightest doubt in the world about the genuineness of the manuscript.” (The Dead Sea Scrolls: 1947-1969, by Edmund Wilson, New York, 1969, p. 18)

They set out now to examine systematically all the caves in the Qumran neighborhood. They entered two hundred and sixty-seven, and in thirty-seven of them found pottery and other relics of human occupancy. In twenty-five of these, the pottery was identical with the jars from the original cave. Several of the caves contained scrolls, which, unprotected by jars, were in a state of disintegration, often buried under layers of dirt. The fragments of these collected ran into the tens of thousands. It was becoming more and more apparent that a library had been hidden here—a library which seems to have included almost all the books of the Bible [the Old Testament], a number of apocryphal works and the literature of an early religious sect. (Ibid., p. 25)

Isaiah Scroll — About 100 B.C.

Martin A. Larson gives this information in his book, The Religion of the Occident, page 227:

Space does not permit us to reproduce the archeological, paleographical, and other evidence which proves that the Dead Sea Scrolls were composed between 170 and 60 B.C. by a Jewish cult which flourished until 69 A.D. . . . Professor W. F. Libby of the University of Chicago subjected a piece of linen wrapping which covered one of the MSS. to the Carbon-14 Process and found that its date of origin was approximately 33 A.D. . . .

There can be no dispute concerning the authenticity of the Scrolls, which, in addition to several previously unknown and complete documents, now translated and published, include two MSS. of Isaiah and literally thousands of fragments found in various caves. Among these are portions of practically every book of the Old Testament.

In his book, The Ancient Library of Qumran, Frank Moore Cross, Jr., gives this information:

A sketch of the contents of Cave IV may be helpful in the discussions to follow. At the end of four years' labor 382 manuscripts have been identified from this cave. . . . Of the manuscripts identified thus far, about one hundred, slightly more than one fourth of the total, are biblical. All of the books of the Hebrew canon are now extant, with the exception of the Book of Esther.

Three very old documents have been found in Cave IV. . . . They include an old copy of Samuel, preserved in only a handful of fragments; a patched and worn section of Jeremiah, . . . and a copy of Exodus . . . of which only a column and a few tatters are extant. . . .

The archaic Samuel scroll can date scarcely later than 200 B.C. A date in the last quarter of the third century is preferable. The Jeremiah is probably slightly later. The archaic Exodus has not been subjected to detailed paleographical analysis; . . . Nevertheless it appears to be no later than the old Samuel fragments and probably is earlier.

One copy of Daniel is inscribed in the script of the late second century B.C. . . .

The biblical scrolls from Qumran span in date about three centuries. A few archaic specimens carry us back to the end of the third century, as we have seen. The heavy majority, however, date in the first century B.C. and in the first Christian century, . . . (The Ancient Library of Qumran, by Frank Moore Cross, Jr., Garden City, New York, 1961, pp. 39, 40, 42, 43)

In a recent article Frank Moore Cross writes:

For the science of paleography, it is difficult to exaggerate the importance of these papyri. . . . the dating proposed by the writer for the archaic Samuel manuscript (ca. 225 B.C.E) now appears to be minimal. The chronology of the Archaic Period (pre-Hasmonean) may prove too low by a generation; the archaic Samuel then would date from 275-225 B.C.E. (New Directions in Biblical Archaeology, Edited by David Noel Freedman and Jonas C. Greenfield, Garden City, New York, 1969, p. 53)

Werner Keller makes these comments concerning the Isaiah scroll:

The text of Isaiah from the cave at Qumran had actually been copied about 100 B.C., as Professor Albright had been first to recognize. . . . with the discovery of the Dead Sea scroll of Isaiah we have a Hebrew text of the Bible. . . . And the remarkable and wonderful fact is that ancient scroll of Isaiah, just like the book of the prophet in any printed Bible, whether in Hebrew, Greek, Latin, German, or any other language, has sixty-six chapters and agrees with our present-day text.

Seventeen sheets of leather sewn together into a length of almost twenty-three feet—this must have been what the roll of the prophet looked like as it was handed to Jesus in the synagogue at Nazareth so that he might read from it to the congregation. “And there was delivered unto him the book of the prophet Esaias [Isaiah].” (Luke 4:16, 17) “Every movement of Jesus’ hands is brought closer to us,” writes Professor Andre Parrot, “for we can still see on the reverse side of the leather the marks of the readers’ fingers.” (The Bible as History, by Werner Keller, Translated by William Neil, New York, 1957, pp. 423-424)

Mormon scholars accept the authenticity of the Dead Sea Scrolls, although they have not come to grips with the serious problems which these manuscripts create for the Book of Mormon and the “Inspired Version” of the Bible. The Mormon Apostle Mark E. Petersen makes this comment concerning the Dead Sea Scrolls:

Until recently, scholars depended on Hebrew manuscripts of the Old Testament dating only from the 9th to the 11th Centuries A.D., but now come the Dead Sea Scrolls dating back as far as the 3rd century B.C. They include a nearly complete text of Isaiah and fragments of all Old Testament books except Esther. (As Translated Correctly, 1966, pp. 3-4)

In his book, The Bible and Archaeology, J. A. Thompson gives the following information concerning the significance of the Dead Sea Scrolls:

Prior to the discovery of these texts, our earliest Hebrew manuscripts were dated about A.D. 900. It has always been the desire of Biblical scholars to obtain earlier manuscripts in order to make a comparison with the present-day Hebrew text. In this way they could discover how well the text had been preserved. As a result of these wonderful Qumran discoveries we now have documents as old as 100 B.C. or perhaps even earlier. . . . in the main these ancient texts agree fairly closely with the text with which we are familiar. Where they diverge they not infrequently follow the Septuagint text more closely, and this diverges from the Hebrew text in a number of places. It is evident also that there were versions of the Hebrew Bible in existence in those days that differed from both the present Masoretic and the Septuagint texts. (The Bible and Archaeology, 1962, p. 264)

Frank Moore Cross, Jr., made these statements concerning the Dead Sea Scrolls:

. . . we must cease to date any biblical work belonging to the Former or Latter Prophets (not to mention the Torah), or any extensive pericope within these books, later than the early second century B.C. . . . It is none the less a gain to have manuscripts, albeit fragmentary and incomplete, of the books of the Pentateuch, the Prophets, especially the Twelve, dating from the second century B.C., which rule out categorically speculations about extremely late additions to prophetic works. (The Ancient Library of Qumran, 1958, p. 164)

Isaiah Text

Millard Burrows, a noted authority on the Dead Sea Scrolls, made this statement with regard to the Isaiah scrolls:

The first of the prophetic books, Isaiah, was evidently, as we have seen, the most popular in the Qumran community. In addition to the two scrolls from Cave 1, there are more or less extensive fragments of thirteen others from Cave 4. Like the later and incomplete scroll from Cave 1, the Cave 4 fragments agree closely with the Masoretic text. This demonstration of the antiquity of our traditional text in the book of Isaiah is all the more important in view of the quite different indications in other books.

By far the most interesting and useful of all the Isaiah manuscripts for the study of the text is the complete St. Mark’s Isaiah scroll—as it may still be called for convenience, although it is now in Israel. It too supports the accuracy, by and large, of the Masoretic text (DSS, page 304). It presents, however, a more popular, less official form of the text than the other manuscripts. It was probably less carefully written and therefore contains a greater proportion of mistakes in copying, but it also preserves a number of ancient readings which were lost in the more orthodox tradition. (More Light on The Dead Sea Scrolls, New York, 1958, p. 146)

On page 172 of the same book, Millard Burrows states that the St. Mark scroll of Isaiah gives “the complete text of the book in a manuscript which cannot be dated much after 100 B.C. at the latest.” Gleason L. Archer, Jr., made this comment about the Isaiah scrolls:

Even though the two copies of Isaiah discovered in Qumran Cave 1 near the Dead Sea in 1947 were a thousand years earlier than the oldest dated manuscript previously known (A.D. 980), they proved to be word for word identical with our standard Hebrew Bible in more than 95 per cent of the text. The 5 per cent of variation consisted chiefly of obvious slips of the pen and variations in spelling. (A Survey of Old Testament Introduction, 1964, p. 19)

Bible scholars have reason to rejoice over the discovery of manuscripts of Isaiah dating back to ancient times. Mormon scholars, however, are faced with a dilemma, for although these manuscripts support the text of the Bible, they could turn out to be one of the strongest evidences against Joseph Smith’s “Inspired Revision” of the Bible and his “translation” of the text of Isaiah found in the Book of Mormon. For years Mormon scholars have labored to prove that the text of Isaiah in the Book of Mormon is actually a translation of an ancient copy of Isaiah and is therefore superior to the translation found in the Bible. They have attempted to show parallels between the text of Isaiah found in the Book of Mormon and that found in some ancient manuscripts. In our book Mormon Scriptures and the Bible, pages 9-11, we show that these parallels are of little value because these manuscripts were known and studied in Joseph Smith’s time.

If Mormon writers could find similarities between the text of the Book of Mormon and documents that were not known in Joseph Smith’s day, this type of evidence would be impressive. The Dead Sea Scrolls, for instance, should provide a great deal of evidence for the Book of Mormon if it is really an ancient record. The Isaiah scroll found at Qumran Cave 1 should have caused a great deal of joy among Mormon scholars, for here is a manuscript of Isaiah which is hundreds of years older than any manuscript previously known. Surely, if the Book of Mormon were true, this manuscript would be filled with evidence to support the text of Isaiah in the Book of Mormon and thus prove that Joseph Smith was a prophet of God. Instead of proving the Book of Mormon, however, it has turned out to be a great disappointment to Mormon scholars. Lewis M. Rogers, who was assistant professor of religion at Brigham Young University, wrote a paper which is entitled, “The Significance of the Scrolls and a Word of Caution.” In this article he stated:

It has been noted that deviations from the Masoretic text in the newly found Isaiah scrolls were minor, indicating a faithful preservation of the accepted Scriptures. However, variations from the standard in fragments from the Book of Samuel were startling, for they appeared to follow the Greek or Septuagint rather than the Masoretic text. . . .

Latter-day Saints have cause to rejoice with other Christians and Jews for the new light and fresh perspective brought to them by the Dead Sea Scrolls, but occasionally they need to be reminded that their hopes and emotions make them vulnerable. It is quite possible that claims for the Book of Mormon and for L.D.S. theology will not be greatly advanced as a consequence of this discovery. (Progress in Archaeology, Brigham Young University, 1963, pp. 46-47)

Wayne Ham wrote his M.A. thesis for the Department of Biblical Languages at Brigham Young University in 1961. He made a study in which he compared the Isaiah scroll with the Book of Mormon. His thesis is entitled, “A Textual Comparison of the Isaiah Passages in the Book of Mormon with the Same Passages in the St. Marks Isaiah Scroll of the Dead Sea Community.” After making this study Mr. Ham was forced to the conclusion that the Isaiah scroll does not support the text in the Book of Mormon. In an article published in Courage in 1970, he stated:

Included in the Dead Sea finds was a complete Isaiah scroll and an incomplete one. Latter Day Saints were hopeful that these Isaiah scrolls would bring some supportive evidence for the Book of Mormon. The theory went like this: The language of the Isaiah passages in the Book of Mormon is that of the King James Version, with some variations. Since the King James Version had been translated from the Massoretic Hebrew text (a text developed by Jewish scholars during the early centuries of the Christian era), it was assumed by some Latter Day Saints that the variations in the Book of Mormon represented an older, more accurate text than the Massoretic text. The Dead Sea Isaiah scroll, which dates probably from the second century B.C., predates by one thousand years what was previously considered to be the oldest surviving text of the Old Testament.

After a thorough investigation of the matter, reported in “A Textual Comparison of the Isaiah Passages in the Book of Mormon with the Same Passages in the St. Mark’s Isaiah Scroll of the Dead Sea Community,” this writer found no noteworthy instances of support for the Book of Mormon claims. (Courage, vol. 1, no. 1, September 1970, p. 20)

The Mormon apologist Dr. Sidney B. Sperry, of Brigham Young University, has to admit that the Dead Sea Scrolls do not help the case for the Book of Mormon:

After reading the Scrolls very carefully, I come to the conclusion that there is not a line in them that suggests that their writers knew the Gospel as understood by Latter-day Saints. In fact, there are a few passages that seem to prove the contrary. . . .

We should be especially interested in the light the Isaiah scroll throws on the problem of the Isaiah text in the Book of Mormon. I have compared in some detail the text of the scroll with its parallels in the Book of Mormon text. This tedious task has revealed that the scroll seldom agrees with the departures of the Book of Mormon text from that of the conventional Masoretic text of Isaiah and consequently the Authorized Version. The conclusions I come to as a result of these comparative studies may be set down as follows:

1. Despite the supposed antiquity of the scroll, its text is inferior to the conventional Hebrew text that has come down to us in the King James Version.

2. If the date assigned to the scroll is correct, we must conclude that serious changes took place in the text prior to the coming of Christ. If my thinking is correct, however, the pronouncement of Nephi concerning the perversion of the scriptures (1 Nephi 13:26) would suggest that we give thought to the possibility that the Isaiah scroll is dated a little too early—let us say about 150 years.

3. The Isaiah scroll is of relatively little use to Latter-day Saints as showing the antiquity of the text of Isaiah in the Book of Mormon.

4. The Book of Mormon text of Isaiah should warn us that the use of the Isaiah scroll of Qumran for purposes of textual criticism is open to grave suspicion.

What then do I see as valuable in the Scrolls? It should be understood that they have great value to the scholar in matters pertaining to Hebrew spelling, grammar and paleography. The Scrolls undoubtedly contribute much to the history of Judaism and Christianity, and specialists of the Old and New Testaments are properly much concerned with them. . . .

But aside from their technical value to scholars, I believe that the importance of the Scrolls in a religious sense has been highly overrated by certain scholars. Their practical importance to Latter-day Saints is relatively small. (Progress in Archaeology, pp. 52-54)

It is interesting to see how Dr. Sperry has to detract from the Isaiah scroll in his attempt to save the Book of Mormon.

Evidence For New Testament

The reader will remember that in his attack upon the Bible, the Mormon Apostle Orson Pratt stated that the “oldest manuscripts of the New Testament which this age are in possession of are supposed to date from the sixth century of the Christian era.” He mentions both the Codex Vaticanus and the Codex Alexandrinus. Scholars now feel that the Codex Vaticanus was written in the fourth century. Bruce Manning Metzger, an authority on ancient Bible manuscripts, makes this statement:

B. One of the most valuable of all the manuscripts of the Greek Bible is codex Vaticanus. As its name indicates, it is in the great Vatican Library at Rome, . . .

The manuscript was written about the middle of the fourth century and contained both Testaments as well as the books of the Apocrypha, . . . (The Text of the New Testament, New York, 1964, p. 47)

Gleason L. Archer, Jr., feels that the Codex Vaticanus is “a magnificent” manuscript and states that it was written about “A.D. 325-350” (A Survey of Old Testament Introduction, p. 40).

The Codex Alexandrinus was probably written in the fifth century. Bruce M. Metzger states:

A. This handsome codex, dating from about the fifth century, contains the Old Testament, except for several mutilations, and most of the New Testament . . . It was presented in 1627 by Cyril Lucar, Patriarch of Constantinople, to King Charles I of England. Today it rests along with codex Sinaiticus in one of the prominent showcases in the Department of Manuscripts of the British Museum. (The Text of the New Testament, 1964, p. 46)

The same year (1859) that the Mormon Apostle Orson Pratt was making one of his most vicious attacks on the Bible, Constantinus Tischendorf discovered the Codex Sinaiticus, which has turned out to be one of the most important manuscripts of the Bible. Scholars feel that this manuscript was written in the fourth century. George Eldon Ladd gives this information concerning this manuscript:

After the Russian revolution, the U.S.S.R. sold the manuscript to the British Museum in London for $500,000—a sale which attracted world-wide attention. This manuscript, called Codex Sinaiticus, dates from the early fourth century, and has proved to be one of the best texts we possess of the New Testament. (The New Testament and Criticism, Michigan, 1967, p. 62)

Kenneth W. Clark, of Duke University, made this statement about this manuscript:

. . . it was at Saint Catherine’s monastery that Constantine Tischendorf discovered in 1859 a manuscript of the entire Bible in Greek. Written in the fourth century, Codex Sinaiticus has come to stand second only to Codex Vaticanus in age and importance, . . . (The Biblical Archaeologist, May 1953, p. 22)

In the book, Our Bible and the Ancient Manuscripts, pages 194-195, we find this information:

The date of the manuscript is in the fourth century, probably about the middle of it. It can hardly be much earlier than A.D. 340, . . . On the other hand, comparison with other hands of the fourth century, of which more are now available than was formerly the case, seems to show that it cannot be appreciably later than the middle of the century.

These three ancient manuscripts are very important as far as the text of the New Testament is concerned. Even some of the most zealous enemies of Christianity concede that they are authentic. The Moslem writer Al-Haj Khwaja Nazir Ammad stated:

There are three ancient manuscripts: the Codex Sinaiticus, otherwise known as the Alpha, found by Tischendorf on Mount Sinai in 1859, said to be of the fourth century; the Codex Alexandrinus known as A found by Cyril Luker, Patriarch of Constantinople, in 1621, which is traced to the fifth century, and the third, the Codex Vaticanus, otherwise known as B, said to be of the fourth century. (Jesus in Heaven on Earth, Pakistan, 1956, p. 15)

F. F. Bruce, a Christian writer from the University of Manchester, makes these statements concerning the documentary evidence for the New Testament:

The evidence for our New Testament writings is ever so much greater than the evidence for many writings of classical authors, the authenticity of which no-one dreams of questioning. . . .

There are in existence about 4,000 Greek manuscripts of the New Testament in whole or in part. The best and most important of these go back to somewhere about AD 350, the two most important being the Codex Vaticanus, the chief treasure of the Vatican Library in Rome, and the well-known Codex Sinaiticus, . . .

Perhaps we can appreciate how wealthy the New Testament is in manuscript attestation if we compare the textual material for other ancient historical works. For Caesar's Gallic War (composed between 58 and 50 BC) there are several extant MSS, but only nine or ten are good, and the oldest is some 900 years later than Caesar's day. Of the 142 books of the Roman History of Livy (59 BC–AD 17) only thirty-five survive; these are known to us from not more than twenty MSS of any consequence, only one of which, and that containing fragments of Books iii–vi, is as old as the fourth century. Of the fourteen books of the Histories of Tacitus (c. AD 100) only four and a half survive; of the sixteen books of his Annals, ten survive in full and two in part. The text of these extant portions of his two great historical works depends entirely on two MSS, one of the ninth century and one of the eleventh. The extant MSS of his minor works (Dialogus de Oratoribus, Agricola, Germania) all descend from a codex of the tenth century. The History of Thucydides (c. 460–400 BC) is known to us from eight MSS, the earliest belonging to c. AD 900, and a few papyrus scraps, belonging to about the beginning of the Christian era. The same is true of the History of Herodotus (c. 480–425 BC). Yet no classical scholar would listen to an argument that the authenticity of Herodotus or Thucydides is in doubt because the earliest MSS of their works which are of any use are over 1,300 years later than the originals.

But how different is the situation of the New Testament in this respect! In addition to the two excellent MSS of the fourth century mentioned above, which are the earliest of some thousands known to us, considerable fragments remain of papyrus copies of books of the New Testament dated from 100 to 200 years earlier still. (The New Testament Documents—Are They Reliable? Grand Rapids, Michigan, 1967, pp. 15–17)

Papyri Finds

Since the time of Orson Pratt some of the most important discoveries concerning the New Testament have been made. In Our Bible and the Ancient Manuscripts, 1958 edition, page 185, we find this statement:

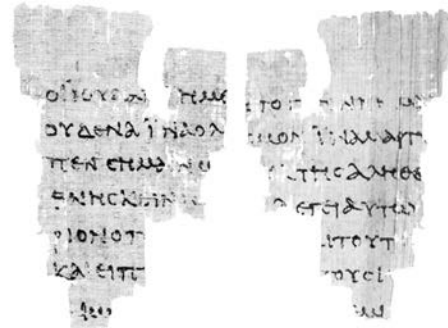

It has already been explained (p. 40) that to the two categories of vellum manuscripts, uncials and minuscules, there has now to be prefixed a third, which has only come into existence within the last seventy-five years, and indeed has only acquired much importance within the last twenty-five. That is the category of papyri, which has added a new chapter to textual history, and has gone far to bridge the gap between the autographs of the New Testament books and the great vellum uncials.

Floyd V. Filson gives the following information concerning the papyrus manuscripts:

. . . it is in Egypt that the overwhelming majority of papyri have survived. This is because the dry climate and drifting sands which cover abandoned sites have enabled the papyrus to survive through centuries without moisture reaching it. Even so almost every papyrus manuscript found is only fragmentary.

The importance of such surviving papyrus manuscripts is that they are early. Almost no parchment manuscripts of New Testament books have survived from ancient times; a few very important ones, such as the Codex Vaticanus and the Codex Sinaiticus, date from the fourth century, and a few others from the fifth century, but it is the papyri which give us manuscripts that go further back than the fourth century. However, papyrus suffers from a serious drawback. It is fragile, and decays easily or becomes brittle and breaks in pieces; and so up to this time we have found only very limited fragments of papyrus manuscripts of New Testament books. Papyrus Bodmer II is outstanding in that so much of John is preserved in full page form. (The Biblical Archaeologist, September 1957, p. 55)

Below is a photograph of both sides of the Rylands Greek Papyrus 457, dated about 125–130 A.D., the oldest known fragment of a New Testament manuscript. It contains John 18:31–33 on one side and 18:37–38 on the other. A photograph of this papyrus can be found in The Biblical Archaeologist, September 1957, page 61.

In Our Bible and the Ancient Manuscripts, pages 189–190, we find this information concerning this fragment:

This scrap, measuring about 3 1/2 by 2 1/2 inches, was among some papyri acquired in 1920 by Dr. B. P. Grenfell for the John Rylands Library at Manchester, but remained unnoticed until Mr. C. H. Roberts identified it as the oldest existing manuscript of any part of the New Testament. It contains John xviii. 31–3, 37, 38 in a hand which can be confidently assigned to the first half of the second century. In the middle fifty years of the nineteenth century, if this scrap could have been produced and its date established, it would have created a profound sensation; for it would have convincingly refuted those who contended that the fourth Gospel was not written until the second century was far advanced. Now we see that it was not only written but had spread to a provincial town in Egypt by the middle of the second century, which goes far towards confirming the traditional date of composition in the last years of the first century.

Patrick Campbell maintained that the Gospel of John was not written until three centuries after the other Gospels: “The Gospels of Matthew, Mark and Luke must be viewed together, and apart from the Gospel of John. The last belongs to a different category and was composed some three centuries later” (The Mythical Jesus, 1965, pp. 25–26). In light of the discovery of “Rylands Greek Papyrus 457” and several other important discoveries, Patrick Campbell's arguments cannot be maintained. J. A. Thompson says the following concerning the Rylands Fragment of John:

The style of writing enabled it to be assigned to the first half of the second century. . . . the fact that it was not only written in Egypt but that it had been used in a provincial town in Egypt at this early date points to the fact that John's Gospel, far from being a late second-century production as some had maintained, was in fact far earlier, and more likely to have been written in the first century, or at least very early in the second. (The Bible and Archaeology, p. 437)

Frank Moore Cross, Jr., also feels that the Rylands Fragment of John should be dated to “the first half of the second century A.D.” (The Ancient Library of Qumran, p. 43). Floyd V. Filson made this statement concerning this fragment:

... it is certainly from the first half of the second century A.D., and the style of writing warrants a date about 125 or 130 A.D. It could be dated a little later or earlier. This is the earliest manuscript fragment of any New Testament book, and its date is remarkably close to the time of writing of the original Gospel. (The Biblical Archaeologist, Sept. 1957, p. 56)

William F. Albright, who was “one of the world’s foremost students of the ancient Near East,” made the following statement:

Meanwhile the sensational publication of a fragment of the Gospel from the early second century (C. H. Roberts, 1935) and of a roughly contemporary fragment of an apocryphal gospel dependent on John (H. I. Bell, 1935) has dealt the coup de grace to all radically late dating of John and has proved that the Gospel cannot be later than the first century A.D. (From the Stone Age to Christianity, by William Foxwell Albright, New York, 1957, p. 388)

F. F. Bruce, of the University of Manchester, gives this interesting information concerning the Rylands Fragment of John and other important discoveries:

In addition to the two excellent MSS of the fourth century mentioned above, which are the earliest of some thousands known to us, considerable fragments remain of papyrus copies of books of the New Testament dated from 100 to 200 years earlier still. The Chester Beatty Biblical Papyri, the existence of which was made public in 1931, consists of portions of eleven papyrus codices, three of which contained most of the New Testament writings. One of these, containing the four Gospels with Acts, belongs to the first half of the third century; another, containing Paul’s letters to churches and the Epistle to the Hebrews, was copied at the beginning of the third century; the third, containing Revelation, belongs to the second half of the same century.

A more recent discovery consists of some papyrus fragments dated by papyrological experts not later than AD 150, published in Fragments of an Unknown Gospel and other Early Christian Papyri, ... Earlier still is a fragment of a papyrus codex containing John xviii. 31-33, 37f., now in the John Rylands Library, Manchester, dated on palaeographical grounds around AD 130, showing that the latest of the four Gospels, which was written, according to tradition, at Ephesus between AD 90 and 100, was circulating in Egypt within about forty years of its composition (if, as is most likely, this papyrus originated in Egypt, where it was acquired in 1917). It must be regarded as being, by half a century, the earliest extant fragment of the New Testament.

A more recently discovered papyrus manuscript of the same Gospel, while not so early as the Rylands papyrus, is incomparably better preserved; this is the Papyrus Bodmer II, whose discovery was announced by the Bodmer Library of Geneva in 1956; it was written about AD 200, and contains the first fourteen chapters of the Gospel of John with one lacuna (of twenty-two verses), and considerable portions of the last seven chapters. (The New Testament Documents—Are They Reliable? 1968, pp. 17-18)

A Comparison of the Manuscript Evidence for the Bible and for Mormon Scriptures

Bruce M. Metzger gives this interesting information:

One of the oldest considerable portions of the Greek New Testament is a papyrus codex of the Gospel of John, the Bodmer Papyrus II, . . . According to its editor, the manuscript dates from about A.D. 200. . . . Still another early Biblical manuscript acquired by M. Bodmer is a single-quire codex of Luke and John. It originally contained about 144 pages, each measuring 10 1/4 by 5 1/8 inches, of which 102 have survived, either in whole or in part. . . . The editors, Victor Martin and Rodolphe Kaasser, date this copy between A.D. 175 and 225. It is thus the earliest known copy of the Gospel according to Luke and one of the earliest known of the Gospel according to John. (The Text of the New Testament, pp. 39-41)

Floyd V. Filson said that “The Bodmer Papyri, reported to have been found in Upper Egypt, must be listed with the Dead Sea Scrolls among the most remarkable finds in archaeological history” (The Biblical Archaeologist, May 1959, p. 48). In Our Bible and the Ancient Manuscripts we find this information:

We now have, . . . substantial portions of a codex containing the four Gospels and Acts written in the first half of the third century, another of the Pauline Epistles of about A.D. 200, fifty leaves on an original codex of 108 leaves containing Numbers and Deuteronomy of the early second century, a tiny scrap of St. John of the same date, together with fragments of Genesis, Deuteronomy, Psalms, Matthew and Titus also of the second century. There is even a fragment of Deuteronomy from a roll of the second century before Christ. A considerable gap in the history of the transmission of the Bible text has thus been filled by the discoveries of recent years. (Our Bible and the Ancient Manuscripts, p. 43)

In the first edition of this work it was stated that “the early papyrus manuscripts of the New Testament have all perished (unless indeed some are still lying buried in the soil of Egypt, which is far from improbable).” This possibility has happily been realized, and, as has already been indicated, we now have a slender thread of tradition extending back to a point barely a generation later than the date of the Apocalypse or the Fourth Gospel. A list compiled by the Rev. P.L. Hedley in 1933 enumerated 157 New Testament fragments on papyrus (including vellum fragments found with papyri, and ostraka), and to these may now be added the Chester Beatty manuscripts and other recent discoveries, which bring the total up to 170 or more. (Ibid., pp. 162-163)

. . . we have a nearly complete manuscript of the Pauline Epistles, written apparently about the beginning of the third century—that is to say, more than a century before the Vaticanus and Sinaiticus. It emphatically confirms the general soundness of the text, . . . (Ibid., pp. 188-189)

Besides the thousands of Greek manuscripts, there is additional evidence for the text of the New Testament found in early translations into other languages and in quotations found in the writings of early Christians (for more information on this matter see our book Mormon Scriptures and the Bible, pages 15-16).

“130,000 Different Readings”

The reader will remember that the Mormon Apostle Orson Pratt made these statements in a discourse delivered in 1859:

All the most ancient manuscripts of the New Testament known to the world differ from each other in almost every verse. . . .

The learned admit that in the manuscripts of the New Testament alone there are no less than one hundred and thirty thousand different readings. . . . No one can tell whether even one verse of either the Old or New Testament conveys the ideas of the original author.

Just think, 130,000 different readings in the New Testament alone! (Journal of Discourses, vol. 7, pp. 27-28)

On another occasion the Apostle Pratt stated: “Who knows that even one verse of the whole Bible has escaped pollution, so as to convey the same sense now that it did in the original?” The Mormon scholar Dr. Hugh Nibley has stated: “. . . when we get the so-called original texts of the Bible before us with their stately apparatus of possible corrections, emendations, suggestions, recommendations, and whatnot, we first come to realize that the holy text is a maze of a thousand passages” (The World and the Prophets, Salt Lake City, 1954, p. 188). In a footnote at the bottom of the same page Dr. Nibley states: “There are more than 8,000 ancient manuscripts of the New Testament, no two of which read exactly alike!”

While it is true that there are many different readings in manuscript copies of the New Testament, Mormon writers have greatly exaggerated the importance of this matter. Gleason L. Archer, Jr., stated:

But what about the text of the Bible as we now possess it? Is that text necessarily free from all mistakes of every kind? Not when it comes to copyists' errors, for we certainly do find discrepancies among the handwritten copies that have been preserved to us, even those which come from the earliest centuries. Some slips of the pen doubtless crept into the first copies made from the original manuscripts, and additional errors of a transmissional type found their way into the copies of copies. It is almost unavoidable that this should have been the case. No man alive can sit down and copy out the text of an entire book without a mistake of any kind. (Those who doubt this statement are invited to try it themselves!) It would take nothing short of a miracle to insure the inerrancy of a copy of an original manuscript. (A Survey of Old Testament Introduction, p. 18)

F. F. Bruce made these interesting observations:

It is easily proved by experiment that it is difficult to copy out a passage of any considerable length without making one or two slips at least. When we have documents like our New Testament writings copied and recopied thousands of times, the scope for copyists' errors is so enormously increased that it is surprising there are no more than there actually are. Fortunately, if the number of MSS increases the number of scribal errors, it increases proportionately the means of correcting such errors, so that the margin of doubt left in the process of recovering the exact original wording is not so large as might be feared; it is in truth remarkably small. (The New Testament Documents—Are They Reliable? p. 19)

George Eldon Ladd makes these observations:

Some of these textual variations involve matters of theological importance; but the majority of them do not essentially affect the meaning of the Bible, and vast numbers of textual errors deal only with trivial differences.

Errors in copying the Greek text arose when the copyist did not correctly read the text that lay before him. In 1 Timothy 3:16, the AV reads “God was manifest in the flesh,” while the RSV reads, “He was manifest in the flesh.” Some uncritical readers might attribute such a change to an alleged “lower theology” of the modern version; but the facts are simple. The earlier manuscripts read OC (“he who”), while many of the later manuscripts read ΘC (theos — “God”). The difference is only two small marks. (The New Testament and Criticism, pp. 63-64)

Through the developed science of textual criticism we have achieved a relatively accurate text of the New Testament. There remain, however, numerous readings where the weight of the divergent witnesses is so evenly balanced that it is impossible to decide with certainty which reading is to be preferred. (Ibid., p. 71)

In his book, The Text of the New Testament, Bruce M. Metzger gives this information:

Words and notes standing in the margin of the older copy were occasionally incorporated into the text of the new manuscript. Since the margin was used for glosses

(that is, synonyms of hard words in the text) as well as corrections, it must have often been most perplexing to a scribe to decide what to do with a marginal note. It was easiest to solve his doubt by putting the note into the text which he was copying. Thus it is probable that what was originally a marginal comment explaining the moving of the water in the pool at Bethesda (John v. 7) was incorporated into the text of John v. 3b-4 (see the King James version for the addition). . . .

Odd though it may seem, scribes who thought were more dangerous than those who wished merely to be faithful in copying what lay before them. Many of the alterations which may be classified as intentional were no doubt introduced in good faith by copyists who believed that they were correcting an error or infelicity of language which had previously crept into the sacred text and needed to be rectified. . . . (The Text of the New Testament, pp. 194-195)

What would a conscientious scribe do when he found that the same passage was given differently in two or more manuscripts which he had before him? Rather than make a choice between them and copy only one of the two variant readings (with the attendant possibility of omitting the genuine reading), most scribes incorporated both readings in the new copy which they were transcribing. (Ibid., p. 200)

In Our Bible and the Ancient Manuscripts we find this information:

1. Errors of Hand and Eye. The mistakes of scribes are of many kinds and of varying importance. Sometimes the copyist confuses words of similar sound, as in English we sometimes find our correspondents write there for their or here for hear. Or he may pass over a word by accident; and this is especially likely to happen when the same word is repeated (it is then called haplography) or if two adjoining words end with the same letters. Sometimes this cause of error (known as homoioteleuton= "similar ending") operates more widely. Two successive lines of the MS. from which he is copying end in the same or similar words; and the copyist's eye slips from the first to the second, and the intermediate line is omitted. Sometimes a whole verse, or a longer passage, may be omitted owing to the identity of the first or last words with those of an adjoining passage. . . . sometimes the MS. from which he is copying is furnished with short explanatory notes or glosses in the margin, and he fails to see where the text ends and the note begins, and so copies the note into the text itself. . . . The veneration in which the sacred books were held has generally protected them against intentional alterations of the text, but not entirely so. The harmonization of the Gospel narratives, described in the last paragraph, has certainly been in some cases intentional; and that, no doubt, without the smallest wish to deceive, but simply with the idea of supplementing the one narrative from another parallel source or sources, or in order to smooth out discrepancies. . . .

One word of warning, already referred to, must be emphasized in conclusion. No fundamental doctrine of the Christian faith rests on a disputed reading. Constant references to mistakes and divergences of reading, such as the plan of this book necessitates, might give rise to the doubt whether the substance, as well as the language, of the Bible is not open to question. It cannot be too strongly asserted that in substance the text of the Bible is certain. Especially is this the case with the New Testament. The number of manuscripts of the New Testament, of early translations from it, and of quotations from it in the oldest writers of the Church, is so large that it is practically certain that the true reading of every doubtful passage is preserved in some one or other of these ancient authorities. This can be said of no other ancient book in the world. . . . the manuscripts of the New Testament are counted by hundreds, and even thousands. In the case of the Old Testament we are not quite in such a good position, as will be shown presently. In some passages it seems certain that the true reading has not been preserved by any ancient authority, and we are driven to conjecture in order to supply it. (Our Bible and the Ancient Manuscripts, pp. 50, 51, 52, 55)

In a footnote on page 55 of the same book we find this statement:

Dr. Hort, whose authority on the point is quite incontestable, estimates the proportion of words about which there is some doubt [in the New Testament] at about one-eighth of the whole; but by far the greater part of these consists merely of differences in order and other unimportant variations, and "the amount of what can in any sense be called substantial variation . . . can hardly form more than a thousandth part of the entire text (Introduction to The New Testament in the Original Greek, p. 2).

Mormon leaders claim that the Catholics conspired to alter the Bible. In the Book of Mormon we read:

. . . thou seest the foundation of a great and abominable church, which is most abominable above all other churches; for behold, they have taken away from the gospel of the Lamb many parts which are plain and most precious; and also many covenants of the Lord have they taken away.

And all this have they done that they might pervert the right ways of the Lord, that they might blind the eyes and harden the hearts of the children of men.

Wherefore, thou seest that after the book hath gone forth through the hands of the great and abominable church, that there are many plain and precious things taken away from the book, which is the book of the Lamb of God.

. . . because of the many plain and precious things which have been taken out of the book, which were plain unto the understanding of the children of men, . . . because of these things which are taken away out of the gospel of the Lamb, an exceeding great many do stumble, yea, insomuch that Satan hath great power over them. (Book of Mormon, 1 Nephi 13:26-29)

Joseph Fielding Smith, Jr., who is the son of the tenth President of the Mormon Church, made these statements:

Scholars do not deny that the original text of the Bible has been corrupted. Truths have been removed in an attempt to preserve traditions. Faulty translations and omissions of phrases and clauses have resulted in confusion. (Religious Truths Defined, 1962, p. 337)

The early "apostate fathers" did not think it was wrong to tamper with inspired scripture. If any scripture seemed to endanger their viewpoint, it was altered, transplanted or completely removed from the Biblical text. All this was done that they might keep their traditions. Such mutilation was considered justifiable to preserve the so-called "purity" of their doctrines. (Ibid., p. 175)

The Mormon Apostle Mark E. Petersen made these statements concerning the Bible:

Many insertions were made, some of them "slanted" for selfish purposes, while at times deliberate falsifications and fabrications were perpetrated. (As Translated Correctly, Salt Lake City, 1966, p. 4)

It is evident then that many of the "plain and precious" things were omitted from the Bible by failure to choose all of the authentic books for inclusion, and by deliberate changes, deletions and forgeries, . . . (Ibid., p. 14)

Joseph Smith himself stated: "I believe the Bible as it read when it came from the pen of the original writers. Ignorant translators, careless transcribers, or designing and corrupt priests have committed many errors" (History of the Church, vol. 6, p. 57). On December 1, 1844, the Mormon publication, Times and Seasons, contained this statement: "Elder R. Richey followed him and showed the situation of our Bible, after passing through the hands of the Mother of Harlots" (Times and Seasons, vol. 5, p. 726).

While it is true that there are various readings in the original handwritten manuscripts of the Bible, the Book of Mormon's charge that the Catholics deliberately conspired to remove "many plain and precious things" out of the Bible is proven false by the Dead Sea Scrolls and other important manuscripts which have been discovered. Anthony A. Hoekema makes these observations:

The Mormon contention that "after the book [the Bible] hath gone forth through the hands of the great and abominable church . . . there are many plain and precious things taken away from the book . . ." (1 Nephi 13:28), is completely contrary to fact. The many copies of Old Testament manuscripts which we now possess do vary in minor matters—the spelling of words, the omission of a phrase here and there—but there is no evidence whatsoever that any major sections of Old Testament books have been lost. The manuscripts found among the Dead Sea Scrolls, generally dated from about 200 to 50 B.C., include portions of every Old Testament book except Esther; studies have revealed that these documents—older by a thousand years than previously discovered Old Testament manuscripts—are substantially identical to the text of the Old Testament which had been previously handed down. As far as New Testament manuscripts are concerned, the oldest of which go back to the second century A.D., the situation is substantially the same. The variations that are found in these manuscripts . . . are of a relatively minor nature. There is no indication whatever that any large sections of material found in the originals have been lost. Most of the manuscript variations concern matters of spelling, word order, tense, and the like; no single doctrine is affected by them in any way. (The Four Major Cults, Michigan 1963, pp. 30-31)

The Book of Mormon plainly states that the changes in the Bible were made after the time of Christ and after the formation of the Catholic Church:

The book that thou beholdest is a record of the Jews, . . . the book proceeded forth from the mouth of a Jew; and when it proceeded forth from the mouth of a Jew it contained the plainness of the gospel of the Lord, . . . these things go forth from the Jews in purity unto the Gentiles, . . . thou seest the foundation of a great and abominable church, which is most abominable above all other churches, for behold, they have taken away from the gospel of the Lamb many parts . . . that they might pervert the right ways of the Lord, . . . after the book hath gone forth through the hands of the great and abominable church, . . . there are many plain and precious things taken away from the book, which is the book of the Lamb of God. (Book of Mormon, 1 Nephi 13:23-28)

In 1832 the Mormon publication The Evening and the Morning Star said that the changes in the Bible were made sometime between 460 and 1400 A.D.:

. . . the most plain parts of the New Testament, have been taken from it by the Mother of Harlots while it was confined in that Church,—say, from the year A.D. 460 to 1400: . . . (The Evening and the Morning Star, vol. 1, no. 1, June, 1832, p. 3)

As we have shown, the "great Isaiah Scroll" found at Qumran provides important evidence to show that the Catholics did not take away "many plain and precious things" from the Bible. This scroll is dated at about 100 B.C., and therefore could not have been touched by the Catholics. Also it should be remembered that this scroll is a Jewish production, and the Book of Mormon claims that the Jews had the Scriptures in their "purity." Why, then, does this scroll fail to support the text of Isaiah as found in the Book of Mormon or Joseph Smith's Inspired Revision of the Bible?

The Catholic Church certainly was not in existence prior to the time of Christ, and President Joseph Fielding Smith has stated that the Catholics did not become the "ruling power in religion" until after the beginning of the fourth century:

The Church established by the Redeemer was taken from the earth . . . The great ecclesiastical organization that arose and claimed to be the Church of Christ was of gradual growth. The change from truth to error was not made all in one day. . . . In the beginning of the fourth century this great religious power, under the Emperor Constantine became the state religion of the Roman Empire. From that time forth its dominion spread and before many years had passed away it became the ruling power in religion in the so-called civilized world. By it "times and laws" were changed. (Essentials in Church History, by Joseph Fielding Smith, pp. 9-10)

In 1887 Rev. M. T. Lamb made this observation:

Have a great many of the best things in the New Testament been taken out of it by a great and abominable church since the Apostles' day, as the Book of Mormon tells us? . . .

Such a piracy of Holy Scripture could not have occurred later than 350 A.D., because there are now in existence copies of the Bible that are between fifteen and sixteen hundred years old, copies written out by hand not later than 350 years after Christ—250 years after the death of the Apostle John. (The Golden Bible, p. 329)

At the time M. T. Lamb wrote the above statement there was still a substantial gap between the original manuscripts and the earliest copies known to scholars. Consequently, Mormons would not accept these fourth century manuscripts as evidence against Joseph Smith's work. Since the turn of the century, however, the situation has entirely changed, for papyrus fragments have been found which virtually close the gap and prove that the Scriptures have not been rewritten by a "great and abominable church."

Floyd V. Filson stated:

Over seventy papyrus manuscripts of New Testament writing have been found . . .

These early manuscripts, although fragmentary, make a real contribution to our knowledge. They show that in early centuries the Gospel of John was widely known in Egypt (where most of the papyri are found), and that the text of the Gospels previously known from manuscripts of the fourth century and later agrees substantially with the text which we find in these third and second century fragments (second century fragments are admittedly rare and small). (The Biblical Archaeologist, February 1961, p. 3)

Sir Fredric Kenyon, who was the Director of the British Museum, made this statement:

"The interval then between the dates of original composition and the earliest extant evidence becomes so small as to be in fact negligible, and the last foundation for any doubt that the Scriptures have come down to us substantially as they were written has now been removed. Both the authenticity and the general integrity of the books of the New Testament may be regarded as finally established." (The Bible and Archaeology, 1940, p. 288, as quoted in The New Testament Documents—Are They Reliable? p. 20)

In Our Bible and the Ancient Manuscripts we find the following:

The discoveries of Greek papyri in Egypt have materially reduced the gap between the earliest extant manuscripts of the New Testament and Septuagint and the date at which the original books were written. They have established, with a wealth of evidence which no other work of ancient literature can even approach, the substantial authenticity and integrity of the text of the Bible as we now possess it. (Our Bible and the Ancient Manuscripts, pp. 318-319)

In September, 1957, The Biblical Archaeologist printed a photograph of the first page "of the Gospel of John in Papyrus Bodmer II." Although this photograph is small most of the writing is quite readable. This papyrus is dated about 200 A.D. We feel that this papyrus provides an excellent test for Joseph Smith's claim that the Catholics changed the Bible, and therefore we are including a photograph of it on the next page. Below the photograph we have copied the characters—written in the "Greek Uncial Script"—from the papyrus and with the help of Berry's Interlinear Literal Translation of the Greek New Testament we have divided the words and have given the English translation below each word. The fragment is damaged on the right side so we have had to restore a few words in brackets. We have numbered the lines for easy reference and have tried to end them at exactly the same place as on the original papyrus. The order of the words in a literal translation of the Greek differs from what we are accustomed to in English. Therefore, we have assigned numbers to the words so that the reader will see the order they should be read for proper understanding.

In order to give the reader an idea of how this papyrus compares with the King James and Revised Standard versions of the Bible, we have made three columns. We will follow the word order suggested above for the Papyrus Bodmer II.

KING JAMES VERSION	PAPYRUS BODMER II	REVISED STANDARD VERSION
In the beginning was the Word, and the Word was with God. The same was in the beginning with God. All things were made by him; and without him was not any thing made that was made. In him was life; and the life was the light of men. And the light shineth in darkness; and the darkness comprehended it not.	In the beginning was the Word, and the Word was with God, and the Word was God. He was in the beginning with God; all things were made by him, and without him was not anything made that was made. In him was life, and the life was the light of men. And the light in the darkness shines, and the darkness has not overcome it.	In the beginning was the Word, and the Word was with God, and the Word was God. He was in the beginning with God; all things were made through him, and without him was not anything made that was made. In him was life, and the life was the light of men. The light shines in the darkness, and the darkness has not overcome it.
There was a man sent from God, whose name was John. The same came for a witness, to bear witness of the Light, that all men through him might believe. He was not that Light, but was sent to bear witness of that Light. That was the true Light, which lighteth every man that cometh into the world. He was in the world, and the world was made by him, and the world knew him not. He came unto his own, and his own received him not. But as many as received him, to them gave he power to become the sons of God, even to them that believe on his name: Which were born, not of blood, nor of the will of the flesh, nor of the will of man, but of God. And ... (John 1:1-14, King James Version, as printed in The New Testament in Four Versions )	There was a man sent from God, whose name was John. He came for a witness, that he might witness of the light, that all men might believe through him. He was not the light, but came that he might bear witness of the light. That was the true light that enlightens every man coming into the world. He was in the world, and the world was made by him, and the world knew him not. He came to his own, and his own received him not. But as many as received him, to them he gave power to become children of God, even to those that believe on his name; who were born, not of blood, nor of the will of the flesh, nor of the will of man, but of God. And ... (Papyrus Bodmer II)	There was a man sent from God, whose name was John. He came for testimony, to bear witness to the light, that all might believe through him. He was not the light, but came to bear witness to the light. The true light that enlightens every man was coming into the world. He was in the world, and the world was made through him, yet the world knew him not. He came to his own home, and his own people received him not. But to all who received him, who believed in his name, he gave power to become children of God; who were born, not of blood nor of the will of the flesh nor of the will of man, but of God. And ... (John 1:1-14, Revised Standard Version, as printed in The New Testament in Four Versions )

The reader will notice that the translation of Papyrus Bodmer II, written about 200 A.D., reads essentially the same as both the King James Version and the Revised Standard Version. While we have only worked with the first page of this papyrus, Floyd V. Filson made these comments concerning the entire manuscript:

In one respect the manuscript may disappoint those who hear of its early date and unusually good state of preservation. Such people may hope to learn something sensational concerning the wording of the text, something which would discredit later manuscripts and find new ideas in the Gospel of John. In these days when advertisers think it necessary to insist that this year's line of motor cars, cigars, or toothpaste is "all new," it may sound tame to many to hear that P66 [Papyrus Bodmer II] confirms the general accuracy of the Greek text of John behind the Revised Standard Version.

This does not mean that we can learn nothing from the manuscript. It teaches much about handwriting and the making of manuscripts about 200 A.D. . . . And it teaches a great deal about the Greek text of John about 200 A.D. Two examples: the manuscript omits 5:3b, 4 and 7:53-8:11. (The Biblical Archaeologist, September 1957, pp. 59-60)

Because of recent discoveries of papyrus manuscripts Mormon writers are faced with a serious dilemma. It is almost impossible to maintain Joseph Smith's teaching that the Catholics conspired to change the Bible in light of these discoveries. Dr. Richard L. Anderson, of Brigham Young University, is undoubtedly one of the top authorities on Bible manuscripts in the Mormon Church. In a paper read at the "Fourteenth Annual Symposium on the Archaeology of the Scriptures," Dr. Anderson seemed to be warning his people against the idea that the New Testament has been drastically altered:

In studying a particular author in antiquity, the classical scholar typically works with a few principal manuscripts, together with a few more extensive fragments or portions of manuscripts. The New Testament scholar, however, faces the wonderful but impossible prospect of attempting to comprehend a text preserved in about 3,000 manuscripts. . . . Nor is sheer quantity most impressive, for the antiquity of his manuscripts should be the envy of all ancient studies. . . . This process of uncovering the major papyrus manuscripts of the New Testament has largely taken place not only in our own century, but in our own generation. . . . Almost the whole New Testament is represented in the papyrus fragments. The only two exceptions now are 1 and 2 Timothy. The real achievement, then, is that the antiquity of the text has now been pushed back almost another century. Of almost eight catalogued papyrus manuscripts and fragments, about twenty-five are dated in the third century. . . . This means that the gap now separating the time of the writing of the New Testament and the oldest preserved manuscripts is now generally no more than 200 years, and as we shall soon see in the case of the letters of Paul and two Gospels, that gap has been narrowed by at least another fifty years. To underline the extent of the findings, let us stress that some part of every book of the New Testament is represented by papyrus dated as early as the third century with the present exception of Philemon, 1 Timothy, 2 Timothy, 1, 2, and 3 John.

The oldest New Testament papyrus furnishes an impressive example of the function of discovery in authenticating New Testament writings. . . . The fragment itself contains about thirty percent of the words of John 18:31-33 on its face and the same percentage of the words of John 18:37-38 on the reverse. . . . the Rylands fragment, . . . shows that the Gospel of John had been written and also had been disseminated in Egypt before the middle of the second century. . . . a copy of the Gospel of John made not very many years after the writing of that Gospel, is a dramatic confirmation of the essential claim of Christianity, as it relates in fragmentary but clear form the question of Pilate, "Are you a king?"—and Jesus' affirmation, "To this end was I born, and for this cause came I into the world, that I should bear witness unto the truth. Every one that is of the truth heareth my voice." . . . the most impressive of the Beatty papyri are the extensive portions of what originally was a collection of Paul's letters, given the number P<sup>46</sup>. . . . As to its antiquity, P<sup>46</sup> is thought by leading papyrologists to be no later than 200 A.D. This means that the oldest collection of Paul's letters now dates from a maximum of 150 years after Paul wrote. With such an early collection, the question naturally arises how the text is different from the traditional one. Differences lie in numerous details, but the outstanding conclusion is that there is little, if any, significant change. . . .

Only within the last decade have come what are in many ways the most important papyrus discoveries yet for New Testament study. Among a series of ancient papyri acquired, the Bodmer Library in Geneva has published a third-century copy of 1 Peter, 2 Peter, and Jude, plus two second-century copies of the Gospel of John and one of Luke. . . .

Among the Bodmer Papyri, the greatest treasures are the copies of the Gospels dating back to the end of the second century. The original publication took place in 1956 of a manuscript enumerated P<sup>66</sup>. It is a practically complete copy of the Gospel of John, which the editor dates about 200 A.D. . . . the most impressive contribution of the new manuscripts of Luke and John is not the few differences, but the extent of their agreement with the life and teachings of Christ as preserved in other manuscripts.

It is easy to get lost in debate on details and fail to see the overwhelming agreement of all manuscripts to the historical record of the New Testament. . . . For a book to undergo progressive uncovering of its manuscript history and come out with so little debatable in its text is a great tribute to its essential authenticity. In tracing the history of manuscript investigation, the student finds that two great facts emerge. First, no new manuscript discovery has produced serious differences in the essential story. This survey has disclosed the leading textual controversies, and together they would be well within one percent of the text. Stated differently, all manuscripts agree on the essential correctness of 99% of the verses in the New Testament. . . . There is more reason today, then, to agree with him [Sir Frederic Kenyon] that we possess the New Testament "in substantial integrity" and to underline that "the variations of text are so entirely questions of detail, not of essential substance."

It is true that the Latter-day Saints have taken the position that the present Bible is much changed from its original form. However, greatest changes would logically have occurred in writings more remote than the New Testament. The textual history of the New Testament gives every reason to assume a fairly stable transmission of the documents we possess. . . .

Joseph Smith said that "many important points touching the salvation of man, had been taken from the Bible, or lost before it was compiled." (Documentary History of the Church, I, 245, 1832.) Major losses might occur by elimination of whole books rather than alteration of those admitted as canonical. Nor do subsequent changes have to be based on open changes of the writings. The forces of evil are more effective at changing the meaning of true terms and concepts than removing them. (Fourteenth Annual Symposium of the Archaeology of the Scriptures, Brigham Young University, 1963, pp. 52-59)

These statements will probably come as a surprise to Mormon writers who claim that the Catholics conspired to change the Bible, especially since they came from the pen of one of their most noted scholars.

Before Mormon writers accuse Christians of altering the Bible they should take a serious look at some of their own revelations published in the Doctrine and Covenants. A careful examination of these revelations shows that thousands of words were added, deleted or changed (see pages 18-26 of this book).

If the churches which have preserved the Bible these many centuries had altered it at the same rate that Joseph Smith changed his revelations, we would be lucky to have anything the same as it was originally written.

“Inspired Revision”

The Mormon writer William E. Berrett stated: “In the spring of 1831, Joseph Smith began what has come to be known as ‘The Inspired Translation of the Bible.’ It was in large part not a translation at all. It was rather a revision of the King James Bible” (The Restored Church, 1956, p. 134). Bruce R. McConkie, of the First Council of the Seventy, gives this information:

... at the command of the Lord and while acting under the spirit of revelation, the Prophet corrected, revised, altered, added to, and deleted from the King James Version of the Bible to form what is now commonly referred to as the Inspired Version of the Bible. ... the marvelous flood of light and knowledge revealed through the Inspired Version of the Bible is one of the great evidences of the divine mission of Joseph Smith. (Mormon Doctrine, Salt Lake City, 1958, pp. 351-352)

Actually, the Inspired Version of the Bible has been the source of much embarrassment for the Mormon Church leaders. It was never published during Joseph Smith’s lifetime. Joseph Smith’s wife, Emma, retained the manuscript and would not give it to Willard Richards, who was sent by Brigham Young to obtain it. We find the following in the History of the Church, vol. 7, page 260: “. . . Willard Richards called on Emma Smith, widow of the Prophet, for the new translation of the Bible: She said she did not feel disposed to give it up at present.” In 1866 Emma gave the manuscript to the Reorganized Church of Jesus Christ of Latter Day Saints and they published it.

Since Brigham Young was unable to obtain the manuscript from Emma, he tried to play down the importance of Joseph Smith’s Inspired Translation:

That made us very anxious, in the days of Joseph, to get the new translation; but the Bible is good enough just as it is, it will answer my purpose, and it used to answer it very well when I was preaching in the world. . . .

The Bible is good enough as it is, . . . (Journal of Discourses, vol. 3, p. 116)

This statement by Brigham Young seems to cast a shadow of doubt upon the revelations given by Joseph Smith, for Smith claimed that he was commanded by God to make this revision of the Scriptures. In a revelation given January 10, 1832, we read:

Now, verily I say unto you my servants, Joseph Smith, Jun., and Sidney Rigdon, saith the Lord, it is expedient to translate again;

And, inasmuch as it is practicable, to preach in the regions round about until conference; and after that it is expedient to continue the work of translation until it be finished. (Doctrine and Covenants, Sec. 73: 3-4)

The Mormon scholar Reed C. Durham, Jr., gives the following information concerning this matter:

... God had commanded him to make that Revision. The command from God was reason enough, the knowledge gained from the above revelation conditioned his soul to better understand that command.

There are eighteen sections in the Doctrine and Covenants wherein the Lord gives commands and specific instructions relating to the Revision. (“A History of Joseph Smith’s Revision of the Bible,” Ph.D. dissertation, Brigham Young University, 1965, pp. 23-24)

Booth here revealed one of the strongest points oft-times overlooked by Latter-day Saint writers about the Revision. To the early Church members this work was considered to be an important and an essential part of the restoration work, whereas, in the present day, the Revision work is too often thought to be a lesser work not essential to the work of the Lord. Booth, however, revealed the thought of the early Church, which was consistent with the early revelations upon the subject. (Ibid., p. 72)

Though it was clear to the Church that it was the Lord’s will that the Revision should be published, the lack of sufficient time and money, prevented its publication during Joseph Smith’s lifetime. (Ibid., page 83)

The Reorganized Church printed the Inspired Revision in 1867. Brigham Young was very opposed to the idea of members of his church receiving the Revision from an “apostate” organization. The Apostle Orson Pratt, on the other hand, wanted to accept it, and this caused some conflict with Brigham Young.

Although the Mormon Church has never printed the Inspired Version, the Reorganized Church’s printing is now available at the Mormon-owned Deseret Book Store, and Mormon scholars use it freely in their writings. The Mormon Apostle John A. Widtsoe made this statement:

Towards the end of the year 1830, with Sidney Rigdon as assistant, he began a somewhat full “explanation and review” of the Old and New Testaments. The work then done is a convincing evidence of Joseph’s inspiration. (Joseph Smith—Seeker After Truth, 1951, p. 139)

Joseph Smith accepted the Bible as far as it was translated correctly but felt that many errors which should be corrected had crept into the work of the copyist and translators. During the first year of the Church and almost to the end of his life, he endeavored through inspiration from on high to correct those many departures from the original text. This was not fully completed when he died, but his manuscript exists in the original and in copies, and has been published by the Reorganized Church of Jesus Christ of Latter Day Saints. It is a remarkable evidence of the prophetic power of Joseph Smith. Hundreds of changes make clear many a disputed text. (Ibid., p. 251)

Dr. Truman G. Madsen, of the Brigham Young University, made these comments concerning the Inspired Revision:

With the cooperation of the historians of both churches, the Institute of Mormon Studies at Brigham Young University, and other interested agencies, Dr. Matthews has compared, verse by verse, the Bernhisel manuscript, the two editions of the Reorganized Church, and, in several cases of variant readings, the original manuscript of the work in the library at Independence.

His study enables us to say:

1. The recent 1944 New Corrected Edition of the Reorganized Church, which book many interested Latter-day Saints have acquired, is faithful to the original manuscript and a most accurate printing. The editors have scrupulously worked to overcome normal scribal mistakes, typographical errors, and difficult notations (e.g., transposed sentences or confusing marginal notations). Matthews concludes that this edition is worthy of trust. (Improvement Era, March 1970, p. 70)

Before Joseph Fielding Smith became President of the Church he claimed that he wanted the church to publish its own edition of the Inspired Revision. In a letter to Joseph F. Merrill he stated:

Answering your inquiry in regard to “The Inspired Scriptures” I will say that several times I have suggested that we get out an edition for our own use but this has never met with very hearty approval. The last time President Grant merely said that since his predecessors had not seen fit to publish these scriptures in full that he was not inclined to do so. (Letter written by Joseph Fielding Smith, as cited in “A History of Joseph Smith’s Revision of the Bible,” by Reed Durham, pp. 271-272)

Joseph Fielding Smith became President of the Mormon Church in 1970, but the church has still not printed the Inspired Revision. Actually, we do not feel that any President of the Church will allow this book to be printed because it would tend to embarrass the church and to show that Joseph Smith was not a prophet of God.

The Mormon Church is faced with a peculiar dilemma with regard to Joseph Smith’s Inspired Revision. They cannot reject it entirely without admitting that he was a deceiver. On the other hand, if they were to print the Revision and fully endorse it, they would be faced with equally unsurmountable problems. The contents of the Inspired Revision actually contradict many of the doctrines that are now taught in the Mormon Church. Therefore, the Mormon Church can neither fully accept nor fully reject the Inspired Version of the Bible. They claim that Joseph Smith was inspired to translate, and then turn right around and use the King James Version. Joseph Fielding Smith stated:

The Church uses the King James Version of the Bible because it is the best version translated by the power of man. (Doctrines of Salvation, vol. 3, p. 191)

Since the Mormon Church leaders cannot come right out and say that Joseph Smith made mistakes in his Inspired Version, they have devised another excuse to keep from fully endorsing it. They claim that Joseph Smith never finished the translation. Joseph Fielding Smith wrote:

The revision of the Bible which was done by Joseph Smith at the command of the Lord was not a complete revision of the Bible. There are many parts of the Bible in which the Prophet did not change the meaning where it is incorrect. He revised as far as the Lord permitted him at the time, and it was his intention to do more, but because of persecution this was not accomplished. (Doctrines of Salvation, vol. 3, p. 191)

In his book, Essentials in Church History, page 139, Joseph Fielding Smith said:

In course of time the Prophet went through the Bible, topic by topic, revising as he was led by revelation. The work was never fully complete, . . .

Reed Durham gives this interesting information concerning this matter:

The Revision was incomplete because after it was finished it still contained errors and contradictions. The text of Mark 15:28 in the Revision contradicts that in John 19:14-16. The latter states that Jesus had not been crucified before the sixth hour; the passage in Mark states that his crucifixion was at the third hour. 1 Kings 4:26 relates that King Solomon had “forty thousand stalls of horses,” but 2 Chronicles 9:25 reveals that he had only “four thousand.” . . . He revised Genesis 5:32 of the Authorized Version (Revision, Genesis 7:85) in such a way as to inform the reader that Japheth was the eldest son of Noah; but he corrected Genesis 10:21 of the Authorized Version (Revision, Genesis 10:12) to reveal that Shem was the eldest son. Joseph Smith significantly altered a passage located in 2 Chronicles 18:20-22, but had apparently overlooked that same passage in 1 Kings 22:21-23. It is apparent that Joseph Smith went to great lengths to harmonize the Gospel accounts, but occasionally failed to correct apparent errors. He corrected Mark 10:11, but failed to do the same in Matthew 19:13 and Luke 18:15. These are only a few of the passages which offer evidence of the incompleteness of the Revision. (“A History of Joseph Smith’s Revision of the Bible,” BYU, 1965, pp. 128-129)

While we certainly agree that Joseph Smith’s Inspired Revision still contains “errors and contradictions,” there is evidence to show that at one time the early Mormons considered it to have been complete. In fact, in the Doctrine and Covenants, Joseph Smith was commanded to “continue the work of translation until it be finished” (Doctrine and Covenants, Sec. 73:4).

In the History of the Church, under the date of February 2, 1833, we find this statement attributed to Joseph Smith:

I completed the translation and review of the New Testament, on the 2nd of February, 1833, and sealed it up, no more to be opened till it arrived in Zion. (History of the Church, vol. 1, p. 324)

In the Church Chronology, by Andrew Jenson, we find the following under the date of February 2, 1833: “Joseph Smith, jun., completed the translation of the New Testament.” Under the date of July 2, 1833, this statement appears: “Joseph the Prophet finished the translation of the Bible.” In a letter dated July 2, 1833, signed by Joseph Smith, Sidney Rigdon, and F. G. Williams, the following statement is found:

We this day finished the translation of the scriptures, for which we return gratitude to our Heavenly Father, . . . (History of the Church, vol. 1, p. 368)

The Mormon writer Arch S. Reynolds stated:

With the above commands and the letters of the Prophet to the Saints we see that the scriptures at that time were considered finished. This is proved by revelation from the Lord commanding the printing and publishing the same as stated in another chapter . . . This shows that the Lord felt that the Bible contained his word and also was given in fulness. (“A Study of Joseph Smith’s Bible Revision,” by Arch Reynolds, typed copy, p. 17)

In the Doctrine and Covenants, Joseph Smith was commanded to print the Inspired Version:

. . . I have commanded you to organize yourselves, even to shinelah [print] my words, the fulness of my scriptures, . . . (Doctrine and Covenants 104:58)

. . . the second lot on the south shall be dedicated unto me for the building of a house unto me, for the work of the printing of the translation of my scriptures, . . . (Doctrine and Covenants 94:10)

. . . let him [William Law] from henceforth hearken to the counsel of my servant Joseph, . . . and publish the new translation of my holy word unto the inhabitants of the earth. (Doctrine and Covenants 124:89)

These commandments were never fulfilled. The Mormon writer Arch Reynolds stated:

Why the Bible was not published is still an enigma; of course the Saints were unsettled: they were persecuted, but many other works were published so why not the Holy Scriptures? . . .

The Lord gave Joseph a commandment to publish the Bible to the world, and the Lord prepared the way to accomplish this but it was not fulfilled.

The Doctrine and Covenants commands the Saints to teach the scriptures (Bible) as given of the Lord to Joseph to all men when it is received in full. The three commands to publish and teach them to all the world is strong evidence of the need of them to all the world. (“A Study of Joseph Smith’s Bible Revision,” p. 32)

Even with all the money the Mormon Church has today, they still have not fulfilled the command to publish the Inspired Version of the Bible to the world.

Perhaps the strangest thing of all concerning the Inspired Version of the Bible is the fact that Joseph Smith himself did not take it seriously. For instance, on pages 167-68 of this book we show how Joseph Smith ignored his own “inspired” renderings concerning the Godhead. The Mormon writer Arch S. Reynolds stated:

At times Joseph Smith ignored his own renderings of the Inspired Bible and quoted the King James version in his letters, sermons, etc. . . . In twenty-six different quotations to different parties in and out of the Church . . . in the first six volumes of the History of the Church, they are like the King James Bible although he had given previous varied renderings in the Inspired Bible. These passages are pertaining to all the principles of the gospel. . . . The above various renderings as given by Joseph differing in essential parts from both the King James and his previous revision show that he had grown in doctrine and had broadened in learning German, Greek, and Hebrew. (“A Study of Joseph Smith’s Bible Revision,” pp. 20, 21, 25, typed copy) The Mormon scholar Reed Durham gives this information:

There is a conspicuous lack of use of the Revision in articles printed in the Messenger and Advocate and Elders’ Journal, and Bible quotations used by Joseph Smith in his discourses indicate an almost complete ignoring of that work (“A History of Joseph Smith’s Revision of the Bible,” p. 113).

After 1833, Joseph Smith prepared and delivered many discourses and sermons which have been preserved for study. . . .

Table III records the results of the study of every Bible passage quoted by Joseph Smith in his sermons and discourses recorded in the History of the Church. . . .

The study indicates that Joseph Smith rarely used a corrected Bible passage from his Revision in any of his sermons or discourses. In fact, he only quoted the Revision three times; whereas 40 per cent of the Bible verses he did quote had been altered in his sermons to read differently from the way they were quoted in the Authorized Version—yet none of these corrections were included in his Revision. When he did quote Bible passages as they read in the Authorized Version, 38 per cent of them had already been altered and had a different reading in the Revision; all of these he apparently ignored in his sermons. (Ibid., pp. 137-139)

If Joseph Smith was inspired by God to translate the Bible, we would at least expect to find his revision of the book of Isaiah in harmony with the text of Isaiah found in the Book of Mormon. Even a superficial examination reveals that this is not the case. The Mormon writer Ariel L. Crowley states:

Logically, therefore, the revision of the English Bible by the translator of the Book of Mormon should have embodied in it the corrections necessitated by the more perfect text of the Book of Mormon quotations.

Examination of the Inspired Version to determine whether or not this was accomplished, discloses that a start was made in that direction, many passages being exactly corrected to conform with the Book of Mormon, while in others the passage is only partially corrected, and in still others not at all. . . . The instances cited are not cited as attacks upon the revision, but as indications that the revision could not at any time have been considered by the prophet to be complete, as he, more than any other, knew the nature of the Book of Mormon text of these passages, and many more similarly uncorrected at his death. (About the Book of Mormon, by Ariel L. Crowley, 1961, pp. 135, 136, 138)

The Mormon writer Reed Durham gives this interesting information:

Additional evidence that Joseph Smith's Revision was not complete is apparent from a study of the Bible (Authorized Version) passages which were quoted in the Book of Mormon. The writer has identified 618 complete Bible verses quoted in the Book of Mormon. . . .

Three additional studies comparing the altered Bible verses in the Book of Mormon with the reading of those same verses in the Revision confirm the findings of this writer: that Joseph Smith neglected to use in his Revision the majority of Bible passages which had already been divinely corrected in the Book of Mormon translation, which is a strong evidence of the Revision's incompleteness. . . .

The findings recorded in Table I identify 207 significantly altered Bible verses quoted in the Book of Mormon. If the Revision had been complete, these verses, believed to be divinely altered, should be in the Revision. . . . Table I indicates that the Revision included only 64 out of the 207 verses in its texts (31 per cent), which means that approximately 70 per cent of the significantly altered verses in the Book of Mormon were totally ignored by Joseph Smith for use in the Revision. There were 107 verses, or 52 per cent, which remained unchanged in the Revision; and 36 verses, or 17 per cent, have a reading different from both the Authorized Version and the Book of Mormon readings. If the Revision had been completed, Joseph Smith would surely have produced a greater harmony of Bible corrections in the Book of Mormon with those in his Revision of the Bible. ("A History of Joseph Smith's Revision of the Bible," pp. 129, 130, 131, 134)

In the Reorganized LDS publication, Saints' Herald, May 1, 1965, page 23, we find this statement:

Passages used in the Book of Mormon and also in the Inspired Version differ so greatly that I fear one cannot hold to a verbal accuracy in detail. In Isaiah 48 there are more than fifty differences between the Inspired Version and the Book of Mormon text.

Reed Durham states that in 1823 "an angel named Moroni appeared to Joseph Smith to reveal to him the ancient records known as the Book of Mormon. In his initial conversation with Joseph, Moroni quoted several passages of scripture which differed from those same passages in the Authorized Version. After this, Joseph Smith no doubt questioned whether other passages were in error" ("A History of Joseph Smith's Revision of the Bible," pp. 21-22). In his history, Joseph Smith made a point of the fact that the angel's quotations were different from what we find in the book of Malachi:

. . . he [the angel] quoted also the fourth or last chapter of the same prophecy, though with a little variation from the way it reads in our Bibles. Instead of quoting the first verse as it reads in our books, he quoted it thus:

For behold, the day cometh that shall burn as an oven, and all the proud, yea, and all that do wickedly shall burn as stubble; for they that come shall burn them, saith the Lord of Hosts, that it shall leave them neither root nor branch.

And again, he quoted the fifth verse thus:

Behold, I reveal unto you the priesthood, by the hand of Elijah the prophet, before the coming of the great and dreadful day of the Lord.

He also quoted the next verse differently:

And he shall plant in the hearts of the children the promises made to the fathers, and the hearts of the children shall turn to their fathers. If it were not so, the whole earth would be utterly wasted at his coming. (Pearl of Great Price, Joseph Smith—History 1:36-39)

Since Joseph Smith emphasized the fact that the quotations were different from the King James Version of the Bible, we would expect these verses to have been changed in his Inspired Revision to agree with the message of the angel. Instead, however, Joseph Smith followed the text of the King James Version in his Inspired Revision. In fact, he marked the entire book of Malachi as "Correct" (see photograph in Restoration Scriptures, p. 188). Below is the way the verses from Malachi appear in Joseph Smith's Inspired Version:

For, behold, the day cometh, that shall burn as an oven; and all the proud, yea, and all that do wickedly, shall be stubble; and the day that cometh shall burn them up, saith the Lord of hosts, that it shall leave them neither root nor branch. . . .

Behold, I will send you Elijah the prophet before the coming of the great and dreadful day of the Lord;

And he shall turn the heart of the fathers to the children, and the heart of the children to their fathers, lest I come and smite the earth with a curse. (Inspired Revision, Malachi 4:1-6)

The Mormon writer Merrill Y. Van Wagoner made this statement:

Verses one, five, and six of chapter four, as they were quoted by Moroni, differ from the usual reading found in both the King James version and Inspired Revision. . . .

Notice that Elijah was to reveal the Priesthood. This reference to the Priesthood is lacking in the present Hebrew text. Instance upon instance could be cited of mistranslations being carried over from the King James to the Inspired Revision and of errors going uncorrected. This in itself is indisputable evidence that the Prophet did not completely revise the Bible.

. . . The fact that the Prophet so seldom quoted or preached his revision is further testimony that he had not received the scriptures in full. . . .

Whenever the Prophet quoted from the Bible he either retained the words of the King James version or else flatly declared it to be wrong and then gave a rendering of the passage which differed from it. He seems to take no account of his changes in the Inspired Revision, which of course was not printed. (The Inspired Revision of the Bible, by Merrill Y. Van Wagoner, 1968 ed., pp. 48, 50, 51)

The problem concerning the verses from Malachi becomes even more serious when we find that in the Book of Mormon Jesus was supposed to have related to the Nephites “the words which the Father had given unto Malachi” (3 Nephi 24:1). An examination of these words found in 3 Nephi 25:1, 5 and 6, reveal that they are also in agreement with the King James version. LaMar Petersen points out that even one of Joseph Smith’s own revelations (Doctrine and Covenants 133:64) quotes from the King James version of Malachi rather than following the message of the angel:

Although many years had now elapsed since his encounter with the angel, Joseph, in recording the interview, remembered the exact words that Nephi used on that memorable September night of 1823, noting perhaps as he wrote them that not only did they vary from the King James Bible, but also from his own Inspired Translation of the Scriptures (which in 1842 was still a manuscript) as well as the Savior’s quotes from Malachi in the Book of Mormon, and a revelation from God to Joseph dated November 3, 1831. (Problems in Mormon Text, by La Mar Petersen, p. 4)

As if this is not confusing enough, Joseph Smith delivered a discourse on Jan. 24, 1844, in which he cited Malachi 4:5 and 6. Although he followed the wording of the King James Version, he claimed that the word “turn” should be translated “bind” or “seal”—a rendering which he does not use in either the Book of Mormon or the Inspired Revision of the Bible (see History of the Church, vol. 6, pp. 183-184). It becomes very difficult to take Joseph Smith’s work seriously when we find that he was so inconsistent.

While it took many scholars, who were authorities in Greek and Hebrew, years to complete the King James Version of the Bible, Joseph Smith began his work without any knowledge of these languages and completed it in three years. Arch S. Reynolds stated:

We know that Joseph Smith was not at that time familiar with either the Greek or Hebrew language; therefore it would be impossible for him to have translated the Bible from the original tongues. Later, however, the need of the knowledge of these languages was seen by him, so he studied those languages and became quite proficient in reading the holy scriptures in those tongues. But in 1830, he was unlearned in those ancient languages. So, technically speaking, he did not translate the scriptures in his Inspired Bible.

Brother John Henry Evans concerning the inspired translation says: “In the hands of an inspired prophet of God, however, the original renderings of passages might easily be restored, for which purpose Joseph undertook the revision.” (“A Study of Joseph Smith’s Bible Revision,” p. 61)

Although some Mormon scholars now hesitate to call Joseph Smith’s Inspired Version a translation, Robert J. Matthews points out that “Every reference to it in the Doctrine and Covenants and the History of the Church calls it a translation” (BYU Studies, Autumn 1968, p. 3).

The anti-Mormon writer R. C. Evans made this comment about Joseph’s Inspired Version:

Those who wish to read this marvellous work, the new Bible translated by Joseph Smith, by direct revelation, will discover that he has not translated a single word, that he had no manuscript of any kind, that he was an ignorant young man, is admitted. There is no evidence that he compared any originals with each other, nor could he have done so if the originals were before him. The claim is that it was all done by direct inspiration from the Almighty, but to call it a translation is the height of impudence and nonsense. . . .

Here is the secret of Smith’s power to translate. He read the Bible, thought that such and such a change should be made, either by adding a few verses, or taking away a few verses. If he had the burning sensation in his bosom it was right, and so he cut and slashed away at the Word of God to his heart’s content, and the result is the Mormon Bible. ## Weak Points

Joseph Smith not only made unnecessary changes in the Bible, but he also failed to see the places where the text of the Bible really needed correction. There is one statement in the King James Version, 1 John 5:7-8, which scholars are certain is an interpolation. In modern versions of the Bible this statement has been removed to conform with the ancient Greek manuscripts. Below is a comparison of the text in the King James Version and that found in the Revised Standard Version:

KING JAMES VERSION—1 John 5:7-8: . . . there are three that bear record in heaven, the Father, the Word, and the Holy Ghost: and these three are one. And there are three that bear witness in earth, the spirit, and the water, and the blood: and these three agree in one. (The New Testament in Four Versions, p. 766)

REVISED STANDARD VERSION—1 John 5:8: There are three witnesses, the Spirit, the water, and the blood; and these three agree. (The New Testament in Four Versions, p. 766)

In Our Bible and the Ancient Manuscripts we find this information:

The text is found in no Greek MSS, except a few of very late date in which it has been inserted from the Latin. It is a purely Latin interpolation of African origin, which, beginning as a gloss, first found its way into the text of Spain, where it appears in the Freising Fragments, and later in the Vulgate codices Cavensis and Toletanus. Thence it spread over Europe as an unequivocal Scripture “proof” of the doctrine of the Trinity. (Our Bible and the Ancient Manuscripts, p. 258)

Bruce M. Metzger gives this information:

Among the criticisms levelled at Erasmus one of the most serious appeared to be the charge of Stunica, one of the editors of Ximenes’ Complutensian Polyglot, that his text lacked part of the final chapter of 1 John, namely the Trinitarian statement concerning “the Father, the Word, and the Holy Ghost: and these three are one. And there are three that bear witness in earth” (1 John v. 7-8, King James version). Erasmus replied that he had not found any Greek manuscript containing these words, though he had in the meanwhile examined several others besides those on which he relied when first preparing his text. In an unguarded moment Erasmus promised that he would insert the Comma Johanneum, as it is called, in future editions if a single Greek manuscript could be found that contained the passage. At length such a copy was found—or was made to order! As it now appears, the Greek manuscript had probably been written in Oxford about 1520 by a Franciscan friar named Froy (or Roy), who took the disputed words from the Latin Vulgate. Erasmus stood by his promise and inserted the passage in his third edition (1522), but he indicates in a lengthy footnote his suspicions that the manuscript had been prepared expressly in order to confute him.

Among the thousands of Greek manuscripts of the New Testament examined since the time of Erasmus, only three others are known to contain this spurious passage. They are Greg. 88, a twelfth-century manuscript which has the Comma written in the margin in a seventeenth-century hand; Tisch. w 110, which is a sixteenth-century manuscript copy of the Complutensian Polyglot Greek text; and Greg. 629, dating from the fifteenth or, as Riggenbach has argued, from the latter half of the sixteenth century. The oldest known citation of the Comma is in a fourth-century Latin treatise entitled Liber apologeticus (ch. 4), attributed either to Priscillian or to his follower, Bishop Instantius of Spain. The Comma probably originated as a piece of allegorical exegesis of the three witnesses and may have been written as a marginal gloss in a Latin manuscript of 1 John, whence it was taken into the text of the Old Latin Bible during the fifth century. The passage does not appear in manuscripts of the Latin Vulgate before about A.D. 800. (The Text of the New Testament, pp. 101-102)

Even in Joseph Smith's time this portion of 1 John was rejected by many scholars. Adam Clarke stated:

Though a conscientious advocate for the sacred doctrine contained in the disputed text, and which I think expressly enough revealed in several other parts of the sacred writings, I must own the passage in question stands on a most dubious foundation. (Clarke's Commentary, vol. 6, 1824, p. 929)

An examination of the writings of Mormon scholars reveals that they also question the authenticity of this verse. Arch S. Reynolds stated:

The extraneous matter added in the Authorized Version is clearly an interpolation, since the above is wanting in every manuscript except one before the fourteenth century, and in all early versions. ("A Study of Joseph Smith's Bible Revision," p. 169)

Richard L. Anderson, of the Brigham Young University, stated:

One of the few major additions that seem apparent is 1 John 5:7. The observation is made that in addition to three earthly witnesses, the spirit, water, and blood, there are three heavenly witnesses, the Father, Son, and Holy Ghost, which are one. The text of the fifth century did not speak of the heavenly Trinity, and the fact that very few Greek manuscripts add the heavenly Trinity makes it probable that this comment was not an original part of John's letter. (Fourteenth Annual Symposium on the Archaeology of the Scriptures, BYU, 1963, p. 53)

Now, if Joseph Smith was inspired at all in his work on the Scriptures we would expect to find this interpolation removed in his "Inspired Revision." Instead, however, we find that it appears exactly as written in the King James Version:

For there are three that bear record in heaven, the Father, the Word, and the Holy Ghost; and these three are one.

And there are three that bear witness in earth, the Spirit, and the water, and the blood; and these three agree in one. (Inspired Version, by Joseph Smith, 1 John 5:7-8)

In our book, Mormon Scriptures and the Bible, we present more evidence to show that Joseph Smith relied so heavily upon the King James Version of the Bible that he failed to see some of the real textual problems found in the Bible. While this is certainly a serious defect in Joseph Smith's work, even more objectionable is the fact that he made changes which cannot be supported by any evidence. For instance, John 1:1 in the King James Version reads: "In the beginning was the Word, and the Word was with God, and the Word was God." Joseph Smith, however, changed this verse to read: "In the beginning was the gospel preached through the Son. And the gospel was the word, and the word was with the Son, and the Son was with God, and the Son was of God" (Inspired Revision, John 1:1).

To our knowledge Joseph Smith's rendition of this verse is not supported by any evidence. In fact, on page 384 of this book we show that "Papyrus Bodmer II," dated about 200 A.D., reads exactly like the King James Version.

Actually, Joseph Smith seems to bear witness against himself on the translation of John 1:1, for in a revelation given May 6, 1833, we find a quotation which supports the rendering in the King James Version: "Therefore, in the beginning the Word was, for he was the Word, even the messenger of salvation—" (Doctrine and Covenants 93:8).

The Mormon writer Robert J. Matthews made this statement:

In the main the passages revised by Joseph Smith are not supported by the three great parchment manuscripts that now enjoy popularity, nor by the thousands of papyrus manuscripts and fragments, nor by the Dead Sea Scrolls. In some few passages there is a type of similarity but these are the exception rather than the rule. ("Joseph Smith's Revision of the Bible," by Robert J. Matthews, 1968, typed copy, p. 17)

Dr. Sperry, of Brigham Young University, has made a similar admission with regard to the text of the Sermon on the Mount found in the Book of Mormon:

The divergent readings of the Nephite text are all interesting and thought-provoking, but lack the confirmation of practically all ancient Greek manuscripts of the New Testament. Nor do the ancient versions lend much support, a fact which might well be expected...

The remainder of 3 Nephi 12 differs in a marked degree from the parallel readings in Matthew 5.... We point out here also that the Greek manuscripts of the Gospels, as well as other ancient versions offer little support to the divergent Nephite readings. (The Problems of the Book of Mormon, 1964, pp. 105-106)

The best Dr. Sperry can offer his people is a hope that some day supporting evidence in the Greek manuscripts will be found:

A Latter-day Saint textual critic would be thrilled to find Greek manuscripts of the New Testament with readings like some of those in the Book of Mormon. And who knows but someday some will be found! (Book of Mormon Institute, BYU, Dec. 5, 1959, p. 7)

In his Inspired Revision Joseph Smith even indicated that the book of Genesis originally contained a prophecy concerning the Book of Mormon and that his own name was mentioned there. In the King James Version, Genesis 50:24 reads:

And Joseph said unto his brethren, I die: and God will surely visit you, and bring you out of this land unto the land which he sware to Abraham, to Isaac, and to Jacob.

In his Inspired Revision Joseph Smith added about 800 words to this verse:

And Joseph said unto his brethren, I die, and go unto my fathers; and I go down to my grave with joy. The God of my father Jacob be with you, to deliver you out of affliction in the days of your bondage; for the Lord hath visited me, and I have obtained a promise of the Lord, that out of the fruit of my loins, the Lord God will raise up a righteous branch out of my loins; and unto thee, whom my father Jacob hath named Israel, a prophet; (not the Messiah who is called Shilo;) and this prophet shall deliver my people out of Egypt in the days of thy bondage.

And it shall come to pass that they shall be scattered again; and a branch shall be broken off, and shall be carried into a far country; nevertheless they shall be remembered in the covenants of the Lord, when the Messiah cometh; for he shall be made manifest unto them in the latter days, in the Spirit of power; and shall bring them out of darkness into light; out of hidden darkness, and out of captivity unto freedom.

A seer shall the Lord my God raise up, who shall be a choice seer unto the fruit of my loins.

Thus saith the Lord God of my fathers unto me, A choice seer will I raise up out of the fruit of thy loins, and he shall be esteemed highly among the fruit of thy loins; and unto him will I give commandment that he shall do a work for the fruit of thy loins, his brethren.

And he shall bring them to the knowledge of the covenants which I have made with thy fathers; and he shall do whatsoever work I shall command him.

And I will make him great in mine eyes, for he shall do my work; and he shall be great like unto him whom I have said I would raise up unto you, to deliver my people, O house of Israel, out of the land of Egypt; for a seer will I raise up to deliver my people out of the land of Egypt; and he shall be called Moses. And by this name he shall know that he is of thy house; for he shall be nursed by the king's daughter and shall be called her son.

And again, a seer will I raise up out of the fruit of thy loins, and unto him will I give power to bring forth my word unto the seed of thy loins; and not to the bringing forth of my word only, saith the Lord, but to the convincing them of my word, which shall have already gone forth among them in the last days;

Wherefore the fruit of thy loins shall write, and the fruit of the loins of Judah shall write; and that which shall be written by the fruit of thy loins, and also that which shall be written by the fruit of the loins of Judah, shall grow together unto the confounding of false doctrines, and laying down of contentions, and establishing peace among the fruit of thy loins, and bringing them to a knowledge of their fathers in the latter days; and also to the knowledge of my covenants, saith the Lord.

And out of weakness shall he be made strong, in that day when my work shall go forth among all my people, which shall restore them, who are of the house of Israel, in the last days.

And that seer will I bless, and they that seek to destroy him shall be confounded; for this promise I give unto you; for I will remember you from generation to generation; and his name shall be called Joseph, and it shall be after the name of his father; and he shall be like unto you; for the thing which the Lord shall bring forth by his hand shall bring my people unto salvation.

And the Lord sware unto Joseph that he would preserve his seed for ever, saying, I will raise up Moses, and a rod shall be in his hand, and he shall gather together my people, and he shall lead them as a flock, and he shall smite the waters of the Red Sea with his rod.

And he shall have judgment, and shall write the word of the Lord. And he shall not speak many words, for I will write unto him my law by the finger of mine own hand. And I will make a spokesman for him, and his name shall be called Aaron.

And it shall be done unto thee in the last days also even as I have sworn. Therefore, Joseph said unto his brethren, God will surely visit you, and bring you out of this land, unto the land which he sware unto Abraham, and unto Isaac, and to Jacob. (Inspired Revision, Genesis 50:24-36)

The reader will notice that the “choice seer” was to be “called Joseph, and it shall be after the name of his father; . . .” Joseph Smith was obviously referring to himself, for his father’s name was Joseph. The Mormon Apostle Mark E. Petersen made this statement concerning the Bible:

. . . for indeed many plain and precious parts must have been removed from it. . . .

One of the most interesting parts of the Old Testament as it should have been, . . . were the predictions pertaining to Joseph Smith, through the writings of Joseph who was sold into Egypt. (As Translated Correctly, p. 64)

The Septuagint Version (a Greek version of the Old Testament, said to have been translated from the Hebrew before the time of Christ) offers no support for Joseph Smith’s Inspired Revision of Genesis 50:24, but instead is almost identical with the King James Version:

And Joseph spoke to his brethren, saying, I die, and God will surely visit you, and will bring you out of this land concerning which God sware to our fathers, Abraam, Issac, and Jacob. (Septuagint Version of the Old Testament, London, Genesis 50:24)

It is almost impossible to believe that this prophecy could have been dropped from both the Greek and Hebrew manuscripts without being detected. The Mormon writer Merrill Y. Van Wagoner admits the difficulty but suggests that such changes were planned by the “Spirit of Darkness”:

Over twelve long verses . . . are lacking in the King James version. In Egypt the Lord told Joseph . . . of the forthcoming Book of Mormon, and of the Prophet, . . . the removal was so carefully done that the break would pass unnoticed.

To summarize, many changes which were indicated by the Prophet’s inspired corrections are of such great regularity and of such a vital nature that they appear to have been made deliberately to keep the truth from man. . . . It is difficult to imagine any one individual, group, or organization having had sufficient power and influence to cause the changes to be made in both the Greek and Hebrew texts as well as in the many versions. We must lay many of those changes which we label planned to the workings of the spirit of darkness, influencing various individuals in different ages in order to thwart the purpose of the Lord. (The Inspired Revision of the Bible, pp. 33-34)

Besides adding his own name to the Bible, Joseph Smith added many of his own views. For instance, his bias against Negroes is apparent in several interpolations he made in the book of Genesis. In the Inspired Revision, Genesis 7:10, 14, and 29 we read:

And there was a blackness came upon all the children of Cainan, that they were despised among all people. . . . Enoch continued to call upon all the people, save it were the people of Cainan, to repent. . . . the seed of Cain were black, and had not place among them.

In the King James version, Genesis 9:26 reads: “And he said, Blessed be the Lord God of Shem; and Canaan shall be his servant.” In his Inspired Revision, Joseph Smith changed this to indicate that a “veil of darkness” came upon Canaan: “And he said, Blessed be the Lord God of Shem; and Canaan shall be his servant, and a veil of darkness shall cover him, that he shall be known among all men” (Inspired Revision, Genesis 9:30).

Joseph Smith’s rendition of this verse is not supported by the Septuagint version. It reads as follows: “And he said, Blessed be the Lord God of Sem, and Chanaan shall be his bond-servant” (Septuagint Version, Genesis 9:26).

One of the most unusual things concerning Joseph Smith’s Inspired Revision is that he put New Testament quotations and practices into the Old Testament. For instance, the Inspired Revision indicates that Adam was baptized and received the Holy Ghost:

And he called upon our father Adam, by his own voice, saying, I am God; I made the world, and men before they were in the flesh.

And he also said unto him, If thou wilt, turn unto me and hearken unto my voice, and believe, and repent of all thy transgressions, and be baptized, even in water, in the name of mine Only Begotten Son, who is full of grace and truth, which is Jesus Christ, the only name which shall be given under heaven, whereby salvation shall come unto the children of men; and ye shall receive the gift of the Holy Ghost, asking all things in his name, and whatsoever ye shall ask it shall be given you. . . .

And it came to pass, when the Lord had spoken with Adam our father, that Adam cried unto the Lord, and he was caught away by the Spirit of the Lord, and was carried down into the water, and was laid under the water, and was brought forth out of the water; and thus he was baptized.

And the Spirit of God descended upon him, and thus he was born of the Spirit, and became quickened in the inner man.

And he heard a voice out of heaven, saying Thou art baptized with fire and with the Holy Ghost; this is the record of the Father and the Son, from henceforth and for ever; (Inspired Revision, Genesis 6:52-53, 67-69)

Notice that these verses are filled with quotations from the New Testament. In the next chapter we find this statement:

And he gave unto me a commandment, that I should baptize in the name of the Father, and of the Son, who is full of grace and truth, and the Holy Ghost which beareth record of the Father and the Son. (Inspired Revision, Genesis 7:13)

Wesley M. Jones made this interesting observation:

These three obscure references to Enoch would within a year, set the Mormon Prophet’s fertile imagination unwinding as we shall see. He would write a new “scripture” to supplement the Book of Mormon. He would put the words of Paul into the mouths of Moses and Enoch. (Joseph Smith: Scripture-Maker, Oakland, California, 1966, p. 4)

Joseph Smith makes a large interpolation in the fourteenth chapter of Genesis. Some of the material seems to have been taken from the book of Hebrews in the New Testament. Below is a comparison of a few phrases:

KING JAMES VERSION—Hebrews 12:33-34: “Who through faith subdued kingdoms, wrought righteousness, obtained promises, stopped the mouths of lions, quenched the violence of fire, . . .

INSPIRED REVISION—Genesis 14:26: Now Melchizedek . . . wrought righteousness; and when a child he feared God, and stopped the mouths of lions, and quenched the violence of fire.

Many other cases of plagiarism from the New Testament could be cited in Joseph Smith's work on Genesis.

The Mormon leaders have always had a great deal to say about apocryphal books and claim that many books have been taken from the Bible. Since Joseph Smith was supposed to have been "inspired" in his work on the Bible, we would expect to find the missing books restored in his "Inspired Version." While he did make some interpolations in the Bible, he did not restore any of the "lost" books. Robert J. Matthews stated:

Apparently he attempted to make an amended or amplified version rather than a literal translation. Nor did he attempt to restore any of the so-called "lost books" of the Bible. (Joseph Smith's Revision of the Bible, p. 18)

Dr. Matthews refers us to the History of the Church, vol. 1, page 363. This is a letter written by Joseph Smith and his Counselors, in which was stated:

We have not found the Book of Jasher, nor any other of the lost books mentioned in the Bible as yet; nor will we obtain them at present.

Instead of restoring the "lost books" Joseph Smith actually ended up with one less book than we have in the King James Version. He claimed that "The Songs of Solomon are not inspired writings" and removed this book from his Bible (see "A History of Joseph Smith's Revision of the Bible," pp. 64-65).

When he came to the books of the Apocrypha Joseph Smith's inspiration seems to have completely failed. The Mormon writer Bruce R. McConkie gives this information concerning the Apocrypha:

Scholars and Biblical students have grouped certain apparently scriptural Old Testament writings, which they deem to be of doubtful authenticity or of a spurious nature, under the title of the Apocrypha. . . .

These apocryphal writings were never included in the Hebrew Bible, but they were in the Greek Septuagint (the Old Testament used by the early apostles) and in the Latin Vulgate. . . .

The Apocrypha was included in the King James Version of 1611, but by 1629 some English Bibles began to appear without it, and since the early part of the 19th century it has been excluded from almost all protestant Bibles. The American Bible Society, founded in 1816, has never printed the Apocrypha in its Bibles, and the British and Foreign Bible Society has excluded it from all but some pulpit Bibles since 1827.

From these dates it is apparent that controversy was still raging as to the value of the Apocrypha at the time the Prophet began his ministry. (Mormon Doctrine, by Bruce R. McConkie, 1966, p. 41)

The King James version of the Bible which Joseph Smith used in his work contained the Apocrypha, but he did not attempt to translate it. George Arbaugh stated:

Scarcely knowing what to do with the Apocrypha and wearied of such work Rigdon and Smith had God rule that they need not be translated. Whoever has the Spirit can understand them as they are and who ever does not have the Spirit "cannot be benefited" anyway. (Revelation in Mormonism, p. 78)

Joseph Smith's revelation regarding the Apocrypha is found in the Doctrine and Covenants as Section 91:

Verily, thus saith the Lord unto you concerning the Apocrypha—There are many things contained therein that are true, and it is mostly translated correctly;

There are many things contained therein that are not true, which are interpolations by the hands of men.

Verily, I say unto you, that it is not needful that the Apocrypha should be translated.

Therefore, whoso readeth it, let him understand, for the Spirit manifesteth truth;

And whoso is enlightened by the Spirit shall obtain benefit therefrom;

And whoso receiveth not by the Spirit, cannot be benefited. Therefore it is not needful that it should be translated. Amen.

Notice that the revelation states that there are "many things" contained in the Apocrypha that "are true," yet it also states that there are "many things" that are false, "which are interpolations by the hands of men." Why, then, did not Joseph Smith remove the interpolations and restore the original text of these books? Wasn't this supposed to be the purpose of his work on the Bible? The Mormon writer Bruce R. McConkie states:

. . . the Prophet felt impelled to inquire of the Lord as to the authenticity of the Apocrypha. From the answer it is clear that the books of the Apocrypha were inspired writings in the first instance, but that subsequent interpolations and changes had perverted and twisted their original contexts so as to leave them with doubtful value. (Mormon Doctrine, 1966 ed., pp. 41-42)

If the books of the Apocrypha were originally "inspired writings," as Mr. McConkie maintains, we would expect to find an inspired correction of them in Joseph Smith's Revision. The fact that he did nothing with them is certainly a mark against Joseph Smith's seership. The Mormon Apostle Mark E. Petersen states:

Probably the best of the questionable books of the pre-Christian era were included in the Catholic and some Protestant Bibles and called the Apocrypha. In our Church we do not use these books. (As Translated Correctly, 1966, p. 15)

Since Mormon writers have said a great deal about books being lost or suppressed from the Bible, they should consider the fact that Joseph Smith did not restore any of these books in his Inspired Version. The Book of Mormon and the Book of Abraham, of course, could not be considered as books lost from the Bible.

Speaking of lost books, it is interesting to note that both the Book of Mormon and the Book of Abraham are incomplete. According to Joseph Smith's own statement he lost part of the Book of Mormon, which was known as "the Book of Lehi" (see page 93 of this book). The missing pages were never found, nor have any of the Mormon leaders since Joseph Smith's time done anything towards restoring this lost book.

The Book of Abraham has only five chapters and is not considered to be a complete translation. The Mormon writer James R. Clark stated:

. . . Joseph Smith did not translate all of the record of the Book of Abraham and he did not publish all he translated. (The Story of the Pearl of Great Price, Salt Lake City, 1962, p. 113)

The Mormon leaders claim that they cannot print the Inspired Version because it "was never fully completed," but they print the Book of Abraham even though it was never completed. Joseph Smith also claimed to have the Book of Joseph as part of his collection of papyri. This collection was lost and most of it has never been recovered. The portion which has survived has been translated and found to be nothing but common Egyptian funerary texts.

Beyond the Text

Robert J. Matthews, Director of Academic Research for the Department of Seminaries and Institutes in the Mormon Church, has done a great deal of research on Joseph Smith's Inspired Version. In an article published in a recent issue of BYU Studies, Dr. Matthews admits the possibility that Joseph Smith may have added material which was never contained in the original manuscripts of the Bible:

The question might be raised whether the Prophet actually restored the text as Matthew wrote it, or whether, being the seer that he was, he went even beyond Matthew's text and recorded an event that actually took place during the delivery of the Sermon, but which Matthew did not include. This cannot be determined with certainty; . . . it is unlikely that he would 'add or take from' unless he did it by the authority of divine revelation. . . . The how of the Prophet's revision of the Sermon on the Mount calls for an expression of inspiration and could represent either a restoration of material that was once in Matthew's account of the Sermon, or could go beyond

Matthew and reiterate an event immediately behind the text which took place during the Sermon but which Matthew did not record.

Another example of direct discourse found only in the Inspired Version is Matthew 9:18-21, which tells of a confrontation between Jesus and the Pharisees and relates an exchange of information about the subject of baptism that is not recorded in the King James Version. . . . As with the earlier example the question may again be asked whether this encounter between Jesus and the Pharisees actually took place as recorded in the Inspired Version. It is either historical or it is not. If not historical then it would simply be a literary device used by the Prophet to convey a doctrine; but since the Prophet is not known to use devices of this kind in the other volumes of scripture that he produced, there is considerable reason to believe that the Prophet regarded this passage as a statement of historical fact. It seems reasonable to conclude that the Inspired Version at this point represents either a restoration of Matthew's original record or an addition of an event that took place in the ministry of Jesus which Matthew did not record but which is, nevertheless, germane to the discussion in Matthew's account. . . . It is probable that the Inspired Version is many things, and that only portions of it represent restorations while other portions may be explanations, interpolations, enlargements, clarifications and the like.

The science of textual criticism offers an objection to the Inspired Version being a restoration of the original text on the basis that the Prophet's work is not extensively supported by the many ancient manuscripts and fragments of the Bible that are now in common use by scholars. However, this may possibly be accounted for in two ways. First, no original manuscripts of the Bible are available, and even the earliest available documents are removed from the originals by many decades. Corruption of the texts could have taken place in the intervening years. Second, many of the passages in the Inspired Version may be reiterations of events which were either not recorded by the Biblical writers or were lost before the Bible was compiled, in which case even the original Bible manuscripts would not contain the information. . . .

My analysis leads me to conclude that the Inspired Version is many things. There are passages that are strongly persuasive of being restorations of the original text, or even of historical events beyond the text. There are other passages that may be inspired explanations, but not necessarily restorations. (BYU Studies, Winter, 1969, vol. IX, no. 2, pp. 170-174)

The Mormon scholar Dr. Hugh Nibley has recently stated that "Whatever translation comes by the gift and power of God is certainly no translation in the ordinary sense, . . . In every case in which he has produced a translation, Joseph Smith has made it clear that his inspiration is by no means bound to any ancient text, but is free to take wings at any time" (BYU Studies, Autumn 1969, p. 71).

Dr. Nibley and other Mormon scholars would, no doubt, like to prove that Joseph Smith carefully followed the ancient texts which he claimed to translate, but since the evidence is so clearly against such an idea, they are forced to say that Joseph Smith's inspiration went beyond the written texts. We feel that this is a very compromised position and comes very close to rejecting Joseph Smith's entire work. The question comes to mind: Where do you draw the line between "inspiration" and "imagination"?

The Reorganized LDS Church published and promoted Joseph Smith's Inspired Revision, yet their own Church Historian now appears to be on the verge of repudiating it. In his recent book, Restoration Scriptures, Richard P. Howard made these statements:

Viewing these subjects as he did from the vantage point of his own Christian background, Joseph Smith quite naturally would have tended to read into the symbolic pre-Christian language of the Old Testament certain uniquely Christian meanings. . . . For example, references to the Holy Ghost and to the Only Begotten—terms arising from the early Christian community—help one to see that even at this early stage of development the text in a sense represents Joseph Smith's studied theological commentary on the King James Version of the early Genesis chapters of the Bible.

. . . Joseph's heavy reliance on the early seventeenth century Elizabethan English language and style of the King James Version throughout this second document makes this verbal inspiration approach to the language of the early Genesis chapters of his New Translation untenable. (Restoration Scriptures, 1969, p. 77)

Whatever the case, the alterations of the King James text in Matthew 24 of the New Translation neither add materially to the content nor elucidate the theological implications of the Matthean text. (Ibid., p. 86)

It is thus unnecessary and could be misleading to appear to claim "direct" revelation in the determination of the entire text of the Inspired Version as the preface written for the 1867 edition apparently implied. (Ibid., p. 151)

"Drastically Changed"

While the Mormon Church has not printed the Inspired Revision in its entirety, a few chapters are printed in the Pearl of Great Price, under the title, Book of Moses. Joseph Smith's "inspired" revision of Matthew, chapter 24, is also included in the Pearl of Great Price. The Mormon Church accepts the Pearl of Great Price as scripture, and it is one of the four standard works of the LDS Church.

When we compare the text of the Book of Moses as it was first printed in 1851 with the way it reads today we find that some serious changes have been made. In the pages that follow we show photographs of two pages of the original 1851 edition of the Pearl of Great Price. We have marked all the changes that would have to be made in the text to bring it into conformity with the 1965 edition of the Pearl of Great Price.

James R. Harris, who was a student at the Brigham Young University, wrote a thesis entitled, "A Study of the Changes in the Contents of the Book of Moses From the Earliest Available Sources to the Current Edition." In this thesis James R. Harris made these statements:

Orson Pratt was the Editor of the first American edition of the Pearl of Great Price. This publication became available to the public about the 21st of June 1878.

The American edition was more drastically changed than any previous publication by a member of the Church. ("A Study of the Changes in the Contents of the Book of Moses From the Earliest Available Sources to the Current Edition." M.A. thesis, Brigham Young University, 1958, typed copy, p. 226)

From the standpoint of omissions and additions of words, the American Edition is the most spectacular rendition. On page forty-four of his Pearl of Great Price Commentary, Elder Milton R. Hunter makes the following statement:

The first American edition of the Pearl of Great Price was published in Salt Lake City in 1878. It agreed in practically every detail with the first edition which was published by Franklin D. Richards in England in 1851.

Brother Hunter was probably not thinking in terms of specific changes in the text or he could not have made the above statement. There were 147 words omitted in the American edition, 113 of those omissions are sustained in our current edition. Some of the words added to the American edition had impressive doctrinal implications. (Ibid., pp. 224-225)

In his study of the changes in the Doctrine and Covenants, Melvin Peterson observed that the Latter Day Saints, who lived at the time Joseph Smith received revelations, were not disturbed by changes made in the revelations. Only non-members of the Church were upset because their concept of revelation was not founded upon experience.

And it came to pass, that Noah and his sons hearkened unto the Lord, and gave heed, and they were called the sons of God. And when these men began to multiply on the face of the earth, and daughters were born unto them, that the sons of men saw that their daughters were fair, they took them wives even as they chose. And the Lord said unto Noah, the daughters of thy sons have sold themselves; for behold mine anger is kindled against the sons of men, for they will not hearken to my voice. And it came to pass, that Noah prophesied, and taught the things of God, even as it was in the beginning. And the Lord said unto Noah, my Spirit shall not always strive with man, for he shall know that all flesh shall die; yet his days shall be an hundred and twenty years; and if men do not repent, I will send in my floods upon them.

And in those days there were giants on the earth, and they sought Noah to take away his life; but the Lord was with Noah, and the power of the Lord was upon him.

Can we say the same for the average Latter Day Saint today? Would members of the Church become upset if suddenly confronted with some of the more drastic changes made in the American edition as compared with earlier publications? (Ibid., p. 237)

There is little doubt that most members of the Mormon Church today would become very disturbed “if suddenly confronted with some of the more drastic changes,” and, contrary to Melvin Petersen’s statement, the members of the Mormon Church who lived in Joseph Smith’s time were also disturbed by changes that were made in the revelations. David Whitmer, one of the three witnesses to the Book of Mormon, stated that when it became known that Joseph Smith had changed his revelations, “the result was that some of the members left the church on account of it” (An Address to All Believers in Christ, by David Whitmer, p. 61). Even though the Mormon leaders had made some “drastic changes” in the 1878 edition, in 1902 they made another revision. James R. Clark, of Brigham Young University, made this statement:

Evidently some time previous to the General Conference of the Church in April, 1902, the First Presidency of the Church had decided that the time had come to make a major revision of The Pearl of Great Price. It seems that they must have called Elder James E. Talmage of the Quorum of the Twelve Apostles in and given him the prime responsibility for the revision. (The Story of the Pearl of Great Price, 1962, pp. 207-208)

Joseph Fielding Smith, who recently became the tenth President of the Mormon Church, once tried to explain away the changes that were made in the Book of Mormon by saying that the printer who published the first edition was “unfriendly” and made errors which had to be corrected in later editions. The changes in the Pearl of Great Price cannot be explained in this way, for the first edition of the Pearl of Great Price was published by Franklin D. Richards, who was an Apostle in the Mormon Church. Certainly, he cannot be accused of being “unfriendly” to the church.

In an article published in the Brigham Young University Studies, James R. Harris made these statements:

Changes have been made in the wording of every book that is included among the standard works of the Church, but misunderstandings regarding the nature, origin, and method of change have disturbed some members of the Church in every generation since the days of the Prophet Joseph Smith. . . . Unfortunately there has also been some clouding of the issue by those who have flatly denied that there have been changes or those who have not made it clear as to what they mean by “no changes.” (Brigham Young University Studies, Summer 1968, p. 361)

The concepts given to a prophet were and are divine; the words with which he transmitted them are and were human. Latter-day Saints should be able to accept new revelation as it flows from the living prophet, and to accept clarifications of past revelation as they come through the proper channels of authority. . . .

Those, in past generations, who were disgruntled over changes that were made in the earliest renditions of the Book of Moses or in any other scripture were worshipping dead things. Their ears were not inclined toward the living God who speaks to his Church through his living prophets. . . .

A tolerance for change has never been more vital. (Ibid., p. 382)

Revising the Revisions

Although Dr. Harris admits that changes were made in the Pearl of Great Price, he feels that Joseph Smith himself made the changes in manuscripts before his death. In other words, he feels that when the Mormon leaders changed the text of the Pearl of Great Price in 1878, they were bringing it into conformity with changes Joseph Smith made in the manuscripts during his lifetime.

Richard P. Howard, Church Historian for the Reorganized Church, has recently released new information which gives some support to Dr. Harris’ idea. He shows that there were a number of different manuscripts involved in the production of the Inspired Revision and that Joseph Smith often revised his own revisions and left the manuscripts in a very confused state:

Many texts reveal that the process was not some kind of automatic verbal or visual revelatory experience on the part of Joseph Smith. He often caused a text to be written in one form and later reworded his initial revision. The manuscripts in some cases show a considerable time lapse between such reconsiderations, . . .

A considerable number of places in NT #2 show that initially Joseph Smith considered certain texts in the King James Version to be either correct or in need of slight revision, but that on latter consideration he decided to amend them further. Since the manuscript pages were already written and filled to the extent that the later corrections could not be included, the problem was solved by writing the text out on a scrap of paper and pinning or sewing it to the appropriate manuscript page. (Restoration Scriptures, pp. 93, 96)

Therefore OT #3 represents a third draft manuscript of Section 22 and Genesis 1-7, a second draft manuscript of Genesis 8-24:42a, and a first draft manuscript of the remainder of the Old Testament, although revised considerable by interpolations written in later years between the lines and on separate scraps of paper pinned to the manuscript pages. (Ibid., p. 106)

July 2, 1833, has traditionally been accepted as the conclusion date of Joseph Smith’s revision of the King James Bible. However, in the light of what has been stated earlier, this date should be thought of as the final manuscript entry made by the scribe on that date at the conclusion of the initial consideration of the Old Testament. Many of the texts written during that initial period of revision were reconsidered and subjected to further revision during the remaining eleven years of Joseph Smith’s life.

When one turns to nearly any page of OT #3 containing substantial initial revision of the King James Version, different colors of ink appear, showing later revisions, written between the lines or on separate scraps of paper and pinned to the manuscript pages. These are most likely in the handwriting of Joseph Smith, Jr. The use of darker ink, and the fact that many of them appear to be in the hand of Joseph Smith, Jr., constitute evidence that from time to time Joseph Smith reviewed his earlier work and refined revisions already made and introduced new revisions as he pressed forward toward hoped for publication. (Ibid., pp. 122-123)

. . . the manuscripts indicate rather clearly that Joseph Smith, Jr., by his continued practice of rerevising his earlier texts (occasionally as many as three times), demonstrated that he did not believe that at any of those points of rerevision he had dictated a perfectly inerrant text by the power or voice of God. . . . It is thus unnecessary and could be misleading to appear to claim “direct” revelation in the determination of the entire text of the Inspired Version as the preface written for the 1867 edition apparently implied. (Ibid., p. 151)

Richard P. Howard’s statement that Joseph Smith rerevised his earlier texts “occasionally as many as three times” is certainly a serious indictment against Joseph Smith’s work and plainly shows that his Inspired Revision is anything but “inspired.” The fact that he could not make up his mind shows that he was tampering with the Scriptures according to his own understanding rather than receiving revelation from God. The Mormon writer Truman G. Madsen admits that Joseph Smith revised his own revisions:

3. The documents provide indications of the mode of the Prophet’s procedure. He often revised a passage, later added to or amended it, and then, in a third attempt, clarified it further. Some of his corrections are inconclusive because the marginal note in the text is not specified as to exact placement. In some such cases we infer that he saw a problem but had not yet fully resolved it. (Improvement Era, March 1970, p. 70).

The reader will remember that Brigham Young condemned the Inspired Version of the Bible printed by the Reorganized Church. James R. Harris, of Brigham Young University, states: “The minutes of the School of the Prophets indicate that President Brigham Young regarded the Revision ‘spurious’ and that he brought Elder Pratt to some level of agreement with his position” (Brigham Young University Studies, Summer 1968, p. 374, n. 23). On the other hand, Brigham Young had “high regard” for the first edition of the Pearl of Great Price (see The Story of the Pearl of Great Price, by James R. Clark, p. 205). After Brigham Young’s death the church leaders completely repudiated his ideas concerning the accuracy of these books, for they changed the text of the Pearl of Great Price to agree with the Reorganized Church’s printing of the Inspired Revision. James R. Harris said that “every major change in the American edition [of the Pearl of Great Price] appears in identical form in the Inspired Revision” (“A Study of the Changes in the Contents of the Book of Moses . . .,” p. 225).

The fact that the Mormon Church leaders changed the text of the Pearl of Great Price to agree with the Inspired Version seems to indicate that they felt that the “apostate” Reorganized Church had a more accurate version of the scriptures than they did. In other words, they put more trust in the publication by the Reorganized Church than they did in the word of Brigham Young, the second Prophet, Seer and Revelator of the church.

It is rather interesting to note that Brigham Young died in 1877, and before a year had passed the new altered edition of the Pearl of Great Price was published. It is also significant that Orson Pratt, the man who had disagreed with Brigham Young over the accuracy of the Inspired Revision, was the Editor of the 1878 edition.

In his thesis, James R. Harris maintained that Orson Pratt based his revisions in the 1878 edition of the Pearl of Great Price upon a copy of the handwritten manuscripts made by John Bernhisel before these manuscripts were obtained by the Reorganized Church:

We insist that Orson Pratt used the Bernhisel manuscript as the source for the American edition for two reasons. First, he would not be willing to trust the product of an apostate church (Reorganized Church of Jesus Christ of Latter Day Saints). Second, he had access to a primary source in the Bernhisel manuscript. . . .

Joseph Fielding Smith, who recently became President of the Church, assured James R. Harris that the text of the Bernhisel manuscript was “almost identical to the first edition of the Inspired Revision as published by the Reorganized Church,” but he would not allow him to see the manuscript (see our book Mormon Scriptures and the Bible, pp. 51-52).

The Mormon scholar Reed Durham was not content to base his conclusions on Joseph Fielding Smith’s statements. He obtained access to the Bernhisel manuscript, and his research led him to the following conclusions:

In Harris’ attempt to account for the exact similarity between the Book of Moses texts in the 1878 American edition and the Holy Scriptures published in 1867, he assumed that: (1) Orson Pratt had possession of the Bernhisel Copy, (2) that the Bernhisel Copy was completed, and (3) that it was exactly the same as the original manuscript. As none of these assumptions is correct, the most correct assumption might be that Orson Pratt, knowing that the source for the Revision as published by the Reorganized Church was the original manuscript and trusting that they accurately preserved that text, corrected his text to harmonize with it. (“A History of Joseph

Smith’s Revision of the Bible,” Ph.D. dissertation, Brigham Young University, 1965, p. 176)

Since Reed Durham’s dissertation was written, James R. Harris has changed his mind somewhat concerning this matter. He still feels that there “is a strong indication that Pratt used the Bernhisel or possibly some other unknown manuscript of equal authority,” but he now admits that “It is possible that Orson Pratt had enough confidence in the Reorganite publication of the Inspired Revision that he accepted that rendition without making any effort to check it against the primary sources available to him” (Brigham Young University Studies, Summer 1968, p. 374).

However this may be, the Mormon leaders also made changes in the text of Joseph Smith’s History to bring it into conformity with the changes they had made in the Book of Moses as printed in the Pearl of Great Price. James R. Harris stated:

Extracts from the History of the Prophet were being published in the Times and Seasons. The Editor of the Periodical published the extract just as the prophet had recorded it in his history and before any revision or correction had taken place. The validity of the above statement may be questioned on the grounds that the History of the Church records the revelation just as it appears in the current (1902) edition of the Pearl of Great Price. An unwary reader might conclude that the Prophet recorded the revelation in his journal as it appears in the published History. Such a conclusion is not remotely possible since the published History rendition contains changes that were not in the text until 1902. . . . No doubt it was within the right of the Editors (with the sanction of the First Presidency) to change the phraseology in those verses of the Book of Moses that were published in the History to conform with the standard text, which would be the “completely” revised manuscript of the Inspired Revision. Unfortunately the historical value of this section of the History of the Church is greatly reduced. (“A Study of the Changes in the Contents of the Book of Moses . . .,” p. 213-214)

Before they were removed from the Doctrine and Covenants, the “Lectures on Faith” had to be changed to conform with the text found in the Pearl of Great Price (see our book Mormon Scriptures and the Bible, pp. 52-53).

Conclusion

The many changes made in the “inspired” renderings and the suppression of evidence has tended to undermine confidence in Joseph Smith’s work on the Bible. Earlier in this chapter we quoted the Mormon Apostle John A. Widtsoe as saying that the Inspired Revision is “a remarkable evidence of the prophetic power of Joseph Smith.” We cannot accept this statement, for a careful examination of his work reveals unmistakable evidence that it is merely a human production and contains many serious errors.

The Mormon writer Milton R. Hunter, of the First Council of the Seventy, made this fantastic claim concerning Joseph Smith’s works:

The Prophet Joseph Smith produced for the world three new volumes of holy scriptures, namely the Book of Mormon, the Doctrine and Covenants, and the Pearl of Great Price, and, in addition, he revised the Bible. No prophet who has ever lived has accomplished such a tremendous feat. There are only 177 pages in the Old Testament attributed to Moses, while Joseph Smith either translated through the gift and power of God or received as direct revelation from Jehovah 835. (Deseret News, Church Section, July 18, 1970, p. 14)

While we must agree that Joseph Smith produced a great deal of material which purports to be scripture, we do not feel that this material bears any evidence of divine inspiration.

The New Mormon Bible

On pages 386-87 of this book, we made this observation:

The Mormon Church is faced with a peculiar dilemma with regard to Joseph Smith's Inspired Revision. They cannot reject it entirely without admitting that he was a deceiver. On the other hand, if they were to print the Revision and fully endorse it, they would be faced with equally unsurmountable problems. The contents of the Inspired Revision actually contradict many of the doctrines that are now taught in the Mormon Church. Therefore, the Mormon Church can neither fully accept nor fully reject the Inspired Version of the Bible. They claim that Joseph Smith was inspired to translate, and then turn right around and use the King James Version. Joseph Fielding Smith stated: "The Church uses the King James Version of the Bible because it is the best version translated by the power of man."

We also pointed out that before he became President of the Church Joseph Fielding Smith wanted the church to publish the Inspired Revision. Smith served as President for over two years, but did nothing towards bringing the Inspired Revision into print. In The Changing World of Mormonism, page 385, we gave this information:

On November 20, 1974, the Mormon church obtained microfilm copies of the original manuscripts of the "inspired revision" from the Reorganized Church. We do not feel, however, that any president of the church will allow this book to be printed because it would tend to embarrass the church and to show that Joseph Smith was not a prophet of God.

In 1979 it was rumored that the church was about to print the Inspired Version. As it turned out, however, the new Bible is only a printing of the King James text with "Excerpts from the Prophet Joseph Smith's translation . . . Short excerpts are provided in the footnotes; longer excerpts are provided in the Appendix."

Two things should be noted about this Bible: One, the portions taken from Joseph Smith's "translation" have not been canonized. The shorter excerpts are merely footnotes to the King James text and the larger ones are separated from the Bible text by 793 pages of material—i.e., a "Topical Guide" and a "Bible Dictionary." Two, the book only contains "excerpts" from Smith's translation. In other words, the Mormon leaders have included only the portions which they deemed advisable. For instance, Joseph Smith's interpolation that Canaan would be made black (" . . . a veil of darkness shall cover him, that, he shall be known among all men") is included in a footnote to Genesis 9:26 (page 14), but his revision of Matthew 5:40-41 is neither found in the footnotes nor in the longer excerpts. Joseph Smith had tried to destroy Jesus' teaching about going the extra mile in his Inspired Revision, but in doing this he had contradicted the translation he gave in the Book of Mormon (3 Nephi 12:40-41) which reads the same as the King James Version.

In any case, the fact that the Mormon leaders would print only "extracts" from Joseph Smith's translation and still use the King James Version leads a person to believe they lack confidence in the work.

The Nag Hammadi Texts

Some members of the Mormon Church continue to make extravagant claims concerning new discoveries which are supposed to support Mormon scriptures. One man, for instance, wrote a letter to the Department of Anthropology and Archaeology at Brigham Young University in which he stated:

I have been talking about the LDS church with some of its members at the Institute at PSU for the past few weeks, and several times mention has been made of documents having been discovered, apparently near the Dead Sea, that support some of Mormonism's key doctrines.

On November 16, 1978, Professor Ross T. Christensen was very forthright in his answer:

I know of no such discovery as the one to which you refer. Nor do I know of any manuscript discovery ever made in the vicinity of the Dead Sea Scrolls which throws much light upon key doctrines of the Latter-day Saint faith.

On pages 21-22 of his pamphlet Jerald and Sandra Tanner's Distorted View of Mormonism, the anonymous Mormon historian ("Dr. Clandestine") claimed that the LDS temple ceremonies "bear striking resemblances to the format of salvation ordinances described in the Gospel of Philip which was discovered at Nag Hammadi, Egypt in recent decades: 'For this one is no longer a christian but a Christ. The Lord did everything in a mystery, a baptism and a chrism [anointing with consecrated oil] and a eucharist and a redemption and a bride-chamber.'"

We feel that Dr. Clandestine and other Mormon scholars who use the Nag Hammadi documents to try to show that early Christians had doctrines similar to Mormonism are making a serious mistake. To begin with, the Nag Hammadi texts came from a group known as Gnostics. Charles F. Pfeifer says that "Gnosticism appropriated Christian terminology to express its essentially unChristian philosophy" (The Biblical World, p. 410). Philip Schaff makes these comments about Gnosticism:

More important and more widely spread in the second period was the paganizing heresy, known by the name of Gnosticism . . . It is a one-sided intellectualism on a dualistic heathen basis. It rests on an over-valuation of knowledge of gnosis, and a depreciation of faith or pistis. The Gnostics . . . fancied themselves the sole possessors of an esoteric, philosophical religion, which made them genuine, spiritual men, and looked down with contempt upon the mere men of the soul and of the body. . . . They, moreover, adulterated Christianity with sundry elements entirely foreign, and thus quite obscured the true essence of the gospel. . . .

As to its substance, Gnosticism is chiefly of heathen descent. It is a peculiar translation or transfusion of heathen philosophy and religion into Christianity. . . .

Gnosticism is, therefore, the grandest and most comprehensive form of speculative religious syncretism known to history. It consists of Oriental mysticism, Greek philosophy, Alexandrian, Philonic, and Cabbalistic Judaism, and Christian ideas of salvation, not merely mechanically compiled, but, as it were, chemically combined. . . . They gathered from the whole field of ancient mythology, astronomy, physics, and magic, everything which could serve in any way to support their fancies. (History of the Christian Church, vol. 2, pp. 199-202)

Speaking of one of the Nag Hammadi texts known as "On the Origin of the World," Hans-Gebhard Bethge and Orval S. Wintermute claim that "the varieties of Jewish thought, Manichaeic motifs, Christian ideas, Greek or Hellenistic philosophical and mythological concepts, magical and astrological themes, and elements of Egyptian lore together suggest that Alexandria may have been the place where the original Greek text was composed" (The Nag Hammadi Library, San Francisco, 1977, p. 161).

The pagan influence in "On the Origin of the World" is evident from the following extracts:

Out of the first blood Eros appeared, being androgynous. His masculine nature is Himeros, because he is fire from the light. His feminine nature which is with him is a blood-Soul, (and) is derived from the substance of Pronoia. He is very handsome in his beauty, having more loveliness than all the creatures of Chaos. Then when all of the gods and their angels saw Eros, they became enamored of him. (Ibid., p. 168)

Now the birth of the instructor occurred in this way. When Sophia cast a drop <of> light, it floated on the water. Immediately the man appeared, being androgynous. . . . An androgynous man was begotten, one whom the Greeks call “Hermaphrodites.” (Ibid., p. 171)

The same work talks of the “Phoenix,” a mythical bird which was supposed to live five or six hundred years. After death it was supposed to rise and live for another cycle of years. Besides being filled with pagan mythology, some of the Nag Hammadi documents disclose the God of the Old Testament as being evil and stupid. John Dart gives this information about the Nag Hammadi texts:

The Garden of Eden story is radically rewritten in three Nag Hammadi texts. The serpent tends to emerge heroically in the Gnostic rendition of Paradise, and the Creator God is portrayed as the ignorant ruler of a despicable world. (The Laughing Savior, New York, 1976, p. 65)

Adam predicted that the wrathful Creator God would seek to destroy Seth’s seed, the men of “gnosis,” with a flood. Noah and his household would be saved to repopulate the earth and serve the evil deity, but angels would rescue the Gnostics by taking them aloft. . . .

Fire, sulphur, and asphalt would be cast down on the Gnostics—allusions to punishment meted out to the biblical Sodom and Gomorrah. (The Gnostic reversal at work again: “Sodom and Gomorrah were really inhabited by the righteous.) The angels... would descend to save them from the fire. . . . (Ibid., pp. 82-83)

...in The Second Treatise of the Great Seth . . . the Creator God bellows: “I am God, and there is not other beside me.” The narrator, later identified with Jesus Christ, reacts: “I laughed in joy when I examined his empty glory.” (Ibid., p. 110)

In the Nag Hammadi text “The Second Treatise of the Great Seth,” Adam, Abraham, Isaac, Jacob and even God Himself are called laughingstocks:

And then a voice—of the Cosmocrator—came to the angels: “I am God and there is no other beside me.” But I laughed joyfully when I examined his empty glory. But he went on to say, “Who is man?” And the entire host of his angels who had seen Adam and his dwelling were laughing at his smallness. . . .

For Adam was a laughingstock, since he was made a counterfeit . . . And Abraham and Isaac and Jacob were a laughingstock, since they, the counterfeit fathers, were given a name by the Hebdomad, as if he had become a stronger than I . . . the Archon was a laughingstock because he said, “I am God, and there is none greater than I. I alone am the Father, the Lord and there is no other beside me. I am a jealous God, who brings the sins of the fathers upon the children for three and four generations.” As if he had become stronger than I and my brothers! . . . he was in an empty glory. . . . he was vain in an empty glory . . . he was a laughingstock . . . (The Nag Hammadi Library, pp. 331, 335-336)

In “The Testimony of Truth,” another Nag Hammadi text, we find the following:

But of what sort is this God? First [he] envied Adam that he should eat from the tree of knowledge. . . . Surely he has shown himself to be a malicious envier. And what kind of God is this? (Ibid., p. 412)

In “The Apocryphon of John,” we read that God “is impious in his madness which is in him . . . he is ignorant of his strength, . . .” (Ibid., p. 105). On the following page God is called “the arrogant one.” In the “Hypostasis of the Archons,” the God of Israel is accused of sin and blasphemy:

Their chief is blind; [because of his] Power and his ignorance [and his] arrogance he said, with his [Power], “It is I who am God: there is none [apart from me].”

When he said this he sinned . . . then there was a voice that came forth from Incorruptibility, saying, “You are mistaken, Samael”—which is, “god of the blind.”

His thoughts became blind. And, having expelled his Power—that is, the blasphemy he had spoken—. . . (Ibid., p. 153)

Since the Nag Hammadi texts are filled with pagan mythology and attack the God of Israel, it is hard to understand why Mormon scholars put much stock in them. Though some of the Gnostic writings may have been originally composed in the 2nd century, the copies found near the Egyptian town of Nag Hammadi were probably written in the 4th century.

The Mormon publication Brigham Young University Today, March 1976, page 8, claims that the Nag Hammadi documents contain some “authentic traditions and teachings,” but it admits that the texts are of doubtful authorship:

The origins of the texts are difficult and often impossible to determine, and it is doubtful they were written by the men whose names they bear—Adam, Seth, Melchizedek, John, James, Paul and Peter..

The same article says that “Two BYU scriptionists . . . have become intrigued by the 4th Century Gnostic papyri which contain striking parallels with Mormon thought and theology.”

Since the Nag Hammadi documents are undoubtedly forgeries, it is hard to understand why Mormon scholars would be “intrigued” by them. We feel that the parallels between the Nag Hammadi texts and Mormonism only tend to show pagan influences on Mormonism. After all, Greek mythology and philosophy were well known in Joseph Smith’s day, and that they had an influence on Joseph Smith as well as the Gnostics should come as no surprise.

Although the Nag Hammadi documents were discovered in 1945 or 1946, they were not made available in their entirety in English translation until 1977. One of the documents, “The Gospel of Thomas,” was published in 1960. We were able to read this purported gospel at that time, but did not find anything in it that supported Mormonism. BYU Studies, Winter 1975, printed a short work entitled, “The Apocalypse of Peter.” Some of the other documents have been printed at various times, but until 1977 the Nag Hammadi texts were not available in their entirety in any modern language. One Mormon scholar took advantage of the unavailability of translations of the texts to make some fantastic claims. Now that translations of the documents have been published in The Nag Hammadi Library, we are able to see how utterly ridiculous these claims were. For instance, he maintained that the sacramental prayer in the Book of Mormon was just like one found in the Nag Hammadi texts. While there is a prayer (“On The Eucharist A) found in “A Valentinian Exposition,” it certainly is not identical to that found in the Book of Mormon (see The Nag Hammadi Library, p. 442).

Now that the texts are available in English, Mormon apologists will have to be more careful in their claims about the Nag Hammadi documents. Our examination of them leads us to conclude that they furnish no new evidence for Mormonism.

25. Blood Atonement

In a manuscript written in 1839, Reed Peck said that the Mormon Prophet Joseph Smith claimed that he had a revelation in which the Apostle Peter told him that he had killed Judas: “He [Joseph Smith] talked of dissenters and cited us to the case of Judas, saying that Peter told him in a conversation a few days ago that himself hung Judas for betraying Christ . . .” (The Reed Peck Manuscript, p. 13).

Although this doctrine was kept secret at first, when the Mormons were settled in Utah they began to teach it openly. On December 13, 1857, Heber C. Kimball, a member of the First Presidency of the Mormon Church, made this statement in the Tabernacle in Salt Lake City:

Judas lost that saving principle, and they took him and killed him. It is said in the Bible that his bowels gushed out; but they actually kicked him until his bowels came out.

“I will suffer my bowels to be taken out before I will forfeit the covenant I have made with Him and my brethren.” Do you understand me? Judas was like salt that had lost its saving principles—good for nothing but to be cast out and trodden under foot of men. . . . It is so with you, ye Elders of Israel, when you forfeit your covenants. . . . I know the day is right at hand when men will forfeit their Priesthood and turn against us and against the covenants they have made, and they will be destroyed as Judas was. (Journal of Discourses, vol. 6, pp. 125-126)

Joseph Smith’s brother William gave this testimony in court:

I left Nauvoo in 1845 because my life was in danger if I remained there, because of my objections and protests against the doctrine of blood atonement and other new doctrines that were brought into the church. (Temple Lot Case, page 98)

Although William Smith’s testimony was not given until 1893, he did publish a “Proclamation” in 1845 in which he told that Brigham Young was teaching Blood Atonement—i.e., that a man might be killed to save his soul:

. . . I heard Brigham Young say, on the stand, that he was glad that Alvine Hodge was killed, . . . And he said further that it was far better for Alvine Hodge to die, than to live any longer in sin, for that he might now possibly be redeemed in the eternal world. That his murderers had done even a deed of charity for that such a man deserved to die. (Warsaw Signal, October 29, 1845)

At first Brigham Young denied that such a doctrine was taught (see History of the Church, vol. 7, pp. 366-367), but when the Mormons arrived in Utah, the doctrine was openly taught. Brigham Young, the second President of the Church, made these statements in a sermon:

There are sins that men commit for which they cannot receive forgiveness in this world, or in that which is to come, and if they had their eyes open to see their true condition, they would be perfectly willing to have their blood spilt upon the ground, that the smoke thereof might ascend to heaven as an offering for their sins; and the smoking incense would atone for their sins, whereas, if such is not the case, they will stick to them and remain upon them in the spirit world.

I know, when you hear my brethren telling about cutting people off from the earth, that you consider it is strong doctrine, but it is to save them, not to destroy them. . . .

And furthermore, I know that there are transgressors, who, if they knew themselves, and the only condition upon which they can obtain forgiveness, would beg of their brethren to shed their blood, that the smoke thereof might ascend to God as an offering to appease the wrath that is kindled against them, and that the law might have its course. I will say further; I have had men come to me and offer their lives to atone for their sins.

It is true that the blood of the Son of God was shed for sins through the fall and those committed by men, yet men can commit sins which it can never remit. As it was in ancient days, so it is in our day; and though the principles are taught publicly from this stand, still the people do not understand them; yet the law is precisely the same. There are sins that can be atoned for by an offering upon an altar, as in ancient days; and there are sins that the blood of a lamb, of a calf, or of turtle doves, cannot remit, but they must be atoned for by the blood of the man. That is the reason why men talk to you as they do from this stand; they understand the doctrine and throw out a few words about it. You have been taught that doctrine, but you do not understand it. (Sermon by Brigham Young, Journal of Discourses, vol. 4, pp. 53-54; also published in the Deseret News, 1856, p. 235)

A photograph of this sermon as it was published in the Deseret News appears on the next page. It should be remembered that the Deseret News was the official organ of the Mormon Church. After being published in the Deseret News it was reprinted in the Journal of Discourses, which was also a Mormon publication. Therefore, there can be no doubt that this was a doctrine of the church.

Capital Crimes

Dr. Hugh Nibley accuses Kelly and Birney of quoting J. M. Grant, who was a member of the First Presidency, out of context in their book Holy Murder:

The prize is another by Grant: “I say there are men and women here that I would advise to go to the President immediately and ask him to appoint a committee to attend to their case, and then let a place be selected and let that committee shed their blood.” (KB, 134; JD V. 49). That sounds ghastly, but if we take the passage in its context it becomes immediately apparent that fire-eating Mr. Grant is simply advocating capital punishment for capital crimes. In the sentences preceding and following the quotation (they are omitted of course by our researchers) Grant makes it perfectly clear that the parties he refers to are those who have committed capital crimes, crimes so great “they cannot be forgiven through baptism.” (Sounding Brass, by Hugh Nibley, Salt Lake City, 1963, p. 231)

In making this statement, Dr. Nibley is being very deceitful. Kelly and Birney have not taken this reference cannot be suffered any longer, a separation must take place; you must part with your sins, or the righteous must be separated from the ungodly. I will now give way, and call upon others of the brethren to speak to you: Amen.

REMARKS

By President J. M. Grant, Bowers, Sunday Morning, Sept. 21, 1856.

[REPORTED BY J. V. LONG.]

I feel that the remarks which we have heard this morning are true, and they apply directly to you who are now present, and to the inhabitants of this city and of the Territory generally, and we do not excuse any of you.

If the arrows of the Almighty ought to be thrown at you we want to do it, and to make you feel and realize that we mean you. And although we talk of the old clay's being ground in the mill, we do not mean it to apply to some other place, for we have enough here who have been dried ever since their baptism, and many of them are cracked and spotted.

Some have received the priesthood and a knowledge of the things of God, and still they dishonor the cause of truth, commit adultery and every other abomination beneath the heavens, and then meet you here or in the street and deny it.

These are the abominable characters that we have in our midst, and they will seek outwards that peep, and to star-gazers, and soothsayers, because they have no faith in the holy priesthood, and then when they meet us they want to be called saints.

The same characters will get drunk and wallow in the mire and filth, and yet they call themselves saints and seem to glory in their conduct, and they pride themselves in their greatness and in their abominations.

They are the old and aged sinners, and are almost if not altogether—past improvement, and are full of hell, and my prayer is that God's indignation may rest upon them, and that he will erase them from the crown of their heads to the noise of their feet.

I say that there are men and women that I would advise to go to the President immediately, and ask him to appoint a committee to attend to their cases, and then let a place be selected, and let that committee send their blood.

We have those amongst us that are full of all manner of abominations, those who need to have their blood shed, for water will not do, their sins are of too deep a dye.

You may think that I am not teaching you Bible doctrine, but what says the apostle Paul? I would ask how many covenant breakers there are in this city and in this kingdom. I believe there are a great many; and if they are covenant-breakers we need a place designated, where we can shed their blood.

Talk about old clay; I would rather have clay from a new bank than some that we have had clogging the wheels for the last nineteen years. They are a perfect nuisance, and I want them cut off, and the sooner it is done the better.

We have men who are incessantly finding fault, who get up little party spirits and criticize the conduct of men of God. They will find fault with this, that, and the other, and nothing is right for them, because they are full of all kinds of ill and wickedness.

And we have women who look like any thing but the celestial law of God; and if they could break asunder the cable of the Church of Christ, there is scarcely a mother in Israel but would do it this day. And they talk it to their husbands, to their daughters, and to their neighbors, and say they have not seen a week's happiness since they became acquainted with that law; or since their husbands took a second wife. They want to break up the church of God, and to break it from their husbands and from their family connections.

Then again there are men that are used as tools by their wives, and they are just a little better in appearance and in their habits than a little black boy. They live in filth and nastiness, they eat it and drink it, and they are filthy all over.

We have Elders and High Priests that are precisely in this predicament; and yet they are wishing for more of the Holy Ghost, they wish to have it in larger doses. They want more revelation, but I tell you that you now have more than you live up to, more than you practice and make use of.

If I hurt your feelings, let them be hurt. And if any of you ask, "do I mean you?" I answer, yes. If any woman asks, "do I mean her?" I answer, yes. And I want you to understand that I am throwing the arrows of God Almighty among Israel; I do not excuse any.

I am speaking to you in the name of Israel's God, and you need to be baptized, and washed clean from your sins, from your backslidings, from your apostasies, from your filthiness, from your lying, from your swearing, from your lusts, and from every thing that is evil before the God of Israel.

We have been trying long enough with this people, who I go in for letting the sword of the Almighty be unsheathed, not only in word but in deed.

I go in for letting the wrath of the Almighty burn up the dross and the filth; and if the people will not glorify the Lord by sanctifying themselves, let the wrath of the Almighty God burn against them, and the wrath of Joseph and of Brigham an heaven.

There is nothing to be humble and doing right foolish, and wicked; just tell you that if an man Great Salt Lake your present state, he would not consider you worthy of his company.

You have got to cleanse yourselves from corruption, before you are fit for the society of those beings. You may hear of people in other cities being baptized and renewing their covenants, but they are not sinners above all others; and except the inhabitants of G. S. L. City repent and do their first works they shall all likewise perish, and the wrath of God will be upon them and round about them.

You can scarcely find a place in this city that is not full of filth and abominations; and if you would search them out, they would easily be weighed in the balances, and you would then find that they do not serve their God and purify their bodies.

But the course they are taking leads them to corrupt themselves, the soil, the waters, and the mountains, and they defile everything around them.

Brethren and sisters, we want you to repent and forsake your sins. And you who have committed sins that cannot be forgiven through baptism, let your blood be shed, and let the smoke ascend, that the incense thereof may come up before God as an atonement for your sins, and that the sinners in Zion may be afraid.

These are my feelings, and may God fulfill them. And my wishes are that He will grant the desires of my brethren, that Zion may be purified, and the wicked purged out of her, until God shall say I will bless the rest until he shall say I will bless your flocks, your herds, your little ones, your houses, your lands, and all that you possess; and you shall be my people and I will come and take up my abode with you, and I will bless all those that do right; which may he grant, in the name of Jesus. Amen.

DISCOURSE

By President Brigham Young, Bowers, Sunday Afternoon, Sept. 21, 1856.

[REPORTED BY G. D. WATT.]

Before I sit down I shall offer a proposition to the congregation; though I will first say a few words concerning our religion, our circumstances, and the circumstances of the brethren and people generally, that inhabit these valleys, but more especially of those that have the privilege of assembling at this Tabernacle from Sabbath to Sabbath.

If they will rightly consider their situation, they will believe for themselves that they are in a place, in a country, where they can be saints as well as in any other place there is on the face of this earth.

There are but a few complaints from those who lose the spirit of their religion, who turn away from us. They think that this people will suffer here. I will give you my feelings upon the subject.

There is not a hardship, there is not a disappointment, there is not a trial, there is not a hard time, that comes upon this people in this place, but that I am more thankful for than any other full granary.

We have been hunting, during the past twenty six years, for a place where we could raise saints, not merely wheat, nor corn. Comparatively I care but little about the wheat and corn, though a little is very useful.

It is true that this is a good country for fruits of some kind; as good peaches as can be raised on any soil this soil produces, and also grapes, apples, and so on. But what of all that? The man, or the woman, that mainly looks after the fruit, after the luxuries of life, good food, fine apparel, and at the same time professes to be a Latter Day Saint, if he does not get the spirit out of his heart it will obtain a perfect victory over him; whereas he is required to obtain a victory over his lusts and over his unwise feelings; and if he does not get rid of that spirit, the quicker he starts out for the States, or west for California, the better.

If we could not raise any fruit, if we could not raise an ear of corn, I should be quite thankful if we could raise the oats and the peas, and make the oat bread and the pea broth, and live on them from year to year.

I say halibut, this is a first-rate place to raise saints. Let the people complain of hard times, complain of their poverty, their poor fare and their hard labor; that would be better, that we have to go far for it, and have to toil so hard to raise our grain; that we live our stock upon the prairie, that a cow is gone today, and an ox was lost last year; that if we turn out our cattle they will stray off; and we shall see them no more.

How would you feel were you in a country where you could not raise stock, except you provided comfortable shelter and an abundance of fodder for them all?

In the country where I was brought up, could you turn out a calf in the fall and have it live through the winter? There never was such a thing done, to my knowledge; and no man ever thought of such a thing as wintering a calf, unless he had a shelter prepared for it almost as warm as the rooms for the children.

I mention these things for the benefit of those here to-day, if any, who do not really know whether they wish to stay, or whether we are right or wrong, or whether 'Mormonism' is true or false.

I would advise those persons to repent of their sins forthwith, and to try with all their might to get the Spirit of their religion upon glory, of faith and thanksgiving; this is the case with all who are full of good works.

We need a reformation in the midst of this people; we need a thorough reform, for I know that very many are in a dozy condition with regard to their religion; I know this as well as I should if you were now to doze and go to sleep before my eyes.

You are the spirit of the gospel, is there any cause for it? No, only that which there is in the world. You have the weakness of human nature to contend with, and you suffer that weakness to decoy you away from the truth, to the side of the adversary; but now it is time to awake, before the time of burning.

Whether the time of burning will be this week, or the next, or next year, I do not know that I care; and I do not know that I would ask, if I was sure the Lord would tell me. But I tell you that which I do know, and that is sufficient.

I do know that the trying day will soon come to you and to me; and ere long we will have to lay down these tabernacles and go into the world, and I do know that as we lie down so judgment will find us, and that is scriptural; "as the tree falls so it shall lie," or, in other words, as death leaves us so judgment will find us.

I will explain how judgment will be laid to the line. If we all live to the age of man the day thereof will soon be here, and that will burn enough, without any thing else; and the present is a day of trial, enough for you and me.

We have got to be rightly prepared to go into the spirit world, in order to become kings. That is, so far as the power of satan is concerned, you and I have got to be free from his power, but we cannot be while we are in the flesh.

Here we shall be perplexed and louted by him; but when we go into the spirit world, there we are masters over the power of satan, and he cannot afflict us any more, and this is enough for me to know.

Whether the world is going to be burned up within a year, or within a thousand years, does not matter a great to you and me. We have the words of eternal life, we have the privilege of obtaining glory, immortality, and eternal lives, now will you obtain these blessings?

Will you spend your lives to obtain a seat in the kingdom of God, or will you lie down and sleep, and go down to hell?

I want all the people to say what they will do, and I know that God wishes all his servants, all his faithful sons and daughters, the men and the women that inhabit this city, to repent of their wickedness, or we will cut them off.

I could give you a logical reason for all the transgressions in this world, for all that are committed in this probationary state, and especially for those committed by men. There are sins that men commit for which they cannot receive forgiveness in this world, or in that which is to come, and if they had their eyes open to see their true condition, they would be perfectly willing to have their blood spilt upon the ground, that the smoke thereof might ascend to heaven as an offering for their sins; and the smoking incense would atone for their sins, whereas, if such is not the case, they will stick to them and remain upon them in the spirit world.

I know, when you hear my brethren telling about cutting people off from the earth, that you consider it a strong doctrine, but it is to save them, not to destroy them.

Of all the children of Israel that started to go through the wilderness, none inherited the land which had been promised, except Caleb and Joshua, and what was the reason? It was because of their rebellion and wickedness; and because the Lord had promised Abraham that he would save his seed.

They had to travel to and fro to every point of the compass, and were wasted away, because God was determined to save their spirits. But they could not enter into his rest in the flesh, because of their transgressions, consequently he destroyed them in the wilderness.

I do know that there are sins committed, of such a nature that if the people did understand the doctrine of salvation, they would tremble because they know that God would atone for the sins that there are transgressors, who, if they knew themselves and the only condition upon which they can obtain forgiveness would beg of their brethren to shed their blood, that the smoke thereof might ascend to God as an offering to suppress the wrath that is kindled against them, and that the law might have its course. I will say further; I know that God wishes to me and other of his servants to atone for their sins.

It is true that the blood of the Son of God was shed for sins through the fall and those committed by men, yet men can commit sins which it can never remit. As it was in ancient days, so it is in our day; and though the principles are taught publicly from this stand, still the people do not understand them, yet the law is almost for an offering upon an altar as in ancient days; and there are sins that the blood of a lamb, of a calf, or of turtle doves, cannot remit, but they must be atoned for by the blood of the man. That is the reason why men talk to you as they do from this stand; they understand the doctrine and throw out a few words about it. You have been taught that doctrine, but you do not understand it. to be brought with God. What a delight it was to hear br. Joseph talk upon the great principles of eternity; he would bring them down to the capacity of a child, he would unite heaven with earth, and this is the beauty of our religion.

When it was mentioned this morning about seeing God, about what kind of a being he was, and how we could see and measurably understand him, I thought I would tell you what I would see our heavenly Father we should see a being similar to our earthly parent, with this difference, our father in heaven is exalted and glorified. He has received his throne, his principality and powers, and he sits as a governor, as a monarch, and overrules kingdoms, thrones, and dominions that have been bequeathed to him, and such as we anticipate receiving. While he was in the flesh, as we are, he was as we are. But it is now written of him that our God is as a consuming fire, that he dwells in everlasting burnings, and this is why sin cannot be where he is.

These are principles that will endure through all eternity, and no fire can obliterate them from existence. They are those principles that are pure, and fire is a most typical one of it; as the glory and purity of the Gods, and of all perfect beings. God is the Father of our spirit; he begot them and has sent them here to receive tabernacles, and to prove whether we will honor them. If we do, then our tabernacles will be exalted; but if we do not, we shall be destroyed; one of the two—dissolution or life. The second death will decompose all tabernacles ever which it gains the ascendancy; and this is the nature of the second death, the tabernacles go back to their native element.

We are of the earth, earthly; and our Father is heavenly and pure. But we will be glorified and purified, if we obey our brethren and the teachings which are given.

When you see celestial beings you will see men and women, but you will see those beings clothed upon with robes of celestial purity. We cannot bear the presence of our Father now; and we are placed at a distance to prove whether we will honor these tabernacles, whether we will be obedient and prepare ourselves to live in the glory of the light, privileges and blessings of celestial beings. We could not have the glory and the light without first knowing the contrast. Do you comprehend that we could have no exaltation, without first learning by contrast?

When you are prepared to see our Father, you will see a being with whom you have long been acquainted, and he will receive you into his arms, and you will be ready to fall into his embrace and kiss him, as you would your fathers and friends that have been dead for a score of years, you will be so glad and joyful, you would not rejoice? When you are qualified to be purified, so that you can endure the glory of eternity, so that you can see your Father and your friends who have gone behind the veil, you will fall upon their necks and kiss them, as we do an earthly friend that has been long absent from us, and that we have been anxiously desiring to see. This is the people that are and will be permitted to enjoy the society of those happy and exalted spirits.

Now for my proposition; it is more particularly for my sisters, as it is frequently happening that women say that they are unhappy. Men will say, "My wife, though a most excellent woman, has not seen a happy day since I took my second wife;" "No, not a happy day for a happy day," says one; and another has not seen a happy day for five years; and it is said that women are tied down and abused; that they are unloved and have not the liberty they ought to have; that many of them are wading through a perfect flood of tears, because of the conduct of some men, together with their own folly.

I wish my own women to understand that what I am going to say is for them as well as others, and I want those who are to tell their sisters, yes, all the women of this community, and then write it back to the States, and do as you please with it. I am going to give you from this time to the 6th day of October next, for reflection, that you may determine whether you wish to stay with your husbands or not, and then I am going to set every woman at liberty and say to them, Now go your way, my women, with the Lord, go your way; as if my wives have got to do us of two things; either round up their shoulders to endure the afflictions of this world and live their religion, or they may leave, for I will not have them about me. I will go into heaven alone, rather than have scolding and fighting around me. I will set all at liberty. "What, first wife too?" Yes, I will liberate you all.

I know what my women will say; they will say, "You can have as many women as you please, Brigham." But I want to go somewhere and do something to get rid of the whippers; I do not want them to receive a part of the truth and spurn the rest out of doors.

I wish my women, and br. Kimball's and br. Grant's to leave, and every woman in this Territory, or else say in their hearts that they will embrace the gospel—the whole of it. Tell the gentiles that I will free every woman in this Territory at our next conference. "What, the first wife too?" Yes, there shall not be one held in bondage, all shall be set free. And then let the father be the head of the family, the master of his own household; and let him treat them as an angel would treat them; and let the wives and the children say amen to what he says, and be subject to his dictation, instead of their dictating the man, instead of their trying to govern him.

No doubt some are thinking, "I wish br. Brigham would say what would become of the children?" I will tell you what my feelings are; I will let my wives take the children, and I have problem, and I have a good fortune, and I out of context. Dr. Nibley states that the sentences preceding and following this quotation will show that J. M. Grant was referring only to capital crimes. Actually, the sentences before and after show that Grant was referring to those who are “covenant breakers,” those who “commit adultery,” and those who commit other sins which we do not usually think of as deserving the death penalty. The following is taken from Mr. Grant’s sermon and shows that he was not quoted out of context:

Some have received the Priesthood and a knowledge of the things of God, and still they dishonor the cause of truth, commit adultery, and every other abomination beneath the heavens, and then meet you here or in the street, and deny it.

These are the abominable characters that we have in our midst, and they will seek unto wizards that peep, and to star-gazers and soothsayers, because they have no faith in the holy Priesthood, and then when they meet us, they want to be called Saints.

The same characters will get drunk and wallow in the mire and filth, and yet they call themselves Saints, and seem to glory in their conduct, and they pride themselves in their greatness and in their abominations.

They are the old hardened sinners, and are almost—if not altogether—past improvement, and are full of hell, and my prayer is that God’s indignation may rest upon them from the crown of their heads to the soles of their feet.

I say, that there are men and women that I would advise to go to the President immediately, and ask him to appoint a committee to attend to their case; and then let a place be selected, and let that committee shed their blood.

We have those amongst us that are full of all manner of abominations, those who need to have their blood shed, for water will not do, their sins are of too deep a dye.

You may think that I am not teaching you Bible doctrine, but what says the apostle Paul? I would ask how many covenant breakers there are in this city and in this kingdom. I believe that there are a great many; and if they are covenant breakers we need a place designated, where we can shed their blood. (Journal of Discourses, vol. 4, pp. 49-50)

Thus it can be seen that Dr. Nibley’s charge that Kelly and Birney quoted J. M. Grant out of context is without foundation.

When we look into the early Mormon publications we find that there were many crimes that the Mormon Church leaders taught there were worthy of death. The following is a list of these crimes:

1. MURDER. The Mormon Prophet Joseph Smith stated:

In debate, George A. Smith said imprisonment was better than hanging.

I replied, I was opposed to hanging, even if a man kill another, I will shoot him, or cut off his head, spill his blood on the ground, and let the smoke thereof ascend up to God; and if ever I have the privilege of making a law on that subject, I will have it so. (History of the Church, by Joseph Smith, vol. 5, p. 296)

The Mormon people apparently took Joseph Smith very serious when he talked of beheading for they incorporated this into their laws in Utah:

In accordance with the law of Utah, the doomed man was given his choice of three methods of execution—hanging, shooting or beheading. (A Mormon Chronicle, The Diaries of John D. Lee, Introduction, p. xix)

In footnote number 143 on page 129 of the same book, we find this statement:

Even the law of territorial Utah, as we have explained in the Introduction, allowed John D. Lee, or any other man condemned to death, to elect to be beheaded as a means of saving his immortal soul by the shedding of his blood.

Although we do not hear of murderers having their heads cut off in Utah today, the law still allows the murderer to be shot so that his blood can flow and atone for his sin. Joseph Fielding Smith, President of the Mormon Church, stated:

... the founders of Utah incorporated in the laws of the Territory provisions for the capital punishment of those who wilfully shed the blood of their fellow men. This law, which is now the law of the State, granted unto the condemned murderer the privilege of choosing for himself whether he die by hanging, or whether he be shot, and thus have his blood shed in harmony with the law of God; and thus atone, so far as it is in his power to atone, for the death of his victim. Almost without exception the condemned party chooses the latter death. (Doctrines of Salvation, by Joseph Fielding Smith, vol. 1, p. 136)

Bruce R. McConkie, of the First Council of the Seventy, stated:

As a mode of capital punishment, hanging or execution on a gallows does not comply with the law of blood atonement, for the blood is not shed. (Mormon Doctrine, by Bruce R. McConkie, 1958 ed., p. 314)

In the Salt Lake Tribune for January 28, 1968, we find the following:

Japanese District and Family Court Judge Hiroshige Takasawa, after more than a year of research studies of Utah’s “unique” form of capital punishment, has found “evidence that present laws stem from early Mormon philosophy of blood atonement.”

Judge Takasawa, a visiting Fulbright research scholar in criminology at the University of Utah, sits on the bench of the Nagoya District Court and Family Court at Toyohashi, Japan.

The judge said that through extensive study of the first days of the Mormon pioneers he has found “a possible relationship” between current death sentences and “early days of violence vs. violence.”

Beginning with the premise, “There must be a background to Utah’s unique form of capital punishment—a system which affords a convicted person a choice of death by hanging or shooting,” Judge Takasawa sought information and materials from state law enforcement agencies and penal officials. (Salt Lake Tribune, January 28, 1968, p. 4C)

As long as the Mormon Church teaches the doctrine of “blood atonement” there is probably little chance of Utah using a gas chamber or electric chair for the condemned murderer.

2. ADULTERY AND IMMORALITY. Bruce R. McConkie stated:

Modern governments do not take the life of the adulterer, and some of them have done away with the supreme penalty where murder is involved—all of which is further evidence of the direful apostasy that prevails among the peoples who call themselves Christians. (Mormon Doctrine, 1958 ed., p. 104)

Brigham Young, the second president of the Mormon Church, stated:

Let me suppose a case. Suppose you found your brother in bed with your wife, and put a javelin through both of them, you would be justified, and they would atone for their sins, and be received into the kingdom of God. I would at once do so in such a case; and under such circumstances, I have no wife whom I love so well that I would not put a javelin through her heart, and I would do it with clean hands . . .

There is not a man or woman, who violates the covenants made with their God, that will not be required to pay the debt. The blood of Christ will never wipe that out, your own blood must atone for it; . . . (Journal of Discourses, vol. 3, p. 247)

Orson Pratt, who was one of the Twelve Apostles in the Mormon Church, stated:

The people of Utah are the only ones in this nation who have taken effectual measures . . . to prevent adulteries and criminal connections between the sexes. The punishment in that territory, for these crimes is death to both male and female. (The Seer, Washington City, D.C., 1854, p. 223)

... the citizens of that Territory think more of their virtue than they do of their lives. They know, that if they have any connections out of the marriage covenant, they not only forfeit their lives by the law of God, but they forfeit their salvation also. (Ibid., p. 42)

Heber C. Kimball, who was a member of the First Presidency of the Mormon Church, made these statements:

These are my views, and the Lord knows that I believe in the principles of sanctification; and when I am guilty of seducing any man's wife, or any woman in God's world, I say, sever my head from my body. (Journal of Discourses, vol. 7, p. 20)

But they cannot whore it here; for, gentlemen, if there is anything of that kind, we will slay both men and women. We will do it, as the Lord liveth—we will slay such characters. Now, which would be the most worthy to be slain—the woman that had had her endowments and made certain covenants before God, or the man that knew nothing about it? The woman, of course. (Ibid., vol. 6, p. 38)

... our females ... are not unclean, for we wipe all unclean ones from our midst: we not only wipe them from our streets, but we wipe them out of existence...so help me God, while I live, I will lend my hand to wipe such persons out: and I know this people will. (Millennial Star, vol. 16, p. 739; also printed in the Journal of Discourses, vol. 7, p. 19)

The Mormon Apostle George A. Smith made the following statement:

The principle, the only one that beats and throbs through the heart of the entire inhabitants of this Territory, is simply this: The man who seduces his neighbors wife must die, and her nearest relative must kill him! (Journal of Discourses, vol. 1, p. 97)

On May 22, 1859, Brigham Young stated:

It is not so much polygamy that they are opposed to, but they hate this people because they strive to be pure, and will not believe in whoredom and adultery, but declare death to the man who is found guilty of those crimes. (Journal of Discourses, vol. 7, p. 146)

The following is found in footnote 135 on page 128 of A Mormon Chronicle, The Diaries of John D. Lee, vol. 1: "Adultery was both a major sin and a capital offense in Mormon eyes." In footnote 101 on pages 332-333 of the same volume the following statement appears:

Lee's solemn warning related to the doctrine of blood atonement. Many early Mormons believed that the sin of adultery was so grievous that only the shedding of the sinner's blood could atone for it. There are many references to the seriousness of this offense. Esias Edwards, for example, tells in his diary how his son-in-law, Frank Sadler, was forced to flee to save his life after a second transgression.

3. STEALING. The following statement concerning Joseph Smith appeared in the Mormon publication Times and Seasons:

President Joseph Smith said, I think it best to continue this subject. I want the elders to make honorable proclamation abroad concerning what the feelings of the first presidency is, for stealing has never been tolerated by them. I despise a thief above ground. (Times and Seasons, vol. 4, pp. 183-184)

Brigham Young taught that thieves should have their throats cut:

President Young then spoke against thieving, ... said he, I should be perfectly willing to see thieves have their throats cut; some of you may say, if that is your feelings Brigham, we'll lay you aside sometime, well, do it if you can; I would rather die by the hands of the meanest of all men, false brethren, than to live among thieves. (History of the Church, vol. 7, p. 597)

If you want to know what to do with a thief that you may find stealing, I say kill him on the spot, and never suffer him to commit another iniquity. ... if I caught a man stealing on my premises I should be very apt to send him straight home, and that is what I wish every man to do, to put a stop to that abominable practice in the midst of this people.

I know this appears hard, and throws a cold chill over our revered traditions received by early education. I had a great many such feelings to contend with myself, and was as much of a sectarian in my notions as any other man, and as mild, perhaps, in my natural disposition, but I have trained myself to measure things by the line of justice, to estimate them by the rule of equity and truth, and not by the false traditions of the fathers, or the sympathies of the natural mind. If you will cause all those whom you know to be thieves, to be placed in a line before the mouth of one of our largest cannon, well loaded with chain shot, I will prove by my works whether I can mete out justice to such persons, or not. I would consider it just as much my duty to do that, as to baptize a man for the remission of his sins. That is a short discourse on thieves, I acknowledge, but I tell you the truth as it is in my heart. (Journal of Discourses, vol. 1, pp. 108-109)

The Apostle Orson Hyde said:

It would have a tendency to place a terror on those who leave these parts, that may prove their salvation when they see the heads of thieves taken off, or shot down before the public ... I believe it to be pleasing in the sight of heaven to sanctify ourselves and put these things from our midst. (Journal of Discourses, vol. 1, p. 73)

4. USING THE NAME OF THE LORD IN VAIN. In the journal of Hosea Stout, Brigham Young is recorded as saying:

... I tell you the time is coming when that man uses the name of the Lord is used the penalty will be affixed and immediately be executed on the spot ... (On the Mormon Frontier, The Diary of Hosea Stout, vol. 1, p. 76)

5. FOR NOT RECEIVING THE GOSPEL. Brigham Young stated:

The time is coming when justice will be laid to the line and righteousness to the plummet; when we shall ask, "Are you for God?" and if you are not heartily on the Lord's side, you will be hewn down. (Journal of Discourses, vol. 3, p. 226)

6. FOR MARRIAGE TO AN AFRICAN. Brigham Young said:

Shall I tell you the law of God in regard to the African race? If the white man who belongs to the chosen seed mixes his blood with the seed of Cain, the penalty, under the law of God is death on the spot. This will always be so. (Journal of Discourses, vol. 10, p. 110)

7. FOR COVENANT BREAKING. Jedediah M. Grant, who was the second counselor to Brigham Young, stated:

I say, that there are men and women that I would advise to go to the President immediately, and ask him to appoint a committee to attend to their case; and then let a place be selected, and let that committee shed their blood.

We have those amongst us that are full of all manner of abominations, those who need to have their blood shed, for water will not do, their sins are of too deep a dye. ... I would ask how many covenant breakers there are in this city and in this kingdom. I believe that there are a great many; and if they are covenant breakers we need a place designated, where we can shed their blood. ...

We have been trying long enough with this people, and I go in for letting the sword of the Almighty be unsheathed, not only in word, but in deed. ...

Brethren and sisters, we want you to repent and forsake your sins. And you who have committed sins that cannot be forgiven through baptism, let your blood be shed, and let the smoke ascend, that the incense thereof may come up before God as an atonement for your sins, and that the sinners in Zion may be afraid. (Deseret News, vol. 6, p. 235, reprinted in the Journal of Discourses, vol. 4, pp. 49-51)

On another occasion Jedediah M. Grant made these comments:

What disposition ought the people of God to make of covenant breakers . . . What does the Apostle say? He says they are worthy of death. . . .

What! do you believe that people would do right, and keep the law of God, by actually putting to death the transgressors? Putting to death transgressors would exhibit the law of God, no difference by whom it was done; that is my opinion.

You talk of the doings of different governments, the United States if you please. . . . Do traitors to that government forfeit their lives? . . . But people will look into books of theology, and argue that the people of God have a right to try people for fellowship, but they have no right to try them on property or life. That makes the devil laugh, saying, I have got them on a hook now; . . .

But if the Government of God on earth, and Eternal Priesthood, with the sanction of High Heaven, in the midst of all his people, has passed sentence on certain sins when they appear in a person, has not the people of God a right to carry out that part of his law as well as any other portion of it? Is it their right to baptize a sinner to save him, and it is also their right to kill a sinner to save him, when he commits those crimes that can only be atoned for by shedding his blood. If the Lord God forgives sins by baptism, and . . . certain sins cannot be atoned for . . . but by the shedding of the blood of the sinner, query, whether the people of God be overreaching the mark, if they should execute the law . . . We would not kill a man, of course, unless we killed him to save him. . . .

. . . If you shall thus advance, and then turn and trample the holy commandments of God under your feet, and break your sacred and solemn covenants, and become traitors to the people of God, would you not be worthy of death? I think you would.

Do you think it would be any sin to kill me if I were to break my covenants? . . . Do you believe you would kill me if I broke the covenants of God, and you had the Spirit of God? Yes; and the more Spirit of God I had, the more I should strive to save your soul by spilling your blood, when you had committed sin that could not be remitted by baptism. (Deseret News, July 27, 1854)

Heber C. Kimball, who was the first counselor to Brigham Young, stated: “. . . for if men turn traitors to God and His servants, their blood will surely be shed, or else they will be damned, and that too according to their covenants” (Journal of Discourses, vol. 4, p. 375).

8. FOR APOSTASY. Brigham Young said:

I say, rather than that apostates should flourish here, I will unsheath my bowie knife. (Great commotion in the congregation, and a simultaneous burst of feeling, assenting to the declaration.) Now, you nasty apostates, clear out, or judgment will be put to the line, and righteousness to the plummet. (Voices, generally, “go it, go it.”) If you say it is right, raise your hands. (All hands up.) Let us call upon the Lord to assist us in this, and every good work. (Journal of Discourses, vol. 1, p. 83)

On another occasion Brigham Young said:

Now take a person in this congregation who has knowledge with regard to being saved in the kingdom of our God and Father and being exalted, the beauty and excellency of the eternities before him compared with the vain and foolish things of the world, and suppose that he is overtaken in a gross fault, that he has committed a sin that he knows will deprive him of that exaltation which he desires, and that he cannot attain to it without the shedding of his blood, and also knows that by having his blood shed he will atone for that sin, and be saved and exalted with the Gods, is there a man or woman in this house but what would say, “Shed my blood that I may be saved and exalted with the Gods?”

All mankind love themselves, and let these principles be known by an individual, and he would be glad to have his blood shed. That would be loving themselves, even unto an eternal exaltation. Will you love your brothers or sisters likewise, when they have committed a sin that cannot be atoned for without the shedding of their blood? Will you love that man or woman well enough to shed their blood? . . . I could refer you to plenty of instances where men have been righteously slain, in order to atone for their sins. I have seen scores and hundreds of people for whom there would have been a chance (in the last resurrection there will be) if their lives had been taken and their blood spilled on the ground as a smoking incense to the Almighty, but who are now angels to the devil . . . I have known a great many men who left this church for whom there is no chance whatever for exaltation, but if their blood had been spilled, it would have been better for them, the wickedness and ignorance of the nations forbids this principle’s being in full force, but the time will come when the law of God will be in full force.

This is loving our neighbor as ourselves; if he needs help, help him; and if he wants salvation and it is necessary to spill his blood on the earth in order that he may be saved, spill it. Any of you who understand the principles of eternity, if you have sinned a sin requiring the shedding of blood, except the sin unto death, would not be satisfied nor rest until your blood should be spilled, that you might gain that salvation you desire. That is the way to love mankind. (Sermon by Brigham Young, delivered in the Mormon Tabernacle, February 8, 1857, printed in the Deseret News, February 18, 1857; also reprinted in the Journal of Discourses, vol. 4, pp. 219-220)

Heber C. Kimball stated:

God designs we should be pure men, holding the oracles of God in holy and pure vessels; but when it is necessary that blood should be shed, we should be as ready to do that as to eat an apple . . . we will let you know that the earth can swallow you up, as it did Korah with his host; and as brother Taylor says, You may dig your graves, and we will slay you, and you may crawl into them. (Journal of Discourses, vol. 6, pp. 34-35)

Mrs. Brooks states that John D. Lee “had seen many cases, among them that of Nephi Stewart, wherein a man was ruined financially and his life endangered by a public announcement that he had been cut off the Church” (John D. Lee, p. 293).

9. FOR LYING. Brigham Young made this statement in 1846:

I preached on the condition of the Camp of Israel—. . . and warned those who lied and stole and followed Israel that they would have their heads cut off, for that was the law of God and it should be executed. (“Manuscript History of Brigham Young,” December 20, 1846, typed copy)

10. FOR COUNTERFEITING. On February 24, 1847, Brigham Young stated:

We investigated several orders purporting to be drawn by J. Allen, Lieut. Col., signed by James Pollick; which I requested should be burned. I swore by the Eternal Gods that if men in our midst would not stop this cursed work of stealing and counterfeiting their throats should be cut. (“Manuscript History of Brigham Young,” February 24, 1847, typed copy)

11. FOR CONDEMNING JOSEPH SMITH OR CONSENTING TO HIS DEATH. Norton Jacob quoted Brigham Young as saying:

A man may live here with us and worship what God he pleases or none at all, but he must not blaspheme the God of Israel or damn old Joe Smith or his religion, for we will salt him down in the lake. (Quest for Empire, p. 127)

Joseph F. Smith, who became the sixth President of the Mormon Church, admitted that he was about to stab a man with his pocket knife if he even expressed approval of the murder of Joseph Smith. The Mormon Apostle Abraham H. Cannon recorded the following in his journal under the date of December 6, 1889:

About 4:30 p.m. this meeting adjourned and was followed by a meeting of Presidents Woodruff, Cannon and Smith and Bros. Lyman and Grant. . . . Bro. Joseph F. Smith was traveling some years ago near Carthage when he met a man who said he had just arrived five minutes too late to see the Smiths killed. Instantly a dark cloud seemed to overshadow Bro. Smith and he asked how this man looked upon the deed. Bro. S. was oppressed by a most horrible feeling as he waited for a reply. After a brief pause the man answered, "Just as I have always looked upon it—that it was a d—d cold-blooded murder." The cloud immediately lifted from Bro. Smith and he found that he had his open pocket knife grasped in his hand in his pocket, and he believes that had this man given his approval to that murder of the prophets he would have immediately struck him to the heart. ("Daily Journal of Abraham H. Cannon," December 6, 1889, pp. 205-206)

The journals of Abraham H. Cannon only recently came to light. The original journals are now located in the Special Collections Dept. of the Brigham Young University Library, and photographs are on file at the Utah State Historical Society and the University of Utah Library.

Was It Actually Practiced?

Although the doctrine of Blood Atonement was openly proclaimed and put into practice in the 1850's, so many Gentiles came to Utah that the church leaders found it impossible to continue the practice. The Mormon writer Klaus J. Hansen stated:

In 1888, apostle Charles W. Penrose observed that "Because of the laws of the land and the prejudices of the nation, and the ignorance of the world, this law can not be carried out, but when the time comes that the law of God shall be in full force upon the earth, then this penalty will be inflicted for those crimes committed by persons under covenant not to commit them." However, shortly after the Mormons established the government of God in Utah on what they believed to be a permanent basis, they attempted to enforce the doctrine. Brigham Young insisted that there were "plenty of instances where men have been righteously slain in order to atone for their sins." (Quest for Empire, by Klaus J. Hansen, Michigan State Univ. Press, 1967, p. 70)

Today the Mormon leaders are somewhat divided over the doctrine of Blood Atonement. Morris L. Reynolds wrote to several prominent Mormons asking them about Blood Atonement. Hugh B. Brown, a Mormon Apostle and a member of the First Presidency under Pres. McKay, made this reply in a letter dated May 13, 1966:

There is no doctrine of the Church requiring the shedding of blood for the salvation where certain sins have been committed. We have been accused of such doctrine, but it is not true. (Letter from Hugh B. Brown)

Although Bruce R. McConkie, of the First Council of Seventy, claims that Blood Atonement was not actually practiced he feels that it is a true principle:

. . . under certain circumstances there are some serious sins for which the cleansing of Christ does not operate, and the law of God is that men must have their own blood shed to atone for their sins . . . (Mormon Doctrine, by Bruce R. McConkie, 1958 ed., p. 87)

B. H. Roberts, who was the Assistant Church Historian, described the doctrine of Blood Atonement as follows:

. . . what is needful for the salvation of the soul where one's sins place him beyond the reach of vicarious means of salvation—then it is the shedding of the sinners own blood that must here be referred to. (A Comprehensive History of the Church, by B. H. Roberts, 1965 ed., vol. 4, p. 129)

Hyrum L. Andrus, of the Brigham Young University, made this statement concerning Blood Atonement:

The concept here voiced, known more popularly as the doctrine of blood atonement, laid the foundation for the establishment of capital punishment in Utah for murder. Its basis is theological, asserting that there are certain crimes which the atonement of Christ will not cover, . . . the individual himself must pay the debt either here or hereafter. Hence, in some cases it was deemed proper to take the life of such persons through the shedding of their blood, that mercy might have claim upon them in the day of redemption. (Joseph Smith and World Government, by Hyrum L. Andrus, Salt Lake City, 1963, p. 107)

As we have already shown, Joseph F. Smith, who became the sixth president of the Mormon Church, was such a firm believer in the doctrine of Blood Atonement that he almost killed a man at Carthage. His son Joseph Fielding Smith, who became the tenth President, still believes in the doctrine, although he cannot face the fact that it was actually practiced in early Utah. In his book Doctrines of Salvation he states:

TRUE DOCTRINE OF BLOOD ATONEMENT. Just a word or two now, on the subject of blood atonement. What is that doctrine? Unadulterated, if you please, laying aside the pernicious insinuations and lying charges that have so often been made, it is simply this: Through the atonement of Christ all mankind may be saved, by obedience to the laws and ordinances of the gospel.

But man may commit certain grievous sins—according to his light and knowledge—that will place him beyond the reach of the atoning blood of Christ. If then he would be saved he must make sacrifice of his own life to atone—so far as in his power lies—for that sin, for the blood of Christ alone under certain circumstances will not avail. . . .

ATONEMENT AND SINS UNTO DEATH. Joseph Smith taught that there were certain sins so grievous that man may commit, that they will place the transgressors beyond the power of the atonement of Christ. If these offenses are committed, then the blood of Christ will not cleanse them from their sins even though they repent.

Therefore their only hope is to have their own blood shed to atone, as far as possible, in their behalf. . . . And men for certain crimes have had to atone as far as they could for their sins wherein they have placed themselves beyond the redeeming power of the blood of Christ. (Doctrines of Salvation, by Joseph Fielding Smith, Salt Lake City, 1954, vol. 1, pp. 133-136)

After expressing a belief in the doctrine of “Blood Atonement,” however, Joseph Fielding Smith turns right around and says that it was never actually practiced by the Mormon Church:

But that the Church practices “Blood Atonement” on apostates or any others, which is preached by ministers of the “Reorganization” is a damnable falsehood . . .

Did you not know that not a single individual was ever “blood atoned,” as you are pleased to call it, for apostasy or any other cause? . . . Do you know of anyone whose blood was ever shed by the command of the Church, or members thereof, to “save his soul?” . . .

Never in the history of this people can the time be pointed to when the Church ever attempted to pass judgment on, or execute an apostate as per your statement. (Ibid., pp. 136-137)

This statement by Joseph Fielding Smith is certainly far from the truth. In our book, The Mormon Kingdom, vol. 2, we have documented the fact that many people in early Utah lost their lives because of the doctrine of Blood Atonement. One example is found in the Confessions of John D. Lee:

. . . the sinful member was to be slain for the remission of his sins, it being taught by the leaders and believed by the people that the right thing to do with a sinner who did not repent and obey the Council, was to take the life of the offending party, and thus save his everlasting soul. This was called “Blood Atonement.” . . .

The most deadly sin among the people was adultery, and many men were killed in Utah for that crime.

Rosmos Anderson was a Danish man . . . He had married a widow lady somewhat older than himself, and she had a daughter that was fully grown at the time of the reformation. The girl was very anxious to be sealed to her stepfather, and Anderson was equally anxious to take her for a second wife, but as she was a fine-looking girl, Klingensmith desired her to marry him, and she refused. At one of the meetings during the reformation Anderson and his step-daughter confessed that they had committed adultery, believing when they did so that Brigham Young would allow them to marry when he learned the facts. Their confession being full, they were rebaptized and received into full membership. They were then placed under covenant that if they again committed adultery, Anderson should suffer death. Soon after this a charge was laid against Anderson before the Council, accusing him of adultery with his step-daughter. This Council was composed of Klingensmith and his two counselors; it was the bishop’s council. Without giving Anderson any chance to defend himself or make a statement, the Council voted that Anderson must die for violating his covenants. Klingensmith went to Anderson and notified him that the orders were that he must die by having his throat cut, so that the running of his blood would atone for his sins. Anderson, being a firm believer in the doctrine and teachings of the Mormon Church, made no objections, but asked for half a day to prepare for death. His request was granted. His wife was ordered to prepare a suit of clean clothing, in which to have her husband buried, and was informed that he was to be killed for his sins, she being directed to tell those who should enquire after her husband that he had gone to California.

Klingensmith, James Haslem, Daniel McFarland and John M. Higbee dug a grave in the field near Cedar City, and that night, about 12 o’clock, went to Anderson’s house and ordered him to make ready to obey the Council. Anderson got up, dressed himself, bid his family good-bye, and without a word of remonstrance accompanied those that he believed were carrying out the will of the “Almighty God.” They went to the place where the grave was prepared; Anderson knelt down upon the side of the grave and prayed. Klingensmith and his company then cut Anderson’s throat from ear to ear and held him so that his blood ran into the grave.

As soon as he was dead they dressed him in his clean clothes, threw him into the grave and buried him. They then carried his bloody clothing back to his family, and gave them to his wife to wash, when she was again instructed to say that her husband was in California. She obeyed their orders.

No move of that kind was made in Cedar City, unless it was done by order of the “Council” or of the “High Council.” I was at once informed of Anderson’s death, . . . The killing of Anderson was then considered a religious duty and a just act. It was justified by all the people, for they were bound by the same covenants, and the least word of objection to thus treating the man who had broken his covenant would have brought the same fate upon the person who was so foolish as to raise his voice against any act committed by order of the Church authorities. (Confessions of John D. Lee, photomechanical reprint of 1880 ed., pp. 282-283)

Gustive O. Larson, Professor of Church History at the Brigham Young University, admits that blood atonement was actually practiced:

To whatever extent the preaching on blood atonement may have influenced action, it would have been in relation to Mormon disciplinary action among its own members. In point would be a verbally reported case of a Mr. Johnson in Cedar City who was found guilty of adultery with his step-daughter by a bishop’s court and sentenced to death for atonement of his sin. According to the report of reputable eyewitnesses, judgment was executed with consent of the offender who went to his unconsecrated grave in full confidence of salvation through the shedding of his blood. Such a case, however primitive, is understandable within the meaning of the doctrine and the emotional extremes of the Reformation. (Utah Historical Quarterly, January 1958, p. 62, n. 39)

On February 15, 1851, Hosea Stout recorded the following in his journal: “They bring news that M. D. Hambleton on last Sunday killed Dr. J. M. Vaughan for similar conduct with Mrs. H. as took place with Dr & Foots wife last summer” (On The Mormon Frontier: The Diary of Hosea Stout, edited by Juanita Brooks, vol. 2, p. 393). This was probably the same case of “Blood Atonement” that Sarah S. Leavitt told of in her record book:

The first person I spoke to after I entered Salt Lake was Dr. Vaun. . . . He said, “Well, Mrs. Leavitt, I have joined the church.” Of course, I was glad and was in hopes he had repented of his sins and would forsake them. But in this I was disappointed, for he sought the women’s company and with the help of love powders succeeded in gratifying his hellish desires. He was called up before the authorities more than once and confessed his sins and asked forgiveness. He was forgiven and he said if he was ever found guilty again his life should be the penalty. He knew the law of God required it. He was guilty again and was shot and killed. Oh, the weakness and depravity of man, to sell their birthright for a mess of pottage, or in other words, sell their souls’ salvation for a few moments of carnal pleasure. (Sarah S. Leavitt Journal, p. 41)

According to Stout, Brigham Young defended the murderer and he was released (see On The Mormon Frontier: The Diary of Hosea Stout, vol. 2, p. 396).

Although many Mormons continue to believe in Blood Atonement as a doctrine, it is not practised in Utah today—with the exception that murderers may still choose to be shot. Nevertheless, it was taught in early Utah and was responsible for the death of many people. In the chapters that follow we will document many cases of Blood Atonement and show how it was used to help establish the Mormon Kingdom.

Death for Marriage to an African

On page 401 of this book, we quoted President Brigham Young as saying that “the law of God is death on the spot” for a white man of the chosen seed to mix “his blood with the seed of Cain” (see Journal of Discourses, vol. 10, p. 110). Wilford Woodruff, who became the fourth President of the Church, recorded in his journal an address delivered by President Young in 1852. In this address we find the following:

And if any man mingle his seed with the seed of Cane [sic] the ownly [sic] way he could get rid of it or have salvation would be to come forward and have his head cut off & spill his Blood upon the ground it would also take the life of his children . . . (“Wilford Woodruff’s Journal,” January 16, 1852, typed copy; original located in LDS Church Archives).

Mormon writer Lester E. Bush, Jr., admits that in this address Brigham Young taught that “miscegenation required blood atonement (offspring included) for salvation . . .” (Dialogue: A Journal of Mormon Thought, Spring 1973, p. 26).

According to the “Excerpts From the Weekly Council Meetings of the Quorum of the Twelve Apostles,” this doctrine was still being taught in 1897. In the report for December 15, 1897, we read:

President Cannon said he had understood President Taylor to say that a man who had the priesthood who would marry a woman of the accursed seed, that if the law of the Lord were administered upon him, he would be killed, and his offspring, for the reason that the Lord had determined that the seed of Cain should not receive the priesthood in the flesh . . . (“Excerpts From the Weekly Council Meetings of the Quorum of the Twelve Apostles, Dealing with the Rights of Negroes in the Church, 1849-1940,” typed copy)

On August 22, 1895, in this same source, George Q. Cannon claimed that Joseph Smith also taught Blood Atonement for this “sin”:

President Cannon remarked that the Prophet Joseph taught this doctrine: That the seed of Cain could not receive the Priesthood...and that any white man who mingled his seed with that of Cain should be killed, and thus prevent any of the seed of Cain’s coming into possession of the priesthood.

Abolishment of Hanging in Utah Leaves Shedding of Blood as the Only Way For Execution

We have previously quoted Joseph Smith as saying that he was “opposed to hanging” and that if a man killed another he would “shoot him, or cut off his head, spill his blood on the ground, . . .” (History of the Church, vol. 5, p. 296). The original source for this quotation appears to be Joseph Smith’s diary, although in the diary account Smith talks of cutting the murderer’s throat rather than complete decapitation. The effect, of course, would be the same, as the blood would be spilled on the ground. In any case, we have shown that the laws of Utah gave murderers the choice between hanging and being shot. In the 1958 printing of his book, Mormon Doctrine, page 314, Bruce R. McConkie, who is now an Apostle in the Mormon Church, indicated that “As a mode of capital punishment, hanging or execution on a gallows does not comply with the law of blood atonement, for the blood is not shed.” In recent years the doctrine of “Blood Atonement,” has been played down by Mormon leaders, and Apostle McConkie’s article on hanging has been removed from recent printings of Mormon Doctrine.

As we have already shown, Joseph Fielding Smith, who became the tenth President of the Mormon Church, had a great deal to say about the doctrine of “Blood Atonement.” Some time after printing Mormonism—Shadow or Reality? we obtained a copy of a letter which Joseph Fielding Smith wrote in answer to an inquiry dated October 18, 1962. In this letter, Smith expressed his objections to hanging: “It is wrong to hang any one who has committed murder, or to kill him by gas. The Lord said his blood should be shed.” Almost eighteen years after Joseph Fielding Smith made this comment, the Utah Legislature banned the practice of hanging so that all those who are executed in the future will be shot:

Although there is little public awareness, Utah takes a historic step this summer when it discontinues hanging as an option for capital punishment. . . .

At least since statehood in 1896 the law has read that for capital crimes “the punishment of death must be inflicted by hanging the defendant by the neck until he is dead, or by shooting him, at his election.”. . .

The new code flatly states: “The warden shall see that the judgment of death is executed by shooting the defendant at the state prison.”. . .

Justice J. Allan Crockett, current high court chief justice, served as chairman of a study committee. He said discussions on the execution change centered on a desire to achieve the most efficient, most humane way of execution. (The Salt Lake Tribune, March 8, 1980) father, who died in Quincy, Illinois, after we were driven from Missouri. My recollection is better with regard to my earthly father than it is in regard to my heavenly Father; but as to knowing of what species he is and how he is organized, and with regard to his existence, I understand it in part, as well as I understand the organization and existence of my earthly father. That is my opinion about it, and my opinion to me is just as good as yours is to you; and if you are of the same opinion you will be satisfied, as I am.

I know my heavenly Father and Jesus Christ whom he has sent, and this is eternal life. And now as we have been told this morning, if you will enter into the Spirit of your calling, if you will the principle of securing to yourselves eternal life, eternal existence, eternal exaltation, it will be well with you. But if, after being put into a carriage and placed upon the road, after having everything prepared for the journey that infinite wisdom could devise, this people stroll into the swamp, get into the woods among the brambles and briars, and wander around until night overtakes them, I say shame on such a people.

I am ashamed to talk about a reformation, for if you have entered into the Spirit of your religion you will know whether those things are so, or not. If you have the Spirit of your religion and have confidence in you, walk along and continue to do so, and secure to yourselves the life before you, and never let it be said, from this time henceforth, that you have awakened out of your sleep, from the fact that you are always awake.

We talk about the reformation, but recollect that you have only just commenced to walk in the way of life and salvation. You have just commenced in the career to obtain eternal life, which is that which you desire, therefore you have no time to spend only in that path. It is straight and narrow, simple and easy, and is an Almightly path, if you will keep in it. If you wander out into swamps, or into brambles, and get into darkness, you will find it hard to get back.

Br. Cummings told you the truth, this morning, with regard to the sins of the people. And I will say that the time will come, and is now high at hand, when those who profess our faith, if they are guilty of what some of this people are guilty of, will find the ax laid at the root of the tree, and they will be hewn down. What has been said is true. The time has been in Israel under the law of God, the celestial law, and that which pertains to the celestial law, for it is one of the laws of that kingdom where our Father dwells, that if a man was found guilty of adultery he must have his blood shed, and that is near at hand. But now I say, the name of the Lord is upon this people, and no more, but faithfully live their religion, their sins will be forgiven them without taking life.

You are aware that when Br. Cummings came to the point of loving our neighbors as ourselves, he could say yes or no, as the case might be; that is true. But I want to connect it with the doctrine you read in the Bible. When we love our neighbor as ourselves, in the time of Jesus said that no man hatches his own flesh. It is admitted by all that every person loves himself. Now if we do not love ourselves, we want to be saved and continue to exist, we want to go into the kingdom where we can enjoy eternity and see no more sorrow nor death. This is the desire of every person who believes in God. Now take a person in this congregation who has knowledge with regard to being saved in the kingdom of our God and our Father, and being exalted, one who knows and understands the principles of eternal life and sees the beauty and excellency of the eternities before him compared with the vain and foolish things of the world, and suppose that he is overthrown in a gross fault, that he has committed a sin that he knows will deprive him of that exaltation which he desires, and that he cannot attain to it without the shedding of his blood, and he knows that by having his blood shed he will atone for that sin and be saved and exalted with the Gods, is there a man or woman in this house but what would say, "shed my blood, that I may be saved and exalted with the Gods?"

All mankind love themselves, and let these principles be shown by an individual, and he would be glad to have his blood shed. That would be loving themselves, even unto an eternal exaltation. Will you love your brothers or sisters likewise, when they have committed a sin that cannot be atoned for without the shedding of their blood? Will you love that man or woman well enough to shed their blood? That is what Jesus Christ meant. He never told a man or woman to love their enemies in their wickedness, never. He never intended any such thing; his language is left as it is for those to read who have the Spirit to discern between truth and error; it was so left for those who can discern the things of God. Jesus Christ never meant that we should love a wicked man in his wickedness.

Now take the wicked, and I can refer to where the Lord had to slay every soul of the families that went out of Egypt, except Caleb and Joshua. He slew them by the hand of their enemies, by the plague, and by the sword, why? Because he loved them, and promised Abraham that he would save them. And he loved Abraham because he was a friend to his God and would stick to him in the hour of darkness, hence he promised Abraham that he would save his seed. And he could save them upon no other principle, for they had forfeited their right to the land of Canaan by transgressing the law of God, and they could not have atoned for the sin if they had lived. But if they were slain the Lord could bring them up in the resurrection and give them the land of Canaan, and he could not do it on any other principle.

I could refer to you plenty of instances where men have been righteously slain, in order to atone for their sins. I have seen scores and hundreds of people for whom there would have been a chance in the last resurrection there will be, if their lives had been taken and their blood spilled on the ground as a smoking incense to the Almighty, but who are now angels to the devil until our elder brother, Jesus Christ, sees them up—conquers death, hell and the grave. I have known a great many men who have left this church for whom there is no chance whatever for exaltation, but if their blood had been spilled it would have been better for them. The wickedness and ignorance of the nations forbid the principle's being in full force, but the time will come when the law of God will be in full force.

This is loving our neighbor as ourselves; if he needs help, help him; and if he wants salvation and it is necessary to spill his blood on the earth in order that he may be saved, spill it. Any of you who understand the principles of eternity, if you have sinned a sin requiring the shedding of blood, except the sin unto death, would not be satisfied until your blood should be spilled, that you might gain that salvation you desire. That is the way to live mankind.

Christ and Balaam have not become friends; they have never shaken hands; they never have agreed to be business and to be on good terms no, never; and they never will, because they are diametrically opposed to each other. If one conquers, the other is destroyed. One or the other of them must triumph and utterly destroy and cast down the opponent. Light and darkness cannot dwell together, and so it is with the kingdom of God.

Now, brothers and sisters, will you live your religion? How many hundreds of times have I asked you that question? Will the Latter Day Saints live their religion? I am ashamed to say anything about a reformation among Saints, but I am happy to think that the people called Latter Day Saints are striving now to obtain the Spirit of their calling and religion. They are just coming into the path, just waking up out of their slumber. It seems as though they are nearly all like babies; we are but children, in one sense. Now let us begin, like children, and walk in the straight and narrow path, live our religion and honor our God.

With these remarks, I pray the God of Israel to bless you forever and ever, for you are the best people on earth. I can say that I am happy that you are doing so well as you are. Continue to proceed in the grace of God's Spirit until the day of his coming, which desire with all my heart, in the name of Jesus Christ. Amen.

THE DESERET NEWS.

ALBERT CARRINGTON, EDITOR.
 GREAT SALT LAKE CITY, WEDNESDAY, FEB. 18.

REYNOLD'S MISCELLANY AND THE ATHENAEUM—Reviewing some Anti-Mormon Publications.

To all lovers of truth it has often appeared strange that the world's publications should have so constantly teemed with wildly FALSE or blithely IGNORANT statements concerning Joseph Smith, Brigham Young, and the Latter Day Saints as a body of people. But so accustomed have we become to such a course on their part, that we were completely surprised to see the Miscellany and Athenaeum pick up and plainly expose the fallacies of three anti-Mormon works, whose absurd contents are generally allowed by so many pious and professed Christians. But however plain it appears in those reviews that the spirit of man can discern the things of man, it also appears equally, or more, plain that the things of God are alone discerned by the Spirit of God. For after most effectually showing up the folly of those anti-Mormon writers through the testimony of their own books, the editors display the most pitiable ignorance in regard to the faith, laws, views, customs, habits, and objects of the Latter Day Saints. Such ignorance on their part concerning anything pertaining to time and sense—to this world and its worldly men and affairs—to worldly wealth, fame, pleasure, power, and advancement—would be a source of deep chagrin to their feelings; but when discovered towards the restoration in our day of the everlasting priesthood and gospel, the raising up of Prophets and Apostles, the organization of the true church in accordance with the pattern instituted by Christ himself while on the earth, it is so far from being a source of chagrin that it almost, if not quite, appears to be a matter of self-gratulation.

The 'Miscellany' asks, "Now, shall we of the Old World ever receive a report of the doings at Salt Lake City in which it will be reasonable to put our trust?" What a question to be asked by professedly knowing editors in professedly enlightened England in this boasted to who those persons were, in which it would be reasonable to put their trust," while at the same time Jesus and his Apostles were constantly proclaiming their true character and mission.

On the 6th of April, 1857, it will be twenty-seven years since the organization of the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter Day Saints, and in that time the Book of Mormon has been printed and widely circulated in the English, French, German, Welsh, Danish, Italian and Hawaiian languages; thousands of Elders without purse or scrip have traversed rivers, seas, and many lands in the dissemination of our faith and doctrines; hundreds of thousands of letters, papers, pamphlets and other publications have been printed and scattered broadcast by the Saints, to the utmost of their means and opportunities; and yet a would-be-repented-wise editor in far famed England asks, "Now, shall we of the Old World ever receive a report of the doings at Salt Lake City in which it will be reasonable to put our trust?" Dear Sir, it will be altogether your own fault if you do not, for in your own island there are many Elders from Great Salt Lake City who are able and more than willing to authentically furnish the required information, among whom are Orson Pratt, in Liverpool, and Ezra T. Benson of the Quorum of the Twelve Apostles. And in addition to those living teachers and thousands of others in your midst, you will find the Millennial Star and numerous 'Mormon' publications for sale at 42 Islington, Liverpool, and at 35 Jewin street, City, London; at which places you will also be able to procure the Deseret News, in which are printed the history of Joseph Smith, the public teachings of Pres. Brigham Young and his Counselors, of the Twelve and others, and such items as are deemed useful and interesting in Utah. You can then sit in your easy chair and scan the most bellied population in far off Utah, having a report thereof in which it will be reasonable to put your trust.

Mr. 'Miscellany' were such an accessible and vast array of correct information at your command upon worldly topics, and were you with all these attainable advantages to write about the Queen of England and Prince Albert, about the leaders in parliament, the men and affairs of the city of London, trade, politics, &c., with so little apparent knowledge as you have about the 'Mormons' and 'Mormon life'—how long think you could you sustain position as an intelligent journalist? Whom taught you that "These extraordinary people have made for themselves a new scheme of life, based on new ideas?" Our scheme of life is at least as old as the days of Adam, is the one revealed by the Almighty for the observance of all his children who desire to attain celestial glory, and is based upon eternal principles as understood in the councils of heaven and made known to man for his guidance.

It may be urged that this is interested testimony; no also is that of Moses in his five books in King James' translation of the Bible, and so is that of all the Prophets and Apostles as printed in that translation. They were all interested in the accounts which they gave centuries and thousands of years ago, which accounts have come to our hands through a very questionable channel. But in our time the Lord has again revealed and is revealing his will, and our testimony is corroborated by hosts of living witnesses, thus proving that the God whom we are striving to worship is the same yesterday, to-day, and for ever; that his arm is not shortened, that his ear is not deaf, and that he is no respecter of persons." But how prone are mankind to garnish the sepulchres of the Prophets, while at the same time they oppress, vilify, persecute, and kill those whom the Lord is sending to teach them. The way of eternal truth! This invariable practice demonstrates how much easier it is, while reading the Bible, to venerate ancient worthies and fancy our obedience had we lived in their days, than it is to actually receive the testimony and teachings of the servants of God living in our midst and follow their counsels and example.

With the light they restrict themselves to, the Miscellany and Athenaeum have handed three scurrilous anti-Mormon works very candidly and truthfully, much more so than is usual; and the Miscellany has gone so far as to "want to know how this system works," and the Athenaeum positively declares that "ill-priesthood, for the gift of the Holy Ghost? And without faithfully walking in this channel, how can any one expect to possess saving knowledge of the plan of salvation? The Lord and his servants say, "this is the way, walk ye in it," while the arch apostate is leading his votaries in numerous by and devious paths, it mattering but little with him how slightly they vary from the true. The truth is extensively printed, the truth is widely proclaimed among the nations by faithful Elders, and yet how few are found who will hear and persistently cleave to it. The very fact that Joseph the Prophet was in his youth poor as to this world's goods and unlearned in worldly science, though in literal fulfillment of prophecy, is wrested by the devil into an argument against his divine mission and authority, and is to this day a stumbling block to the world who think they know so much and are so learned, when they are in reality blind and poor and naked and ignorant."

When reflecting upon the thick veil that is over the earth, the dark fables and the vanities that wholly engage the minds of the vast majority of accountable beings, the disregard of correct testimony, teaching and example, we are tempted at times, in human weakness, to leave each one to unassisted and unaidedly pursue his own course. But this will never answer, since, aside from obvious duty, there are many good, honorable, law-abiding, truth-seeking people scattered abroad upon the earth, and unto whom the principles of life must be taught. Were it not so the Athenaeum would not have made the following statement, "Such leaders (Joseph Smith and Brigham Young) and such a people require to be grappled with in a different spirit to what is brought to bear upon them in all the books we have yet seen about them—the compendious terms 'dupes and imposters' do not cover the facts." Truly they do not, and glad are we to see here and there even a few waking up to the facts couched in the great issue now being joined on this earth, for this issue as it proceeds will try the integrity of men to the utmost and will end in utterly sweeping away not only the refuge of lion and abominations, but all who take shelter in that refuge.

SANDWICH ISLANDS.—Pres. Elias Smith writes from Honolulu, under date Dec. 6, that he had lately visited all the branches on the island of Maui, and found them in a better condition than he had anticipated. The Elders were generally in the enjoyment of good health, and were entering in their efforts for the salvation of the people.

Drouth still continued severe, and in some places many were suffering through lack of food.

The volcano on Hawaii had ceased its eruptions.

THE WESTERN STANDARD.—Persons wishing to subscribe for Vol. 2 of the "Western Standard" should make early application to S. W. RICHARDS, Agent for this City. Subscribers for Vol. 1 will be furnished with Vol. 2, unless they give immediate notice to discontinue at the close of the year.

THE ELECTION.—A more warmly contested city election has never been known in New York than that of the fourth of November, 1856. Without doubt it will be remembered as having been attended with more bribery, fraud, corruption, and illegality in every form than was known at any previous time. Riot run loose—the police were inefficient, apparently disorganized. Crowds of shoulder hitters, bullies, and prize fighters surrounded ballot boxes, preventing any from approaching but those of the "right sort," those in whom they could see a want of all moral principle.

Boxes for the distribution of tickets were knocked down and the tickets destroyed—the police standing by inactive. In some of the districts thousands of respectable citizens desirous of voting were by force prevented. Others, who succeeded in spite of danger to life and limb, returned from the ballot boxes with their money and garments taltered. When the elective franchise was thus secured to us, and party victory is achieved by such means, who can doubt corruption will be found in high places, and men better fitted for ignoble, ignominious positions, will be raised to offices of trust and power? When will the good time come?—[Life Illustrated.]

How different is the conduct at elections in Utah, where they invariably pass off peacefully and with harmonious unanimity. In the matter of elections, at least, all must admit that the 'barbarians of Utah' are far in advance of the abominations practiced by the enlightened and refined Christians of the United States.—[Ed.]

EVERYTHING.—The liar is the next greatest fool to the wise. A prudent reticence is the wisdom. Silence is a much more most gifted eloquence.

26. The Word of Wisdom

On February 27, 1833, Joseph Smith gave the revelation known as the “Word of Wisdom.” This revelation appears as Section 89 of the Doctrine and Covenants. Below is a photograph of this revelation.

Notice that the Word of Wisdom forbids the use of hot drinks, strong drinks and tobacco. The Mormon Church today interprets hot drinks to mean tea and coffee. It would appear, however, that in the early history of the church all hot drinks were forbidden. On April 7, 1868, the Mormon Apostle George Q. Cannon stated that chocolate drinks and hot soups were forbidden:

We are told, and very plainly too, that hot drinks—tea, coffee, chocolate, cocoa and all drinks of this kind are not good for man. . . . we must feed our children properly. . . . We must not permit them to drink liquor or hot drinks, or hot soups or to use tobacco or other articles that are injurious. (Journal of Discourses, vol. 12, pp. 221, 223)

Even though the revelation uses only the words “hot drinks” the Mormon Church today interprets this to mean drinks that contain caffeine. In other words, the emphasis is no longer on whether the drink is hot or cold, but rather how much caffeine it contains. For example, an article in the church’s Improvement Era condemns the drinking of cola drinks. It stated that a large bottle of cola drink contained approximately the same amount of caffeine as a cup of coffee.

Chocolate drinks, on the other hand, even though they are hot and contain a small amount of caffeine, are no longer forbidden. The following appeared on the Editorial Page of the Church Section in the Deseret News:

One of the latest efforts to justify drinking coffee is the current propaganda that drinking cocoa or chocolate is against the Word of Wisdom and that cocoa is supposed to contain even more caffeine than does coffee.

It is difficult to understand why some individuals seem to enjoy shocking people with extreme statements, or why they enjoy being the center of attraction so much that they are willing to set forth untruths as though they were facts. . . . The facts then completely dispel any notion that cocoa or chocolate is as harmful as coffee. Persons who say that those drinking hot chocolate are breaking the Word of Wisdom as effectively as if they drank coffee do not state the truth. . . .

When interviewing for temple recommends, for instance, or for advancement in the priesthood, or for baptism, or for any other purpose, bishops never inquire as to whether a person drinks cocoa or eats chocolate candy. If the use of cocoa and chocolate were against the doctrine of the Church such inquiry would be made, but it is not. (Deseret News, editorial page in the Church News, May 5, 1962)

Although some portions of Joseph Smith’s Word of Wisdom are stressed by the Mormon leaders, other portions are almost ignored. The Mormon writer John J. Stewart states: “The admonition to eat little meat is largely ignored, as are some other points of the revelation” (Joseph Smith, The Mormon Prophet, 1966, p. 90).

Origin of Revelation

Brigham Young, the second President of the Mormon Church, made the following statements concerning the conditions that led to the giving of the Word of Wisdom:

I think I am as well acquainted with the circumstances which led to the giving of the Word of Wisdom as any man in the Church, although I was not present at the time to witness them. The first school of the prophets was held in a small room situated over the Prophet Joseph’s kitchen. . . . When they assembled together in this room after breakfast, the first they did was to light their pipes, and, while smoking, talk about the great things of the kingdom, and spit all over the room, and as soon as the pipe was out of their mouths a large chew of tobacco would then be taken. Often when the Prophet entered the room to give the school instructions he would find himself in a cloud of tobacco smoke. This, and the complaints of his wife at having to clean so filthy a floor, made the Prophet think upon the matter, and he inquired of the Lord relating to the conduct of the Elders in using tobacco, and the revelation known as the Word of Wisdom was the result of his inquiry. (Journal of Discourses, vol. 12, p. 158)

David Whitmer, one of the three witnesses to the Book of Mormon, gave a similar explanation for the origin of the Word of Wisdom. The following appeared in an interview with David Whitmer which was published in the Des Moines Daily News:

... quite a little party of the brethren and sisters being assembled in Smith's house. Some of the men were excessive chewers of the filthy weed, and their disgusting slobbering and spitting caused Mrs. Smith (who, Mr. Whitmer insists, was a lady of predisposed refinement) to make the ironical remark that "It would be a good thing if a revelation could be had declaring the use of tobacco a sin, and commanding its suppression." The matter was taken up and joked about, one of the brethren suggesting that the revelation should also provide for a total abstinence from tea and coffee drinking, intending this as a counter "dig" at the sisters. Sure enough the subject was afterward taken up in dead earnest, and the "Word of Wisdom" was the result. (The Des Moines Daily News, Saturday, October 16, 1886)

It has been suggested that the temperance movement led to Joseph Smith's "Word of Wisdom." The Mormon writer Leonard J. Arrington gives this interesting information:

In recent years a number of scholars have contended that the revelation is an outgrowth of the temperance movement of the early nineteenth century. According to Dean D. McBrien, who first expressed this theory, the Word of Wisdom was a remarkable distillation of the prevailing thought of frontier America in the early 1830's. Each provision in the revelation, he claimed, pertained to an item which had formed the basis of widespread popular agitation in the early 1830's:

A survey of the situation existing at Kirtland when the revelation came forth is a sufficient explanation for it. The temperance wave had for some time been engulfing the West. Just a few years before, Robert Owen had abolished the use of ardent spirits in his community at New Harmony. In 1826 Marcus Morton had founded the American Temperance Society, called at first the Cold Water Society by way of contempt. In June, 1830, the Millennial Harbinger quoted in full, and with the hearty personal endorsement of Alexander Campbell, an article from the Philadelphia "Journal of Health," which in turn was quoting a widely circulated book. "The Simplicity of Health," which article most strongly condemned the use of alcohol, tobacco, the eating intemperately of meats . . . Temperance Societies were organized in great numbers during the early thirties, six thousand being formed in one year. . . . On October 6, 1830, the Kirtland Temperance Society was organized with two hundred thirty nine members. . . . This society at Kirtland was a most active one . . . it revolutionized the social customs of the neighborhood.

McBrien then goes ahead to point out that the Temperance Society succeeded in eliminating a distillery in Kirtland on February 1, 1833, just twenty-seven days before the Latter-day Saint revelation counseling abstinence was announced, and that the distillery at Mentor, near Kirtland, was also closed at the same time. (Brigham Young University Studies, Winter 1959, pp. 39-40)

Whitney R. Cross gives this information:

The temperance movement was larger in every dimension than Burned-over District ultraism. It began much earlier and has not yet ended. During the 1830's it attained national scope. . . . Further, if alcohol was evil because it frustrated the Lord's design for the human body, other drugs like tea, coffee, and tobacco, must be equally wrong. . . . Josiah Bissell, the Pioneer Line ultraist, had even before the 1831 revival "got beyond Temperance to the Cold Water Society—no tea, coffee or any other slops." (The Burned-Over District, New York, 1965, pp. 211-212)

Joseph's Example

The Word of Wisdom is considered to be one of the most important revelations in the Mormon Church. A Mormon who continues to break the Word of Wisdom is considered to be weak in the faith. Breaking the Word of Wisdom is considered a sin which can bar a person from the Temple. In order to get a temple recommend a person is required to answer this question: "4. Do you keep the Word of Wisdom?" (Temple Recommend Book).

Joseph Fielding Smith, tenth President of the Mormon Church, claims that the habit of drinking tea can "bar" a person from the "celestial kingdom of God":

SALVATION AND A CUP OF TEA . . . my brethren, if you drink coffee or tea, or take tobacco, are you letting a cup of tea or a little tobacco stand in the road and bar you from the celestial kingdom of God, where you might otherwise have received a fulness of glory? . . . There is not anything that is little in this world in the aggregate. One cup of tea, then it is another cup of tea and another cup of tea, and when you get them all together, they are not so little. (Doctrines of Salvation, vol. 2, p. 16)

The Mormon writer John J. Stewart claims that the Mormon Prophet Joseph Smith carefully observed the Word of Wisdom:

. . . no one can hold high office in the Church, on even the stake or ward level, nor participate in temple work, who is a known user of tea, coffee, liquor or tobacco. . . .

The prophet himself carefully observed the word of wisdom, and insisted upon its observance by other men in high Church positions, . . . (Joseph Smith, The Mormon Prophet, p. 90)

Although most members of the church feel that Joseph Smith, the founder of the Mormon Church, "carefully observed the Word of Wisdom," research reveals just the opposite. In fact, Joseph Smith, the man who introduced the temple ceremony into the Mormon Church, would not be able to go through the temple if he were living today because of his frequent use of alcoholic beverages.

On page 72 of his book, Sounding Brass, Dr. Hugh Nibley asks where the evidence is that Joseph Smith drank. We would answer Dr. Nibley by saying that this evidence is found throughout Joseph Smith's own History of the Church. In the History of the Church, vol. 2, page 26, we find the following:

The council proceeded to investigate certain charges presented by Elder Rigdon against Martin Harris; one was, that he told A. C. Russell, Esq., that Joseph drank too much liquor when he was translating the Book of Mormon . . .

Brother Harris did not tell Esq., Russell that Brother Joseph drank too much liquor while translating the Book of Mormon, but this thing occurred previous to the translating of the book . . .

The reader will remember that Martin Harris was one of the three witnesses to the Book of Mormon. The statement by Harris should be compared with a statement found in an affidavit made by Barton Stafford. Stafford, who knew Joseph Smith before he left Palmyra, stated that Smith "was very much addicted to intemperance" (Affidavit of Barton Stafford, dated November 3, 1833, as reprinted in Joseph Smith and Money Digging).

It might be argued that this was prior to the time when the Word of Wisdom was given and that Joseph Smith changed his habits after 1833. Evidence, however, plainly shows that Joseph Smith continued to use alcoholic beverages after the Word of Wisdom was given. Under the date of May 2, 1843, the following statement is recorded in Joseph Smith's History of the Church:

Wednesday, 3.—Called at the office and drank a glass of wine with Sister Jenetta Richards, made by her mother in England, and reviewed a portion of the conference minutes. (History of the Church, vol. 5, p. 380)

Benjamin F. Johnson, a personal friend of Joseph Smith, wrote the following about Smith: “He was partial to a well supplied table and he did not always refuse the wine that ‘maketh the heart glad’” (A letter by Benjamin F. Johnson to Elder George S. Gibbs, 1903, as printed in The Testimony of Joseph Smith’s Best Friend, p. 4). The following references appear in Joseph Smith’s History of the Church for January, 1836:

We then partook of some refreshments, and our hearts were made glad with the fruits of the vine. (History of the Church, vol. 2, p. 369)

Elders Orson Hyde, Luke S. Johnson, and Warren Parrish, then presided the Presidency with three servers of glasses filled with wine to bless. And it fell to my lot to attend to this duty, which I cheerfully discharged. It was then passed round in order, then the cake in the same order; and suffice it to say, our hearts were made glad while partaking of the bounty of earth which was presented, until we had taken our fill; . . . (Ibid., vol. 2, p. 378)

Joseph Smith continued to disobey the Word of Wisdom until the day of his death. The History of the Church contains this information concerning an incident in Carthage jail:

Before the jailor came in, his boy brought in some water, and said the guard wanted some wine. Joseph gave Dr. Richards two dollars to give the guard; but the guard said one was enough, and would take no more.

The guard immediately sent for a bottle of wine, pipes, and two small papers of tobacco; and one of the guards brought them into the jail soon after the jailor went out. Dr. Richards uncorked the bottle, and presented a glass to Joseph, who tasted, as Brother Taylor and the doctor, and the bottle was then given to the guard, who turned to go out. (History of the Church, vol. 6, p. 616)

We do not know how often Joseph Smith used tobacco, but as the reader will remember (see page 6 of this book), at one time “he rode through the streets of Nauvoo smoking a cigar” (“Joseph Smith As An Administrator,” M.A. thesis, Brigham Young University, May 1969, p. 161).

The Mormon leaders have made three important changes concerning the Word of Wisdom in Joseph Smith’s History of the Church (for details see page 6 of this book). In one instance, Joseph Smith asked “Brother Markam” to get “a pipe and some tobacco” for the Apostle Willard Richards. These words have been replaced with the word “medicine” in recent editions of the History of the Church. At another time Joseph Smith related that he gave some of the “brethren” a “couple of dollars, with directions to replenish” their supply of “whisky.” In modern editions of the History of the Church, twenty-three words have been deleted from this reference to cover up the fact that Joseph Smith encouraged the “brethren” to disobey the Word of Wisdom. In the third instance, Joseph Smith frankly admitted that he had “drank a glass of beer at Moessers.” These words have been omitted in recent editions of the History of the Church.

In her attack on Fawn Brodie’s book, No Man Knows My History, the Mormon writer F. L. Stewart makes these statements:

49. NM [No Man Knows My History] states that a revelation known as the “Word of Wisdom” states that Mormons should “use wine only at communion.” Therefore, says NM, when Joseph drank wine at weddings, he was breaching this revelation.

The “Word of Wisdom” actually states that wine should be taken “only in assembling yourselves together, to offer up your sacraments before Him.” The correct word is “sacraments,” not “communion.” Since both weddings and baptisms were considered to be sacraments, Joseph was not breaching this revelation when he drank wine at weddings. . . . (Exploding The Myth About Joseph Smith, The Mormon Prophet, 1967, p. 55)

In a footnote on the same page, F. L. Stewart states:

. . . Joseph drank wine as a sacrament at his wife’s baptism in 1830. This custom is no longer practiced at baptism and weddings, and water is now used in the place of wine for the sacrament of the Lord’s Supper.

F. L. Stewart’s attempt to explain away Joseph Smith’s disregard for the Word of Wisdom cannot be taken seriously. Joseph Smith’s “glass of wine” with Jenetta Richards had nothing to do with a “sacrament,” nor can his “beer at Moessers” be explained in this manner. When Joseph Smith and his friends drank wine in the jail at Carthage, it was certainly not taken as a sacrament. John Taylor, who became the third President of the Mormon Church, made this point very clear in the History of the Church:

Sometime after dinner we sent for some wine. It has been reported by some that this was taken as a sacrament. It was no such thing; our spirits were generally dull and heavy, and it was sent for to revive us. . . . I believe we all drank of the wine, and gave some to one or two of the prison guards. (History of the Church, vol. 7, p. 101)

It is interesting to note that the Apostle John Taylor continued to use alcoholic beverages after Joseph Smith’s death. Hosea Stout recorded the following in his diary on June 3, 1847:

While I was explaining this Prests O. Hyde, P. P. Pratt and John Taylor also came in so I stoped saying I had been caught twice Elder Taylor replied to go on and not stop for them. I told him it was nothing but a police meeting and not interesting to them.

“Never mind says he we are police men too.”

Says I. “I hope you will all conform to the rules of the police then.”

“Certainly” says Taylor “Bring on the jug” says I at which they were presented with a large jug of whiskey.

This was such an unexpected turn that it was only answered by a peal of laughter & they all paid due respect to the jug . . .

After drinking says Parley “I have traveled these streets all times of the night & never before have I saw a police man but now I know where to find them hereafter” alluding to the jug.

“Parley” says I “do you not know that some things in this kingdom are only spiritually discerned & so with the police.” (On The Mormon Frontier, The Diary of Hosea Stout, 1844-1861, vol. 1, p. 259)

All of the early Mormon Apostles seem to have used alcoholic beverages after the Word of Wisdom was given. Joseph Smith made the following statement concerning an incident that happened in 1840: “April 17.—This day the Twelve blessed and drank a bottle of wine at Penworthan, made by Mother Moon forty years before” (History of the Church, vol. 4, p. 120). Under the date of April 12, 1845, Hosea Stout recorded in his diary that he attended “a feast of beer and cakes prepared by the old police. The Old police and wives and some of the Twelve were present We had a joyful time as much cakes & beer as we could eat and drink . . .” (On The Mormon Frontier, The Diary of Hosea Stout, vol. 1, p. 34). On July 1, 1845, Hosea Stout recorded: “This day there was a grand concert . . . we had also the 12 and other authorities with us, and was also provided with as much beer, wine, cakes &c as we could eat and drink” (Ibid., p. 50). While Joseph Smith and other authorities in the Mormon Church did not observe the Word of Wisdom, others felt that it should be a strict rule for the church. In the minutes of a conference held at Far West in 1837 the following statement is found: “The congregation, after a few remarks from Sidney Rigdon, unanimously voted not to support stores and shops selling spirituous liquors, tea, coffee, or tobacco” (History of the Church, vol. 2, p. 524). It is interesting to note that when Joseph Smith opened his store in Nauvoo, it was supplied “with sugar, molasses, glass, salt, tea, coffee &c., purchased in St. Louis” (History of the Church, vol. 4, p. 483). In spite of the vote taken at Far West, not to patronize any store selling these items, Joseph Smith seems to have had a thriving business. It appears that Joseph Smith's own home was supplied with tea and coffee. George A. Smith related the following:

... a certain family, ... arrived in Kirtland, and the Prophet asked them to stop with him ... Sister Emma, in the mean time, asked the old lady if she would have a cup of tea ... or a cup of coffee. This whole family apostatized because they were invited to take a cup of tea or coffee, after the Word of Wisdom was given. (Journal of Discourses, vol. 2, p. 214)

Because of the fact that Joseph Smith did not keep the Word of Wisdom, Almon W. Babbitt felt that he had a right to break it. On the 19th of August, 1835, Almon W. Babbitt was brought to trial:

On the 19th, a charge was preferred before a council of the Presidency, against Elder Almon W. Babbitt, ...

Elder J. B. Smith testified that Elder Babbitt had assumed the prerogative of dictating to him in his preaching; and that he was not keeping the Word of Wisdom.

Elder Babbitt said that he had taken the liberty to break the Word of Wisdom, from the example of President Joseph Smith Jun., and others, but acknowledged that it was wrong; ... (History of the Church, vol. 2, p. 252)

Joseph's Bar

In Nauvoo Joseph Smith sold liquor; the following ordinance was passed in 1843 (the reader must remember that Joseph Smith was Mayor of Nauvoo at the time):

Ordinance on the Personal Sale of Liquors.

Section 1. Be it ordained by the City Council of Nauvoo, that the mayor of the city be and is hereby authorized to sell or give spirits of any quantity as he in his wisdom shall judge to be for the health and comfort or convenience of such travelers or other persons as shall visit his house from time to time.

Passed December 12, 1843.

Joseph Smith, Mayor.

Willard Richards, Recorder. (History of the Church, vol. 6, p. 111)

Joseph Smith's own son related the following:

About 1842, a new and larger house was built for us. ... Father proceeded to build an extensive addition running out from the south wing toward the east. ...

At any rate, it seemed spacious then, and a sign was put out giving it the dignified name of "The Nauvoo Mansion," ... Mother was to be installed as landlady, and soon made a trip to Saint Louis..

When she returned Mother found installed in the keeping-room of the hotel—that is to say, the main room where the guests assembled and where they were received upon arrival—a bar, with counter, shelves, bottles, glasses, and other paraphernalia customary for a fully-equipped tavern bar, and Porter Rockwell in charge as tender.

She was very much surprised and disturbed over this arrangement, but said nothing for a while ... she asked me where Father was. I told her he was in the front room ... Then she told me to go and tell him she wished to see him. I obeyed, and returned with him to the hall where Mother awaited him. "Joseph," she asked, "What is the meaning of that bar in this house?" ... "How does it look," she asked, "for the spiritual head of a religious body to be keeping a hotel in which is a room fitted out as a liquor-selling establishment?"

He reminded her that all taverns had their bars at which liquor was sold or dispensed..

Mother's reply came emphatically clear, though uttered quietly:

"Well, Joseph, ... I will take my children and go across to the old house and stay there, for I will not have them raised up under such conditions as this arrangement imposes upon us, nor have them mingle with the kind of men who frequent such a place. You are at liberty to make your choice; either that bar goes out of the house or we will."

It did not take Father long to make the choice, for he replied immediately, "Very well, Emma; I will have it removed at once"—and he did. (The Saints' Herald, January 22, 1935, p. 110)

Joseph Smith even tried to justify drunkenness because of the example of Noah. The following appears in Joseph Smith's History of the Church:

Sunday, 7.—Elder William O. Clark preached about two hours, reproved the Saints for a lack of sanctity, and a want of holy living, enjoining sanctity, solemnity and temperance in the extreme, in the rigid sectarian style.

I reproved him as Pharisaical and hypocritical. ... "What many call sin is not sin; I do many things to break down superstition, and I will break it down;" I referred to the curse of Ham for laughing at Noah, while in his wine, but doing no harm. Noah was a righteous man, and yet he drank wine and became intoxicated; the Lord did not forsake him in consequence thereof, for he retained all the power of his priesthood, and when he was accused by Canaan, he cursed him by the priesthood which he held, and the Lord had respect to his word, and the priesthood which he held, notwithstanding he was drunk, and the curse remains upon the posterity of Canaan until this day. (History of the Church, vol. 4, pp. 445-446)

Oliver Boardman Huntington related the following incident in his journal:

Robert Thompson was a faithful just clerk for Joseph Smith the Prophet in Nauvoo and had been in his office steady near or quite 2 years. Joseph said to brother Thompson one day. "Robert I want you to go and get on a buss [bust?] go and get drunk and have a good spree. If you don't you will die."

Robert did not do it. He was very pious exemplary man and never guilty of such an impropriety as he thought that to be. In less than 2 weeks he was dead and buried. (Journal of Oliver B. Huntington, typed copy at the Utah State Historical Society, vol. 2, p. 166)

Juanita Brooks shows that there was even drinking in the unfinished Nauvoo Temple:

... others were still putting in their time on the temple. On April 23, Samuel Richards told how the carpenters swept up their shavings "after which it was voted that Bro. Angel go and inform the Trustees that the hands were ready to drink the barrel of wine which had been reserved for them." The painters continued their work until the evening of April 29, when a group of the workers and their wives met in the attic and "had a feast of cakes, pies, wine, &c, where we enjoyed ourselves with prayer, preaching, administering for healing, blessing children, and music and dancing until near Midnight. The other hands completed the painting in the lower room." (John D. Lee, pp. 86-87)

On the way to Utah, Brigham Young counseled the Mormons to "make beer as a drink" (John D. Lee, p. 116). "Two lbs. tea, 5 lbs. coffee" were listed as part of the "requirements of each family of five for the journey across the plains" (History of the Church, vol. 7, p. 454). On October 9, 1865, Brigham Young stated that "it is very rarely indeed that I taste tea or coffee; ..." (Journal of Discourses, vol. 11, p. 140). However this may be, in 1854 Nunes Carvalho traveled with Brigham Young and reported that Young drank coffee on a regular basis:

This was an imposing travelling party, ... taking the word of command from the leading wagon, in which rode Gov. Brigham Young. One of his wives, an accomplished and beautiful lady, ... made her husband's coffee, and cooked his meals ... I ... frequently had my seat at their primitive table, ... a moveable table was arranged in the wagon. Venison, beef, coffee, eggs, pies, etc., were served at every meal. (Among the Mormons, edited by William Mulder and A. Russell Mortensen, p. 267)

According to Hosea Stout's diary, Brigham Young made this statement on September 27, 1845: "... I am and ever intend to be the Master of my passions ... some may say I am in the habits of taking snuff and tea yet I am no slave to these passions and can leave these off if they make my brother affronted ... " (On The Mormon Frontier, The Diary of Hosea Stout, vol. 1, p. 75). On April 7, 1867, Brigham Young acknowledged in the Tabernacle that he had chewed tobacco for many years. His excuse was that he used it for a toothache:

... it is not my privilege to drink liquor, neither is it my privilege to eat tobacco. Well, bro. Brigham, have you not done it? Yes, for many years, but I ceased its habitual practice. I used it for toothache; now I am free from that pain, and my mouth is never stained with tobacco. (Journal of Discourses, vol. 12, p. 404)

Brigham Young's son, Brigham Young, Jun., did not try to excuse his use of tobacco as his father did. He stated:

I remember once, when a boy, Jedediah M. Grant saw me chewing tobacco, and said he, "You chew tobacco, do you?" "Yes, sir." "Well, I never had any taste for it; it is no virtue in me that I do not use it, I tried hard enough, but it made me sick." The virtue, brethren, is in putting away or overcoming habits which you know would impede your progress in the kingdom of God. It was not virtue in Bro. Grant that he did not chew tobacco, he tried to learn how, but could not do it. I tried, and succeeded. (Journal of Discourses, vol. 15, pp. 141-142)

Young's Distillery

The Mormon Apostle John A. Widtsoe stated:

"Boothill cemeteries," in which were buried men killed in unholy orgies, mostly in saloons, are not found in Utah. Saloons came there with non-Mormons. (Gospel Interpretations, Salt Lake City, 1947, p. 250)

This statement by the Apostle Widtsoe is certainly untrue. Actually, Brigham Young, the second President of the Mormon Church owned the "first bar-room" in Salt Lake City. The historian Hubert Howe Bancroft gives this information:

As to the manufacture of whiskey, President Taylor states that alcohol was first made by the Saints for bathing, pickling, and medicinal purposes, and was little used for drinking. Stills were afterward obtained from emigrants, and the manufacture and sale of alcohol were later controlled by the city councils. The first bar-room in S. L. City, and the only one for years, was in the Salt Lake House, owned by President Young and Feramorz Little. It was opened for the accommodation of travellers, whose requirements would be supplied by some one, and it was thought by the brethren that they had better control the trade than have outsiders do so. (History of Utah, p. 540, n. 44)

Stanley P. Hirshon states:

In Nauvoo the Mormons drank heavily. . . . in December 1843 the Mormon-controlled City Council authorized Joseph Smith to sell liquor in his hotel.

In Utah the church dominated the liquor trade. In 1856 Caleb Green freighted six tons of tobacco, rum, whiskey, brandy, tea, and coffee across the plains for Young, and two years later The New York Times reported that the "principal drinking-saloon and gambling-room are in Salt Lake House, a building under the control of the Church and the immediate superintendency of Heber C. Kimball." . . .

Young tried his best to rid himself of rival brewers. (The Lion of the Lord, Knopf, 1969, p. 285)

On June 7, 1863, Brigham Young acknowledged to the congregation assembled in the Bowery, that he had built a distillery:

When there was no whisky to be had here, and we needed it for rational purposes, I built a house to make it in. When the distillery was almost completed and in good working order, an army was heard of in our vicinity and I shut up the works; I did not make a gallon of whisky at my works, because it came here in great quantities, more than was needed. (Journal of Discourses, vol. 10, p. 206)

Hubert Howe Bancroft gives this information: "Peter K. Dotson, . . . came to Salt Lake City in 1851, and was first employed by Brigham as manager of a distillery, afterwards becoming express and mail agent" (History of Utah, p. 573, n. 2). Josiah

F. Gibbs gives this interesting information concerning Brigham Young's distillery:

During forty years the Mormon prophets absolutely controlled the city council and police force of Salt Lake. And whatever vice and crime arose from the sale and consumption of intoxicants during the period under discussion, is justly chargeable to the Mormon leaders.

Instead, however, of bringing their unappealable dictum to bear on the side of temperance and decent morals, the Prophet Brigham became a distiller of whiskey and other intoxicants, and high priests were the wholesale and retail distributors.

The evidence in support of the foregoing allegations is clipped from data compiled from the city records by gentlemen living in Salt Lake City, . . .

On July 2, 1861, the special committee, to whom was referred the subject of the manufacture and sale of liquor, presented a report reading as follows:

To the Honorable Mayor of Salt Lake City: —

Your committee, to whom was referred the subject of the manufacture and sale of spirituous liquor, would report that they visited several distilleries in and near the city and would respectfully recommend that the City Council purchase or rent the distillery erected by Brigham Young near the Mouth of Parley's canyon, and put the same in immediate operation, employing such persons as shall be deemed necessary to manufacture a sufficient quantity to answer the public demand; controlling the sale of the same, and that the profits accruing therefrom be paid into the City Treasury.

(Signed) Alderman Clinton,
Alderman Sheets,
Councilman Felt.

Orlando W. Powers, who served as associate justice of the supreme court of Utah, gave this testimony in the "Reed Smoot Case":

After the Liberal Party had secured control of the city of Salt Lake, I procured an investigation to be made of the city records, which had been written up by the Mormon city recorders from the earliest time, . . .

The city of Salt Lake at that time ran a saloon—a city saloon. It had a city billiard hall. It had a city bathing establishment. It ran a distillery. Its recorder kept an account with the trustee in trust for the Mormon Church, which trustee was credited with tithing—and the tithing, by the way, is the 10 per cent that good Mormons are supposed to pay into the church—due from the various church officials, and they were charged with liquor, and for bathing, and for things of that kind. (The Reed Smoot Case, vol. 1, pp. 804-805)

On July 26, 1890, Judge Powers gave a speech in which he stated:

It will please you to know that notwithstanding the fact that the city had gone into the whisky business on its own hook, on August 19, 1862, it granted to Brigham Young a license to distill peaches into brandy. August 11, 1865, Mr. Young and George Q. Cannon addressed the Council on the liquor question. Mr. Young said:

"This community needs vinegar and will require spirituous liquor for washing and for health, and it will be right and proper for the city to continue its sale as it has done and make a profit."

. . . Brigham Young kept an open account on the city books, and this account shows that from 1862 to 1872 there were 235 different charges for liquor purchased by him amounting in the aggregate to $9316.66, or an average of $846.97 per year, . . .

An examination of the official records of the United States shows that from 1862, when the tax on distilled spirits was first levied, until the coming of the Union Pacific railroad in 1869, which was the beginning of the Gentile era in Utah, thirty-seven distilleries existed in this Territory. . . . These facts, taken from public records, dispose of the charge that the Gentiles invaded a temperance community. (The Salt Lake Tribune, July 14, 1908)

According to John D. Lee, Brigham Young kept a large supply of liquor. Under the date of May, 14 [15th], 1867, Lee recorded the following in his journal:

About 5 P.M. Prest. B. Young & suite arrived in the city from his southern visit among the Sai[n]ts. . . . On the following day I went to see him in his Mansion where I spent near 1/2 day—very agreeable indeed. He had a decanter of sp[ic]endid wine brought in of his own make & said, I want to treat Bro. Lee to as Good an article, I think, as can be bought in Dixie. The wine indeed was a Superior article. He said that he had some 300 gallons & treated about 2000$ worth of liquers yearly & continued that we [he] wish[e]d that some one would take his wine at 5$ per gallon & sell it, where upon Pres. D. H. Wells said that he would take 200 gal. at 6$ a gallon &c. (A Mormon Chronicle, The Diaries of John D. Lee, vol. 2, pp. 71-72)

In 1867, Brigham Young stated that most of the Bishops did not observe the Word of Wisdom:

You go through the wards in the city, and then through the wards in the country, and ask the Bishops—“Do you keep the Word of Wisdom?” The reply will be “Yes; No, not exactly.” “Do you drink tea?” “No.” “Coffee?” “No.” “Do you drink whisky?” “No.” “Well, then, why do you not observe the Word of Wisdom?” “Well, this tobacco, I cannot give it up.” And in this he sets an example to every man, and to every boy over ten years of age, in his ward, to nibble at and chew tobacco. You go to another ward, and perhaps the Bishop does not chew tobacco, nor drink tea nor coffee, but once in a while he takes a little spirits, and keeps whiskey in his house, in which he will occasionally indulge—Go to another ward, and perhaps the Bishop does not drink whisky nor chew tobacco, but he “cannot give up his tea and coffee.” And so it goes through the whole church. Not every Bishop indulges in one or more of these habits, but most of them do. I recollect being at a trial not long since where quite a number of Bishops had been called in as witnesses, but I could not learn that there was one who did not drink whiskey, and I think that most of them drank tea and coffee. I think that we have some bishops in this city who do not chew tobacco, nor drink liquor nor tea nor coffee to excess. . . . If a person is weary, worn out, cast down, fainting, or dying, a brandy sling, a little wine, or a cup of tea is good to revive them. Do not throw these things away, and say they must never be used; they are good to be used with judgment, prudence, and discretion. Ask our bishops if they drink tea every day, and in most cases they will tell you they do if they can get it. (Journal of Discourses, vol. 12, pp. 402-403)

The same year that Brigham Young made the statements cited above, the Apostle Wilford Woodruff stated: “Very few of us have kept the Word of Wisdom; but I have no doubt that if the council of President Young were carried out it would save the people of this Territory a million of dollars annually” (Journal of Discourses, vol. 11, p. 370). In a sermon delivered March 10, 1860, Brigham Young stated:

Many of the brethren chew tobacco, and I have advised them to be modest about it. Do not take out a whole plug of tobacco in meeting before the eyes of the congregation, and cut off a long slice and put it in your mouth, to the annoyance of everybody around. Do not glory in this disgraceful practice. If you must use tobacco, put a small portion in your mouth when no person sees you, and be careful that no one sees you chew it. I do not charge you with sin. You have the “Word of Wisdom.” Read it. (Journal of Discourses, vol. 8, p. 361)

Tobacco chewing became a serious problem in the Tabernacle, for in 1870 Brigham Young stated:

There is another subject I wish to refer to. Last Sabbath this front gallery, . . . was very full. After meeting was dismissed I took a walk through it, and to see the floor that had been occupied by those professing to be gentlemen, and I do not know but brethren, you might have supposed that cattle had been there rolling and standing around, for here and there were great quids of tobacco, and places one or two feet square smeared with tobacco juice. I want to say to the doorkeepers that when you see gentlemen who cannot omit chewing and spitting while in this house, request them to leave; and if such persons refuse to leave, and continue their spitting, just take them and lead them out carefully and kindly. We do not want to have the house thus defiled. It is an imposition for gentlemen to spit tobacco juice around, or to leave their quids of tobacco on the floor; they dirty the house, and if a lady happen to besmear the bottom of her dress, which can hardly be avoided, it is highly offensive. We therefore request all gentlemen attending conference to omit tobacco chewing while here. (Journal of Discourses, vol. 13, p. 344)

The Mormon writer Leonard J. Arrington makes these interesting observations concerning the “Word of Wisdom”:

The strong and increased emphasis on the Word of Wisdom which characterized the official Mormon attitude throughout the remainder of the century appears to have begun in 1867. . . .

The explanation for these rules and the widespread resolves to obey the Word of Wisdom seems to lie in the conditions of the Mormon economy . . . was necessary for the Latter-day Saints to develop and maintain a self-sufficient economy in their Rocky Mountain retreat. Economic independence was a necessary goal of the group and every program of the church tended toward that end . . . There must be no waste of liquid assets on imported consumers’ goods. . . . Saints who used their cash to purchase imported Bull Durham, Battle-Axe plugs, tea, coffee, and similar “wasteful” (because not productive) products were taking an action which was opposed to the economic interests of the territory. In view of this situation, President Young came to be unalterably opposed to the expenditure of money by the Saints on imported tea, coffee, and tobacco. It was consistent with the economics of the time that he should have had no great objection to tobacco chewing if the tobacco was grown locally. It was also consistent that he should have successfully developed a locally-produced “Mormon” tea to take the place of the imported article. . . . In a letter of instructions to all the settlements south of Great Salt Lake City, President Young wrote:

This community has not yet concluded to entirely dispense with the use of tobacco, and great quantities have been imported . . . I know of no better climate and soil than are here for the successful culture of tobacco. Instead of buying it in a foreign market and importing it over a thousand miles, why not raise it in our country or do without it? . . . Tea is in great demand in Utah, and anything under that name sells readily at an extravagant price. Tea can be produced in this Territory in sufficient quantities for home consumption, and if we raise it ourselves we know that we have the pure article. If we do not raise it, I would suggest that we do without it.

In his sermons Brigham Young made these statements concerning tea, coffee, tobacco and whiskey:

You know that we all profess to believe the “Word of Wisdom.” There has been a great deal said about it, more in former than in latter years. We as Latter-day Saints, care but little about tobacco; but as “Mormons” we use a great deal. . . . The traders and passing emigration have sold tons of tobacco, besides what is sold here regularly. I say that $60,000 annually is the smallest figure I can estimate the sales at. Tobacco can be raised here as well as it can be raised in any other place.

It wants attention and care. If we use it, let us raise it here. I recommend for some man to go to raising tobacco. One man, who came here last fall, is going to do so; and if he is diligent, he will raise quite a quantity. I want to see some man go to and make a business of raising tobacco and stop sending money out of the territory for that article.

Some of the brethren are very strenuous upon the “Word of Wisdom,” and would like to have me preach upon it, and urge it upon the brethren, and make it a test of fellowship. I do not think that I shall do so. I have never done so. We annually expend only $60,000 to break the “Word of Wisdom,” and we can save the money and still break it, if we will break it. (Journal of Discourses, vol. 9, p. 35)

What I am now about to say is on the subject of tobacco. Let us raise our own tobacco, or quit using it. In the years '49, '50, '51, '52, and '53, and so long as I kept myself posted . . . we spent upwards of $100,000 dollars a year for tobacco alone! We now spend considerable more than we did then. Let us save this ready means in our country by abstaining from the use of this narcotic, or raise it ourselves. (Ibid., vol. 11, p. 140)

It is true that we do not raise our own tobacco: we might raise it if we would. We do not raise our tea; but we might raise it if we would, for tea-raising, this is as good a country as China; and the coffee bean can be raised a short distance south of us. . . . We can sustain ourselves; and as for such so-called luxuries as tea, coffee, tobacco and whiskey, we can produce them or do without them. (Ibid., vol. 11, pp. 113-114)

Brigham Young also recommend that the Mormons make wine. Angus M. Woodbury stated:

A circular was sent out to the various orders of the stake by Brigham Young and George A. Smith suggesting policies of operation. In brief, it suggested that fruit be canned or dried fit for any market; that wine be made at few places under expert direction for exportation; . . . (The Mormon United Order in Utah, p. 9)

Leonard J. Arrington informs us that Brigham Young wanted most of the wine to be sold to the gentiles:

The attempts of the latter-day Saints in southern Utah and elsewhere to make wine are all illustrative of the dominating philosophy of economic self-sufficiency. One function of these enterprises, of course, was to provide wine for the sacrament of the Lord's Supper. . . . Wine was used in the sacrament of the church as late as 1897. A more important function of wine-making, however, was to provide much-needed income for the poverty-stricken pioneers in Utah's Dixie. The intention was to sell most of the wine in mining communities in southern Utah and Nevada. Brigham Young instructed as follows: “First, by lightly pressing, make a white wine. Then give a heavier pressing and make a colored wine. Then barrel up this wine, and if my counsel is taken, this wine will not be drunk here, but will be exported, and thus increase the fund.” More of the Dixie wine was consumed in the Mormon settlements than church officials had hoped, however, and the enterprise was discontinued before 1900. (Brigham Young University Studies, Winter 1959, pp. 46-47)

In footnote 29 on page 251 of A Mormon Chronicle, vol. 2, this interesting information is given: “At Brigham Young's suggestion, Neagle went east . . . In 1865 he was called upon to take charge of the wine-making industry at Toquerville. Here he raised many varieties of grapes, imported a wine press from California, and soon became the largest wine producer in the intermountain area. His large stone house with the wine-cellar basement still stands in Toquerville.” In his book, Desert Saints, Nels Anderson gives this information:

Wine-making was another Mormon enterprise that came to the same end as the cotton, iron, and silk missions. The St. George Tithing Office reported on March, 1887, a supply of 6,610 gallons of wine, valued at 50 cents per gallon. . . .

The making of wine and some whiskey and brandy went ahead without organized direction for more than a decade. On March 26, 1874, when Brigham Young spoke to the women . . . He favored making wine for sale to outsiders. . . . The tithing office at St. George received wine of many grades. It met the problem by setting up standards. The tithing clerk issued these instructions on September 20, 1879:

In order to obtain a more uniform grade of wine than we are able to obtain by mixing together the tithes of small pressings in the hands of sundry individuals; it is suggested that those having but small quantities of grapes to make up into wine, deliver their tithes in grapes at this office. This may be arranged under the direction of the bishop so that economy may be preserved in the hauling, for which, of course, credit will be given on the tithing account.

Thus the church found itself the chief single producer of wine in the Dixie area . . . Because the tithing offices held the largest amount of wine for the market at any time, it was in a position to name the price. Church interest is evidenced in a letter sent by the St. George Tithing Office August 12, 1880. This letter was a bill sent to the managers in charge of building the Manti Temple, to whom had been sent a quantity of wine—4 barrels, or 158 gallons. It was not sold, but tithing credit was asked as follows: $187.50 for the wine; $20.00 for the barrels; for hauling the wine to Manti, $16.00; total $233.50. This was given in pay to the builders of the temple.

In 1889 Edward H. Snow, clerk of the St. George Tithing Office, wrote the presiding bishop at Salt Lake City regarding wine: “Our sales during the year do not amount to half of what we are obliged to make up from the grapes that are brought in. . . . We have made at this office alone over 600 gallons this year. We cannot refuse the grapes or the wine, and I see no way to get rid of it.” Snow wanted the presiding bishop to take the surplus. Later the tithing office sent men with loads of wine to the northern settlements, where they traded Dixie's liquid wealth for wheat and flour or took it to the mining camps, . . .

Dixie brethren did not follow Brother Brigham's counsel. They drank so much of the wine that by 1890 drunkenness was a worry to the church leaders. The tithing office discontinued accepting wine for tithes and abandoned its own presses. (Desert Saints, by Nels Anderson, University of Chicago Press, 1966, pp. 373-374)

The Mormon wine business proved the entering wedge for a kind of fraternalism between Mormons and Gentiles which was very disturbing to local church leaders. Mormons who drank wine with the Gentiles became friendly with them. Besides breaking down the social barriers, wine-drinking became a vice to some of the brethren. . . .

The High Council complained that some wine-drinkers did not pay their tithing, that others neglected their families, and that still other wine-drinkers were degenerating into loafers. . . . The bishops were required to take offenders to task; but this was not easy, since in some wards most of the brethren made wine for sale and most of the brethren had become wine-drinkers to some degree. . . .

Since the St. George Tithing Office, as a practical measure, had originally joined with the farmers in making wine, the church authorities were much embarrassed in pushing their drive against wine-drinkers. About 1887 the tithing office discontinued making wine. The passing of Silver Reef as a market left the producers with quantities of wine on hand. The tithing office managed, as well as it could, to get rid of the more than six thousand gallons on hand.

From the moral angle, church leaders were forced to recognize that their people could not be makers of liquor without being drinkers of it, too. There were too many drinkers of wine and too few moderate drinkers among them. (Desert Saints, 1966, pp. 435-436)

Wine and Visions

One anti-Mormon writer claimed that the witnesses to the Book of Mormon were drunk at the time they received their vision concerning the plates. We have been unable to find any evidence to support this accusation. There is, however, evidence to show that wine was used to excess in the Kirtland Temple at the very time the Mormons were claiming to receive visions.

The reader will remember that we quoted William Harris as saying:

In the evening, they met for the endowment. The fast was then broken by eating light wheat bread, and drinking as much wine as they saw proper. Smith knew well how to infuse the spirit which they expected to receive; so he encouraged the brethren to drink freely, telling them that the wine was consecrated, and would not make them drunk. . . . they began to prophecy, pronouncing blessings upon their friends, and curses upon their enemies. If I should be so unhappy as to go to the regions of the damned, I never expect to hear language more awful, or more becoming the infernal pit, than was uttered that night. (Mormonism Portrayed, pp. 31-32)

Charles L. Walker, a faithful Mormon, recorded the following in his diary:

Sun., Nov. 21, 1880. . . . Bro. Milo Andress . . . Spoke of blessings and power of God manifested in the Kirtland Temple. Said he once asked the Prophet who [why?] he (Milo) did not feel that power that was spoken of as the power which was felt on the day of Pentecost? . . . when we had fasted for 24 hours and partaken of the Lord's supper, namely a piece of bread as big as your double fist and half a pint of wine in the temple, I was there and saw the Holy Ghost descend upon the heads of those present like cloven tongues of fire. ("Diary of Charles L. Walker," 1855-1902, excerpts typed, 1969, p. 35)

The statement by the Mormon Apostle George A. Smith would also lead a person to believe that wine was used to excess:

. . . after the people had fasted all day, they sent out and got wine and bread, . . . they ate and drank, . . . some of the High Counsel of Missouri stepped into the stand, and, as righteous Noah did when he awoke from his wine, commenced to curse their enemies. (Journal of Discourses, vol. 2, p. 216)

In a statement dated February 27, 1885, Mrs. Alfred Morley made this comment:

I have heard many Mormons who attended the dedication, or endowment of the Temple, say that very many became drunk. . . . The Mormon leaders would stand up to prophesy and were so drunk they said they could not get it out, and would call for another drink. Over a barrel of liquor was used at the service. (Naked Truths About Mormonism, Oakland, California, April, 1888, p. 2)

Isaac Aldrich stated: "My brother, Hazen Aldrich, who was president of the Seventies, told me when the Temple was dedicated a barrel of wine was used and they had a drunken 'pow-wow'" (Ibid., p. 3).

Stephen H. Hart gave this information:

Mr. McWhitney, who was a Mormon . . . said he attended a service which lasted from 10 A.M. until 4 P.M., and there was another service in the evening. The Lord's Supper was celebrated and they passed the wine in pails several times to the audience, and each person drank as much as he chose from a cup. He said it was mixed liquor, and he believed the Mormon leaders intended to get the audience under the influence of the mixed liquor, so they would believe it was the Lord's doings. . . . When the liquor was repassed, Mr. McWhitney told them he had endowment enough, and said he wanted to get out of the Temple, which was densely crowded. (Ibid., p. 3)

The reader will remember that David Whitmer, one of the three witnesses to the Book of Mormon, called the endowment "a trumped up yarn" and said that "there was no visitation" (The Des Moines Daily News, October, 16, 1886). The fact that the Mormons fasted for some time and then drank an excessive amount of wine probably led many of them to curse their enemies and to believe that they had seen visions.

LaMar Petersen has gathered a great deal of information on this subject which he has compiled in a manuscript entitled "Hearts Made Glad." When this manuscript is published it will throw important light on this subject.

Hypocrisy

The Mormon Apostle Orson Pratt once stated:

I do not wonder that the world say that the Latter-day Saints do not believe their own revelations. Why? Because we do not practice them. (Journal of Discourses, vol. 17, p. 104)

We have shown that Joseph Smith, the founder of the Mormon Church, did not keep the Word of Wisdom, yet, according to Joseph Fielding Smith, Joseph Smith taught that a member of the church could not hold an office unless he observed the Word of Wisdom:

One question considered was as follows: "Whether disobedience to the word of wisdom was a transgression sufficient to deprive an official member from holding office in the Church, after having it sufficiently taught him?" After a free and full discussion Joseph Smith, who presided, gave his decision as follows: "No official member in this Church is worthy to hold an office after having the word of wisdom properly taught him; and he, the official member, neglecting to comply with or obey it." This decision was confirmed by unanimous vote. (Essentials in Church History, p. 169)

It is certainly strange that Joseph Smith could break the Word of Wisdom and yet retain his position as President of the Church. The thing that makes this especially strange is that when a member of the church did not observe the Word of Wisdom, this was sometimes used against him if he was tried for his fellowship. Leonard J. Arrington stated: "Moreover, when a council at Far West tried a high church official (David Whitmer) for his fellowship, the first of the five charges against him was that he did not observe the Word of Wisdom" (Brigham Young University Studies, Winter 1959, p. 40). As we have already shown, when Almon W. Babbitt was charged with not observing the Word of Wisdom, his only defence was that he "had taken the liberty to break the Word of Wisdom, from the example of President Joseph Smith, Jun., and others." We have also shown that after Joseph Smith's death, Brigham Young and other church leaders did not observe the Word of Wisdom.

It is a well known fact that Ann Eliza Webb, who was married to Brigham Young, later left Young and wrote a book against the Mormon Church. Dr. Hugh Nibley tried to discredit her book by stating that she was never a good Mormon: "She may have detested the man, but if she really believed in his religion, as she perpetually protests, her behavior would have been totally different: at the very least she would have gone to prayers, kept the Word of Wisdom, and paid tithing—none of which she did" (Sounding Brass, p. 152). Using the same argument, we would ask Dr. Nibley why Joseph Smith and Brigham Young did not keep the Word of Wisdom?

Heber C. Kimball, who was a member of the First Presidency, once stated that "virtuous Saints, . . . will not sell whiskey, and stick up groceries, and establish distilleries, . . ." (Journal of Discourses, vol. 2, p. 161). This statement seems very strange when we learn that Joseph Smith sold whiskey in Nauvoo, and that Brigham Young built a distillery and sold alcoholic beverages in Utah. Even the Mormon-owned Zions Cooperative Mercantile Institution (now known as ZCMI) sold the items forbidden by the Word of Wisdom. On October 7, 1873, George A. Smith, a member of the First Presidency, made this statement: "We are doing a great business in tea, coffee, and tobacco in the Cooperative Store" (Journal of Discourses, vol. 16, p. 238).

In 1908 the Salt Lake Tribune accused the Mormon leaders of trying to monopolize the liquor business in Utah:

... the Mormon priesthood...resisted to the utmost the establishment of liquor houses by Gentiles here for a good while, not because they were liquor houses, but because the Gentiles were getting the trade. . . . This fierce effort to retain the liquor traffic here as a monopoly of the church was quite in accord with the present status of affairs here where the church is running the biggest liquor business in the state, through its Z.C.M.I. drug store and also through the big liquor business done by Apostle Smoot in his drug store at Provo. . . . By means of auxiliary companies like the Z.C.M.I. drug company they maintain a huge liquor trade for the benefit of the church hierarchs, and the trustee-in-trust for the church, and at the same time claim to be special advocates of the temperance cause; and while taking the tremendous profits of that trade, throw up their hands in horror at the idea of people spending so much money for liquor. . . . denying all responsibility for it, while at the same time pocketing the profits and getting away with the rewards. (Salt Lake Tribune, July 14, 1908)

It would appear that even some of the Mormons were shocked by the fact that the church-owned Z.C.M.I. sold items which were forbidden in the Word of Wisdom. Joseph F. Smith, who became the sixth President of the Church, tried to justify the sale of these items in the church store:

Some of our pretended pious people, a few years ago, were shocked and horrified by seeing the symbol of the All-Seeing Eye and the words “Holiness to the Lord” in gilt letters over the front of Zion’s Cooperative Mercantile Institution. Especially was this the case with some of our brethren when they found these letters over the drug department of Z.C.M.I. Why was it? Why some of these pious (?) Mormons found that Z.C.M.I. under the symbol of the All-Seeing Eye and the sacred words, “Holiness to the Lord,” sold tea and coffee, and tobacco, and other things possibly that Latter-day Saints ought not to use; and at the drug store, Z.C.M.I. kept liquors of various kinds for medicinal purposes. It was terribly shocking to some of the Latter-day Saints that under these holy words liquor should be kept for sale. Has it injured me, in any sense of the word, because Z.C.M.I. drug store kept liquor for sale? Has it made me a drunkard? Have I been under the necessity of guzzling liquid poison? Have I made myself a sot because liquor was kept for sale by Z.C.M.I.? I am not the worse for it, thank the Lord. And who else is? No one, except those pious Mormons (?) who in open day or under the cover of night would go into the drug store and buy liquor to drink. . . . Those who were the most horrified at seeing the All-Seeing Eye and “Holiness to the Lord” over the front door of Z.C.M.I., I will guarantee are the ones that have bought the most tea and coffee, tobacco and whiskey there. . . . It does not matter to me how much tea and coffee Z.C.M.I. sells, so long as I do not buy it. If I do not drink it am I not all right? And if the poor creature that wants it can get it there, that ought to satisfy him. If he could not get it there, he would not patronize Z.C.M.I. at all, but would go some where else to deal. (Conference Report, April 1898, p. 11)

It is interesting to note that Joseph F. Smith served as President of Z.C.M.I.—as well as President of the Mormon Church—at the time liquor was sold there. In the Reed Smoot Case we find the following testimony:

Mr. CARLISLE. You are traffic manager of the Zion Cooperative Mercantile Institution, I believe?
 Mr. LOVE. Yes, sir.
 Mr. CARLISLE. Does it not deal in liquors?
 Mr. LOVE. It does.
 Mr. CARLISLE. Who is the President of that concern?
 Mr. LOVE. Joseph F. Smith. (Reed Smoot Case, vol. 4, pp. 318-319)

Although the Word of Wisdom contains some good precepts, it is obviously a product of the thinking of Joseph Smith’s times. Alcoholic beverages were condemned by the temperance movement years before Joseph Smith gave his “revelation.” Although Smith was correct in stating that tobacco is harmful, we do not feel that this proves that his “revelation” is divinely inspired. The Wayne Sentinel—a newspaper printed in the neighborhood where Joseph Smith grew up—published these statements concerning tobacco three years before Joseph Smith gave the “Word of Wisdom”:

It is really surprising that a single individual could be found, who, after experiencing the distressing sensations almost invariably produced by the first use of tobacco, would be willing to risk their recurrence a second time: . . . tobacco is, in fact, an absolute poison.

... We have ourselves known individuals, in whom very severe and dangerous affections of the stomach—tremors of the limbs, and great emaciation, were referable to excessive smoking and chewing, and which were removed only after these habits were entirely relinquished. (Wayne Sentinel, November 6, 1829)

As we mentioned earlier, LaMar Petersen has prepared a manuscript entitled “Hearts Made Glad.” When this manuscript is published it will throw a great deal of light on the Word of Wisdom and Joseph Smith’s attitude towards it.

27. The Mormon Kingdom

On May 12, 1844, the Mormon Prophet Joseph Smith made this statement: “I calculate to be one of the instruments of setting up the kingdom of Daniel by the word of the Lord, and I intend to lay a foundation that will revolutionize the whole world” (History of the Church, vol. 6, p. 365).

The Mormon Apostle Orson Hyde once stated:

What the world calls “Mormonism” will rule every nation. Joseph Smith and Brigham Young will be the head. God has decreed it, and his own right arm will accomplish it. This will make the heathen rage, and the people imagine a vain thing. (Journal of Discourses, vol. 7, p. 53)

John Taylor, who became the third President of the Church, made this statement in 1865:

We do believe it, and honestly acknowledge that this is that kingdom which the Lord has commenced to establish upon the earth, and that it will not only govern all people in a religious capacity, but also in a political capacity. (Journal of Discourses, vol. 11, p. 53)

Heber C. Kimball, who was a member of the First Presidency, made this statement in 1859:

And so the Nations will bow to this kingdom, sooner or later, and all hell cannot help it. (Journal of Discourses, vol. 7, p. 170)

It was in Nauvoo, Illinois, that Joseph Smith did the most toward planning the kingdom which he hoped would eventually rule every nation. In the Preface to his book Quest For Empire, The Political Kingdom of God and the Council of Fifty in Mormon History, Klaus J. Hansen says that “the idea of a political kingdom of God, promulgated by a secret ‘Council of Fifty,’ is by far the most important key to an understanding of the Mormon past.” On page 24 of the same book, we find the following statement: “Certain non-Mormons, curiously enough, seem to have known more about the political ambitions of Joseph Smith and Brigham Young than most faithful Latter-day Saints.”

As early as 1838 Thomas B. Marsh, President of the Council of the Twelve Apostles, left the church and made an affidavit in which he stated:

The plan of said Smith, the Prophet, is to take this State, and he professes to his people to intend taking the United States and ultimately the whole world. (Affidavit of Thomas B. Marsh, as printed in A History of the Latter-day Saints in Northern Missouri From 1836 to 1839, by Leland Gentry, Brigham Young University, 1965, p. 414)

Council of Fifty

Not long before his death, Joseph Smith formed a secret organization known as the “Council of Fifty.” The Mormon writer John J. Stewart states:

The Prophet established a confidential Council of Fifty or “Ytfif,” comprised of both Mormons and non-Mormons, to help attend to temporal matters, including the eventual development of a one-world government, in harmony with preparatory plans for the second advent of the Saviour. (Joseph Smith, The Mormon Prophet, by John J. Stewart, Salt Lake City, 1966, p. 204)

The Mormon writer Klaus J. Hansen gives us this information:

The Council of Fifty, according to charter member Benjamin F. Johnson, consisted of “a select circle of the prophet’s most trusted friends, including the twelve [apostles] but not all constituted authorities of the Church.” . . . Joseph Smith established the precedent that the president of the church should also be the president of the Council of Fifty, a custom followed both by Brigham Young and John Taylor. . . .

What Smith taught in these meetings is largely a matter of conjecture, because the deliberations and actions of the Council of Fifty were then and still remain for the most part shrouded in secrecy. . . . Secrecy at times went so far that papers accumulated during a meeting were burned at the close of the session. . . . Ultimately, therefore, the whole world would be aware of the existence of the Council of Fifty. In fact, it is difficult to see how it could have been otherwise, since world government was to be one of the Council’s primary missions. . . . the temporal laws of the kingdom of God were to be based on a modified version of the Constitution of the United States. . . . The Council of Fifty was the “highest court on earth.” As such, it considered itself superior to any codifications of the law, even that of a constitution. (Quest for Empire, pp. 61-68)

On pages 4-5 of the same book, Klaus Hansen states:

Even among the Mormons, few were themselves aware of the revolutionary implications inherent in the concept of the political kingdom of God as taught by their prophet Joseph Smith to a small group of faithful followers, after he had initiated them into a secret Council of Fifty in the spring of 1844. . . . Indeed, if few Mormons, in 1844, knew what kind of kingdom their prophet had organized that year, fewer know today.

The Mormon writer J. D. Williams made this statement:

And in the case of the Grand Council of the Kingdom, the Church obviously contemplated far more than “giving advice.” Believed to have been organized in March, 1844, the Grand Council (or “Council of Fifty”) was to be the government of the Kingdom of God (which Kingdom was not the Church but the ultimate governing body for all mankind). The Council was composed of two non-Mormons and forty-eight to fifty Mormon high priests. . . .

The picture is one of a secret government, responsible not to the governed but to ecclesiastical authority, which will provide benign rule for all people, without election. (Dialogue: A Journal of Mormon Thought, Summer, 1966, pp. 46-47)

Klaus J. Hansen informs us that the “Council of Fifty” wore special robes, had secret signs, and bore some resemblance to Freemasonry:

Bennett’s secret order bore some remarkable similarities to certain masonic rituals and practices. This was also true of Smith’s Council of Fifty. . . . John C. Bennett was able to convince Smith that a masonic lodge in Nauvoo might be a considerable asset . . . Smith himself was initiated as a master mason . . .

Whether or not there existed any direct connection between the government of the kingdom of God and Freemasonry cannot be determined. But it is significant that the Nauvoo Lodge was installed three weeks before Smith received his revelation about the political kingdom of God. The oaths of secrecy administered in the Lodge in 1842 could serve as a means of preparation and of testing to determine to whom the prophet could entrust the more important and potentially more dangerous secrets revealed to the Council of Fifty in 1844. It is, therefore, to be expected that many charter members of the Council of Fifty in 1844 belonged to the Nauvoo Lodge. . . . members of the Council of Fifty, like the Freemasons, donned special robes in their private ceremonies, and “offered up” secret signs. (Quest for Empire, pp. 55-56)

William Clayton recorded the following in his diary concerning a meeting of the “Council of Fifty” held after Joseph Smith’s death:

. . . all the members of the council of the K. of G. in the camp except brother Thomas Bullock, went unto the bluffs . . . out of sight, we clothed ourselves in the priestly garments . . . Albert Carrington and Porter Rockwell . . . having no clothing with them, stood guard at a little distance from us to prevent interruption. (Diary of William Clayton, as quoted in Quest For Empire, p. 111)

Klaus J. Hansen says that the records of the Council of Fifty have been suppressed: “The official records of the Council of Fifty, with one small significant exception, are not available for research at the present time, although their existence cannot be doubted” (Quest For Empire, p. 214). Richard D. Poll, Professor of History at Brigham Young University, says that “The Council of Fifty is likely to remain a tantalizingly mysterious body until its records become available for study. . . .” (Dialogue: A Journal of Mormon Thought, Autumn 1967, p. 135).

On page 161 of his book, Quest For Empire, Klaus Hansen gives us this information: “In a writ issued for the arrest of prominent citizens of Nauvoo for ‘treasonable designs against the state,’ mention was made of a private council of which the accused supposedly were members. Whoever originated the complaint must have had some information regarding the Council, for six of the seven persons named in the complaint belonged to the Council of Fifty.” On pages 56-57 of the same book, we find the following: “The secret meetings and activities of the Council of Fifty, especially if misinterpreted by the Gentiles, might well have made Smith vulnerable to the charge of treason.”

Joseph Made King

Thomas Ford, the Governor of Illinois, made this statement a few months after Joseph Smith’s death:

It was asserted that Joseph Smith, the founder and head of the Mormon Church, had caused himself to be crowned and anointed King of the Mormons: . . . (Nauvoo Neighbor, January 1, 1845)

In 1853 William Marks, who had been a member of the secret “Council of Fifty,” admitted that Joseph Smith had been ordained to be a king before his death:

I was also witness of the introduction (secretly,) of a kingly form of government, in which Joseph suffered himself to be ordained a king, to reign over the house of Israel forever; which I could not conceive to be in accordance with the laws of the church, but I did not oppose this move, thinking it none of my business. (Zion’s Harbinger and Baneemy’s Organ, St. Louis, July, 1853, p. 53)

According to Dan Jones, Wilson Law heard Joseph Smith say that “the kingdom referred to was already set up, and that he was the king over it (History of the Church, vol. 6, pp. 568-569).

The Mormon writer Klaus J. Hansen, who wrote his master’s thesis on the “Political Kingdom of God” at the Brigham Young University, made this statement:

The scriptures indicated that Christ would rule as king over the kingdom of God. Smith took this idea quite literally and thought it only logical that he, as predecessor of the Saviour, should enjoy certain prerogatives of royalty. Consequently, shortly before his death, the prophet apparently had himself ordained as “king on earth.” . . .

The title of king may have been a metaphor, but the power deriving from the office was not. In this respect it is especially important to recall that Smith held his political office by divine right and not by sovereignty. However metaphorical these royal pretensions may have been, Smith apparently knew that they were so potentially dangerous as to be entrusted only to the initiated. (Quest for Empire, pp. 66-67)

In his master’s thesis, Klaus J. Hansen tells that George Miller, who had been a member of the “Council of Fifty,” admitted that Joseph Smith was ordained to be a king:

Rumors implying that the Prophet assumed royal pretensions are somewhat substantiated by George Miller who stated on one occasion that “In this council we ordained Joseph Smith as king on earth.” (“The Theory and Practice of the Political Kingdom of God in Mormon History, 1829-1890,” Master’s Thesis, Brigham Young University, 1959, typed copy, p. 114)

In Dialogue: A Journal of Mormon Thought, Summer 1966, page 104, Mr. Hansen frankly admits that “Joseph Smith did start a political kingdom of God and a Council of Fifty; he was made king over that organization; . . .” On page 103 of the same article Mr. Hansen states:

William Marks, president of the Nauvoo Stake, joined the Council of Fifty—a secret political organization . . . only because of his strong ties of fealty to Joseph Smith. He witnessed Joseph’s installation as king over that organization with the greatest distaste. Others, less loyal to Joseph, openly broke with him over such doctrines while he was still alive. In fact, this break precipitated the events leading to the murder of the Mormon prophet.

George Miller, who claimed that Joseph Smith was ordained king, referred to the members of the “Council of Fifty” as “princes”:

“. . . Brigham Young having sent an express to me to meet them in council at winter quarters, and bring James Emmet with me (as he had also in Joseph Smith’s life-time been organized into the council of the fifty princes of the kingdom), . . .” (Statement by George Miller, as quoted in Joseph Smith and World Government, by Hyrum L. Andrus, Salt Lake City, 1963, p. 83)

The Mormon Apostle Parley P. Pratt made this statement:

This Priesthood, including that of the Aaronic, holds the keys of revelation of the oracles of God to man upon the earth; the power and right to give laws and commandments to individuals, churches, rulers, nations and the world; to appoint, ordain, and establish constitutions and kingdoms; to appoint kings, presidents, governors or judges, and to ordain or anoint them to their several holy callings, also to instruct, warn, or reprove them by the word of the Lord. (Key to the Science of Theology, 1855, p. 66)

In his book History of Illinois, Governor Thomas Ford made this statement:

“It seems, from the best information that could be got from the best men who had seceded from the Mormon Church, that Joe Smith about this time conceived the idea of making himself a temporal prince as well as spiritual leader of his people. He instituted a new and select order of the priesthood, the members of which were to be priests and kings temporally and spiritually. These were to be his nobility, who were to be the upholders of his throne. He caused himself to be crowned and anointed king and priest, far above the rest; and he prescribed the form of an oath of allegiance to himself, which he administered to his principal followers. . . . The Mormons openly denounced the government of the United States as utterly corrupt, and as being about to pass away, and to be replaced by the government of God, to be administered by his servant Joseph.” (History of Illinois, as quoted in Quest for Empire, p. 155)

G. T. M. Davis made this statement concerning Joseph Smith being ordained king:

“The great aim of Joseph Smith was evidently to clothe himself with the most unlimited power, civil, military and ecclesiastical, over all who became members of his society. . . . The first step taken by him, was to satisfy his people that he had received a revelation from God. . . . and gave the following as the substance of his revelation. . . . That he (Joseph) was a descendant from Joseph of old through the blood of Ephraim. And that God had appointed and ordained that he, with his descendants, should rule over all Israel, . . . and ultimately the Jews and Gentiles. That the authority with which God had clothed him, . . . extended over all mankind, . . . Joe further stated that God had revealed to him, that the Indians and Latter Day Saints, under Joe as their king, and ruler, were to conquer the Gentiles, and that their subjection to this authority was to be obtained by the sword! From this revelation, he enforced upon them that it was necessary he should be crowned king, and they, believing in the gross imposition, yielded to his edict. Joe was accordingly crowned king, under God, over the immediate house of Israel. This ceremony was performed in 1842, by a council of fifty in number, denominated the “ancient of days.” . . . The peculiar attributes of his power, Joe insisted, were—that he could direct the actions of the entire House of Israel; . . . and that finally the whole earth was to become under subjection to him.—He further impressed upon the council crowning him, that God’s desire was, as revealed to him, (Joe,) that, for the time being, this was to remain a perfect secret until God should reveal to the contrary. And accordingly Joe swore them all to present secrecy, under the penalty of death! . . . (Article in the St. Clair Banner, September 17, 1844, p. 2)

When Fawn Brodie stated that Joseph Smith was anointed king, Dr. Nibley claimed that there was not enough evidence to support this accusation. Since that time a great deal of new evidence has come to light, and now many Mormon writers are willing to concede that Joseph Smith was made king. For instance, Kenneth W. Godfrey, Director of the LDS Institute at Stanford University, stated: “Antagonism toward the Mormon Prophet was further incited when it was correctly rumored, that he had been ordained “King over the Immediate House of Israel” by the Council of Fifty” (Brigham Young University Studies, Winter 1968, pp. 212-213). Among other things, Dr. Godfrey’s footnote refers us to the “Diary of George A. Smith, May 9, 1844.” This diary is in the “Library of the Church Historian.”

Richard D. Poll, Professor of History and Political Science at Brigham Young University, also seems willing to concede that Smith was ordained king:

That neither the Prophet nor the Council was totally preoccupied with the political race is clear from the investigations of Texas and other possible new homes for the Saints which were in progress, and also from the intriguing and rather convincingly documented report that the Prophet was ordained “King on Earth” in the Council during this period. (Dialogue: A Journal of Mormon Thought, Autumn 1968, p. 19, n. 11)

From the evidence presented above it would appear that Joseph Smith wanted to establish an independent government. Klaus J. Hansen makes this comment: “. . . the political kingdom of God required of its citizens a separate loyalty that was difficult to harmonize with loyalty to the United States” (Quest for Empire, p. 119).

Joseph For President

In 1844 the “Council of Fifty” decided to run Joseph Smith for the presidency of the United States. Klaus J. Hansen stated:

. . . the Council of Fifty, while seriously contemplating the possibility of emigration, also considered a rather spectacular alternative, namely, to run its leader for the presidency of the United States in the campaign of 1844. . . . Smith and the Council of Fifty seems to have taken the election quite seriously, much more so, indeed, than both Mormons and anti-Mormons have heretofore suspected. (Quest For Empire, p. 74)

Just a short time before this, Joseph Smith had stated that he did not wish to participate in politics:

. . . but as my feelings revolt at the idea of having anything to do with politics, I have declined, in every instance, having anything to do on the subject. I think it would be well for politicians to regulate their own affairs. I wish to be let alone, that I may attend strictly to the spiritual welfare of the Church. (History of the Church, by Joseph Smith, vol. 5, p. 259)

Even though Joseph Smith made this statement in 1843, in 1844 he announced that he was a candidate for the presidency of the United States. The Elders of the church were actually called to electioneer for Joseph Smith. At a special meeting of the Elders held April 9, 1844, Brigham Young made this statement: “It is now time to have a President of the United States. Elders will be sent to preach the Gospel and electioneer” (History of the Church, vol. 6, p. 322). At the same meeting Heber C. Kimball made this statement: “. . . we design to send Elders to all the different States to get up meetings and protracted meetings, and electioneer for Joseph to be the next president” (History of the Church, vol. 6, p. 325). The Mormon writer John J. Stewart refers to those who were sent to campaign as “political missionaries”:

Immediately following the conference, several dozen men were assigned by the Quorum of Twelve to carry the Prophet’s political manifesto to the various cities and states of the Union, and campaign for his election to the presidency. The apostles themselves would soon travel forth to head this vast force of political missionaries. (Joseph Smith, The Mormon Prophet, by John J. Stewart, Salt Lake City, 1966, p. 209)

Robert Bruce Flanders gives this interesting information:

The second strategic move to “establish dominion of the Kingdom” as Miller put it was to run Joseph Smith for President in 1844. . . . the Mormons were serious about Smith’s candidacy. . . . George Miller said that the campaign was planned by the Council of Fifty. Elders were to go on campaigning missions to every state in the Union, . . . The campaign was to be “the entire united effort of all the official members of the Church,” said Miller. “At no period had there been half so many elders in the vineyard in proportion to the number of members in the Church.” (Nauvoo: Kingdom of the Mississippi, University of Illinois, 1975, pp. 299, 301, 302)

Willard Richards wrote the following in a letter dated June 20, 1844:

. . . Your views about the nomination of General Smith for the Presidency are correct. We will gain popularity and external influence. But this is not all: we mean to elect him, and nothing shall be wanting on our part to accomplish it; . . . (Letter by Willard Richards, as quoted in Intimate Disciple, Claire Noall, 1957, p. 418)

At first the Mormons wanted James Arlington Bennett to be Joseph Smith’s running mate. Even the Mormon writer John J. Stewart has to admit that this man was “above all else a rank opportunist. . . . Although he never had a serious interest in the LDS religion, he allowed Brigham Young to baptize him, in the Atlantic ocean near his mansion on Long Island, later referring to the event as ‘a frolic in the Atlantic’” (Joseph Smith, The Mormon Prophet, p. 166). John J. Stewart’s opinion of James Arlington Bennett was probably correct, for in a letter to Joseph Smith, dated October 24, 1843, Bennett stated: “I may yet run for a high office in your state, when you would be sure of my best services in your behalf; therefore, a known connection with you would be against our mutual interest. . . . In short, I expect to be yet, through your influence, governor of the State of Illinois” (History of the Church, vol. 6, pp. 72-73). On June 24, 1845, Brigham Young said he “Received a letter from James Arlington Bennett of New York, in which he applies to be consecrated a general of the Nauvoo Legion, that he may ‘fight Napoleon’s battles over again, either in Nauvoo or elsewhere.’ This wild spirit of ambition has repeatedly manifested itself to us by many communications received from various sources, suggesting schemes of blood and empire, as if the work of the Lord was intended for personal aggrandisement” (History of the Church, vol. 7, p. 429).

Even though the Mormons seem to have been aware of the fact that James Arlington Bennett was a “rank opportunist,” they wanted him to be Joseph Smith’s running mate. On March 4, 1844, Joseph Smith instructed Willard Richards to write to Bennett. In this letter we find the following:

Your friends here consider your letter about the Governorship of Illinois just like every man in your quarter, mere sport, child’s sport; for who would stoop to the play of a single State, when the whole nation was on the board?—a cheaper game!

General Smith says, if he must be President, Arlington Bennett must be Vice-President. . . . your name will appear in our next paper as our candidate for Vice President of the United States. . . .

Dear General, if glory, honor, force, and power in righteous principles are desired by you, now is your time. You are safe in following the counsel of that man who holds communion with heaven; and I assure you, if you act well your part, victory’s the prize. . . .

On the 6th of April is our special conference at Nauvoo. I wish you could be here on that occasion, but the time is too short. From that period our Elders will go forth by hundreds or thousands and search the land, preaching religion and politics; and if God goes with them, who can withstand their influence? (History of the Church, vol. 6, pp. 231- 232)

On March 8, 1844, Joseph Smith learned that James A. Bennett “was a native of Ireland, and therefore was not constitutionally eligible to be Vice-President” (History of the Church, vol. 6, p. 244). Since Bennett was not eligible, Sidney Rigdon was chosen as Joseph Smith’s running mate.

Some Mormons have claimed that Joseph Smith was not serious in his attempt to become President. Joseph Fielding Smith, who became the tenth President of the Church, made this statement: “There was no thought on the part of President Joseph Smith or the Saints that he would be elected, but it gave to them an opportunity to express their feelings, and to sustain a candidate who would advocate their rights against oppression” (Essentials in Church History, p. 356). It is certainly true that Joseph Smith did not have much chance of winning; in fact, the Mormon writer Kenneth W. Godfrey says that “It is highly probable that in spite of the determined efforts of ‘ordained’ political campaigners, the Mormon leader would not have received a single electoral vote” (Brigham Young University Studies, Winter 1968, p. 212). Nevertheless, at the time the Mormon leaders took Joseph Smith’s candidacy very serious, Claire Noall, a Mormon writer, stated: “I discovered a great deal of evidence to support an earnest campaign for Joseph Smith as a candidate for the national presidency” (Intimate Disciple, p. 616). Klaus J. Hansen makes it clear that the Mormon leaders were very serious about the matter:

As a result, the Council of Fifty decided to send all available elders on missions to campaign for Joseph Smith and to preach Mormonism at the same time. . . . In the privacy of the Council of Fifty, Smith clearly viewed his candidacy more seriously than in public. This discrepancy suggests, as do the denials of polygamy, that the prophet’s public statements must be taken with caution. Smith’s own care in keeping the true purposes of his candidacy secret indicates that he knew that the public at large would treat him as demoted if it learned of his actual hopes; but this realization also reveals that he at least knew what he was doing. . . .

If Smith had not believed his election in 1844 to be a possibility, why did he enlist the entire man-power of the church in a quixotic venture? (Quest for Empire, pp. 78-79)

Joseph Smith himself made this statement on January 29, 1844: “If you attempt to accomplish this, you must send every man in the city who is able to speak in public throughout the land to electioneer . . . There is oratory enough in the Church to carry me into the presidential chair the first slide” (History of the Church, vol. 6, p. 188). On March 7, 1844, Joseph Smith stated: “When I get hold of the Eastern papers, and see how popular I am, I am afraid myself that I shall be elected; . . .” (History of the Church, vol. 6, p. 243).

The fact that Joseph Smith would allow himself to be crowned king shows that he was obsessed with the idea of gaining power. It is possible that Joseph seriously believed that he would become President, and that he would rule over the people of the United States.

The attempt by Joseph Smith to become President seems to have been a treasonous plot to bring the United States Government under the rule of the Priesthood. Klaus J. Hansen stated:

But what if, through a bold stroke, he could capture the United States for the kingdom? The Council of Fifty thought there might be a chance and nominated the Mormon prophet for the Presidency of the United States. (Dialogue: A Journal of Mormon Thought, Autumn 1966, p. 67)

George Miller, who had been a member of the Council of Fifty, made this statement in a letter dated June 28, 1855:

It was further determined in Council that all the elders should set out on missions to all the States to get up an electoral ticket, and do everything in our power to have Joseph elected president. If we succeeded in making a majority of the voters converts to our faith, and elected Joseph president, in such an event the dominion of the kingdom would be forever established in the United States; and if not successful, we could fall back on Texas, and be a kingdom notwithstanding. (Letter by George Miller, dated June 28, 1855, as quoted in Joseph Smith and World Government, by Hyrum Andrus, Salt Lake City, 1963, p. 54)

Instead of going to Texas the Mormons settled in the Great Salt Lake valley. Hyrum Andrus admits that Smith had even “considered the alternative of establishing the Saints in the capacity of an independent nation, should all other alternatives fail” (Ibid., p. 60).

Before the election Joseph Smith was assassinated. Thus he was unable to establish the kingdom he had planned.

It is certainly strange that Joseph Smith would establish a secret “Council of Fifty,” for in the Book of Mormon all secret societies, bands, oaths and covenants are condemned. In Helaman 6:22 we read: “And it came to pass that they did have their signs, yea, their secret signs, and their secret words; and this that they might distinguish a brother who had entered into the covenant, . . .” In verse 26 we read that these oaths and covenants came from the Devil:

Now behold, those secret oaths and covenants . . . were put into the heart of Gadianton by that same being who did entice our first parents to partake of the forbidden fruit—

In the 8th chapter of Ether, verses 18 and 19, we read:

And it came to pass that they formed a secret combination, even as they of old; which combination is most abominable and wicked above all, in the sight of God;

For the Lord worketh not in secret combinations. . . .

The Book of Mormon not only condemns secret societies, but it also states that there will be “no kings” in America:

And this land shall be a land of liberty unto the Gentiles, and there shall be no kings upon the land, who shall raise up unto the Gentiles. . . . he that raiseth up a king against me shall perish, for I, the Lord, the king of heaven, will be their king, . . . (Book of Mormon, 2 Nephi 10:11, 14)

It is almost unbelievable that Joseph Smith would allow himself to be ordained king after publishing the Book of Mormon which contains a warning against this very thing.

Brigham Young As King

The practice of ordaining the President of the Mormon Church as “king on earth” did not cease with the death of Joseph Smith. It is reported that Brigham Young, the second President of the Mormon Church, was ordained king, and the Mormon Apostle Abraham H. Cannon states that there was a discussion in the Council of Fifty as to whether John Taylor, the third President of the Church, should be ordained king:

Father [George Q. Cannon, a member of the First Presidency] said Moses Thatcher's drawing away from his brethren commenced as far as his knowledge concerning it went, at a time when the Council of Fifty met in the old City Hall, and Moses opposed the proposition to anoint John Taylor as Prophet, Priest and King, and Moses' opposition prevailed at that time. Moses has constantly opposed the increase of power in the hands of the President of the Church. ("Daily Journal of Abraham H. Cannon," December 2, 1895, p. 198; original at Brigham Young University Library)

With regard to John Taylor being anointed king, our attention has been called to a typed copy of an entry from the journal of Franklin D. Richards—the original journal is in the Church Historian's Office. Richards was a member of the Council of Fifty, and under the date of February 4, 1885, he recorded this statement in his journal:

Feb. 4, 1885 At 8 p.m. Attended council at Endowment House where we had prayers consecrated oil and Prest. Jno Taylor was anointed K.P.R. of C.Z. & K.??

This reference seems to show that John Taylor was anointed king on February 4, 1885.

It would appear, then, that at least three of the Mormon leaders were ordained as kings. Whether the practice continued after Taylor's death is not known. Of the three men known to have been ordained kings only Brigham Young was able to reign over the Mormon people for any length of time. The Mormon writer Klaus J. Hansen seems to feel that Brigham Young was ordained king shortly after the Mormons came to Utah: ". . . the prophet [Joseph Smith] apparently had himself ordained as 'king on earth.' Brigham Young, upon his arrival in the Salt Lake Valley, likewise reportedly had this ceremony performed in the Council of Fifty" (Quest For Empire, p. 66). On page 200, footnote 74, of the same book, Hansen gives this information:

Former Bishop Andrew Cahoon, whose father Reynolds Cahoon had been a member of the Council of Fifty, testified in 1889: "The King of that Kingdom that was set up on the earth was the head of the Church. Brigham Young proclaimed himself king here in Salt Lake Valley before there was a house built, in 1847."

Heber C. Kimball, a member of the First Presidency, may have been referring to Brigham Young's ordination to be "king" when he made these statements in 1856:

The Church and kingdom to which we belong will become the kingdom of our God and his Christ, and brother Brigham Young will become President of the United States.

(Voices responded, "Amen.")

And I tell you he will be something more; but we do not now want to give him the name: but he is called and ordained to a far greater station than that, and he is foreordained to take that station, and he has got it; and I am Vice-President, and brother Wells is the Secretary of the Interior—yes, and of all the armies in the flesh.

You don't believe that; but I can tell you it is one of the smallest things that I can think of. You may think that I am joking; but I am perfectly willing that brother Long should write every word of it; for I can see it as naturally as I see the earth and the productions thereof. (Journal of Discourses, vol. 5, p. 219)

On another occasion Heber C. Kimball stated:

. . . the President of the United States will bow to us and come to consult that authorities of this church to know what he had best do for his people.

You don't believe this. Wait and see: . . . (Ibid., vol. 5, p. 93)

The historian Hubert Howe Bancroft made this statement concerning an incident that happened on July 24, 1857:

All eyes turned at once to Brigham. . . . Gathering the people around him, he repeated the words uttered ten years before, prophesying even now that at no distant day he would himself become President of the United States, or dictate who should be President. (History of Utah, photomechanical reprint of 1889 edition, p. 505)

Brigham Young even referred to himself as a "dictator." The following quotations are taken from some of his sermons:

As formerly, I presented myself before you . . . acknowledged and sustained by you as the dictator, counsellor, and adviser of the people of God. (Journal of Discourses, vol. 9, p. 267)

You may say it is hard that I should dictate you in your temporal affairs. Is it not my privilege to dictate you? (Ibid., vol. 12, p. 59)

I sometimes say to my brethren, "I have been your dictator for twenty-seven years—over a quarter of a century I have dictated this people; that ought to be some evidence that my course is onward and upward." (Ibid., vol. 14, p. 205)

Now ask the Father in the name of Jesus whether I am telling you the truth about temporal things or not, and the same Spirit that bore witness to you that baptism by immersion is the correct way according to the Scriptures, will bear witness that the man whom God calls to dictate affairs in the building up of his Zion has the right to dictate about everything connected with the building up of Zion, yes even to the ribbons the women wear; and any person who denies it is ignorant. (Ibid., vol. 11, p. 298)

Speaking of early Utah, the Mormon writer William E. Berrett made this statement: "The Church did, however, exercise a definite control over the economic and social life of its people" (The Restored Church, p. 477).

Brigham Young went so far as to tell the people they could not trade with those who didn't belong to the Mormon Church:

And you, sisters, cease trading with any man or being in this city or country who does not belong to the church. If you do not, we are going to cut you off from the church. (Journal of Discourses, vol. 12, p. 315)

We have talked to the brethren and sisters a great deal with regard to sustaining ourselves and ceasing this outside trade. . . . My feelings are that every man and woman who will not obey this counsel shall be severed from the Church, and let all who feel as I do lift up the right hand. (The vote was unanimous.) (Ibid., p. 301)

Thomas G. Alexander states:

During the late 1860's and early 1870's, Utah was no place for a Gentile. What one historian has called a "full-blown boycott" had developed against non-Mormon businesses by the end of 1868. (Dialogue: A Journal of Mormon Thought, Autumn 1966, p. 85)

The Mormons built their own schools, and Brigham Young was very opposed to free schools. According to Brigham Young it was the "bishops" who appointed the school teachers (see Journal of Discourses, vol. 16, pp. 17-19). On page 20 of the same sermon Brigham Young stated:

I understand that the other night there was a school meeting in one of the wards of this city, and a party there—a poor miserable apostate—said, "We want a free school, and we want to have the name of establishing the first free school in Utah." To call a person a poor miserable apostate may seem like a harsh word; but what an election for the legislature has so far been found. Indeed, it is quite likely that no election occurred. Hosea Stout recorded in his diary that he was mystified by what procedure he had received his mandate. In view of the circumstances, the most likely explanation is that the Council of Fifty simply hand-picked the assembly. The executive and judicial branches of the new government were filled entirely by members of the Council of Fifty. . . . a combination of facts seems to indicate that the probate courts acted as the extended arm of the Council, administering the laws of the kingdom of God on a local level. . . . Since the Council of Fifty controlled both the executive and legislative branches of government, the leaders of the political kingdom of God, through the probate courts, could influence the administration of the counties. . . .

When Brigham Young and the Council of Fifty initiated steps to gain either territorial status or become a state of the Union they did so not because they loved the United States, but because they had no choice. Failure to initiate the move undoubtedly would have aroused the suspicion of Washington. . . . The Council of Fifty, through its actions, revealed that it hoped to maintain as much control as possible while giving the appearance of fully cooperating with the government of the United States. . . . Had Deseret achieved statehood, the political control of the Council of Fifty quite likely would have continued with little outside interference. . . . Frank Cannon's assertion that the Mormons attempted to gain admission to the Union in order to escape its authority, as paradoxical as this may sound, is thus basically correct. (Quest For Empire, pp. 123, 124, 126, 127, 128, 130, 131, 132, 134, 135)

These are very revealing statements to be coming from a Mormon writer who did a great deal of his research at Brigham Young University.

The evidence that we have presented clearly shows that Brigham Young considered himself King and that early Utah was controlled by Young and his "council of the Fifty Princes of the Kingdom." The anti-Mormon writer J. H. Beadle made this observation:

Thus it is the union of Church and State, or rather the absolute subservience of the State to the Church, the latter merely using the outside organization to carry into effect decrees already concluded in secret council, that makes Mormonism our enemy. . . . In short, it is not the social, immoral, or polygamic features that so chiefly concern us, but the hostile the treasonable and the mutinous. (Life in Utah; or, The Mysteries and Crimes of Mormonism, 1870, pp. 400-401)

No Democratic Elections

In early Utah the Mormon people were taught to vote one way. John Taylor, who became the third President of the Mormon Church, made these statements:

In political matters we are pretty well united. At our elections we generally vote as a unit. (Journal of Discourses, vol. 11, p. 355)

Some people say, "You folks always vote together," we would be poor coots if we did not, and just as bad as the rest of you. Some folks here, a short time ago, got up a little political operation, and tried how it would answer to run one against another; but it did not work well and they had to quit. (Ibid., vol. 15, p. 219)

Brigham Young was very opposed to democratic elections. The following statements are taken from his discourses:

This is the plant or tree from which schism springs; and every government lays the foundation of its own downfall when it permits what are called democratic elections. If a party spirit is developed, the formation of one party will be speedily followed by another; and furthermore, the very moment that we admit this, we admit the existence of error and corruption somewhere. (Journal of Discourses, vol. 14, p. 93)

This is one objection which outsiders have to the Latter-day Saints:

they all go and vote one way. Is it not right to do so? Let us think about it. Suppose that we do all actually vote one way, or for one man for our delegate to Congress, and have no opposing candidate, and get the best there is, is that not better than having opposition? What does opposition bring? It certainly brings anger and strife; and of what use are they? They serve no good purpose. Then let us all vote one way, and think and act one way, and keep the commandments of God. . . . (Journal of Discourses, vol. 13, p. 219)

When we see a religion, and one which is claimed to be the religion of Christ, and it will not govern men in their politics, it is a very poor religion, it is very feeble, very faint in its effects, hardly perceptible in the life of a person. (Ibid., vol. 14, p. 159)

Stanley S. Ivins gives this interesting information:

Under this divinely directed system, there could be little need for such democratic procedures as political parties and competing elections. . . .

For the first twenty years, political activity in Utah was based upon theocratic philosophy. Elections were held, but they did not mean much. A single list of properly selected candidates would be submitted to the people, who would go through the motions of voting for them. There was no law against voting for someone else, but the balloting was not secret, so that anyone not voting right could be easily identified and branded an apostate. And since apostasy was just about the greatest of sins, very few wanted to be charged with it. . . . The church publication, "The Millennial Star," explaining how such things were handled in Utah, said that if there was disagreement at a meeting for making nominations, "the Prophet of God, who stands at the head of the Church, decides. He nominates, the convention endorses, and the people accept the nomination." It added that there was free speech in the Territorial Legislature, "but any measure that cannot be unanimously decided on, is submitted to the President of the Church, who, by 'the wisdom of God,' decides the matter, and all the Councilors and Legislators sanction the decision." (M.S., vol. 29, p. 746)

A check of the official returns from 18 annual elections in Utah, beginning in 1852, showed that there was little dissatisfaction with the approved candidates. The 1867 election was the only one which was unanimous, but there was only one dissenting vote in 1857, four in 1853, six in 1864, twelve in 1852, and fourteen in 1860. The largest opposition vote was 702 in 1869, with 622 of them coming from the Gentile city of Corinne. . . . Next largest was 619 in 1866. . . . Of the 96,107 votes cast, over this eighteen year period, 96 per cent went to the regular candidates. And if the known Gentile ballots are eliminated, the percentage rises to 97.4. (The Moses Thatcher Case, by Stanley S. Ivins, pp. 2-3)

In his History of Utah, page 483, Hubert Howe Bancroft gives this information:

By act approved January 3, 1853, it was ordered that general elections should be held annually. . . . in section five of this act each elector was required to provide himself with a vote containing the names of the persons he wished to be elected, . . . and present it folded to the judge of the election, who must number and deposit it. . . . the clerk then wrote the name of the elector, and opposite it the number of the vote. This measure, which virtually abolished vote by ballot, gave much ground of complaint to the anti-Mormons.

R. N. Baskin made this statement concerning this matter:

It was also evident that under the existing election law the Liberal party could not elect its ticket after it acquired a majority. A number of Liberal Mormons, especially among the younger members, from time to time expressed to me a desire to vote the Liberal ticket, but refrained from doing so because their marked ballots would disclose the fact and subject them to discipline or expulsion from the Mormon church, and injure their business in a way they could not afford. (Reminiscences of Early Utah, p. 73)

Klaus J. Hansen gives this information:

... absence of the secret ballot assured that only the most recalcitrant would dare oppose the official slate. . . .

Casting a vote in opposition to approved candidates was severely frowned upon, but was not in and of itself grounds for disciplinary action. Running for political office without church approval, however, was a much more serious matter. In the Mormon colony of San Bernardino, . . . B. F. Grouard and F. M. Van Leuven were disfellowshipped simply because they ran for political office against other church members nominated by the authorities, who, incidentally, also happened to be members of the Council of Fifty. Another case of wilful opposition to the political counsel of church leaders occurred in 1854. One of the candidates nominated . . . Albert P. Rockwood, had incurred the dislike of a group of voters, who nominated a candidate their own, Stephen H. Hales, in opposition. According to John Hyde, Jr., a Mormon apostate, Hales obtained the majority; “Stephen Hales was accordingly sent for by Brigham, who gave him a severe reprimand for daring to allow his name to be used as an opponent of ‘the church nomination.’ ” Hales was compelled to resign, and Rockwood seated instead. The most important fact of this incident, apparently unknown to Hales and his supporters, and to Hyde, was that Rockwood belonged to the Council of Fifty. (Quest For Empire, pp. 137-138)

On page 40 of the same book, Klaus J. Hansen states:

For over fifty years, Mormon elections were hardly anything more than a “sustaining” of the official candidates. . . . If a man, therefore, opposed the official church candidate, he was questioning the divine sanction under which this candidate had been nominated. Such a man was clearly on the road to apostasy.

In 1853 Dr. Bernhisel was chosen as a delegate to Congress in the Mormon Tabernacle. Brigham Young stated:

If we wish to make political speeches, and it is necessary, for the best interest of the cause and kingdom of God, to make them on the Sabbath, we do it . . .

Brother Kimball has seconded the motion, that Doctor Bernhisel be sent back to Washington, as our delegate. All who are in favour of it, raise your right hands. (More than two thousand hands were at once seen above the heads of the congregation.)

This has turned into a caucus meeting. It is all right. I would call for an opposite vote if I thought any person would vote. I will try it, however. (Not a single hand was raised in opposition.) (Journal of Discourses, vol. 1, p. 188)

Some years later Brigham Young stated:

Dr. Bernhisel is our delegate; . . . we say, “Let us send him,” and he is unanimously elected. And if we had a thousand officers to elect—if we had to elect the President of the United States, you would never see a dissenting vote. (Journal of Discourses, vol. 5, p. 228)

It is interesting to note that Dr. Bernhisel was a member of the Council of Fifty (see Quest For Empire, p. 227).

Joseph F. Smith, who became the sixth President of the Mormon Church, made this statement:

We move as a man, almost; we hearken to the voice of our leader; we are united in our faith and in our works, whether politically or religiously. (Journal of Discourses, vol. 12, p. 328)

Brigham Young seemed to have no understanding of the value of the political system in America. He obviously wanted a dictatorship where the “dictator” would rule “to the day of his death.” The following statements are taken from Young’s sermons:

In our Government a President is elected for four years, . . . Would it not be better to extend that period during life or good behaviour; . . . (Journal of Discourses, vol. 6, p. 345)

Should they keep him in office only four years? Should they make a clause in their Constitution that a President shall serve at most for only two terms without a vacation in his services? That is an item that should not be found in the Constitution of the United States, . . . We should select the best man we could find, and centre our feelings upon him, and sustain him as our President, dictator, lawgiver, controller, and guide in a national capacity, and in every other capacity wherein he is a righteous example . . .

Can the Constitution be altered? It can; and when we get a President that answers our wishes to occupy the executive chair, there let him sit to the day of his death, and pray that he may live as long as Methuselah; . . . (Journal of Discourses, vol. 7, pp. 11, 14)

It is hardly any secret that Brigham Young wanted to be the man who would “occupy the executive chair . . . to the day of his death.” The reader will remember that the historian Bancroft claimed that Brigham Young said that “he would himself become President of the United States, or dictate who should be President” (History of Utah, p. 505).

The church’s political party was known as the “People’s Party.” Dean E. Mann states: “Operating later through the Council of Fifty and the People’s Party, the Church continued to exercise great influence over political affairs until that party’s abandonment in 1890” (Dialogue: A Journal of Mormon Thought, Summer 1967, p. 45). Klaus J. Hansen says that “the chairman of the central committee of the People’s Party, John Sharp, was a member of the Council of Fifty. . . . William H. Hooper, who served the Mormons in Washington until 1872, belonged to the Council of Fifty. So did George Q. Cannon, who replaced Hooper and served until 1882, when he lost his seat under the Edmunds Act” (Quest For Empire, p. 172).

The Mormon writer J. D. Williams gives this information:

Statehood for Utah was delayed because Congress was convinced that the Mormons had too many wives and too few political parties. . . . the parties were few enough, all right—just one. . . . But this one-party system came under challenge in 1869, when a group of Brigham Young’s critics . . . were excommunicated from the Church and moved almost at once to set up a party of their own. . . . (Dialogue: A Journal of Mormon Thought, Summer 1966, pp. 36-37)

Some writers claim that because of persecution the Mormons were driven to vote one way. This is completely untrue; the non-Mormons were forced to form the Liberal Party because of the church’s attempt to control early Utah. The Mormon writer Klaus J. Hansen states:

In the absence of conflict, so the argument runs, Mormon institutions would have been as democratic as those of the United States itself. . . . This explanation, however, is too simple. . . . An examination of the political theory of the Kingdom of God reveals that persecution or no persecution, the Saints were committed to political unity. (Dialogue: A Journal of Mormon Thought, Autumn 1966, p. 72)

Speaking of the Mormon idea of “the Kingdom of God,” the Mormon writer Hyrum L. Andrus states:

To establish the Kingdom of God in its political authority would require a major concession on the part of non-Latter-day Saints: that of granting the appropriate priesthood councils in Zion the power to name men to governmental office, with the consent of the people. On the other hand, there were certain benefits the non-Latter-day Saint could expect to receive from accepting. (Joseph Smith and World Government, p. 33)

The early Mormon leaders could not seem to understand why the Gentiles were not willing to accept their rule. The Valley Tan printed an abstract of a sermon by Heber C. Kimball, a member of the First Presidency, which contains the following statements:

Then will the American people prostrate themselves before the independent Saints of Deseret, and beg for food and protection; then will the nations of the earth bow themselves down to our prophets, . . .

That’s what these Federal officers are sent here for, to wait upon us, to be our servants; and if they had done their duty they would have hung forty before this time for committing treason against Deseret—for violating the laws of this Territory. When we go to the States we obey their laws, and when they come here they ought to obey our laws. They ought to go to the polls and vote for the man who we want to elect to office. They ought to do as Romans do when they are among Romans. But do they do it? No, they are traitors to Deseret. (The Valley Tan, September 14, 1859, p. 2)

The Liberal Party, which was formed to combat the domination of the Mormon Church in politics, had a very difficult time at first. Even the Mormon historian B. H. Roberts had to admit that the Liberal Party received unjust treatment (see Comprehensive History of the Church, vol. 5, pp. 307-309).

Stanley S. Ivins gives this information concerning the political situation in Utah toward the end of the 19th century:

Faced with the growing strength of the Liberal Party and the fact that, under the existing Mormon versus Gentile political division, the prospect of statehood for Utah was very dim, someone decided that it was time for a change. So, in the spring of 1891, the People's Party was disbanded, the Mormons were advised to divide on national party lines, and local Republican and Democratic organizations were formed. On the surface, this action suggested that the church was getting out of politics. (The Moses Thatcher Case, p. 4)

J. D. Williams gives this interesting information:

Then came the dramatic, now humorous, sequence of events in which theocracy served as midwife for the birth of democracy in Utah. Sometime in 1891 (a day uncertain) at a meeting of the leaders of the People's Party (the Church party), the First Counselor in the Church Presidency, George Q. Cannon, made an appearance. President Cannon informed the party officials that the First Presidency of the Church wanted the existing parties scrapped and the national parties instituted in their place. He then warned that the old religious warfare would be perpetuated under new labels if all the People's Party became Democrats and the Liberals became Republicans.

So the word went forth from that meeting that Mormons should join both national parties. And as the word moved down the hierarchy, some imaginative bishops at the ward level gave "practical translation" to the advice: They stood at the head of the chapel aisle and indicated that the Saints on one side (dare we say "right"?) should become Republicans and those on the other (left?) should become Democrats.

The People's Party disbanded in 1891 as President Cannon had requested and the Liberal Party followed suit in December, 1893. (Dialogue: A Journal of Mormon Thought, Summer 1966, pp. 37-38)

Moses Thatcher

Wallace Turner made these statements in his book, The Mormon Establishment, pages 271-272:

Stanley S. Ivins has documented the very cruel way the First Presidency destroyed the ecclesiastical standing of one of the apostles who resisted the return to church domination of political life—Moses Thatcher. . . .

This case established quite clearly in the minds of all Mormon politicians that they must pay attention to the church leaders.

In his work, The Moses Thatcher Case, Stanley S. Ivins gives the following information concerning this matter:

Before the next election, things were happening which were to greatly alter the political affiliations of the Mormons. Some of the church leaders met with James C. Blaine and two other high ranking Republicans, and appealed to them for help in getting statehood for Utah. They were laughed at and told that they could not expect such help as long as there were so many Democrats in the Territory. Some time later, at a meeting of church officials in the Gardo House, it was decided that those church leaders who were Republicans would campaign for their party, and those who were Democrats would remain silent. The only objection to this decision came from Apostle Moses Thatcher, who on at least two occasions, had come out openly against participation of the church in politics. (Salt Lake Tribune, May 10, 1896)

When the 1892 campaign got under way, the high church officials of Republican persuasion went out to tell the Saints that the Brethren and the Lord wanted more Republicans. But their program was somewhat upset when Apostle Thatcher, B. H. Roberts and Charles W. Penrose, disregarding the decision of their brethren, campaigned for the Democrats. Both Utah and the nation went Democratic, and Grover Cleveland was the one who signed the enabling act making Utah a state.

The three brethren who had not kept quite about their Democratic sympathies found themselves in trouble, as we learn from the journal kept by Apostle Marriner W. Merrill. (Utah Pioneer and Apostle, Marriner W. Merrill and His Family—Published by Melvin Clarence Merrill—1937). At a January 11, 1893 meeting of the Twelve Apostles, the president of the quorum, Lorenzo Snow, "referred to Moses Thatcher's recent course in not being in harmony with the First Presidency. Then Moses talked and was much agitated and affected and felt humble." Next day the Twelve met with the First Presidency "where matters relating to Apostle Thatcher's recent campaign speeches were discussed as not being with the Presidency in sentiment and feelings. After a six-hour meeting I moved that we all forgive one another and hereafter work in harmony with the First Presidency; seconded and carried unanimously." But full harmony did not follow, for on March 22nd, the Presidency again met with the Twelve, "and occupied the most of the time principally dwelling on their grievances against Apostle Moses Thatcher in the recent campaign." The meeting was adjourned until the following morning, when the "subject of Apostle Moses Thatcher, B. H. Roberts and C. W. Penrose was discussed at length; they all went in direct opposition to the First Presidency policy in the last fall political campaign." After a long discussion, "it was decided that those Brethren should see their wrong, repent, and make confessions to their Quorums and the Presidency. We all partook of bread and wine at 3:30 p.m. and adjourned at 4:30 p.m. to meet again on Monday, April 3rd. It was agreed that the Brethren above named should not attend the dedication of the Salt Lake Temple until they made matters right." . . . Faced with being barred from participating in it, Roberts and Penrose apparently repented, but Thatcher held out to the end. . . . The evening before the dedication, the Twelve met "in the President's office to again consider Apostle Moses Thatcher's case, . . . he made a very humble acknowledgement and said he had done wrong and asked forgiveness, and all voted to forgive him freely." So everyone took part in the April 6th dedication, and at an April 20th meeting of "the Priesthood, . . . in the Temple," all those present agreed to sustain the First Presidency "in all things, political as well as all other matters." So it appeared that harmony and the unquestioned political authority of the Presidency had been restored. But future events did not bear this out.

Although the national administration was now Democratic, the church leaders continued their work for the Republicans and, in the 1893 election, they won control of the Legislature by a narrow margin. Before the 1894 election, the Liberal Party had been disbanded, and the Republicans again won, . . .

The use of church influence in behalf of the Republicans had been no secret, but the Democrats had not chosen to make an issue of it, thinking that to do so would do their cause more harm than good. However, with the approach of the 1895 election, which was to choose the first state officials, they decided that they would try to use the church a little. So they nominated B. H. Roberts for Representative to Congress, and announced that if they won control of the Legislature, Utah's first two Senators would be Moses Thatcher and Joseph L. Rawlins. But this action back-fired on them. During the October general conference of the church, a special priesthood meeting was held in the Assembly Hall, at which Joseph F. Smith strongly rebuked Thatcher and Roberts for accepting political nomination without the consent of the Presidency. He was backed up by George Q. Cannon and President Wilford Woodruff. This meant that the church was officially opposed to the Democratic ticket, and it so alarmed the party leaders that they reconvened their convention to consider the problem. Some wanted to withdraw all their candidates in protest, but this idea was rejected, and it was decided to make an open issue of church influence in politics. An eight column Address to the People was prepared and published in the Salt Lake Herald. It began with an attack upon the union of church and state, then reviewed at length the activities of high church officials in behalf of the Utah Republicans. The campaign became a contest between the Democrats and the church, as represented by its highest leaders. The Republicans won, but by a smaller margin than in 1894.

The involvement of Thatcher and Roberts in this campaign spelled more trouble for them. The Deseret News of November 9th carried a long editorial, . . . explaining that church members must be subject to discipline in temporal affairs, and that those who were critical of this principle were in rebellion against divine authority. And from Apostle Merrill's journal, we learn that, at a February 13, 1896 meeting of the First Presidency, Twelve and First Seven Presidents of Seventies, the question of Roberts' "conduct in the last fall's political campaign" was taken up. He defended his course and refused "to make reconciliation" with his brethren. At a March 5th meeting of the same three quorums, his case was again considered, and "After 5 hours' labor with Brother Roberts he was dropped from his Quorum for 3 weeks and suspended from the exercise of the Priesthood for that time, and if no repentance is shown in that time then the action of the Presidency and Apostles and the six Presidents is to be final in his case. The meeting adjourned for 3 weeks." When the adjourned meeting was reconvened, on March 26th, Roberts "made a full confession and was forgiven by all present, and a time of tears and rejoicing was indulged in by all."

In the meantime, "because of events which have happened during the late political contest," a document, which came to be called a political manifesto, had been prepared. It was a long declaration of church policy in political matters, which was to be signed by the general authorities and presented to the April conference for approval. It stated that the church had never tried to interfere in affairs of State, and that it had always been understood that men holding high church positions should not accept political office without first obtaining the approval of "those who preside over them." In line with this policy, the signers of the manifesto agreed that, before any "leading official" of the church accepted a political position, or nomination for such a position, he should apply to the "proper authorities" for permission. It was denied that this rule represented a desire to interfere in the affairs of state government. (Deseret News, April 6, 1896)

After being labored with for weeks, Mr. Roberts agreed to sign the manifesto, but it was apparently not shown to Moses Thatcher until the day on which it was to be presented to the general conference. That morning it was taken to his home, where he was ill. He asked for time to study it and was given an hour and a half. He saw it as a misleading statement of the past and present attitude of church leaders in political matters, and as a step toward giving those leaders more political power. When his time was up, he returned it, with a written statement that he did not feel that he could sign it without "stultifying" himself. That afternoon, when the general church authorities were presented to the conference to be sustained, the name of Apostle Thatcher was omitted, without a word of explanation. This unorthodox, and rather underhanded, punishment of Thatcher was unfavorably looked upon by many of the Saints, as shown by the reception given the political manifesto when it was presented to the different Stakes and Wards. At the Cache Stake Conference, three members of the High Council refused to approve it. When it was presented at Provo, many of the congregation would not vote, a few walked out, and one man stood up and very emphatically voted against it. When presented at the morning session of the Tooele Stake Conference, it received three negative votes. One of them was cast by J. C. De La Mare, an alternate member of the High Council. At the afternoon meeting, Apostle Francis M. Lyman declared the manifesto to be a revelation, and asked the congregation to vote to suspend Elder De La Mare from his church position. Between 20 and 25 voted for suspension and 8 or 10 against it, but most of the 250 to 300 who were present refused to vote.

There was so much criticism of the action against Thatcher that, at an October 5th meeting of the Presidency and Twelve, "it was decided to explain Moses Thatcher's case at the Conference at 2 p.m." (Merrill Journal) So, at the afternoon meeting, seven speakers defended the church action and charged that Thatcher had been out of harmony with his fellows for four years. Next day President George Q. Cannon, speaking upon the same subject, declared that not since "the great apostacy in Kirtland," had there been so much criticism of church leadership. He warned that this was a sign of apostacy and that those who continued with such criticism would lose the Holy Spirit and "go into darkness." When the church authorities were presented, the name of Thatcher was again omitted. . . .

On July 9th the Quorum of Twelve Apostles had charged their fellow Apostle with apostacy, but on account of his poor health and other delaying circumstances no final action in the matter had been taken.

In the meantime, another election campaign was under way. . . .

Soon after the election, a Salt Lake Tribune reporter visited Moses Thatcher and asked him if he was a candidate for the Senate. He replied that he would not work for the office, but if "young Utah" felt that his election would vindicate the principles for which he had contended and help prevent "the forging of chains upon the people of Utah," he would accept the position if it were offered him. This interview was reported in the November 15th [1897] issue of the Tribune. Four days later the News contained a notice that, at a November 19th meeting of the Council of Twelve Apostles, Brother Thatcher had been dropped from that quorum. Apostle Merrill wrote that he was expelled for insubordination and apostacy.

The prospect of the choice of Thatcher to represent Utah in the Senate brought a strong reaction from the church authorities. On five successive days, beginning November 17th, the News featured violent anti-Thatcher editorials. It declared that his candidacy was "an assault upon the doctrines and organic existence" of the church, and that his election would mean that the Democrats wanted to "wound a vital principle of the discipline of the most numerous religious body in this State," and thereby flagrantly insult "that entire religious society." It denied what it called the hysterical implications of the Tribune and Herald, that the News was threatening Thatcher, and insisted that his candidacy was a religious, not a political, question. It was against him because "he stands upon a platform which, fairly interpreted, means nothing more nor less than war against a religious society." (The Moses Thatcher Case, by Stanley S. Ivins, pp. 4-8)

Stanley S. Ivins went on to show that Moses Thatcher was defeated, and later the Mormon Church tried to excommunicate him. J. D. Williams calls this a "classic case in the use of church discipline against an Apostle who violated the established rules" (Dialogue: A Journal of Mormon Thought, Summer 1966, pp. 39-40).

The reader will remember that Abraham H. Cannon related that his father (George Q. Cannon, a member of the First Presidency) said that "Moses Thatcher's drawing away from his brethren commenced as far as his knowledge concerning it went, at a time when the Council of Fifty met in the old City Hall, and Moses opposed the proposition to anoint John Taylor as Prophet, Priest and King, and Moses' opposition prevailed at that time. Moses has constantly opposed the increase of power in the hands of the President of the Church" ("Daily Journal of Abraham H. Cannon," December 2, 1895, p. 198, original at Brigham Young University Library).

Moses Thatcher certainly did oppose “the increase of power in the hands of the President of the Church,” as George Q. Cannon stated. We find the following in the back part of a journal kept by Moses Thatcher:

Brother George Q Cannon said to me about May 1885 in the Presidents office that he believed that the President of the Church had a perfect and it should be an unquestioned right to use the entire revenues or funds of the Church ____ [for ?] himself o[r] family if he wished to do so, or in any other manner he might choose.

I answered that I did not believe any such dangerous doctrine, . . . (Journal of Moses Thatcher, p. 140; microfilm copy at the Utah State Historical Society)

Attack on America

Brigham Young taught that the Mormon people were to become “free and independent from all other kingdoms” (Journal of Discourses, vol. 5, p. 98). This teaching created a great deal of friction between the Mormon people and the United States Government. The Mormon leaders became very bitter against the U.S. Government and its officials. The Apostle Orson Pratt stated: “What else does he say? ‘My Church shall be free and independent of all creatures beneath the celestial world.’ Have we been free from the United States? No, we have not; but we are to be made free from every government upon the face of the earth; . . . The American continent never was designed for such a corrupt Government as the United States’ to flourish or prosper long upon it” (Ibid., vol. 6, p. 204). Joseph Young said: “The administrators of the Government that we live under are just as insane as they can be” (Ibid., p. 207). Bishop Lorenzo D. Young made this statement: “I have long prayed that the Lord Almighty would destroy the nation that gave me birth, unless the rulers thereof repent. Yes, I pray that it may be broken to pieces and become like an old vessel that is broken and thrown out to rot and to return to its native elements” (Ibid., p. 225).

Brigham Young, the second President of the Mormon Church, made these statements about the U.S. Government:

. . . our Government is controlled by ignorance; . . . and every department is more or less governed by ignorance, folly, and weakness. More imbecility has been manifested in the management of public affairs, of late, than ought to be manifested by any government. (Journal of Discourses, vol. 7, p. 64)

That Government known as the United States’ has become like water spilled on the ground, and other governments will follow. (Ibid., vol. 8, p. 336)

The present Government of the United States is self-destroying, as they are now proving. (Ibid., vol. 9, p. 321)

I shall take the liberty of talking as I please about the President of the United States, . . .

Is a man fit to be President of the United States, who will bow and succumb to the whims of the people? No. (Ibid., vol. 5, p. 126)

I have just as good a right to say that President Taylor is in hell, as to say that any other miserable sinner is there. (Ibid., vol. 2, p. 183)

. . . President Polk; . . . is now weltering in hell with old Zachary Taylor, where the present administrators will soon be, if they do not repent. (Ibid., vol. 5, p. 232)

Brigham Young also made some unfavorable comments about Abraham Lincoln:

Our present President, what is his strength? It is like a rope of sand, or like a rope made of water. He is as weak as water. What can he do? Very little . . . Of late, at times, I have almost wished that I had been born in a foreign nation. I feel disgraced in having been born under a government that has so little power, disposition, and influence for truth and right; but I cannot help it. What is the cause of their weakness and imbecility? They have left the paths of truth and virtue, . . . Shame, shame on the rulers of the nation! I feel myself disgraced to hail such men as my countrymen, . . . (Journal of Discourses, vol. 9, p. 4)

The Mormon Apostle George A. Smith made this statement about Abraham Lincoln:

Mr Lincoln now is put into power by that priestly influence; and the presumption is, should he not find his hands full by the secession of the Southern States, the spirit of priestcraft would force him, in spite of his good wishes and intentions, to put to death, if it was in his power, every man that believes in the divine mission of Joseph Smith, or that bears testimony of the doctrines he preached. (Ibid., vol. 9, p. 18)

Stanley P. Hirshon quotes Brigham Young as making the following statements in 1869:

“Who goes to the White House in these days?” Young had inquired. “A gambler and a drunkard. And the Vice-President is the same. And no man can get either office unless he is a gambler and a drunkard or a thief. And who goes to Congress? You may hunt clear through the Senate and House, and if you can find any men that are not liars, thieves, whoremongers, gamblers, and drunkards. I tell you they are mighty few, for no other kind of men can get in there.” (The Lion of the Lord, pp. 278-279)

Daniel H. Wells, who was a member of the First Presidency, made this statement concerning the U.S. Government: “I do not think there is a more corrupt government upon the face of the earth” (Journal of Discourses, vol. 8, p. 374). John Taylor, who became the third President of the Mormon Church, made these statements:

I have vowed in my own mind, over and over again, if I was in Utah, the United States might stand over me until doomsday, before I would do anything for them, unless I was paid for it beforehand. Excuse me, Governor Young, if I am not very patriotic. No man need call upon me to do anything in Utah for the United States, unless they pay me the money down. I won’t trust them. (Journal of Discourses, vol. 5, p. 117)

Mean as the Americans are, they will not, many of them, hire for soldiers. (Ibid., vol. 6, p. 27)

The Mormon Apostle Orson Hyde said:

Just so with the Constitution of the United States. It was framed by the inspiration of the Almighty, we readily grant . . . It has served and fulfilled its purpose . . . The Constitution now serves but little purpose other than a cloak for political gamblers, merchants, and hucksters.

The Almighty looks down from heaven and sees it impossible to save the Constitution, . . . Although it was framed by his wisdom and skill, and his power and goodness, yet with as much cheerfulness will it be overthrown as it was erected or framed. (Ibid., vol. 6, p. 153)

Klaus J. Hansen gives this information:

Brigham Young predicted: “God Almighty will give the United States a pill that will put them to death, and that is worse than lobelia. I am prophet enough to prophesy the downfall of the government that has driven us out. . . . Wo [sic] to the United States: I see them going to Death and destruction.” (Quest for Empire, pp. 116-117)

“The time is not far distant,” he [Brigham Young] wrote to the staunch friend of the Mormons in 1858, “when Utah shall be able to assume her rights and place among the family of nations.” Official documents of the period, no doubt purposefully, are dated “State of Deseret,” not “Territory of Utah.” One letter, directed to Col. Thomas Ellerbeck of the Nauvoo Legion, was signed by Thomas Tauner [sic] as “Captain of the Royal Artillery, Deseret.” . . . understandably, the Civil War quickened Mormon expectations for the deliverance of Zion. . . .

Certain enemies of the Mormons, nevertheless, charged the Saints with desiring a confederate victory. What the Mormons, however, really seem to have expected—at least during the beginning of the war—was a mutual destruction of both sides. Such expectations found expression in the diary of Charles Walker who, in 1861, wrote: “The Virginians are preparing to seize the capital at Washington, . . . Bro. Brigham spoke of the things in the East said he hoped they would both gain the victory said he had as much sympathy for them as the Gods and Angels had for the Devils in Hell.” . . .

In keeping with this idea of preparedness, the Council of Fifty held itself in readiness to take over when other earthly governments would crumble. After it had failed to obtain statehood for its revived State of Deseret in 1862, the Council nevertheless continued the state organization in the enigmatic meetings of the so-called ghost legislature of Deseret, which convened the day after the close of each session of the territorial legislature during the 1860’s. . . . When Lee surrendered . . . it became only too obvious that the anticipations of the Saints and God’s fore knowledge once again had not coincided. Nevertheless, more than a year after the cessation of hostilities, Frances P. Dyer could write to her father that apostle John Taylor “could not finish” an address to the Saints “without running on to the one string that they all harp on all the time till I get sick of it, that is the down fall of the United States government and the building up of Mormonism.” (Ibid., pp. 165-69)

Things have changed a great deal since the early Mormon leaders left the scene. Davis Bitton made this observation:

The Church entered the twentieth century in anxious pursuit of respectability. The Mormons had long been accused of being immoral and un-American. . . . At last the Saints could be “respectable.” . . . They became not only loyal Americans but patriots, determined to prove their Americanism to any doubter. Soon after the turn of the century the new Boy Scouts of America program was adopted by the Church with great enthusiasm. Thousands of Mormon boys could now pledge to do their duty to God and country, with none of the old schizophrenia. (Dialogue: A Journal of Mormon Thought, Autumn 1966, p. 126)

Although Mormons are now considered to be very patriotic, some of them seem to lack a real understanding of the meaning of freedom (see The Mormon Kingdom, vol. 2, p. 103).

Decline of the Kingdom

The Mormon writer Richard D. Poll states:

As for the doctrine of “separation of church and state,” only when the end of the nineteenth century saw the political kingdom indefinitely postponed did it become an operating principle within the Mormon community. (Dialogue: A Journal of Mormon Thought, Autumn 1966, p. 137)

Frank J. Cannon was a man who labored very hard to break down the control which the Mormon Church had over the people of Utah. J. D. Williams states:

Republican Frank Cannon, son of George Q. Cannon of the First Presidency, . . . became in 1896 one of the state’s first two Senators. . . .

Finding himself opposed by another Democrat, whose candidacy was championed by an Apostle, Heber J. Grant, Senator Cannon rented the Salt Lake Theater and delivered a tirade against church interference in politics. The Senator was then called to Church President Lorenzo Snow’s home. The Prophet told the Senator that it was the “will of the Lord” that he should step aside gracefully to permit his father, George Q. Cannon, President Snow’s first counselor, and a Republican, to be elected to Cannon’s seat. The Senator refused to follow the dictate; the Democrat Legislature refused to elect father or son; and Utah suffered the ignominy of being represented by only one Senator from 1899 to 1901. (Dialogue: A Journal of Mormon Thought, Summer 1966, pp. 40-41)

Frank J. Cannon made these comments concerning this matter:

He [President Lorenzo Snow] sat down in his chair, composing himself with an air that might have distinguished one of the ancient kings. . . .

“It would be most unfortunate,” he said, “for us, as a people, if we failed to elect a Senator. . . .” “Last night,” he continued, “lying on my bed, I had a vision. I saw this work of God injured by the political strife of the brethren. And the voice of the Lord came to me, directing me to see that your father was elected to the Senate.” . . . “The Lord will take care of the event. I want you to withdraw from the race and throw your strength to your father. It is the will of the Lord that you do so.”

“Have you a revelation to that effect also?” I asked.

He answered, pontifically, “Yes.”

“You’ll publish it to the world, then, the same as other revelations?”

“No,” he replied. “No.”

“Then I’ll not obey it,” I said, “because if God is ashamed of it, I am.”

His air of prophetic authority changed to one of combative resolution. He explained that one of the other candidates, a strong Democrat, had agreed to accept the revelation if I would; that the two of us could give our strength to the church candidate; that the Church would turn to my father the votes that it had already in command for McCune, and my father’s election would be carried. (Under the Prophet in Utah, pp. 229-231)

Just after the turn of the century the Mormon leaders found themselves in serious trouble because of their attempt to control politics in Utah. Klaus J. Hansen gives this information:

In 1903, a powerful group of senators instigated proceedings to remove Reed Smoot, a Mormon apostle, from his senate seat, on the grounds that the Mormon hierarchy still controlled political affairs in Utah, that separation of church and state were only practiced superficially, and that Smoot was therefore an emissary of the Mormon priesthood as well as a representative of the state. Most of the leading Mormon authorities were subpoenaed to appear before the senate committee. Alleged church control of politics and attempts to establish a political kingdom of God were the major charges levelled against the Mormons. President Joseph F. Smith averred that the church, and not Smoot, was on trial. These hearings, more than anything else, forced Mormon leaders to come to a decision on church influence in politics, and on the future of the political kingdom of God. (Quest For Empire, pp. 183-184)

After this investigation the Mormon leaders were forced to be more careful in their attempt to gain political power. The Mormon writer J. D. Williams states that “today, with the normal power imperatives of any large organization with much at stake, the L.D.S. Church remains in politics” (Dialogue: A Journal of Mormon Thought, Summer 1966, p. 34). J. D. Williams also gives this interesting information:

More subterranean, and less official, were the endorsement tactics used in the heated Thomas-Bennett election for the U.S. Senate during 1950. A “watch-and-ward society” called the Law Observance and Enforcement Committee had become appended to the Church hierarchy prior to this time. Its primary job was to report to the First Presidency on violations of liquor, tobacco and prostitution laws in Salt Lake County. But in 1950 this committee extended itself in publishing a list of candidates who would support Church standards. Attached to a mimeographed talk which was to be read in the monthly Fast and Testimony Meeting, the list began with the candidates for Senator and Congressman and ran on through thirty-two local offices. Seventeen of the thirty-four Democrats had been crossed out; two of the thirty-four Republicans.

Like Moses Thatcher of old, Mormon Democrats felt their Church had betrayed them. In the ensuing cross-fire, the First Presidency issued a disclaimer through the Salt Lake press declaring that they had neither approved a list of acceptable candidates nor directed the circulation of such a list. But the list, and other gratuitous insults against Thomas, had their effect. He was defeated in November by the prominent Utah businessman-Churchman, Wallace F. Bennett. . . .

On occasion, more covert actions to influence the electorate are tried than front-page editorials and sermons from the pulpit. One thinks particularly of the efforts made by key Church people in 1954 to secure a favorable referendum vote on a one-senator-per-county reapportionment amendment.

To secure that vote in populous Salt Lake County (which would thereby cost the county six out of its seven state senators), a political committee of the Apostles was formed under the co-chairmanship of Elders Henry D. Moyle and Harold B. Lee. They authorized Stake President Junius Jackson to form the Salt Lake Valley Stake Presidents Committee as the campaign vehicle. Under the aegis of that committee, pro-reapportionment pamphlets were prepared and then distributed by Deseret Industry trucks, ward teachers, Beehive girls—by anyone who carried the “Church stamp” so as to convey the impression of Church endorsement of the proposal.

But in the end, the ground was cut from beneath the entire effort by the release of a letter to the press which the First Presidency had written to Professor Frank Jonas, plainly saying that “the Church takes no position with reference to it. . . . No one is authorized to align us with either side of the controversy.” The effort to use Church channels for political campaigning was thereby successfully interdicted and the proposed constitutional amendment went down to defeat on election day. . . .

But the practice of Church officials’ making suggestions to public administrators and law makers has never died. As a case in point, one thinks of the Law Observance and Enforcement Committee during the 1940’s when it reported to Second Counselor David O. McKay. Word from the Committee about a grocery store’s selling cigarettes or beer to minors would lead to a “high level” call to Public Safety Commissioner Ben Lingenfelter, and the police would then check out the offending grocer.

Up until recent times, there were close ties between Church headquarters and city and county planning and zoning officers to assure the reservation of lots for new ward houses as subdivision plats were filed. But the responsibility has now shifted to the ward bishops to negotiate with subdividers.

In the legislative area, relations between Church officials and lawmakers are still very direct. Some are out-in-the open for the public to see; others are behind the scenes. Communiques to members of Congress are periodically sent by the First Presidency. Two famous ones were the 1946 admonition to the Utah Congressional delegation to oppose a peacetime draft and the 1965 letter to all Mormons in Congress to resist the repeal of “right-to-work” laws. (Dialogue: A Journal of Mormon Thought, Summer 1966, pp. 43, 45-47)

The “Law Observance and Enforcement Committee” of the Mormon Church, mentioned by J. D. Williams, found itself in trouble with the law in 1966. The following appeared in The Daily Utah Chronicle, published at the University of Utah:

Colonel Elmer G. Thomas of Salt Lake City’s Twenty-four Stakes of Zion Law Enforcement and Observance Committee has again stepped in the middle of a muddy puddle.

Summer ’66 found Thomas and the League on the path of righteousness, this time in pursuance of the area’s alcohol vendors. The league apparently found a nineteen year-old Kaysville youth to pose at being of legal age who would try to purchase liquor from area package stores. . . .

When the league finished its research and released the findings based on the youth’s visits to Salt Lake liquor stores, they no doubt thought they had rid the Valley of an undesirable element.

A Salt Lake area package agency was closed by the Utah State Liquor Control Commission and a clerk was fired and subsequently charged with illegal sale of liquor to a minor. . . .

Utah’s Attorney General Phil Hansen considerably dampened the effect of the league’s victory with his decision that regardless of the intent of the league’s actions it had violated state statutes in urging a minor to break the liquor laws.

Since Hansen’s decision became public, the youth has been charged with illegal purchase of an alcoholic beverage, his father, also a member of the league has been charged with aiding and abetting the illegal purchase. County Attorney Grover A. Giles hinted his office may file additional charges against “groups” who may have aided, abetted or counseled the Kaysville youth’s actions. (The Daily Utah Chronicle, September 23, 1966, p. 2)

Wallace Turner gives this information concerning the church’s stand on right to work laws:

So on June 22, 1965, President McKay and his two counselors, Hugh B. Brown and Nathan Eldon Tanner, wrote a letter to three United States senators and eight representatives in Congress urging them to vote against President Lyndon B. Johnson’s attempt to repeal section 14(b) of the Taft-Hartley Act because this would repeal the nineteen state right to work laws. Only the Mormon members of Congress got the letters; the First Presidency ignored the Gentiles there. . . .

Five of the Democratic members—Senator Moss, Representatives Moss, Dyal, Hanna and Udall—all signed a joint letter. They said that they would not heed the attempt of the Mormon president to give them religious instruction on casting their votes. They wrote:

We yield to none of our brothers in our dedication to the protection of the God-given rights of our fellow citizens. While we respect and revere the offices held by the members of the First Presidency of the church, we cannot yield to others our responsibilities to our constituency, nor can we delegate our own Free Agency to any but ourselves. We know that each of you will agree that in this instance we act in conformity with the highest principles of our church in declining to be swayed by the views expressed in the communications.

In signing the letter, Udall also said that he was going to vote the way the First Presidency indicated, but only because Arizona had a right to work law and he felt compelled to uphold it. (The Mormon Establishment, pp. 292-293)

During the past few years there has been a great deal of controversy in the Mormon Church with regard to Ezra Taft Benson’s political activities. Mr. Benson is an Apostle in the Mormon Church, and although he is not a member of the John Birch Society, his activities on their behalf have caused the Mormon Church leaders a great deal of embarrassment. On January 4, 1964, Drew Pearson made the following comment concerning Ezra Taft Benson:

Benson has praised the man who says Mr. Eisenhower was a dedicated agent of communism—Robert Welch; while Reed Benson, Ezra’s son, has become a paid organizer for Welch’s John Birch Society. . . .

Benson has become so extreme in his views that the Mormon Church, of which he is one of the Twelve Apostles, has quietly transferred him abroad to head the church’s European mission. (San Francisco Chronicle, January 4, 1964)

On February 21, 1964, the Deseret News reported that “President David O. McKay of the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints denied in a letter released here Friday he sent Elder Ezra Taft Benson to Europe because of Elder Benson’s alleged activities with the John Birch Society.”

The Idaho State Journal let the “cat out of the bag,” however, when they published two letters written to Rep. Ralph R. Harding. One of them was written by Joseph Fielding Smith, who has since become President of the Mormon Church, and the other was written by Robert McKay, who is the son of the late President David O. McKay. The Salt Lake Tribune reprinted parts of these letters on Friday, February 21, 1964:

The paper then quoted Mr. Smith’s letter as saying:

“I am glad to report to you that it will be some time before we hear anything from Brother Benson, who is now on his way to Great Britain where I suppose he will be at least for the next two years. When he returns, I hope his blood will be purified.”

Robert McKay’s letter, the paper said, expressed a similar sentiment.

“We shall all be relieved when Elder Benson ceases to resist counsel and returns to a concentration on those affairs befitting his office,” he wrote. “It is my feeling that there will be an immediate and noticeable curtailment of his Birch Society activities.” . . .

There was speculation last December when Mr. Benson was sent to Europe by the church that he was being exiled for his political views. The LDS Church officially denied the rumors. . . .

President Smith, when contacted in his Salt Lake apartment Thursday afternoon, said he had written to Rep. Harding late last year stating that Elder Benson was on his way to Great Britain to serve as a mission president.

“I don’t recall writing ‘When he returns, I hope his blood will be purified.’ If I did write such a statement, I meant that when he returned he would be free of all political ties,” President Smith declared.

The church official said his letter was personal to Rep. Harding and was not intended for publication. (Salt Lake Tribune, February 21, 1964, p. 4-A)

In his book, The Mormon Establishment, Wallace Turner shows that Benson has continued his activities for the Birch Society and that this has caused a great deal of controversy in the Mormon Church.

Conclusion

In this chapter we have shown that the Council of Fifty had a great deal of power in early Utah. Klaus J. Hansen gives this information:

An examination of Utah territorial legislatures from 1851 to 1896 reveals that not until the 1880’s, when the influx of Gentiles into the territory in large numbers began to crack Mormon political hegemony, did the Council of Fifty lose its political influence. (Quest For Empire, p. 137)

The reorganization of the Council of Fifty in 1880 suggests that it may have been dormant for a period. . . . On Monday, March 29, Nuttall recorded in his diary that he “went this morning with Elder Franklin D. Richards at his office and examined the records of the council of 50 or Kingdom of God and made out lists of members now living.”

The reorganization of the Council took place immediately after the general conference of the church in April. . . . On April 21, the Council again convened at the city hall. At this meeting, Feramorz Little, Mayor of Salt Lake City, was “admitted as a member.” . . . The Council of Fifty, organized by Joseph Smith himself through revelation, apparently could not simply be pushed aside. (Ibid., pp. 173-174)

We know that the Council of Fifty was still in existence in 1884, for Abraham H. Cannon recorded the following in his diary:

At 10 a.m. I attended a meeting in the Social Hall with S. B. Young, John W. Taylor and John Q., and was introduced to 50. “The Kingdom of God and its laws, and the keys thereof, and judgment in the hands of His servant, Ahman Christ.” (“Daily Journal of Abraham H. Cannon,” October 9, 1884, vol. 5, p. 24)

It is interesting to note that the “Minutes of the Council of Fifty,” for 1880 lists Joseph F. Smith as a member (Quest for Empire, p. 226). Joseph F. Smith became the sixth President of the Mormon Church, and his son, Joseph Fielding Smith, recently became the tenth President.

Several years ago we discussed the Council of Fifty with a man who had been a member of the church’s “Law Enforcement and Observance Committee.” He stated that this committee was not part of the Council of Fifty, but he told us of a conversation he had with B. H. Roberts in which Roberts claimed that the Council of Fifty was established by revelation and would always be a part of the church. J. D. Williams, however, feels that the Council of Fifty is no longer in existence:

While the laity have no sure knowledge of its demise, one presumes that the Council, like polygamy, was abandoned about the time of statehood as the full machinery of civil government replaced the vestiges of theocracy. (Dialogue: A Journal of Mormon Thought, Summer 1966, p. 47)

Does the Council of Fifty Still Exist?

On pages 414-415 of this book, we tell how Joseph Smith set up a secret organization known as the Council of Fifty. The Council of Fifty was set up for the purpose of establishing “one-world government” under the control of the Mormon priesthood. In an article published in Rocky Mountain Magazine, January-February, 1980, page 17, Michael Parrish related:

... in the words of one believer, a former instructor at church-owned Brigham Young University: “The Mormons do intend to take over the world, certainly world government. There’s no secret about that—it’s in the writings of Joseph Smith right on down. The Constitution of the United States will ‘hang by a thread’ and the church will save it by establishing a theocracy.”

Most scholars feel that the Council of Fifty completely dissolved sometime around the turn of the century, but there are some people who feel it is still functioning. In Mormon Spies, Hughes and the C.I.A., pages 51-52, we considered some material which indicated that the “Council of Fifty” may still be in existence and that Ezra Taft Benson, who is next in line to be President of the Church, is a member. We were not able to offer any real proof concerning this matter, but evidence has recently turned up to show that Heber J. Grant, the seventh President of the Church, was a member of the Council of Fifty and that members of this organization were still alive for many years after the turn of the century. The following is taken from a typed copy of “Heber J. Grant Journal Sheets”:

—1932 Sheets (Jan. 3, 1932): “Brother Franklin S. Richards called at Brother David P. Howells’ home this morning at my request, and we examined a private record covering a period of a number of years, of an organization that at one time had between forty and fifty members, when I was the junior apostle. Today Brother Franklin and I are the only surviving members. We got about two-thirds of the way through the record and I arranged to meet him again next Sunday and finish it.”

Mormon scholar D. Michael Quinn does not make any direct quotations from this document, but he seems to verify its authenticity:

On 3 January 1932, Heber J. Grant recorded that he and Franklin S. Richards were the only surviving members of the Council, and with the death of President Grant on 14 May 1945 the technical survival of the Council of Fifty ended. (Brigham Young University Studies, Winter 1980, p. 191)

Now, while Dr. Quinn may be right in stating that “the technical survival of the Council of Fifty” ended on May 14, 1945, it is also possible to believe that after reading the records of the Council of Fifty in 1932, President Grant decided to get the organization functioning again. After all, the Council almost died during Brigham Young’s lifetime. Quinn states that, “John Taylor, revitalized the Council of Fifty by reconvening it on 10 April 1880 for the first time ‘since last met, in Oct. 68’” (Ibid., p. 173). On page 174 of the same article Quinn says that “John Taylor resurrected the Council of Fifty.” Whether President Grant “resurrected” it again after January 1932 is not known, and, as we pointed out in Mormon Spies, Hughes and the C.I.A., the charge that it is still in existence comes from “hear-say information.”

In any case, Ezra Taft Benson would have had a good opportunity to learn about the goals of the Council of Fifty because he was “ordained an apostle 7 Oct. 1943” and would have been well acquainted with President Grant (see Deseret News 1980 Church Almanac, p. 80). Unless the church releases all of the secret records of the Council of Fifty, we may never know whether Ezra Taft Benson is a member of the Council of Fifty or whether the organization died out in 1945. We do know, however, that

Benson’s goals are consistent with those of the Council of Fifty. If the Council of Fifty is not in existence at the present time, it seems reasonable to believe that Benson might want to reestablish it. He would certainly have the power to do this if he became the “Living Prophet.”

The Salt Lake Tribune for November 4, 1974, reported that, “President Ezra Taft Benson, . . . said, in an interview this week, it is ‘entirely possible’ the president of the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints (Mormon) will one day declare support for a political candidate. . . . President Benson stands next in the traditional line of ascension to the Mormon presidency.”

In a speech delivered at BYU on February 26, 1980, Benson proclaimed that the Prophet has a right to dictate to his people on political matters and even to “lead them in government. Alma was the head of the Church and of the government in the Book of Mormon; Joseph Smith was mayor of Nauvoo and Brigham Young was governor of Utah . . . Those who would remove prophets from politics would take God out of government.” Those who know of President Benson’s previous attempts to involve the church in politics realize the danger that lies ahead if he should become the “Living Prophet.” This is a very real possibility because Spencer W. Kimball, the present leader, is four years older than Benson and now in poor health.

Are Mormon Leaders Still Anointed Kings?

On page 416 of this book we pointed out that the church’s attempt to suppress the fact that Joseph Smith was anointed king has failed and that Mormon scholars are beginning to admit that the charge is true. Recently, D. Michael Quinn conceded that Joseph Smith’s scribe, William Clayton, recorded the matter in his journal and that a revelation given to the Council of Fifty mentioned the matter:

This leads to the final office in the symbolic Kingdom of God on earth as embodied in the Council of Fifty. William Clayton recorded in his journal that in the 11 April 1844 meeting of the Council of Fifty, “was prest. Joseph chosen as our prophet Priest, & King by Hosannas.” . . . Although it has been suggested that William Mark’s statements referred to conventional LDS temple rites rather than to a theocratic ceremony, the evidence does not support this objection. Aside from the contemporary account of William Clayton and some reminiscent descriptions by William Marks, the revelation to the Council of Fifty on 27 June 1882 also stated that God called Joseph Smith, Jr., “to be a Prophet, Seer and Revelator to my Church and Kingdom; and to be a King and Ruler over Israel.” (Brigham Young University Studies, Winter 1980, p. 186)

On page 418 of this book we presented evidence which shows that President John Taylor was made king on February 4, 1885. Dr. Quinn confirms that John Taylor was anointed king and cites the following from a “Manuscript in Franklin D. Richards Miscellaneous Papers, Church Archives”:

... President Taylor stated the object of the Council directed Br Nuttall to read a Revelation which he said he received more than a year ago requiring him to be anointed & set apart as a King Priest and Ruler over Israel on the Earth—over Zion & the Kingdom of Christ our King of Kings. . . . F.M.L. motioned that we proceed to obey the requirement of the revelation. when we clothed in our Priestly attire. E Snow offered prayer, when after the usual ceremony F.M. Lyman prayed in the circle. L. Snow consecrated a bottle of oil. Counselor Cannon anointed President John Taylor and we all laid hands on the Pres. & Geo. Q. sealed the anointing according to a written form which had been prepared. (Brigham Young University Studies, Winter 1980, p. 187)

On page 188 of the same article, Dr. Quinn produces circumstantial evidence that Joseph F. Smith, the sixth President of the Church was also anointed king:

Although the Council of Fifty did not convene after 1884, members of the First Presidency and the Quorum of the Twelve may have performed this theocratic ordinance for the Presidents of the Church who followed John Taylor. At any rate, John W. Taylor, former member of the Quorum of the Twelve Apostles and one of the last men admitted to the Council of Fifty, addressed President Joseph F. Smith in 1911 as “Prophet, President and King” in a letter regarding the Council of Fifty.

Although we cannot actually prove that the President of the Mormon Church is still anointed as king, Apostle Bruce R. McConkie makes it plain that he is in reality “the earthly king”:

1. The Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints as it is now constituted is the kingdom of God on earth. . . . The Church and Kingdom are one and the same. . . .

The Church (or kingdom) is not a democracy; . . . The Church is a kingdom. The Lord Jesus Christ is the Eternal King, and the President of the Church, the mouthpiece of God on earth, is the earthly king. All things come to the Church from the King of the kingdom in heaven, through the king of the kingdom on earth. (Mormon Doctrine, 1979, pp. 415-16)

Records of the Council of Fifty Still Suppressed

D. Michael Quinn, one of the church’s best scholars, has done a great deal of research on the Council of Fifty. Unfortunately, however, Dr. Quinn was not allowed access to important records concerning this secret organization:

These teachings of Joseph Smith to the Council of Fifty, found nowhere else, fill hundreds of pages. On 16 March 1880, nearly 200 pages of the Council’s minutes concerning only its “origin and Organization” were read to President John Taylor, Joseph F. Smith, and Franklin D. Richards. . . . Joseph F. Smith wrote that the Prophet’s 1844 instructions to the Council of Fifty were “grand & god like.”

When Joseph Smith went to Carthage, Illinois, for his last imprisonment, the Church nearly lost these voluminous teachings of the Prophet to the Council of Fifty. . . . Joseph Smith told William Clayton to either burn or bury the records of the Council of Fifty. William Clayton trusted that calmer, more reasonable and more secure times would come for the Latter-day Saints and therefore preserved the records for future generations. Though not available at this time, those teachings of Joseph Smith and of his successors in the Council of Fifty are a far greater legacy to the Latter-day Saints than the often-mundane activities of the Council itself. (Brigham Young University Studies, Winter 1980, p. 192)

Writing in The John Whitmer Historical Association Journal, vol. 1, 1981, page 17, Dr. Quinn refers to the “still unavailable minutes of the Council of Fifty. These minutes are in the vault of the LDS First Presidency’s office.” Although Quinn has been hindered in his research because of the church’s policy of suppression, he has brought forth some very important material concerning the Council of Fifty. One interesting thing that he points out is “the subordination of the Council of Fifty to Church authority”:

At times, the Council of Fifty was even a rubber stamp for prior decisions of the First Presidency and the Quorum of the Twelve Apostles.

From the beginning, the LDS Presidency and apostles directed the Council of Fifty to predetermined ends. . . . The most striking example of this rubber-stamp quality of the Council of Fifty occurred in October 1882. The First Presidency and the Quorum of the Twelve discussed on 4 October who should be the candidate for Utah’s delegate to Congress, and in the morning of 11 October 1882, the Presidency and apostles voted that John T. Caine be the delegate. Three hours later, at the direction of the LDS hierarchy, the Council of Fifty convened, discussed who should be the delegate to Congress, “nominated” John T. Caine, and appointed a committee to inform the nominating committee of the Church’s political party, the People’s Party.

Members of the Council of Fifty who were not in the First Presidency or the Quorum of the Twelve were probably unaware of the extent to which those authorities manipulated meetings of the Council of Fifty so as to arrive at predetermined decisions. Therefore, the unsophisticated Council members developed unrealistic views. . . . Even Apostle Lyman Wight exaggerated the Council of Fifty’s importance because his long absences from Nauvoo during 1844 and 1845 prevented his seeing the extent to which the Presidency and apostles constituted a shadow government behind the Council of Fifty’s shadow government. These overly enthusiastic Council of Fifty members simply did not understand that the Mormon hierarchy was supreme in both Church and Kingdom, and that it allowed no rival. (Brigham Young University Studies, Winter 1980, pp. 174, 176-177)

Although we cannot agree with all the observations Dr. Quinn makes in his article, we do feel that he has made a real contribution to those who wish to understand the Council of Fifty and its role in making Mormon leaders kings.

Secret Meeting Before Mormon Kingdom Fully Established

In his book, The Progress of Man, pages 417-418, Joseph Fielding Smith, who later became the tenth President of the church, said that “there is a nucleus of a government, formed since that of the United States, which is perfect in its nature, having emanated from a Being who is perfect.

“But some may enquire, is it right—is it lawful for another government to be organized within the United States, of a theocratical nature? Yes, perfectly so!”

In his book, The Way to Perfection, pages 290-291, Joseph Fielding Smith tells of a secret meeting to be held in Missouri before Christ returns:

Until this grand council is held, Satan shall hold rule in the nations of the earth; but at that time thrones are to be cast down and man’s rule shall come to an end. . . . Preparation for this work is now going on. . . .

This council in the valley of Adam-ondi-Ahman is to be of the greatest importance to this world. At that time there will be a transfer of authority from the usurper and impostor, Lucifer, to the rightful King, Jesus Christ. . . .

When this gathering is held, the world will not know of it; the members of the Church at large will not know of it, yet it shall be preparatory to the coming in the clouds of glory of our Savior Jesus Christ as the Prophet Joseph Smith has said. The world cannot know of it. The Saints cannot know of it—except those who officially shall be called into this council—for it shall precede the coming of Jesus Christ as a thief in the night, unbeknown to all the world.

Mullen, Mormons and the C.I.A.

One thing that really concerns those who know about the Council of Fifty and the church’s ultimate plan to rule the world is the large number of Mormons involved in intelligence work for the U.S. Government. Some people feel that there may be a connection between the Central Intelligence Agency and the Mormon Church. During the investigation of the Watergate break-in it was discovered that the Robert R. Mullen Company, which handled international public relations for the Mormon Church, also provided cover for the CIA. We first became aware of this company in 1966 when Robert Mullen wrote the book, The Latter-day Saints: The Mormons Yesterday and Today. Although Mr. Mullen claimed he was a non-Mormon, he was far from an unbiased observer. In fact, his book was nothing but a thinly disguised propaganda piece written for the church. This, of course, is not too surprising since his firm handled public relations for the church. According to the church's newspaper, Deseret News, Oct. 8, 1966, Mullen "was engaged to publicize the first European tour of the famous Tabernacle Choir . . ." The Mullen Company was still handling public relations for the church at the time of the Watergate break-in.

In any case, Robert Bennett, the son of the noted Mormon Senator Wallace F. Bennett, became President of the Mullen Company in 1971. One of Robert Bennett's employees was Howard Hunt, the notorious spy who took part in the Watergate break-in. According to James McCord, who was also involved in the Watergate affair, some of the planning for the burglary took place in the Mullen Company. He gave this testimony in the Senate Watergate Hearings:

Mr. McCord. The meetings, as best I recall, in which these references by Mr. Hunt took place, took place in Mr. Hunt's office, in the Robert F. Mullen Co. . . .

Mr. Liddy, during those discussions, as best I recall, would raise the topic that the planning and the progress of the operation itself was going forward, comments about what Mr. Mitchell was saying to him about what could be done in terms of the priorities of the operation; that is, which ones were to be done first and second. . . .

Mr. Thompson. Do you recall anything that Mr. Hunt said to you about Mr. Colson's involvement or did you just get the general impression that Mr. Colson was involved in some way from what Mr. Hunt told you?

Mr. McCord. I believe my previous testimony which I will restate before this committee, was to the effect that when I had met Mr. Hunt in his offices at 1700 Pennsylvania Avenue [this is the address of the Mullen Co.] with Mr. Liddy that he had referred to his previous work at the White House for Mr. Colson, referring to him as his superior; that during the session that Mr. Hunt, Mr. Liddy, and I had in Mr. Hunt's offices, Mr. Hunt had a typed plan that he had typed himself, step-by-step, for the entry of the Democratic National Committee headquarters; . . . (Hearings Before The Select Committee On Presidential Campaign Activities Of The United States Senate . . . , U.S. Government Printing Office, 1973, Book 1, pp. 142-143)

Besides the Watergate break-in, other illegal surveillance activities were discussed at the company which handled the Mormon Church's public relations. Even a student from the church's own Brigham Young University was recruited for the spying activities. We find the following in The Senate Watergate Report, vol. 1, page 297:

D. Ruby II. In February 1972, Howard Hunt hired Thomas Gregory, a student at Brigham Young University, to infiltrate the Muskie campaign. Hunt met Gregory through Robert Fletcher, the nephew of Robert Bennett, Hunt's employer at the Mullen Company.

On January 17, 1973, the Brigham Young University paper, Daily Universe reported:

BYU student Thomas Gregory testified yesterday in Washington D.C. that he was paid $3400 for spying and quit after a "close call" in an effort to bug Gen. George McGovern's headquarters.

Gregory testified in the Watergate bugging trial that he met with E. Howard Hunt, G. Gordon Liddy, James W. McCord Jr., and four other defendants in a Washington hotel room early last May.

He said McCord expressed interest in planting electronic listening devices in the offices of McGovern campaign officials, according to Associated Press reports. . . . He did agree to remain in the building late on May 28 and leave some locks open when he departed. However, another man working in the headquarters discovered him and wanted to know why he was there.

The fact that the Mormon Church used the Mullen Company to handle its public relations becomes very intriguing when we learn of the deep involvement this company had with the CIA. J. Anthony Lukas wrote:

. . . when Mullen established its "own" office in Stockholm in 1962, it was staffed by two CIA men—James Everett and Jack Kindschi—who pretended to be working on a study for General Foods, . . . while they were actually debriefing Soviet and Chinese defectors. . . . Kindschi moved for a time to Mexico City, again under Mullen cover, while Everett established a Mullen office in Amsterdam . . . there is evidence that Mullen & Company may have served a similar role at home. (Nightmare: The Underside Of The Nixon Years, New York, 1976, p. 38)

It is interesting to note that we had corresponded with CIA agent James Everett for a number of years. In fact, he had written to us from Sweden on January 20, 1965, on Mullen & Company stationery (see photograph in Mormon Spies, Hughes and the C.I.A., p. 14) and had requested copies of our publications on Mormonism. When we first confronted James Everett with the question of whether he had worked for the CIA, he denied any involvement. Later, however, we found evidence that Everett had served as an agent. On May 29, 1976, we decided that we would confront Mr. Everett again with this important question. This time we had the evidence and Mr. Everett frankly confessed that he had been under "deep cover" while he was with the Mullen Co. and that this fact had come out in testimony before the Nedzi committee. The findings of the Nedzi committee have been published under the title, Inquiry Into The Alleged Involvement Of The Central Intelligence Agency In The Watergate And Ellsberg Matters: Hearings Before The Special Subcommittee On Intelligence Of The Committee On Armed Services, House of Representatives, Ninety-Fourth Congress, First Session. These hearings not only throw light on James Everett, but they also show the cover-up which Robert Mullen and Robert Bennett engaged in after the Watergate break-in when they tried to keep their company's relationship with the CIA a secret. One CIA memo, written March 1, 1973, contains some enlightening information:

1. Mr. Robert R. Mullen, . . . telephoned CCS on the morning of February 28 to advise us that Sandy Smith, a reporter from Time Magazine, was in the Mullen office late on February 27. Smith started off by saying that "a source in the Justice Department" had informed him that the company "is a front for CIA." Mr. Mullen denied the allegation stoutly, said the company clients are all legitimate and offered to let Smith inspect the company books. . . .

3. Mullen told Smith that Bob Bennett, partner of Mr. Mullen who was on a business trip to California, really knew most about Hunt's later period of Mullen employment. . . .

10. . . . It was agreed that Mr. Colby would recommend to the DCI, Mr. Schlesinger, that Messrs. Mullen and Bennett be allowed to read the June 21, 1972 memorandum to the FBI and that they be asked to continue to deny any allegation of association with the Agency, and state in effect that there was no relationship, and if there were, it, of course, would not be admitted. . . .

12. Mr. [deleted] and Mr. Mullen met near the Watergate and proceeded to Mr. Mullen's apartment in the Watergate through a rear entrance to the Watergate. Mr. Bennett joined them shortly and both read the memorandum. . . . They said they would continue to deny any association with the Agency other than the already acknowledged relationship with the Cuban Freedom Committee.

13. . . . Mr. Bennett said that he recently spent four hours in Los Angeles being interviewed by a Newsweek reporter and had convinced him that the Mullen Company was not involved with the Watergate Affair. Mr. Bennett rather proudly related that he is responsible for the article "Whispers about Colson" in the March 5 issue of Newsweek. Mr. Bennett does not believe the company will be bothered much more by the news media . . . Mr. Bennett said also that he had been feeding stories to Bob Woodward of the Washington Post with the understanding that there be no attribution to Bennett. Woodward is suitably grateful for the fine stories and by-lines which he gets and protects Bennett (and the Mullen Company). . . . Mr. Bennett mentioned the February 12, 1973 meeting among himself, Mullen and [deleted], when he stated his opinion that the Ervin Committee investigating the Watergate incident would not involve the company. He said that, if necessary, he could have his father, Senator Bennett of Utah, intercede with Senator Ervin. His conclusion then was that he could handle the Ervin Committee if the Agency can handle Howard Hunt. . . .

14. . . . Bennett believes he and his Agency affiliations will not be raised again. He has the Ervin Committee shut off and feels the Agency has the responsibility to persuade Howard Hunt to avoid revealing what he knows of the history of cover arrangements with the company. Bennett and Mullen further suggested that the Agency "plug the leak" in the FBI and/or Department of Justice. (CIA memo, dated March 1, 1973, as cited in Inquiry Into The Alleged Involvement Of The Central Intelligence Agency In The Watergate And Ellsberg Matters, U.S. Government Printing Office, 1975, pp. 1073-1075)

In his testimony before the Nedzi committee, Robert Bennett gave this information:

Mr. Nedzi. Did you ever receive any instructions from anyone in the CIA to misrepresent or to refuse to represent the truth to the press?

Mr. Bennett. In the July 10 meeting with Mr. Lukoskie when I told him that I denied to the press that Mullen had any CIA ties, he expressed approval of that. He urged me to continue to take that posture. . . .

Mr. Nedzi. At one point Mr. Eisenstadt, in his memo, makes reference to a statement allegedly made by you, " * * * that they take care of Hunt and you take care of Ervin." Would you comment on that statement?

Mr. Bennett. That is an accurate statement. I am not sure the way it appeared in the paper is accurate. There have been other phrases.

Mr. Nedzi. The statement in the memorandum was, "His conclusion then was that he could handle the Ervin committee if the Agency can handle Howard Hunt."

Mr. Bennett. Yes, that is accurate. The reference to the newspaper to my father was not accurate. We are talking about a coverup, Mr. Chairman. We are talking about a coverup of the Mullen Co.'s relationship with the CIA overseas. As I explained this morning, I have consistently attempted, prior to the time that it was blown by CBS News, to keep this relationship dark. I was convinced that the Ervin committee would not expose that relationship. I was not convinced that Howard would—that Howard might, very easily, get on the stand and, for some purpose connected with his own defense, expose Mr. Everett in [deleted.]

I was saying to the Agency . . . I am satisfied that the Ervin committee can be handled in terms of covering up the relationship between the Mullen Co. and the CIA. I said, "I cannot handle Howard.

That is your responsibility." That is the message that I was giving the CIA. (Inquiry Into The Alleged Involvement Of The Central Intelligence Agency In The Watergate And Ellsberg Matters, pp. 1082, 1105, 1106)

Robert Bennett, of course, knew that if the whole story came out it would bring embarrassment to both the Mormon Church and the CIA. In spite of his efforts to cover up the matter, the truth became known, and Jack Anderson, who is himself a member of the Mormon Church, revealed that Bennett knew of the "White House burglary-bugging team" before the Watergate break-in was discovered:

WASHINGTON — CIA front man Robert Bennett, son of veteran Sen. Wallace Bennett, R-Utah, has conceded that he knew a White House burglary-bugging team was on the prowl in advance of the celebrated Watergate break-in.

A secret memorandum, written by his CIA case officer, states the Senator's son withheld vital information from the authorities.

In an interview with my associate Les Whitten, Bennett acknowledged he knew at least three days before the Watergate burglary that White House aide E. Howard Hunt, and his second-story crew had plotted to break into the campaign headquarters of Sen. George McGovern, D-S.D., and bug the place.

Instead of reporting the conspiracy to the police, Bennett kept his mouth shut. He also confided to his CIA contact that he had held back information from the original Watergate prosecutors when they later questioned him about the Watergate break-in.

This episode is another link in the mysterious CIA involvement in Watergate. We uncovered the first piece of the puzzle as early as April 7, 1973, when we reported that the CIA had "ordered its agents not to talk to the FBI about the explosive Watergate case." Thereafter, we published several reports about the CIA and Watergate, but the full story still hasn't been told. . . .

Bennett's nephew referred a Brigham Young University student, named Thomas Gregory, to Hunt who recruited the young man as a political spy. . . . Gregory went back to Bennett and explained his misgivings. As Bennett related it, Gregory had been told by Hunt to work late one night at McGovern headquarters and leave a door open so the White House burglars could sneak in.

Gregory informed Bennett that Hunt was "reporting to someone higher up." Hunt's White House connections impressed young Gregory. Bennett said he also felt Hunt would do nothing illegal because "he had a full-time lawyer advising him." The lawyer, it turned out, was Hunt's co-conspirator, G. Gordon Liddy. (Deseret News, June 25, 1974)

For a more complete statement about Bennett's cover-up see our publication, Mormon Spies, Hughes And The C.I.A., pages 35-39.

At any rate, we think the most significant thing about James A. Everett's confession that he was a secret agent for the CIA is the new light it throws on Robert R. Mullen's book, The Latter-day Saints: The Mormons Yesterday and Today. After we found that the Mullen Company provided cover for the CIA, we began to suspect that Mr. Mullen's book might have some connection to the CIA. Since the investigation by the Senate Select Committee on Intelligence, the connection between the CIA and the publishing world has become known. The New York Times for April 27, 1976, reported that "Prior to 1967, the Central Intelligence Agency sponsored, subsidized or produced over 1,000 books: approximately 25 percent of them in English. In 1967 alone, the C.I.A. published or subsidized over 200 books, . . ." The Mullen book on the Mormons appeared in the fall of 1966, and was printed by "Doubleday & Company."

It is interesting to note that the Senate Select Committee found that another book “actually written by C.I.A. agents” was unwittingly published by Doubleday. This, of course, does not prove that the CIA had anything to do with Mullen’s book about the Mormons, but when we remember that Mullen provided cover for the CIA, we cannot help but be a little suspicious of any book which came from his public relations firm. Now, when we add to this the fact that CIA agent James Everett worked on foreign editions of the book on the Mormons the whole thing becomes even more intriguing. We became aware of Mr. Everett’s involvement with the Mullen book when we first talked to him on the telephone on October 7, 1974. At that time, of course, he was denying any connection between himself and the CIA. Now that we learn that Mr. Everett was really a secret agent, this takes on new significance. Why would a CIA spy be working on a book for the Mormons? Mr. Everett later explained that this work was just part of his cover and that it had no connection with the CIA. In other words, he needed a legitimate project to work on so that he could cover up his secret activities. This could very well be true, but then how can we be certain that it was not also a part of his CIA role? How do we know where to draw the line? In a conversation on May 29, 1976, Mr. Everett made a very revealing statement concerning his work on the Mullen book. He said that before the various translations were made, it was necessary to make certain changes to make the book fit each country and that he helped make these revisions. In other words, he had a part in the decision making process as to what should appear in each translation of the book. These revisions were then approved by Mr. Mullen.

The situation we have, then, is this: Robert Mullen, whose company provided cover for the CIA and helped to prepare literature for groups connected with the CIA, wrote a book promoting the interests of the Mormon Church. It was published by a company which had previously been unwittingly used by the CIA to print a book written by CIA agents. After Mr. Mullen’s book about the Mormons appeared in English, it was translated into foreign languages and a secret agent of the CIA, James A. Everett, helped to make revisions in the text to fit the various countries. Because of these strange circumstances, we cannot help but raise the question as to whether the CIA has some interest in the programs of the Mormon Church.

In the book, Mormon Spies, Hughes And The C.I.A., pages 55 and 68, we pointed out that some former CIA agents believe that the Mormon missionary system is sometimes used to provide cover. Mr. Everett claims that this is “a lot of hogwash.” He indicated that the CIA would never use such young men. We, of course, agree that most missionaries would be too young, but there are certainly many that are old enough. Then, too, there are mission presidents who serve for a longer period. In an Associated Press story printed in the Salt Lake Tribune, we find the following:

The Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints, which has more than 30,000 missionaries worldwide, denies any connection with the CIA. But the confusion is understandable—the CIA does some of its most successful recruiting in predominantly Mormon Utah.

This summer, the CIA conducted an experimental radio advertising campaign in Utah. Charles Jackson, the CIA’s chief recruiting officer, said “well over 100 applicants responded to the radio spots.” . . .

“Utah is one of our good sources,” said Denver CIA recruiter Jack Hansen, now in Provo to recruit at BYU, whose student newspaper—the Daily Universe—is currently running CIA job advertisements. . . .

“We’ve never had any trouble placing anyone who has applied to the CIA,” said Dr. Gary Williams head of the BYU Asian Studies Department. “Every year, they take almost anybody who applies.”

Former Mormon missionaries have the three qualities the CIA wants: foreign language ability, training in a foreign culture and former residence in a foreign country, Williams said. . . .

Williams admitted that some governments are concerned about the “pretty good dose of returned missionaries who’ve gone back to the countries they were in, as Central Intelligence agents.”

He said Brazil was among the countries which have questioned the church about the number of former missionaries who’ve returned as CIA employees, and Taiwan had expressed concern because a mission president there had worked with the CIA several years prior to his church assignment. (Salt Lake Tribune, October 1, 1981)

The Idaho Statesman, which printed the same AP story on October 1, 1981, included a very interesting paragraph which did not appear in the Salt Lake Tribune:

Young Mormons leaving on missions have been approached to work concurrently for the CIA, Williams said. He said he knew of none who had ever accepted.

Patrick J. McGarvey, who used to work for the CIA, claimed that he personally knew a man who used a missionary cover while working for the C.I.A. In his book, C.I.A.: The Myth and the Madness, page 57, McGarvey related: “Deep cover knows few bounds. . . . A friend found himself back in the Mormon mission in Hong Kong after his training.” While McGarvey’s book would seem to show that the church has been used to provide cover for CIA activities, we seriously doubt that the CIA would use a large number of Mormons while they are still serving on their missions. If very many were used, it would soon become generally known and the cover would not be effective. In any case, there can be no doubt that a large number of returned missionaries are being recruited to the CIA. On February 22, 1975, an employee of the CIA sent us a letter in which he stated:

I am currently employed with the Central Intelligence Agency and can attest to the fact that the Agency has been very fruitful in hiring Mormons, especially former missionaries.

. . . I would appreciate it if you would keep the above information in your confidence as to not using my name. I do not feel that I have given you any secret information but people can sometimes make something out of nothing.

The CIA would naturally be drawn to the Mormon missionary who has learned a foreign language and has had some experience in a foreign country. If the CIA already has a “surprising number” of Mormons in its employ at the present time, they will probably have a great many more in the future because the church is developing the “language center of the world” to train missionaries at Brigham Young University. In the BYU alumni paper we read:

It’s a profound combination: take BYU and add a multimillion dollar language center designed to teach at least 20 languages to 22,250 missionaries each year. The result is, as one observer conjured, the “language center of the world.” (Brigham Young University Today, August, 1974)

The church’s educational system and genealogical program could also be very useful to the CIA.

After reading our book, Mormon Spies, Hughes and the C.I.A., Jim Kostman of the Assassination Information Bureau, an organization which has done research on the murder of John F. Kennedy, became so interested in the possibility of a Mormon-CIA relationship that he flew out from Massachusetts to talk with us. In the interview, Mr. Kostman told us he talked with a man who had been involved with the CIA. This man claimed that when he was trying to locate a piece of equipment belonging to the CIA, he was told that it was on loan to the Mormon Church Genealogical Department, and that the church did a great deal for the CIA.

In the January 1975 issue of the Salt Lake City Messenger we reported that a man who had taught at the Brigham Young University told us that the church's educational system contains a large number of men who have been involved in the CIA or FBI. Later we found evidence that even the church's commissioner of education, Dr. Neal A. Maxwell, was at one time connected with the CIA. In the Brigham Young University's paper The Daily Universe we found the following: "Dr. Neal A. Maxwell, church commissioner of education . . . served for two years with the United States Central Intelligence Agency" (Daily Universe, February 23, 1971). According to the Deseret News, Church Section, for November 14, 1964, Dr. Maxwell served as an assistant to Senator Bennett after he left the CIA: "From 1952-54 he served with the Central Intelligence Agency and from 1954-56 was legislative assistant to Sen. Wallace F. Bennett, R-Utah." This is very interesting in light of the fact that Sen. Bennett's son, Robert, later ran the Mullen Company which served as a CIA front while handling public relations for the church. After we publicized the information about Maxwell's involvement with the CIA, a television station picked up the story. Although it may have only been a coincidence, shortly after this he was removed from his job as commissioner of education. Since that time, however, he has become one of the highest leaders in the Mormon Church. On July 24, 1981, the Salt Lake Tribune announced that he had been moved up to become a member of the Council of Twelve Apostles. In addition, Bob Gottlieb and Peter Wiley report that Maxwell is on the church's Special Affairs Committee:

Recently, the church organized the Special Affairs Committee to deal with issues, particularly national and international issues, that might "impact on church interests," as one key church operative put it. The committee consists of former railroad executive Gordon Hinckley, former Mayor of Palo Alto, California, James Faust and former Central Intelligence Agency man and University of Utah vice president Neal Maxwell. . . . A number of politicians told us that they "cleared" their candidacies with the Special Affairs Committee to at least assure that the church would not oppose them, since its opposition is considered the kiss of death in Utah politics. (The Nation, August 16-23, 1980, pp. 151-152)

While any direct connection between the Mormon Church and the CIA would be very difficult to prove, the circumstances surrounding the publication of Robert Mullen's book tend to make us very suspicious. The reader will remember that The Latter-day Saints: The Mormons Yesterday and Today was written by a man who prepared material for organizations linked to the CIA, and since a secret agent worked on foreign editions, we cannot help but suspect that it is in some way connected with the interests of the CIA. We feel that this whole matter needs further investigation to determine if there has been a secret attempt to link church and state through the CIA. For more information on this important subject we recommend our book, Mormon Spies, Hughes and the C.I.A.

28. The Danites

John Whitmer, one of the eight witnesses to the Book of Mormon, made this statement:

Joseph Smith, Jr., S. Rigdon, and Hyrum Smith moved their families to this place, Far West, in the spring of 1838. As soon as they came here, they began to enforce their new organized plan, which caused dissensions and difficulties, threatenings and even murders. Smith called a council of the leaders together, in which council he stated that any person who said a word against the heads of the Church, should be driven over these prairies as a chased deer by a pack of hounds, having an illusion to the Gideonites, as they were termed, to justify themselves in their wicked designs. Thus on the 19th of June, 1838, they preached a sermon called the salt sermon, in which these Gideonites understood that they should drive the dissenters, as they termed those who believed not in their secret bands, in fornication, adultery or midnight machinations. . . . They had threatened us, to kill us, if we did not make restitutions to them, by upholding them in their wicked purposes and designs. . . . But to our great astonishment, when we were on our way home from Liberty, Clay County, we met the families of Oliver Cowdery and L. E. Johnson, whom they had driven from their homes, and robbed them of all their goods, save clothing, bedding, etc.

While we were gone Jo. and Rigdon and their band of Gadaiatons kept up a guard, and watched our houses, and abused our families, and threatened them, if they were not gone by morning, they would be drove out, and threatened our lives, if they ever saw us in Far West. (John Whitmer's History, p. 22)

In a manuscript written in 1839, Reed Peck gives this information:

The people of the surrounding country were still friendly & harmony prevailed among the Mormons till the middle of June when the enmity of the two parties from Kirtland manifested itself to an alarming degree At this period measures were conserted no doubt by instigation of the presidency to free the community of the Cowderies, Whitmers, Lyman Johnson and some others, to effect which a secret meeting was called at Far West, by Jared Carter and Dimick B. Huntington two of Smiths greatest courtiers where a proposition was made and supported by some as being the best policy to kill these men that they would not be capable of injuring the church. . . . the Sunday following (June 17th) in the presence of a large congregation— S. Rigdon took his text from the fifth chapter of Mathew “Ye are the salt of the Earth but if the salt have lost his savour wherewith shall it be salted, it is henceforth good for nothing but to be cast out and be trodden under foot of men” From this scripture he undertook to prove that when men embrace the gospel and afterwards lose their faith it is the duty of the Saints to trample them under their feet . . . and called on the people to rise en masse and rid the county of such a nuisance He said it is the duty of this people to trample them into the earth and if the county cannot be freed from them any other way I will assist to trample them down or to erect a gallows on the square of Far West and hang them up as they did the gamblers at Vicksburgh and it would be an act at which the angels would smile with approbation Joseph Smith in a short speech sanctioned what had been said by Rigdon, though said he I don't want the brethren to act unlawfully but will tell them one thing Judas was a traitor and in stead of hanging himself was hung by Peter, and with this hint the subject was dropped for the day . . . On the next Tuesday these dissenters as they were termed were informed that preparation[s] were being made to hang the[m] up and if they did not escape their lives would be taken before night, . . . The wrath of the presidency and the threats of han[g]ing &c. were undoubtedly a farce acted to frighten these men from the county that they could not be spies upon their conduct or that they might deprive them of their property and indeed the proceedings of the presidency and others engaged in this affair fully justify the latter conclusion, . . . (“The Reed Peck Manuscript,” dated Sept. 18, 1839, University of Utah, pp. 6-7 of typed copy)

William Harris made this statement concerning the Salt Sermon:

About this time, Rigdon preached his famous “salt sermon.” . . . He informed the Mormons that the church was the salt; that dissenters were the salt that had lost its savor, and that they were literally to be trodden under the feet of the church, until their bowels should be gushed out. In order to give weight to this interpretation, he attempted to sustain his position from the Bible! He referred to the case of Judas, informing the people that he did not fall headlong and his bowels gush out, without assistance, but that the apostles threw him, and with their feet trampled them out! He also said that Ananias and Sapphira his wife, did not fall down dead, as translated; but that Peter and John slew them, and the young men, or deacons, carried them out and buried them. (Mormonism Portrayed, by William Harris, Warsaw, Ill., 1841, pp. 32-33)

The Mormon historian B. H. Roberts frankly admitted that Sidney Rigdon, a member of the First Presidency of the Mormon Church, preached the “Salt Sermon”:

Sometime in June Elder Sidney Rigdon delivered what was afterwards called his “Salt Sermon,” . . .

The doctrine of the text the speaker applied to the dissenting brethren and intimated that the “trodden under foot of men” should be literal, much to the scandalizing of the church, since the dissenters made capital of it to prejudice the minds of the non-“Mormons” of the surrounding counties. (A Comprehensive History of the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints, by B. H. Roberts, Salt Lake City, Utah, 1930, vol. 1, p. 438)

After telling of the “Salt Sermon,” B. H. Roberts stated:

This, unfortunately, was followed shortly afterwards by a communication drawn up by Elder Rigdon, it is said, and addressed to the leading dissenters, Oliver Cowdery, David Whitmer, John Whitmer, William W. Phelps and Lyman E. Johnson, commanding them to leave Caldwell county within three days under penalty of a “more fatal calamity” befalling them if they refused to depart. The document was signed by eighty-four men, more or less prominent in the church, but neither the Prophet's nor Sidney Rigdon's name is included among the signatures. This action was undoubtedly a departure from that strict adherence to legal procedure for which the church must stand or else accept the doctrine of the "old settlers" of Jackson county that there exists with the community, outside of legal procedure, the right to expel undesirable people from that community. . . . Those eighty-four citizens of Caldwell county were not justified in taking the law into their own hands and under threats of vengeance driving these dissenters from Far West, for that was the effect of these threats. (Comprehensive History of the Church, vol. 1, pp. 438-439)

The letter to the dissenters was reproduced in Senate Document 189. In this letter we find the following:

"To Oliver Cowdery, David Whitmer, John Whitmer, William W. Phelps, and Lyman E. Johnson, greeting:

"Whereas the citizens of Caldwell county have borne with the abuse received from you . . . having exhausted all the patience they have, . . . out of the county you shall go, and no power shall save you. And you shall have three days after you receive this communication to you, including twenty-four hours in each day, for you to depart with your families peaceably; which you may do undisturbed by any person; but in that time, if you do not depart, we will use the means in our power to cause you to depart; for go you shall. . . . vengeance sleepeth not, neither does it slumber; and unless you heed us this time, and attend to our request, it will overtake you at an hour when you do not expect, and at a day when you do not look for it; and for you there shall be no escape; for there is but one decree for you, which is depart, depart, or a more fatal calamity shall befall you. . . . we will put you from the county of Caldwell: so help us God." (Senate Document 189, 26th Congress, 2d Session, February 15, 1841, pp. 6, 7, 9)

Ebenezer Robinson tells that this letter was "signed by 83 determined men. Among the names we recognize some of the members of the High Council, and others holding high positions in the church, including that of Hyrum Smith, one of the First Presidency" (The Return, October 1889, typed copy, p. 51).

Reed Peck wrote the following:

We found that the events of a few days had placed Caldwell County unde[r] a despotic government where even liberty of speech was denied to those not willing to unite in support of the New Order . . . A friend of long standing . . . said that if Joseph Smith should tell him to cut my throat he would do it without hesitation . . .

A few individuals of us were ever after this opposed to the rule of the presidency perceiving that all spiritual and temporal affairs were under their control and no monarch on earth ever had supreme power over his subjects more than they over the inhabitants of Caldwell county only they durst not exercise it to so great a degree. Their word was law in religious civil and military matters, . . . In the latter part of June a young man from Ohio having reported something about J Smith & S Rigdon, was taken by constable D. B. Huntington Geo W Robinson and a few others compelled to sign a libel & kneel before S. Rigdon and ask pardon as the only alternative to escape a caining from the constable who held his staff over him in an attitude for striking until he bent the knee . . . (The Reed Peck Manuscript, pp. 7-9)

Reed Peck also stated:

John Corrill observed to a person in Far West that he did not "think it his duty to unite with the firm and that he had no confidence in the revelation that required it" Joseph Smith and S Rigdon learning that he had made this observation, chid him severely for his rebellion in the presence of several persons Smith said to him "if you tell about the streets again that you do not believe this or that revelation I will walk on your neck Sir" at the same time smiting his fists to evince his great rage He talked of dissenters and cited us to the case of

Judas, saying that Peter told him in a conversation a few days ago that himself hung Judas for betraying Christ He also said "if you do not act differently and show yourself approved you shall never be admitted into the Kingdom of Heaven—I will stand at the entrance and oppose you myself and will keep you out if I have to take a fisty cuff in doing it." (Ibid., p. 13)

Origin of the Danites

David Whitmer, one of the three witnesses to the Book of Mormon, made this statement:

If you believe my testimony to the Book of Mormon; if you believe that God spake to us three witnesses by his own voice, then I tell you that in June, 1838, God spake to me again by his own voice, from the heavens, and told me to "separate myself from among the Latter Day Saints, for as they sought to do unto me, so should it be done unto them." In the spring of 1838, the heads of the church and many of the members had gone deep into error and blindness. . . . In June, 1838, at Far West, Mo., a secret organization was formed, Doctor Avard being put in as the leader of the band; a certain oath was to be administered to all the brethren to bind them to support the heads of the church in everything they should teach. All who refused to take this oath were considered dissenters from the church, and certain things were to be done concerning these dissenters, by Dr. Avard's secret band. . . . my persecutions, for trying to show them their errors, became of such a nature that I had to leave the Latter Day Saints; and as I rode on horseback out of Far West, in June 1838, the voice of God from heaven spake to me as I have stated above. I was called out to hold the authority which God gave me! (An Address To All Believers In Christ, by David Whitmer, Richmond, Mo., 1887, pp. 27-28)

In the Comprehensive History of the Church, the Mormon historian B. H. Roberts gives us the following information concerning the secret band known as the Danites:

It is in this testimony and principally in the statement of Dr. Avard, that the existence of the "Danites" in the "Mormon" church is affirmed. Avard declared that about four months before the date of his testimony,—which would be in the month of July, 1838—"a band called the 'Daughter of Zion' (afterwards called the 'Danite Band') was formed of the members of the Mormon church, the original object of which was to drive from the county of Caldwell all those who dissented from the Mormon church; in which they succeeded admirably and to the satisfaction of all concerned." (Comprehensive History of the Church, vol. 1, pp. 500-501)

Reed Peck gives this interesting information concerning the Danite Band:

Some time previous to this secret meetings had been held in F West . . . I atten[ded] one about the last of June and heard a full disclosure of its object—Jared Carter Geo W. Robinson and Sampson Avard, under the instruction of the presidency, had formed a secret military society, called the "daughter of Zion". . . "When any thing is to be performed no member shall have the privilege of judging whether it would be right or wrong but shall engage in its accomplishment and trust God for the result

"It is not our business or place to know what is required by God, but he will inform us by means of the prophet and we must perform If any one of you see a member of the band in difficulty in the surrounding country contending for instance with an enemy, you shall extricate him even if in the wrong if you have to do with his adversary as Moses did with the Egyptian put him under the sand and both pack off to Far West and we will take care of the matter ourselves. No person shall be suffered to speak evil or disrespectfully of the presidency The secret signs and purposes of the society are not to be revealed on pain of death" &c &c About 50 persons were initiated into the Society at the time I was introduced . . .

I was appointed Adjutant of the band . . . though I declared to my trusty friends that I would never act in the office—All the principles of the Society tended to give the presidency unlimited power over the property, persons and I might say with propriety lives of the members of the church as physical force was to be resorte[d] to if necessary to accomplish their designs The blood of my best friend must flow by my own hands if I would be a faithful Danite should the prophet command it Said A McRae in my hearing “If Joseph should tell me to kill Vanburen in his presidential chair I would immediately start and do my best to assassinate him let the consequences be as they would—” . . . Captains of fifties & Captains of tens and all these officers with the privates were to be under the administration of the presidency of the church and wholly subject to their control At a meeting for the organization of the Danites Sampson Avard presented the society to the presidency who blessed them and accepted their services as though they were soon to be employed in executing some great design They also made speeches to the society in which great military glory and conquest were represented as a waiting them. . . . In the fore part of July the “brother of Gideon” or Jared Carter Capt Genl of the Danites having complained to Joseph Smith of some observations made by Sidney Rigdon in a sermon was tried for finding fault with one of the presidency and deprived of his station and Elias Higbee was appointed in his stead

Carter’s punishment according to the principles of the Danites should have been death In the evening after the trial . . . D. B. Huntington stated that Joseph declared during the examination that he should have cut Carter’s throat on the spot if he had been alone when he made the complaint Huntington also said that on his trial Carter came within a finger point of losing his head. Sampson Avard related at the same time the arrangements that had been made by the presidency and officers present at the trial respecting the dissenters— Said he, “all the head officers are to be furnished by the presidency with a list of dissenters both in Ohio and Missouri and if for example I meet with one of them who is damning and cursing the presidency, I can curse them too and if he will drink I can get him a bowl of brandy and after a while take him by the arm and get him one side in the brush when I will into his guts in a minute and put him under the sod. When an officer has disposed of a dissenter in this way he shall inform the presidency, and them only with whom it shall remain an inviolable secret. In July the law of consecration took effect which required every person to give up to the bishop all surplus property of every description not necessary for their present support Sampson Avard the most busy actor and sharpest tool of the Presidency informed John Corrill and Myself that “all persons who attempted to deceive and retain property that should be given up would meet with the fate of Ananias and Saphira who were killed by Peter!” (The Reed Peck Manuscript, pp. 9-12)

In his dissertation written at Brigham Young University, Leland Gentry gave the following information:

The Band went by several titles. In its initial stage, it was referred to as the “Big Fan” or “Brothers of Gideon,” while it was known as the “Daughters of Zion” in its second phase. Somewhere along the line, the term “Danite” was adopted, . . . There were about three hundred men belonging to the Danite order. . . . meetings were secretive and carefully guarded. . . . Members of the Organization were placed under solemn covenant and a penalty of death not to reveal any secrets committed to them. . . .

Secret signs and tokens of recognition were taught, enabling Danites to detect a friend under any circumstances. The “Signal of distress,” once given, must be responded to, even at the risk of certain death. . . .

Avard took advantage of important Latter-day Saint teachings to further the growth of his Danite band. He taught his followers that they were living in a “new and different dispensation,” one in which the Kingdom of God would break in pieces and consume all earthly kingdoms. The duty of all noble and loyal Danites was to waste away the Gentiles by stealing their goods and consecrating them to the Kingdom of God. If any questioned this procedure, the reply was given that the earth is the Lord’s not man’s, and that the laws of the land do not apply when one commits himself to God alone. (A History of the Latter-day Saints in Northern Missouri, pp. 362-364)

Attempted Explanations

Mormon writers have been somewhat divided concerning the Danite Band. Some have denied that it even existed. Others have admitted its existence but denied that Joseph Smith was connected with it. Still others have admitted that it existed and had church approval.

The Mormon writer Ivan J. Barrett stated:

Writers to this day who should know better bring in this Danite band which never existed. John Taylor to Vice President Colfax said when the Danite story was brought up, “I was there and knew to the contrary; and so did the people of Missouri, and so did the Governor.” (More Remarkable Stories of How We Got The Revelations in The Doctrine and Covenants, Extension Publications, B.Y.U., p. 20)

John Taylor, who became the third President of the Church, also stated:

I have heard a good deal about Danites, but I never heard of them among the Latter-day Saints. If there was such an organization, I never was made acquainted with it . . . (History of the Church, vol. 3, p. 168, footnote)

The Mormon Apostle John A. Widtsoe, on the other hand, admitted that Dr. Avard tried to organize a secret band but denied that the church supported it (see Gospel Interpretations, by John A. Widtsoe, Salt Lake, 1947, pp. 245-250).

The Mormonologist Hugh Nibley states: “It is significant that those who have written on the Danites, from Bennett to Brooks, have not bothered to mention that the earliest and fullest discussion of the subject is by Joseph Smith himself. Is it not odd that they will not consider this account—. . .” (Sounding Brass, by Hugh Nibley, Salt Lake City, 1963, p. 217). The statement Dr. Nibley refers to is found in the History of the Church, vol. 3, pp. 178-182:

. . . Satan himself was no less busy in striving to stir up mischief in the camp of the Saints: and among the most conspicuous of his willing devotees was one Doctor Sampson Avard, . . . he stated that he had the sanction of the heads of the Church for what he was about to do; and by his smiles and flattery, persuaded them to believe it, and proceeded to administer to the few under his control, an oath, binding them to everlasting secrecy to everything which should be communicated to them by himself. Thus Avard initiated members into his band, firmly binding them, by all that was sacred, . . . and would often affirm to his company that the principal men of the Church had put him forward as a spokesman, and a leader of this band, which he named Danites.

Thus he duped many, . . . He held his meetings daily, and carried on his crafty work in great haste, to prevent mature reflection upon the matter by his followers, until he had them bound under the penalties of death to keep the secrets and certain signs of the organization by which they were to know each other by day or night.

After those performances, he held meetings to organize his men into companies of tens and fifties, appointing a captain over each company. . . . he then called his captains together and taught them in a secluded place, as follows:

Avard’s Instructions to His Captains.

My brethren, as you have been chosen to be our leading men, our captains to rule over this last kingdom of Jesus Christ—and you have been organized after the ancient order—I have called upon you here today to teach you, and instruct you in the things that pertain to your duty, and to show you what your privileges are, . . . Know ye not, brethren, that it soon will be your privilege to take your respective companies and go out on a scout on the borders of the settlements, and take to yourselves spoils of the goods of the ungodly Gentiles? for it is written, the riches of the Gentiles shall be consecrated to my people, the house of Israel; and thus you will waste away the Gentiles by robbing and plundering them of their property; and in this way we will build up the kingdom of God, and roll forth the little stone that Daniel saw cut out of the mountain without hands, . . . If our enemies swear against us, we can swear also. . . . I would swear to a lie to clear any of you; and if this would not do, I would put them or him under the sand as Moses did the Egyptian; and in this way we will consecrate much unto the Lord, and build up His kingdom; . . . And if any one of this Danite society reveals any of these things, I will put him where the dogs cannot bite him.

At this lecture all of the officers revolted, . . .

Avard's teachings were still manfully rejected by all . . . the eyes of those present were opened, Avard's craft was no longer in the dark, and but very little confidence was placed in him, even by the warmest of the members of his Danite scheme.

When a knowledge of Avard's rascality came to the Presidency of the Church, he was cut off from the Church, and every means proper used to destroy his influence, at which he was highly incensed, and went about whispering his evil insinuations, but finding every effort unavailing, he again turned conspirator, and sought to make friends with the mob.

And here let it be distinctly understood, that these companies of tens and fifties got up by Avard, were altogether separate and distinct from those companies of tens and fifties organized by the brethren for self defense, in case of an attack from the mob. . . . Therefore, let no one hereafter, by mistake or design, confound this organization of the Church for good and righteous purposes, with the organization of the "Danites," of the apostate Avard, which died almost before it existed. (History of the Church, vol. 3, pp. 178-182)

There are several reasons why this statement attributed to Joseph Smith cannot be accepted. One of the most important is that it contradicts another statement made by him on January 3, 1844:

The Danite system alluded to by Norton never had any existence. It was a term made use of by some of the brethren in Far West, and grew out of an expression I made use of when the brethren were preparing to defend themselves from the Missouri mob, in reference to the stealing of Macaiah's images (Judges chapter 18)—If the enemy comes, the Danites will be after them, meaning the brethren in self defense. (History of the Church, vol. 6, p. 165)

Notice that in the first statement Joseph Smith admits that there was a Danite Band, whereas in the second he denies its existence. Furthermore, in the first statement he claims that Avard named the group "Danites," but in the second he states that it "was a term made use of by some of the brethren in Far West, and grew out of an expression I made use of."

Toward the end of the first statement Joseph Smith says that the "companies of tens and fifties got up by Avard, were altogether separate and distinct from those companies of tens and fifties organized by the brethren for self defense, in case of an attack from the mob." He also states:

Therefore, let no one hereafter, by mistake or design, confound this organization of the Church for good and righteous purposes, with the organization of the "Danites," of the apostate Avard, which died almost before it had existed.

While it is true that there were two organizations—i.e., the "Danites" and the "Armies of Israel"—the two were not really as "separate and distinct" from each other as Joseph Smith would have us believe. Actually, the Danites served in the "Armies of Israel." The Mormon writer Leland Gentry states:

The so-called "Armies of Israel" created at Far West and Adam-ondi-Ahman by order of General Alexander Doniphan were later confused with the Danites. The confusion was natural, since both groups were broken down into smaller units and since many Danites also belonged to the legitimate militia. The latter made no visible attempt, apparently, to distinguish between their services for one group or the other. (A History of the Latter-day Saints in Northern Missouri From 1836 to 1839, BYU Thesis, 1965, p. 362)

Thus we see that the "Danites" and the "Armies of Israel" were not really so distinct. In the first statement concerning the Danites Joseph Smith stated:

When a knowledge of Avard's rascality came to the Presidency of the Church, he was cut off from the Church, and every means proper used to destroy his influence, at which he was highly incensed, and went about whispering his evil insinuations, but finding every effort unavailing, he again turned conspirator, and sought to make friends with the mob. (History of the Church, vol. 3, p. 181)

It does not take much research to show that this statement is completely false. Leland Gentry admits that the Danites were in existence in June, 1838, but Avard was not excommunicated until March, 1839. In an extract from the minutes of a conference held March 17, 1839, we read:

. . . elder George W. Harris made some remarks relative to those who had left us . . . After the conference fully expressed their feelings upon the subject, it was unanimously voted that the following persons be excommunicated from the church of Jesus Christ of Latter Day Saints, viz: George M. Hinckle, Sampson Avard, John Corrill, Reed Peck, Wm. W. Phelps, Frederick G. Williams, Thomas B. Marsh, Burr Riggs, and several others. After which the conference closed by prayer. (Times and Seasons, vol. 1, p. 15)

Thus we see that Joseph Smith's statement is completely untrue. Joseph Smith stated that as soon as the presidency found out about Avard's teachings they excommunicated him and then he turned conspirator and "sought to make friends with the mob." What actually happened was that the presidency were well aware of Avard's teachings and supported him. When Avard was later arrested, he turned against the church and testified against Joseph Smith. According to the History of the Church his testimony was given on November 13, 1838 (History of the Church, vol. 3, p. 209). It was three months after his testimony against the church that he was finally excommunicated.

In spite of these facts, Mormon writers still continue to propagate this untruthful story. President Joseph Fielding Smith stated:

These Danites did subscribe to some oath of vengeance on their enemies. However, as soon as Joseph Smith discovered what was going on, he put a stop to it and Avard was excommunicated. (Essentials in Church History, by Joseph Fielding Smith, p. 227)

Dr. Hugh Nibley quotes Lorenzo Dow Young, who told a similar falsehood:

"From the meeting I went directly to Brother Brigham and related the whole history of the affair. He said he had long suspected that something wrong was going on, but had seen no direct development. He added we will go at once to brother Joseph who has suspected that some secret wickedness was being carried on by Dr. Avard. Dr. Avard was at once cited before the authorities of the Church and cut off for his wickedness. He turned a bitter enemy of the saints." (Sounding Brass, by Hugh Nibley, p. 220)

From the information quoted above it is very obvious why we cannot believe Joseph Smith's statement concerning the Danites.

Joseph Smith to Blame

The Mormon writer William E. Berrett admits that "Such a band as the 'Danites' did exist, as historians affirm; . . .

The organization had been for the purpose of plundering and murdering the enemies of the Saints (The Restored Church, by William E. Berrett, Salt Lake City, 1956, pp. 197-198).

Although Mr. Berrett admits that the Danite band did exist, and that it was for the purpose of “plundering and murdering the enemies of the Saints,” he claims that the Mormon Church leaders were not responsible for it being formed. While many Mormons would like to believe that Joseph Smith was not responsible for the Danite band, the evidence shows that he was to blame. David Whitmer, one of the three witnesses to the Book of Mormon, claimed that Joseph Smith and Sidney Rigdon were responsible. In an interview, which was published in the Kansas City Daily Journal, David Whitmer stated:

... they issued a decree organizing what was termed the “Danites, or Destroying Angels,” who were bound by the most fearful oaths to obey the commandments of the leaders of the church. The Danites consisted only of those selected by Smith and Rigdon. They t[h]reatened myself, John Whitmer, Oliver Cowdery and Lyman Johnson with the vengeance of the Danites . . . (Kansas City Daily Journal, June 5, 1881)

The Mormon argument that Joseph Smith had nothing to do with the Danites breaks down rapidly when we begin to examine the facts. Several men who had been members of the Mormon Church testified that the Danites were supported by the church. Thomas B. Marsh, who had been President of the Council of the Twelve Apostles, made this statement in an affidavit given October 24, 1838:

“They have among them a company, considered true Mormons, called the Danites, who have taken an oath to support the heads of the Church in all things that they say or do, whether right or wrong. Many, however, of this band are much dissatisfied with this oath, as being against moral and religious principles.” (History of the Church, vol. 3, p. 167, footnote)

Even some of those who remained faithful admitted that the Danites were a church organization. Oliver Boardman Huntington stated the following in his diary:

But a few weeks before, and but a few rods from this same place, I first formed a knowledge, and took the first mystic step in the new and unknown bonds of the brothers and ites of Dan; entered an apprentice in the divine brotherly union; . . . This society of Danites was condemned by the public like the rest of Mormonism; . . . (Diary of Oliver Boardman Huntington, vol. 1, p. 36, typed copy at Utah State Historical Society)

The following is found in the Biographical Sketch of Luman Andros Shurtliff:

About this time I was invited to unite with a society called the Danite society. It was got up for our personal defense, also for the protection of our families, property and religion. Signs and pass words were given by which members could know the other wherever they met, night or day. (Biographical Sketch of Luman Andros Shurtliff, p. 32, Utah State Historical Society)

The memory of the “Danites” was not soon forgotten. On September 22, 1846, the Nauvoo Legion was taken through “the old Missouri Danite drill.” Hosea Stout records the following in his journal:

We then had a drill muster for an (h)our or so. I took the command by order of the Col. After drilling a while I took them through the old Missouri Danite drill. (On The Mormon Frontier; The Diary of Hosea Stout, edited by Juanita Brooks, University of Utah Press, 1964, vol. 1, p. 197)

On another occasion Hosea Stout wrote:

Saturday March 21st 1846. This morning some of the teams began to move . . . we then went on again performing as we rode some Danite evolutions of horsemanship as practised in the War in Davis County Missouri in the fall of 1838. (Ibid., pp. 140-141)

Under the date of June 5, 1847, Hosea Stout wrote:

To day the Omahas were to come in & I was ordered to meet them . . .

We received them as usual formed on horse back according to the Danite system of horsemanship and consequently I was in the center of the line (Ibid., p. 259)

In a footnote on page 141 of the same volume, Juanita Brooks states:

17. These “Danite evolutions of horsemanship” are mentioned several times by Stout, Lee and other contemporary writers. Some were used in southern Utah as a part of parades and celebrations as late as the 1860’s.

After the Mormons arrived in Utah, Brigham Young made this statement:

If men come here and do not behave themselves, they will not only find the Danites, whom they talk so much about, biting the horses’ heels, but the scoundrels will find them biting their heels. In my plain remarks, I merely call things by their right names. Brother Kimball is noted in the States for calling things by their right names, and you will excuse me if I do the same. (Journal of Discourses, vol. 5, p. 6)

Stealing From the Gentiles

In his book, A History of the Latter-day Saints in Northern Missouri From 1836 to 1839, Leland Gentry claims that Joseph Smith was not fully aware of what Dr. Avarad was doing. On page 322 he states:

In time, however, under the leadership of Avarad, the movement assumed a third purpose entirely foreign to the spirit of Mormonism; stealing from the Gentiles. . . . During the very trying period known as the “Mormon War,” some of the Danites did rob their enemies’ homes and then consecrated the property thus taken as “spoils of war.” “It was frequently observed among the troops,” said John Clemenson, “that the time had come when the riches of the Gentiles should be consecrated to the Saints.”

While the argument that stealing is “foreign to the spirit of Mormonism” may sound quite convincing to Mormons today, it does not hold much water for those who are well versed in early Mormon history. Mary Ettie V. Smith, for instance, stated that the Mormon Apostle Orson Hyde received goods which were taken from the Gentiles while the Mormons were on the way to Utah:

The horses, and other booty purchased or stolen, was forwarded at once to Kanesville, and was there received by Orson Hyde, who, after assorting it, forwarded it on to the plains, or made such disposition of it as would place it beyond the reach of the Gentiles, in case suspicion should be directed towards them. Orson Hyde is one of the “Twelve Apostles,” and is often in the States. There are now many persons living by whom these facts can be proved. (Mormonism: Its Rise, Progress, And Present Condition. Embracing The Narrative Of Mrs. Mary Ettie V. Smith, Of Her Residence And Experience Of Fifteen Years With The Mormons, Hartford, 1870, p. 107)

Mrs. Smith also charged that Bill Hickman was involved in this stealing from the Gentiles:

Somewhat along in the evening, William Hickman, one of the “Danites,” came to the cabin door, . . . He had not heard that our child was dead. Hickman said: “This will make it bad for us; but what a splendid night for our expedition, and things are in such a shape we cannot put it off?”

Wallace pointed to our dead baby, under the window, and made no reply.

“Yes,” said Hickman, “I see that is serious. But we must go.” . . . Hickman, although somewhat embarrassed, said they would fasten the door, as well as they could, but Wallace must go, and it was time they were there already; and, taking him by the arm, hurried him away, and they left me alone with my dead child. (Ibid., pp. 70-71)

On pages 76-77 of the same book, Mrs. Smith stated:

I asked Wallace, a few days after, where he went the night he left me with the wolves, and went with William Hickman. . . .

Wallace said, “the President of the ‘stake,’ David Fulmer [Fulmer?], had received the information, that a Gentile family by the name of Martin, were about to pass Garden Grove . . . and that they had a great many cattle and horses. . . .

“The ‘Danites’ were therefore . . . to intercept him, and take Martin’s stock...which we accordingly did—Hickman and myself, with some others. . . .” In reply to another question, he said, “If the emigrants, when they lose their cattle, go on, and do not run against their fate by making us too much trouble, in looking for, or in the attempt to recover them, they are not harmed; otherwise they are put out of the way.”

While these charges may seem incredible to a Mormon today, they are well within the realm of possibility. That the early Mormon leaders approved of stealing from the Gentiles is made very plain in the journal of John Bennion. In 1860 Bennion felt that William Hickman—this is the same man spoken of by Mrs. Smith—should be punished for his evil deeds, but he soon learned that Bishop Gardiner “had been bound & could not act” against Hickman and that Orson Hyde—President of the Twelve Apostles and the man whom Mrs. Smith accuses of receiving stolen property—taught that a man should not be punished for stealing from the “gentiles.” The following is taken from Bennion’s journal:

Sat 13 went to the city met Bp Gardiner had a talk with him about W. A. Hickmans wicked course for some time past he said that up till now he had been bound & could not act I told him I was not bound neither was I afraid to expose the whickedness of any man that it was my duty to expose we got home about sun down in the evening I met with Bp & councillors & parties concerned [to] try George Hickman for stealing mules when about to commence trial Elder Hyde come in and by Bp Gardners solicitation he preached and the trial was postponed after meeting Bp council & Elder Hyde had a long talk in my house br Hyde said speaking of stealing that a man may steal & be influenced by the Spirit of the Lord to do it that Hickman had done it years past said that he never would institute a trial against a brother for stealing from the gentiles but stealing from his brethren he was down on it he laid down much teaching on the subject

S 14th went to meeting at the mill to hear br Hyde . . . he give much good instruction spoke on last nights intention to try Hickman give it as the word of the Lord to set him free for the past, bid him go & sin no more. (“John Bennion Journal,” October 13 and 14, 1860, original journal at Utah State Historical Society)

Since this evidence comes from John Bennion’s journal—not from an anti-Mormon source—it cannot be easily dismissed.

On page 339 of his book, A History of the Latter-day Saints in Northern Missouri From 1836 to 1839, Leland Gentry says: “Danites were apparently taught to obey the commands of their superiors without question or hesitation.” While such a teaching may seem extreme today, in the early period of Mormon history it was publicly taught. Heber C. Kimball, First Counselor to Brigham Young, once said that “if you are told by your leader to do a thing, do it, none of your business whether it is right or wrong” (Journal of Discourses, vol. 6, p. 32). On another occasion he said that if a person does things “according to counsel and they are wrong, the consequences will fall on the heads of those who counseled you, so don’t be troubled” (William Clayton’s Journal, p. 334).

Since the Mormon people were receiving this type of teaching from their leaders it is no surprise that they allowed themselves to be bound by oaths not to reveal the secrets of the Danite society. Leland Gentry made this statement:

The organization was characterized by secret oaths, signs, and penalties for infraction of Danite covenants; promises were exchanged to protect or to help a fellow Danite regardless of the cost or circumstances, such action to be taken without question or hesitation. Those who joined the Order became so involved that it was impossible for them to withdraw without endangering their lives. (A History of the Latter-day Saints in Northern Missouri From 1836 to 1839, p. 730)

Cutting Throats

It is very interesting to note that Orson Hyde, one of the Twelve Apostles in the Mormon Church, became very upset at Sidney Rigdon after Joseph Smith’s death, and accused him of teaching murder when the Mormons were in Far West. The following statement by Orson Hyde appeared in the Mormon newspaper, the Nauvoo Neighbor:

Elder Rigdon has been associated with Joseph and Hyrum Smith as a counselor to the church, and he told me in Far West that it was the imperative of the Church to obey the word of Joseph Smith, or the presidency, without question or inquiry, and that if there were any that would not, they should have their throats cut from ear [to] ear. (The Nauvoo Neighbor, December 4, 1844)

This was a very damaging admission to make. Since Sidney Rigdon was a counselor to Joseph Smith in the First Presidency, it would be almost impossible to believe that Joseph Smith was not aware of what was going on.

Although Leland Gentry will not admit that Joseph Smith was involved with the Danites, he is almost forced to admit that Sidney Rigdon had something to do with them. On page 348 of his book, A History of the Latter-day Saints in Northern Missouri From 1836 to 1839, he states:

Sidney Rigdon’s connection with the Danites is also buried in mystery. Although he denied that neither he or Joseph Smith belonged to the Order, statements are credited to him during this period which have strong Danite overtones. Rigdon’s biographer, Daryl Chase, allows that while the testimony given against Rigdon at the trial was one-sided, it does show that he “was one of the chief storm-centers on the Mormon side.”

The Mormon writer Klaus J. Hansen frankly admits that Sidney Rigdon helped organize the Danite Band:

Sampson Avard, with the connivance and encouragement of Sidney Rigdon, had organized a secret military organization bound together by oaths and secret passwords. . . . Ostensibly, Avard had organized the band in self-defense against the depredations of the Missourians. But his real intentions went farther, and must be identified with Smith’s ambitions to establish the political kingdom of God. Although the prophet repudiated Avard’s excessive zeal and excommunicated him from the church, there can be no question that the germ for Avard’s ideas must be sought in ideas that originated with the leader of Mormonism himself. (Quest for Empire, by Klaus J. Hansen, pp. 57-58)

The Mormon argument that Joseph Smith was not aware of the Danite Band really begins to break down when the Mormon writer Leland Gentry has to admit that the First Presidency—including Joseph Smith—attended a Danite meeting:

Increased pressures from doubtful Danites resulted in the only visit Joseph or Hyrum Smith ever made to Danite meetings. It is possible that Sidney Rigdon may have visited more than once. Avard informed those present at the meeting that “he had procured the Presidency to come there to show that what he had been doing was according to their direction and will.” However, adds Peck, Avard “did not explain to the Presidency” before the assembly “what his teachings had been in that society.” John Clemenson, also present for the same occasion, testified as follows:

The three composing the Presidency was at one of those meetings, and to satisfy the people, Dr. Avard called on Joseph Smith, Jr., who gave them a pledge that if he led them into difficulty, he would give them his head for a football and that it was the will of God these things should be so. The teacher and active agent of the society, [however], was Dr. Avard.

It will be recalled that the Danite organization went through three stages of development, the longest of which was the second stage, namely, self-protection from mob violence. . . .

It was during the very early period of stage number two that the First Presidency visited a Danite meeting at Avarð's request. Although Avarð "did not explain to the Presidency what his teachings had been in the society," he did justify its right to existence on the grounds that it was organized to protect the Saints. Owing to the unresponsive attitude of the Missouri Legislature toward requests for a local militia, the First Presidency, not understanding the full intent of Avarð's mind, may have felt that the Society had a legitimate basis for existence. Hence Joseph Smith's statement that "it was the will of God these things should be so." This comment was nothing more than a commendation to those assembled that their services in defence of their brethren were acceptable unto the Lord and in line with His will. (A History of the Latter-day Saints in Northern Missouri From 1836 to 1839, pp. 342-343)

On page 362 of the same book Leland Gentry states:

The student stands aghast at the methods by Sampson Avarð. Avarð skillfully utilized numerous devices to construct and perpetuate his organization. He told his followers that he acted under Joseph Smith's direction and then swore his men to everlasting secrecy so that they could not inquire for themselves. He even induced the First Presidency to attend a Danite meeting and give their approval to what he was teaching, without, of course, informing them what his teachings were. He demonstrated outward allegiance to the Church himself by obeying the Law of Consecration and by urging his followers to do the same.

It would seem, then, that Mormon writers have backed themselves into a corner. The only reasonable thing for them to do now is to admit the whole truth about the Danites. Harold Schindler, a Mormon writer, does exactly that. He states:

One of the great controversies surrounding the Sons of Dan concerns the question of whether or not Joseph knew and approved of its existence prior to the society's public exposure in November, 1838. The point is relevant because if his denials of such knowledge are true, it marked the only occasion in Orrin Porter Rockwell's life when he strayed from the dictates of the church by entering into an unauthorized doctrinal venture. His close relationship and devoted obedience to the prophet makes it inconceivable that he would have failed to inform Joseph of the Danites. Even so, the prophet's absolute grip on the church precludes the possibility that Avarð could have carried out an undertaking of such magnitude in secrecy. Finally, the argument presents itself that the prophet probably encouraged the concept, since it played a dual role of preventing a recurrence of the Kirtland rebellion by uncovering potential apostates almost immediately while at the same time protecting the Mormons against their Gentile enemies. (Orrin Porter Rockwell; Man of God, Son of Thunder, by Harold Schindler, 1966, p. 44)

"War of Extermination"

On July 4, 1838, the Mormons had a celebration at Far West. In Joseph Smith's History we find the following:

July 4.—The day was spent in celebrating the Declaration of Independence . . . and also by the Saints making a "Declaration of Independence" from all mobs and persecutions which have been inflicted upon them, . . .

The oration was delivered by President Rigdon, at the close of which was a shout of Hosanna, . . . (History of the Church, vol. 3, pp. 41-42)

B. H. Roberts made this comment concerning Rigdon's speech:

This oration by Sidney Rigdon has always been severely criticised as containing passages that were ill-advised and vehemently bitter. Especially those passages which threatened a war of extermination upon mobs should they again arise to plague the saints. (History of the Church, vol. 3, p. 42, footnote)

An extract from Rigdon's speech is published in the Comprehensive History of the Church. The following is taken from that account:

"But from this day and this hour we will suffer it no more. We take God and all the holy angels to witness, this day, that we warn all men, in the name of Jesus Christ to come on us no more for ever, for from this hour we will bear it no more; our rights shall no more be trampled on with impunity; the man, or the set of men who attempt it, do it at the expense of their lives. And that mob that comes on us to disturb us, it shall be between us and them a war of extermination; for we will follow them until the last drop of their blood is spilled; or else they will have to exterminate us, for we will carry the seat of war to their own houses and their own families, and one party or the other shall be utterly destroyed. . . . No man shall be at liberty to come into our streets, to threaten us with mobs, for if he does he shall atone for it before he leaves the place; neither shall he be at liberty to vilify and slander any of us, for suffer it we will not, in this place. . . . Neither will we indulge any man, or set of men, in instituting vexatious law suits against us, to cheat us out of our rights; if they attempt it we say woe be unto them. We this day, then, proclaim ourselves free with a purpose and determination that never can be broken, No, never! No, never! No, never!" (Comprehensive History of the Church, by B. H. Roberts, vol. 1, p. 441)

The Mormon historian B. H. Roberts admitted that Joseph Smith approved of the "declaration":

The unwisdom of the utterance has been quite generally recognized by our writers, and by them responsibility for it has been placed upon the rather fervid imagination of Sidney Rigdon, who delivered the speech, and who quite generally is supposed to have been mainly or wholly responsible for it. This is not true. The speech was carefully prepared, written before delivery in fact, and read by other presiding elders of the church before its delivery. It immediately appeared in The Far West, a weekly newspaper published at Liberty, Clay county; and was also published in pamphlet form by Ebenezer Robinson on the press of the Elders' Journal. Joseph Smith in his journal speaks of it approvingly; and in the Elders' Journal, of which he was the editor, and in the editorial columns under his name, the speech is approvingly recommended to the saints. In view of these facts, if the "declaration" was of doubtful propriety, and unwise and impolitic, responsibility for it rests not alone on Sidney Rigdon, but upon the authorities of the church who approved it, and the people who accepted it by their acclamation. (Comprehensive History of the Church, vol. 1, p. 443)

When Sidney Rigdon later fell into a state of apostacy, the other Mormon leaders tried to blame him for all their troubles in Missouri. They claimed that his declaration was the cause of the trouble that they had with the Gentiles; they even acted as if Joseph Smith had nothing to do with the speech. The Mormon Apostle Orson Hyde stated:

Now I don't know of any man in this church that has gone deeper into matters than he [Sidney Rigdon] did in Far West in his oration on the 4th of July. He was the cause of our troubles in Missouri, and although brother Joseph tried to restrain him, he would take his own course, . . . (Millennial Star, vol. 5, p. 104)

Brigham Young went so far as to say: "Elder Rigdon was the prime cause of our troubles in Missouri, by his fourth of July oration" (Times and Seasons, statement of Brigham Young at the church trial of Sidney Rigdon, October 1, 1844, vol. 5, p. 667).

It was not long after Sidney Rigdon gave his speech that war broke out between the Mormons and the inhabitants of Missouri, and the Mormons were finally driven from the state. As in all wars, innocent people were killed and atrocities were committed by both sides (see The Mormon Kingdom, vol. 1, pp. 66-78).

Although we must not try to justify the actions of the non-Mormons in Missouri (especially concerning the massacre at Hawn's Mill, where innocent Mormons were killed), we cannot accept the explanation given by many Mormon historians. They claim that the non-Mormons were completely to blame and that the Mormons were persecuted because of their religion.

It should be remembered that Sidney Rigdon said that if a war started it would be a war of "extermination." When Governor Boggs issued his "infamous" Exterminating Order, he stated that the Mormons "must be exterminated or driven from the state, if necessary for the public good." The Mormon writer Harold Schindler stated: "It was more than coincidence that Boggs chose that particular word in his instructions to General Clark" (Orrin Porter Rockwell; Man of God, Son of Thunder, p. 58).

While we feel that Governor Boggs was wrong in driving the Mormons out of Missouri (the innocent with the guilty), the Mormons should remember that they drove the dissenters out of Caldwell County.

The Mormon writer Leland Gentry stated:

One of the important questions emerging from a study of the Mormon War is which of the troops from either side were legal and which were not. As shown in former portions of this work, men which at certain times were not authorized to act were, at other times, legitimate militia. This fact compounds rather than simplifies the problems. Moreover, both sides appear to have engaged in illegal as well as legal operations. The Mormons had their secret order of Danites, which organization was not officially empowered to act. The non-Mormons banded together in several unofficial companies to commit their deeds of mayhem. (A History of the Latter-day Saints in Northern Missouri From 1836 to 1839, p. 501)

The Mormon writer Klaus J. Hansen feels that one of the main reasons the Mormons were persecuted was because of their idea of "a temporal kingdom of God":

Yet the burden of responsibility must not be placed, in the fashion of the defenders of Mormonism, entirely on the Gentiles. What the apologists have done is to project twentieth-century Mormon values and practices into the nineteenth century. They, understandably, can see no reason why anybody would want to persecute them. Neither can they concede this possibility to their ancestors. Consequently, in the eyes of the apologists, the cessation of conflict is primarily evidence of a matured American society willing to accept the religious peculiarities of Mormonism. What the apologists do not want to admit is that Mormonism itself had to undergo fundamental changes in order to make possible its acceptance by society at large. . . .

As long as the Saints, however, exerted all their efforts toward the realization of a temporal kingdom of God on earth, conflict with their environment was inevitable. One enemy of the Saints asked the pointed question, if the Mormons were entirely the victims of the ill will of their neighbors, "why have they come into violent conflict with the people in all their seven places of settlement? For they have tried every different kind of people, from New York, through Ohio, Illinois, and Missouri, to Salt Lake. Are all the people of all those places incurably vicious, mobbers and trespassers on religious right?" (Quest for Empire, 1967, pp. 149-150)

Mormon Crimes

The Mormon writer Leland Gentry makes this observation: "Latter-day Saint historians have generally been unwilling to concede that the Mormons of 1838 did the burning or plundering which the non-Mormons charged against them" (A History of the Latter-day Saints in Northern Missouri From 1836 to 1839, p. 383).

According to the History of the Church, Joseph Smith stated that the mob burned their own houses:

The mob seeing that they could not succeed by force, now resorted to strategem; and after removing their property out of their houses, which were nothing but log cabins, they fired them, and then reported to the authorities of the state that the "Mormons" were burning and destroying all before them. (History of the Church, vol. 3, pp. 163-164)

Hyrum Smith, Joseph's brother, made an affidavit in which he stated:

They went to work and moved their families out of the county and set fire to their houses; and not being able to incense the "Mormons" to commit crimes, they had recourse to this stratagem to set their houses on fire, . . . which deed was most diabolical and of the blackest kind; for indeed the "Mormons" did not set them on fire, nor meddle with their houses or their fields. (History of the Church, vol. 3, pp. 408-409)

While many Mormon apologists have tried to blame everything on the Missourians, the Mormon writer Leland Gentry admits that there is another side to the story:

The evidence tends to support the view that both sides engaged in incendiary acts. . . .

The charge of theft raises another interesting point. As formerly noted, the Danites were taught to take from the Gentiles and consecrate to the Church. Nearly every person who testified at the trial against the Mormon leaders made mention of this fact. John Clemenson stated that "it was frequently observed among the troops [at Diahman] that the time had come when the riches of the Gentiles should be consecrated to the Saints." Jeremiah Myers testified that "the consecrated property . . . was dealt out to those in need" by Bishop Vinson Knight. (A History of the Latter-day Saints in Northern Missouri From 1836 to 1839, pp. 385, 387)

It must be acknowledged that the fears which the non-Mormons entertained against the Saints were real. The charges of burning and stealing had partial foundation in fact, and these actions were interpreted as acts of war. To the Saints, however, these deeds were mere acts of retaliation, necessities laid upon them as a result of similar doings by the mobs. Moreover, that which was taken was considered to be "consecrated property" belonging to the Church. It was dealt out carefully to those in dire need.

The role of the Danites in the Mormon War is not clear. There is little doubt that some participated in the Battle of Crooked River, and several are known to have done so in the burnings and plunderings in Daviess County. The meeting in Far West over which Sidney Rigdon allegedly presided has all the earmarks of being Danite-inspired. The formation of a "Destruction Company," thoroughly Danite in intent, was most unfortunate for the Saints in view of future developments. It laid them open to further charges of aggression. (Ibid., pp. 426-427)

By the time that Doniphan ordered the Saints to form in their own defense, the Danite movement had entered its third phase, namely, pillaging, spoiling, and burning the property of all who opposed the Saints. (Ibid., pp. 328-329)

To help insure the departure of the dissidents, a secret organization was formed among the Saints known as the Danite Band. This Order went through three principal stages of development. First, it was organized to drive out the Dissenters. Having accomplished this object, the Society's members pledged themselves to protect the lives and property of their brethren against all comers. At the peak of the Mormon War, the movement assumed its third and final object, namely plundering and burning the property of non-Mormon enemies. It is likely that this Organization was responsible for many of the excesses later charged against the Saints in general. (Ibid., p. 729)

Both the Mormon Apostle Orson Hyde and Thomas B. Marsh, President of the Council of the Twelve Apostles, left Far West and made affidavits against the church:

AFFIDAVIT OF THOMAS B. MARSH

At the request of a committee of the citizens of Ray county, I make the following statement . . . Joseph Smith, the prophet, had preached a sermon in which he said that all the Mormons who refused to take up arms, if necessary, in the difficulties with the citizens, should be shot or otherwise put to death; and as I was there with my family,

I thought it most prudent to go and did go with my wagon as the driver. We marched to Adam-ondi-Ahman and found no troops or mob in Davies county. . . . a company of about eighty Mormons, commanded by a man fictitiously named Captain Fearnought, marched to Gallatin. . . . I afterwards learned from the Mormons that they had burnt Gallatin and that it was done by the aforesaid company that marched there. The Mormons informed me that they had hauled away all the goods from the store in Gallatin and deposited them at the Bishop's storehouse at Diahmon [sic]. On the same day, Lyman Wight marched about eighty horsemen for Mill Port [sic]. He returned before night and called for Joseph Smith and Hiram [sic] Smith, to report to them . . . and said Wight reported that he had been in sight of Mill Port [sic]—saw no one to fight—but that the people had gone and left their houses and property. The prophet, on hearing the property was left, commenced a reply and said: "We had better see to it," when Wight stopped him by saying, "Never mind, we will have a private council," and Smith replied, "Very Well." . . . The same evening a number of footmen came up from the direction of Mill Port [sic] laden with property which I was informed consisted of beds, clocks, and other household furniture. . . . During the same time, a company called the Fur Company were sent out to bring in fat hogs and cattle, calling the hogs, bears, and the cattle, buffaloes. . . . They have among them a company consisting of all that are considered true Mormons, called the Danites, who have taken an oath to support the heads of the church in all things that they say or do, whether right or wrong; many, however, of this band, are much dissatisfied with this oath as being against moral and religious principles. On Saturday last, I am informed by the Mormons that they had a meeting in Far West, at which they appointed a company of twelve, by the name of the Destruction Company, for the purpose of burning and destroying; and that if the people of Buncombe came to do mischief upon the people of Caldwell and committed depredations upon the Mormons, they were to burn Buncombe; and if the people of Clay and Ray made any movements against them, this destroying company were to burn Liber[t]y and Richmond. This burning was to be done secretly, . . . At the same meeting, I was informed, they passed a decree that no Mormon dissenter should leave Caldwell county alive; and that such as attempted to do it, should be shot down and sent to tell their tale in eternity. In a conversation between Dr. Avard and other Mormons, said Avard proposed to start a pestilence among the Gentiles, as he called them, by poisoning their corn, fruit, &c., and saying it was the work of the Lord; and said Avard advocated lying for the support of their religion, and said it was no harm to lie for the Lord. The plan of said Smith, the Prophet, is to take this State, and he professes to his people to intend taking the United States and ultimately the whole world. This is the belief of the Church, and my own opinion of the Prophet's plans and intentions. . . . I have heard the prophet say that he should yet tread down his enemies and walk over their dead bodies; that if he was not let alone, he would be a second Mahomet to this generation, and that he would make it one gore of blood from the Rocky Mountains to the Atlantic Ocean; that like Mahomet, whose motto, in treating for peace, was "The Alcoran or the Sword," so should it eventually be with us, "Joseph Smith or the sword." These last statements were made during the last summer. The number of armed men at Adam-ondi-Ahman was between three and four hundred.

AFFIDAVIT OF ORSON HYDE

The most of the statements in the foregoing disclosure of Thomas B. March [sic] I know to be true; the remainder I believe to be true.

ORSON HYDE

Richmond, October 24, 1838.

Sworn to and subscribed before me on the day above written. HENRY JACOBS, J.P.

(Correspondence, Orders, etc., Missouri, 1841, pp. 57-59, as quoted in A History of the Latter-day Saints in Northern Missouri From 1836 to 1839, pp. 412-414)

After the Mormons had surrendered, General Wilson wrote a letter in which he stated:

It would astonish you to see the immense piles of stolen property which has been brought in, and deposited by the Mormons, consisting of almost everything to be found at a farm house, and much remaining yet concealed. Large quantities have been found in and near town. (Correspondence, Orders, etc., Missouri, 1841, as quoted in A History of the Latter-day Saints in Northern Missouri From 1836 to 1839, p. 499)

Even John Whitmer, one of the witnesses to the Book of Mormon, told of the criminal acts of the Mormons:

After they had driven us and our families, they commenced a difficulty in Daviess County, adjoining this county, in which they began to rob and burn houses, etc. etc., took honey which they, (the Mormons) called sweet oil, and hogs which they called bear, and cattle which they called buffalo. Thus they would justify themselves by saying, "We are the people of God, and all things are God's; therefore, they are ours." The old inhabitants were not slack in paying them in their own coin. Thus war and bloodshed commenced and the result was the Church was driven from this land, the pure in heart and innocent, as well as the more wicked, save a few dissenters who were left here to fulfill some of the former commandments. (John Whitmer's History, p. 22)

Although the testimony of non-Mormons and those who later apostatized from the church shows that the Mormons were guilty of many crimes in Missouri, some of the statements made by faithful members of the church are absolutely devastating. Benjamin F. Johnson, for instance, made this statement:

. . . I started upon a two-year-old colt which by some circumstance I had got astride of, and fell into rank with a company of near twenty mounted men, with Cornelius P. Lot as our Captain. I soon learned our destination was to Taylor's on Grand River, about nine miles above, where it was said arms and ammunition were held for the use of the mob. . . . There were two men with a number of women and children, and all affirmed that there was nothing of the kind there. After a thorough search of houses, barns, etc., our captain ordered a search in the cornfields to hunt the cornshocks, which soon resulted in the discovery of arms and ammunition and of their falsehoods. The females hastily took from the houses what they could carry, and here I might say there was almost a trial of my faith in my pity for our enemies, even those who were plotting our destruction. Among the women was one, young married and apparently near her confinement, and another with small children and not a wagon, and many miles away from any of their friends, and snow had begun already (in November) to fall. My sympathies were drawn toward the women and children, but I would in no degree let them deter me from duty. So while others were pillaging for something to carry away, I was doing my best to protect, as far as possible, the lives and comfort of the families who were dependent on getting away upon horseback. . . . While others were doing the burning and plunder, my mission was of mercy so far as duty would permit. But of course I made enemies at home, and became more known by those who were our avowed enemies. Before noon we had set all on fire and left upon a circuitous route towards home. (My Life's Review, Independence, Mo., 1947, pp. 38-39)

Oliver Boardman Huntington, another faithful member of the Mormon Church, recorded the following in his journal:

Open hostilities had previously commenced on both sides, by the mobs burning one or two houses, and committing several outbreaks upon the brethren in the country around. . . . it was my natural turn to glory in excitement, . . . every day, almost, brought fresh news of some new outrage and outbreak, on one side; and the next would be a signal revenge or victory on the other; yet my desires were not satisfied, for I wished and desired to be in the midst of the scene; and often in vain spent tears, implored my father to let me go with the scouting parties. . . . At the time that Galeton was to be burned, I pleaded with father to let me go; but to no effect. On the appointed day I went to the top of the hill; a little above the well known pile of burnt stones, . . . even an altar that Adam built, . . . I say I stood there and cast my eyes in the direction of Galeton, as near as I could judge, and saw the smoke rising towards Heaven, which filled me with ambition, the love of excitement, tumult and something new.

In tears I looked far over the trees and wished and sighed and wished again that I was there, . . . I stood along on the Prairie and cried. The next day I went to Bishop Knights and saw the plunder, and O what lots, I thought; and heard them tell, in what order they took the place, marching up on the run, and one man who was in such a fright to save his life, that he ran from the store to his horse, and on his way, pulled out his knife, and in stead of untying his horse, cut the reins, mounted and dashed into the woods out of sight in almost the twinkling of an eye. The store they burned, but the goods were preserved. (“Oliver Boardman Huntington Journal,” pp. 31-32, typed copy, Utah State Historical Society)

On page 34 of the same journal, Mr. Huntington tells what the Mormons did with the plunder before they surrendered:

The day on which they [the Missouri Militia] arrived, by the request of some of our leading men, they camped out of the city and on the other side of the river, to stay until the next day; and none to disturb us until they came over to receive our arms. As there had been a great many things plundered by us which were then in our houses we thought it good to get one night to get it all out of our houses to a general place of deposit. Therefore nearly all the brethren were employed in taking all plundered property to a general plunder depot; that they should not know who had this mans or that mans, and thereby perhaps save some lives. This employment lasted until daylight. . . . At the appointed hour the brethren were at Lyman Wights new block building, not finished, where also all the plundered property was stowed, . . .

In a letter to his father, dated October 29, 1838, Albert P. Rockwood wrote the following:

. . . the companies are called Dan because [the] Prophet Daniel has said the Saints shall take the Kingdom & possess it for ever. . . . the Missouri mob have all left Davis Co. the fear of God rests down upon them and they flee when no man persueth. the Brethren are fast returning from the northern Campaign with hearts full of gratitude, not a drop of blood has been spilt, the Mob disperse by hundreds on the approach of the Danites, . . . Thursday 25 . . . 70 horsemen started for the encampment of the mob...the mob was secreted behind the bank of the River 4 of the Brethren were wounded. David Patten was one of them. a Rush was now made by the Brethren on the mob secreted, when a terrible but short conflict ensued in less than 2 minutes the mob was seen making their escape up the opposite bank, . . . leaving about 70 Horses with saddle Bridles some arms Blankets Tents waggons &c. which were taken as the spoil of our enemies. . . . Now Father come to Zion & fight for the Religion of Jesus, many a Hoary head is seen with their armour about them bold to defend their Masters cause. You may ask if the Prophet goes out with the Saints to Battle? I answer he is a Prophet to go before the people as in times of old & if you wish to know what sword he carries, just turn to the book of Mormon & see the sword that Nephi took from Laban when he slew him you there will see what he has got. Is not this marvelous? Well when you come [to] Zion you will learn many marvelous things which will strengthen you in the faith & which are for the edification of the Saints. Bro. Joseph has unsheathed his sword & in the name of Jesus declares that it shall not be sheathed again until he can go into any country or state in safety & peace . . . (“Albert P. Rockwood Paers,” letter dated October 29, 1838, Coe Collection, Yale University Library)

Joseph Surrenders

Ebenezer Robinson gives us this information:

In the afternoon of the 30th of October, 1838, a large body of armed men were seen approaching Far West, whom we supposed were mobbers coming to attack the city, as at that time we did not know of the Governor’s order calling out the Militia, . . . President Joseph Smith, Jr., delivered an address, . . . in which he made this declaration that if the mob persisted in coming upon us, “We will play h—l with their apple cart.” (The Return, vol. 2, no. 1, Jan. 1890, typed copy)

John Taylor, the third President of the Mormon Church, made this statement about the trouble at Far West:

. . . there were not more than about 200 of us in the place. We had one fellow who was taken with a fit of trembling in the knees, and he ordered our people to retreat. As soon as Joseph heard this sound, he exclaimed, “Retreat! where in the name of God shall we retreat to?” He then led us out to the prairie facing the mob and placed us in position; and the first thing we knew a flag of truce was seen coming towards us. The person bearing it said that some of their friends were among our people for whose safety they felt anxious. . . . Joseph Smith, our leader, then sent word back by this messenger, said he, “Tell your General to withdraw his troops or I will send them to hell.” I thought that was a pretty bold stand to take, as we only numbered about 200 to their 3,500; but they thought we were more numerous than we really were, . . . (Journal of Discourses, vol. 23, p. 37)

Joseph Smith’s bold attitude was undoubtedly outward show, for John Corrill related the following:

Smith appeared to be much alarmed, and told me to beg like a dog for peace, and afterwards said he had rather go to States-prison for twenty years, or had rather die himself than have the people exterminated. (A Brief History of the Church of Christ of Latter Day Saints, 1839, p. 41)

At any rate, Joseph Smith surrendered and was almost shot by the militia. As it ended up, however, he was turned “over to the civil authorities for trial” (History of the Church, vol. 3, p. 209). The Mormon historian B. H. Roberts wrote:

Finding that he was debarred from proceeding by court-marshal, General Clark turned over his first group of prisoners together with the second group, numbering fifty-six, to be examined in a court “of inquiry” at Richmond before Judge Austin A. King. The prisoners were accused of “treason, murder, arson, burglary, robbery, larceny and perjury.” (Comprehensive History of the Church, vol. 1, pp. 498-499)

The “court of inquiry” began on November 12, 1838. Harold Schindler states: “All testimony heard in Judge King’s court can be found in Correspondence, Orders, etc., pp. 97-151. . . . This also was published as Senate Document No. 189, 26th Congress, 2nd Session, 1841” (Orrin Porter Rockwell; Man of God, Son of Thunder, 1966, p. 63). Juanita Brooks gives this information:

October 31, 1838, really marked the end of the Danite Band. All were ordered to bring whatever loot they had taken to a central place where it could not be identified with any specific person. Joseph Smith and several of the leaders surrendered and were confined in Liberty Jail, and those who had participated in the Battle of Crooked River fled into the unsettled stretches of Iowa to the north. . . .

In the minds of the Missourians, the twenty-eight men who fled north were the Danites, and their absence removed the stigma from other members. Some of the Danite leaders had turned state’s evidence; others had scattered. Charles C. Rich and Hosea Stout were among those who fled, and for three months were absent from their wives. (On The Mormon Frontier, The Diary Of Hosea Stout, vol. 1, Introduction, pp. xv-xvi)

Sampson Avard, the leader of the Danite Band, was one of those who turned state’s evidence. In his testimony he stated:

Sampson Avard, a witness produced, sworn, and examined on behalf of the State, deposes and saith: That about four months since, a band, called the Daughters of Zion, (since called the Danite band,) was formed of the members of the Mormon church, the original object of which was to drive from the county of Caldwell all those who dissented from the Mormon church; . . . I consider Joseph Smith, jr., as the prime mover and organizer of this Danite band. The officers of the band, according to their grades, were brought before him, at a school-house, together with Hiram Smith and Sidney Rigdon: the three composing the first presidency of the whole church. Joseph Smith, jr., blessed them, and prophesied over them: declaring that they should be the means, in the hands of God of bringing forth the millennial kingdom. It was stated by Joseph Smith, jr., that it was necessary this band be bound together by a covenant, that those who revealed the secrets of the society should be put to death. The covenant taken by all the Danite band was as follows, to wit: They declared, holding up their right hands, "In the name of Jesus Christ, the Son of God, I do solemnly obligate myself ever to conceal, and never to reveal, the secret purposes of this society called the Daughters of Zion. Should I ever do the same, I hold my life as the forfeit." The prophet Joseph Smith, jr., together with his two counsellors, (Hiram Smith and Sidney Rigdon,) were considered as the supreme head of the church; and the Danite band feel themselves as much bound to obey them, as to obey the Supreme God. Instruction was given by Joseph Smith, jr., that if any of them should get into a difficulty, the rest should help him out; and that they should stand by each other, right or wrong. This instruction was given at a Danite meeting, in a public address . . . Lyman Wight observed, that, before the winter was over, he thought we would be in St. Louis, and take it. Smith charged them that they should be united in supporting each other. Smith said, on some occasions, that one should chase a thousand, and two put ten thousand to flight; that he considered the United States rotten. He compared the Mormon church to the little stone spoken of by the Prophet Daniel; and the dissenters first, and the State next, was part of the image that should be destroyed by this little stone. . . . Captain Patten (who was called by the prophet Captain Fearnought) . . . led the troops to Gallatin, . . . He made a rush into Gallatin, dispersed the few men there, and took the goods out of Stolling's store, and carried them to Diahmon, and I afterwards saw the storehouse on fire. When we returned to Diahmon, the goods were deposited in the Lord's storehouse, under the care of Bishop Vincent Knight. Orders were strictly given that all the goods should be deposited in the Lord's storehouse. . . . On the day Patten went to Gallatin, Colonel Wight went to Millport, as I understood. I saw a great many cattle, beds, furniture, &c., brought into our camp by the Mormons. . . . Some months ago I received orders to destroy the paper concerning the Danite Society; which order was issued by the first presidency, and which paper, being the constitution for the government of the Danite Society, was in my custody, but which I did not destroy. It is now in General Clark's possession. . . . This paper was taken into President Rigdon's house, and read to the prophet and his councillors, and was unanimously adopted by them as their rule and guide in [the] future. After it was thus adopted, I was instructed by the council to destroy it, as, if it should be discovered, it would be considered treasonable. . . . Smith, after erecting his bulwarks, (the night after General Lucas arrived,) asked me if I did not think him pretty much of a general; and I answered in the affirmative. We were advised, all the time, to fight valiantly, and that the angels of the Lord would appear in our defence and fight our battles. (Senate Document 189, 26th Congress, 2d Session, pp. 1-6, 9)

On page 21 of the same document, Sampson Avard stated:

I was continually in the society of the presidency, receiving instructions from them as to the teachings of the Danite band; and I continually informed them of my teachings; and they were apprised of my course and teachings in the Danite society. (Senate Document 189, p. 21)

John Corroll, who had been a very prominent Mormon, also testified for the State. The following is taken from his testimony:

President Rigdon last summer preached a sermon, commonly called the Salt sermon, which seemed to have for its object to produce a feeling among the people to get rid of the dissenters, for crimes alleged, and because they disagreed with them. . . . I was afterwards invited to one of these meetings, where an oath, in substance the same as testified to by Dr. Avard, was administered. . . . I took exceptions only to the teaching as to the duties of that society, wherein it was said, if one brother got into any kind of a difficulty, it was the duty of the rest to help him out, right or wrong. At the second, or at least the last meeting I attended, the presidency, (to wit: Joseph Smith, jr., Hiram Smith, and Sidney Rigdon,) and also George W. Robertson, was there. There was at this meeting a ceremony of introducing the officers of the society to the presidency, who pronounced blessings on each of them, as introduced, exhorting to faithfulness in their calling, and they should have blessings. After this, President Smith got up . . . he observed to the people that they should obey the presidency, and, if the presidency led them astray, they might destroy them. In the last, or in some public meeting, Joseph Smith, jr. said: if the people would let us alone, we would preach the gospel to them in peace; but, if they came on us to molest us, we would establish our religion by the sword; and that he would become to this generation a second Mahomet.

About April last, I heard Joseph Smith, jr. and President Rigdon (who appeared to be vexed, on account of troubles and lawsuits they had had) say that they would suffer vexatious lawsuits no longer, and that they would resist even an officer in the discharge of his duty . . . On Monday, Joseph Smith, jr. made a speech; and some resolutions were passed, purporting that those persons who would not engage in their undertaking, their property should be consecrated [confiscated] to the use of those who did engage in their undertaking. On Sunday, Joseph Smith, jr., in his discourse, spoke of persons taking, at some times, what, at other times, would be wrong to take; and gave as an example the case of David eating the shew-bread, and also of the Saviour and his Apostles plucking the ears of corn and eating, as they passed through the cornfield. . . . It was my understanding that Dr. Avard's teaching in the Danite society proceeded from the presidency. (Ibid., pp. 12-14)

John Cleminson was another witness called in behalf of the State. The following is taken from his testimony:

John Cleminson, . . . sworn, . . . deposes and saith: Some time in June, I attended two or three Danite meetings; and it was taught there, as a part of the duty of the band, that they should support the presidency in all their designs, right or wrong; that whatever they said was to be obeyed, and whoever opposed the presidency in what they said, or desired done, should be expelled from the county, or have their lives taken. The three composing the presidency was at one of those meetings; and to satisfy the people, Dr. Avard called on Joseph Smith, jr., who gave them a pledge, that if they led them into a difficulty he would give them his head for a foot-ball, and that it was the will of God these things should be so. The teacher and active agent of the society was Dr. Avard, and his teachings were approved of by the presidency. Dr. Avard further taught as a part of their obligation, that if any one betrayed the secret designs of the society, they should be killed and laid aside, and nothing said about it. . . . When process was filed against Joseph Smith and others, in my office as clerk of Caldwell circuit court, for trespass, Joseph Smith, jr., told me not to issue that writ; that he did not intend to submit to it; . . . I felt myself intimidated and in danger, if I issued it, knowing the regulation of the Danite band. . . .

When we first went to Daviess, I understood the object to be to drive out the mob, if one should be collected there; but when we got there, we found none. I then learned the object was, from those who were actively engaged in the matter, to drive out all the citizens of Daviess and get possession of their property. . . . It was frequently observed among the troops, that the time had come when the riches of the Gentiles should be consecrated to the Saints. (Senate Document 189, pp. 15-16)

In the testimony of George M. Hinkle we find the following:

There was much mysterious conversation in camps, as to plundering, and house-burning; so much so, that I had my own notions about it; and, on one occasion, I spoke to Mr. Smith, jr., in the house, and told him that this course of burning houses and plundering, by the Mormon troops, would ruin us; that it could not be kept hid, and would bring the force of the State upon us; that houses would be searched, and stolen property found. Smith replied to me, in a pretty rough manner to keep still; that I should say nothing about it; that it would discourage the men; and he would not suffer me to say any thing about it. . . .

I saw a great deal of plunder and bee-steeds brought into camp; and I saw many persons, for many days, taking the honey out of them; I understood this property and plunder were placed into the hands of the bishop at Diahmon. . . .

The general teachings of the presidency were, that the kingdom they were setting up was a temporal kingdom; . . . Until lately, the teachings of the church appeared to be peaceable, . . . but lately a different idea has been advanced—that the time had come when this kingdom was to be set up by forcible means, if necessary. It was taught, that the time had come when the riches of the Gentiles were to be consecrated to the true Israel. This thing of taking property was considered a fulfillment of the above prophecy . . . Joseph Smith, jr. made a speech to the troops who were called together, in which he said: That the troops which were gathering through the country were a damned mob; that he had tried to please them long enough; that we had tried to keep the law long enough; but, as to keeping the law of Missouri any longer, he did not intend to try to do so. That the whole State was a mob set; and that, if they came to fight him, he would play hell with their apple-carts. . . . While the last expedition was in progress in Daviess county, a portion of the troops returned to Far West, . . . Rigdon . . . held in his hand a letter from Joseph Smith, jr., in Daviess county, in which, he said, there was a profound secret, and the boys who were present were sent away. The letter, as near as I recollect it, was as follows: That our enemies were now delivered into our hands, and that we should have victory over them in every instance. The letter stated that, in the name of Jesus Christ, he knew this by the spirit of prophecy. . . . (Senate Document 189, pp. 21-25)

In Burr Riggs' testimony the following appears:

Burr Riggs, a witness for the State, produced, sworn, and examined, deposed and saith: In the latter part of June last, immediately after the witness and Cowdery left Far West, I fell into company with Joseph Smith, jr., and Geo. W. Robinson. Jos. Smith, jr., said there were certain men using their influence against the proceedings of the presidency, and if they were suffered to go on they would do great injury. And Smith told Robinson, the first man he heard speaking against the presidency, and against their proceedings, he must tie him up and give him thirty-nine lashes; and if that would not do, give him thirty nine more, until he was sorry for what he had said; and Robinson said he would do it. . . . Two or three days before the surrender of the Mormons to the militia at Far West, I heard Jos. Smith, jr. say that the sword was now unsheathed, and should not again be sheathed until he could go through these United States, and live in any county he pleased, peaceably. . . . there was a meeting in Far West, in which Mr. Sidney Rigdon presided. There were present about 60 or 100 men; . . . Mr. Rigdon said that the last man had run away from Far West that was going to; that the next man who started, he should be pursued and brought back, dead or alive. This was put to vote, and agreed to, without any one objecting to it. He further said, that one man had slipped his wind yesterday, and had been thrown aside into the brush for the buzzards to pick, and the first man who lisped it should die. (Senate Document 189, p. 30)

In his testimony, Jesse Kelly claimed that a Mormon captain stated that they were going to take the entire State:

The captain asked us if we belonged to the mob, and we replied not; . . . the captain then said, if we did not wish to fight them, we must leave the State; for we intend said he, after we get possession of Daviess, to take Livingston; and after that, keep on, till we take possession of the whole state. (Senate Document 189, p. 31)

Addison Price made a similar statement in his testimony: "It was said by several of the company, that, as soon as they had rid Daviess county, they would have Livingston, and, before they stopped, they intended to have the State" (Senate Document 189, p. 32).

John Whitmer, one of the witnesses to the Book of Mormon, gave this testimony in behalf of the State:

John Whitmer [Whitmer], a witness for the State, produced, sworn, and examined, deposed and saith: About the 17th of April last, . . . Joseph Smith, jr., spoke in reference to difficulties they had, and their persecutions, &c., in and out of the church. Mr. Smith said he did not intend in future to have any process served on him, and the officer who attempted it should die; that any person who spoke or acted against the presidency of the church, should leave the country or die; that he would suffer no such to remain there; that they should lose their head. George W. Harris, . . . observed, "the head of their influence, I suppose." Mr. Smith replied, Yes, he would so modify it. Mr. Rigdon . . . in speaking of the head of their influence, he said that he meant that ball on their shoulders, called the head, and that they should be followed to the ends of the earth. Mr. Rigdon further remarked, that he would suffer no process of law to be served on him hereafter.

Some time in June, after Mr. Rigdon had preached his "salt sermon," I held conversation with several Mormons on the subject of that sermon, . . . I also conversed with George W. Robinson, . . . I told him I thought it was contrary to the laws of the land to drive men from their homes; to which he replied, such things had been done of old, and that the gatherings of the saints must continue, and that dissenters could not live among them in peace.

I also conversed with Mr. J. Smith, jr., on this subject. I told him I wished to allay the (then) excitement, as far as I could do it. He said the excitement was very high, and he did not know what would allay it; but remarked, he would give me his opinion, which was, that if I would put my property into the hands of the bishop and high council, to be disposed of according to the laws of the church, he thought that would allay it, and that the church after a while might have confidence in me. I replied to him, I wished to control my own property. In telling Mr. Smith that I wished to be governed by the laws of the land, he answered, "Now, you wish to pin me down to the law." And further, this deponent saith not. (Senate Document 189, pp. 32-33)

William W. Phelps, a very prominent Mormon, also gave testimony for the State. In his testimony he made these statements:

William W. Phelps, a witness on the part of the State, produced, sworn, . . . and saith: That, as early as April last, at a meeting in Far West . . . Mr. Rigdon arose, and made an address to them, in which he spoke of having borne persecutions, and law-suits, and other privations, and did not intend to bear them any longer; that they meant to resist the law, and, if a sheriff came after them with writs, they would kill him; and, if any body opposed them, they would take off their heads. . . . In the fore part of July, I being one of the justices of the county court, was forbid by Joseph Smith, jr., from issuing any process against him. . . . A few days before the 4th day of July last, I heard D. W. Patten (known by the fictitious name of Captain Fearnought) say that Rigdon was writing a declaration, to declare the church independent, I remarked to him,

I thought such a thing treasonable—to set up a government within a Government. He answered, it would not be treasonable if they would maintain it, or fight till they died. . . . I was at the meeting the Monday before the last expedition to Daviess, . . . Joseph Smith, jr., I think it was, who addressed the meeting, and said, in substance, that they were then about to go to war in Daviess county; that those persons who had not turned out, their property should be taken to maintain the war. . . . Joseph Smith, jr., . . . said it was necessary to have something to live on; and, when they went out to war, it was necessary to take spoils to live on. . . . I went on to Diahmon a few days after the Mormon troops had gone out. I went on to the tavern, late at night, where I found Joseph Smith, jr., Hiram Smith, and others. . . . Wight asked J. Smith, twice, if he had come to the point now to resist the law; that he wanted this matter now distinctly understood. . . . Smith replied, the time had come when he should resist all law. . . . I heard J. Smith remark, there was a store at Gallatin, and a grocery at Millport; and in the morning after the conversation between Smith and Wight about resisting the law, a plan of operations was agreed on, which was: that Captain Fearnought, who was present, should take a company of 100 men, or more, and go to Gallatin, and take it that day; to take the goods out of the store in Gallatin, bring them to Diahmon, and burn the store. . . . I saw Lyman Wight parade a horse company, and start off with it towards Millport. I also [saw] a foot company the same day go off.

On the same day, in the evening, I saw both these companies return; the foot company had some plunder, . . . I was invited to a school-house, . . . A guard was placed around the house, and one at the door.

Mr. Rigdon then commenced making covenants, with uplifted hands. The first was, that, if any man attempted to move out of the county, or pack their things for that purpose, that any man then in the house, seeing this, without saying any thing to any other person, should kill him, and haul him aside into the brush; and that all the burial he should have should be in a turkey buzzard's guts, so that nothing of him should be left but his bones. That measure was carried in form of a covenant, with uplifted hands. After the vote had passed, he said, Now see if any one dare vote against it, and called for the negative vote; and there was none. The next covenant, that, if any persons from the surrounding country came into their town, walking about—no odds who he might be—any one of that meeting should kill him, and throw him aside into the brush. This passed in a manner as the above had passed. The third covenant was, “conceal all these things.” Mr. Rigdon then observed that the kingdom of heaven had no secrets; that yesterday a man had slipped his wind, and was dragged into the hazel brush; and, said he, “the man who lisps it shall die.” (Senate Document 189, pp. 43-46)

After the inquiry some of the Mormons were released. Joseph Smith, however, was not released. The Mormon historian B. H. Roberts states:

Joseph Smith, Lyman Wight, Caleb Baldwin, Hyrum Smith, Alexander McRae, and Sidney Rigdon were held for treason against the state, murder, burglary, arson, robbery and larceny; and were committed to prison without bail in Liberty, Clay county, . . . (A Comprehensive History of the Church, vol. 1, p. 500)

The Mormon writer Klaus J. Hansen claims that Judge Austin A. King conducted the inquiry in a “very biased manner,” yet he admits that the evidence cannot be entirely discounted:

. . . the testimony given at the trial was offered by enemies of the Mormons or personal enemies of Smith, including a number of apostates. But, although such testimony has to be viewed with considerable caution, it cannot be discounted entirely, especially in view of Smith's subsequent endeavors in behalf of the political kingdom of God. The evidence of the apostates, in fact, reveals how far Smith had attempted to go in establishing that kingdom. (Quest for Empire, p. 152)

Joseph Smith made “at least two attempts to escape” from the authorities in Missouri. Finally, after spending some time in the Liberty Jail, Joseph Smith did escape.

John Whitmer stated:

Smith and those others were tried by those officers for treason, etc., but found that they were not legally authorized to execute them after having found them guilty of many breaches of the law of the land, they put them in the hand of civil officers of the government, to be tried by the law of the land, and were committed to jail; but before the trial came on, which was named to some of the counties of this state, where the people were not so much prejudiced against them, as they were moved from Clay County to the county where they were to be tried, they hired the guard to let them go, . . . money hired those base and corrupt men, who let them go; and this through the wickedness of those to whom their safe-keeping were committed, these men escaped the justice of the law of the land which they had transgressed, and went unpunished at this time. (John Whitmer's History, p. 22)

Harold Schindler makes this statement concerning the escape:

While many Missourians still pressured to have the Mormons hanged, several officials in high places, perhaps Boggs himself, had come to the realization that an “escape” would be convenient to all concerned, since the fugitives certainly would leave the state at the first opportunity, and it was unlikely they would return with a grand jury indictment hanging over their heads. Accordingly, Sheriff Morgan and his guards conveniently became intoxicated during the ride to Boone County. Late that night the five prisoners galloped across the border into Illinois. (Orrin Porter Rockwell, by Harold Schindler, 1966, p. 65)

Trouble in Illinois

After the Mormons were driven from Missouri, they gathered in Illinois and built the city of Nauvoo. Within a few years, however, the Mormons found themselves in serious trouble with the people in Illinois. In 1844 Joseph Smith and his brother Hyrum were assassinated by a mob, and in 1846 the Mormons were driven from Illinois.

While we cannot endorse the methods used by the people of Illinois in driving the Mormons out, there is another side to the story which the Mormon leaders do not tell their people.

John D. Lee claimed that some enemies of the church were killed in Nauvoo by orders from the church leaders:

I knew of many men being killed in Nauvoo by the Danites. It was then the rule that all the enemies of Joseph Smith should be killed, and I know of many a man who was quietly put out of the way by the orders of Joseph and his apostles while the Church was there.

It has always been a well understood doctrine of the Church that it was right and praiseworthy to kill every person who spoke evil of the Prophet. This doctrine had been strictly lived up to in Utah, until the Gentiles arrived in such great numbers that it became unsafe to follow the practice, but the doctrine is still believed, and no year passes without one or more of those who have spoken evil of Brigham Young being killed, in a secret manner.

Springfield, Utah, was one of the hot-beds of fanaticism, and I expect that more men were killed there, in proportion to population, than in any other part of Utah. In that settlement it was certain death to say a word against the authorities, high or low. (Confessions of John D. Lee, photo-reprint of 1880 ed., p. 284)

According to John D. Lee, the police in Nauvoo were very similar to the Danite organization:

Whatever the police were ordered to do, they were to do and ask no questions. Whether it was right or wrong mattered not to them, they were responsible only to their leaders, and they were amenable only to God. I was a confidant among them, and they let me into the secret of all they did, and they looked to me to speak a good word for them with Brigham, as they were ambitious to please him and obtain his blessing. I knew that I was in their full confidence, and the captain of the police never asked me to do anything he knew I was averse to doing. Under Brigham Young, Hosea Stout was Chief of Police. They showed me where they buried a man in a lot near the Masonic Hall. They said they got him tight and were joking with him while some men were digging his grave. They asked him to go with them into a pit of corn, saying it was fully grown. They told him they had a jug of whiskey cached out there. They led him to his grave, and told him to get down there, and hand up the jug, and he should have the first drink. As he bent over to get down, Rosswell Stevens struck him with his police cane on the back of the head and dropped him. They then tightened a cord around his neck to shut off his wind, and then they covered him up, and set the hill of corn back on his grave to cover up any tracks that might lead to his discovery.

Another man they took in a boat, about two o'clock at night, for a ride. When out in the channel of the river, the man who sat behind him struck him upon the head and stunned him. They then tied a rope around his neck and a stone to the other end of the rope, and sent him to the bottom of Mississippi River. There was another man whose name I have forgotten, who was a great annoyance to the Saints at Nauvoo. He generally brought a party with him when he came to the city, and could threaten them with the law, but he always managed to get away safely. They (the Saints) finally concluded to entrust his case to Howard Egan, a policeman, who was thought to be pretty long headed. He took a party of chosen men, or "destroying angels," and went to La Harp, a town near the residence of this man, and watched an opportunity when he would pass along. They "saved" him, and buried him in a wash-out at night. In a short time afterwards a thunder storm washed the earth away and exposed the remains. (Confessions of John D. Lee, p. 159)

Notice that John D. Lee stated that the Mormon police committed murders for the church and that "Under Brigham Young, Hosea Stout was Chief of Police." The Mormon paper, Deseret Weekly, contained this statement concerning Hosea Stout:

He . . . was intimately associated with the Prophet Joseph Smith for a number of years, prior to his death, and for some time acted as his body guard, as well as being an officer of the Nauvoo Legion and chief of police. (Deseret Weekly, March 9, 1889, as quoted in On the Mormon Frontier, The Diary of Hosea Stout, vol. 2, p. 740)

Fortunately, Hosea Stout's diary has survived, and it is certainly one of the most revealing documents that we have ever encountered. The fact that it was written by a faithful Mormon makes it even more significant. In his diary Hosea Stout frankly tells of some of the violent methods used by the Mormon leaders. For instance, under the date of April 3, 1845, Hosea Stout recorded the following in his diary:

In the morning I went to the Temple and was roughly accosted by Brs Cahoon & Cutler about a circumstance which took place last night at the Temple. They said that the Old Police had beat a man almost to death in the Temple. To which I replied I was glad of it and that I had given orders to that effect in case anyone should be found in the Temple after night and they had only done as they were told, or ordered. . . . we concluded to lay the matter before President Brigham Young and get his advice, as we went we met Brother H. C. Kimball and while relating the matter to him Brother Brigham came to us and we related the matter to him and he approved of the proceedings of the Police and said he wanted us to still guard the Temple to regulate the matters there which was done to our satisfaction and justification. (On The Mormon Frontier, The Diary of Hosea Stout, vol. 1, p. 32)

Under the date of January 9, 1846, Hosea Stout recorded:

When we came to the Temple some what a considerable number of the guard were assembled and among them was William Hibbard son of the old man Hibbard. He was evidently come as a spy. When I saw him I told Scott that we must "bounce a stone off of his head." to which he agreed we prepared accordingly & I got an opportunity & hit him on the back of his head which came very near taking his life. But few knew anything about what was the matter he left the ground out of his senses when he came to himself he could not tell what had happened to him &c. (On the Mormon Frontier, The Diary of Hosea Stout, vol. 1, p. 103)

Other entries in Hosea Stout's diary show that he was a very brutal man (see The Mormon Kingdom, vol. 2, p. 7).

The people of Illinois were well aware of the fact that the Mormon leaders used violent methods in dealing with their enemies. In the Warsaw Signal for January 7, 1846, we find the following reprinted from the Springfield Journal:

Some other disclosures are talked of as having been made: the manner in which persons are disposed of, who are supposed to be enemies of the leading Mormons. They are seized by some members of the Danite or other band, a leather strap placed around the neck, so that if the least resistance is made, they are choked; and in this condition they are taken to a skiff, carried to the middle of the river, their bowels ripped open, and their bodies sunk. This is what is termed making "catfish bait" of their enemies. It is said that quite a number of persons were disposed of in this manner. (Warsaw Signal, January 7, 1846)

We have already shown that Joseph Smith formed a secret "Council of Fifty" in Nauvoo. The Mormon writer Klaus J. Hansen states that several Danites were initiated into the "Council of 50":

Proven loyalty in one secret organization could be advantageous to another. As a result, several important Danites were among those initiated into the Council of Fifty in 1844. . . . Rumors circulating in Nauvoo during 1844 that Smith had revived the Danite band cannot be substantiated and are most likely a result of the suspected purposes and activities attributed to the Council of Fifty by the uninitiated. (Quest for Empire, p. 58)

Mr. Hansen admits that the "Council of Fifty" may have been involved in the practice of "blood atonement":

The law of blood atonement was still another law revealed from heaven which was difficult to enforce even in the kingdom of God. If, according to this doctrine, a member of the kingdom committed the crimes of murder and adultery, or if he betrayed one of his fellow Mormons to the enemies of the church, or revealed the secrets of the kingdom, he could save his soul only if he expiated for the crime by the shedding of his blood. Blood atonement was, of course, a form of capital punishment. Yet because of its theological implications, and because the Council of Fifty was to administer it, the doctrine was surrounded with an aura of mystery, terror, and holy murder. The Council of Fifty heightened the atmosphere of fear and secrecy associated with this practice by conducting cases involving the possibility of blood atonement in utmost secrecy for fear of public repercussions. (Quest for Empire, p. 69)

Juanita Brooks gives us this information concerning a man who was almost put to death by the "Council of Fifty":

The most surprising case before the YTFIF [fifty spelled backwards] was that of Ira West, one of the first captains in the organization as they left Nauvoo. No specific charges are entered in the record . . . but it is very clear that he was no longer in good fellowship and that action against him was to be drastic. In the first appeal against him, made on March 3, it was declared:

Then can the members of this council suffer their sympathy to arise to that extent that mercy will Rob Justice of its claims, Suffering infernal thieves, Murderers, Whoremongers & every other wicked curse to live among us, adding sin to sin, crime to crime, corrupting the morals of the People when their Blood ought to flow to atone for their crimes. I want their cursed heads to be cut off that they may atone for their sins, that mercy may have her claims upon them in the day of redemption.

The case was held over until the next day, when it was clear that "The Council all agreed that he had forfeited his head, but the difficulty was how he should be disposed of." Some suggested that he should be executed publicly, others thought that he should just disappear, then the people would know he was gone, and other offenders would take warning. Still others put up a strong argument for a case in open court before a judge and jury.

Finally, Brigham Young said to the marshal, “Take Ira E. West & Thomas Byrns into custody & put them in chains, & on the day of the Election, there offer them for sale to the highest bidder.” . . .

One might assume that perhaps this man did lose his life, but the diary of Hosea Stout, at that time not a member of the Council of Fifty, tells what happened. Writing under date of Monday, March 12, 1849, he says:

Today was our first political election which commenced at 10 o’clock A.M. A large assemblage of men convened where many subjects were discussed and among the rest the subject of Ira E. West who had been tried by the H.C. & cut off from the church & fined 100 dollars for lying, stealing & swindling &c—and afterward had attempted to run away & was now in chains. He was here offered for sale to anyone who would pay his debts & take him untill he could work it out. No one however took him & for a while the prospect was fair for him to loose his head—His brother C. West took him at last, I believe.

(John D. Lee, by Juanita Brooks, pp. 143-144)

Since the records of the Council of Fifty were kept secret, there is no way of knowing how many people could have been sentenced to death by this secret organization.

Brigham Young, who led the church after Joseph Smith’s death, was very prone to use violent methods in dealing with apostates and enemies of the church. On one occasion he stated: “Now, you Gladdenites, keep your tongues still, lest sudden destruction come upon you” (Journal of Discourses, vol. 1, p. 83).

Ebenezer Robinson related that a “brother from Canada” became “very much exercised, spiritually, and fasted and prayed, . . . when one morning, just after daylight he came out of the house and . . . hallooing at the top of his voice, warning the people and the nations to repent and prepare for the things which were coming upon the earth.” According to Robinson, Joseph Smith just walked away, “but Brigham Young came with a raw-hide whip, and whipped the man back into the house” (The Return, vol. 1, p. 115).

Even Brigham Young’s dreams were filled with violence. Under the date of September 10, 1845, he related:

I dreamed last night that I was chased by a mob to a place like a barn . . . one chased me so close that he got into the same room with me and it was Thomas Ford, who appeared only two and one-half feet high, I took his wrist between my fingers and stepped to the door and knocked down one after another of the mob with him till I discovered he was dead. (History of the Church, vol. 7, p. 439)

On March 27, 1853, Brigham Young told of a dream he had in which he cut the throats of some “mobbers” and “murderers”:

I dreamed . . . I took my large bowie knife, that I used to wear as a bosom pin in Nauvoo, and cut one of their throats from ear to ear, saying “Go to hell across lots.” (Journal of Discourses, vol. 1, p. 83)

On one occasion Brigham Young stated:

I have never yet talked as rough in these mountains as I did in the United States when they killed Joseph. I there said boldly and aloud, “If ever a man should lay his hands on me and say, on account of my religion, ‘Thou art my prisoner,’ the Lord Almighty helping me, I would send that man to hell across lots.” I feel so now. (Journal of Discourses, vol. 2, p. 317)

Speaking of the trouble the Mormons had with the people of Illinois, Heber C. Kimball, a member of the First Presidency in Brigham Young’s time, stated:

I felt pretty well in Nauvoo, at the time brother Brigham was speaking of; though I did regret—perhaps I did wrong—but I did regret that peace was proclaimed so quick; for I tell you there were about one or two score of men I wanted to see under the sod; then I was willing to make peace: . . . (Journal of Discourses, vol. 5, pp. 334-335)

Brigham Young made these comments concerning this matter:

I do not know that anybody complained in Nauvoo, except brother Kimball; and he was only sorry that the war closed so soon, for we had our eyes upon a good many of those infernal scoundrels, and we wanted to sod them. (Journal of Discourses, vol. 5, p. 338)

On another occasion Brigham Young said:

I have sometimes had feelings of this kind—“Draw your swords, ye Elders of Israel, and never sheathe them so long as you have an enemy upon the earth.” I sometimes felt, before the move, like taking the sword and slaying my enemies, until they were wasted away. (Ibid., vol. 8, p. 150)

Using the Mean Devils

Edward Bonney, who became famous for his work of bringing murderers to justice in the Mississippi Valley, made these comments concerning the Mormons in Nauvoo:

While the Mormons were rapidly increasing in numbers and daily increasing their power and wealth, the country around was suffering severely from a succession of robberies almost without parallel in the annals of crime. Stock of every description and goods of all kinds were constantly taken, and all in the vicinity trembled lest they, like their neighbors, might be stripped of their all without a hope of restoration or revenge.

The offenders were frequently tracked in the direction of Nauvoo, and sometimes, though rarely, the property was recovered, but in no case could the perpetrators of the crime be arrested and brought to justice. In case of an arrest at Nauvoo the accused were immediately released by the city authorities, and the cry of “Persecution against the Saints” raised, effectually drowning the pleas for justice of the injured, and the officer forced to return and tell the tale of defeat. This done, the fugitive found a safe shelter under the widespread wings of the Mormon leaders and laughed at pursuit. (The Banditti of the Prairies, University of Oklahoma Press, 1963, pp. 15-16)

The Mormon writer John J. Stewart admits that some Mormons were stealing, but he claims that the leaders of the church did not approve of this course:

By late 1841 the reputation of the Church, and particularly the reputation of its leaders, was suffering from the thievery and lies of several Mormon converts who, like Sampson Avard in Missouri, had begun stealing from both Mormons and non-Mormons, and falsely claiming that the Church leaders condoned their actions. Joseph, Hyrum, and the Quorum of Twelve each in turn issued public statements denouncing the actions and lies of these people. (Joseph Smith, The Mormon Prophet, p. 155)

While it is true that the Mormon leaders denied the charge of stealing, we must remember that they also denied polygamy at the very time they were practicing it! Therefore, we cannot put any more stock in their denials of stealing than we can in their denials of polygamy, especially in light of the evidence we have presented.

Brigham Young, the second President of the Mormon Church, made these statements:

And if the Gentiles wish to see a few tricks, we have “Mormons” that can perform them. We have the meanest devils on the earth in our midst, and we intend to keep them, for we have use for them; and if the Devil does not look sharp, we will cheat him out of them at the last, for they will reform and go to heaven with us. (Journal of Discourses, vol. 6, p. 176)

. . . we have some of the meanest men that ever disgraced God’s footstool right in the midst of the Latter-day Saints. Do not be startled at that, because it is true. I have told the people many a time, if they want anything done, no matter how mean, they can find men here who can do it, if they are to be found on the earth. (Ibid., vol. 15, p. 226)

. . . do you say there are are [sic] people here who are wicked? So we say. Could I wish things to be otherwise? No, I would not have them different if I could. . . .

Some of the Elders seem to be tripped up in a moment, and revelation they can get from the devil, and make use of them to add sin to sin. This fact is also another proof that all hell is against this people, for there is not a person in the world, that gives way to wickedness, but what has antipathy against this people.

Now hearken, O ye Texians; do you say there are people here who are wicked? So we say. Could I wish things to be otherwise? No, I would not have them different if I could. We can produce the best men and the worst, the best women and the worst, and thus prove, according to the sayings of Jesus Christ and his Apostles, that this is the kingdom of God, or at least answers to the Savior's description of that kingdom.

Were I in Texas I would say, let me tell you that I have not embraced any man on this earth, in my faith, but I have embraced the doctrine of salvation, and it is no matter what the people do in Utah. Here is the doctrine of salvation, talk against that, prove that to be false, or find a flaw in it, if you can. As for the people, they cannot save you. Never embrace a man in your faith, for that is sectarianism.

There are many of the men and women now before me who have looked for a pure people, and have supposed that that was a proof of the truth of our doctrines, but they will never find such a people until Satan is bound, and Jesus comes to reign with his Saints. The doctrine we preach is the doctrine of salvation, and it is that which the Elders of this Church take to the world, and not the people of Utah.

Some of the Elders seem to be tripped up in a moment, if the wicked can find any fault with the members of this Church; but bless your souls, I would not yet have this people faultless, for the day of separation has not yet arrived. I have many a time, in this stand, dared the world to produce as mean devils as we can; we can beat them at anything. We have the greatest and smoothest liars in the world, the cunningest and most adroit thieves, and any other shade of character that you can mention.

We can pick out Elders in Israel right here who can beat the world at gambling, who can handle the cards, cut and shuffle them with the smartest rogue on the face of God's foot-stool. I can produce Elders here who can shave their smartest shavers, and take their money from them. We can beat the world at any game.

We can beat them, because we have men here that live in the light of the Lord, that have the Hely Priesthood, and hold the keys of the kingdom of God. But you may go through all the sectarian world, and you cannot find a man capable of opening the door of the kingdom of God to admit others in. We can do that. We can pray the best, preach the best, and sing the best. We are the best looking and finest set of people on the face of the earth, and they may begin any game they please, and we are on hand, and can beat them at anything they have a mind to begin. They may make sharp their two-edged swords, and I will turn out the Elders of Israel with greased feathers, and whip them to death. We are not to be beat. We expect to be a stumbling block to the whole world, and a rock of offence to them.

I never preached to the world but what the cry was, "That damned old Joe Smith has done thus and so." I would tell the people that they did not know him, and I did, and that I knew him to be a good man; and that when they spoke against him, they spoke against as good a man as ever lived.

I recollect a conversation I had with them bring those priests, editors, and politicians who have howled so long about us, and we will attend to their cases. But I pray that I may never witness such scenes as I have in the midst of this people. If they will let us alone, we will preach the Gospel; and if they do not, we will do it, and we will build up Zion, if all the devils in hell howl. Let us know that we have to build up Zion until the Spirit of peace shall overrule our country.

Do you ever reflect upon the matter? Look at St. Louis. More murders have been committed there in almost any few days than have been committed in this Territory since it was organized. It is customary there to have murders committed almost daily; but we, above all other people, ought never to have such a crime committed in our midst; and we never have had, so far as the Latter-day Saints are concerned.

I will now tell you something. It is a secret; and I wish you to keep it to yourselves. There have been men here who have had their plans arranged for robbing; and I will take the liberty to say that, when we find them, "judgment will be laid to the line and righteousness to the plummet." Those are my feelings, and I express them plainly, that the good and honest may be able to pass from the Eastern States to California, and back and forth, in peace. And when a "Mormon" unlawfully disturbs anybody, I say, let him be overtaken by a "Vigilance Committee." And when mobocrats come here, they will find a "Vigilance Committee." Now, listeners, send that to the States, if you wish. I want the people in the States to know that there are a few poor curses here, and also to know that we do not want a gang of highwaymen here. And I say to all such characters, if you come here and practice your iniquity, we will send you home quick, whenever we can catch and convict you. I wish such characters would let the boys have a chance to lay their hands on them.

If men come here and do not behave themselves, they will not only find the Danites, whom they talk so much about, biting the horses' heels, but the scoundrels will find something biting their heels. In my plain remarks, I merely call things by their right names. Brother Kimball is noted in the States for calling things by their right names, and you will excuse me if I do the same.

We will build up Zion and establish the kingdom of God upon the earth, and the wicked cannot help themselves. I have not built up this kingdom, neither did Joseph Smith. What the Lord told brother Joseph to do, that he did. And what the Lord tells you and me to do we will do, by the help of God. May God bless us all. Amen.

if the wicked can find fault with the members of this Church; but bless your souls, I would not yet have this people faultless, for the day of separation has not yet arrived. I have many a time, in this stand, dared the world to produce as mean devils as we can; we can beat them at anything. We have the greatest and smoothest liars in the world, the cunningest and most adroit thieves, and any other shade of character that you can mention.

We can pick out elders in Israel right here who can beat the world at gambling, who can handle the cards, cut and shuffle them with the smartest rogue on the face of God's foot-stool. I can produce elders here who can shave their smartest shavers, and take their money from them. We can beat the world at any game. . . . We are the best looking and finest set of people on the face of the earth, and they may begin any game they please, and we are on hand, and can beat them at anything they have a mind to begin. (Journal of Discourses, vol. 4, p. 77)

Bill Hickman

When Brigham Young said that “we have the meanest devils on the earth . . . and we intend to keep them, for we have use for them,” he may have had Bill Hickman in mind, for he was considered a man that would do anything that was mean. Under the date of October 28, 1871, in the Church Chronology, Bill Hickman was called a “notorious outlaw.” The Mormon historian B. H. Roberts called Hickman “a typical western desperado” (A Comprehensive History of the Church, vol. 4, p. 133).

The interesting thing concerning Bill Hickman is that toward the end of his life he wrote a book in which he stated that he had committed his crimes with the approval of the Mormon Church leaders. He claimed that he had committed murders by the orders of Brigham Young and the Apostle Orson Hyde. J. H. Beadle, who wrote the preface to Brigham's Destroying Angel, made this observation:

. . . while all the Mormon people spoke of Bill Hickman as a desperately bad man, and guilty of untold murders, I was struck by two curious and then unexplainable facts:—

1. The first was, that while everybody, from Brigham Young down, united in calling Hickman a murderer, and while evidence could easily be collected of several of his crimes, not a single attempt had been made by priest or people to bring him to justice. For twenty years the Mormons had the courts and juries exclusively in their own hands. During that time many persons had been executed for crime; they could do as they pleased in judicial matters, and abundant evidence was before them against Hickman; but no grand jury ever moved, there was no indictment, and not even a complaint before an examining magistrate. This indicated something—but what? Until I obtained Hickman's manuscript, I never fully knew. When Hickman was arrested all the Mormon speakers and papers united in denouncing him as “a notorious criminal, who had long been able to evade justice.” If this was known, as they admit it was, why was not Hickman arrested and punished during that long period in which the Mormons arrested and punished whomsoever they pleased? (Brigham's Destroying Angel, Salt Lake City, 1904, Preface)

Dr. Hugh Nibley, of the Brigham Young University, claims that the Mormon Church was not aware of Bill Hickman's crimes:

To Beadle's mind the significant thing about Hickman was that the Mormons knew he was bad, and yet did not prosecute him. Prosecute him for what? The West was full of bad and dangerous men who couldn't be prosecuted until they were caught in a crime. Hickman's early crimes were all most secret, known only to himself, until he confessed to Beadle. (Sounding Brass, p. 258)

Actually, many of Bill Hickman's crimes were publicly known. As early as December 25, 1859, the Mormon Apostle Amasa Lyman admitted that Hickman had a bad reputation:

The spirit of thieving stalks abroad in our land, . . . say some, “we hear that there is stealing done over yonder (pointing towards the west), and that it is Bill Hickman and his gang that do it.” (Journal of Discourses, vol. 7, p. 307)

The truth of the matter is that the Mormon leaders were well aware of Bill Hickman's crimes and they actually shielded him from justice. This fact is made very plain in the journal of John Bennion. The reader will remember that in 1860 Bennion felt that Hickman should be punished for his evil deeds, but he soon learned that Bishop Gardiner “had been bound & could not act” against Bill Hickman and that Orson Hyde (President of the Twelve Apostles) taught that a man should not be punished for stealing from the “gentiles”:

. . . br Hyde said speaking of stealing that a man may steal & be influenced by the spirit of the Lord to do it that Hickman had done it years past said that he never would institute a trial against a brother for stealing from the gentiles but stealing from his brethren he was down on it he laid down much teaching on the subject . . . (“John Bennion Journal,” October 13, 1860)

The reader will remember that we quoted Mary Ettie V. Smith as stating that the Apostle Orson Hyde received stolen goods at Kanesville and that Bill Hickman was involved in this stealing. There is also good reason to believe that Hickman was involved in crime in Nauvoo. The Warsaw Signal, March 26, 1845, printed a letter which contained this statement: “Wm. A. Hickman stole some bacon, was put in jail, in a few days was bailed out by two brother Mormons . . .”

The Bloomington Herald, November 22, 1845, published this statement by Edward Bonney concerning Bill Hickman:

. . . Haight left, went immediately to Fort Madison, . . . thence to Nauvoo and procured some witnesses headed by Wm. A. Hickman, a fugitive from justice, from Iowa, who has served one term, in the Alton penitentiary and has twice been chased from Missouri into Nauvoo, with stolen horses, within the last two months. (The Bloomington Herald, November 22, 1845, typed copy)

After the trouble in Nauvoo, Hickman was arrested and put in prison. In his autobiography Bill Hickman states:

I stayed a few days, and when the jailer came in one afternoon, I knocked him down, took his bowie knife and cut the chain off my leg, took his pistols and left, and have not been back since, which was about twenty-five years ago. This was the only time I was ever in prison. (Brigham's Destroying Angel, p. 46)

Bill Hickman came west to make his home among the Mormons. In Utah the Mormon leaders not only protected him from justice, but they also encouraged him in his crimes. J. H. Beadle stated:

. . . long after Hickman was known as a murderer he was successively promoted to a number of offices; he was Sheriff and Representative of one county, Assessor and Collector of Taxes, and Marshal; and during all this time he was on terms of personal intimacy with Brigham Young. (Brigham's Destroying Angel, Preface, p. vi)

Under the date of May 9, 1854, Hosea Stout recorded this statement in his journal: “Judge Appleby organized the County of Green River by appointing Robert Alexander Clerk of Probate Court, W.A. Hickman Sheriff also assessor and Collector as well as prosecuting attorney” (On the Mormon Frontier; The Diary of Hosea Stout, vol. 2, p. 516).

The Mormon leaders not only allowed this “notorious outlaw” to be Sheriff, but they also gave him a position in the church. In 1858 Bill Hickman “was chosen as Counselor to Acting Bishop Harker.” (Historical Record, by Andrew Jenson, vol. VI, p. 343, as quoted in On the Mormon Frontier, vol. 2, p. 668, n. 36)

In his book, Desert Saints, page 149, Nels Anderson gives this interesting information:

On August 30, 1856, General Burr wrote to his chief, Thomas A. Hendricks, Commissioner of the General Land Office in Washington, that one of his deputies, a Mr. Troskolowski, had been “assaulted and severely beaten by three men under the direction of one Hickman, a noted member of the so-called “Danite band.” The beating had been administered, it was alleged, by order of higher-ups in the church.

Burr tried without effect to get the Utah civil authorities to take action against the offenders. He was told that the beating was probably deserved because the men of Burr’s party had been “talking and railing against their religion.” He concluded: “We Gentiles feel that we cannot rely upon the laws for protection and are permitted to live here at the pleasure of the rulers.”

On page 137 of the same book, Nels Anderson states that “It is hard to believe that he [Hickman] had not been a killer for the Mormon cause; . . .”

Stanley P. Hirshon gives this information concerning Hickman:

. . . Joseph Troskolawsski, the United States Deputy Surveyor for Utah . . . put on the stagecoach for Ohio twelve-year-old Emma Wheat, who was being forced into a marriage she detested. On the following evening in the Salt Lake City store run by Hooper and Thomas S. Williams he met and spoke briefly to Bill Hickman, the famed Danite or Shenpip. When Troskolawsski stepped outside, three other Danites sneaked behind him and knocked him down. While one beat him about the head with the butt of a whip, the others stamped and kicked him. “Kill the d—d son of a b—h,” Hickman screamed joining in, “kill him quick, I’ll stand the consequences.” Hooper and Williams eventually rescued Troskolawsski, who by then was choking on his own blood. . . .

The next day David H. Burr, the Surveyor General, burst into Young’s office and asked if the prophet was going to tolerate such crimes. Young sent for Hickman, then bragging about his feat all over town, and talked to him for two hours. The following day he got Hickman out of town by sending him with presents for the Indians at Green River. (The Lion of the Lord, 1969, p. 127)

Like his predecessor, however, Young hated Gentiles. Even the army could not stop atrocities. One day in the mid-1860’s Hickman, angered because a favorite wife had been refused credit, beat and dragged down a flight of stairs Fay Kimball, a clerk for Bell and Livingston, the merchants. Kimball was bedridden for several months and then left Utah. His uncle, the senior partner of Kimball and Lawrence, complained to Young about the attack but, leaving the prophet’s office, bumped into Hickman, who asked: “Well, what did you make of it?” (Ibid., pp. 269-270)

Mrs. Mary Ettie V. Smith related the following:

About the time referred to in the last chapter, Jesse T. Hartly came to Great Salt Lake City. He was a man of education and intelligence, and a lawyer by profession. I never knew where he was from, but he was a Gentile when he came, and soon after married a Mormon girl by the name of Bullock, which involved a profession, at least, of Mormonism. . . . At all events, the eye of the Prophet was upon him from the first, . . . the Prophet regarded him with some suspicion, . . . when all the Heads of the Church were on the stand; and the Prophet rose at once with that air of judicial authority, from which those who know him best understand there is no appeal, and said: “This man, Hartly, is guilty of heresy. He has been writing to his friends in Oregon against the Church, and has attempted to expose us to the world, and he should be sent to hell cross lots.” This was the end of the matter as to Hartly.

His friends after this avoided him, and it was understood that his fate was sealed. He knew that to remain was death; he therefore left his wife and child, and attempted to effect an escape.

Not many days after he had gone, Wiley Norton told us, with a feeling of exultation, that they had made sure of another enemy of the Church. That the bones of Jesse Hartly were in the canons, . . .

Nearly a year and a half after this, when on my way to the States, I saw the widow of Jesse Hartly at Green River. She had been a very pretty woman, and was at that time but twenty-two years old. I think she was the most heartbroken human being I have ever seen . . . she commenced by saying:

You may have suffered; . . . But the cruelty of my own fate, I am sure, is without a parallel—even in this land of cruelty.

I married Jesse Hartly, knowing he was a “Gentile” in fact, but he passed for a Mormon, but that made no difference with me, although I was a Mormon, because he was a noble man, and sought only the right. . . . I do not understand all he discovered, or all he did; but they found he had written against the Church, and he was cut off, and the Prophet required as an atonement for his sins, that he should lay down his life. . . . They kill those there who have committed sins too great to be atoned for in any other way. The Prophet says, if they submit to this he can save them; otherwise they are lost. Oh! that is horrible. But my husband refused to be sacrificed, and so set out alone for the United States: thinking there might be at least a hope of success. I told him when he left me, and left his child, that he would be killed, and so he was. William Hickman and another Danite, shot him in the canons; and I have often since been obliged to cook for this man, when he passed this way, knowing all the while, he had killed my husband. My child soon followed after its father, and I hope to die also; for why should I live? They have brought me here, where I wish to remain, rather than to return to Salt Lake, where the murderers of my husband curse the earth, and roll in affluence unpunished. (Mormonism: Its Rise, Progress, And Present Condition, Hartford, 1870, pp. 308-311)

In his confessions Bill Hickman admitted that he had killed Hartley by orders of Orson Hyde and Brigham Young:

When we had got across what was known as the Big Mountain, and into East Canon, some three or four miles, one Mr. Hartley came to us from Provo City. This Hartley was a young lawyer . . . and had married a Miss Bullock, of Provo, . . . at the April Conference, Brigham Young, before the congregation, gave him a tremendous blowing up, calling him all sorts of bad names, and saying he ought to have his throat cut, which made him feel very bad. He declared he was not guilty of the charges.

I saw Orson Hyde looking very sour at him, and after he had been in camp an hour or two, Hyde told me that he had orders from Brigham Young, if he came to Fort Supply to have him used up. “Now,” said he, “I want you and George Boyd to do it.” I saw him and Boyd talking together; then Boyd came to me and said: “It’s all right, Bill; I will help you to kill that fellow.” One of our teams was two or three miles behind, and Orson Hyde wished me to go back and see if anything had happened to it. . . . Hartley stepped up and said he would go. Orson Hyde then whispered to me: “Now is your time; don’t let him come back.” We started, and about half a mile on had to cross the canon stream, . . . While crossing, Hartley got a shot and fell dead in the creek. His horse took fright and ran back to camp.

I went on and met Hosea Stout, who told me the team was coming close by. I turned back, Stout with me, for our camp. Stout asked me if I had seen that fellow, meaning Hartley. I told him he had come to our camp, and he said from what he heard he ought to be killed. I then told him all that had happened, and he said that was good. When I returned to camp Boyd told me that his horse came into camp with blood on the saddle, and he and some of the boys took it to the creek and washed it off. Orson Hyde told me that was well done; that he and some others had gone on the side of the mountain, and seen the whole performance. We hitched up and went to Weber River that day. (Brigham’s Destroying Angel, pp. 97-98)

It is interesting to note that Hosea Stout’s diary confirms the fact that Hartley was in trouble with the church. Under the date of April 9, 1854, he stated: “I was not present much of the time but the same subject was continued and lectures were delivered against girls marrying gentiles & winter Saints & one Mr Hartley cut off from the Church . . . He is said to be a runaway horse thief from Oregon came here & married joined the church & had sent up his name to get his endowment” (On The Mormon Frontier; The Diary of Hosea Stout, vol. 2, p. 512).

Hickman claimed that Hosea Stout was in the company going to Green River, and that he told him of the murder. Hickman said that this trip took place “about the first of May” in 1854 (Brigham’s Destroying Angel, p. 96). Hosea Stout’s diary confirms the fact that he was in the party with Hickman. Under the date of May 1, 1854, he stated:

About noon I started for Green River G. W. Boyd hauling my provision and luggage. I took Henry Allen along with me . . . We crossed over the first mountain & encamped on the creek changing my loading in the mean time into W.A. Hickman’s wagon. (On The Mormon Frontier, vol. 2, p. 514)

Notice that Hosea Stout mentions “G. W. Boyd” as being in the party. Bill Hickman stated that a man by the name of “George Boyd” was supposed to help with the murder.

Hickman claimed that Apostle Hyde helped cover up the fact that Hartley had been murdered:

When supper was over, Orson Hyde called all the camp together, and said he wanted a strong guard on that night, for that fellow that had come to us in the forenoon had left the company; he was a bad man, and it was his opinion that he intended stealing horses that night. This was about as good a take-off as he could get up, it was all nonsense; it would do well enough to tell; as everyone that did not know what had happened believed it. (Brigham’s Destroying Angel, p. 98)

Hosea Stout also mentioned Orson Hyde’s speech to the company:

This evening Elder Hyde informed the company that Mr J—Hartley who did not make his appearance to day with us had most likely had some dishonest intentions by his leaving & wished the guard to renew their diligence lest their horses might be stolen. (On The Mormon Frontier, vol. 2, p. 514)

J. H. Beadle makes this observation concerning Hickman’s confession of the murder of Hartley:

In a few brief words Hickman narrates one of the most cruel, causeless, and cold-blooded murders ever perpetrated. Hartley’s case is the one most generally known in Utah of all mentioned in this book, . . . Of all the crimes committed by Hickman this one seems to rest most heavy on his conscience. In conversation he strove to avoid it, and at this point his manuscript is heavily blurred and blotted, with frequent erasures, and every evidence of an uncertain hand and hesitating mind, impelled to, yet dreading the narration. (Brigham’s Destroying Angel, p. 201)

Dr. Hugh Nibley, of the Brigham Young University, claims that “The Hickman stories were not true.” He accuses J. H. Beadle of inventing these stories: “. . . we believe that those tales are Beadle’s invention, . . .” (Sounding Brass, p. 264).

Although J. H. Beadle was very opposed to the Mormon Church, there is evidence that Mr. Beadle did not invent the stories. R. N. Baskin, who was mayor of Salt Lake City and a member of the supreme court of the State of Utah, made this statement in his book Reminiscences Of Early Utah:

One evening in 1872, Samuel Gilson, who discovered the gilsonite deposits in eastern Utah, came to my office and informed me that the United States marshal held a warrant for the arrest of Bill Hickman, and that he was hiding to avoid arrest by the marshal and escape assassination by members of the Danite organization of which he had formerly been an active member. That having piloted General Connor’s soldiers into Utah, and having severed his connection with that organization, his former Danite associates had become suspicious of him, and were seeking his life, and that he wanted to employ me as his attorney. I most positively refused to become Hickman’s attorney. Mr. Gilson then stated that Hickman had expressed a desire to make a confession, and that even if I did not accept the offer of employment, that if I would agree to meet him he thought Hickman was in such a state of mind that he would tell me what he knew regarding the numerous murders which had been committed in the Territory. As I was desirous of ascertaining whether such an organization as the Danites or “Destroying Angels”—which was so much talked about and feared, especially by apostate Mormons—actually existed, and as Hickman—if it did exist—would know, I consented to meet him . . . Hickman, about eleven o’clock at night, in company with Mr. Gilson, came to my office. . . . I said to him that if, as generally asserted, he was or had been a member of such an organization, and had participated in the numerous murders which had been committed in the Territory, that the only atonement now within his power was to reveal the facts, as it might aid in preventing the commission of other like crimes. After deliberating for about a minute, he said that during his seclusion his mind had been greatly disturbed by the matter, and that he had finally concluded to reveal the facts to me, although in doing so he would acknowledge his own guilt. Procuring a pad and pencil I took down all that he said and also cross-examined him closely. We were together several hours. At that meeting he revealed most of the numerous crimes contained in his published confession, but in more minute detail. I told him that I wanted him to meet me again and repeat his statements. This he consented to do. Within two or three weeks thereafter I met him a second time and, as before, took down what he said and cross-examined him. My purpose in doing this was to test the truth of his confession, because if not true, his several statements would in all probability be inconsistent. At various times when I had leisure I critically examined and compared the statements, and while in the second one he mentioned two cases of murder which he had omitted in the first one, and in the second added some details which were not contained in the first, I failed to detect any contradictory statements. The statements of other persons made to me tended to corroborate his confessions. (Reminiscences of Early Utah, by R. N. Baskin, pp. 36-37)

On page 150 of the same book, Mr. Baskin stated:

The Danites were an organization in the Mormon church. Its existence was stated by Bill Hickman in his confession made to me. He gave me the names of more than a score of its active members, among whom were a number of reputed notorious Danite assassins. He stated that the members were bound by their covenants to execute the orders of the priesthood, and that when a direct order or intimation was given to “use up” anyone, it was always executed by one or more of the members, according to the circumstances of the case. That such an organization existed is conclusively shown by the numerous mysterious murders which were never investigated by the executive officers of the Territory, or any attempt made to prosecute the guilty parties. The Mormon sermons, the confessions of Hickman and Lee, and numerous other circumstances made plain its existence. Hickman confessed to me that he personally knew of thirteen persons having been murdered, some of them by him, and others by various Danites; that at one time he murdered a man by the name of Buck at the personal request of Brigham Young. (Reminiscences of Early Utah, p. 150)

On page 264 of his book, Sounding Brass, Dr. Hugh Nibley makes the following statement:

The patent absurdity of the “Confessions” becomes apparent on the most superficial investigation and grows with every monotonous episode.

. . . how could Beadle and everybody else back East know all about Hickman and his Danites for years before Hickman ever divulged his deep secrets?

R. N. Baskin shows, however, that Hickman’s crimes were well known at least 13 years before Hickman made his confession:

In the early days of my experience in Utah, I frequently had cases which required me to go to the city of Provo, and when attending court there I lodged at Mr. Bullock’s hotel. Having heard of the murder of Hartley, and that his wife was a sister of Mr. Bullock, I asked him on one occasion, while stopping at his hotel, whether what I had heard respecting the murder of Hartley was true. He stated that Hartley had incurred the displeasure of Brigham Young, who at a public meeting had used strong language against Hartley, and had ordered him to leave the speakers stand; that on account of the charges made by Brigham, which Bullock said were not true, Hartley was put under the ban of the church, and decided to change his residence. He joined the company of Judge Appleby, and while leaving the Territory was murdered by Hickman. I asked Mr. Bullock if the matter had ever been investigated by the executive authorities, and he said it had not been, although it was generally known that Hickman had committed the crime. I also asked him why he had not instituted proceedings against Hickman. He shook his head significantly and replied, "Don't press me for an answer to that question."

The following account of the murder of Hartley, given by his wife thirteen years before the confession of Hickman, is contained in Mrs. Mary V. Smith's book entitled, "Fifteen Years Residence with the Mormons," pp. 309-310, . . . (Reminiscences of Early Utah, pp. 152-153)

The fact that Mrs. Hartley told of the murder of her husband years before Hickman made his confession, and that Hosea Stout's diary confirms many of the details found in Hickman's confession, seems to prove that Hartley was murdered by orders of the Mormon leaders. We must agree with J. H. Beadle when he says that "those accustomed to judging the weight of evidence can come to but one conclusion: Jesse Hartley was murdered for apostasy, . . ." (Brigham's Destroying Angel, Appendix C, pp. 204-205).

Orrin Porter Rockwell

When Brigham Young said, "We have the meanest devils on the earth in our midst, and we intend to keep them, for we have use for them," he might also have had Orrin Porter Rockwell in mind. On June 11, 1878, the Salt Lake Tribune stated that it was estimated that Orrin Porter Rockwell had "participated in at least a hundred murders for the Church, none of which he ever divulged" (Salt Lake Tribune, June 11, 1878, as quoted in Orrin Porter Rockwell; Man of God, Son of Thunder, p. 9).

The Mormon writer Nicholas Van Alfen claimed that Rockwell had only killed when it was necessary for the sake of law and order:

He killed many men. But these cases were always in the performance of his duty as an officer. Notwithstanding the many attempts of Porter's critics to slander him, there is not a single proof of his ever having taken a life wantonly. (Porter Rockwell—The Mormon Frontier Marshal, 1964, p. 93)

In studying the life of Orrin Porter Rockwell we are very indebted to Harold Schindler, a Mormon writer who has had the courage to examine Rockwell's life in a scholarly and objective manner.

Just how many men Rockwell actually put to death may never be known; there is no doubt, however, that he did not hesitate to kill when he felt that it was necessary. Harold Schindler relates the following:

After consulting with several other elders in the posse, Rockwell decided to end the chase and return to Tooele, but first he intended to deal with the prisoners. Deeming it unwise to turn the four loose "to commit more depredations and perhaps shed the blood of some useful citizen . . . they were sacrificed to the natural instincts of self-defence." At a signal from Rockwell, the four Utes were shot to death, their bodies dumped into shallow graves scooped from the desert sand. (Orrin Porter Rockwell; Man of God, Son of Thunder, University of Utah Press, 1966, p. 201)

The Mormon apologist Nicholas Van Alfen makes these comments regarding Rockwell:

Turning the other cheek had not gone into Porter's mental and emotional make up. The suffering, tears and cries of his people left him barren of any compassion for the rogue and the lawless. This affected him the rest of his life as a law man in Utah. . . .

Rockwell learned how to shoot with an unexcelled accuracy . . . In his mind every target was a formidable foe who was trying to beat him to the draw. He prepared himself well for Port lived to be an old man through a gun-fighting career that was second to none. (Porter Rockwell—The Mormon Frontier Marshal, pp. 17-18)

Nicholas Van Alfen even has to admit that Orrin Porter Rockwell sometimes took the law into his own hands:

One cannot resist the conclusion that Porter nourished a growing hatred and an attitude of revenge against the type of men that characterized lawlessness and brutality. He became a peril to them because at times he was his own court, judge and executioner. (Ibid., pp. 47-48)

On page 65 of the same book, we find the following:

John F. Everet, an old timer of Springville, Utah, knew Rockwell . . . Mr. Everet praised Porter highly but criticized him because too often he did not bother with the courts. If a man stole a horse and had to be chased a hundred miles, it was not likely that the thief would be brought in alive.

On page 96 of the same book, Nicholas Van Alfen stated that "Porter always said that he never killed a man unless he deserved it."

According to Mr. Schindler's research, Orrin Porter Rockwell was born on June 28, 1813. He was one of the first to join the Mormon Church. In Missouri Rockwell joined the dreaded Danite band.

After the Mormons had been driven from Missouri, they were filled with hatred and ideas of revenge. Joseph Smith felt that "Lieutenant Governor Boggs" was chiefly responsible for driving the Mormons out of Missouri and at one time said he was worthy of death:

All earth and hell cannot deny that a baser knave, a greater traitor, and a more wholesale butcher, or murderer of mankind ever went untried, unpunished, and unhung—since hanging is the popular method of execution among the Gentiles in all countries professing Christianity, instead of blood for blood, according to the law of heaven. (History of the Church, vol. 1, p. 435)

On May 6, 1842, an attempt was made on the life of Lilburn W. Boggs. The Mormon writer John J. Stewart stated:

Unfortunately for Joseph, the Mormons and mankind generally, Boggs recovered despite three bullet wounds in the head and neck. (Joseph Smith, The Mormon Prophet, 1966, p. 171)

Many people believed that Joseph Smith had predicted Boggs' death. Harold Schindler stated:

About this time Joseph angrily prophesied that Lilburn Boggs would "die by violent hands within a year." And in a fit of pique he added that Governor Carlin would die in a ditch. (Orrin Porter Rockwell; Man of God, Son of Thunder, p. 72)

Anti-Mormon writers have always accused Orrin Porter Rockwell of shooting Boggs. The Mormon writer Harold Schindler has done a great deal of research on this matter, and although he does not definitely state that Rockwell was guilty of the attempted assassination, he does bring out the fact that Rockwell was in the area and that he was using an assumed name:

Therefore, in February of 1842 when Orrin Porter Rockwell gathered up his family to visit Independence so that Luana, eight months pregnant with their fourth child, could be with her parents, Bennett, so he says, was not surprised at Joseph's explanation that Rockwell had gone to "fulfill prophecy." Once in Independence Rockwell set out to find work . . . Since Jackson County settlers still harbored a hatred for Mormons, Rockwell used an assumed name while in the area; he called himself Brown. (Orrin Porter Rockwell, p. 73)

On pages 75 and 76 of the same book Mr. Schindler states:

Outside the house a crowd had quickly gathered at first report of the murder attempt and now numbered nearly two hundred persons; one of the spectators searching the spot where the gunman had stood found traces of footprints in the mud, and in a partially-filled puddle he discovered a gun. Sheriff Reynolds studied the firearm carefully, . . . a storekeeper named Uhlinger recognized the weapon as one stolen from his shop.

“I thought the niggers had taken it, but that hired man of Ward’s—the one who used to work with the stallion—he came in to look at it just before it turned up missing!” the storekeeper said.

Grateful for a genuine lead, Reynolds began looking for the hired hand, “to ask some questions,” but the man was nowhere to be found. It was not long before the sheriff determined that Mr. Brown, the suspect, was Orrin Porter Rockwell.

On page 80 of the same book, Mr. Schindler states:

If Rockwell did fire the fateful shot, it would appear the decision was of his own making; he had no love for Boggs, and in Rockwell’s eyes the man had sinned against the church in ordering the expulsion of the Saints from Missouri. It also is possible Rockwell felt he was performing a religious duty as a member of the priesthood in fulfilling Joseph’s prophecy.

On May 28, 1842, the Mormon newspaper, The Wasp, published a communication signed by “Vortex.” In this article we find the following: “Boggs is undoubtedly killed, according to report, but who did the noble deed remains to be found out.”

It is interesting to note that even John Whitmer, one of the eight witnesses to the Book of Mormon, felt that Joseph Smith was responsible for the attempted murder of Boggs:

As soon as the Lord gave Smith and the church favor in the eyes of the people among whom they lived, and began to prosper them and many began to gather to Nauvoo, Smith and the leaders began to exercise their hatred to those whom he called his enemies. He hired a man by the name of Porter Orin Rockwell (who was one of the Gadianton band of whom I heretofore spoke) to go and murder a man by name of L. W. Boggs who had been elected governor by the people of the state of Missouri; but was not governor at the time Smith sent him to commit this crime. Boggs resided at Independence, the place appointed for the land of Zion, yea, the New Jerusalem; so Rockwell went to Independence, and at night he went to the house of Boggs and shot him through the window; but he did not kill him, only wounded him severely, but was not sufficient testimony to condemn him, though it is a well-known fact that he was hired by Smith to kill Boggs. (John Whitmer’s History, chapter 21)

Joseph Smith held Orrin Porter Rockwell in full fellowship, and on one occasion he said that Rockwell “was an innocent and a noble child and my soul loves him” (History of the Church, vol. 5, p. 125).

Nicholas Van Alfen gives this interesting information: “Rockwell claimed throughout his life that Joseph Smith promised him if he would never cut his hair he would never die at the hands of his enemies” (Porter Rockwell—The Mormon Frontier Marshal, p. 41).

In 1845 Orrin Porter Rockwell found himself in trouble for shooting Frank Worrell. The Mormons admitted that Rockwell killed Worrell, but they claimed it was in self defense. Anti-Mormons, on the other hand, felt that Worrell was killed in a deliberate ambush (see The Mormon Kingdom, vol. 2, pp. 19-21).

This statement concerning Rockwell appeared in the Quincy Whig:

Rockwell’s career of crime is familiar to those who have heard or read of Mormon proceedings in Hancock. He was Joe Smith’s right hand man, and stood ready to execute any order of Joe’s however criminal. . . .

Rockwell has been a perfect desperado—reckless and ruffianly to the last extreme. A few days since one of the Higbees had occasion to visit Nauvoo on business. . . . Rockwell, hearing of his presence in the city, followed him about, threatening his life, firing pistols over his head etc., . . .

The day or two previous to his arrest, he was roaming about the streets of Nauvoo, with his weapons belted around him, swearing that the troops were now disbanded—that he intended to regulate the county, and openly boasted that he had killed Worrell, and that there were more in the county that he intended to serve in the same way. The fact is, the fellow had so long been suffered to run at large in violation of the law, that he began to think he could continue his career with impunity. (Quincy Whig, May 6, 1846, as quoted in Orrin Porter Rockwell, p. 153)

While it was obvious to the “Gentiles” that Rockwell was a murderer, the Mormons honored him and even initiated him into the secret “Council of Fifty” (Quest For Empire, pp. 223-225).

One of the cruelest deeds the Mormons engaged in was the Aiken massacre. Evidence shows that Rockwell was involved in this massacre. J. H. Beadle gave the following information concerning the Aiken massacre:

The party consisted of six men: . . . They left Sacramento early in May, 1857, going eastward to meet Johnston’s army, as was supposed. On reaching the Humboldt River they found the Indians very bad, and waited for a train of the Mormons from Carson, who were ordered home about that time. With them they completed the journey. John Pendleton, one of that Mormon party, in his testimony on the case says: “A better lot of boys I never saw. They were kind, polite, and brave; always ready to do anything needed on the road.”

The train traveled slowly, so the Aikin party left it a hundred miles out and came ahead, and on reaching Kaysville, twenty-five miles north of Salt Lake City, they were all arrested on the charge of being spies for the Government! . . . The Aikin party had stock, property, and money estimated at $25,000. Nothing being proved against them they were told they should be “sent out of the Territory by the Southern route.” Four of them started, leaving Buck and one of the unknown men in the city. The party had for an escort, O. P. Rockwell, John Lot, _____ Miles, and one other. When they reached Nephi, one hundred miles south, Rockwell informed the Bishop, Bryant, that his orders were to “have the men used up there.” Bishop Bryant called a council at once, and the following men were selected to assist: J. Bigler (now a Bishop,) P. Pitchforth, his “first councillor,” John Kink, and _____ Pickton.

The doomed men were stopping at T. B. Foote’s, and some persons in the family afterwards testified to having heard the council that condemned them. The selected murderers, at 11 p.m., started from the Tithing House and got ahead of the Aikins’, who did not start till daylight. The latter reached the Sevier River, when Rockwell informed them they could find no other camp that day; they halted, when the other party approached and asked to camp with them, for which permission was granted. The weary men removed their arms and heavy clothing, and were soon lost in sleep—that sleep which for two of them was to have no waking on earth. All seemed fit for their damnable purpose, and yet the murderers hesitated. As near as can be determined, they still feared that all could not be done with perfect secrecy, and determined to use no firearms. With this view the escort and the party from Nephi attacked the sleeping men with clubs and the kingbolts of the wagons. Two died without a struggle. But John Aiken bounded to his feet, but slightly wounded, and sprang into the brush. A shot from the pistol of John Kink laid him senseless. ‘Colonel’ also reached the brush, receiving a shot in the shoulder from Port Rockwell, and believing the whole party had been attacked by banditti, he made his way back to Nephi. With almost superhuman strength he held out during the twenty-five miles, and the first bright rays of a Utah sun showed the man, who twenty-four hours before had left them handsome and vigorous in the pride of manhood, now ghastly pale and drenched with his own blood, staggering feebly along the streets of Nephi. He reached Bishop Foote’s, and his story elicited a well-feigned horror.

Meanwhile the murderers had gathered up the other three and thrown them into the river, supposing all to be dead. But John Aiken revived and crawled out on the same side, and hiding in the brush, heard these terrible words:

“Are the damned Gentiles all dead, Port?”

“All but one—the son of a b— ran.”

Supposing himself to be meant, Aikin lay still till the Danites left, then, without hat, coat, or boots, on a November night, the ground covered with snow, he set out for Nephi. Who can imagine the feelings of the man? Unlike “Colonel” he knew too well who the murderers were, and believed himself the only survivor. To return to Nephi offered but slight hope, but it was the only hope, and incredible as it may appear he reached it next day. He sank helpless at the door of the first house he reached, but the words he heard infused new life into him. The woman, afterwards a witness, said to him, “Why, another of you ones got away from the robbers, and is at Brother Foote’s.”

“Thank God; it is my brother,” he said, and started on. The citizens tell with wonder that he ran the whole distance, his hair clotted with blood, reeling like a drunken man all the way. It was not his brother, but “Colonel.” . . .

Bishop Bryant came, extracted the balls, dressed the wounds, and advised the men to return, as soon as they were able, to Salt Lake City. . . . The murderers had returned, and a new plan was concocted. “Colonel” had saved his pistol and Aiken his watch, a gold one, worth at least $250. When ready to leave they asked the bill, and were informed it was $30. They promised to send it from the city, and were told that “would not do.” Aiken then said, “Here is my watch and my partner’s pistol—take your choice.” Foote took the pistol. When he handed it to him, Aikin said, “There, take my best friend. But God knows it will do us no good.” Then to his partner, with tears streaming from his eyes, “Prepare for death, Colonel, we will never get out of this valley alive.”

According to the main witness, a woman of Nephi, all regarded them as doomed. They had got four miles on the road, when their driver, a Mormon named Wolf, stopped the wagon near an old cabin: informed them he must water his horses; unhitched them, and moved away. Two men then stepped from the cabin, and fired with double-barreled guns; Aikin and “Colonel” were both shot through the head, and fell dead from the wagon. Their bodies were then loaded with stone and put in one of those “bottomless springs”—so called—common in that part of Utah. . . .

Meanwhile Rockwell and party had reached the city, taken Buck and the other man, and started southward, plying them with liquor. It is probable that Buck only feigned drunkenness; but the other man was insensible by the time they reached the Point of the Mountain. There it was decided to “use them up,” and they were attacked with slungshots and billies. The other man was instantly killed. Buck leaped from the wagon, outran his pursuers, their shots missing him, swam the Jordan, and came down it on the west side. He reached the city and related all that occurred, which created quite a stir. Hickman was then sent for to “finish the job,” which he did, as related in the text. (Brigham’s Destroying Angel, Appendix F, pp. 206-210)

There can be no doubt that the Mormons did take the Aiken party as prisoners and murder them as related by Beadle. Under the date of November 3, 1857, Hosea Stout recorded the following in his diary: “Cal mail came and six Cal prisoners taken at Box Elder supposed spies” (On The Mormon Frontier, The Diary of Hosea Stout, vol. 2, p. 644).

On Nov. 9, 1857, Hosea Stout recorded that he was “guarding the prisoners from Cal.” On November 20, 1857, Stout made this very revealing entry in his diary:

O. P. Rockwell with 3 or four others started with 4 of the prisoners, which we had been guarding for some days, South to escort them through the settlements to Cal via South route The other two are going to be permitted to go at large and remain till spring and the guard dismissed. (On The Mormon Frontier, The Diary of Hosea Stout, vol. 2, p. 645)

The Mormon writer Harold Schindler has done a great deal of research concerning the Aiken massacre. On pages 272-278 of his book, Mr. Schindler gives this information:

All six men of the Aiken Party rode with Rockwell’s escort as far as Lehi, where Chapman and Jones, who preferred to remain behind, took their leave. . . . Escorting the two Aikens, Tuck Wright, and Colonel Eichard were Rockwell, Sylvanus Collett, and two others, witnesses said. . . .

Twenty years later, when Sylvanus Collett was on trial for his life (charged with the murder of John Aiken), two Mormons, Joseph Skeen and his son, William, both took the witness stand and testified that Collett had told them the whole story of the Aiken Party. . . . Troubled by the gossip, Skeen asked Collett about it and was told “that he [Collett] had been an escort to the Aiken party from the north, they having been delivered over to Rockwell . . . and himself, with the order to make away with them.”

The Skeens, father and son, agreed in substance that Collett gave this account of what transpired after the eight-man party left Nephi:

Because the Californians were large and strong, a second group of men had been sent from Nephi . . .

After dinner . . . someone shouted that Indians were attacking. The four men who had been sent in advance to act as reinforcements created a confusion to distract the Californians, and at a signal (here the Skeens were in conflict, the father testifying Collett gave the sign, the son saying it was Rockwell) each of the four men in the escort, having selected a victim in advance, slipped a bar of iron from his sleeve and struck his man on the head. “. . . Collett missed (his) man,” William Skeen told the court. In fact, he said, Collett was being badly beaten until Rockwell pulled a revolver and, firing across the campfire, shot Collett’s man in the back. The wounded Californian lurched, fell into the brush, and escaped in the darkness. The bodies of the two Aikens and the colonel were thrown into the river; Tom Aiken and Eichard were dead, but the icy water apparently revived John Aiken, who crawled to shore and made his way to Nephi. . . . Mrs. Frances Cazier, who had watched the drama with interest, noticed Rockwell and three others enter town after dark. Next morning she was standing in the doorway of her home adjacent to the Tithing Office and saw Rockwell sitting inside with several other men. At Collett’s trial she testified she heard a voice say: “Boys, you’ve made a bad job of it; two got away. Nephi won’t be trusted with another job.”

Fourteen-year-old Alice Lamb listened to a conversation between several Nephi residents in which the return of Aiken and Wright was discussed and a decision made to lure the two men to another spot and “there to make away with them.” . . . Guy Foote and Reuben Down had occasion to pass the Tithing Office corral; there they saw horses and pack animals belonging to the Aiken Party.

Four or five days after the two survivors had made their surprise appearance in Nephi, they felt able to travel . . . Shortly before they rode out of the settlement, Rockwell and several men were seen heading north.

The events of the next few hours remain much of a mystery, but William Skeen swore that Collett had boasted of ambushing Wright and Aiken at a place called Willow Creek, eight miles from Nephi. The buggy had stopped for water when the door to a nearby header’s shack flew open and a couple of double-barreled shotguns poked out and fired, killing the two men instantly. The bodies were weighted with rocks and thrown in the deep springs bubbling four miles away. . . .

Before long, Aiken Party property was turning up everywhere. Guy Foote saw one of his friends walking around in John Aiken’s coat, with what appeared to be amended bullet hole in the back. . . . As Rockwell and his men rode back to Great Salt Lake City, they did not go unnoticed. In Provo, Richard Ivie marked the iron grey mule now in possession of the four Mormons as the same animal he had admired in the Aiken Party. George Murdock in Lehi recognized an iron grey mule and a roan pony in the Rockwell outfit as Aiken stock.

The rest of the story is a puzzle, but the known facts would indicate that as Rockwell and his companions continued toward Great Salt Lake City, they were joined, for one reason or another, by A. J. “Honesty” Jones. Perhaps he, too, recognized the mule or some other Aiken gear. Near Point of the Mountain an attempt was made on his life, but Jones was able to escape with only bruises. He made it across the Jordan River and back to Great Salt Lake City, where he began “telling all that happened, which is making a big stink!”

Bill Hickman, fresh from a murder himself, enters the picture at this point. Told that “the boys have made a bad job of trying to put a man away.” Hickman says he was ordered to find Jones and “use him up.” (Orrin Porter Rockwell, pp. 272-278)

In his confessions Bill Hickman wrote:

After being at home some time, word was sent to me to have my boys look for a man that had got away from a party at what was called the Point of the Mountain, . . . two hours later a messenger came from the city and told me I was wanted at Brigham Young’s office immediately. I mounted my horse and was in town in an hour, and went to Young’s office. He asked me if I “had seen the boys?” I asked him what boys? and he answered, “Geo, Grant and William Kimball.” I told him I had not. I then told him I had got word to come to his office, and wished to know what was wanting. He answered: “The boys have made a bad job of trying to put a man out of the way. They all got drunk, bruised up a fellow, and he got away from them at the Point of the Mountain, came back to this city, and is telling all that happened, which is making a big stink.” He said I must get him out of the way and use him up. He told me to go and find the boys, meaning Generals Grant and Kimball, they both being acting generals in the Utah militia at that time, and arrange things with them, so as to have him taken care of.

I found them, and they told me O. P. Rockwell, with a party, had made a bad job and wanted help, and I had been sent for to wind it up. Said they: “Did Brigham tell you what was up?” I told them he did, and had sent me to arrange things. They told me they had things fixed; that when the party, to which this man belonged, first came into the Territory, they had all stopped twelve miles north of the city, and remained several weeks in the neighborhood where George Dalton lived; that Dalton was in town, and they had got him to see this man (whose name I never heard, only he was called Buck), and take him home with him, for he had confidence in Dalton. They said Dalton understood it, and they were waiting for me to come and meet him on the road. They then hunted up Dalton, and told him they had things all right now. Dalton was to leave town a little before sundown, and pass the Hot Springs three miles north of the city, and take the lower road on which there was not much travel, and I was to meet him. I was to know his team because both of his horses were white, and he was to drive very fast.

All being arranged, and the sun about an hour high. I got my horse, and the question was then asked how many men I wanted to go with me. I told them I did not want anyone. They said I must have somebody, and I told them then I would take a man that was standing by, by the name of Meacham. They got him a horse, and we went to the place appointed, and just at dark the wagon came. We called to it to halt. The man, Buck, got a shot through the head, and was put across the fence in a ditch. A rag was hung on a brush to know the place.

We returned to the city to Gen. Grant’s, as per agreement, and found him at home with Gen. Kimball, O. P. Rockwell, and somebody else whose name I do not recollect now. They asked if all was right, and I told them it was. They got spades, and we all went back, deepened the ditch, put him in and buried him, returned to Grant’s, took some whisky, and separated for the night. The next day Kimball and I went to Brigham Young’s, told him that Buck was taken care of, and there would be no more stink about his stories. He said he was glad of it. Buck was the last one of the Aiken’s party, of whom there has been considerable said. (Brigham’s Destroying Angel, pp. 127-130)

Less than two years after the Aiken massacre the U.S. marshal P. K. Dotson held a warrant for Orrin Porter Rockwell’s arrest. Dotson found it impossible to make the arrest, and Orrin Porter Rockwell retained his freedom for many years. He was in full fellowship with the church during this period, and on June 1, 1873, he was called on a mission to Grass Valley (Orrin Porter Rockwell; Man of God, Son of Thunder, p. 356). Finally, on September 29, 1877, he was arrested for his part in the Aiken massacre. Under the date of September 29, 1877, we find this statement in Jenson’s Church Chronology:

O. Porter Rockwell was arrested and imprisoned in Salt Lake City, being charged with murder, said to have been committed about twenty years before. Oct. 5th, he was admitted to bail in the sum of $15,000. (Church Chronology, p. 100)

The Salt Lake Tribune for September 30, 1877, reported:

Another one of “our best society,” O. P. Rockwell, was jugged yesterday. This man has been one of the chief murderers of the Mormon Church, opening his career of blood in Nauvoo, under the regime of the Prophet. He was indicted a day or two ago by the grand jury of the First District Court, for participation in the horribly atrocious murder of the Aiken party, in 1858, on the Sevier. He was arrested, yesterday, by the United States marshal, in this city, and sent to the penitentiary for safekeeping. . . . (Salt Lake Tribune, September 30, 1877, as quoted in Orrin Porter Rockwell, p. 360)

Rockwell was 64 years old at the time he was arrested for his part in the Aiken massacre. On June 9, 1878, Orrin Porter Rockwell died, and therefore he was never brought to justice. On June 11, 1878, the Salt Lake Tribune carried these statements concerning Rockwell:

Porter Rockwell is another of the long list of Mormon criminals whose deeds of treachery and blood have reddened the soil of Utah, and who has paid no forfeit to offended law. . . . Brutal in his instincts, lawless in his habits, and a fanatical devotee of the Prophet, the commands of this gloomy despot he received as the will of the Lord, and with the ferocity borne of mistaken zeal, he grew to believe that the most acceptable service he could render the Almighty, was, as Lear expresses it, to “kill, kill, kill, kill, kill!” He killed unsuspecting travelers, whose booty was coveted by his prophet-master. He killed fellow Saints who held secrets that menaced the safety of their fellow criminals in the priesthood. He killed Apostates who dared to wag their tongues about the wrongs they had endured. . . . The Danite Rockwell retired from the avenging business, and for some years past has been extensively engaged in raising horses and cattle. But the recollection of his evil deeds haunted him, and conscience preyed upon his soul like the undying worm. To gain escape from this fiery torment he sought the intoxicating bowl, and whenever he appeared in the streets of Salt Lake, it was generally in the character of a vociferating maniac.

He died in time to escape the hand of the law. Being indicted in the First District for participating in the Aiken murder, District Attorney [Philip T.] Van Zile was gathering together a mass of evidence which must have convicted him of the crime charged, and brought him to the same fate as was visited upon the “butcher Lee.” (Salt Lake Tribune, June 11, 1878, as quoted in Orrin Porter Rockwell, pp. 363-364)

From the evidence that Harold Schindler has furnished there can be little doubt that Orrin Porter Rockwell was a murderer. Even Thomas G. Alexander, of the Brigham Young University, had to admit that Schindler’s “evidence that Rockwell may have been responsible for the murders for which he stood indicted at the time of his death (pages 273-279) appears fairly reliable” (Brigham Young University Studies, Autumn 1967, p. 101).

29. Temple Work

In order to really understand present-day Mormonism and the hold it has upon its people it is necessary to know about the work that goes on in Mormon temples. The ceremonies that are performed in these temples are secret, and only “worthy” members of the Mormon Church may participate in them.

Baptism for the Dead

The Mormon doctrine of baptism for the dead was first practiced in Nauvoo, Illinois. Wilford Woodruff, the fourth President of the Mormon Church, made this statement:

Joseph Smith himself . . . went into the Mississippi River one Sunday night after meeting, and baptized a hundred. I baptized another hundred. The next man, a few rods from me, baptized another hundred. We were strung up and down the Mississippi, baptizing for our dead. But there was no recorder, we attended to this ordinance without waiting to have a proper record made. But the Lord told Joseph that he must have recorders present at these baptisms—men who could see with their eyes and hear with their ears, and record these things. Of course, we had to do the work over again. Nevertheless, that does not say the work was not of God. (The Deseret Weekly, vol. 42:554, April 25, 1891, as quoted in Temples of the Most High, by N. B. Lundwall, Salt Lake City, 1962, p. 69)

On May 2, 1843, Charlotte Haven wrote a letter in which she stated:

. . . we spied quite a crowd of people, and soon perceived there was a baptism. Two elders stood knee-deep in the icy cold water, and immersed one after another as fast as they could come down the bank. We soon observed that some of them went in and were plunged several times. We were told that they were baptized for the dead who had not had an opportunity of adopting the doctrines of the Latter Day Saints. So these poor mortals in ice-cold water were releasing their ancestors and relatives from purgatory! We drew a little nearer and heard several names repeated by the elders as the victims were doused, and you can imagine our surprise when the name George Washington was called. So after these fifty years he is out of purgatory and on his way to the “celestial” heaven! (Overland Monthly, December 1890, pp. 629-30)

Many of the baptisms for the dead which were performed in Joseph Smith’s day had to be done over. Brigham Young, the second President of the Church, stated:

Joseph in his life time did not receive every thing connected with the doctrine of redemption, . . .

I have said that a man cannot be baptized for a woman, nor a woman for a man, and it be valid. . . . Well then, what has been our course on former occasions? Why, here go our beloved sisters and they are baptized in the river or the font for their uncles, for their fathers, for their grandfathers and great grandfathers. (Millennial Star, vol. 6, p. 121)

On April 9, 1857, Wilford Woodruff made these comments concerning this matter:

When that was first revealed, . . . we began to be baptized for our dead. A man would be baptized for both male and female. . . . I . . . was baptized for all my dead relatives I could think of, both male and female, as did others; but, afterwards, we obtained more light upon the subject, and President Young taught the people that men should attend to those ordinances for the male portion of their dead friends, and females for females. . . . How did we feel when we first heard the living could be baptized for the dead? We all went to work at it as fast as we had an opportunity, and were baptized for everybody we could think of, without respect to sex. . . . by-and-by, it was revealed, through the servants of the Lord, that females should be baptised for females, and males for males; but the full particulars of this order was not revealed till after the days of Joseph: . . . (Journal of Discourses, vol. 5, pp. 84-85)

The early Mormon leaders seem to have been very confused concerning baptism for the dead. Brigham Young once stated:

Hundreds and thousands, I suppose, were baptized before any record was kept at all, and they were baptized over, and a record kept . . . the Lord did not reveal everything at once; but I need not dwell on this any longer. (Journal of Discourses, vol. 18, p. 241)

The Mormon leaders teach that the spirits of people who have died cannot enter the kingdom of heaven until a Mormon is baptized for them by proxy. They admit, however, that there is a possibility that some of the spirits may not receive the work which they do for them. Heber C. Kimball, who was a member of the First Presidency, said:

Perhaps my father may not receive the Gospel. If he don’t, my baptism will not do him any good. . . . You might as well go and be baptized for a devil as for a man who will not receive the Gospel in the spirit world. (Journal of Discourses, vol. 5, p. 90)

Some people have wondered why these baptisms, if they are really necessary, could not be performed in heaven. President Joseph Fielding Smith tries to make it appear that this would be impossible: “It is easy to understand how they in person could believe in Christ and even obtain the spirit of repentance; but water is an element of this world, and how could spirits be baptized in it, or receive the laying on of hands for the gift of the Holy Ghost? The only way it can be done is vicariously, someone who is living acting as a substitute for the dead” (Doctrines of Salvation, vol. 2, p. 141). Joseph Fielding Smith’s argument is not too convincing, for he states that the souls of fish “lived before they were placed naturally in this earth,” and the “fishes of the sea” will be “recreated, or renewed, through the resurrection, for they too are living souls” (Doctrines of Salvation, vol. 1, pp. 63, 74). Since Joseph Fielding Smith maintains that the souls of fish are “in the similitude of their bodies,” we would assume that there would have to be something for them to swim in.

Daniel H. Wells, who was a member of the First Presidency, gave another reason why baptisms could not be performed in heaven: “You cannot grapple a spirit to baptize it, neither can you perform the sealing ordinances in the spirit, . . .” (Journal of Discourses, vol. 16, p. 240)

We find this information about baptizing the dead in Joseph Smith’s History:

Chrysostum says that the Marchionites practiced baptism for their dead. “After a catechumen was dead, they had a living man under the bed of the deceased; then coming to the dead man, they asked him whether he would receive baptism, and he making no answer, the other answered for him, and said that he would be baptized in his stead; and so they baptized the living for the dead.” The church of course at that time was degenerate, and the particular form might be incorrect, but the thing is sufficiently plain in the Scriptures, hence Paul, in speaking of the doctrine, says, “Else what shall they do which are baptized for the dead, if the dead rise not at all? Why are they then baptized for the dead?” (1 Cor. 15:29). (History of the Church, vol. 4, p. 599)

Bible scholars are divided as to the meaning of the verse which Joseph Smith quotes. Some claim that it means one thing, and others believe that it means something else. Mormons, of course, believe that it applies to temple work, where a living person is baptized in behalf of someone that has died. Now, even if this verse does apply to a living person being baptized for someone else, as the Mormons maintain, this does not prove that faithful Christians were practicing it. Paul does not say that “we” are baptized for the dead, but rather that “they” are baptized for the dead. The use of the word “they” instead of the word “we” could make a great deal of difference in the meaning of the statement. If a Protestant made the statement, “Why do they then pray for the dead, if the dead rise not at all,” it would not mean that he was endorsing the Catholic doctrine of prayers for the dead. However, if a person made the statement, “Why do we then pray for the dead, if the dead rise not at all,” we would assume that he believed in prayers for the dead.

A good discussion of 1 Corinthians 15:29 is found in the pamphlet Baptism for the Dead:

A careful reading of this epistle shows that the Apostle Paul writes to the Corinthian Saints using the words “I,” “we,” “ye,” “you,” when referring to them and/or himself all the way through his message; but when he mentions baptism for the dead, he changes to “they.” “What shall they do?” “Why are they then baptized for the dead?” In the verses following, he returns to the use of “we” and “you.” Thus he seems to disassociate himself and the righteous Saints from the methods used by those groups who at that time were practicing baptism for the dead.

The Apostle Paul did not urge his hearers to practice the principle, nor did he command it. He merely used the case as an illustration. Paul did not worship the “unknown God” of the pagans because he found an altar to the pagan unknown god (Acts 17:23) . . . There is no mention of baptism for the dead in the Bible up until Paul—and no mention afterward. Paul, as well as the other apostles, rather than endorsing baptism for the dead as then practiced, seems to have exercised a counteracting influence upon this ordinance, for it was perpetuated only among heretics.

The Bible contains no specific authorization of this doctrine. Christ does not mention it, nor do any of the apostles, save Paul; who makes only an indirect reference to it. (Baptism for the Dead, by Charles R. Hield and Russell F. Ralston, 1951, pp. 23-24)

The fact that Christ never mentioned baptism for the dead is strong evidence that no such doctrine existed in the early Christian church.

The Mormon Apostle Orson Pratt admitted that the Bible does not contain any information as to how baptism for the dead should be performed. His excuse for the Bible not containing this information was that it was probably lost or taken out of the Bible. He stated:

This doctrine of baptism for the dead must have been well understood by them, . . . Now when, and in what manner was this doctrine communicated to them? It may have been fully developed to them in the epistle which he says that he had previously written to them. This doctrine may have been as important as baptism to the living. Does the written or unwritten word of God with which Christendom are acquainted, inform them anything about how this ceremony is to be performed? Does it inform them who is to officiate?

Who is the candidate in behalf of the dead? What classes of the dead are to be benefited by it? Does scripture or tradition inform us in what particular baptism for the dead will affect them in the resurrection? Does it inform us whether baptism for the dead can be administered in all places, or only in a baptismal font, in a temple consecrated for that purpose? All these important questions remain unanswered by scripture and tradition. (Orson Pratt's Works, 1891 edition, p. 205)

It is interesting to note that in trying to establish the doctrine of baptism for the dead, Joseph Smith contradicted his own “Inspired Version” of the Bible. Hebrews 11:40 of the King James Version, which is often used by Mormons to prove that work for the dead is necessary, reads as follows: “God having provided some better thing for us, that they without us should not be made perfect.” Joseph Smith, however, changed this verse to read as follows in the Inspired Revision of the Bible: “God having provided some better things for them through their sufferings, for without sufferings they could not be made perfect.”

Now, in section 128 of the Doctrine and Covenants, Joseph Smith had to ignore his own rendition of this verse in trying to establish the doctrine of baptism for the dead. He quoted the King James Version instead of his “inspired” rendition. In verse 15 he said: “. . . these are principles in relation to the dead and the living . . . their salvation is necessary and essential to our salvation, as Paul says concerning the fathers—that they without us cannot be made perfect—neither can we without our dead be made perfect.” In verse 18 he said: “. . . what is that subject? It is the baptism for the dead. For we without them cannot be made perfect; neither can they without us be made perfect.” Joseph Smith certainly contradicted himself with regard to Hebrews 11:40.

Endless Genealogies

Baptism for the dead is now performed only in temples. The Mormon people are very zealous about this work for the dead, for they believe they are saving their ancestors. John Taylor, who became the third President of the Mormon Church, stated: “. . . we are the only people that know how to save our progenitors, . . . we in fact are the saviours of the world, if they ever are saved; . . .” (Journal of Discourses, vol. 6, p. 163). Wilford Woodruff, who became the fourth President, felt that he had saved John Wesley, Columbus, and all of the Presidents of the United States except three:

The dead will be after you, they will seek after you as they have after us in St. George. They called upon us, knowing that we held the keys and power to redeem them.

I will here say, before closing, that two weeks before I left St. George, the spirits of the dead gathered around me, wanting to know why we did not redeem them. . . . These were the signers of the Declaration of Independence, and they waited on me for two days and two nights. . . . I straightway went into the baptismal font and called upon brother McCallister to baptize me for the signers of the Declaration of Independence, and fifty other eminent men, making one hundred in all, including John Wesley, Columbus, and others; I then baptized him for every President of the United States, except three; and when their cause is just, somebody will do the work for them. (Journal of Discourses, vol. 19, p. 229)

The Mormons are now spending millions of dollars doing genealogical research in order to find the names of those who have died so that they can do proxy baptism for them. Bruce R. McConkie, who is a member of the First Council of the Seventy, made this statement concerning this matter:

Before vicarious ordinances of salvation and exaltation may be performed for those who have died . . . they must be accurately and properly identified. Hence, genealogical research is required . . . the Church maintains in Salt Lake City one of the world's greatest genealogical societies. Much of the genealogical source material of various nations of the earth has been or is being microfilmed by this society; millions of dollars is being spent; and a reservoir of hundreds of millions of names and other data about people who lived in past generations is available for study. (Mormon Doctrine, 1966, pp. 308-309)

Heber J. Grant, the seventh President of the Church, once stated:

"I am deeply interested in genealogical work. . . . I have in my employ a sister who devotes all her time to the preparation of genealogical records. Last year I expended in the neighborhood of $200.00 per month during the entire year for genealogical research work pertaining to the families to which I belong in direct descent and through marriage." (Temple Mormonism, New York, 1931, p. 10)

The Deseret News told of a woman who searched 15 years to find the names of some of her ancestors:

"You may hunt for years before you find what you're looking for," Mrs. Triptow said, "then you might discover it all at once."

She proved it one day last month, when in one minute she found the names of four new ancestors for whom she had searched 15 years. She spotted their names and christening dates in the Bedlington (England) parish register printout at the Genealogical Society library. (Deseret News, Church Section, April 23, 1966, p. 14)

Wallace Turner gives this information concerning genealogical research:

This microfilming of records is a tremendous work, growing in scope continually, operated entirely for the benefit of the ancestor tracing that leads to the vicarious Temple ceremonies. As of July 1, 1965, the microfilm division had a total of 406,682 rolls of microfilm of 100 feet each. There were records from all over the world. Just consider that even from the Bahamas they have 608 rolls containing about 780,000 separate pages of records. The total microfilm load included 579,679,800 pages of documents. There were more than 5 billion names in the files. . . .

The church puts about $4 million a year into the Genealogical Society. It has 575 employees and is run by a board which includes two apostles. The microfilm unit sends crews all over the world to locate and photograph records. . . . The negative microfilms are stored in a great vault system dug out of the rocks of Cottonwood Canyon in the Wasatch Mountains southeast of Salt Lake City. This underground storage system was produced by the church at a cost of $2.5 million. It has six vaults, which each hold a million rolls of film. As of July 1, 1965, the church had just over 400,000 rolls, not enough to half fill one vault. During 1964, the microfilming units worked in fourteen countries. (The Mormon Establishment, pp. 81-82)

Robert Mullen gives the following information about the storage vaults and the genealogical work done by the church:

You see three huge banklike vault doors. One, you are told, weighs fifteen tons and could withstand almost any blast. Each of these vault doors leads to a 350-foot long room, extending even farther back into the granite mountain. These immense rooms, also lined with softly painted steel and floored and lighted like the most modern offices, are connected with three cross extensions of similar design. . . .

The vaults have their own self-contained power plant, their own emergency supplies, fresh air filters, and other equipment to endure even a severe atomic attack, which one can only suppose was at least at the back of the minds of designers and builders. But the vaults are not reserved for emergency use; they are in daily service as the principal storage area for the 250 million or more feet of microfilm in the Church's genealogical library. . . . The most recent acquisition, for example, are microfilms of every birth and death in New Zealand since records were kept. . . .

Today genealogical work is a favorite occupation with many of the Church members. On a normal business day in Salt Lake City you will find perhaps one hundred men and women entering the centrally located genealogical headquarters and peering into the big reading machines on which microfilms are projected. Others will be consulting Church experts, furnishing the family names and other material that can be fed into the information retrieval computers.

(The Latter-day Saints: The Mormons Yesterday and Today, New York, 1966, pp. 193-195)

The Mormon Apostle LeGrand Richards boasts that the Mormon Church "has one of the largest and best genealogical libraries in the world. . . . It is safe to predict that in the not too far distant future, the Church Genealogical Library will not only be the best in the world but will also be a repository of most all other genealogical libraries" (A Marvelous Work and a Wonder, 1957 edition, p. 192; 1979 edition, p. 187).

Many people have wondered why the Mormon Church spends so much time and money searching for the names of the dead when there are so many people starving to death. It would seem far better to spend this money and time on the living and let the Lord take care of the dead. The Mormon leaders admit that they will never be able to find all of the names until the Lord gives them during the millennium. The Mormon Apostle LeGrand Richards states:

This work will obviously have to continue throughout the thousand years of the millennium. . . . At present, we are dependent upon the written records that have been kept. But during the millennium we will have direct communication with the heavens, when all the names and information concerning those who are ready and worthy of baptism will be revealed. (Ibid., 1957 edition, p. 178; 1979 edition, pp. 173-171)

Since the Mormon leaders believe that the Lord will have to provide many of the names anyway, would it not be better to spend this time and money helping the living instead of searching for the names of the dead? Because of this emphasis on work for the dead, one Mormon has compared the church to the ancient Egyptians. The Egyptians, of course, spent a fantastic amount of time and money building pyramids and doing other work for their dead.

The Book of Mormon says that the false churches "rob the poor because of their fine sanctuaries" (2 Nephi 28:13), yet the Mormon Church is spending millions of dollars building beautiful temples. The Salt Lake Temple, for instance, cost between 3 and 4 million dollars and took almost 40 years to build. According to figures given to N. B. Lundwall by the Church Historian's Office, the church has spent $16,925,000.00 on Temples alone, and these figures do not include the temples built in Ogden, Provo and Oakland. If we added the millions of dollars spent for genealogical research the figures would amount to a great deal more. Thus it does appear that the Mormons are similar to the ancient Egyptians in their attitudes toward the dead. Joseph Fielding Smith, the tenth President of the Church, has made these statements:

. . . the greatest commandment given us, and made obligatory, is the temple work in our own behalf and in behalf of our dead. (Doctrines of Salvation, vol. 2, p. 149)

The Prophet Joseph Smith declared, "The greatest responsibility in this world that God has laid upon us is to seek after our dead." (Ibid., p. 146)

The reader will remember that Jesus never even mentioned the doctrine of baptism for the dead. In Mark 12:29-31 we find:

And Jesus answered him, The first of all the commandments is, Hear, O Israel; The Lord our God is one Lord:

And thou shalt love the Lord thy God with all thy heart, and with all thy soul, and with all thy mind, and with all thy strength: this is the first commandment.

And the second is like, namely this, Thou shalt love thy neighbor as thyself. There is none other commandment greater than these.

There are two scriptures written by Paul which have been used against the genealogical work done by members of the Mormon Church:

Neither give heed to fables and endless genealogies, which minister questions, rather than godly edifying which is in faith: so do. (1 Timothy 1:4)

But avoid foolish questions, and genealogies, and contentions, and strivings about the law; for they are unprofitable and vain. (Titus 3:9)

Elijah the Prophet

In Malachi 4:5-6 we read the following:

Behold, I will send you Elijah the prophet before the coming of the great and dreadful day of the Lord:

And he shall turn the heart of the fathers to the children, and the heart of the children to their fathers, lest I come and smite the earth with a curse.

These verses are very important to the Mormons, for it is claimed that Elijah the Prophet appeared in the Kirtland Temple and opened the “door of salvation” for those who are dead, thus fulfilling this prophecy. In the Introduction to vol. 2 of the History of the Church the following appears: “The work done by Elijah was to open the door of salvation for the dead.” The Mormon Apostle LeGrand Richards states:

To which church in all the world today can one go, other than The Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints, and be told of Elijah’s coming in fulfillment of this prophecy? His coming is of the utmost importance in the sight of God . . .

When the keys of this dispensation for the turning of the heart of the fathers to the children, and the heart of the children to their fathers, had been committed, by Elijah, into the hands of Joseph Smith and Oliver Cowdery, they proceeded to explain the new and strange doctrine of baptism for the dead to their associates and the membership of the Church. They made it plain that the children here upon the earth can be baptized for their loved ones who have passed away without enjoying this privilege. The knowledge of this great truth has caused the “heart of the children” to turn “to their fathers,” and the children to seek out their genealogy so they can be baptized for their kindred dead. (A Marvelous Work and a Wonder, 1957 ed., pp. 169, 171; 1979 ed., pp. 165, 167)

Upon careful examination we find that verses 5 and 6 of the 4th chapter of Malachi could not apply to an appearance of Elijah in the Kirtland Temple because the Bible says that this prophecy was fulfilled in Christ’s day. In fact, Jesus himself said that it was fulfilled. In order to understand the words of Jesus we must understand that the name Elias is the Greek word for the Hebrew name Elijah. Any good dictionary has this information in it, but a person does not have to consult a dictionary to find this information. The Bible itself proves this to be true. James tells us that Elias prayed and it rained not for the space of three years and six months (James 5:17), but 1 Kings 17:1 makes it clear that it was Elijah, thus proving that Elijah and Elias are two names for the same person. Elijah is the Old Testament name and Elias is the New Testament name, just the same as Noe is the New Testament name for Noah of the Old Testament (see 1 Peter 3:20). Therefore, any time Elijah is mentioned in the New Testament he is called Elias. With this thought in mind we can see that the prophecy of the coming of Elijah was fulfilled in John the Baptist. Jesus said:

And from the days of John the Baptist until now the kingdom of heaven suffereth violence, and the violent take it by force.

For all the prophets and the law prophesied until John.

And if ye will receive it, this is Elias [or Elijah], which was to come. (Matthew 11:12-14)

Matthew 17:10-13 makes it even clearer that the prophecy concerning the coming of Elijah has already been fulfilled in John the Baptist:

And his disciples asked him, saying, Why then say the scribes that Elias must first come?

And Jesus answered and said unto them, Elias truly shall first come and restore all things.

But I say unto you, that Elias [or Elijah] is come already, and they knew him not, but have done unto him whatsoever they listed, Likewise shall also the Son of man suffer of them.

Then the disciples understood that he spake unto them of John the Baptist.

Verse 6 of the 4th chapter of Malachi contains this information concerning Elijah: “And he shall turn the heart of the fathers to the children, and the heart of the children to their fathers, lest I come and smite the earth with a curse.”

The Mormon leaders claim that this prophecy was fulfilled in their temple work; however, the Bible makes it clear that this prophecy has been fulfilled by John the Baptist. In Luke 1:13 and 17 we read:

But the angel said unto him, . . . thou shalt call his name John. . . .

And he shall go before him in the spirit and power of Elias [or Elijah], to turn the hearts of the fathers to the children, and the disobedient to the wisdom of the just; to make ready a people prepared for the Lord.

Now that we know that Elias is the New Testament name for Elijah, we can certainly see that Joseph Smith made a serious mistake when he claimed that he saw both Elias and Elijah in the Kirtland Temple. In the Doctrine and Covenants 110:12-13 we read:

After this, Elias appeared, and committed the dispensation of the gospel of Abraham, . . .

After this vision had closed, another great and glorious vision burst upon us; for Elijah the prophet, who was taken to heaven without tasting death, stood before us, . . .

It is interesting to note that Joseph Smith made the same mistake in Section 27 of the Doctrine and Covenants, for he spoke of Elias and Elijah as two separate persons. Joseph Smith also made the same mistake concerning the Prophet Isaiah. Esaias is the New Testament name for Isaiah; however, Joseph Smith spoke of Isaiah and Esaias as two separate people (see Doctrine and Covenants 76:100).

All in Vain?

Perhaps the most embarrassing thing to the Mormon Church concerning the doctrine of baptism for the dead is the Book of Mormon itself. The Book of Mormon is supposed to contain the “fulness of the everlasting Gospel.” In the Doctrine and Covenants 42:12 we read:

And again, the elders, priests, and teachers of this church shall teach the principles of my gospel, which are in the Bible and the Book of Mormon, in the which is the fulness of the gospel.

Joseph Smith said the angel told him that “the fulness of the everlasting gospel was contained in it [the Book of Mormon], as delivered by the Savior to the ancient inhabitants;” (Pearl of Great Price, Joseph Smith—History 1:34).

Even though the Book of Mormon is supposed to contain the fulness of the gospel, it never mentions the doctrine of baptism for the dead, not even once! The word “baptism” appears 25 times in the Book of Mormon. The word “baptize” appears 28 times. The word “baptized” appears 85 times, and the word “baptizing” appears 6 times, but the doctrine of baptism for the dead is not even mentioned once.

The excuse that the doctrine of baptism for the dead was removed from the Bible certainly would not prove true in the case of the Book of Mormon. The Catholics never had the Book of Mormon and therefore they could not have removed it.

Actually, the Book of Mormon condemns the very ideas that lead to the practice of baptism for the dead. It plainly indicates that there is no chance for a person to repent after death if he has known the gospel and has rejected it. In Alma 34:33-35 we read:

And now, as I said unto you before, as ye have had so many witnesses, therefore, I beseech of you that ye do not procrastinate the day of your repentance until the end; for after this day of life, which is given us to prepare for eternity, behold, if we do not improve our time while in this life, then cometh the night of darkness wherein there can be no labor performed.

Ye cannot say, when ye are brought to that awful crisis, that I will repent, that I will return to my God. Nay, ye cannot say this; for that same spirit which doth possess your bodies at the time that ye go out of this life, that same spirit will have power to possess your body in that eternal world.

For behold, if ye have procrastinated the day of your repentance even until death, behold, ye have become subjected to the spirit of the devil, and he doth seal you his; therefore, the Spirit of the Lord hath withdrawn from you, and hath no place in you, and the devil hath all power over you; and this is the final state of the wicked. (Book of Mormon, Alma 34:33-35)

Thus we can plainly see from these words that are found in the Book of Mormon that those who rejected the gospel in this life will never have another chance to receive it. Therefore, baptism would avail them nothing. Those who have received the gospel in this life need no work done for them. This leaves only little children and those who have never had a chance to accept the gospel. The Book of Mormon states that little children are saved without baptism: “Wherefore, if little children could not be saved without baptism, these must have gone to an endless hell.” (Moroni 8:13)

The Book of Mormon also teaches that those who have died without the law need no baptism:

For behold that all little children are alive in Christ, and also all they that are without the law. For the power of redemption cometh on all them that have no law; wherefore, he that is not condemned, or he that is under no condemnation, cannot repent; and unto such baptism availeth nothing— (Moroni 8:22)

Therefore, according to the Book of Mormon, there is no class of people that baptism for the dead could help. Those who have not had the law need no baptism, therefore, it would be a waste of time to search out their genealogies and be baptized for them. Those who have heard and rejected the gospel do not have another chance for repentance, therefore, baptism for the dead could not help them. There is no one, then, that baptism for the dead could help. Millions of dollars that could be used to help and save the living are spent in doing work for the dead, which, according to the Book of Mormon, is all in vain.

Certainly the fact that the Book of Mormon does not mention baptism for the dead should prove to a Mormon that it is a false doctrine. Truly, it is going beyond the teachings of Christ. Since the Book of Mormon claims to contain the fulness of the gospel and does not even mention baptism for the dead we can conclude that it is a false doctrine. When a glass is full of water it can contain no more, and since baptism for the dead is not found in what purports to be the “fulness of the gospel” we can only conclude that it is no part of the gospel. In the Book of Mormon we read:

And whoso shall declare more or less than this, and establish it for my doctrine, the same cometh of evil, and is not built upon my rock; . . . and the gates of hell stand open to receive such when the floods come and the winds beat upon them. (Book of Mormon, 3 Nephi 11:40)

Temple Marriage

The Mormon Church teaches that it is necessary for a person to be married or sealed in the Temple so that he can obtain the highest exaltation in the hereafter. This work is done for both the living and the dead. The doctrine of Temple Marriage comes from Section 132 of the Doctrine and Covenants. This is a revelation given to Joseph Smith on July 12, 1843. Joseph Fielding Smith, the tenth President of the Church, made these statements:

If you want salvation in the fullest, that is exaltation in the kingdom of God, so that you may become his sons and his daughters, you have got to go into the temple of the Lord and receive these holy ordinances which belong to that house, which cannot be had elsewhere. (Doctrines of Salvation, vol. 2, p. 44)

It fills my heart with sadness when I see in the paper the name of a daughter or a son of members of this Church, and discover that she or he is going to have a ceremony and be married outside of the temple of the Lord, because I realize what it means, that they are cutting themselves off from exaltation in the kingdom of God.

Sorrow in resurrection if no eternal marriage. These young people who seem to be so happy now, when they rise in the resurrection—and find themselves in the condition in which they will find themselves—then there will be weeping, and wailing, and gnashing of teeth, and bitterness of soul; . . . (Ibid., p. 60)

On page 61 of the same book, the following statement appears: “Civil marriage makes servants in eternity.” On page 62, this statement appears: “Celestial marriage makes Gods in eternity.”

The Mormon leaders teach that those who marry in the temple will have children forever. Bruce R. McConkie, of the First Council of Seventy, explains:

Those who gain eternal life (exaltation) also gain eternal lives, meaning that in the resurrection they have eternal “increase,” “a continuation of the seeds,” a “continuation of the lives.” Their spirit progeny will “continue as innumerable as the stars; or, if ye were to count the sand upon the seashore ye could not number them.” (Doctrine & Covenants 131:1-4; 132:19-25, 30, 55)

“Except a man and his wife enter into an everlasting covenant and be married for eternity, while in this probation, by the power and authority of the holy priesthood,” the Prophet says, “they will cease to increase when they die; that is, they will not have any children after the resurrection.” (Mormon Doctrine, 1966, p. 238)

President Joseph Fielding Smith states: “What is eternal life? It is to have ‘a continuation of the seeds forever and ever’” (Doctrines of Salvation, vol. 2, p. 9). On page 73 of the same volume, President Smith says: “Restrictions will be placed upon those who enter the terrestrial and testial kingdoms, and even those in the celestial kingdom who do not get the exaltation; changes will be made in their bodies to suit their condition; and there will be no marrying or giving in marriage, nor living together of men and women, because of these restrictions.”

Mormon theology teaches that even God Himself has a wife and that in the pre-existence we lived as His sons and daughters. Milton R. Hunter, of the First Council of the Seventy makes this statement:

Jesus is man’s spiritual brother. We dwelt with Him in the spirit world as members of that large society of eternal intelligences, which included our heavenly parents . . . (The Gospel Through the Ages, 1958, p. 21)

The Mormon authorities teach that it is impossible for a person to receive the highest exaltation without temple marriage. Milton R. Hunter remarked:

Marriage is not only a righteous institution, but obedience to this law is absolutely necessary in order to obtain the highest exaltation in the Kingdom of God. (The Gospel Through the Ages, p. 119)

Non-Mormon writers have stated that the Apostle Paul was probably not married, but Bruce R. McConkie, of the First Council of Seventy, states: “Paul himself was married. Of this there is no question” (Mormon Doctrine, 1966, p. 119). Some of the early Mormon leaders taught that Jesus was married, but there is not much said on this subject today.

If the Mormon doctrine of “sealing” were true we would expect to find evidence that Jesus was married in the temple. No such evidence has been found. Dr. Hugh Nibley states:

5. Before deciding whether Jesus was a polygamist we would have to know whether he was married. If he was that information has been withheld. Some of the recently discovered early Christian writings from Egypt imply very clearly that he was married, but of course they don't prove it, since their authority has yet to be determined. I know of no official teaching of the Church to the effect that Jesus was a polygamist. There are all sorts of things we don't know about Jesus, and this is one of them. (Letter by Hugh Nibley to Morris Reynolds, May 12, 1966)

If the doctrine of eternal marriage was known by the early church, we would expect to find it mentioned many times throughout the Bible. Instead, however, we do not find it mentioned once in the entire Bible. In fact, Jesus seems to have taught just the opposite:

And Jesus answering said unto them, The children of this world marry, and are given in marriage: But they which shall be accounted worthy to obtain that world, and the resurrection from the dead, neither marry, nor are given in marriage: Neither can they die any more: for they are equal unto the angels; and are the children of God, being the children of the resurrection. (Luke 20:34-36)

While Mormon apologists have a hard time explaining the fact that the Bible does not support the doctrine of temple marriage, they are faced with an even greater problem when they turn to the Book of Mormon. The Book of Mormon, which is supposed to contain the “fulness of the gospel,” does not contain even one passage to support the doctrine of temple marriage!

President Joseph Fielding Smith feels that the early Christians “received their endowments,” but he admits that they did not have a temple:

The saints of the primitive Christian Church did not have access to a temple. The temple in Jerusalem was the only temple, and it had fallen into the hands of unbelievers—wicked men—and therefore those members of the Church in that dispensation could not perform this labor for dead in the temple. Therefore all ordinances they performed for the dead had to be performed elsewhere. (Doctrines of Salvation, vol. 2, p. 169)

The Mormon Apostle LeGrand Richards frankly admits that Temple Marriage did not come from the Bible:

This glorious principle of eternal marriage did not come to the Prophet Joseph Smith by reading the Bible, but through the revelations of the Lord to him. (A Marvelous Work and a Wonder, 1966, p. 195)

Temple Marriage or sealing was, like many other doctrines, not part of the original Mormon faith. The first edition of the Doctrine and Covenants, published in 1835, condemned such a teaching. On page 251 of the 1835 edition of the Doctrine and Covenants, we read as follows:

1 . . . we believe, that all marriages in this church of Christ of Latter Day Saints, should be solemnized in a public meeting, or feast, prepared for that purpose: and that the solemnization should be performed by a presiding high priest, high priest, bishop, elder, or priest, not even prohibiting those persons who are desirous to get married, by other authority. . . .

4 All legal contracts of marriage made before a person is baptized into this church, should be held sacred and fulfilled.

This section on marriage was so diametrically opposed to the later teachings of the church, that it finally had to be completely removed from the Doctrine and Covenants. It was removed from the 1876 edition when the revelation on plural marriage and sealing was put in. Joseph Fielding Smith makes these statements concerning the removal of the section on marriage:

At this conference two other articles were also received, read, approved, and ordered to be printed in the Doctrine and Covenants, one on marriage and the other on laws and government. These two articles appeared in each edition of the Doctrine and Covenants from the first edition in 1835, until 1876. . . .

Why article on marriage was deleted. In the days of Nauvoo, the Lord gave Joseph Smith a revelation on marriage; that revelation appears under date of July 12, 1843. . . . It would not have been consistent to have allowed that article on marriage to stay in when it contradicted the revelation given to the Prophet Joseph Smith, so they took it out, and very properly. That is a matter of history that we ought to be familiar with.

False teachings of article on marriage. I want to read from this article on marriage to show you that it is not a revelation and could not be: “According to the custom of all civilized nations, marriage is regulated by laws and ceremonies; therefore, we believe that all marriages in this Church of Christ of Latter-day Saints should be solemnized in a public meeting or feast prepared for that purpose,”—(I do not believe that at all. We solemnize marriages in the temple of the Lord, at an altar. We do not have a crowd, and it is not a feast.)—“And that the solemnization should be performed by a presiding high priest, high priest, bishop, elder, or priest, not even prohibiting those persons who are desirous to get married, of being married by other authority.”

I do not believe that. I believe every marriage in this Church should be performed by a high priest who is appointed by the one who holds the keys to perform that ceremony for time and eternity, at the altar in the house of the Lord, and it ought not to be performed anywhere else. . . .

So it would be inconsistent, I say, to keep that article in here, when the revelation known as section 132 came to the Prophet Joseph Smith and was added to the revelations in the Doctrine and Covenants. (Doctrines of Salvation, vol. 3, pp. 194-197)

Connected With Polygamy

The revelation which contains the information concerning Temple Marriage is also the revelation which contains the teaching of polygamy—i.e., Section 132 of the Doctrine and Covenants. Therefore, polygamy and Temple Marriage stand or fall together. Charles Penrose, who was later sustained as First Counselor in the First Presidency, made this perfectly clear in a conference at Centerville, Utah:

Elder Charles W. Penrose spoke a short time . . . He showed that the revelation that had been the subject of attention was [the] only one published on Celestial Marriage, and if the doctrine of plural marriage was repudiated so must the glorious principle of marriage for eternity, the two being indissolubly interwoven with each other. (Millennial Star, vol. 45, p. 454)

This statement by Charles Penrose certainly makes it clear that a person cannot believe in the doctrine of Temple Marriage without also believing in polygamy. The following appeared in the Millennial Star, vol. 15, page 226: “We cannot be married to our husbands for eternity, without subscribing to the law that admits a plurality of wives.”

The Mormon Apostle Orson Pratt stated:

. . . if plurality of marriage is not true or in other words, if a man has no divine right to marry two wives or more in this world, then marriage for eternity is not true, and your faith is all vain, and all the sealing ordinances and powers, pertaining to marriages for eternity are vain, worthless, good for nothing; for as sure as one is true the other also must be true. (Journal of Discourses, vol. 21, p. 296)

While the Mormon people no longer are allowed to practice polygamy, they have not repudiated the doctrine. They still teach that polygamy is practiced in heaven. The Mormon writer John J. Stewart makes it very clear that plural marriage is still an “integral part of LDS scripture.” In his book Brigham Young and His Wives, Copyright 1961, Mr. Stewart states:

The Church has never, and certainly will never, renounce this doctrine. The revelation on plural marriage is still an integral part of LDS scriptures and always will be. If a woman, sealed to her husband for time and eternity, precedes her husband in death, it is his privilege to marry another also for time and eternity, providing that he is worthy of doing so. Consider, for instance, the case of President Joseph Fielding Smith of the Council of the Twelve, one of the greatest men upon the earth . . . After the death of his first wife President Joseph Fielding Smith married another, and each of these good women are sealed to him for time and eternity. (Brigham Young and His Wives, p. 14)

Joseph Fielding Smith, the tenth President of the Mormon Church, makes this comment concerning his “wives”:

I get a great deal of comfort out of the thought that if I am faithful and worthy of an exaltation, my father will be my father, . . . and my wives will be mine in eternity. I don’t know how some other people feel, but that is a glorious thought to me. That helps to keep me sober. (Doctrines of Salvation, vol. 2, p. 67)

While Mormon men are allowed more than one wife in heaven, a woman can have but one husband. President Joseph Fielding Smith stated:

When a man and a woman are married in the temple for time and all eternity, and then the man dies and the woman marries another man, she can be married to him for time only.

When a man marries a woman who was married previously to her husband in the temple but who has not died, he does so, or should, with his eyes open. If the children are born to this woman and her “time” husband, he has no claim upon those children. They go with the mother. This is the law. Certainly a man cannot in reason expect to take another man’s wife, after that man is dead, and rear a family by her and then claim the children.

If he wants a family of his own, then he should marry a wife that he can have in eternity. (Doctrines of Salvation, vol. 2, pp. 78-79)

At one time Brigham Young became so zealous to establish polygamy that he declared that a man who would not enter into polygamy would have his wife taken from him in the resurrection and given to another:

Now, where a man in this church says, “I don’t want but one wife, I will live my religion with one,” he will perhaps be saved in the Celestial kingdom; but when he gets there he will not find himself in possession of any wife at all. He has had a talent that he has hid up. He will come forward and say, “Here is that which thou gavest me, I have not wasted it, and here is the one talent,” and he will not enjoy it, but it will be taken and given to those who have improved the talents they received, and he will find himself without any wife, and he will remain single forever and ever. . . . I recollect a sister conversing with Joseph Smith on this subject. She told him: “Now don’t talk to me; when I get into the celestial kingdom, if I ever do get there, I shall request the privilege of being a ministering angel; that is the labor that I wish to perform. I don’t want any companion in that world; and if the Lord will make me a ministering angel, it is all I want.” Joseph said, “Sister, you talk very foolishly, you do not know what you will want.” He then said to me: “Here, Brother Brigham, you seal this lady to me.” I sealed her to him. This was my own sister according to the flesh. Now, sisters, do not say, “I do not want a husband when I get up in the resurrection.” . . . If in the resurrection you really want to be single and alone, and live so forever and ever, and be made servants, while others receive the highest order of intelligence and are bringing worlds into existence, you can have the privilege. They who will be exalted cannot perform all the labor, they must have servants and you can be servants to them. (Deseret News, September 17, 1873)

Sealing in Spite of Sin

The Doctrine and Covenants 132:26 clearly teaches that after a man is sealed in the temple, he can commit any sin except murder, and still come forth in the first resurrection to enter into exaltation.

The only stipulation being that he must be destroyed in the flesh and turned over to the buffetings of Satan. However, after this is over he will rise in the first resurrection to his exaltation. Verse 26 reads as follows:

Verily, verily, I say unto you, if a man marry a wife according to my word, and they are sealed by the Holy Spirit of promise, according to mine appointment, and he or she shall commit any sin or transgression of the new and everlasting covenant whatever, and all manner of blasphemies, and if they commit no murder wherein they shed innocent blood, yet they shall come forth in the first resurrection, and enter into their exaltation; but they shall be destroyed in the flesh, and shall be delivered unto the buffetings of Satan unto the day of redemption, saith the Lord God.

Joseph Smith told William Clayton that “nothing but the unpardonable sin can prevent you from inheriting eternal life for you are sealed up by the power of the priesthood unto eternal life, having taken the step necessary for that purpose . . . The unpardonable sin is to shed innocent blood, or be accessory thereto” (History of the Church, vol. 5, p. 391).

The Apostle Orson Pratt said that “the Saint who has been sealed unto eternal life and falls into transgression and does not repent, but dies in his sin, will be afflicted and tormented after he leaves this vale of tears until the day of redemption; but having been sealed with the spirit of promise through the ordinances of the house of God, those things which have been sealed upon his head will be realized by him in the morning of the resurrection” (Journal of Discourses, vol. 2, p. 260).

To say that once a person has received certain temple ceremonies he can live like he pleases and yet receive salvation is not only shocking to the moral sense, but also contrary to the teachings of both the Bible and the Book of Mormon. In the Book of Mormon we read:

And he that endureth not unto the end, the same is he that is also hewn down and cast into the fire, from whence they can no more return, because of the justice of the Father. (Book of Mormon, 3 Nephi 27:17)

And no unclean thing can enter into his kingdom; therefore nothing entereth into his rest save it be those who have washed their garments in my blood, because of their faith, and the repentance of all their sins, and their faithfulness unto the end. (Ibid., 3 Nephi 27:19)

In direct contradiction to these teachings the Mormon Apostle Orson Pratt said:

If we transgress, we shall have to suffer for that transgression here in the flesh; and after we lay our bodies down, we shall suffer in the spirit-world, until we have suffered enough for our sins, unless we have shed innocent blood. . . . if we should be cut off in the flesh and sent down to be punished in the spirit-world, and there be buffeted by those spirits, and still retain our memories, we can say these sufferings will not endure for ever, but we shall enjoy all that has been put upon our heads, and, through the Priesthood, and signs and tokens that have been revealed, come forth in the first resurrection, and pass by the sentinels and the Gods that stand to keep the way to eternal lives. And if there be thrones, dominions, principalities, and powers, we shall come in possession of them, for this is the promise of the Almighty. (Journal of Discourses, vol. 8, p. 106)

A Secret Ceremony

While the revelation commanding Temple Mormonism is printed in the Doctrine and Covenants, the ritual itself is supposed to be kept secret. Nevertheless, a number of Mormons became alienated from the Mormon Church and exposed the ceremony. Several of these accounts have been printed. Because the ritual is kept secret many false impressions and charges of gross immorality have been circulated. On February 18, 1846, the Warsaw Signal charged that those who participated in the ritual were “in a state of nudity” throughout the ceremony. In response to this article a woman who had been through the endowments wrote a letter to the editor in which she stated that the ceremony had been misrepresented:

Mr. Sharp: —Dear Sir: —I discover by your paper, in what you have published in regard to the Mormon endowments, . . . that you have been wrongly informed . . .

I went into this pretended holy operation, . . . We were first received past the Guard into a private room...this was the room of preparation or purification—We were divested of all our apparel, and in a state of perfect nudity we were washed from head to foot,—a blanket was then thrown about our persons, and then commencing at the head we were anointed from head to foot with sweet oil scented (I think) with lavender. We were then clothed in white robes. All this was done by sisters in the church—none others were present—it is false to say that men and women are admitted together in an indecent manner. We were then conducted into a room called the Garden of Eden; . . . After a considerable ceremony, which I do not recollect much of, . . . a very dandy-like fellow appeared with a black cap on, that had a long tail attached to it; he . . . induced some of our sisters to eat of the “forbidden fruit.” Soon after the voice of the Lord appeared again in the garden; . . . The fellow in the black cap presents himself before the Lord... The Lord pronounces a curse upon him—he gets down upon his belly and crawls off. . . . We were then presented with aprons, . . . we were passed into another room, . . . This was called the Terrestrial Kingdom: . . . After a considerable parade and ceremony, we passed into another room, or Celestial Kingdom. Here I saw . . . Brigham Young, with a white crown upon his head, and as I have since been told, representing God himself. We passed this room without much ceremony into another. . . . we took upon ourselves oaths and obligations not to reveal the secrets of the priesthood. . . . In one place I was presented with a new name, which I was not to reveal to any living creature, save the man to whom I should be sealed for eternity, . . . and from all that I can gather, all the females had the same name given them, but we are not allowed to reveal it to each other, . . . I have forgotten a part of the penalties. In one place something was spoken to me which I do not recollect—the meaning was “marrow in the bone;” the token was a firm hold of the hand, pressing the finger nails firmly into the wrist of the right hand. . . .

Now, sir, this is the substance of the Mormon endowment. . . . Yours, EMELINE.
(Warsaw Signal, April 15, 1846, p. 2)

Increase McGee Van Dusen and his wife exposed the temple ritual in 1847. Their account was reprinted many times. Many other accounts were printed during the nineteenth century. Wesley P. Walters has compiled a list of published accounts of the temple ceremonies which we have printed in The Mormon Kingdom, vol. 1, pp. 170-172.

Just after the turn of the century many Mormons were questioned concerning the temple ritual in the “Proceedings Before The Committee On Privileges And Elections Of The United States Senate In The Matter Of The Protests Against The Right Of Hon. Reed Smoot, A Senator From The State Of Utah, To Hold His Seat.” This testimony was printed by the United States Government in four volumes. We will have more to say about this later. On February 12, 1906, the Salt Lake Tribune published the temple ceremony. In 1931 W. M. Paden published a pamphlet entitled, Temple Mormonism—Its Evolution, Ritual and Meaning. This is supposed to be one of the most accurate accounts of the ceremony. In the last few years John L. Smith and William J. Whalen have published accounts of the ritual.

Actually, we can get some idea of what goes on in the Temple simply by searching through Mormon publications. The fact that the Mormons receive secret words, signs and grips in the Temple which they feel are necessary for a person to gain exaltation in Heaven is obvious from several statements made by the Mormon leaders. According to the History of the Church, Joseph Smith himself made this statement:

Sunday, May 1, 1842.—I preached in the grove, on the keys of the kingdom, charity, &c. The keys are certain signs and words by which false spirits and personages may be detected from true, which cannot be revealed to the Elders till the Temple is completed. . . . There are signs in heaven, earth and hell; the Elders must know them all, to be endowed with power, to finish their work and prevent imposition. The devil knows many signs, but does not know the sign of the Son of Man, or Jesus. (History of the Church, vol. 4, p. 608)

Brigham Young, the second President of the Mormon Church, made this statement:

Your endowment is, to receive all those ordinances in the House of the Lord, which are necessary for you, after you have departed this life, to enable you to walk back to the presence of the Father, passing the angels who stand as sentinels, being enabled to give them the key words, the signs and tokens, pertaining to the Holy Priesthood, and gain your eternal exaltation in spite of earth and hell. (Journal of Discourses, vol. 2, p. 31)

Joseph Fielding Smith, the tenth President of the Mormon Church, states:

If you would become a son or a daughter of God and an heir of the kingdom, then you must go to the house of the Lord... Sons and daughters have access to the home where he dwells, and you cannot receive that access until you go to the temple. Why? Because you must receive certain key words as well as make covenants by which you are able to enter. If you try to get into the house, and the door is locked, how are you going to enter, if you haven't your key? You get your key in the temple, which will admit you. (Doctrines of Salvation, 1960, vol. 2, p. 40)

The fact that there are washings and anointings is proven by a statement Brigham Young made on December 26, 1845:

Elders Heber C. Kimball, Orson Pratt and I were present in the Temple this morning . . . Every man that comes in, is washed and anointed by good men . . . (History of the Church, vol. 7, pp. 552-53)

Alvin R. Dyer, who served in the First Presidency under David O. McKay, stated that “a new name” is given to those who go through the endowment ceremony:

I call your attention now to the washing and anointing that you received in the Temple. . . . When you went into the washing and anointing room where you were washed and anointed with water and oil, you were given a new name, and you were promised that someday you would be called up to be a king and priest; or a queen and priestess. Don't ever suppose that that is for this life. It is not. It is for the next life, and the Lord is preparing today the rulers that will be administrators of these degrees of Glory after the Spirit World. (Speech by Alvin R. Dyer, Missionary Conference, Oslo, Norway, March 18, 1961)

One of the most revealing statements by Brigham Young about the temple endowment was recorded in the diary of L. John Nuttall:

When we got our washings and anointing under the hands of the Prophet Joseph at Nauvoo, we had only one room to work in, with the exception of a little side room or office where we were washed and anointed, had our garment placed upon us and received our new name; and after he had performed these ceremonies, he gave the key-words, signs, tokens, and penalties. Then after, we went into the large room over the store in Nauvoo, Joseph Smith divided up the room the best that he could, hung up the veil, marked it, gave us our instructions as we passed along from one department to another, giving us signs, tokens, penalties, with the key-words pertaining to those signs. And after we had got through, Brother Joseph turned to me and said, “Brother Brigham, this is not arranged right, but we have done the best we could under the circumstances in which we are placed, and I want you to take this matter in hand and organize and systematize all these ceremonies with the signs, tokens, penalties, and key-words.” I did so and each time I got something more so that when we went through the Temple at Nauvoo I understood and knew how to place them there. We had our ceremonies pretty correct. (Statement by Brigham Young, recorded in the "Diary of L. John Nuttall," February 7, 1877, as quoted in God, Man, and the Universe, by Hyrum L. Andrus, 1968, p. 334)

As we carefully examine this statement we find that Brigham Young mentioned washings, anointings, garments, the new name, key-words, signs, tokens and penalties. He also stated that there was a "veil" with certain marks on it.

According to a "Price List Issued by The General Board of Relief Society" on June 1, 1968, those who desired to go through the Temple must have the following "Articles for Temple Wear":

MEN			WOMEN
Robe	Garments	Trousers	Robe	Garments	Dress
Cap	(old style)	Shirt	Veil	(old style)	Slip
Apron	Shoes or heavy	Tie and Belt	Apron	Shoes or heavy	Hose
Shield	moccasins	Hose	Shield	moccasins

Those who have been through the Temple are required to wear "garments" for the rest of their lives, although most Mormons do not wear the "old style" garments except in the Temple. William J. Whalen says:

The devout Mormon who has received his "endowments" in the temple will wear sacred temple undergarments at all times. Resembling a union suit, now abbreviated at the knees, the undergarments are worn by both men and women, awake and sleeping. It is said that older Mormons refuse to take off these garments completely even while taking a bath; they will hang one leg out of the tub so that they will never lose contact with the garments. Mystic signs are embroidered on them to remind the wearers of their temple obligations. (The Latter-day Saints in the Modern Day World, 1964, pp. 18-19)

On page 168 of the same book, William J. Whalen says that "the garment was a long union suit of muslin or linen with the specified cabalistic marks. It has been abbreviated in recent years especially in the interests of feminine fashions. The full-length garment is still worn in the temple."

The fact that the garments have been abbreviated is very interesting, for the early Mormon leaders taught that they could not be changed. Joseph F. Smith, the sixth President of the Mormon Church, made this statement before the changes were made:

The Lord has given unto us garments of the holy priesthood, and you know what that means. And yet there are those of us who mutilate them, in order that we may follow the foolish, vain and (permit me to say) indecent practices of the world. In order that such people may imitate the fashions, they will not hesitate to mutilate that which should be held by them the most sacred of all things in the world, next to their own virtue, next to their own purity of life. They should hold these things that God has given unto them sacred, unchanged and unaltered from the very pattern in which God gave them. Let us have the moral courage to stand against the opinions of fashion, and especially where fashion compels us to break a covenant and so commit a grievous sin. (The Improvement Era, vol. 9:813, as quoted in Temples of the Most High, p. 276)

The following statement by a woman who had been through the endowment ritual was reprinted in the Salt Lake Tribune on February 12, 1906:

She [the temple worker] then told me to put on my garments. These are made in one piece. On the right breast is a square, on the left a compass, in the center a small hole, and on the knee a large hole, which is called the "stone." We were told that as long as we kept them on no harm could befall us, and that when we changed them we were not to take them all off at once but slip out a limb at a time and immediately dive into the clean ones. The neck was never to be cut low, or the sleeves short, as that would be patterning after the fashion of the gentiles.

In 1918 the First Presidency of the Church sent a message to the Bishops in which the following appears:

FIRST: The garments worn by those who receive endowments must be white, and of the approved pattern; they must not be altered or mutilated, and are to be worn as intended, down to the wrist and ankles, and around the neck.

Please inform all to whom you issue recommends that these requirements are imperative, . . . The Saints should know that the pattern of endowment garments was revealed from heaven, and that the blessings promised in connection with wearing them will not be realized if any unauthorized change is made in their form, or in the manner of wearing them. (Messages of the First Presidency, by J.R. Clark, 1971, vol. 5, p. 110)

Although the Mormon leaders vigorously maintained that the "garments" must be "worn as intended, down to the wrist and ankles, and around the neck," and that they could not be altered from "the very pattern in which God gave them," women's fashions caused the arms and legs to be shortened and the neck line to be lowered. The old style which is worn in the temple still comes down to the wrists and the ankles. On June 14, 1923, the First Presidency of the Mormon Church sent out a message which contained the following statements:

Dear Brethren:

For some time past the First Presidency and Council of Twelve have had under consideration the propriety of permitting certain modifications in the temple garment, with the following result:

After careful and prayerful consideration it was unanimously decided that the following modifications may be permitted, and a garment of the following style be worn by those Church members who wish to adopt it, namely:

- (1) Sleeve to elbow.
- (2) Leg just below knee.
- (3) Buttons instead of strings.
- (4) Collar eliminated.
- (5) Crotch closed.

It may be observed that no fixed pattern of the temple garment has ever been given, and that the present style of garment differs very materially from that in use in the early history of the Church, at which time a garment without collar and with buttons was frequently used.

It is the mind of the First Presidency and Council of Twelve that this modified garment may be used by those who desire to adopt it, without violating any covenant they make in the House of the Lord, and with a clear conscience, . . .

It should be clearly understood that this modified garment does not supercede the approved garment now in use, that either of these patterns may be worn, as Church members prefer, without being considered unorthodox, and those using either will not be out of harmony with the order of the Church. . . .

Will you kindly advise the Bishops of your Stake of these changes, being careful to give the matter no unnecessary publicity.

This letter is not to pass from your hands, nor are copies to be furnished to any other person.

Your Brethren in the Gospel,

[s] H J Grant
Charles W. Penrose
A. W. Ivins
First Presidency

Note:

We send you this copy of a letter addressed to Stake Presidents for your personal information, and to be used by you in connection with the instructions contained in it. (Letter by the First Presidency of the Mormon Church, dated June 14, 1923, typed copy)

Such a change could not be made without the gentiles noticing it. The Salt Lake Tribune reported:

Coming not as an order, nor as a rule to be rigidly enforced, but rather permissive in character, is a recent outgiving of the first presidency. . . . It concerns the garments worn by members of the church who have been married in the temple, . . .

While minor modifications of the temple garment, it is said, have been made at various times during past years, the latest order in permission is regarded by younger members of the church as most liberal and acceptable. Among the older membership the optional change is variously received. Some of the pioneer stock look upon any deviation from the old order as a departure from what they had always regarded as an inviolable rule. Others of long standing in the church accept the change as a progressive move . . .

In the old days the temple garment was made of plain, unbleached cotton cloth. Unbleached linen was as far afield in “finery” as the devotee was permitted to go. No buttons were used on the garment. Tape tie-strings took their place. The garment itself was uncomfortably large and baggy. But despite these imperfections, the old-style garment is faithfully adhered to by many of the older and sincerely devout members of the church. These regard the garment as a safeguard against disease and bodily harm, and they believe that to alter either the texture of cloth or style, or to abandon the garment altogether would bring evil upon them.

One good woman of long membership in the church, hearing of the change that has recently come about, went to the church offices and uttered fervid objection. “I shall not alter my garments, even if President Grant has ordered me to do so. My garments now are made as they were when I was married in the endowment house, long before the temple was built. The pattern was revealed to the Prophet Joseph and Brother Grant has no right to change it,” she said.

Explanation was made that the first presidency had merely issued permission to those who so desired to make the modifying change; that any member of the church who preferred to adhere to the original style was at perfect liberty to do so.

President Charles W. Penrose says that modification of the garment is elective with each individual member of the church who has gone through the temple. The change in style is permitted for various good reasons, chief among which are promotion of freedom of movement in the body and cleanliness. Formerly the sleeves were long, reaching to the wrists. While doing housework the women would roll up the sleeves. If sleeves were to be rolled up they might as well be made short in the first place for convenience, it was argued. Permission to abbreviate is now given, but it is not an order . . .

Encasing the lower limbs the old-style garment reaches to the ankles and is looked upon by young members as baggy, uncomfortable and ungainly. The young of the gentler sex complained that to wear the old style with the new and finer hosiery gave the limbs a knotty appearance. It was embarrassing in view of the generally accepted sanitary shorter skirt. Permission is therefore granted by the first presidency to shorten the lower garment. Also buttons are permitted to take the place of the tie-strings.

Young men of the church, especially those who take exercise or play games at gymnasiums favor the shorter garment. The permission granted is hailed by them as a most acceptable and progressive one. Altogether, and except in few instances, the permissive modification is welcomed as a sanitary move and a change looking to the comfort and health of those who wear temple garments.

Instead of the old style, coarse, unbleached, irritating material of which temple garments were once made, the finer knitted goods, and even silks, are now used. These materials and modified styles are officially approved, but such alterations are optional with each individual, and by no means compulsory, church officials desire it understood. (The Salt Lake Tribune, June 4, 1923)

Since 1923 the temple garment has been abbreviated even more. The sleeves no longer come down to the elbow, nor do the legs hang down over the knee. The Mormon leaders now seem to put more emphasis on the importance of the marks in the garment rather than the garment itself. On August 31, 1964, the

First Presidency of the Mormon Church sent the following letter to Presidents of Stakes and Bishops of Wards:

Dear Brethren:

The calling of men into military training renders it desirable to reaffirm certain observations heretofore made in the matter of wearing the temple garment.

1. The covenants taken in the temple and attached to the wearing of garments contemplate that they will be worn at all times. . . .

2. In the early days of the Church the Lord announced that where men prevented his Saints from carrying out the commandments he had given them, the Lord would relieve the Saints from rendering obedience to the commandment, and would visit the iniquity and transgression involved in such disobedience upon the heads of those who “hindered” his work. . . .

3. Where the military regulations are of a character that “hinders,” that is, makes impossible the wearing of the regulation garments, . . . effort should be made to wear underclothing that will approach as near as may be the normal garment.

Where military regulations require the wearing of two-piece underwear, such underwear should be properly marked, as if the articles were of the normal pattern. If circumstances are such that different underwear may be turned back to the wearer from that which he sends to the laundry, then the marks should be placed on small pieces of cloth and sewed upon the underwear while being worn, then removed when the underwear is sent to the laundry, and reseed upon the underwear returned.

The wearing of the normal garment should be resumed at the earliest possible moment.

4. Every effort should be made to protect the garments from the gaze and raillery of scoffers. . . . If the scoffing became unbearable and the wearer should decide that the Lord would consider he was really “hindered” by the scoffers from wearing the garments, and if he should therefore lay them aside, then the wearer should resume the wearing of the normal garment at the earliest possible moment. . . . The wearing of the garment is the subject of direct covenant between the Lord and the covenant maker, who must determine to what extent he will keep his covenants. To break our covenants is to lose the protection and blessings promised from obedience thereto.

Sincerely yours,

The First Presidency

The Presiding Bishopric of the Church sent the following to Bishops and Stake Presidents:

Removal or Exposure of Temple Garments

The following letter was sent to bishops August 23, 1955. It is reproduced here for the information of new bishops and for more convenient reference.

Dear Brethren:

The First Presidency have suggested that we communicate with you on the subject of this letter.

It is being observed that some Latter-day Saint men and women, some of whom are presiding officers and teachers in both stake and ward positions, are removing their temple garments to wear abbreviated clothing in varying degrees when working around their homes, when traveling by auto, or camping out-of-doors. In some instances, brethren who have been through the temple are removing their shirts while mowing the lawns and performing other out-door responsibilities, thus exposing the upper garment to full view.

Such removal of the temple garment, or exposure to more or less public view, is not in keeping with its significance or its sacred purpose.

It is suggested you use your influence in encouraging Latter-day Saints to avoid these practices. . . .

Faithfully your brethren,
 THE PRESIDING BISHOPRIC
 (Signed) Bishop Joseph L. Wirthlin
 Bishop Thorpe B. Isaacson
 Bishop Carl W. Buehner

(Letter from The Presiding Bishopric, photographically reprinted in I Visited the Temple, by John L. Smith, 1966, p. 28)

Before a person can go through the endowment ritual he must have a "Temple Recommend." Below the reader will see a photograph of the "Recommend." In order to obtain this "Recommend" the applicant must be in good standing in the Mormon Church. He is supposed to be questioned by the Bishop. Below the reader will find instructions concerning this matter which were sent to "Bishops of Wards and Presidents of Stakes" by the First Presidency.

The Mormon leaders sometimes claim that "every member" of the Church can go through the temple if they live worthy lives.

This, of course, is not true, for Negroes cannot receive their endowments in the temple regardless of how they live.

As we indicated earlier, a number of accounts of the temple ritual have been published. A few years ago we reprinted W. M. Paden's Temple Mormonism. This account of the temple ceremony was originally printed in 1931. While Paden's work is essentially accurate, some changes have been made in the ceremony over the years. Since we wanted to publish the most accurate account possible, we had a couple who have done work for the dead and have been through the temple about fifty times revise Paden's work. After this a man who has been through the temple about 120 times agreed to help us. He has brought the ceremony up to date. Although the account does not include every word spoken during the ceremony, he feels that it contains all of the essential elements and that they are accurate. We published this account in 1969 in our book The Mormon Kingdom, vol. 1. Since even active Mormons, who are familiar with the temple ritual, have admitted that this account is very accurate we are reprinting it in the next chapter of this book—a few minor errors which appeared in the first printing have been corrected.

To Bishops of Wards and Presidents of Stakes:

Dear Brethren:

Recent experiences emphasize the need of greater care and attention being exercised in the issuing of recommends to the Temple. Applicants in too many cases seem to be more appreciative of going through the House of the Lord than deeply conscious of the obligations they take upon themselves by so doing.

Enclosed herewith is a copy of a recommendation for the new Temple Recommend. It includes everything which was in the old recommend and a few additional questions.

We wish particularly to call your attention to the instructions printed thereon. You will note that the obligation of the personal interview of the applicant by the Bishop will now take the place of the "statement to be filled in by the applicant" as heretofore practiced.

Therefore, in your careful interrogation of the applicant, you will please keep in mind the following standards and principles of the Church, and others which are equally essential to worthiness to go through the Temple of the Most High:

1. Are you morally clean and worthy to enter the temple?
2. Will you and do you sustain the General Authorities of the Church, and will you live in accordance with the accepted rules and doctrines of the Church?
- 2a. Do you have any connection, in sympathy or otherwise, with any of the apostate groups or individuals who are running counter to the accepted rules and doctrines of the Church?
3. Are you a full tithe payer?
- 3a. Are you exempt from paying tithes?
4. Do you keep the Word of Wisdom?
5. Do you always wear the regulation garments?
6. Will you earnestly strive to do your duty in the Church, to attend your sacrament, priesthood, and other meetings, and to obey the rules, laws, and commandments of the Gospel?
7. Have you ever been denied a recommend to any Temple? If so, ascertain date of refusal, name of Bishop, Ward, Stake and obtain clearance from previous Bishop before issuing recommend.
8. Have you ever been divorced?

The Bishop is the "common judge in Israel" and upon him and his counselors rests the great responsibility of encouraging the membership of the Ward so to live as to be worthy of the blessings of the Temple.

As indicated on this new form, the President of the Stake will continue as heretofore to pass upon the recommendations of the Bishop.

Ever praying the Lord to guide you and inspire you in this important phase of your duties as a Bishop, we remain

Sincerely yours,

David O. McKay
Henry A. Moore
Hugh B. Brown

DIRECTIONS TO BISHOPS AND BRANCH PRESIDENTS

The recommend in this book is valid for all the Temples of the Church, and for all Ordinances. When issuing a Recommend for all ordinances for the dead only, please use only the left-hand side of the recommend. However, when the applicant is recommended for Own Endowment, Marriage, Sealing after Civil Marriage or Sealing to Parents, then both sides of this Recommend must be completed in full.

Make the recommend in triplicate. Deliver the white and buff copies to applicant to take to Stake President for his signature, retain pink copy in the book. The applicant must deliver the white and buff copies to the first temple he enters after obtaining this recommend: the white copy will be retained by the temple and will subsequently be filed in the temple in the district in which the applicant holds Church membership; the buff copy will be stamped and returned to the applicant. THE BUFF COPY, PROPERLY STAMPED, WILL THEN ADMIT THE APPLICANT TO ANY TEMPLE IN THE CHURCH.

More Changes in Temple Garments

On page 463 of this book we have a photograph of the temple garment. It came down to the wrists and ankles of those who wore it. At the time we published the 1972 edition of this book, a member was required to wear the full-length style when attending to the temple ritual but could wear an abbreviated style the rest of the time. On November 10, 1975, however, the First Presidency of the Church sent a letter to “All Temple Presidents” in which a change was made so that the abbreviated garment could be worn in the endowment ceremony:

In the future, while involved in temple ordinances, patrons will have the option of wearing either the “approved style” garment (short sleeve and knee length) or the garment with the long sleeve and long leg.

Patrons receiving their initiatory ordinances may be clothed in their own “approved style” garment.

It is suggested that temple presidents not purchase any more of the long-sleeve, long-leg garments for rental purposes.

This may be announced to all temple workers and posted on the bulletin boards in the locker rooms. Notice is going forward to Stake, Mission, and District Presidents suggesting that they notify Bishops, Branch Presidents and other priesthood leaders. No other announcement or publicity is desired.

The suggestion that “temple presidents not purchase any more of the long-sleeve, long-leg garments for rental purposes” leads to the conclusion that Mormon leaders are embarrassed by the “old style” garments and want to gradually phase them out.

In 1979, the Mormon leaders made still another change in the garments. The First Presidency of the Church instructed as follows in a letter dated December 15, 1979:

After due consideration the First Presidency and Council of the Twelve have approved and authorized the Beehive Clothing Mills to manufacture two-piece garments for both men and women. These garments will be in addition to the one-piece garments. . . . The total price for both pieces will be about the same as the price for the one-piece garment.

Change in Temple Recommend

On page 461 of this book we have a photograph of a “Temple Recommend.” According to the Mormon writer Carlfred Broderick, “the brethren have added a significant [sic] new question in the temple recommend interview: “Is there anything unholy, unnatural or worthy of repentance in your intimate relationship with your spouse?” (Dialogue: A Journal of Mormon Thought, Summer 1980, p. 70).

Blacks Now Admitted

On page 461 we stated that blacks “cannot receive their endowments in the temple regardless of how they live.” President Spencer W. Kimball’s revelation concerning blacks holding the priesthood has changed the situation so that they can now go through the temple.

Eternal Life Only for Those Who Go Through the Temple

The Bible clearly states that “whosoever believeth in him [Jesus] should not perish, but have eternal life” (John 3:15). President Spencer W. Kimball, on the other hand, claims that eternal life only comes through temple marriage:

Only through celestial marriage can one find the strait way, the narrow path. Eternal life cannot be had in any other way. The Lord was very specific and very definite in the matter of marriage. (Deseret News, Church Section, November 12, 1977)

President Lee Looked Forward to Plural Marriage

On page 457 of this book, we pointed out that after the death of his first wife Joseph Fielding Smith, the tenth President of the Church, was married to another woman for eternity. President Smith claimed that “my wives will be mine in eternity.” Harold B. Lee, the eleventh President of the Church, also remarried after his wife’s death and was planning on living plural marriage in heaven. President Lee wrote a poem in which he reflected:

My lovely Joan was sent to me;
So Joan joins Fern
That three might be, more fitted for eternity.
“O Heavenly Father, my thanks to thee”
(Deseret News 1974 Church Almanac, p. 17)

Ancestral Worship?

On page 453 we pointed out that the Mormon Church spends millions of dollars doing work for the dead. This obsession with the dead approaches very close to ancestral worship. Adney Y. Komatsu, a member of the First Quorum of Seventy in the Mormon Church, made this statement in the 146th General Conference of the church:

May I share with you this afternoon an experience that happened to a young couple who were members of the Church in Japan. . . . the couple joined with others in seeking out their ancestors and in planning to have the temple work done for them. The girl searched diligently through shrines, cemeteries, and government record offices, and was able to gather seventy-seven names. . . . As this young couple joined their family members...they displayed their book of remembrance. . . . They discussed with those relatives assembled their ancestral lines and the importance of completing the genealogical research. It was difficult for their nonmember families to understand the reasons for a Christian church teaching principles such as “ancestral worship,” for this was a Buddhist teaching and tradition. . . . Through genealogical research and through doing temple work for their progenitors, and especially with a temple now becoming available in Tokyo, members can so live that the gospel will yet be embraced by many more in the Orient. (The Ensign, May 1976, p. 102)

The Mormon Church has continued to spend vast sums of money on temples since we printed the 1972 edition of this book. On August 31, 1974, the Salt Lake Tribune gave this information about a temple built in Washington, D.C.:

. . . it is indeed marble, 288 feet high, $15 million worth, and that makes the new Washington Temple of the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints not only one of the most architecturally amazing but also one of the most expensive church edifices to rise in recent years. . . . It is the 16th temple to be built by the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints. . . .

Using figures printed in the Deseret News 1980 Church Almanac, we find that the church has spent approximately $86,000,000 on temples. Some of the temples, of course, would cost a great deal more to build today—e.g., the Salt Lake Temple is listed as follows: “Total cost of building and grounds by 1893—$3,469,118.” The Logan Temple is given a cost of only $660,749, but we know that “between $7 and $8 million” was spent for renovation (Salt Lake Tribune, February 6, 1979). It should also be noted that no cost is listed for the Mexico City Temple, and on April 3, 1980, the Salt Lake Tribune reported:

The First Presidency of the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints Wednesday announced plans to build seven new temples. . . . in Atlanta, Ga.; Buenos Aires, Argentina; Sydney, Australia; Santiago, Chile; Papeete, Tahiti; Nukunono, Tonga, and Apia, Western Samoa.

Just one year following this announcement (April 2, 1981) the Salt Lake Tribune reported:

Plans for nine temples of the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints to be built on five continents were announced Wednesday by the First Presidency. . . .

The temples will be in Chicago, Ill.; Dallas, Texas; Guatemala City, Guatemala; Lima, Peru; Frankfurt, Germany; Stockholm, Sweden; Seoul, Korea; Manila, Philippines; and Johannesburg, South Africa. . . .

At the press conference it was announced the temples, when completed, will increase the total number of temples worldwide to 37.

The Jordan River temple was dedicated in 1981. According to the Deseret News 1981 Church Almanac, page 282, this temple cost “Approximately $14,594,000.” As we think of the many millions of dollars that the church is spending on these temples—used mainly to do work for the dead—we cannot help but remember again the Book of Mormon’s claim that it is the false churches that “rob the poor because of their fine sanctuaries” (2 Nephi 28:13).

30. The Temple Ceremony

By A Temple Worker (1969 Version)

***NOTE ADDED OCTOBER 1990: On May 3, 1990, the New York Times made the startling announcement that the Mormon Church had changed some of its secret temple ceremony. The penalties, which played such a prominent part in the version printed below, have now been completely removed and other important changes have been made. In a new book entitled Evolution of the Mormon Temple Ceremony: 1842-1990, we give the complete text of the recently revised “endowment ceremony” and also show all the changes that have been made in the ritual.

In order for a member of the L.D.S. Church to enter the temple a “Temple Recommend” must be obtained. This is received by being interviewed and having the “Temple Recommend” signed by the applicant’s Bishop or Branch President and one of the Stake or Mission Presidency.

When arriving at the temple the “recommend” is shown to the attendant at the recommend desk, who checks it to make sure that it is signed correctly. He then stamps the recommend with the date that the recommend expires.

The first ceremony in the temple is that of Baptism for the Dead.

Baptism for the Dead

Brother (or Sister) _____, having been commissioned of Jesus Christ, I baptize you, for and in behalf of _____, who is dead, in the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost. Amen.

Next comes the Confirmation for the Dead.

Confirmation for the Dead

Brother (or Sister) _____, in the name of Jesus Christ, we lay our hands upon your head for and in behalf of _____, who is dead, and confirm you a member of the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints, and say unto you: Receive the Holy Ghost. Amen.

In the Salt Lake Temple there is also the Reconfirmation for the Dead.

Reconfirmation [Salt Lake Temple]

Brother (or Sister) _____, in the name of Jesus Christ, we lay our hands upon your head for and in behalf of _____, who is dead, and confirm you a member of the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints, and say unto you: Receive the Holy Ghost, and confirm upon you all your former Church and Temple blessings. Amen.

After the Baptism and Confirmation for the Dead are done, the person who is doing work for the dead is ready to be washed with water, anointed with oil and clothed in the garment of the Holy Priesthood. This is the beginning of the Endowment Ceremony.

Washing & Anointing Room for Men

For the men who go to the temple, they go to the dressing room for men known as the Washing and Anointing Room. This dressing room for men is separate from the dressing room for women. In the dressing room the man who is going through the temple for his own endowment removes all of his clothing, which he puts into a private locker. He then puts on a white piece of cloth, with a hole in the center for his head. This hangs down over the front and back of the man, but is open at the sides. This is called a shield. He goes to the area where the washings and anointings take place. If he is doing work for the dead he is ordained an Elder for the dead person.

Ordination for the Dead

Brother _____, having authority we lay our hands upon your head and confer upon you the Melchizedek Priesthood and ordain you an Elder in the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints, for and in behalf of _____, who is dead, and seal upon you every grace, gift and authority appertaining to this office in the Holy Melchizedek Priesthood, for and in his behalf, in the name of Jesus Christ. Amen.

If the man is going through the temple for his own endowment he is already an Elder. He is then directed to a booth where he waits to be washed. The temple worker there holds out his hand to take the garment the man is holding, and the man enters the booth to be washed with water.

The temple worker puts his right hand under running water and proceeds to wash the individual’s body. As he recites the ceremony the temple worker touches each part of the body mentioned in the ceremony with his fingers or hand.

Washing — of Men

Brother _____, having authority, I wash you preparatory to your receiving your anointings (for and in behalf of _____, who is dead), that you may become clean from the blood and sins of this generation. I wash your head, that your brain and your intellect may be clear and active; your ears, that you may hear the word of the Lord; your eyes, that you may see clearly and discern between truth and error; your nose, that you may smell; your lips that you may never speak guile; your neck, that it may bear up your head properly; your shoulders, that they may bear the burdens that shall be placed thereon; your back, that there may be marrow in the bones and in the spine; your breast, that it may be the receptacle of pure and virtuous principles; your vitals and bowels, that they may be healthy and strong and perform their proper functions; your arms and hands, that they may be strong and wield the sword of justice in defense of truth and virtue; your loins, that you may be fruitful and multiply and replenish the earth, that you may have joy in your posterity; your legs and feet, that you may run and not be weary, and walk and not faint.

The washing is then confirmed.

James D. Wardle in Temple Clothing

Temple Garment

Note: In 1975 LDS Church leaders changed the regulations so that a garment with “short sleeve and knee length” could be worn in the temple. It appears that the “long-sleeve, long-leg garment” will eventually be phased out (see page 461-A of this book).

James D. Wardle Demonstrates Penalties
(Penalties were removed in 1990.)

Confirmation of Washing — of Men

Brother _____, having authority, we lay our hands upon your head (for and in behalf of _____, who is dead), and seal upon you this washing, that you may become clean from the blood and sins of this generation, through your faithfulness, in the name of Jesus Christ. Amen.

Next he enters another part of the booth where there is a stool on which he sits while another temple worker dips out of a horn some oil and proceeds to anoint the individual's body.

Anointing — of Men

Brother _____, having authority, I pour this holy anointing oil upon your head (for and in behalf of _____, who is dead), and anoint you preparatory to your becoming a king and a priest unto the Most High God, hereafter to rule and reign in the House of Israel forever. I anoint your head that your brain and your intellect may be clear and active; your ears, that you may hear the word of the Lord; your eyes, that you may see clearly and discern between truth and error; your nose, that you may smell; your lips, that you may never speak guile; your neck, that it may bear up your head properly; your shoulders, that they may bear the burdens that shall be placed thereon; your back, that there may be marrow in the bones and in the spine; your breast, that it may be the receptacle of pure and virtuous principles; your vitals and bowels, that they may be healthy and strong and perform their proper functions; your arms and hands, that they may be strong and wield the sword of justice in defense of truth and virtue; your loins, that you may be fruitful and multiply and replenish the earth, that you may have joy in your posterity; your legs and feet that you may run and not be weary and walk and not faint.

The anointing is then confirmed and sealed.

Confirmation of Anointing — of Men

Brother _____, having authority we lay our hands upon your head (for and in behalf of _____, who is dead), and confirm upon you this anointing, wherewith you have been anointed in the Temple of our God preparatory to becoming a king and a priest unto the Most High God hereafter to rule and reign in the House of Israel forever; and seal upon you all the blessings hereunto appertaining, through your faithfulness, in the name of Jesus Christ. Amen.

He now enters to be clothed with the garment that he brought with him.

Clothing — of Men

Brother _____, having authority, I place this garment upon you (for and in behalf of _____, who is dead) which you must wear throughout your life. It represents the garment given to Adam when he was found naked in the Garden of Eden, is called the Garment of the Holy Priesthood. Inasmuch as you do not defile it, but are true and faithful to your covenants, it will be a shield and a protection to you against the power of the destroyer until you have finished your work on the earth. With this Garment I give you a new name, which you should always remember, and which you must keep sacred, and never reveal except at a certain place that will be shown you hereafter. The name is "_____."

He then goes back to his locker, removes his shield, and puts on his white clothing, which he rented or brought with him. This includes white shirt, trousers, belt, socks, tie and moccasins. This is put over the garment. He then carries in his hand the temple clothing which he will put on later in the ceremony.

The women have been going through similar proceedings in a different area. In the dressing room for women, the women put on over the garment a white slip, dress, hose and moccasins.

For those who come to do work for the dead, and the washing, anointing and clothing have already been done, they are given a little slip of paper with the birth date and name of the person who has died.

The new name is given to those who are getting their own endowment, also if a person is going through the complete endowment for a dead person.

After being dressed in white clothing the men and women receive a new name for the dead. To the men it is said to them as follows:

Brother _____, having authority, I give you a new name for and in behalf of _____, who is dead, which name you should always remember, and which you must keep sacred and never reveal except at a certain place that will be shown you hereafter. The new name is: _____.

The brethren and sisters then go to the Creation Room. The men all sit on one side of the room and the women sit together on the opposite side.

Creation Room

Brethren and Sisters:

All of the brethren in this company should have been ordained, and each of the brethren and sisters should have been washed, anointed and clothed in a garment of the Holy Priesthood, and should have received a new name. If any one of you has forgotten the new name, or has not received all of these ordinances in connection with this company, please stand.

LECTURER: Brethren, you have been washed and pronounced clean, or that through your faithfulness, you may become clean from the blood and sins of this generation. You have been anointed to become hereafter kings and priests unto the Most High God, to rule and reign in the House of Israel forever.

Sisters, you have been washed and anointed to become queens and priestesses to your husbands.

Brethren and Sisters, if you are true and faithful, the day will come when you will be chosen, called up and anointed kings and queens, priests and priestesses, whereas you are now anointed only to become such. The realization of these blessings depends upon your faithfulness.

You have had a garment placed upon you, which, you were informed, represents the garment given to Adam when he was found naked in the Garden of Eden, and which is called the Garment of the Holy Priesthood. This you were instructed to wear throughout your life. You were informed that it will be a shield and a protection to you if you are true and faithful to your covenants.

You have had a new name given unto you, which you were told never to divulge nor forget. This new name is a keyword which you will be required to give at a certain place in the temple today.

These Endowments are to prepare you for exaltation in the Celestial Kingdom.

If you proceed and receive your full Endowments, you will be required to take upon yourselves sacred obligations, the violation of which will bring upon you the judgment of God; for God will not be mocked. If any of you desire to withdraw rather than accept these obligations, of your own free will and choice, you may now make it known by raising your hands. Brethren and Sisters, as you sit here, you will hear the voices of three persons who represent Elohim, Jehovah and Michael. Elohim will command Jehovah and Michael to go down and organize a world. You will be told of the six creative periods. They will also tell of the organization of man in their own likeness and image, male and female. However, man will not be seen until after he becomes mortal. Now, kindly give your attention.

The Creation — First Day

ELOHIM: Jehovah, Michael, See yonder is matter unorganized. Go ye down and organize it into a world like unto the other worlds that we have heretofore organized. When you have finished, call your labors the First Day and bring me word.

JEHOVAH: We will go down.

MICHAEL: We will go down.

JEHOVAH: Michael, see, here is matter unorganized, we will organize it into a world like unto the other worlds that we have heretofore formed, we will call our labors the First Day and return and report.

MICHAEL: We will return and report our labors of the First Day, Jehovah.

JEHOVAH: Elohim, we have been down as thou hast commanded and have organized a world like unto the other worlds that we have heretofore formed and we have called our labors the First Day.

Second Day

ELOHIM: It is well. Jehovah, Michael, return again to the world that you have organized and divide the waters, the great waters call ye seas and the dry land call ye earth, form mountains and hills, great rivers and small streams to beautify and give variety to the face of the earth and call your labors the Second Day and return and report.

JEHOVAH: We will return to the earth that we have organized.

MICHAEL: We will return, Jehovah.

JEHOVAH: Michael, let us divide the great waters, and call it seas and the dry land we will call earth, we will form mountains and hills, great rivers and small streams to beautify and give variety to the face of the earth and we will call our labors the Second Day and return and report.

MICHAEL: We will return and report our labors of the Second Day, Jehovah.

JEHOVAH: Elohim, we have been down as thou hast commanded, we have divided the great waters and called it seas and the dry land we have called earth, we have formed mountains and hills, great rivers and small streams to beautify and give variety to the face of the earth. We have called our labors the Second Day. This is our report.

Third Day

ELOHIM: It is well, Jehovah, Michael, go down again. Divide the light from the darkness, call the light day and the darkness night. Cause the lights in the firmament to appear. The greater light to rule the day and the lesser light to rule the night. Cause the stars also to appear, to give light to the earth the same as with other worlds we have heretofore formed. When you have done this, call your labors the third day, and return and report.

JEHOVAH: We will go down.

MICHAEL: We will go down.

JEHOVAH: Michael, we will divide the light from the darkness. We will call the light day, and the darkness night. We will cause the lights in the firmament to appear. The greater light to rule the day and the lesser light to rule the night. We will cause the stars also to appear, to give light to the earth, the same as with other worlds we have heretofore formed. We will call our labors the Third Day, and return and report.

MICHAEL: We will return and report our labors of the Third Day, Jehovah.

(Elohim, Jehovah and Michael continue with the work of the creative periods of the 4th, 5th and 6th Days.)

Creation of Adam and Eve

ELOHIM: Jehovah, see, the earth which we have formed, there is no man to till and take care of it. We will form man in our own likeness and image.

JEHOVAH: We will do so, Elohim.

ELOHIM: Brethren and Sisters, this is Michael, who helped form the earth. When he awakes from the sleep which we have caused to come upon him he will be known as Adam and having forgotten everything, will become as a little child. Adam, awake! Jehovah, is it good for man to be alone?

JEHOVAH: It is not good for man to be alone, Elohim.

ELOHIM: We will cause a deep sleep to come upon this man whom we have formed and make for him a woman to be a companion and a helpmeet for him. Brethren, close your eyes as if you were asleep. Adam, awake and arise. All the brethren will please arise. Adam, see the woman which we have formed to be a companion and an helpmeet for you. What will you call her?

ADAM: Eve.

ELOHIM: Why will you call her Eve?

ADAM: Because she is the Mother of all living.

ELOHIM: That is right, Adam. She is the Mother of all living. We will plant a garden eastward in Eden, and there we will put the man whom we have formed. Jehovah, introduce Adam into the garden.

JEHOVAH: It shall be done, Elohim.

ELOHIM: The brethren will now follow Adam and the sisters will follow Eve, and we will introduce you into the Garden.

The Garden of Eden

ELOHIM: Adam, see this garden which we have planted for you. Of every tree of the garden thou mayst freely eat, but of the tree of knowledge of good and evil thou shalt not eat of it. Nevertheless, thou mayst choose for thyself. But remember that I forbid it, for in the day that thou eatest thereof thou shalt surely die. Now be fruitful and multiply, and replenish the earth, and have joy in your posterity. Now remember this commandment and go to dress this garden and keep it. We will go away, but we will return and give you further instructions.

ADAM: Let your minds be calm. We shall be visited soon.

LUCIFER: Well, Adam, you have a new world.

ADAM: A new world?

LUCIFER: Yes, a new world, patterned after the old one where we used to live.

ADAM: I know nothing of any other world.

LUCIFER: Oh, I see, your eyes are not yet opened. You must eat some of the fruit of this tree. Adam, here is some of the fruit of that tree. It will make you wise.

ADAM: I will not partake of it.

LUCIFER: Oh, you will not! Well, we shall see! Eve, here is some of the fruit of that tree, it will make you wise. It is delicious to the taste and very desirable.

EVE: Who are you?

LUCIFER: I am your brother.

EVE: You, my brother, and come here to tempt me to disobey Father?

LUCIFER: I have said nothing about Father. Eve, here is some of the fruit of that tree. It will make you wise.

EVE: But Father said that in the day we ate thereof we should surely die.

LUCIFER: Ye shall not surely die but shall be as the gods; ye shall know good from evil, virtue from vice, light from darkness, health from sickness, pleasure from pain. And thus your eyes shall be opened and you will have knowledge.

EVE: Is there no other way?

LUCIFER: There is no other way.

EVE: Then I will partake.

LUCIFER: That is right. Now go and get Adam to partake.

EVE: Adam, here is some of the fruit of that tree; it is delicious to the taste and very desirable.

ADAM: Eve, do you know what fruit that is? I shall not partake. Do you not know that Father commanded us not to eat of the fruit of that tree?

EVE: Do you intend to obey all of Father's commandments?

ADAM: Yes, all of them.

EVE: Do you not recollect that Father commanded us to be fruitful and multiply and replenish the earth? Now I have partaken of the forbidden fruit, and shall be cast out, while you will be left a lone man in the Garden of Eden.

ADAM: Eve, I see that it must be so. I will partake that man might be.

LUCIFER: Yes, that is right.

EVE: I know thee now. Thou art Lucifer, who was cast out of Father's presence for rebellion.

LUCIFER: Oh, I see you are beginning to get your eyes open.

ADAM: What apron is that you are wearing?

LUCIFER: This is an emblem of my power and priesthoods.

ADAM: Priesthoods?

LUCIFER: Yes, priesthoods.

ELOHIM: Jehovah, let us go down and see the man Adam in the Garden of Eden.

JEHOVAH: We will go down. Elohim.

ADAM: I hear someone coming.

LUCIFER: See, you are naked. Take some fig leaves and make you aprons. Father will see your nakedness. Quick, hide.

ADAM: Brethren and Sisters, put on your aprons.

ELOHIM: Adam! Adam! Adam, where art thou?

ADAM: I heard thy voice and I hid myself because I was naked.

ELOHIM: Who told thee that thou wast naked? Hast thou eaten of the tree whereof I commanded thee thou shouldst not partake?

ADAM: The woman whom thou gavest to be with me, she gave me of the tree and I did eat.

ELOHIM: Eve, what is this that thou hast done?

EVE: The serpent beguiled me and I did eat.

ELOHIM: Lucifer! Lucifer, what hast thou been doing here?

LUCIFER: Oh, the same thing that has been done in other worlds.

ELOHIM: And what is that?

LUCIFER: I gave them some of the fruit of the tree of the knowledge of good and evil to them.

ELOHIM: Lucifer, because thou hast done this thou shalt be cursed above all the beasts of the field. Upon thy belly shalt thou go and dust shalt thou eat all the days of thy life.

LUCIFER: If thou curseth me for doing the same thing that has been done in other worlds I will take the spirits that follow me and they shall possess the bodies thou createst for Adam and Eve.

ELOHIM: I will put enmity between thee and the seed of the woman, thou mayst have power to bruise his heel, but he shall have power to crush thy head. Depart. Because thou hast hearkened unto the voice of Satan and hast eaten of the fruit whereof I commanded thee thou shouldst not eat, I will greatly multiply thy sorrow and thy conception; in sorrow shalt thou bring forth children. Nevertheless thou mayst be saved in child-bearing. Thy desire shall be to thy husband and he shall rule over thee. Adam, because thou hast hearkened unto the voice of thy wife and hast eaten of the fruit of the tree, cursed is the ground for thy sake. In sorrow shalt thou eat of it all the days of thy life. In the sweat of thy face shalt thou eat bread till thou return unto the ground from whence thou wast taken; for dust thou art, and unto dust shalt thou return. Jehovah, let cherubim with a flaming sword be placed to guard the way of the tree of life, lest Adam put forth his hand and partake of the tree of life and live forever in his sins.

JEHOVAH: It shall be done, Elohim. Let cherubim and a flaming sword be placed to guard the way of the tree of life, lest Adam put forth his hand and partake of the tree of life and live forever in his sins. It is done, Elohim.

The Law of Obedience

ELOHIM: Eve, because thou wast the first to partake of the forbidden fruit, if you will covenant that you will keep the law of your husband, etc. . . . Adam, if you will covenant that you will obey the law of Elohim, we will give unto you the law of obedience and sacrifice and we will provide a Saviour for you that you may come back into our presence, and with us partake of eternal life and exaltation.

EVE: Adam, I now covenant to obey your law as you obey our Father.

ADAM: Elohim, I now covenant that from this time forth I will obey your law and keep your commandments.

ELOHIM: It is well, Adam. Jehovah, inasmuch as Adam and Eve have discovered their nakedness, make coats of skins for them.

JEHOVAH: It shall be done, Elohim. Brethren and Sisters, the garment that was placed upon you in the washing room was to cover your nakedness and represents the coat of skins spoken of. Anciently it was made of skins. With this garment you received your new name. It is done, Elohim.

ELOHIM: We will now put the sisters under covenant to obey the law of their husbands. Sisters, arise, raise your right hand to the square. Each of you do covenant and promise that you will obey the law of your husband and abide by his council in righteousness. Each of you bow your head and say yes.

SISTERS: Yes.

ELOHIM: That will do. Brethren, arise. You and each of you do covenant and promise that you will obey the law of God and keep His commandments. Each of you bow your head and say yes.

BRETHREN: Yes.

ELOHIM: That will do.

Law of Sacrifice

ELOHIM: When Adam was driven out of the Garden of Eden he built an altar and offered sacrifices, and after many days an angel of the Lord appeared unto Adam, saying: Why dost thou offer sacrifices unto the Lord? And Adam said unto him: I know not, save the Lord commanded me. And then the angel spake saying: This thing is a similitude of the Sacrifice of the Only Begotten of the Father, which is full of grace and truth. Wherefore, thou shalt do all that thou doest in the name of the Son, and thou shalt repent and call upon God in the name of the Son forevermore. The posterity of Adam down to Moses and from Moses to Jesus Christ offered up the first fruits of the field and the firstlings of the flock, which continued unto the death of Jesus Christ. Which ended sacrifice by the shedding of blood. A couple will now come to the altar. Brethren and Sisters, this couple at the altar represent all of you as if at the altar, and you must remember that you are under the same obligations that they will be. We are instructed to give unto you the law of sacrifice as contained in the Old and New Testaments, which is that you do sacrifice all that you have, including your own lives, if necessary, for the building up of the Kingdom of God on the earth. All arise. Each of you bring your right arm to the square. You and each of you do covenant and promise before God, angels, and these witnesses at this altar that you will keep the law of sacrifice as contained in the Old and New Testaments, which has been explained to you. Each of you bow your head and say yes.

BRETHREN & SISTERS: Yes.

ELOHIM: That will do.

First Token of the Aaronic Priesthood

We are required to give unto you the First Token of the Aaronic Priesthood. Before doing this, however, we desire to impress upon your minds the sacred character of the First Token of the Aaronic Priesthood, with its accompanying name, sign and penalty, together with that of all the other Tokens of the Holy Priesthood, with their accompanying names, signs and penalties, which you will receive in the temple this day. They are most sacred and are guarded by solemn covenants and obligations of secrecy to the effect that under no condition, even at the peril of your life, will you ever divulge them, except at a certain place that will be shown you hereafter. The representation of the penalties indicates different ways in which life may be taken.

The First Token of the Aaronic Priesthood is given by clasping the right hands together and by placing the joint of the thumb over the first knuckle of the hand, in this manner.

Adam, we give unto you the First Token of the Aaronic Priesthood. We desire all to receive it. All arise.

If any of you have not received this Token, please raise your hand.

The name of this Token is the new name that you received in the washing and anointing room. If any of you have forgotten your new name, please stand.

The sign of the First Token of the Aaronic Priesthood is made by bringing the right arm to the square the palm of the hand to the front, the fingers close together and the thumb extended. This is the sign. The execution of the penalty is represented by placing the thumb under the left ear, the palm of the hand down, and by drawing the thumb quickly across the throat, to the right ear, and dropping the hand to the side.

If I were going through the temple today either for myself or for the dead, and had been given John as my new name, I would say, after making the sign, I, John, do covenant and promise that I will never reveal the First Token of the Aaronic Priesthood, together with its accompanying name, sign and penalty, rather than do so I would suffer my life to be taken.

All arise.

The sign of the First Token of the Aaronic Priesthood is made by bringing the right arm to the square; the palm of the hand to the front, the fingers close together and the thumb extended. This is the sign.

Now repeat in your minds after me the words of the covenant, at the same time representing the execution of the penalty.

I, _____ (think of the new name) do covenant and promise that I will never reveal the First Token of the Aaronic Priesthood, together with its accompanying name, sign and penalty. Rather than do so I would suffer my life to be taken.

That will do.

(If any of the brethren or sisters make a mistake in the execution of the penalty, the execution of the penalty is done over.)

It is necessary to repeat the sign and the execution of the penalty. The sign of the First Token of the Aaronic Priesthood is made by bringing the right arm to the square, the palm of the hand to the front, the fingers close together, and the thumb extended. This is the sign. It is not necessary to repeat again the words of the covenant in representing the execution of the penalty, but let the name of the token pass through your mind. The execution of the penalty is represented by placing the thumb under the left ear, the palm of the hand down, and by drawing the thumb quickly across the throat to the right ear, and dropping the hand to the side.

ELOHIM: Jehovah, see that Adam is driven out of this beautiful garden into the lone and dreary world, where he may learn by his own experience the good from the evil.

JEHOVAH: It shall be done, Elohim. The brethren will follow Adam and the sisters will follow Eve into the Lone and Dreary World.

ADAM: The first two rows of brethren and sisters please stand.

The Lone and Dreary World

ADAM: Brethren and Sisters, this room represents the Telestial Kingdom, or the world in which we now live. When Adam was driven out of the Garden of Eden, he built an altar and offered prayer and these are the words he uttered:

O God, hear the words of my mouth!

O God, hear the words of my mouth!

O God, hear the words of my mouth!

LUCIFER: I hear you. What is it you want?

ADAM: Who are you?

LUCIFER: The god of this world. What is it you want?

ADAM: I was calling upon Father.

LUCIFER: Oh, I see, you want religion. I'll have some preachers along presently.

PREACHER: You have a fine congregation here.

LUCIFER: Oh, are you a preacher?

PREACHER: Yes.

LUCIFER: Have you ever been to college and been trained for the ministry?

PREACHER: Why, certainly. A man cannot preach unless he has been trained for the ministry.

LUCIFER: Well, do you preach the orthodox religion?

PREACHER: Yes, that is what I preach.

LUCIFER: Well, if you'll preach your orthodox religion to this people and convert them, I'll give you—let me see—five thousand a year.

PREACHER: Well, you know that five thousand is a small sum when you take into consideration the great amount we have to pay to learn to preach.

LUCIFER: If you succeed I will raise your salary.

PREACHER: I'll do my best. Good morning, sir.

ADAM: Good morning.

PREACHER: I understand you are looking for religion?

ADAM: I was calling upon Father.

PREACHER: I'm glad to hear you were calling upon Father. Let us now sing a hymn:

When I can read my title clear,
In mansions in the sky,
I'll bid farewell to all my fears,
And wipe my weeping eyes.

Do you believe in a God who is without body, parts or passions, who sits on the top of a topless throne, whose center is everywhere and circumference nowhere; who fills the universe and yet is so small that He can dwell in your heart? Do you believe in this Great Being?

ADAM: No, I cannot comprehend such a Being.

PREACHER: That is the beauty of it. Perhaps you believe in hell, that great bottomless pit which is full of fire and brimstone, into which the wicked are cast and where they are continually burning and yet are never consumed?

ADAM: No, I do not believe in any such place.

PREACHER: I am sorry for you.

LUCIFER: I am sorry, very, very sorry. What is it you want?

ADAM: I am waiting for messengers from Father.

(Instructions from Elohim are given to Jehovah, and from Jehovah to Peter, James and John.)

PETER: Good morning. What are you doing here?

LUCIFER: Teaching religion.

PETER: What is it you preach?

LUCIFER: We teach the philosophies of men, mingled with Scripture.

PETER: And how is it accepted by this congregation?

LUCIFER: Oh, very well with all except this man (Adam) he doesn't believe anything we preach.

PETER: Good morning, sir. What do you think of the preaching of this gentleman?

ADAM: I cannot comprehend it.

PETER: Can you give us some idea concerning it.

ADAM: He tells of a God who is without body, parts or passions, and of a hell without a bottom, into which the wicked are cast and where they are continually burning and yet never consumed. I do not believe in any such doctrine. I am waiting for messengers from Father.

PETER: That is right. We commend you for your integrity. Good day. We will probably visit you again soon.

LUCIFER: Now is the great day of my power. I reign from the rivers to the end of the earth. There is none who dares make afraid.

PREACHER: Shall we ever have any apostles or prophets?

LUCIFER: No, but there may be some who will profess revelation or apostleship. Just test them by asking them to perform a great miracle, such as cutting off an arm or some other member of the body and restoring it so that the people may know they come with power. (Peter, James and John return and report to Jehovah, and Jehovah reports to Elohim. Instructions from Elohim are given to Jehovah, and from Jehovah to Peter, James and John.)

PETER: I am Peter.

JAMES: I am James.

JOHN: I am John.

LUCIFER: Yes, I thought I knew you. Do you know who these men are? They claim to be apostles. Test them.

PREACHER: Are you the Apostles of the Lord Jesus Christ?

PETER: We are.

PREACHER: Why, he said we should have no more apostles and if any should come professing to be such I was to ask them to cut off an arm or some other member of the body and restore it, so that the people may know they come with power.

PETER: We do not satisfy man's curiosity in that manner. It is a wicked and an adulterous generation that seeketh for a sign. Do you know who that man is? Why, that is Lucifer!

PREACHER: What! the Devil?

PETER: Yes, I believe that is one of his names. I would advise you to have a settlement with him and get out of his employ.

PREACHER: But if I leave his employ, what will become of me?

PETER: We will preach the gospel unto you with the rest of Adam's posterity.

PREACHER: That is good. I would like to have a settlement.

LUCIFER: I am willing to keep my word and fulfill my part of the agreement. I promised to pay you if you would convert this people, but they have nearly converted you. You can get out of my kingdom. I want no such men in it.

PETER: (to Adam) Have you any tokens or signs?

LUCIFER: Have you any money?

PETER: We have enough for our needs.

LUCIFER: You can buy anything in this world for money.

PETER: (to Adam) Do you sell your tokens or signs for money? You have them, I presume?

ADAM: I have them, but I do not sell them for money. I am waiting for messengers from Father.

LUCIFER: I have something to say concerning this people. If they do not live up to every covenant they make at these altars in this temple this day, they will be in my power.

PETER: Satan, we command thee to depart.

LUCIFER: By what authority?

PETER: (right arm to the square) In the name of Jesus Christ our Master.

Adam, we are true messengers from Father.

ADAM: How shall I know that you are true messengers?

PETER: By our giving unto you the token and sign given you in the Garden of Eden.

ADAM: (taking Peter by the right hand) What is that?

PETER: The first token of the Aaronic Priesthood.

ADAM: Has it a name?

PETER: It has.

ADAM: Will you give it to me?

PETER: I can not, for it is the new name, but this is the sign. (right arm elevated to the square) And this is the execution of the penalty. (Thumb of right hand across the throat)

ADAM: Brethren and Sister, these are true messengers from Father. I exhort you to give strict heed to their counsel and teachings and they will lead you in the ways of life and salvation.

The Law of the Gospel

PETER: A couple will now come to the altar. Brethren and Sisters, this couple at the altar represent all of you as if at the altar, and you must remember that you are under the same obligations that they will be. We are instructed to give unto you the Law of the Gospel, also a charge to avoid all lightmindedness, loud laughter, evil speaking of the Lord's Anointed, the taking of the name of God in vain and every other unholy and impure practice. All arise. Each of you bring your right arm to the square. You and each of you do covenant and promise before God, angels and these witnesses at this altar that you will keep the Law of the Gospel as it has been explained to you. Each of you bow your heads and say yes.

BRETHREN & SISTERS: Yes.

The Robes of the Holy Priesthood

PETER: We are instructed to clothe you in the robes of the Holy Priesthood. Place the robe on the left shoulder, place the cap with the bow over the right ear, replace the apron, tie the girdle with the bow on the right side and put on the moccasins. Those who are wearing slippers and intend using them as moccasins will please remove them from their feet and put them on as part of the temple clothing.

You may now proceed to clothe.

Second Token of the Aaronic Priesthood

PETER: A couple will now come to the altar. We are instructed to give unto you the Second Token of the Aaronic Priesthood with its accompanying name, sign and penalty. Before doing this, however, we desire to impress upon your minds the sacred character of the Second Token of the Aaronic Priesthood with its accompanying name, sign and penalty. They are most sacred and are guarded by solemn covenants and obligations of secrecy to the effect that under no condition, even at the peril of your life will you ever divulge them, except at a certain place that will be shown you hereafter. The representation of the penalty indicates different ways in which life may be taken.

The Second Token of the Aaronic Priesthood is given by clasping the right hands together and by placing the joint of the thumb between the first and second knuckles of the hand, in this manner.

Adam, we give unto you the Second Token of the Aaronic Priesthood.

We desire all to receive it. All arise. If any of you have not received this token, please raise your hand.

The name of this token is your own first given name if you are going through the temple for yourself, or the first given name of the person for whom you are officiating.

PETER: The sign of the second token of the Aaronic Priesthood is made by bringing the right hand in front of you, with the hand in cupping shape, the right arm forming a square, the left arm being raised to the square. This is the sign. The execution of the penalty is represented by placing the right hand on the left breast, drawing the hand quickly across the body and dropping the hands to the sides.

If I were going through the temple for the first time this day for my own endowments—my first given name being Thomas—I would say: I, Thomas, do covenant and promise that I will never reveal the second token of the Aaronic Priesthood, with its accompanying name, sign and penalty. Rather than do so I would suffer my life to be taken.

All arise.

The sign of the second token of the Aaronic Priesthood is made by bringing the right hand in front of you, with the hand in cupping shape, the left arm being raised to the square. This is the sign.

Now repeat in your minds after me the words of the covenant, at the same time representing the execution of the penalty.

I, _____ (think of the first given name), do covenant and promise that I will never reveal the second token of the Aaronic

Priesthood, together with its accompanying name, sign and penalty. Rather than do so I would suffer my life to be taken.

That will do.

(If one of the brethren or sisters makes a mistake in the execution of the penalty, the execution of the penalty is repeated.)

Brethren and Sisters, it is necessary to repeat the sign and the execution of the penalty. The sign of the second token of the Aaronic Priesthood is made by bringing the right hand in front of you, with the hand in cupping shape, the right arm, forming a square, and the left arm being raised to the square. This is the sign. It is not necessary to repeat again the words of the covenant in representing the execution of the penalty, but let the name of the token pass through your mind. The execution of the penalty is represented by placing the right hand on the left breast, drawing the hand quickly across the body, and dropping the hands to the sides.

(Peter, James and John return and report to Jehovah, and Jehovah reports to Elohim. Instructions from Elohim are given to Jehovah, and from Jehovah to Peter, James and John.)

PETER: We have been instructed to have you place your robe on the right shoulder, preparatory to receiving the first token of the Melchizedek Priesthood, and entering into the Terrestrial World. You may now do so. The brethren will follow Adam and the sisters will follow Eve into the room representing the Terrestrial World.

The Terrestrial World

Law of Chastity

PETER: A couple will now come to the altar. We are instructed to give unto you the Law of Chastity. To the sisters it is that no one of you will have sexual intercourse with any of the sons of Adam, except your legal and lawful husband. To the brethren it is that no one of you will have sexual intercourse with any of the daughters of Eve, except your legal and lawful wife.

Sisters, please arise. Each of you bring your right hand to the square. You and each of you do covenant and promise before God, angels and these witnesses at this altar that you will keep the Law of Chastity, as it has been explained to you. Each of you bow your head and say yes.

SISTERS: Yes.

PETER: That will do.

Brethren, arise. Each of you bring your right hand to the square. You and each of you do covenant and promise before God, angels and these witnesses at this altar that you will keep the Law of Chastity as it has been explained to you. Each of you bow your head and say yes.

BRETHREN: Yes.

PETER: That will do.

First Token of the Melchizedek or the Sign of the Nail

PETER: We are instructed to give unto you the first token of the Melchizedek Priesthood or sign of the nail. This is done by bringing your right hand forward in a vertical position, fingers close together, thumb extended. And the person given the token places the tip of his forefinger in the center of the palm and the thumb on the back of the hand, in this manner. We desire all to receive it. All arise.

If any of you have not received this token, please raise your hand.

The sign of the first token of the Melchizedek Priesthood or sign of the nail is made by bringing the left hand in front of you with the hand in cupping shape, the left arm forming a square, the right hand is also brought forward, the fingers close together, and the thumb is placed over the left hip. This is the sign. The execution of the penalty is represented by drawing the thumb quickly across the body and dropping the hands to the side.

The name of this token is The Son, meaning the Son of God.

If I were going through the temple today either for myself or for the dead, I would say, after making the sign, I covenant in the name of the Son that I will never reveal the first token of the Melchizedek Priesthood or sign of the nail, with its accompanying name, sign or penalty. Rather than do so I would suffer my life to be taken.

All arise.

Each of you make the sign of the first token of the Melchizedek Priesthood or sign of the nail by bringing the left hand in front of you with the hand in cupping shape, the left arm forming a square, the right hand is also brought forward, the palm down, the fingers close together and the thumb extended and the thumb is placed over the left hip. This is the sign.

Now repeat in your minds after me the words of the covenant at the same time representing the execution of the penalty.

I covenant in the name of the Son that I will never reveal the first token of the Melchizedek Priesthood or sign of the nail, with its accompanying name, sign or penalty. Rather than do so I would suffer my life to be taken.

That will do.

(If any of the brethren or sisters makes a mistake in the execution of the penalty, the execution of the penalty is repeated.)

Brethren and Sisters, it is necessary to repeat the sign and the execution of the penalty. The sign of the first token of the Melchizedek Priesthood, or sign of the nail, is made by bringing the left hand in front of you with the hand in cupping shape, the left arm forming a square; the right hand is also brought forward the palm down, the fingers close together, the thumb extended, and the thumb is placed over the left hip.

This is the sign. It is not necessary to repeat again the words of the covenant in representing the execution of the penalty, but let the name of the token pass through your mind. The execution of the penalty is represented by drawing the thumb quickly across the body and dropping the hands to the sides.

PETER: We will return and report.

(Peter, James and John return and report to Jehovah, and Jehovah reports to Elohim. Instructions from Elohim are given to Jehovah and from Jehovah to Peter, James and John.)

Law of Consecration

PETER: A couple will now come to the altar. We are instructed to give unto you the Law of Consecration as contained in the book of Doctrine and Covenants; this I will explain, it is that you do consecrate yourselves, your time, talents and everything with which the Lord has blessed you or with which he may bless you to the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints, for the building up of the Kingdom of God on the earth and for the establishment of Zion.

All arise. Each of you bring your right arm to the square.

You and each of you do covenant and promise before God, angels and these witnesses at this altar that you will keep the Law of Consecration as contained in this the book of Doctrine and Covenants, which is that you do consecrate yourselves, your time, talents and everything with which the Lord has blessed you or with which he may bless you to the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints for the building up of the Kingdom of God on the earth and for the establishment of Zion.

Each of you bow your head and say yes.

BRETHREN & SISTERS: Yes.

Second Token of the Melchizedek Priesthood

The Patriarchal Grip or Sure Sign of the Nail

PETER: We are instructed to give unto you the second token of the Melchizedek Priesthood, the Patriarchal Grip or Sure Sign of the Nail, and to instruct you in the true order of prayer and to give you further instructions preparatory to going through the veil.

The second token of the Melchizedek Priesthood, the Patriarchal Grip or Sure Sign of the Nail is given by clasping the right hands together and by interlocking the little finger and by placing the forefinger of the right hand on the center of the wrist, in this manner. We desire all to receive it. All arise.

If any of you have not received it, please raise your hand.

The name of the second token of the Melchizedek Priesthood, the Patriarch Grip or Sure Sign of the Nail will not be given you at this stage of the endowment, but will be given later on.

The sign is made by raising both hands high above the head and by lowering your hands to the side, saying:

Pay lay ale

Pay lay ale

Pay lay ale

When Adam was driven out of the Garden of Eden he built an altar and offered prayer and these are the words he used, repeated three times.

We desire all to receive it. All arise. Each of you make the sign of the second token of the Melchizedek Priesthood, the Patriarch Grip or Sure Sign of the Nail by raising both hands high above the head and by lowering your hands to the side.

BRETHREN & SISTERS:

Pay lay ale

Pay lay ale

Pay lay ale

PETER: That will do.

There is no penalty mentioned for this token, but you must remember that you are under just as strict an obligation to secrecy for this token and sign as you are for all the other tokens and signs of the Holy Priesthood which you have received in the temple this day, etc.

A lecture will next be given, which summarizes the instructions, ordinances and covenants, and also the tokens with their key words, signs and penalties, pertaining to the endowment which you have thus far received. You should try to remember and keep in mind all that you have heard and seen and may yet hear and see in this House. The purpose of this lecture is to assist you to remember that which has been taught you this day. You must keep in mind that you are under a solemn obligation never to speak, outside of the temples of the Lord, of the things you see and hear in this sacred place.

Lecture Before the Veil

LECTURER: Brethren and Sisters, these endowments as herein administered, long withheld from the children of men, pertain to the dispensation of the fulness of times and have been revealed to prepare the people for exaltation.

(The Lecturer explains to the brethren and sisters what they have gone through, from the Washing and Anointing Room to the time they receive this lecture. He mentions that they have received the keys of the Priesthood contained in these endowments.)

These are what are termed the mysteries of Godliness and they will enable you to understand the expression of Jesus made prior to his betrayal—This is life eternal that they might know thee, the only true God and Jesus Christ, whom thou hast sent. May God bless you all. Amen.

The Prayer Circle

PETER: We will now teach you the true order of prayer. We would like the witnesses to come forward and stand at the head of the altar and six other couples to come forward and form a circle around the altar.

John will instruct and lead the circle.

JOHN: If any of you have unkind feelings towards any member of this circle you are invited to withdraw, that the Spirit of the Lord may not be restrained. In this circle we are required to make all the signs and tokens of the Holy Priesthood.

(The signs and tokens of the Holy Priesthood are offered up, after which the couples form the true order of prayer and John kneels at the altar for prayer.)

PETER: The Sisters will unveil their faces and the Brethren and Sisters in the circle will return to their seats.

The Veil of the Temple

PETER: We will now uncover the Veil.

Brethren and Sisters, this is the Veil of the temple. It is necessary to explain the marks on the Veil. These four marks are the marks of the Holy Priesthood and corresponding marks are found on your individual garment. This is the mark of the square.

(Peter explains that the meaning of this mark is to be a reminder of the covenants that were entered into this day.)

This is the mark of the compass. . . . That all truth is circumscribed into one great whole, and that desires, appetites and passions are to be kept within the bounds the Lord has established.

This is the navel mark. It is placed on the right side of the garment, over the navel, and is a reminder of the constant need of nourishment to body and spirit.

This is the knee mark. It is placed in the leg of the garment, over the knee cap, and indicates that every knee shall bow and every tongue confess that Jesus is the Christ.

These other three marks are for convenience, for working at the veil.

Through this one the person representing the Lord puts his right hand to test our knowledge of the tokens of the Holy Priesthood; through this one he asks us certain questions, and through this one we give our answers.

Since all of you will have to go through the veil, we will show you how this is done.

The worker gives three taps with the mallet.

(Peter shows the brethren and sisters how this is done.)

The Five Points of Fellowship

LORD: What is that?

PETER: (acting as Adam) The second token of the Melchizedek Priesthood, the Patriarchal Grip or Sure Sign of the Nail.

LORD: Has it a name?

PETER: It has.

LORD: Will you give it to me?

PETER: I cannot. I have not yet received it. For this purpose I have come to converse with the Lord through the veil.

LORD: You shall receive it upon the five points of fellowship through the veil.

PETER: (The five points of fellowship are: inside of right foot by the side of right foot, knee to knee, breast to breast, hand to back and mouth to ear.)

(Peter, James and John return and report to Jehovah, and Jehovah reports to Elohim. Instructions from Elohim are given to Jehovah and from Jehovah to Peter, James and John.)

PETER: Brethren and Sisters, we are instructed to introduce you at the Veil, where you will receive the name of the second token of the Melchizedek Priesthood, the Patriarchal Grip or Sure Sign of the Nail, preparatory to your entering into the presence of the Lord.

Will the Veil workers please take their places at the Veil.

Ceremony at the Veil

(The worker gives three taps with the mallet.)

LORD: What is wanted?

WORKER: Adam, having been true and faithful, desires to converse with the Lord through the veil (for and in behalf of _____ who is dead).

LORD: Present him at the veil and his request shall be granted. What is that?

ADAM: The first token of the Aaronic Priesthood.

LORD: Has it a name?

ADAM: It has.

LORD: Will you give it to me?

ADAM: I will, through the veil (gives new name).

LORD: What is that?

ADAM: The second token of the Aaronic Priesthood.

LORD: Has it a name?

ADAM: It has.

LORD: Will you give it to me?

ADAM: I will, through the veil (first given name).

LORD: What is that?

ADAM: The first token of the Melchizedek Priesthood, or sign of the nail.

LORD: Has it a name?

ADAM: It has.

LORD: Will you give it to me?

ADAM: I will through the veil (The Son).

LORD: What is that?

ADAM: The second token of the Melchizedek Priesthood, The Patriarchal Grip or Sure Sign of the Nail.

LORD: Has it a name?

ADAM: It has.

LORD: Will you give it to me?

ADAM: I cannot. I have not yet received it. For this purpose I have come to converse with the Lord through the veil.

LORD: You shall receive it upon the five points of fellowship, through the veil.

This is the name of the token— Health in the navel, marrow in the bones, strength in the loins and in the sinews, power in the priesthood be upon me and upon my posterity through all generations of time and throughout all eternity.

What is that?

ADAM: The second token of the Melchizedek Priesthood, the Patriarchal Grip or Sure Sign of the Nail.

LORD: Has it a name?

ADAM: It has.

LORD: Will you give it to me?

ADAM: I will, upon the five points of fellowship through the veil—Health in the navel, marrow in the bones, strength in the loins and in the sinews, power in the priesthood be upon me and upon my posterity through all generations of time and throughout all eternity.

LORD: That is correct.

(The worker gives three taps with the mallet.)

LORD: What is wanted?

WORKER: Adam, having conversed with the Lord through the veil, desires now to enter his presence.

LORD: Let him enter.

(Adam is admitted into the Celestial Room.)

The Marriage Ceremony

(The right hands are clasped in the Patriarchal grip, while the parties kneel at the altar.)

Do you Brother _____ (acting as proxy for _____ who is dead), take Sister _____ (acting as proxy for _____ who is dead) by the right hand and receive her unto yourself to be your lawful and wedded wife for time and for all eternity, with a covenant and promise that you will observe and keep all the laws, rites and ordinances pertaining to this Holy Order of Matrimony in the new and everlasting Covenant, and this you do in the presence of God, angels and these witnesses of your own free will be choice?

BROTHER: Yes.

Do you Sister _____ (acting as proxy for _____ who is dead) take Brother _____ (acting as proxy for _____ who is dead) by the right hand and give yourself to him to be his lawful and wedded wife, and for him to be your lawful and wedded husband, for time and for all eternity, with a covenant and promise that you will observe and keep all the laws, rites and ordinances pertaining to this Holy Order of Matrimony in the new and everlasting Covenant; and this you do in the presence of God, angels and these witnesses of your own free will and choice?

SISTER: Yes.

By virtue of the Holy Priesthood and the authority vested in me, I pronounce you _____ and _____ legally and lawfully husband and wife for time and for all eternity, and I seal upon you the blessings of the holy resurrection with power to come forth in the morning of the first resurrection clothed with glory, immortality and eternal lives, and seal upon you the blessings of kingdoms, thrones, principalities, powers, dominions and exaltations, with all the blessings of Abraham, Isaac and Jacob, and say unto you, be fruitful and multiply and replenish the earth, that you may have joy and rejoicing in the day of the Lord Jesus Christ. All these blessings, together with all the blessings appertaining unto the new and everlasting covenant. I seal upon you by virtue of the Holy Priesthood, through your faithfulness, in the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost, Amen. *

[The parties then kiss each other, which ends the ceremony.]

Sealing of Children to Parents Ceremony

(Brother or Sister _____ you being proxy for _____ who is dead)

By the authority of the Holy Priesthood, I seal you _____ (acting as proxy for and in behalf of _____) to your father _____ and to your mother _____, for time and all eternity, as an heir (or heirs) (with all the children) as though you were born in the new and everlasting covenant, in the name of the Father and of the Son and of the Holy Ghost. Amen.

The Second Anointing

[This is the highest ceremony in the temple. It is not performed in all temples.]

* FOOTNOTE: It should be noted that the wording of the marriage ceremony is still very similar to that given by the Apostle Orson Pratt in 1853 (see The Seer, pages 31-32). Pratt apparently believed that he was doing the church a service by publishing this part of the ceremony. Brigham Young, on the other hand, was very disturbed about the matter: "I have prayed fervently when Orson published the sealing ordinance that it might be forgotten" ("Minutes of Meeting at Historian's Office, April 4, 1860," Brigham Young Collection, LDS Archives, as cited by Gary James Bergera in Dialogue: A Journal of Mormon Thought, Summer 1980, p. 27).

31. Changes in the Temple Ceremony

The fact that changes have been made in the Mormon temple ceremony can be demonstrated by comparing earlier accounts with the one published in this book. Some of these changes were made after the turn of the century.

Bloody Oaths

Ebenezer Robinson, who had been the editor of the Times and Seasons, made this statement concerning the endowment ritual:

Here was instituted, undoubtedly the order of things which represented the scenes in the Garden of Eden, which was called in Nauvoo, the “Holy Order,” a secret organization. The terrible oaths and covenants taken by those who entered there were known only to those who took them, as one of the members said to me, “I could tell you many things, but if I should, my life would pay the forfeiture.” (The Return, vol. 2, pp. 346-348, typed copy, p. 153)

These oaths have been greatly modified since Joseph Smith’s time. The changes were probably made within the last thirty or forty years. Below are comparisons of the oaths as they were published in Temple Mormonism in 1931 with the way they are given today. The first oath we will deal with was printed as follows in 1931:

“We, and each of us, covenant and promise that we will not reveal any of the secrets of this, the first token of the Aaronic priesthood, with its accompanying name, sign or penalty. Should we do so; we agree that our throats be cut from ear to ear and our tongues torn out by their roots.” (Temple Mormonism, p. 18)

This oath has been changed as follows (see page 468 of this book):

I, _____ (think of the new name) do covenant and promise that I will never reveal the First Token of the Aaronic Priesthood, together with its accompanying name, sign and penalty. Rather than do so I would suffer my life to be taken. [1968 version]

The second oath was printed as follows by Paden in 1931:

“We and each of us do covenant and promise that we will not reveal the secrets of this, the Second Token of the Aaronic Priesthood, with its accompanying name, sign, grip or penalty. Should we do so, we agree to have our breasts cut open and our hearts and vitals torn from our bodies and given to the birds of the air and the beasts of the field.” (Temple Mormonism, p. 20)

This has been changed as follows ( see page 470 of this book):

I, _____ (think of the first given name), do covenant and promise that I will never reveal the second token of the Aaronic Priesthood, together with its accompanying name, sign and penalty. Rather than do so I would suffer my life to be taken. [1968 version]

The third oath was printed as follows in the book Temple Mormonism:

“We and each of us do covenant and promise that we will not reveal any of the secrets of this, the First Token of the Melchizedek Priesthood, with its accompanying name, sign or penalty. Should we do so, we agree that our bodies be cut asunder in the midst and all our bowels gush out.” (Temple Mormonism, p. 20)

This oath now reads as follows (see page 471 of this book):

I covenant in the name of the Son that I will never reveal the first token of the Melchizedek Priesthood or sign of the nail, with its accompanying name, sign or penalty. Rather than do so I would suffer my life to be taken. [1968 version]

To the early Mormon people these oaths were a very serious matter. In a discourse delivered December 13, 1857, Heber C. Kimball, a member of the First Presidency, stated:

Judas lost that saving principle, and they took him and killed him. . . . they actually kicked him until his bowels came out.

“I will suffer my bowels to be taken out before I will forfeit the covenant I have made with Him and my brethren.” Do you understand me? Judas was like salt that had lost its saving principles —good for nothing but to be cast out and trodden under foot of men. . . . It is so with you, ye Elders of Israel, when you forfeit your covenants. . . . I know the day is right at hand when men will forfeit their Priesthood and turn against the covenants they have made, and they will be destroyed as Judas was. (Journal of Discourses, vol. 6, pp. 125-126)

On another occasion Heber C. Kimball stated: “. . . for if men turn traitors to God and His servants, their blood will surely be shed, or else they will be damned, and that too according to their covenants” (Journal of Discourses, vol. 4, p. 375).

Jedediah M. Grant, second counselor to Brigham Young, said: “I would ask how many covenant breakers there are in this city . . . I believe that there are a great many; and if they are covenant breakers we need a place designated, where we can shed their blood” (Deseret News, vol. 6, p. 235; reprinted in Journal of Discourses, vol. 4, pp. 49-51). At another time Jedediah M. Grant stated:

Do you think it would be any sin to kill me if I were to break my covenants? . . . Do you believe you would kill me if I broke the covenants of God, and you had the Spirit of God? Yes; and the more Spirit of God I had, the more I should strive to save your soul by spilling your blood, when you had committed sin that could not be remitted by baptism. (Deseret News, July 27, 1854)

For many similar statements by the early Mormon leaders the reader should see pages 398-404 of this volume.

A person can only begin to imagine how serious these oaths must have been to the Mormon people when the doctrine of “Blood Atonement” was practiced. Now that the oaths have been modified and the practice of “Blood Atonement” abandoned, the Mormon leaders do not have as much control over their people.

Oath of Vengeance

One of the oaths was the source of so much trouble that the Mormon leaders finally removed it entirely from the endowment ritual. This oath was printed in Temple Mormonism as follows:

“You and each of you do solemnly promise and vow that you will pray, and never cease to pray, and never cease to importune high heaven to avenge the blood of the prophets on this nation, and that you will teach this to your children and your children’s children unto the third and fourth generation.” (Temple Mormonism, p. 21)

A great deal of testimony has been given concerning this oath, and although all of the witnesses did not agree as to its exact wording, there can be little doubt that such an oath was administered to the Mormon people after Joseph Smith’s death.

According to the History of the Church, Joseph Smith wanted his brother Hyrum to live so that he could “avenge” his blood:

... I said to the company present, “I wish I could get Hyrum out of the way, so that he may live to avenge my blood, and I will stay with you and see it out.” (History of the Church, vol. 6, p. 520)

I told Stephen Markam that if I and Hyrum were ever taken again we should be massacred, or I was not a prophet of God. I want Hyrum to live to avenge my blood, but he is determined not to leave me. (Ibid., p. 546)

John D. Lee related that the following occurred after Joseph Smith’s death:

... Brigham raised his hand and said, “I swear by the eternal Heavens that I have unsheathed my sword, and I will never return it until the blood of the Prophet Joseph and Hyrum, and those who were slain in Missouri, is avenged. This whole nation is guilty of shedding their blood, by assenting to the deed, and holding its peace.” “Now,” said he, “betray me, any of you who dare to do so!” Furthermore, every one who had passed through their endowments, in the Temple, were placed under the most sacred obligations to avenge the blood of the Prophet, whenever an opportunity offered, and to teach their children to do the same, thus making the entire Mormon people sworn and avowed enemies of the American nation. (The Confessions of John D. Lee, photo-reprint of the 1880 edition, p. 160)

Some Mormon apologists have maintained that there was no “oath of vengeance” in the temple ceremony, but the “Daily Journal of Abraham H. Cannon” makes it very plain that there was such an oath. Under the date of December 6, 1889, the Apostle Cannon recorded the following in his diary:

About 4:30 p.m. this meeting adjourned and was followed by a meeting of Presidents Woodruff, Cannon and Smith and Bros. Lyman and Grant. . . . In speaking of the recent examination before Judge Anderson Father said that he understood when he had his endowments in Nauvoo that he took an oath against the murderers of the Prophet Joseph as well as other prophets, and if he had ever met any of those who had taken a hand in that massacre he would undoubtedly have attempted to avenge the blood of the martyrs. The Prophet charged Stephen Markham to avenge his blood should he be slain: after the Prophet’s death Bro. Markham attempted to tell this to an assembly of the Saints, but Willard Richards pulled him down from the stand, as he feared the effect on the enraged people. (“Daily Journal of Abraham H. Cannon,” December 6, 1889, pp. 205-206)

The Apostle Cannon went on to relate that Joseph F. Smith was about to murder a man with his pocket knife if he even expressed approval of Joseph Smith’s death (see page 403 of this book).

Allen Joseph Stout seemed to have the “oath of vengeance” in mind when he made this statement concerning the murder of Joseph and Hyrum Smith:

But I there and then resolved in my mind that I would never let an opportunity slip unimproved of avenging their blood upon the head of the enemies of the church of Jesus Christ. I felt as though I could not live; I knew not how to contain myself, and when I see one of the men who persuaded them to give up to be tried, I feel like cutting their throats yet. And I hope to live to avenge their blood; but if I do not I will teach my children and children’s children to the fourth generation as long as there is one descendant of the murderers upon the earth. (“Journal of Allen Joseph Stout,” pp. 13-14, as quoted in Orrin Porter Rockwell—Man of God, Son of Thunder, by Harold Schindler, p. 137)

Heber C. Kimball, who was a member of the First Presidency, said that “the whole people of the United States are under condemnation. They consented to the death of Joseph, Hyrum, David, Parley, and lots of men, women, and children” (Journal of Discourses, vol. 5, p. 253). The Mormon Apostle Orson Hyde said that “The blood of Joseph and Hyrum was shed. . . . Has the nation atoned for that blood? No. . . . they have drawn upon themselves the anger of God; and that blood has to be atoned for, . . .” (Ibid., vol. 6, p. 154). As late as October, 1885, the Apostle F. D. Richards said: “But, ah! the terrible fact exists that the blood of the prophets is upon this nation, . . .” (Ibid., vol. 26, p. 345).

Just after the turn of the century the Mormon leaders found themselves in serious trouble because of the “Oath of Vengeance.” They were questioned at great length concerning this oath in the “Reed Smoot Case.” The “Oath of Vengeance” remained in the temple ceremony, however, even after the “Reed Smoot Case” was printed, for Stanley S. Ivins told us that he took it in 1914. It must have been removed sometime between then and 1937, for Francis M. Darter made this complaint in a lecture delivered February 28, 1937:

The Law and prayer of Retribution, or divine judgment, against those who persecute the Saints, has been entirely removed from Temple services. . . . The reason why it was taken out, says one Apostle, was because it was offensive to the young people. (Celestial Marriage, by Francis M. Darter, 1937, p. 60)

Other Changes

Because the practice of polygamy was abandoned a number of changes had to be made in the temple ceremony. For instance, when the men took the “Law of Chastity” in earlier times they agreed that they would “not have sexual intercourse with any other than your lawful wife or wives, . . .” (Salt Lake Tribune, February 12, 1906). The words “or wives” have now been deleted.

In 1853, the Mormon Apostle Orson Pratt told how the first wife gave her husband a second wife in the endowment ceremony:

The wife stands on the left hand of her husband, while the bride stands on her left. The President, then, puts this question to the wife: “Are you willing to give this woman to your husband to be his lawful and wedded wife for time and for all eternity? If you are, you will manifest it by placing her right hand within the right hand of your husband.” The right hands of the bridegroom and bride, being thus joined, the wife takes her husband by the left arm, as if in the attitude of walking: . . . (The Seer, February 1853, p. 31)

This portion of the ceremony has, of course, been completely deleted since the practice of polygamy was abandoned.

The account of the temple ceremony printed in the Salt Lake Tribune on February 12, 1906, states that the Devil offered the preacher “four thousand dollars a year.” The preacher’s salary has now been raised to five thousand dollars. This raise, however, is not sufficient to preserve the original meaning of the ceremony. In 1906 four thousand dollars was a great deal of money. This part of the ceremony was evidently intended to give the Mormon people the impression that ministers are servants of the Devil and that they receive a great deal of money for their services. (It should be remembered that the Mormons claim that they do not have a paid ministry.) Today, many Mormons make well over five thousand dollars a year. Therefore, the ceremony does not give the same impression that it did in 1906. If the salary were raised to fifteen or twenty thousand dollars it would be more consistent with the idea which was originally intended.

The washing and anointing ceremonies seem to be more refined than they were in former times. A woman who had been through the endowment ritual before the turn of the century gave this account:

One of the women, an officiating high priestess, told me to come behind the curtain . . . I went, and after I was undressed. I had to step into a long bath, about half full of water, when another woman proceeded to wash me. I objected strongly to this part of the business, but she told me to show a more humble spirit. However, when she got down to my feet, she let me go, and I was turned over to . . . Bathsheba Smith . . . She looked thoroughly like business.

Another woman was standing beside her with a large wooden spoon and some green olive oil in a cow's horn. This woman poured the oil out of the spoon into Bathsheba's hand, who immediately put it on my head, ears, eyes, mouth, and every part of my body, and as she greased me, she muttered a kind of prayer over each member of my body: My head, that I might have knowledge of the truths of God: my eyes, that I might see the glories of the kingdom, my mouth, that I might at all times speak the truth, my arms, that they might be strong in the defense of the gospel, my bosom—here I must ask my readers not to think I want to tell this part of the story, but I do want people to know the truth, and how disgusting and indelicate this thing is. Mormon people deny many of these things, . . . but I solemnly assert that these things do exist. To continue: My bosom, that I might nourish the children whom I might raise by my husband. . . . and another part of my body that I might raise up a goodly seed, that they might be pillars of strength to the upbuilding and strengthening of God's kingdom upon the earth. And so she got down to my feet, when she hoped they might be swift in the paths of righteousness and truth. (Salt Lake Tribune, February 12, 1906)

For information on two other changes in the temple ceremony see The Mormon Kingdom, vol. 1, p. 138).

Testimony on Ceremony

On at least three different occasions Mormons or those who had formerly been Mormons were called upon to give testimony concerning the temple ceremony. Since this testimony throws important light on the ceremony before it was changed we will present some of it in this chapter.

Just after the turn of the century, the Mormon Apostle Reed Smoot was elected to serve in the United States Senate. Many people claimed that the Mormon leaders were still teaching polygamy and that the temple ceremony contained an oath against the Government of the United States. An investigation was made, and the testimony was published by the Government Printing Office. The first volume was printed in 1904 and the last appeared in 1906.

The Mormon historian B. H. Roberts made these comments in his testimony:

The CHAIRMAN. Can you tell the committee any portion of that ceremony?

Mr. ROBERTS. No, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. It was then a secret?

Mr. ROBERTS. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. . . . Ought sacred things to be kept from the world?

Mr. ROBERTS. I think some sacred things ought to be. (The Reed Smoot Case, vol. 1, pp. 741-743)

Angus M. Cannon, who was a Patriarch in the Mormon Church, made the following statements in his testimony:

The CHAIRMAN. Could you state the ceremony?

Mr. CANNON. I would not like to.

The CHAIRMAN. What objection is there to making that public?

Mr. CANNON. Because it is sacred.

The CHAIRMAN. . . . Do you promise specifically not to reveal what occurs in the endowment house?

Mr. CANNON. I would rather not tell what occurs there. . . . (The Reed Smoot Case, vol. 1, pp. 791-92)

J. H. Wallis, Sr., testified that he had been through the temple about 20 times. He gave the following information in his testimony:

Mr. WALLIS. The obligations of priesthood were taken, the two with the Aaronic priesthood and two with the Melchisedec. Would you like me to give the details of it?

Mr. TAYLER. Go on.

Mr. WALLIS. (standing). "You, and each of you, do solemnly promise and vow that I will not reveal this the first token of the Aaronic priesthood with its accompanying name, sign, and penalty. Should I do so"—this is the sign [indicating]—"I agree that my throat be cut from ear to ear and my tongue torn out by its roots from my mouth." . . .

Mr. TAYLER. That is called the Aaronic?

Mr. WALLIS. That is called the first token of the Aaronic priesthood. The second token of the Aaronic priesthood.—its sign is that [indicating], and the obligation commences the same, only that "I agree to have my breast cut asunder and my heart and vitals torn from my body."

Then the first token of the Melchisedec priesthood is this [indicating]; is this square [indicating], and about the same words, only that "I agree to have my body cut asunder in the midst and all my bowels gushed out." The second token of the Melchisedec priesthood there is no penalty to, but the sign is the crucifixion sign, and the words accompanying that are "Pale, hail, hail." I do not know what it means. . . .

Mr. TAYLER. At any other stage of that ceremony is there an obligation?

Mr. WALLIS. Yes, sir. . . . There are vows—the "vow of the sacrifices" is one—where we vow conjointly to give all our substance and all we might ever become possessed of to the support of the Church . . .

Mr. TAYLER. What other vow?

Mr. WALLIS. Another is called the "vow of chastity," by which we all vowed we would have no connection with any of the other sex unless they were given to us by the priesthood; and another vow was what we used to call the "oath of vengeance." . . .

Mr. TAYLER. Stand up, if it will help you, and give us the words, if you can.

Mr. WALLIS (standing up). "That you and each of you do promise and vow that you will never cease to importune high heaven to avenge the blood of the prophets upon the nations of the earth or the inhabitants of the earth." (The Reed Smoot Case, vol. 2, pp. 77-79)

The next day Mr. Wallis corrected his testimony concerning the "oath of vengeance":

Mr. WALLIS. In repeating the obligation of vengeance I find I made a mistake; I was wrong. It should have been "upon this nation." I had it "upon the inhabitants of the earth." It was a mistake on my part. (Ibid., pp. 148-149)

August W. Lundstrom made these statements in his testimony:

Mr. TAYLER. How many times did you take or hear the obligation of sacrifice and the obligation of retribution?

Mr. LUNDSTROM. Six times.

. . . .

Mr. TAYLER. Can you give us the obligation of retribution?

Mr. LUNDSTROM. I can.

Mr. TAYLER. You may give that.

Mr. LUNDSTROM. "We and each of us solemnly covenant and promise that we shall ask God to avenge the blood of Joseph Smith upon this nation." There is something more added, but that is all I can remember verbatim. That is the essential part.

Mr. TAYLER. What was there left of it? What else?

Mr. LUNDSTROM. It was in regard to teaching our children and children's children to the last generation to the same effect.

Mr. TAYLER. You were, you have stated, at one time a priest and councilor to what—to the stake president?

Mr. LUNDSTROM. No, sir; councilor to the bishop. (The Reed Smoot Case, vol. 2, pp. 151-153)

On December 15, 1904, August W. Lundstrom was recalled to the stand. In this testimony he stated:

Mr. LUNDSTROM. The penalty for revealing the tokens and violating any of the covenants are as follows: The first one is to have the throat cut from ear to ear. That is, we make the request there. I, August, ask that if I ever violate the covenant I entered into this day or reveal these tokens, that my throat be cut from ear to ear.

The CHAIRMAN. Go on. Give the others.

Mr. LUNDSTROM. Another is that I make the request that if I violate the covenant or reveal the tokens that I have my breast cut asunder and my vitals torn out. And the third is that my body be cut asunder and my entrails gushed out, making the same request every time. (The Reed Smoot Case, vol. 2, pp. 160-162)

August W. Lundstrom also gave this testimony:

Mr. LUNDSTROM. There are certain marks on the garment, as it is called—the garment of the holy priesthood.

The CHAIRMAN. What are those marks?

Mr. LUNDSTROM. There are the marks of the holy priesthood . . .

The CHAIRMAN. Would you state about on what portion of the garment these marks appear?

Mr. LUNDSTROM. There is a mark on the right and on the left breast one in front of the navel, and one on the right knee.

The CHAIRMAN. What are the marks? What is the nature of them, as to whether they are rents in the garment?

Mr. LUNDSTROM. The knee mark and the mark in front of the navel is like an ordinary buttonhole; but the mark on the left breast is like a pair of compasses and on the right breast it is like a square.

The CHAIRMAN. Are these garments worn by all who take the obligation?

Mr. LUNDSTROM. Yes, sir; they always wear it.

Senator DUBOIS. Do you mean by that that you shall never take them off?

Mr. LUNDSTROM. Not any longer time than necessary to change and put on clean ones. (The Reed Smoot Case, vol. 2, pp. 181-183)

Mrs. Annie Elliot made these statements in her testimony:

Mr. TAYLER. Then what is the next thing that you remember about that?

Mrs. ELLIOTT. It was where we took the oaths then, which I think it is very embarrassing for me to say them.

Mr. TAYLER. Tell us what you remember.

Mrs. ELLIOTT. One, I remember, they told me to pray and never cease to pray to get revenge on the blood of the prophets on this nation, and also teach it to my children and children's children.

Mr. TAYLER. Was there any other obligation?

. . . .

Mrs. ELLIOTT. Well, it was that if I ever revealed anything what was done in there, I was to have my throat cut from ear to ear and tear out my tongue by the roots. That was one of them.

Mr. TAYLER. Anything else that you remember?

Mrs. ELLIOTT. Yes; there is some more.

Mr. TAYLER. State them, if you can.

Mrs. ELLIOTT. I do not feel like I can. I think it was at that time too serious, and I have always thought I would put it away and never mention it, and it seems like it is hard for me to do it. Of course, if I have to, I can.

The CHAIRMAN. Of course, witness, it is hard and difficult, but state it in your own way the substance of what you remember.

Mrs. ELLIOTT. Well, it was also at a certain place that if I revealed anything my breast would be cut open and my vitals would be torn out, and another place that my abdomen would be torn open and the entrails squirt out.

Mr. TAYLER. Do you remember anything of an obligation or oath of sacrifice, Mrs. Elliott?

Mrs. ELLIOTT. Yes, sir; that we was to sacrifice all we owned if it was called for.

Mr. TAYLER. To what?

Mrs. ELLIOTT. To the church. (The Reed Smoot Case, vol. 2, pp. 189-190)

Hugh M. Dougall made these statements in his testimony:

Mr. WORTHINGTON. I want to ask you whether you, or any of those who went through with you, to your knowledge, were called upon to agree to what I now read, or to it in substance.

"That you, and each of you, do promise and vow that you will never cease to importune High Heaven to avenge the blood of the prophets upon this nation."

Mr. DOUGALL. No, sir.

Mr. WORTHINGTON. Did anything like that occur?

Mr. DOUGALL. Well, as I remember, there is something that might possibly have resembled that.

The CHAIRMAN. We can not hear the witness.

Mr. DOUGALL. There was something, as I remember, that might have led one to believe that such a thing was being done. As I remember it, they importuned Heaven to avenge the blood of the prophets and the martyrs on this generation, I think.

. . . .

The CHAIRMAN. How long did it take to perform the ceremony?

Mr. DOUGALL. It took from probably early in the morning till about 4 o'clock . . .

The CHAIRMAN. A very lengthy ceremony?

Mr. DOUGALL. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Can you tell the committee what it was?

Mr. DOUGALL. No, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Why not?

Mr. DOUGALL. Conscientious scruples. I have promised secrecy. I have kept it for forty years or more, and feel under moral obligation to keep it.

The CHAIRMAN. Were you sworn to secrecy?

Mr. DOUGALL. I think so. As I remember it, I was. I think so.

. . . .

The CHAIRMAN. Was there any penalty attached if you did reveal it?

Mr. DOUGALL. I think there was.

. . . .

The CHAIRMAN. Was it a severe penalty?

Mr. DOUGALL. As my memory goes, I think it was.

The CHAIRMAN. Was it a penalty of death?

Mr. DOUGALL. I do not think that I care about answering any more questions on that point, Senator. (The Reed Smoot Case, vol. 2, pp. 759, 762-764)

Alonzo Arthur Noon gave testimony on Jan. 14, 1905. In his testimony we find the following:

The CHAIRMAN. Then you regarded the organization at that time as a secret organization, of course?

Mr. NOON. I did.

The CHAIRMAN. Was there any penalty attached to the disclosure of the ceremony?

Mr. NOON. Yes; there was a penalty.

The CHAIRMAN. Was it a severe penalty?

Mr. NOON. Fairly severe. . . .

The CHAIRMAN. . . . Was it a penalty of expulsion?

Mr. NOON. I believe that is a question I would refuse to answer.

The CHAIRMAN. What do you say as to the penalty being the tearing out of the tongue or the tearing open of the breasts and taking out the vitals? What do you say about that?

Mr. NOON. I answer the same as the other—that is, I would refuse to answer it.

The CHAIRMAN. You decline to answer it?

Mr. NOON. I decline to answer. (The Reed Smoot Case, vol. 2, p. 779)

Walter M. Wolfe, who had been “professor of geology” at “Brigham Young College,” made these statements:

Mr. CARLISLE. How many times have you passed through the Endowment House?

Mr. WOLFE. Not less than twelve.

. . . .

Mr. WOLFE. The law of vengeance is this: “You and each of you do covenant and promise that you will pray, and never cease to pray, Almighty God to avenge the blood of the prophets upon this nation, and that you will teach the same to your children and your children’s children unto the third and fourth generations.” At the conclusion the speaker says: “All bow your heads and say yes.”

Mr. CARLISLE. Was that done?

Mr. WOLFE. It was done.

Senator OVERMAN. Was that done every time or just one time?

Mr. WOLFE. It was done every time I went through.

Senator OVERMAN. That was twelve times?

Mr. WOLFE. Yes, sir.

Mr. CARLISLE. . . . was any ceremony of anointing gone through?

Mr. WOLFE. Yes, sir.

Mr. CARLISLE. What is done in that ceremony?

Mr. WOLFE. Those who participate in it are washed. The different parts of the body, from the head to the feet, are washed, and blessings are pronounced with the washing, and the anointing is done with oil from the head to the feet, and the blessing is pronounced with that. (The Reed Smoot Case, vol. 4, pp. 6-7)

In his testimony, William Jones Thomas made this statement concerning the “Oath of Vengeance”:

Mr. THOMAS. It was, in substance, that I would seek to avenge the blood of the prophet Joseph Smith upon this nation, and teach my children the same unto the third and fourth generations, as near as I can remember. That was the substance of it. (The Reed Smoot Case, vol. 4, pp. 68-69)

Even though several witnesses claimed that there was no “oath of vengeance” in the temple ceremony, the Committee on Privileges and Elections” (except for a minority who issued a separate report) felt that the testimony given by the rest of the witnesses was strong enough to prove the existence of such an oath. The following appeared in the report issued by that committee:

In the protest signed and verified by the oath of Mr. Leilich it is claimed that Mr. Smoot has taken an oath as an apostle of the Mormon Church which is of such a nature as to render him incompetent to hold the office of Senator. From the testimony taken it appears that Mr. Smoot has taken an obligation which is prescribed by the Mormon Church and administered to those who go through a ceremony known as “taking the endowments.” It was testified by a number of witnesses who were examined during the investigation that one part of this obligation is expressed in substantially these words:

You and each of you do covenant and promise that you will pray and never cease to pray Almighty God to avenge the blood of the prophets upon this nation, and that you will teach the same to your children and to your children’s children unto the third and fourth generation.

. . . .
The evidence showing that such an obligation is taken is further supported by proof that during the endowment ceremonies a prayer is offered asking God to avenge the blood of Joseph Smith upon this nation, . . .

That an obligation of vengeance is part of the endowment ceremony is further attested by the fact that shortly after testimony had been given on that subject before the committee, Bishop Daniel Connelly of the Mormon Church denounced the witnesses who had given this testimony as traitors who had broken their oaths to the church.

The fact that an oath of vengeance is part of the endowment ceremonies and the nature and character of such oath was judicially determined in the third judicial court of Utah in the year 1889 in the matter of the application of John Moore and others to become citizens of the United States. . . .

The obligation hereinbefore set forth is an oath of disloyalty to the Government which the rules of the Mormon Church require, or at least encourage, every member of that organization to take.

It is in harmony with the views and conduct of the leaders of the Mormon people in former days, when they openly defied the Government of the United States, . . . It may be that many of those who take this obligation do so without realizing its treasonable import; but the fact that the first presidency and twelve apostles retain an obligation of that nature in the ceremonies of the church shows that at heart they are hostile to this nation and disloyal to its Government. (The Reed Smoot Case, vol. 4, pp. 495-497)

In 1889 John Moore and W. J. Edgar were denied citizenship because they were members of the Mormon Church and had taken the oaths in the Endowment House. In the “Opinion and Decision of the Court” we read:

Objection was made, however, to the admission of John Moore and William J. Edgar upon the ground that they were members of the Mormon Church, and also because they had gone through the Endowment House of that church and there had taken an oath or obligation incompatible with the oath of citizenship they would be required to take if admitted. . . .

Those objecting to the right of these applicants to be admitted to citizenship introduced eleven witnesses, who had been members of the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-Day Saints, commonly called the Mormon Church. Several of these witnesses had held the position of bishop in the church and all had gone through the endowment house and participated in its ceremonies. . . . That these ceremonies occupy the greater part of a day, and include the taking of an oath, obligation, or covenant by all who receive their endowments that they will avenge the blood of the prophets, Joseph and Hyrum Smith, upon the Government of the United States and will enjoin this obligation upon their children unto the third and fourth generations; that they will obey the priesthood in all things, and will never reveal the secrets of the endowment house under the penalty of having their throats cut from ear to ear, their bowels torn out, and their hearts cut out of their bodies.

The right arm is anointed that it may be strong to avenge the blood of the prophets. . . . The evidence established beyond any reasonable doubt that the endowment ceremonies are inconsistent with the oath an applicant for citizenship is required to take, and that the oaths, obligations, or covenants there made or entered into are incompatible with the obligations and duties of citizens of the United States. The applications of John Moore and Walter J. Edgar, both of whom were shown on the former examination to be members of the Mormon Church, and to have gone through the endowment house, are therefore denied.

(Opinion of Judge Anderson, rendered in the third judicial court at Salt Lake City, Utah, November 30, 1899, as quoted in The Reed Smoot Case, vol. 4, pp. 341-343)

Some of the testimony given in 1889 was actually printed in the Mormon-owned Deseret News. John Bond made these statements in his testimony:

Court—Let the witness state what transpired.

The witness Bond testified — I went through several rooms; in room 5 I took what I call an obligation, named the Aaronic Priesthood, which confined me to obey every doctrine of the Church, especially against the government of the United States. The penalty was that I was to have my throat cut and my tongue torn out. Then I was required to take an oath that I would avenge the blood of Joseph Smith on this nation, and teach my children and my children's children to the latest generation. The penalty was to have my heart and bowels torn out. Another obligation was to obey the Priesthood in all things. Wilford Woodruff put me through this ceremony and married me. I was sorry I took the oath, and resigned from the Church the next year. . . . There were about 50 other persons there who went through the same ceremony there were two polygamists; my wife was asked if she would allow her husband to take more wives than one; a vote was taken and all responded "aye;" we took obligations not to divulge these ceremonies, and penalties were attached which I do not remember. . . . I took an obligation to avenge the blood of the Prophets on the United States. I took the obligation to go into polygamy. (Deseret Evening News, November 14, 1889)

Martin D. Wardell made these statements in his testimony:

. . . in 1863 or 1864 I went through the Endowment House; I went through a second time about a year later; I took an oath that we would avenge the blood of Joseph Smith on this nation, from the President down; they put the lock on to us with an oath that if we revealed any of the secrets we would have our throats cut and our bowels torn out; we were asked to take an oath to obey the Church in all matters, . . . (Deseret Evening News, November 14, 1889)

Andrew Cahoon made these statements:

. . . I was a Bishop 18 years; was one when I left the Church; I received my Endowments 44 years ago, and am familiar with the ceremony so far as my memory goes; never officiated; got my endowments in 1845 or 1846; I took obligations there—everyone has to; there are oaths administered there; they relate to obeying the Priesthood, and to avenge the blood of the Prophets; this was understood to mean Joseph and Hyrum; the blood was to be avenged on any who were guilty of shedding the blood, or consenting to it; there was also a covenant to yield implicit obedience, at all times to the Priesthood; the penalty was death for revealing any of the secrets; I did not understand how the penalty was to be inflicted; the understanding was that if a man apostatized and divulged the secrets he should meet the death penalty; there was something about the throat being cut, and being disemboweled; the right hand was also forfeited; one of the penalties was for disobedience to the Priesthood. (Deseret Evening News, November 14, 1889)

James McGuffie made these statements in his testimony:

. . . I went through only once . . . They then required us to take an oath, and to teach our children and our children's children to do all we could to uproot the American government, because they had not punished the murderers of Joseph Smith. We took an oath that we would obey the Priesthood in all things; we were citizens of the Kingdom of God, and were to be enemies of the government of the United States, because they did not avenge the blood of Joseph and Hyrum. The penalties were to have our throats cut, and our hearts and bowels torn out. The penalty was death. That was told to us, and we believed it would be done. (Deseret Evening News, November 14, 1889)

R. N. Baskin quotes the following from the testimony of Dr. Heber John Richards:

Q. Did you take any obligation under penalty? I wish you would state it in substance.

A. I couldn't do it — I couldn't do it if I was willing, and I don't feel willing to.

Q. Well, doctor, it has been stated upon the witness stand that if a man apostatized from the church, the duty of those who had been through the endowment house, was to go and murder or kill him. Did you hear anything of that sort?

A. No, sir. I can explain to you, what I understood by that was simply this: That after I had become a member of the church, if I then fell away, I could get remission if I went voluntarily and asked for the atonement of my blood, but not without it; it must come by my desire, the same as baptism does. If I was taken out and baptized against my will, it would do me no good; and if I was killed against my will it would do me no good.

Q. And it would be appropriate when they made the request for some brother to shed his blood?

A. Yes, some person who was authorized to do so.

Q. And it wouldn't be murder?

A. It wouldn't be murder—it would be murder probably in the eyes of the law, but not in the eyes of the church.

Q. And that was taught?

A. That was taught. (Reminiscences of Early Utah, pp. 97-98)

Just before the turn of the century, a dispute arose concerning some property in Independence, Missouri. Joseph Smith had stated that a temple should be built there. Both the Church of Christ and the Reorganized LDS Church claimed the property and the issue was finally settled in court. Mormon leaders and others who had been through the temple ceremony were called upon to give testimony. Mercy Rachel Thompson made these statements in her testimony:

Q.—Did they anoint the whole body with oil, or just the head?

A.—Well, now you are asking these questions, and I have answered them as far as I can, but that is a question I do not feel I am called on to answer, but I did not take an oath not to tell it at any time. . . . I decline to answer the question whether in taking endowments we anointed the body with oil. I did not take any obligation not to reveal that, but I decline to answer it because I do not feel disposed to tell you. It is something you have no business to ask me, and I do not feel like telling you. . . . the endowments in Nauvoo and in Salt Lake City were the same, but I decline to tell you how they were given in Salt Lake. . . . I saw the caps and moccasins that were worn by the ladies in Nauvoo while they were taking endowments there. I will not look at the pictures in Exhibit D to see if it is a representation of the caps and moccasins. I will not look at it, because I am afraid to look at it, and I do not want to look at it, because if it is true, it is something we never dared to draw or make any representation of, because it is sacred, and the Lord would never allow any such things to be without manifesting his displeasure or anger. (The Temple Lot Case, Lamoni, Iowa, 1893, pp. 354, 355, 357)

John Hawley made these statements in his testimony:

I went to Salt Lake City in 1856, . . . they gave the endowments of washing and anointing, and then there was an oath taken in Utah to avenge the blood of the prophet. . . . I remember the leaves there on the apron and the form of the apron, I remember that very well. . . .

In taking the endowments at Salt Lake there was an oath required, and the oath that was required was to avenge the blood or death of the prophet. . . . We were made to swear to avenge the death of Joseph Smith the martyr, together with that of his brother Hyrum, on this American nation, and that we would teach our children and children's children to do so. The penalty for this grip and oath was disembowelment. . . .

I would not have discussed the methods of these endowments when I was a member of the Utah Church. The penalty for revealing or disclosing these secrets was disembowelment.

The grips and tokens of the priesthood were what we were not to disclose. . . . I kept the obligations while I was living in Salt Lake City. (The Temple Lot Case, pages 453, 456-459)

In The Mormon Kingdom, vol. 1, pages 140-150, we give even more testimony on the temple ceremony, but this should be sufficient to show that the oaths given in the temple ceremony were originally very crude. They were the product of the time when the Mormon leaders were stressing the doctrine of “Blood Atonement.” After the Mormon leaders stopped preaching the doctrine of “Blood Atonement,” it became necessary to modify the oaths.

Sealing Men to Men

Although it is a well known fact that the Mormons believe in sealing women to men and children to their parents for all eternity, few people know about the doctrine of sealing men to men. Brigham Young, the second President of the Mormon Church, called the doctrine of sealing men to men “a great and glorious doctrine”:

By this power men will be sealed to men back to Adam, completing and making perfect the chain of the Priesthood from his day to the winding up scene. I have known men that I positively think would fellowship the Devil, if he would agree to be sealed to them. “Oh, be sealed to me, Brother; I care not what you do. You may lie and steal, or anything else, I can put up with all your meanness, if you will only be sealed to me.” Now this is not so much weakness as it is selfishness. It is a great and glorious doctrine, but the reason I have not preached it in the midst of this people, is, I could not do it without turning so many of them to the Devil. Some would go to hell for the sake of getting the devil sealed to them. (Journal of Discourses, vol. 9, p. 269)

On page 270 of the same volume, Brigham Young said:

If men are sealed to me, it is because they want to be; and if they will be good, and hearken to my counsel and live a righteous life, I will agree to dictate and counsel them; but when men want to be sealed to me to have me feed and clothe them, and then act like the Devil, I have no more feeling and affection for them than I have for the greatest stranger in the world. Because a man is sealed to me, do you suppose that he can escape being judged according to his works? No.

Kimball Young gives us the following information:

That this masculine principle went deep, and far more fantastically than the Saints could comprehend, is shown in a sermon by Brigham Young, reported by John Read. In a letter to one of his wives Read said that Brigham referred to some future time “when men would be sealed to men in the priesthood in a more solemn ordinance than that by which women were sealed to man, and in a room over that in which women were sealed to man in the temple of the Lord. (Isn't One Wife Enough? p. 280)

This doctrine of sealing men to men was evidently known as the “Law of Adoption.” Juanita Brooks explains:

At this time another ceremony was instituted, which though it was of short duration and never widely practiced, was significant and important while it lasted. This was the adoption of young men and their wives to one of the leaders. The idea behind it was that in establishing the Kingdom of God upon the earth there should be also a celestial relationship. If the Prophet Joseph were to become a God over a minor planet, he must not only have a large posterity but able assistants of practical skills. Brigham Young had been “sealed” to Joseph under this law; now he in turn had some thirty-eight young men sealed to him.

Of this number, John D. Lee was second. . . . All of the men thus joined in the covenant seemed brothers in one sense, and for some of them Lee developed a genuine affection. Among others, jealousies grew up as they competed for favor.

In the same way, Lee had eighteen or nineteen young men with their wives adopted to him, most of them those he had brought into the church. He often spoke of them as George Laub Lee, W. B. Owens Lee, Miles Anderson Lee, James Pace Lee, Allen Weeks Lee, William Swap Lee. (John D. Lee, by Juanita Brooks, 1962, p. 73)

Juanita Brooks also stated: “Joseph Smith had sealed to himself a number of his most faithful followers, among them the first members of the Council of Fifty, to help to establish the Kingdom of God upon this earth...Brigham Young had adopted at least forty young men with their wives and families in a temple ceremony. Many of these added his name to their own . . .” (On The Mormon Frontier, The Diary of Hosea Stout, vol. 1, p. 178, n. 50). John D. Lee said that he was “the second one adopted to Brigham Young. I should have been his first adopted son, being the first that proposed it to him, but always ready to give preference to those in authority, I placed A. P. Rockwood’s name first on the list” (Confessions of John D. Lee, p. 170). Lee took the doctrine of adoption very serious. He often referred to Brigham Young as “Father Young.” At one time he was sick and Brigham Young came to visit him. Speaking of this incident John D. Lee stated: “About 3 . . . Father B.Y. brought and laid on my breast a cane built from one of the branches of the Tree of Life that stood in the garden in the Temple” (Journals of John D. Lee, 1846-47 and 1859, edited by Charles Kelly, p. 67). On another occasion John D. Lee stated:

Walked to Pres. B. Young’s, . . . Had the pleasure of drinking a glass of wine made by himself. . . . Spent 2 hours conversing with him and hearing him explain the Law of Adoption. . . . he suggested to me the propriety of taking some 20 or 30 of the brethren down into the settlements and take contracts of threshing and cleaning wheat . . . My reply was to him, Father, thy will be done. (Ibid., pp. 37-38)

The historian Hubert Howe Bancroft said that older men could be sealed to younger men as their sons:

The father may be either younger or older than the son, but in any case assumes the character of guardian, with full control of the labor and estate of the adopted son. (History of Utah, photo-reprint of 1889 Edition, p. 361)

Brigham Young was apparently embarrassed because some of the “old persons,” who were adopted to him, were calling him father. He stated:

I have a request to make of my family and that is that they (especially old persons) omit calling me Father. Call me Bro. Brigham. (Journals of John D. Lee, p. 82)

To Brigham Young the Law of Adoption was a serious matter. Under the date of January 6, 1847, he recorded the following in his history:

Thomas Alvord wrote to me . . . I replied as follows:

“In answer to your questions I reply, inasmuch as you have made a covenant with bro. Samuel Bent to be sealed to him and be attached to his kingdom, you ought to keep that covenant; and when there is some one to act in his stead, or as proxy for him (as he is fallen asleep) and a Temple built for such purposes, you must attend to it, and if you should not live, you must leave on record your request with some of your relatives, or some one you shall select.” (“Manuscript History of Brigham Young,” January 6, 1847, typed copy)

Under the date of January 16, 1847, the following appears in the “Manuscript History of Brigham Young”:

I said some men were afraid they would lose some glory if they were sealed to one of the Twelve, and did not stand alone and have others sealed to them. A Saint’s kingdom consisted of his own posterity, and to be sealed to one of the Twelve did not diminish him, but only connected him according to the law of God by that perfect chain and order of Heaven, that will bind the righteous from Adam to the last Saint.

Under the date of February 23, 1847, Brigham Young even claimed that he saw Joseph Smith in a dream and asked him concerning the law of adoption:

23RD—. . . I related the following dream: While sick and asleep about noonday of the 17th inst., I dreamed that

I went to see Joseph. He looked perfectly natural, sitting with his feet on the lower round of his chair. I took hold of his right hand and kissed him many times, and said to him: "Why is it that we cannot be together as we used to be, You have been from us a long time, and we want your society and I do not like to be separated from you."

Joseph rising from his chair and looking at me with his usual, earnest, expressive and pleasing countenance replied, "It is all right."

I said, "I do not like to be away from you."

Joseph said, "It is all right; we cannot be together yet; we shall be by and by; but you will have to do without me a while, and then we shall be together again."

I then discovered there was a hand rail between us,

Joseph stood by a window and to the southwest of him it was very light. I was in the twilight and to the north of me it was very dark; I said, "Brother Joseph, the brethren you know well, better than I do; you raised them up, and brought the Priesthood to us. The brethren have a great anxiety to understand the Law of Adoption or sealing principles; and if you have a word of counsel for me I should be glad to receive it."

Joseph stepped toward me, and looking very earnestly, yet pleasantly said, "Tell the people to be humble and faithful. . . . Be sure to tell the people to keep the Spirit of the Lord; and if they will, they will find themselves just as they were organized by our Father in Heaven before they came into the world. Our Father in heaven organized the human family, but they are all disorganized and in great confusion."

Joseph then shewed me the pattern, how they were in the beginning. This I cannot describe, but I saw it, and saw where the Priesthood had been taken from the earth and how it must be joined together, so that there would be a perfect chain from Father Adam to his latest posterity. Joseph again said, "Tell the people to be sure to keep the Spirit of the Lord and follow it, and it will lead them just right." ("Manuscript History of Brigham Young," February 23, 1847, typed copy)

Under the date of February 28, 1847, Hosea Stout told that Brigham Young related his dream and called it a "vision of God":

At six went to a High Council as usual. There was not much done of interest except some remarks of President Young which I will give in short It is in relation to a spell of sickness he had had lately. He spoke as follows. . . .

On Wednesday morning I was taken ill and it has been asked if I had a vision . . .

All that I know, is what my wife told me about it since. She said that I said, I had been where Joseph & Hyrum was.

And again that I said, it is hard coming to life again.

But I know that I went to the world of spirits; but what I saw I know not, for the vision went away from me, as a dream which you loose when you awake.

The next day I had a dream.

I dreamed that I saw Joseph sitting in a room, . . .

I told him that the Latter Day Saints was very anxious to know about the Law of Adoption, and the sealings powers & c and desired word of council from him. . . .

I saw how we were organized before we took tabernacles and every man will be restored to that which he had then, and all will be satisfied. After this I turned away & saw Joseph was in the edge of the light; but where I had to go was as midnight darkness.

He said I must go back, so I went back in the darkness.

I want you all to remember my dream for I [sic] it is a vision of God and was revealed through the spirit of Joseph.

(On The Mormon Frontier, The Diary of Hosea Stout, edited by Juanita Brooks, vol. 1, pp. 237-238)

John D. Lee also told of Brigham Young's "vision" in his journal (see The Case Against Mormonism, vol. 1, p. 21).

The Law of Adoption evidently caused a great deal of dissension among the Mormons. In a sermon delivered on February 16, 1847, Brigham Young stated:

Such jealousies do exist and were I to say to the elders you now have the liberty to build up your kingdoms, one half of them would lie, swear, steal and fight like the very devil to get men and women sealed to them. They would even try to pass right by me and go to Jos. thinking to get between mine and the 12. Some have already tried to use an influence against me, but such jealousies and selfishness shall be stopped and if the brethren do not stop it I will blow it to the four winds by making them all come and be sealed to me and I through my father, and he and all this church to Jos. . . .

I have gathered a number of families around me through the Law of Adoption and seal of the covenant according to the order of the priesthood and others have done likewise, it being the means of salvation left to bring us back to God. (Journals of John D. Lee, edited by Charles Kelly, pp. 80-81)

In the same sermon Brigham Young stated:

Those that are adopted into my family and take me for their counsellor, if I continue faithfully I will preside over them throughout all eternity and will stand at their head and Jos. will stand at the head of this church and will be their president, prophet and God to the people in this dispensation. When we locate I will settle my family down in the order and teach them their duties. They will then have to provide temporal blessings for me instead of my boarding from 40 to 50 persons as I now do, and will administer spiritual blessings to them. (Ibid., p. 83)

Brigham Young claimed that the Law of Adoption would bring great exaltation to the faithful:

Pres. B. Young . . . continued his remarks on the Law of Adoption. Granted the brethren permission to ask questions when they did not fully comprehend his meaning. The Lord introduced the Law of Adoption for the benefit of the children of men . . . This principle I ans[w]er is not clearly understood by many of [the] Elders in this church at the present time as it will hereafter be, and I confess that I have had only a smattering of these things, but when it is necessary I will attain to more knowledge on the subject . . . I have often heard elders say that they were [not] dependent on any man. . . . I consider that we are all dependent on one another for our exaltation, that our interests is inseparately connected (for example) what can my family do without me? Supposing they were to all turn away from me, I hold the keys over them through which they are to receive their exaltation. Would they not be like sheep that are without a shepherd and would be devoured by the wolves? (Ans.) They certainly would. Then let us change the position and say that I would cut off all my family, then what glory would I have with nobody to rule over but my own dear little self? To tell you my feelings I would rather be annihilated than to be in that situation. . . . I will show you a rule by which you may comprehend the exaltation of the faithful. I will use myself as a figure and say that I am ruler over ten sons and soon each one of them will have 10 men sealed to them and then they would be rulers over them and that would make me ruler over ten presidents (or rather kings), whereas before I was ruler over 10 subjects only. Or in other words I ruled over one kingdom whereas I now rule over 10. Then let each one of those ten get ten more and then I would be ruler of 100 kingdoms and so on continue through all eternity and the more honor and glory that I could bestow upon my sons the more it would add to my exaltation but to clip the thread of your exaltation then where would be your glory. . . . if you wish to advance, hold up the hands of your file leader and as the Yankee says, boost him ahead and should you have 10 legions of trains follow on after you you should say to your file leader, push ahead for I am coming with my train, boosting up at the same [time] instead of trying to pass. To him the word would stimulate him and he would say, come on my boys, I will travel as fast as you can and on we would go in one solid train th[r]ough all eternity.

Before I stop I will answer a question that has been repeatedly asked me (E.I.) should I have a father dead that has never heard this gospel, would it be required of men to redeem him and then have him adopted into some man's family and I be adopted to my father? (I ans. No.) If we have to attend to the ordinances of redemption for our dead relatives we then become their saviours and were we to wait to redeem our dead relatives before we could link the chains of the P.H. we would never accomplish it. (Journals of John D. Lee, 1846-47 and 1859, Edited by Charles Kelly, pp. 86-89)

The following statements by the Mormon leaders appear in John D. Lee's journal under the date of Feb. 17, 1847:

I [Heber C. Kimball is speaking] look upon the law of adoption as being the means of uniting families together by the connecting links of the priesthood, still I am aware that many have had trials for fear that they had given away their birthright when if [in?] fact they had none, not having been adopted. . . . But to urge anyone to be adopted or sealed to you it is like damming water to make it run up hill, it always breaks over unless [you] are all the time draining and is but dammed water at last. . . . Dr. Richards (the Historian) addressed the collection. Said . . . I but seldom ever address this people. . . . One item that caught my attention was this thing of jealousy, fearing that some now is rising or gaining power and influence faster than what I am. Therefore jealousy will arise which causes an envious feelings in our bosom and we imagine that man is lexeering [electioneering] and using unlawful measures to gain an influence. . . . Elder W. Woodruff said he never before enjoyed himself as well as he did under the instructions of yesterday's and today's while my brethren were reasoning upon the law of adoption, seal of the covenant and priesthood, a subject of deep and thrilling interest to us all. Yet I have had but little instruction on this important subject although I have much desired. I have never had the privilege of having anyone adopted into my family. At the time those ordinances were attended to I was absent on a mission, consequently have never lectioneered much and I do not know that I have ever asked a man to be adopted into my family. . . . Elder G. A. Smith said he and Bro. Amasa Lyman have just returned from a mission on the other side of the river but he durst [not] say as Bro. Pratt and Woodruff has, that he had not lectioneered, for I have with all my might, but if I have lectioneered to the injury and hurt of any man I am ignorant of it. I always lectioneered but for the good of this cause and so does Bro. Pratt and all my brethren. But there is one thing that I don't like to see and that is this thing called jealousy stirring up family disturbances and broils because we are afraid that some man is gaining favor and I am not advancing as fast as they are. And in order to keep back or stop their influence we go to those that have been sealed and discourage them saying why didnt [you] go come with me where none but the respected are? Was you not as capable of holding the keys of presidency yourself as Bro. Lee who has probably 10 or 15 men sealed to him? Certainly you (I use Bro. Lee present because he is the 1st man I see) were. Then you should have gone to serve the 12 and thereby caused dissatisfaction. For example suppose I was to jump every man and be sealed to the great God and have 3 only sealed to me. I don't think my kingdom would be very large or my glory very great. Not more so than it would be was I sealed to the most obscure Saint in this Kingdom. I could get no more. I should be dependent on the exertion of those who were sealed to me. But was I sealed to the most obscure individual in this church and I had 10s of 10,000 sealed to me, would not my glory be greater than it would be was I sealed to headquarters with my 3 only? Certainly it would. It does [not] matter so much where we are sealed provided we form a part of link the Priesthood. Then let jealousy stop and be united that we may speedily build up the kingdom of God on the earth, & c. (Journals of John D. Lee, February 17, 1847, pp. 91-94)

Under the date of July 13, 1846, Hosea Stout made this entry in his journal concerning the Mormon Apostle Orson Hyde:

This evening Elder O. Hyde spoke at length . . . on the Law of Adoption. The first sermon I ever heard publicly. He desired all who felt willing to do so to give him a pledge to come into his kingdom when the ordinance could be attended to but wished all to select the man whom they choose & c. (On The Mormon Frontier; The Diary of Hosea Stout, vol. 1, p. 178)

In a footnote on the same page, Juanita Brooks stated:

Since some of the apostles had been away on missions, they had not heard of this plan, and so could not share the possible glory. Here Orson Hyde is definitely trying to secure some adopted children; . . . The whole plan became the subject of so much controversy that it was all dropped and the practice abandoned.

There can be little doubt that the idea of sealing men to men caused many bad feelings. Hosea Stout made this statement in his journal under the date of December 9, 1847:

There was a Council today . . . & John D. Lee's case up Most of his wives & adopted children were dissatisfied with him & I believe it was so managed to let all go free who chose when 2 wives & almost all of his adopted children stepped out. (On The Mormon Frontier; The Journals of Hosea Stout, vol. 1, p. 290)

Juanita Brooks made this comment in a footnote on the same page:

Four of Lee's adopted sons accepted their freedom at once; others continued with friendly relations but without any constraint. This action was really a death blow to the whole system of Adoption already a bone-of-contention among the Mormon leaders. Once in the valley, no one honored it, so that its very existence is now largely forgotten.

Charles Kelly made this statement concerning the doctrine of sealing men to men: "Like many other Mormon doctrines, it was but a passing fad, and is now ignored and forgotten" (Journals of John D. Lee, 1846-47 and 1859, edited by Charles Kelly, p. 88, n. 87).

In 1894 Wilford Woodruff, the fourth President of the Mormon Church, repudiated the doctrine of adoption and claimed that a man should be sealed to his own father. Woodruff admitted that some friends had been sealed to him, but he stated that he had "peculiar feelings about it":

I have not felt satisfied, neither did President Taylor, neither has any man since the Prophet Joseph who has attended to the ordinance of adoption in the temples of our God. We have felt that there was more to be revealed upon this subject than we had received. Revelations were given to us in the St. George Temple, which President Young presented to the Church of God. Changes were made there, and we still have more changes to make, in order to satisfy our Heavenly Father, satisfy our dead and ourselves. I will tell you what some of them are. I have prayed over this matter, and my brethren have. We have felt, as President Taylor said, that we have got to have more revelation concerning sealing under the Law of Adoption. Well, what are these changes? One of them is the principle of adoption. In the commencement of adopting men and women in the temple at Nauvoo, a great many persons were adopted to different men who were not of the lineage of their fathers, and there was a spirit manifested by some in that work that was not of God. Men would go out and electioneer and labor with all their power to get men adopted to them. One instance I will name here: A man went around Nauvoo asking every man he could, "You come and be adopted to me, and I shall stand at the head of the kingdom, and you will be there with me." . . . Men are in danger sometimes in being adopted to others, until they know who they are and what they will be. Now, what are the feelings of Israel? They have felt that they wanted to be adopted to somebody. President Young was not satisfied in his mind with regard to the extent of this matter; President Taylor was not. When I went before the Lord to know who I should be adopted to (we were then being adopted to prophets and apostles), the Spirit of God said to me, “Have you not a father, who begot you?” “Yes, I have.” “Then why not honor him?” “Yes,” says I, “that is right.” I was adopted to my father, and should have had my father sealed to his father, and so on back; and the duty that I want every man who presides over a temple to see performed from this day henceforth and forever, unless the Lord Almighty commands otherwise, is, let every man be adopted to his father. When a man receives the endowments, adopt him to his father; not to Wilford Woodruff, nor to any other man outside the lineage of his fathers. That is the will of God to this people. . . . I say let every man be adopted to his father; . . . It is my duty to honor my father who begot me in the flesh. It is your duty to do the same. When you do this, the Spirit of God will be with you. And we shall continue this work, the Lord adding light to that which we have already received. I have had friends adopted to me. We all have, more or less. But I have had peculiar feelings about it, especially lately. There are men in this congregation who wish to be adopted to me. I say to them to day, if they can hear me, Go and be adopted to your fathers, and save your fathers, . . . A man may say, “I am an Apostle, or I am a High Priest, or I am an Elder in Israel, and if I am adopted to my father, will it take any honor from me?” I would say not. . . . Those of you who stand here—I do not care whether you are Apostles or what you are—by honoring your fathers you will not take any honor from your heads; you will hold the keys of the salvation of your father’s house, as Joseph Smith does. You will lose nothing by honoring your fathers and redeeming your dead. (Millennial Star, vol. 56 pp. 337-341)

On April 8, 1894, George Q. Cannon, a member of the First Presidency of the Mormon Church, also repudiated the Law of Adoption. He stated that since the Nauvoo period he had never thought about the Law of Adoption without having “a certain amount of fear concerning it”:

. . . as has been beautifully explained this morning by President Woodruff, it is our duty to be sealed to our parents, that our lineage may be preserved; . . . in the minds of many there has been a feeling of doubt in regard to this principle of adoption as it was being practiced among us. I well remember myself in my boyhood days that which President Woodruff has referred to—the spirit that was manifested by many at the dedication of the temple at Nauvoo when the ordinances were administered there. Some men thought to build up kingdoms to themselves; they appeared to think that by inducing men and women to be adopted into their families they were adding to their own glory. From that day until the present, I have never thought of this subject of adoption without having a certain amount of fear concerning it.

. . . There is no true principle of the Gospel that will produce division. . . . And this revelation that God has given to His servant, the President of our Church, removes all the danger which seemed to threaten us through an imperfect understanding of the manner in which the law of adoption should be carried out.

To illustrate this point, let me suppose that the First Presidency of this Church were to seek to build up families for themselves from among this people, each one seeking to have men and women sealed to him in order that he might have a large following; and suppose each of the Twelve Apostles was to do the same; and suppose the High Priests and the brethren officiating in the temples were to do the same, what would be the result? You can see at once that in a little time we would be divided into tribes and clans, each man having his own following, and each following looking to the man to whom they had been adopted for counsel and for guidance, and in this way the governing authority of the Holy Priesthood in our midst would be divided and lessened. Who can not understand the danger there would be under such a condition of affairs. But...God has removed it by making it plain that it is the duty of every man to be sealed to his father, . . . I have this belief concerning us; that it was arranged before we came here how we should come, and through what lineage we should come. We were not born of the seed of Ham; we were not born of some questionable race; . . .

. . . suppose that each of us should seek some great man in the Church to be sealed to . . . and we think, “well, that man is much better than my father. . . .” We should not despise our origin. . . . There need be none to say, “Well, . . . I am adopted to Joseph, or to Brigham, or to John Taylor, or to Wilford Woodruff, . . .” There will be no need to pride and plume ourselves on the fact that we are adopted to these various men, and thus divide the people . . . Every man that reflects upon it can see that this revelation which God has given through his servant Wilford Woodruff removes that danger out of our pathway and prepares us to go forward and honor our kindred . . .

Why should a man come to one of the Apostles and be sealed to him and then trace his genealogy through him and his ancestors, and neglect his own? (Millennial Star, vol. 56, pp. 354-358)

Thus we see that the Law of Adoption, which Brigham Young called “a great and glorious doctrine” and “the means of salvation left to bring us back to God,” was completely repudiated by later Mormon leaders. Wilford Woodruff, the fourth President of the Mormon Church, admitted that he had had “peculiar feelings” about the Law of Adoption, and George Q. Cannon said that the practice “would result in great confusion” (see The Case Against Mormonism, vol. 1, p. 24).

A comparison of Brigham Young’s teaching and that of Wilford Woodruff plainly shows that the early Mormons were not led by revelation. Brigham Young said:

. . . I will answer a question that has been repeatedly asked me (E.I.) should I have a father dead that has never heard this gospel, would it be required of me to redeem him and then have him adopted into some man’s family and I be adopted to my father? (I ans. No.) . . . were we to wait to redeem our dead relatives before we could link the chains of the P.H. we would never accomplish it. (Journals of John D. Lee, p. 89)

Wilford Woodruff, on the other hand, stated:

. . . let every man be adopted to his father. When a man receives the endowments, adopt him to his father; not to Wilford Woodruff, not to any other man outside the lineage of his fathers. That is the will of God to this people. . . . I say let every man be adopted to his father; . . . (Millennial Star, vol. 56, p. 338)

Brigham Young claimed to have a revelation concerning the doctrine of sealing men to men, and he declared that it was a “means of salvation.” Wilford Woodruff, however, completely repudiated the doctrine. According to John Read, Brigham Young taught that “men would be sealed to men in the priesthood in a more solemn ordinance than that by which women were sealed to man, and in a room over that in which women were sealed to man in the temple of the Lord.” Brigham Young seemed to feel that temples were more essential for sealing men to men than for sealing women to men: “But we can seal women to men, but not men to men, without a temple” (Journal of Discourses, vol. 16, p. 186).

Present-day leaders of the Mormon Church put great stress upon the idea of sealing women to men, but Brigham Young’s teachings about the Law of Adoption have been repudiated.

Conclusion

In this chapter we have not only shown that the Mormon leaders have given up the ordinance of sealing unrelated men to each other, but that they have made important changes in the ceremony where women are sealed to men.

After careful examination of the temple ceremony, we have come to the conclusion that it bears unmistakable evidence of being a man-made ritual. The fact that so many changes had to be made in it to try to make it acceptable shows plainly that it is not from God.

32. The Temple Ceremony and Masonry

The Mormon writer Hyrum L. Andrus claims that Joseph Smith obtained “essential elements” of the temple ceremony from the papyri he received from Michael H. Chandler:

Evidence indicates that Joseph Smith obtained the essential covenants, key-words, etc., of the temple ceremony from the writings of Abraham. (See Facsimile No. 2, figures 3 and 8.) . . . Having obtained essential elements of this ceremony from the writings of Abraham, he then organized them into a formal ceremony, . . . (God, Man and the Universe, 1968, p. 334)

Bruce R. McConkie, of the First Council of the Seventy, says the ordinances performed in the temple “were given in modern times to the Prophet Joseph Smith by revelation, many things connected with them being translated by the Prophet from the papyrus on which the Book of Abraham was recorded” (Mormon Doctrine, 1966, p. 779).

We have already shown that the papyri have nothing to do with Abraham or his religion (see pages 294-369 of this book). Now that it is plain that these papyri are pagan documents, Mormons must look elsewhere for the origin of the temple ceremony. We feel that at least part of the temple ceremony came from Freemasonry. In fact, the similarities between the temple ceremony and the ritual of the Masons are rather startling.

Joseph Becomes a Mason

Although Joseph Smith’s early writings are filled with material which condemns secret societies, the presence of the Danite band among the Mormons indicates that by 1838 his attitude toward secret societies had changed. The reader will remember that the Danites were a secret oath-bound society and that the members were to be punished with death if they made public the secrets of the order (see pages 428-50 of this book).

When the Mormon leaders found themselves in serious trouble with the law because of the Danite band, Joseph Smith went back to the teachings of the Book of Mormon and publicly repudiated secret societies. In a letter written from Liberty Jail, dated March 25, 1839, Joseph Smith joined with four others in stating:

We further, caution our brethren, against the impropriety of the organization of bands or companies, by covenants, oaths, penalties, or secesies, but let the time past of our experience and sufferings by the wickedness of Doctor Avarad suffice, and let our covenants, be that of the everlasting covenant, as it is contained in the holy writ, and the things which God has revealed unto us; pure friendship, always becomes weakened, the very moment you undertake to make it stronger by penal oaths and secrecy. (Times and Seasons, vol. 1, p. 133)

After Joseph Smith went to Nauvoo, he again took an interest in secret societies. In fact, it was in Nauvoo that Joseph Smith became a Mason, formed the Council of 50, and established the secret temple ceremony. Many of the converts to the Mormon Church were Masons or had been Masons in the past. The Mormon Apostle John A. Widtsoe stated: “Many members of secret societies have joined the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints” (Evidences and Reconciliations, 3 volumes in 1, p. 113). On pages 357-358 of the same book, the Apostle Widtsoe stated:

Many of the Saints were Masons, such as Joseph’s brother Hyrum, Heber C. Kimball, Elijah Fordham, Newel K. Whitney, James Adams, and John C. Bennett . . .

With the acquiescence of the Prophet, members of the Church already Masons petitioned the Grand Master of Illinois for permission to set up a lodge in Nauvoo. In answer they were granted permission, in October, 1841, to hold lodge meetings; but it was March 15, 1842, before authority was given to set up a lodge in Nauvoo and to induct new members. Joseph Smith became a member.

Ebenezer Robinson seemed to blame John C. Bennett for the great interest which the church leaders had in masonry. However this may have been, Joseph Smith himself became a member of the Masonic fraternity. The following statement is recorded in Joseph Smith’s History under the date of March 15, 1842:

In the evening I received the first degree in Free Masonry in the Nauvoo Lodge, assembled in my general business office. (History of the Church, vol. 4, p. 551)

The next day Joseph Smith stated:

I was with the Masonic Lodge and rose to the sublime degree. (History of the Church, vol. 4, p. 552)

The Mormons who joined the Masonic Lodge soon found themselves in trouble with other members of the fraternity. S. H. Goodwin states:

Not long after this lodge had been set to work, rumors of unusual proceedings therein became current. Report had it that the Nauvoo brethren set at naught certain established and well-known Masonic laws and usages. . . . On the 16th day of July following, Bodley Lodge No. 1, of Quincy, held a special meeting . . . After discussion, the sentiment of the meeting took the form of resolutions. One of these called upon Grand Master Jonas to suspend the dispensation of Nauvoo Lodge until the annual communication of Grand Lodge. Another throws a little light back upon the events connected with the institution of that lodge. This resolution reads:

Resolved: That Bodley Lodge No. 1, of Quincy, request of the Grand Lodge of the state of Illinois, that a committee be appointed at the next annual meeting of said lodge to make enquiry into the manner the officers of the Nauvoo Lodge, U.D. were installed, and by what authority the Grand Master initiated, passed and raised Messrs. Smith and Sidney Rigdon to the degrees of Entered Apprentice, Fellow Craft and Master Mason, at one and the same time, and that the proceedings of the committee be reported for the benefit of this lodge.

(Mormonism and Masonry, by S. H. Goodwin, 1938, pp. 28-29)

Finally, the Masons refused to allow the Mormons to continue “a Masonic Lodge at Nauvoo” (Mormonism and Masonry, p. 34). One Masonic historian wrote: “‘If the Lodge had been suffered to work two years longer, every Mormon in Hancock County would have been initiated’ ” (History of Freemasonry in Illinois, p. 184, as quoted in Mormonism and Masonry, by S. H. Goodwin, p. 34). The Mormon Apostle John A. Widtsoe admitted that “large numbers of Nauvoo citizens were inducted into the fraternity. Soon the Nauvoo Lodge had more members than all the other Illinois lodges together. It became the largest in the state. In this rapid growth, some lodge errors appear to have been made” (Evidences and Reconciliations, 3 volumes in 1 edition, p. 358).

The Mormon writer E. Cecil McGavin made these statements in his book, Mormonism and Masonry (not to be confused with the book by Goodwin which bears the same name):

It is not surprising that they made a few departures from the ancient landmarks and introduced some changes in the procedure which brought upon them the full weight of Masonic displeasure. . . .

At this time there were only two hundred twenty-seven Masons in Illinois outside of Nauvoo. These were distributed among eleven lodges, making an average of twenty-one members in each lodge. The largest lodge was in Springfield, with a membership of forty-three.

Within five months, the Mormons initiated two hundred eighty-six members in Nauvoo, and forty-five in the Rising Sun Lodge at Montrose, Iowa.

Thus there were more Masons in Nauvoo in a few weeks than there were in all other lodges in Illinois combined. (Mormonism and Masonry, by E. Cecil McGavin, Salt Lake City, 1956, pp. 89-92)

Masonry is an ancient institution. Its landmarks are sacred and must be preserved. From the distant past, its leaders have attempted to keep it inviolate. The slightest change in its regulations has been regarded with suspicion.

The Mormons were careless in some respects, failing to realize the sanctity of the “ancient landmarks” and feeling free to make small innovations without consulting the Grand Lodge. Such a step, though not intended to trample underfoot the honored customs of the past, was perfectly natural for them. Their religion was a revolutionary one. They never attempted to follow the religious pattern of the world, being free to introduce many teachings and institutions that were not practiced in any other church.

This spirit of freedom and newness of growth with no attempt to deviate from the theological path of the past, may have influenced them to deviate from the ancient landmarks of Masonry. . . .

Since the Mormons were completely ignored by the Masons in neighboring towns and by the Grand Lodge also, they were likely to make many errors as they sought to put their lodge in motion. There was a spirit of freedom in all their religious activities, never for a moment feeling bound by the traditions of the past, but always free to make revolutionary changes in the matter of religious ritual and practice. This feeling may have crept into the lodge work and resulted in some changes that would be frowned upon by other Masons. The complaints about voting and initiations may have been well founded, yet those same mistakes were not uncommon in young lodges.

. . . On the question of voting, it is said that the ballot must be strictly secret and the voting must be unanimous. Each applicant must be voted for on a separate ballot. This was a slow and cumbersome method in comparison with the dispatch with which the voting was conducted in Church assemblies, so it is not unlikely that they violated the strict Masonic regulation concerning balloting. (Ibid., pp. 104-106)

Although Joseph Smith found himself in trouble with the Masons, he gave the Masonic signal of distress just before he was murdered. In his book concerning Masonry, William Morgan gives this information concerning what a Mason is supposed to do “in case of distress”:

The sign is given by raising both hands and arms to the elbows, perpendicularly, one on each side of the head, the elbows forming a square. The words accompanying this sign, in case of distress, are, “O Lord, my God! is there no help for the widow’s son?” (Freemasonry Exposed, New York, 1827, p. 76)

John D. Lee claimed that Joseph Smith used the exact words that a Mason is supposed to use in case of distress:

Joseph left the door, sprang through the window, and cried out, “Oh, Lord, my God, is there no help for the widow’s son!” (Confessions of John D. Lee, photomechanical reprint of 1880 edition, p. 153)

Other accounts seem to show that Joseph Smith used the first four words of the distress cry. According to the History of the Church, Joseph Smith “fell outward into the hands of his murderers, exclaiming. ‘O Lord, my God!’” (History of the Church, vol. 6, p. 618). Less than a month after Joseph and Hyrum Smith were murdered, the following appeared in the Mormon publication, Times and Seasons:

. . . with uplifted hands they gave such signs of distress as would have commanded the interposition and benevolence of Savages or Pagans. They were both Masons in good standing. Ye brethren of “the mystic tie” what think ye! Where is our good master Joseph and Hyrum? Is there a pagan, heathen, or savage nation on the globe that would not be moved on this great occasion, as the trees of the forest are moved by a mighty wind? Joseph’s last exclamation was “O Lord my God!” (Times and Seasons, vol. 5, p. 585)

The Mormon writer E. Cecil McGavin admitted that Joseph Smith gave the Masonic signal of distress:

When the enemy surrounded the jail, rushed up the stairway, and killed Hyrum Smith, Joseph stood at the open window, his martyr-cry being these words, “O Lord My God!” This was not the beginning of a prayer, because Joseph Smith did not pray in that manner. This brave, young man who knew that death was near, started to repeat the distress signal of the Masons, expecting thereby to gain the protection its members are pledged to give a brother in distress.

In 1878, Zina D. Huntington Young said of this theme, “I am the daughter of a Master Mason; I am the widow of the Master Mason who, when leaping from the window of Carthage jail, pierced with bullets, made the Masonic sign of distress, but those signs were not heeded except by the God of Heaven.” (Mormonism and Masonry, by E. Cecil McGavin, p. 17)

On page 16 of the same book, Mr. McGavin quotes the following from the Life of Heber C. Kimball, page 26:

“Joseph, leaping the fatal window, gave the Masonic signal of distress.”

In Utah the Masons will not allow a Mormon to become a member of their fraternity because of the things that happened in Nauvoo. Brigham Young once stated: “. . . I refer to the Freemasons. They have refused our brethren membership in their lodge, because they were polygamists” (Journal of Discourses, vol. 11, p. 328).

Although it is true that the Masons in Utah were disturbed with the Mormons because of polygamy, there are other reasons why they refused to allow Mormons to join their fraternity. One of the most important is that they feel that Joseph Smith stole part of the Masonic ritual and included it in his temple ceremony. S. H. Goodwin made this statement:

The observant Craftsman cannot be long among the Mormon people without noting the not infrequent use made of certain emblems and symbols which have come to be associated in the public mind with the Masonic fraternity. And now and again he will catch expressions and phrases in conversation, and meet with terms in literature, which are suggestive, to say the least. If he should continue his residence in Utah, he will sometimes be made aware of the fact, when shaking hands with a Mormon neighbor or friend, that there is a pressure of the hand as though some sort of a “grip” is being given. (Mormonism and Masonry, S. H. Goodwin, p. 43)

According to E. Cecil McGavin, “Grand Master J. M. Orr of Utah” made this statement in 1878:

We say to the priests of the Latter-day Church, you cannot enter our lodge rooms—you surrender all to an unholy priesthood. You have heretofore sacrificed the sacred obligations of our beloved Order, and we believe you would do the same again. Stand aside; we want none of you. Such a wound as you gave Masonry in Nauvoo is not easily healed, and no Latter-day Saint is, or can become a member of our Order in this jurisdiction. (Mormonism and Masonry, p. 7)

Masonry in Temple Ritual

The relationship between the Mormon temple ritual and Masonry is too close to be called a coincidence. The fact that both Mormons and Masons have a temple in which they administer secret ceremonies is striking, but when we compare the ritual and learn that Joseph Smith was a Mason, we are forced to the conclusion that he borrowed from Masonry in establishing his temple ceremony.

In this study we have had access to two books which give the Masonic ritual. They were reprinted by Ezra A. Cook Publications, Inc., Chicago, Illinois. The first is Capt. William Morgan's Freemasonry Exposed, which was first published in 1827. (It should be remembered that the author of this book disappeared and that this set off the great controversy concerning Masonry.) The second is Richardson's Monitor of Free-Masonry. This book was published some time after Morgan's expose, but it is important because it gives some of the "higher degrees" not mentioned by Morgan.

The following are some of the parallels between the ritual of the Masons and the Mormon temple ceremony. Because some of the details of the temple ceremony have been changed in recent years, we are using the pamphlet, Temple Mormonism—Its Evolution, Ritual and Meaning, New York, 1931, to make our comparison.

1. Both the Masons and the Mormons have what is called "the five points of fellowship."

MORMONS: The five points of fellowship are given by putting the inside of the right foot to the inside of the Lord's, the inside of your knee to his, laying your breast close to his, your left hands on each other's backs, and each one putting his mouth to the other's ear, in which position the Lord whispers:

Lord—"This is the sign of the token:

"Health to the navel, marrow in the bones, . . ."

(Temple Mormonism, p. 22)

MASONS: He (the candidate) is raised on what is called the five points of fellowship, . . . This is done by putting the inside of your right foot to the inside of the right foot of the person to whom you are going to give the word, the inside of your knee to his, laying your right breast against his, your left hands on the back of each other, and your mouths to each other's right ear (in which position alone you are permitted to give the word), and whisper the word Mahhah-bone . . . He is also told that Mahhah-bone signifies marrow in the bone. (Freemasonry Exposed, pp. 84-85)

The reader will note that the Mormon temple ceremony still contains "the five points of fellowship" (see page 472 of this book). Masonic writers seem willing to speak of "the five points of fellowship." George Oliver stated: "Masons profess to be united in an indissoluble chain of sincere affection, called the five points of fellowship; . . ." (The Antiquity of Freemasonry, p. 168, as cited by McGavin in Mormonism and Masonry, p. 9). A Masonic poet has even written a poem entitled, "The Five Points of Fellowship." In a footnote to this poem we find this statement:

The paraphrase embodies the following ancient form of injunction.

"Foot to foot (teaches) that we will not hesitate to go on foot and out of our way to aid and succor a needy Brother; knee to knee, that we will remember a Brother's welfare, in all our applications to Deity; breast to breast, that we will ever keep, in our breast, a Brother's secrets, when communicated to us as such, murder and treason excepted; hand to back, that we will ever be ready to stretch forth our hand to aid and support a falling Brother, . . ." (The Poetry of Freemasonry, by Robert Morris, as quoted in Mormonism and Masonry, p. 11)

The words "marrow in the bones" are still used in the Mormon temple ceremony (see page 472). It is interesting to note that the woman who exposed the ceremony back in 1846 stated that in "one place something was spoken to me which I do not recollect—the meaning was 'marrow in the bone;'. . ." (Warsaw Signal, April 15, 1846)

2. When the candidate receives "The First Token of the Aaronic Priesthood" he makes a promise similar to the oath taken in the "First Degree" of the Masonic ritual.

MORMONS: . . . we will not reveal any of the secrets of this, the first token of the Aaronic priesthood, with its accompanying name, sign or penalty. Should we do so, we agree that our throats be cut from ear to ear and our tongues torn out by their roots. (Temple Mormonism, p. 18)

MASONS: . . . I will . . . never reveal any part or parts, art or arts, point or points of the secret arts and mysteries of ancient Freemasonry . . . binding myself under no less penalty than to have my throat cut across, my tongue torn out by the roots, . . . (Freemasonry Exposed, pp. 21-22)

3. In both ceremonies the thumb is drawn across the throat to show the penalty.

MORMONS: Sign—In executing the sign of the penalty, the right hand, palm down, is drawn sharply across the throat, . . . (Temple Mormonism, p. 18)

MASONS: This is given by drawing your right hand across your throat, the thumb next to your throat, . . . (Freemasonry Exposed, p. 23)

4. Those who receive the "First Token of the Aaronic Priesthood" give a grip that is similar to that used by the Masons in the "First Degree" of their ritual.

MORMONS: The Grip—Hands clasped, pressing the knuckle of the index finger with the thumb. (Temple Mormonism, p. 18)

MASONS: The right hands are joined together as in shaking hands and each sticks his thumb nail into the third joint or upper end of the forefinger; . . . (Freemasonry Exposed, p. 23)

5. Some of the wording concerning the "grip" is similar.

MORMONS: . . . Peter now takes Adam by the right hand and asks:

Peter— "What is that?"

Adam— "The first token of the Aaronic Priesthood."

Peter— "Has it a name?"

Adam— "It has."

Peter— "Will you give it to me?"

Adam— "I can not, for it is connected with my new name, but this is the sign." (Temple Mormonism, p. 20)

MASONS: The Master and candidate holding each other by the grip, as before described, the Master says,

"What is this?"

Ans. "A grip."

"A grip of what?"

Ans. "The grip of an Entered Apprentice Mason."

"Has it a name?"

Ans. "It has."

"Will you give it to me?"

Ans. "I did not so receive it, neither can I so impart it."

(Freemasonry Exposed, pp. 23-24)

6. The oath of the "Second Token of the Aaronic Priesthood" is similar to that taken in the second degree of Masonry.

MORMONS: "We and each of us do covenant and promise that we will not reveal the secrets of this, the Second Token of the Aaronic Priesthood, with its accompanying name, sign, grip or penalty. Should we do so, we agree to have our breasts cut open and our hearts and vitals torn from our bodies and given to the birds of the air and the beasts of the field.” (Temple Mormonism, p. 20)

MASONS: “I, . . . most solemnly and sincerely promise and swear, . . . that I will not give the degree of a Fellow Craft Mason to any one of an inferior degree, nor to any other being in the known world, . . . binding myself under no less penalty than to have my left breast torn open and my heart and vitals taken from thence . . . to become a prey to the wild beasts of the field, and vulture of the air, . . .” (Freemasonry Exposed, p. 52)

7. Both have a similar sign.

MORMONS: The sign is made by placing the left arm on the square at the level of the shoulder, placing the right hand across the chest with the thumb extended and then drawing it rapidly from left to right and dropping it to the side. (Temple Mormonism, p. 20)

MASONS: The sign is given by drawing your right hand flat, with the palm of it next to your breast, across your breast from the left to the right side with some quickness, and dropping it down by your side; . . . (Freemasonry Exposed, p. 53)

8. Both have a similar grip.

MORMONS: The Grip is given by clasping the hand and pressing the thumb in the hollow between the first and second knuckles of the hand. (Temple Mormonism, p. 20)

MASONS: . . . the pass-grip, is given by taking each other by the right hand, as though going to shake hands, and each putting his thumb between the fore and second fingers where they join the hand, and pressing the thumb between the joints. (Freemasonry Exposed, p. 54)

9. In both cases a “name” is used.

MORMONS: The name is the given name of the candidate. (Temple Mormonism, page 20)

MASONS: . . . the name of it is Shibboleth. (Freemasonry Exposed, p. 54)

10. The promise made when receiving the “First Token of the Melchizedek Priesthood” resembles the oath given by the Masons in the third or “Master Mason’s Degree.”

MORMONS: Peter— “We and each of us do covenant and promise that we will not reveal any of the secrets of this, the First Token of the Melchizedek Priesthood, with its accompanying name, sign or penalty. Should we do so, we agree that our bodies be cut asunder in the midst and all our bowels gush out.” (Temple Mormonism, p. 20)

MASONS: “I, . . . most solemnly and sincerely promise and swear, in addition to my former obligations, that I will not give the degree of a Master Mason to any of an inferior degree, nor to any other being in the known world, . . . binding myself under no less penalty than to have my body severed in two in the midst, and divided to the north and south, my bowels burnt to ashes . . .” (Freemasonry Exposed, pp. 73-75)

11. The sign of the penalty is similar in both cases. (The description of this sign which appears in Temple Mormonism is not completely accurate; therefore, we are using the account that appeared in the Salt Lake Tribune. The reader can see that this is the way the sign is given today (see page 470 of this book).

MORMONS: In this, the left hand is placed palm upright, directly in front of the body, there being a right angle formed at the elbow;

the right hand, palm down, is placed under the elbow of the left; then drawn sharply across the bowels, and both hands are dropped at the side. (Salt Lake Tribune, February 12, 1906)

MASONS: The Penal Sign is given by putting the right hand to the left side of the bowels, the hand open, with the thumb next to the belly, and drawing it across the belly, and letting it fall; this is done tolerably quick. This alludes to the penalty of the obligation: “Having my body severed in twain,” etc. (Freemasonry Exposed, p. 77)

12. In both cases a “name” is used.

MORMONS: The Name of this token is the Son, meaning the Son of God. (Temple Mormonism, p. 20)

MASONS: . . . the word or name is Tubal Cain. (Freemasonry Exposed, p. 77)

13. The conversation at the “veil” in the temple ceremony is very similar to that of the “Fellow Craft Mason” when he is questioned concerning the “grip.”

MORMONS:

Lord— “What is this?”

Endowee— “The second token of the Melchizedek Priesthood— The Patriarchal Grip or Sure Sign of the Nail.”

Lord— “Has it a name?”

Endowee— “It has.”

Lord— “Will you give it to me?”

Endowee— “I can not for I have not yet received it.”

(Temple Mormonism, p. 22)

MASONS:

. . . “What is this?”

Ans. “A grip.”

“A grip of what?”

Ans. “The grip of a Fellow Craft Mason.”

“Has it a name?”

Ans. “It has.”

“Will you give it to me?”

Ans. “I did not so receive it, neither can I so impart it.”

(Freemasonry Exposed, p. 54)

14. Both the Masons and the Mormons have a vow regarding “chastity.”

MORMONS: “You and each of you do covenant and promise that you will not have sexual intercourse with any of the opposite sex except your lawful wife or wives who are given you by the holy priesthood.” (Temple Mormonism, p. 21)

MASONS: “Furthermore do I promise and swear that I will not violate the chastity of a Master Mason’s wife, mother, sister, or daughter, I knowing them to be such, nor suffer it to be done by others, if in my power to prevent it.” (Masonry Exposed, pp. 74-75)

15. The grip known as “The Sign of the Nail” seems to be similar to one given by Masons in one of their higher degrees.

MORMONS: The grip is given by placing the thumb on back of hand and the tip of forefinger in the centre of palm, representing the piercing of the hand by a nail. It is called “The Sign of the Nail.” (Temple Mormonism, p. 20)

MASONS: Grand Commander now explains the grip and word of a Knight of Malta. He says to candidate—Thomas, reach hither thy finger, and feel the print of the nails; [they join right hands, and force the first finger into the centre of the palm;] . . . (Richardson's Monitor of Free-Masonry, p. 122)

16. The “Oath of Vengeance” which used to be used in the Mormon Temple ceremony resembles an oath in one of the higher degrees of Masonry.

MORMONS: “You and each of you do solemnly promise and vow that you will pray, and never cease to pray, and never cease to importune high heaven to avenge the blood of the prophets . . .” (Temple Mormonism, p. 21)

MASONS: “We promise and swear, by the living God, always supreme, to revenge the death of our ancestor; . . .” (Richardson's Monitor of Free-Masonry, p. 188)

17. Both Mormons and Masons change clothing before going through their rituals.

MORMONS: The candidate, being directed to these washing and dressing rooms and having divested himself of all his clothing, awaits his time in the bath . . .

The candidate then retires to the dressing room, where he puts on a shirt and a pair of white pants and white stockings. (Temple Mormonism, pp. 14-15)

MASONS: The candidate during the time is divested of all his apparel (shirt excepted) and furnished with a pair of drawers kept in the lodge for the use of candidates. The candidate is then blindfolded, his left foot bare, his right in a slipper, his left breast and arm naked, and a rope called a Cable-tow round his neck . . . (Freemasonry Exposed, p. 18)

18. Both Mormons and Masons use an apron.

MORMONS: Adam (Turning to the audience)—“In your bundles brethren and sisters, you will each find an apron, you will now put it on.” (Temple Mormonism, p. 17)

MASONS: The Master returns to his seat while the Wardens are examining the candidate, and gets a lambskin or white apron, presents it to the candidate, and observes, “Brother, I now present you with a lambskin or white apron. It is an emblem of innocence, and the badge of a Mason . . .” (Freemasonry Exposed, p. 24)

19. In one of the higher degrees the Masons anoint the candidate. This is somewhat similar to the anointing ceremony in the Mormon Temple ritual.

MORMONS: As the candidate is washed, the officiant hurries through the lustration ritual. . . the candidate is passed on to another attendant and is anointed with oil. The oil is very definitely applied to the various organs of his body. The pronouncements used in this ceremony are much the same as those used in the lustration ritual. (Temple Mormonism, p. 15)

MASONS: Master orders the basin of perfumed water and a clean napkin to be brought to him, and directs candidate to wash his hands, which he does. . . .

Master takes a box of perfumed ointment and anoints candidate on his head, eyes, mouth, heart, the tip of his right ear, hand, and foot, and says—“You are now, my dear brother, received a member of our society; . . .” (Richardson's Monitor of Free-Masonry, p. 167)

20. Both Mormons and Masons give what they call a “new name” to the candidate.

MORMONS: “With these garments I give you a new name which is never to be divulged to anyone. . . . The name I shall give you is _____.” (Temple Mormonism, p. 15)

MASONS: “I also present you with a new name; it is CAUTION; . . .” (Freemasonry Exposed, p. 25)

21. In the Mormon Temple ceremony the candidate cannot pass through the veil until he has given certain signs and words. In the Royal Arch Degree the Masons use veils.

MORMONS: The candidate is now taken to one of the openings between the pillars by one of the Temple workers, who gives three raps with a mallet on the pillar. The Lord parts the veil slightly and asks what is wanted.

Temple Worker—“The man Adam having been true and faithful in all things now desires to converse with the Lord through the veil.”

Lord—“See that his garments are properly marked, present him at the veil, and his request shall be granted.”

Attendants or Temple workers prompt the candidate in his answers and grips. . . .

The Endowee is then taken to the opening by the attendant, who gives three more raps with the mallet.

Lord—“What is wanted?”

Attendant—“Adam, having conversed with the Lord through the veil, now desires to enter his presence.”

Lord—“Admit him.”

As he says this he extends his hand and welcomes the candidate into the Glory room. (Temple Mormonism, p. 22)

MASONS:

Principal Sojourner—Companions, we will pass on, and make and alarm at the Third Veil. [Stamps nine times.]

Master of the Third Veil—Who comes there? Who dare approach this Third Veil of our sacred Tabernacle?

Principal Sojourner—Three weary sojourners from Babylon, who have come to assist in the rebuilding of the house of the Lord, without the hope of fee or reward.

Master of Third Veil—How do you expect to enter?

Principal Sojourner—By the words, sign, and word of exhortation of the Master of the Second Veil.

Master of Third Veil—Give them.

Principal Sojourner—Shem, Japeth and Adoniram. [Thrusts his hand into his bosom as Master of Second Veil had done.]

Master of Third Veil—They are right. You can enter the third Veil.

The candidates enter. (Richardson's Monitor of Free-Masonry, pp. 76-77)

22. In the Mormon temple ceremony a man represents Adam. The Masons also have a man who personates Adam in the degree of “Knight of the Sun.”

MORMONS: Elohim—. . . “This man who is now being operated upon is Michael. . . . When he awakes he. . . will be known as Adam!” (Temple Mormonism, p. 16)

MASONS: Thrice Puissant Grand Master, representing Father Adam, is stationed in the east. (Richardson's Monitor of Free-Masonry, p. 185)

23. In the Mormon temple ceremony a man represents God. In the Mason's Royal Arch Degree a man “personates the Deity.”

MORMONS: When all is quiet, a man dressed in white flannels, representing Elohim, comes from behind the curtain . . . (Temple Mormonism, p. 15)

MASONS: One of the members now personates the Deity, behind the bush, and calls out Moses! Moses! (Richardson's Monitor of Free-Masonry, p. 73)

24. Both the Mormons and the Masons consider the square and the compass to be extremely important. The marks of the square and the compass appear on the Mormon temple garments and on the veil.

MORMONS: We now have the veil explained to us. We are told that it represents the veil of the temple. The marks are the same as those on the garments—the compass on the left and the square on the right side. (Temple Mormonism, p. 22)

MASONS: . . . the three great lights in Masonry are the Holy Bible, Square and Compass. . . the Square, to square our actions, and the Compass to keep us in due bounds with all mankind, . . . (Freemasonry Exposed, pp. 22-23)

Even a Mormon writer, E. Cecil McGavin, is willing to admit that the “square and the compass” appear on Mormon temple clothing: “It is universally known that Mormon temple clothing contain certain marks of the priesthood, including the square and compass” (Mormonism and Masonry, p. 72).

25. In the Masonic ritual the point of the compass is pressed against the left breast of the candidate. The Mormon temple garment has the mark of the compass on the left breast.

MORMONS: The marks are the same as those on the garments—the compass on the left . . . (Temple Mormonism, p. 22)

MASONS: The candidate then enters, the Senior Deacon at the same time pressing his naked left breast with the point of the compass, . . . (Freemasonry Exposed, p. 19)

26. The angle of the square is pressed against the right breast in the Masonic ritual. The mark of the square appears on the right breast of the Mormon temple garment.

MORMONS: . . . the square on the right side, . . . (Temple Mormonism, p. 22)

MASONS: As he enters, the angle of the square is pressed hard against his naked right breast, . . . (Freemasonry Exposed, p. 50)

27. A mallet is used by both the Masons and the Mormons in their ceremonies.

MORMONS: . . . one of the Temple workers, . . . gives three raps with a mallet . . . (Temple Mormonism, p. 22)

MASONS: . . . he gives a rap with the common gavel or mallet, . . . (Freemasonry Exposed, p. 11)

Other parallels between the Mormon temple ceremony and the Masonic ritual could be shown, but these should be sufficient to convince the reader that Joseph Smith borrowed from the Masons when he established the endowment ceremony.

In 1934 Anthony W. Ivins, who was a member of the First Presidency of the Mormon Church, wrote a book entitled, The Relationship of “Mormonism” and Freemasonry. On page 89 of this book, the following statement appears:

Whether there are resemblances between the ordinances administered in the temples of the Church and those administered in Masonic temples, the writer does not know. He has made no effort to find out. It is not his business to know. While there are many Masons who are members of the Church, he has not at any time asked one of them for information, nor has any one of them ever proffered it. He has read the criticism of no writer who has written on the subject, his limited knowledge has been derived from books written by recognized Masonic authorities. Were he in possession of knowledge of ceremonies regarded as private and sacred by Masons his respect for the men who are connected with the order would seal his lips. . . . the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints was not influenced by Masonry, either in its doctrines, organization, or the bringing forth of the Book of Mormon. (The Relationship of “Mormonism” and Freemasonry, p. 89)

We feel that Anthony W. Ivins’ own statement shows that he was not qualified to write a book concerning “The Relationship of ‘Mormonism’ and Freemasonry.” If he “made no effort to find out” what went on in the Masonic ceremonies, how could he know that Mormonism “was not influenced by Masonry”?

The Mormon writer E. Cecil McGavin has written a book which is far better than that written by Anthony W. Ivins. Although we cannot agree with many of his conclusions, we feel that he has compiled a great deal of material that is relevant to the subject. Mr. McGavin is even willing to admit that there are some similarities between Mormonism and Masonry:

Numerous, indeed, were the early references to the Temple ritual in the sermons and writings of Joseph Smith. Though a few rudimental principles may have been similar to the Masonic ritual, he opened a vast, new field of wisdom that had certainly been “hidden for generations.” (Mormonism and Masonry, p. 148)

The Mormons, the American Indians, the ancient Essenes, and the early Druids are not the only ones who have “Masonic” symbols and practices in their rituals. . . .

The Odd Fellows and other fraternal orders have their secret signs, grips, tokens, and passwords. The Masons certainly have no monopoly on that vast field of ritual and symbolism that arose during the childhood of the human race and spread into all countries. . . .

It is evident that the Masonic ritual embraces a few features that resemble the rudimental ceremonies of the temple endowment, yet these few points of similarity are largely restricted to the rituals pertaining to the Aaronic priesthood. (Ibid., pp. 196-197)

Masons who visit the Temple Block in Salt Lake City are impressed by what they call the Masonic emblems displayed on the outside of the Mormon Temple.

Yes, the “Masonic emblems” are displayed on the walls of the temple—the sun, moon, and stars, “Holiness to the Lord,” the two right hands clasped in fellowship, the All-seeing eye, Alpha and Omega, and the beehive. Masonic writers tell us the Mormon Temple ritual and their own are slightly similar in some respects.

Without any apologies we frankly admit that there may be some truth in these statements.

Yes, the public is entitled to an explanation of these mysteries and coincidences. (Ibid., Preface)

The Mormon Apostle John A. Widtsoe made this comment:

Fourth, that there are similarities in the services of the temple and some secret organization may be true. (Evidence and Reconciliations, 3 volume in one edition, p. 112)

The Mormon historian B. H. Roberts gave the following testimony regarding the temple ceremony:

The CHAIRMAN. The obligations and covenants, whatever they are, then, you are not at liberty to disclose?

Mr. ROBERTS. No, sir. I would be led to regard those obligations as similar to those who perhaps have passed through Masonic fraternities, or are members of Masonic fraternities.

The CHAIRMAN. Then your church organization in that particular is a sort of Masonic fraternity?

Mr. ROBERTS. It is analogous, perhaps, in some of its features. (Reed Smoot Case, vol. 1, p. 741)

Dr. Hugh Nibley, of Brigham Young University, has made this statement concerning Mormonism and Masonry:

Among the first to engage in the Latter-day Temple work were many members of the Masons, a society that “is not, and does not profess to be, a religion,” but whose rites present unmistakable parallels to those of the Temple. Yet, like the Indians, those men experienced only an expansion of understanding. (What Is a Temple, Brigham Young University Press, 1968, p. 247)

In footnote 71 on page 248 of the same work, Dr. Nibley stated:

Pending the exhaustive study that the subject deserves, we will only say here, that an extensive reading of Masonic and Mormon teachings and history should make it clear to any reader that the former is the shadow, the latter the substance. The one is literal, the other allegorical.

Since many members of the Mormon Church were Masons and were familiar with its ritual, Joseph Smith must have realized that he might be accused of stealing the ceremonies from Masonry. In what was apparently a move to offset this criticism, Joseph Smith claimed that Masonry once had the true endowment and that it had become corrupted through the passage of time. E. Cecil McGavin gives us this information:

In the diary of Benjamin F. Johnson, an intimate friend and associate of Joseph Smith, it is recorded that “Joseph told me that Freemasonry was the apostate endowment, as sectarian religion was the apostate religion.” Elder Heber C. Kimball, who had been a Mason for many years, related that after Joseph Smith became a Mason, he explained to his brethren that Masonry had been taken from the Priesthood. (Mormonism and Masonry, p. 199)

The last part of McGavin’s information may have come from Heber C. Kimball’s daughter, for she stated that “The Prophet Joseph after becoming a Mason said that Masonry had been taken from the Priesthood” (Woman’s Exponent, vol. 12, p. 126, as cited in Mormonism and Masonry, by E. Cecil McGavin, p. 99).

In trying to explain why their temple ritual resembles that of the Masons, some Mormons claim that the endowment was given in Solomon’s Temple and that the Masons preserved part of the ceremony. The Mormon Apostle Melvin J. Ballard has been quoted as saying the following:

“Modern Masonry is a fragmentary presentation of the ancient order established by King Solomon, from whom it is said to have been handed down through the centuries.

“Frequent assertion that some details of the Mormon Temple ordinances resemble Masonic rites, led him to refer to this subject,” the speaker declared, and he added, “that he was not sorry there was such a similarity, because of the fact that the ordinances and rites revealed to Joseph Smith constituted a reintroduction upon the earth of the divine plan inaugurated in the Temple of Solomon in ancient days.” . . .

“Masonry is an apostasy from the ancient early order, just as so-called Christianity is an apostasy from the true Church of Christ.” (The Salt Lake Herald, December 29, 1919, as quoted in Mormonism and Masonry, by S. H. Goodwin, pp. 49-50)

The Mormon writer E. Cecil McGavin states:

Yes, there may be some similarities in the rituals of the Mormons and the Masons, but those few likenesses in a vast realm of ritual cannot be explained by the fact that Joseph Smith attended a few meetings of the Masonic fraternity. In the light of the evidence supplied by Masonic historians, the conclusion is forced upon us that some of the features of the ritual once administered in Solomon’s Temple have persisted in Masonry. . . .

Since some of the Masonic ritual has descended from Solomon’s time, altered and corrupted by the passing centuries, should one be surprised to find a few similarities when the Temple ritual is again established? . . .

If the facts were available and the original sources extant, it would doubtless be apparent that everything in the ritual of the Mormons that the Masons say was taken from their ceremonies, dates back to Solomon’s time. (Mormonism and Masonry, pp. 192-194)

William J. Whalen made these comments in rebuttal to E. Cecil McGavin’s statements:

McGavin accepts the most fanciful claims to antiquity put forth by such discredited Masonic historians as Mackey, Anderson and Oliver.

These early Masonic writers were wont to claim Solomon, Adam, and most of the upright men of the Old Testament as early lodge brothers. Modern Masonic historians date the origin of the lodge in the early eighteenth century and recognize that these pioneer speculative Masons simply adopted the story of the building of Solomon’s temple as a dramatic background for their initiations. Fred L. Pick and G. Norman Knight in their Pocket History of Freemasonry admit:

Up to the present time, no even plausible theory of the “origin” of the Freemasons has been put forward. The reason for this is probably that the Craft, as we know it, originated among the Operative Masons of Britain. No doubt it incorporated from the earliest times shreds of ritual, folk-lore and even occult elements of time-immemorial antiquity. But it is almost certainly a British product and of British origin.

A few elements in modern Masonry here and there can be traced to the medieval guilds of working masons, but no one with a scholarly reputation would try to maintain that the degree system as it is worked now—and as it was worked in Nauvoo in 1842—could have possibly been derived from Solomonic rites. (The Latter-day Saints in the Modern Day World, New York, 1964, pp. 203-204)

While some Mormon writers claim that Masonry dates back to the time of Solomon, Anthony W. Ivins, who was a member of the First Presidency, stated:

. . . the foregoing definitely proves that the origin of Freemasonry is shrouded in mystery, that the origin of the craft is based largely upon legends which are not authenticated by reliable evidence. If true, they take us back to the idolatrous worship and pagan practices of Egypt, Greece, and other semi-heathen nations of antiquity. (The Relationship of “Mormonism” and Freemasonry, 1934, p. 15)

Only One Explanation

We feel that there is only one logical explanation for the many parallels between the temple ceremony and Masonry, and that is that Joseph Smith borrowed from the Masons. The reader should remember that it was on March 16, 1842, that Joseph Smith stated: “I was with the Masonic Lodge and rose to the sublime degree” (History of the Church, vol. 4, p. 552). Less than two months later (May 4, 1842), Joseph Smith introduced the Temple endowment ceremony. According to Joseph Smith’s History, it was in the same room “where the Masonic fraternity meet occasionally”:

Wednesday, 4.—I spent the day in the upper part of the store, that is in my private office (so called because in that room I keep my sacred writings, translate ancient records, and receive revelations) and in my general business office, or lodge room (that is where the Masonic fraternity meet occasionally, for want of a better place) in council with General James Adams, of Springfield, Patriarch Hyrum Smith, Bishops Newel K. Whitney and George Miller, and President Brigham Young and Elders Heber C. Kimball and Willard Richards, instructing them in the principles and order of the Priesthood, attending to washings, anointings, endowments and the communication of keys pertaining to the Aaronic Priesthood, and so on to the highest order of the Melchisedek Priesthood, . . . (History of the Church, vol. 5, pp. 1-2)

The Mormon historian B. H. Roberts stated:

A photogravure of the “brick store” in the upper story of which were instituted these sacred ceremonies accompanies this chapter. In addition to its use as a “temple” it was also the place of meeting for the Nauvoo Lodge of Free Masons. (Comprehensive History of the Church, vol. 2, pp. 135-136)

One woman who was questioned concerning the temple ceremony gave this testimony:

A.—. . . I said I received endowments in Nauvoo, in the Masonic Hall, I rather think it was. Yes, sir, I think that was where it was. All the ceremony was performed in the Masonic Hall. The washing was done in the Masonic Hall, and the anointed with oil.

Q.—What furniture was in the Masonic Hall at the time the endowment was performed?

A.—Well, now, if you are expecting me to tell you all about the particulars of what was there in the way of furniture and what was done there, you must not expect me to do it any more than you would expect a Mason or an Odd Fellow or any other member of a secret society to reveal the secrets of their order; . . . (Temple Lot Case, pp. 353-354)

Wilford Woodruff, the fourth President of the Mormon Church, testified:

I do not say there were any washings in the Masonic Temple, but there were meetings held in the Masonic Temple. There were certain ordinances performed there at the start, because there was no temple built at that time. (Temple Lot Case, p. 299)

With this very close connection between Mormonism and Masonry, it is almost impossible to believe that Joseph Smith did not borrow from Masonry in establishing the temple ceremony. E. Cecil McGavin, however, argues that Joseph Smith did not take an active part in Masonry, and therefore he could not have used Masonry to build up the temple ritual:

. . . he never attended more than six meetings of the lodge after receiving the third degree of Masonry on March 16, 1842. He never took an active part in the fraternity and never received a higher degree than that conferred upon him by Grand Master Jonas at the time the Nauvoo lodge was installed.

It is sheer presumption to maintain that the signs, tokens, keys, and blessings of the Temple ritual, that he frequently spoke about, were to be taken from Masonry. (Mormonism and Masonry, p. 135)

We feel that Joseph Smith probably had some knowledge of Masonry long before he joined the fraternity. Many of his close associates were Masons. The Apostle Heber C. Kimball, one of Joseph Smith's best friends, had been a Mason since 1823, and Joseph Smith's own brother, Hyrum, became a member of the fraternity in 1827—three years before the Book of Mormon was published. The Mormon writer Kenneth W. Godfrey gives this information:

Joseph Smith's own brother, Hyrum, became a Mason at Victor, New York, in 1827, and Heber C. Kimball, an early Mormon apostle, joined and received the first three degrees of Freemasonry at Milnor as early as 1823. . . .

William W. Phelps, an early Mormon writer and publisher, . . . had broad background and solid acquaintance with Masonic history and practice. Thus he was in a position to influence the Mormon prophet, . . .

The number of Masons in the church, together with Joseph Smith's close association with Phelps, leads to the conclusion that the Prophet and other Mormons were undoubtedly acquainted with some aspects of the Masonic ceremony before they settled in Illinois. (Journal of the Illinois State Historical Society, Spring, 1971, pp. 81-82)

Joseph Smith probably became well informed concerning Masonry through the newspapers published in his area. The Wayne Sentinel contained a great deal about Masonry, and the Palmyra Freeman was regarded as an anti-Masonic newspaper. William J. Whalen observed that Joseph Smith might have "witnessed the presentation of burlesque Masonic ceremonies at anti-Masonic rallies near his home. If he did not enjoy such spectacles or hear exposes of Masonic initiations, he would have been one of the few people in that part of New York State to have escaped the pervasive influence of the anti-Masonic movement." (The Latter-day Saints in the Modern Day World, pp. 195-196)

S. H. Goodwin stated that Joseph Smith "lived in the very heart of the region affected by the anti-Masonic excitement, 1826-1830; he was familiar with exposes widely distributed at that time; undoubtedly he, with his neighbors, had often seen 'renouncing Masons' present at great public gatherings what was alleged to be all of the Masonic Degrees; . . ." (Mormonism and Masonry, p. 38)

On page 51 of the same book, Goodwin points out that "Joseph Smith lived within a few miles of the center of that excitement. And further, there were exposes and innumerable pamphlets and other printed matter dealing with this subject that were widely distributed in New York and adjoining states."

The reader will remember that William Morgan's expose of Masonry was published in Batavia, New York, in 1827. Joseph Smith could have learned a great deal about the Masonic ritual from this book. We know that Heber C. Kimball had a copy of it, for his own daughter stated:

I remember once, when but a young girl, of getting a glimpse of the outside of the Morgan's book exposing Masonry, but which my father always kept locked up. (Woman's Exponent, XII, 126, as quoted in Mormonism and Masonry, by E. Cecil McGavin, p. 99)

It is interesting to note that Morgan's widow became a member of the Mormon Church and lived in Nauvoo. Heber C. Kimball's daughter stated: In Nauvoo I was acquainted with the widow and daughter of Morgan who exposed Masonry." Fawn Brodie says that the "most famous woman in the church was William Morgan's widow, Lucinda, now married to George W. Harris, one of Joseph's key men, and incidentally a Mason of high rank" (No Man Knows My History, p. 301).

Strange as it may seem, Morgan's widow later became one of Joseph Smith's wives. Andrew Jenson, who was the Assistant LDS Church Historian, stated that she was "one of the first women sealed to the Prophet Joseph" (Historical Record, vol. VI, p. 233).

Embarrassing Questions

The Mormon leaders find themselves faced with several embarrassing questions regarding the temple ritual and Masonry. Many members of the Mormon Church wonder how they can believe in a secret temple ritual, when the Book of Mormon condemns all secret societies, bands and oaths. In fact, it plainly states that "the Lord worketh not in secret combinations, . . ." (Ether 8:19).

Then, too, there is the question of why Joseph Smith would become a Mason. Besides all of the statements in the Book of Mormon which condemn secret societies, the reader will remember that Joseph Smith joined with four others in stating:

We further, caution our brethren, against the impropriety of the organization of bands or companies, by covenants, oaths, penalties, or secrecies, . . . pure friendship, always becomes weakened, the very moment you undertake to make it stronger by penal oaths and secrecy. (Times and Seasons, vol. 1, p. 133)

Benjamin F. Johnson claims that Joseph Smith told him that "Freemasonry was the apostate endowment." Why would Joseph Smith join an organization that was in a state of apostasy?

The Mormon leaders now claim that it is not right for members of the church to join the Masons or other secret societies. Anthony W. Ivins, who was a member of the First Presidency, made this statement:

The Mormon Church has no quarrel with Free Masonry or any other organization which is formed for a righteous purpose. It advises its members to refrain from identifying themselves with any secret, oath-bound society. . . . It is difficult to serve two masters and do justice to both. (The Relationship of "Mormonism" and Freemasonry, p. 8)

Joseph F. Smith, who became the sixth President of the Mormon Church, made this statement in 1900:

"We have passed a resolution that men who are identified with these secret organizations shall not be preferred as bishops, or sought for as counselors; the same when it comes to selecting M.I.A. officers. The men who have done this have disqualified themselves and are not fit to hold these offices." (Provo Enquirer, November 12, 1900, as quoted in Mormonism and Masonry, by Goodwin, p. 76)

The Mormon Apostle John A. Widtsoe stated:

The activities of the Church, in all departments are sacred, not secret.

This point of view makes it difficult for Latter-day Saints to look with favor upon secret, oath-bound societies. The words of the Prophet Joseph Smith are sufficient answer to the question: (Note especially the last sentence.)

And again, I would further suggest the impropriety of the organization of bands or companies, by covenant or oaths, by penalties or secrecies; . . . Pure friendship always becomes weakened that very moment you undertake to make it stronger by penal oaths and secrecy (Teachings of the Prophet Joseph Smith, p. 146).

Many secret organizations may be actuated by high ideals. None, however, can transcend the ideals of the gospel of Jesus Christ. Therefore, from the point of view of encouraging people to walk uprightly they would seem unnecessary. . . . Sometimes they cause loss of interest in Church duties, for no one can serve two masters with equal interest. . . . Divided allegiance is always unsatisfactory and often dangerous. (Evidences and Reconciliations, vol. 1, pp. 213-214)

It is interesting to note that the same Apostle who made these statements against secret societies had to turn right around and write a chapter entitled, “Why Did Joseph Smith Become a Mason?” He claimed that Joseph Smith joined the Masons to win friends among “the prominent and influential men of the state” so that the church would not be persecuted, but he had to admit that “The attempt to win sufficient friends through Masonry to stop persecution failed” (Evidences and Reconciliations, vol. 3, pp. 114-117).

The reader will note that the Apostle Widtsoe has cited Joseph Smith’s words about “the impropriety of the organization of bands or companies, by covenant or oaths, by penalties or secrecies” to use against secret societies. We feel that these same words could be used against the Temple ceremony. The Apostle Widtsoe, however, maintains that “the temple endowment is not secret. All who meet the requirements for entrance to the temple may enjoy it” (Evidences and Reconciliations, vol. 3, p. 24).

The Apostle Widtsoe’s reasoning with regard to this matter is very poor. All secret societies allow their own members to participate in their ritual. The Mormon temple ceremony is kept secret from outsiders, and, after all, isn’t this what makes a secret society?

Many members of the Mormon Church maintain that the temple ceremonies are sacred and not secret. The Mormons, of course, have a right to believe that their ceremonies are sacred, but this does not excuse the fact that they are secret. They are just as secret as the ceremonies of any other secret society. We once heard a guide on Temple Square tell the people that the reason they couldn’t go into the temple was that if they let some in soon everyone would want to go in, and they would not be able to perform their ceremonies with such a crowd coming and going through the temple. This seemed to satisfy the people, but it was far from the truth. If the guide had been telling the truth, the church would be willing to make films of the temple ceremonies so that the people could see them without disturbing the work. They could not do this, of course, for the very nature of the ritual would prohibit such a production. In one part of the ceremony we find the following (see page 468 of this book):

. . . we desire to impress upon your minds the sacred character of the First Token of the Aaronic Priesthood, with its accompanying name, sign and penalty, together with that of all the other Tokens of the Holy Priesthood, . . . They are most sacred and are guarded by solemn covenants and obligations of secrecy to the effect that under no condition, even at the peril of your life, will you ever divulge them, except at a certain place that will be shown you hereafter. The representation of the penalties indicates different ways in which life may be taken.

From this it is obvious that the temple ritual is a secret, and John A. Widtsoe’s statement that “the temple endowment is not secret” is completely false.

Conclusion

Briefly summarized, the connection between Mormonism and Masonry is as follows:

1. Both Mormonism and Masonry have secret ceremonies that are performed in secret temples.
2. The “Masonic emblems” are displayed on the walls of the Mormon temple.
3. The Mormon temple ritual is similar in many respects to that used by the Masons.
4. Joseph Smith and many of the most prominent members of the Mormon Church were also members of the Masonic Lodge.
5. Temple ceremonies were actually performed in the Masonic Hall.

Dr. Durham Admits Masonic Influences

Reed Durham, who has served as president of the Mormon History Association, has carefully examined the parallels between Mormonism and Masonry. Although Dr. Durham still maintains that Joseph Smith was a prophet, he has to admit that Masonry had a definite influence upon Mormonism:

. . . I am convinced that in the study of Masonry lies a pivotal key to further understanding Joseph Smith and the Church. . . . It commenced in Joseph’s home when his older brother became a Mason. . . . The many parallels found between early Mormonism and the Masonry of that day are substantial . . . I believe that there are few significant developments in the Church, that occurred after March 15, 1842, which did not have some Masonic interdependence. . . . There is absolutely no question in my mind that the Mormon ceremony which came to be known as the Endowment, introduced by Joseph Smith to Mormon Masons, had an immediate inspiration from Masonry. This is not to suggest that no other source of inspiration could have been involved, but the similarities between the two ceremonies are so apparent and overwhelming that some dependent relationship cannot be denied. . . .

It is also obvious that the Nauvoo Temple architecture was in part, at least, Masonically influenced. Indeed, it appears that there was an intentional attempt to utilize Masonic symbols and motifs. . . .

It was true that in orthodox Masonry, . . . the inclusion of women was definitely prohibited . . . The Joseph Smith Masonry was daily becoming less orthodox and tended to follow more in the direction of some unorthodox Masonry . . .

The second type of unorthodox female Masonry was known as “Adoptive” Masonry . . . The ceremonies for women in this order were quite similar to those later found within the endowment ceremony of the Mormons. . . . I suggest that enough evidence presently exists to declare that the entire institution of the political kingdom of God, including the Council of Fifty, the living constitution, the proposed flag of the kingdom, and the anointing and coronation of the king, had its genesis in connection with Masonic thoughts and ceremonies. . . . Can anyone deny that Masonic influence on Joseph Smith and the Church, either before or after his personal Masonic membership? The evidence demands comments. . .

There are many questions which still demand the answers . . . if we, as Mormon historians, respond to these questions and myriads [sic] like them relative to Masonry in an ostrich-like fashion, with our heads buried in the traditional sand, then I submit: there never will be “any help for the widow’s son.” (“Is There No Help For the Widow’s Son?” Mormon Miscellaneous, October, 1975, pp. 11, 12, 13, 16)

33. The Mountain Meadows Massacre

Because of the persecution the Mormon people received in Missouri and Illinois, some members of the church became very bitter against their enemies. The Mormon leaders went so far as to blame the United States Government for their troubles. The Mormon Apostle Orson Pratt wrote the following in 1845:

Brethren awake!—be determined to get out from this evil nation next spring. We do not want one saint to be left in the United States after that time. Let every branch . . . be determined to flee out of Babylon, . . . (Times and Seasons, vol. 6, p. 1043)

The following statements from the Latter-Day Saints' Millennial Star, vol. 7, show the feelings that the Mormons had against the United States Government in 1846:

And now when the Saints cannot remain any longer, they are willing to go. This is also necessary in order that the judgments of God might be poured out upon that guilty nation that is already drunk with the blood of the Saints. The church must come out from the midst of the Gentiles. . . . There is no safety under the government of the United States . . . let the Saints arise and go out of her midst. . . .

Elder Thomas Ward rose to express his feelings on the present occasion, . . . Providence and circumstances compel the church to come from that Gentile race, to become a people and nation themselves, and to transact business with nations instead of the people that have oppressed us. (Latter-Day Saints' Millennial Star, vol. 7, pp. 1-2)

. . . duty calls our beloved brother Woodruff from the presidency of the church in Britain, to join his brethren in their exodus from the United States . . . from an unprotecting and oppressive government. (Ibid., p. 10)

. . . the wrath of an avenging God must fall upon the nation, and it is necessary for his people to be gathered away, that they be not partakers of the plagues that will assuredly come upon that guilty land. (Ibid., p. 60)

. . . her [America's] own children are ashamed of their birthright, . . . they will go forth shaking off the dust of their feet upon her, and leaving their curse upon the doomed and fated people and rulers of the United States. . . . The cup of the iniquity of that nation is full unto the brim, and the blood of the Saints crieth from the ground for vengeance, and it is nigh at hand, even at the door. That guilty nation, that hath vaunted herself above all nations, shall bite the dust and come to naught, the elements of destruction are within herself, . . . shameful shall be thy fall! (Ibid., pp. 200-201)

On December 1, 1845, W. W. Phelps wrote a letter in which he stated:

“Sir: The Quorum of the Twelve solicited me to write to you . . . we have concluded to let this rotten government alone, and shall not petition at Washington.” (Oliver Cowdery—Second Elder And Scribe, p. 249)

On May 14, 1848, Oliver B. Huntington reported the following in his diary:

“ . . . the spirit of God rested upon Brigham and he cursed the nation by the authority and power of God and the Priesthood given him and all the Saints said amen. He was never known to curse so much in his life as on that day. The nation, the land of Missouri, that sickness should not allow any but the righteous to live upon it, and old Colonel Miller, . . . All the Saints said amen.” (“Oliver B. Huntington Diary,” May 14, 1848, as cited in The Lion of the Lord, p. 88)

Hosea Stout recorded the following in his diary:

Friday 26th [1845]. . . . The company . . . were addressed by Lieu Gen Young . . . I never intend to winter in the United States except on a visit we do not owe this country a single Sermon . . . I do not intend to Stay in such an Hell of a Hole and if this bee your mind signify it by saying Hie—which was loudly responded to by the assembly—they are continually accusing us of stealing they [their?] horses & cattle—I wish some of the brethren would steal & kill them . . . They are as corrupt as Hell from the president down clean through the priest and the people are all as corrupt as the Devil . . . (On The Mormon Frontier—The Diary of Hosea Stout, vol. 1, p. 73)

In 1857 Heber C. Kimball, a member of the First Presidency, made these comments:

Thank God, I say, that we are delivered from that Christian nation. Deliver me from their Christianity and from them. . . .

I will tell you the day of our separation has come, and we are a free and an independent people, isolated a thousand miles from the Christian nation; and thanks be to our God for ever. (Journal of Discourses, vol. 6, pp. 130, 133)

The Utah War

Brigham Young had hoped to take the Mormons “beyond the boundaries of the United States,” but the Mexican War “changed these calculations” (Quest for Empire, p. 115). Therefore, the Mormon leaders found themselves still under the power of the United States Government. Although Brigham Young was allowed the privilege of being Governor, the federal government appointed a number of officials that displeased the Mormon leaders. John Taylor, who became the third President of the Mormon Church, stated:

I said, We have been outrageously imposed upon by United States' officials. They send out every rag-tag and bob-tail, and every mean nincompoop they can scrape up from the filth and scum of society, and dub him a United States' officer; . . . (Journal of Discourses, vol. 5, p. 118)

Although Brigham Young's idea of establishing a kingdom was bound to bring him into conflict with the government of the United States, it should be acknowledged that the officials sent by the government were not perfect. Stanley P. Hirshon observes:

Unfortunately some of Utah's federal appointees deserved such treatment, “Money is my God,” Drummond bragged to Remy and Julius Brenchley, “and you may put this down in your journals if you like.” Abandoning his wife without support, Drummond brought with him to Utah a prostitute he had picked up in Washington and passed off as his wife. In court she sat beside him. (The Lion of the Lord, p. 160)

In his zeal to establish a kingdom Brigham Young was ready to capitalize on any mistake made by the federal government. The historian Hubert Howe Bancroft gives this information: “At the tabernacle elders waxed bold, and all their remonstrances and overtures of peace being rejected, they openly avowed, sometimes in braggart phrase, their contempt for the United States government and its army, and declared that Israel should now be free” (History of Utah, pp. 523-524). Stanley P. Hirshon states that “Young’s methods reinforced the Gentile belief that the Mormons seriously threatened the federal government” (The Lion of the Lord, p. 142). The Mormon writer William E. Berrett made this statement: “Misunderstandings between the Saints and Federal appointees and the subsequent ill feelings and abusive actions on both sides, fill many pages of Utah history” (The Restored Church, 1956, p. 446). On May 4, 1855, the New York Herald reported that Brigham Young said the following:

. . . It is reported that I have said that whoever the President appoints, I am still Governor. I repeat it, all hell cannot remove me. (Cries of “Amen.”) I am still your Governor. (Cries of “Glory to God.”) I will still rule this people until God himself permits another to take my place. I wish I could say as much for the other officers of the government. The greater part of them are a gambling, drinking, whoring set. . . . Do you think I’ll obey or respect them? No! I’ll say as I did the other day, when the flag was hauled down from before the military quarters—“Let them take down the American flag; we can do without it.” (Great applause, stamping of feet and yells.) (New York Herald, May 4, 1855, as cited in The Lion of the Lord, pp. 158-159)

On September 6, 1857, Hosea Stout recorded the following in his diary:

President B. Young in his Sermon declared that the thre[a]ld was cut between us and the U.S. and that the Almighty recognised us as a free and independent people and that no officer appointed by government (sent to [crossed out]) should come and rule over us from this time forth. (On The Mormon Frontier, The Diary of Hosea Stout, vol. 2, p. 636)

Heber C. Kimball, a member of the First Presidency, made these statements:

Is there a collision between us and the United States? No; we have not collashed: that is the word that sounds nearest to what I mean. But now the thread is cut between them and us, . . . (Journal of Discourses, vol. 5, p. 251)

We have declared our independence...when the time of the test comes, as the Lord God Almighty lives, if you then leave us or betray us, that is the end of you. . . .

This year’s trouble will not be much. It is not going to amount to a great deal; but it will amount to this—a collision between this people and the United States; and the gate will be shut down between us and them. This is already done to a certain extent; but many of you do not see it. (Ibid., p. 275)

One of the main incidents that triggered the Utah War was a raid the Mormons made on the office of Judge George P. Stiles. Nels Anderson states:

Stiles took the position that the United States marshal and not the territorial marshal should have jurisdiction over serving writs and impaneling juries. The former office was usually a Gentile; the latter, a Mormon, an important factor in selecting jurors. Because of his opposition, three Mormon lawyers—James Ferguson, J. C. Little, and Hosea Stout—in February, 1857, created a disturbance in the court of Judge Stiles. Not satisfied with breaking up the court and forcing its adjournment, these lawyer-Saints raided the office of Judge Stiles, took possession of some of his books, and carried some of his documents and papers to an outhouse and burned them. (Desert Saints, p. 160)

The reader will notice that Nels Anderson states that Hosea Stout was involved in this disturbance. In his diary Hosea Stout recorded the following under the date of December 30, 1856:

Last night the Law library of Judge Stiles & T. S. Williams was broken open and the books and papers thereof taken away. A privy near by was filled with books a few thousand shingles and laths added and the concern set on fire and consumed. Six transit Lex non Scripti. (On The Mormon Frontier, The Diary of Hosea Stout, vol. 2, p. 613)

In a footnote on the same page, Juanita Brooks states:

As on October 12, 1855, when persons unknown broke into the office of Almon W. Babbitt and carried away all the official papers, now again some zealots looted the offices of Judge Stiles, lately excommunicated, and Thomas S. Williams, also out of favor with the church. Later these books were found and returned, the burning of the privy and some papers being only a trick to anger and deceive the judge. Sic transit lex non Scripti—“Thus passeth away the unwritten law.”

The historian Hubert Howe Bancroft gives the following information concerning this matter:

A short time afterwards the records of the United States district courts were taken from the judge’s office during his absence, and a few moments before his return a bonfire was made of the books and papers in his office. He, of course, supposed that the records were also consumed, and so made affidavit on his return to Washington in the spring of 1857. Meanwhile the business of the courts was suspended. The records had, in fact, been removed, and were in safe-keeping; but this silly freak was noised abroad throughout the land with many exaggerations, and excited much adverse comments. (History of Utah, pp. 488-489)

After the departure of Drummond, the only gentile official remaining in the territory was Garland Hurt, the Indian agent, and none were found willing to accept office in a territory where it was believed they could only perform their duty at peril of their lives. (Ibid., p. 492)

It was now established, as was supposed, on sufficient evidence, that the Mormons refused obedience to gentile law, that federal officials had been virtually driven from Utah, that one, at least, of the federal judges had been threatened with violence while his court was in session, and that the records of the court had been destroyed or concealed. With the advice of his cabinet, therefore, and yielding perhaps not unwillingly to the outcry of the republican party, President Buchanan determined that Brigham should be superseded as governor, and that a force should be sent to the territory, ostensibly as a posse comitatus, to sustain the authority of his successor. (Ibid., p. 495)

Nels Anderson gives this information:

Senator Stephen A. Douglas made a speech on June 12, 1857, . . . He spoke with authority of reports which indicated that the Mormons were not loyal to the government. He charged that nine out of ten of Utah’s inhabitants were aliens, that Mormons were bound to their leader by “horrid oaths,” that the church was inciting the Indians to acts of hostility, and that the Danites, or “Destroying Angels,” were robbing and killing American citizens.

On June 26 Lincoln made a speech, also at Springfield; and he also touched the Mormon question. He ventured the opinion that perhaps territorial status should be repealed and Utah placed under the judicial control of neighboring states. The Mormons, he said, “ought somehow [to] be called into obedience.” . . .

President Buchanan felt impelled to take action against the Mormons, . . . He met the situation by calling the Mormon problem one of civil disobedience. . . .

On June 29 General Scott dispatched orders to General W. S. Harney at Fort Leavenworth, instructing him to outfit a detachment of 2,600 men and officers for garrison service in Utah to restore order and support civil authority. (Desert Saints, pp. 167-168)

Instead of submitting, the Mormon leaders decided to resist the federal government. Heber C. Kimball, a member of the First Presidency, made these statements:

Listen to the counsel of God and those men that are placed here; . . . our enemies shall be overcome every time before they cross that Big Mountain, if we have to do it ourselves. . . . We intend to kill the poor curses ourselves, before they get to the Big Mountain. (Journal of Discourses, vol. 5, p. 135)

Will we have manna? Yes. The United States have 700 waggons loaded with about 2 tons to each wagon with all kinds of things, and then 7,000 head of cattle; and there are said to be 2,500 troops, with this, and that, and the other. That is all right. Suppose the troops don't get here, but all these goods and cattle come. Well, that would be a mighty help to us; that would clothe up the boys and the girls, and make them comfortable; and then, remember, there are 15 months' provisions besides. I am only talking about this . . . the President of the United States, . . . shall be cursed, in the name of Israel's God, . . .

Send 2,500 troops here, our brethren, to make a desolation of this people! God Almighty helping me, I will fight until there is not a drop of blood in my veins. Good God! I have wives enough to whip out the United States; for they will whip themselves. Amen. (Ibid., pp. 94-95)

. . . we shall never be ruled over by them from this day forth, . . . You ladies, too, will certainly have to do your part, or back out. I told you last Sunday to arm yourselves; and if you cannot do it any other way, sell some of your fine bonnets, fine dresses, and buy yourselves a good dirk, a pistol, or some other instrument of war. Arm your boys and arm yourselves universally, and that, too, with the weapons of war; . . . if we live our religion, and do as we are told, those men will never come over those mountains; for we shall slay the poor devils before they get there. (Ibid., pp. 162-163)

The Mormon Apostle George A. Smith was sent south, and according to his own statement, his preaching was of a military nature:

. . . I found myself preaching a military discourse; . . .

I then went to Harmony, Brother Dame preached to the military, and I to the civil powers; . . . my discourse partook of the military more than the religious. . . it seemed that I was perfectly running over with it, and hence I had to say something about it. (Journal of Discourses, vol. 5, pp. 221-222)

As we shall see later, the visit to the southern settlements by George A. Smith had a very important relationship to the Mountain Meadows Massacre.

At this time the Mormon leaders did everything they could to turn their people against the U.S. Government and to stir them up to resist the troops sent by the President. Brigham Young, for instance, told the people that the federal government's request for the "Mormon Battalion" in 1846 was an act of persecution:

There cannot be a more damnable, dastardly order issued . . . the poor, low, degraded curses sent a requisition for five hundred of our men . . . That was President Polk; and he is now weltering in hell. . . . And the very act of James K. Polk in taking five hundred of our men, . . . would have hung him between the heavens and the earth, if the laws had been faithfully executed. (Journal of Discourses, vol. 5, pp. 231, 232, 235)

This accusation was, of course, completely untrue; actually, the federal government did this as a "special favor" for the Mormon people, and the Mormons themselves had requested it (see pp. 249-250 of this book).

The Mormon leaders also misrepresented the intentions of the U.S. Government by stating that the troops were going to kill them and steal the women. Stanley P. Hirshon stated: "As Kimball saw it, Buchanan had sent 'troops to kill brother Brigham and me; and to take the young women to the States' . . ." (The Lion of the Lord, p. 172). On September 27, 1857, Heber C. Kimball stated:

. . . they [the troops] exulted over us and sang all manner of songs, telling how they were going to kill brother Brigham and all those who would uphold "Mormonism;" and they seemed to be as crazy as fools. They swore that they would use every woman in this place at their own pleasure—that they would slay old Brigham and old Heber; . . . (Journal of Discourses, vol. 5, p. 274)

Charles L. Walker recorded the following in his diary:

Sunday, Jan. 24, 1858. . . . Went to the Tabernacle. Bro. E. T. Benson . . . said the U.S. were all gaping full of fear about the Mormons and were shipping troops around by California. Said it was their intention to destroy every man, woman and child that was a Mormon and wipe us out of existence. ("Diary of Charles L. Walker," 1855-1902, typed excerpts, p. 2)

The following statements by the historian Hubert Howe Bancroft show that the accusations by the Mormon leaders were without foundation:

. . . every precaution was taken to avoid, if possible, the shedding of blood. "The instructions of the commanding officer," writes the secretary of war, "were deliberately considered and carefully drawn, and he was charged not to allow any conflict to take place between the troops and the people of the territory, except only he should be called upon by the governor for soldiers to act as a posse comitatus in enforcing obedience to the laws." (History of Utah, p. 497)

On page 537 of the same book, Bancroft shows that when the Mormons finally allowed the troops to come in they did not commit the crimes which the Mormon leaders claimed they would commit:

During the march of the army not a house was disturbed, not a citizen harmed or molested, and during its sojourn of nearly two years in the territory, instances were rare indeed of gross misconduct on the part of the soldiery.

When the Mormon leaders told their people that the troops were coming to destroy them and take their women it caused a great deal of fear. Under the direction of Brigham Young the Mormon people prepared to fight the U.S. Government troops. On September 15, 1857, Brigham Young issued a proclamation in which he stated:

Therefore, I, Brigham Young, governor, and superintendent of Indian affairs for the territory of Utah, in the name of the people of the United States in the territory of Utah, 1st—Forbid all armed forces, of every description, from coming into this territory under any pretense whatever.

2nd—That all the forces in said territory hold themselves in readiness to march, at a moments notice, to repel any and all such invasion.

3d—Martial law is hereby declared to exist in this territory, from and after the publication of this proclamation; and no person shall be allowed to pass or repass into, or through, or from this territory, without a permit from the proper officer. (A Comprehensive History of the Church, vol. 4, p. 274)

In simple language Brigham Young's "proclamation" meant that he intended to resist the U.S. troops when they tried to enter the territory of Utah. In his History of Utah, the historian Hubert Howe Bancroft gives the following information concerning the "Utah War":

But the sequel will show that instead of the troops living on the Mormons, the Mormons lived on the troops, stampeding their cattle, plundering or destroying their provision trains, and only after all fear of active hostilities had been removed, selling them surplus grain at exorbitant rates. (History of Utah, p. 499)

Then war became the universal theme. Fire-arms were manufactured or repaired; scythes were turned into bayonets; long-unused sabres were burnished and sharpened, and from all parts of the earth the saints were summoned to the defence of Zion. (Ibid., p. 505)

. . . I cannot do better than quote a few lines from a despatch addressed soon afterward by the lieutenant-general of the Nauvoo legion to Major Joseph Taylor, and signed, "your brother in Christ, Daniel H. Wells." "On ascertaining the locality or route of the troops, proceed at once to annoy them in every possible way. Use every exertion to stampede their animals and set fire to their trains. Burn the whole country before them and on their flanks. Keep them from sleeping, by night surprises; blockade the road by felling trees or destroying the river fords where you can. Watch for opportunities to set fire to the grass on their windward, so as, if possible, to envelop their trains. Leave no grass before them that can be burned. Keep your men concealed as much as possible, and guard against surprise.” . . . later General Wells, in command of 1,250 men, supplied with thirty days’ rations, established his headquarters at Echo Canon, . . . Through this canon, the Mormons supposed, lay the path of the invading army, . . . On the western side of the canon dams and ditches were constructed, by means of which the road could be submerged to a depth of several feet; at the eastern side stone heaps were collected and boulders loosened from the overhanging rocks, so that a slight leverage would hurl them on the passing troops, and parapets were built as a protection for sharp-shooters. . . . Wells determined to open the campaign, a plan of which had been before arranged at Salt Lake City. Inviting to dinner Major Lot Smith, . . . he asked him whether he could take some forty men, . . . and, passing in rear of the foe, turn back or burn the supply trains still on the road. “I think I can,” replied Lot Smith; and the next evening he started out. . . . he approached them at dusk, while encamped at a spot known as Simpson’s Hollow, on Green River, and there lay in ambush for several hours. Meanwhile he ascertained as he relates, that there were two trains, each of twenty-six wagons—there being, in fact, three, with seventy-five wagons in all. . . . When all the wagons were fairly in a blaze, the Mormons rode away, telling their panic-stricken captives that they would return as soon as they had delivered the spoils to their comrades near by, and instantly shoot any one who should attempt to extinguish the flames. . . .

On the 11th of October the troops commenced their march. . . . Meanwhile bands of Mormons, under their nimble and ubiquitous leaders, hung on their flanks, just out of rifle-shot, harassing them at every step, 700 oxen being captured and driven to Salt Lake City on the 13th. . . .

The march commenced on the 6th of November, and on the previous night 500 of the strongest oxen had been stolen by the Mormons. . . . The trains destroyed at Simpson Hollow, for instance, were laden entirely with provisions, while three others that followed contained the tents and all the clothing. Fortunately the latter did not fall into the hands of the Mormons, though when unpacked it was found that they contained more of utterly useless supplies than of what was really needed. . . .

Thus did the army of Utah pass the winter of 1857-8, amid privations no less severe than those endured at Valley Forge eighty-one years before; . . . (Ibid., pp. 511, 513-520, 522)

. . . Buchanan was induced to stop the threatened war, and on the 6th of April signed a proclamation promising amnesty to all who returned to their allegiance. After dwelling at length on the past offences of the Mormons and the malign influence of their leaders, he declares the territory to be in a state of rebellion. “This rebellion,” he continues, “is not merely a violation of your legal duty; it is without just cause, without reason, without excuse. You never made a complaint that was not listened to with patience. You never exhibited a real grievance that was not redressed as promptly as it could be . . . But being anxious to save the effusion of blood, and to avoid the indiscriminate punishment of a whole people for crimes of which it is not probable that all are equally guilty, I offer now a free and full pardon to all who will submit themselves to the authority of the government.”

The proclamation, though it served its purpose gave offence to both parties. . . . the Mormon authorities admitted the burning of the army trains and the stampeding of cattle, and for those acts accepted the president’s pardon. All other charges they denied. (Ibid., pp. 529-532)

The Utah war was an ill-advised measure on the part of the United States government. . . . The Utah war cost several hundred lives, and at least $15,000,000, at a time in the nation’s history when men and money could least be spared, and accomplished practically nothing, save that it exposed the president and his cabinet to much well-deserved ridicule. (Ibid., p. 538)

The Mormon historian B. H. Roberts says that the Mormons did not wish to shed blood, but he admits that they destroyed government property:

A council of war was held by the Nauvoo Legion officers at Fort Bridger on the afternoon of the 3rd of October. It was decided in the council to begin active operations against the “Expedition.” . . .

General Wells ordered Major Lot Smith to take a small company of men and intercept the supply trains then advancing from South Pass and either turn them back or burn them. . . .

While Smith’s command was burning the first train a guard from the second came up to see what was going on. . . . fifty-one wagons and their contents were completely destroyed in this first burning. . . . There were twenty-five wagons in this third train, and allowing the teamsters and Captain Simpson to load up two of the wagons with provisions and clothing for their personal use, the rest of the train was burned. . . .

The amount of property destroyed in burning these seventy-four wagons was considerable, and appears in detail in Commissary Clarke’s report in the House Documents of the 35th Congress. (Comprehensive History of the Church, vol. 4, pp. 278, 279, 280, 281, 283, 285)

It is very interesting to note that when indictments were issued against the Mormon leaders and others for treason, the notorious “Destroying Angels” Bill Hickman and Orrin Porter Rockwell were included. The Mormon writer Harold Schindler states:

A grand jury empanelled by the “court” returned a true bill against twenty Mormons by name . . .

A glance at the first eight names on the blanket indictment showed Brigham Young, Heber C. Kimball, Daniel H. Wells, John Taylor, George D. Grant, Lot Smith, Porter Rockwell, and William A. Hickman. All were charged with treason, in that they “wickedly, maliciously and traitorously levied war against the United States.” (Orrin Porter Rockwell, p. 282)

. . . in Washington Buchanan was directing a team of peace commissioners to proceed to Utah with a proclamation of full pardon for all deeds committed during the “war.” Its language swept away treason indictments returned by the grand jury at Camp Scott. So long as he accepted the terms, Rockwell, among others, had no need to fear reprisals for military actions during the so-called rebellion. (Ibid., p. 286)

Although the Mormons did not shed the blood of the United States troops, they robbed and destroyed their provisions and thus caused hardships that undoubtedly led to the death of many soldiers. The historian Bancroft states that the Utah war “cost several hundred lives.” It would, of course, be hard to determine just how many of these men would have lived if the Mormons had not destroyed their provisions. While the Mormons were reluctant to fire upon the U.S. troops, they killed a large number of innocent civilians in Utah at this time. The Mountain Meadows Massacre, the Aiken Massacre and a number of other cruel murders were committed during this period of rebellion.

The Massacre

The Mormon historian B. H. Roberts called the Mountain Meadows Massacre “the most lamentable episode in Utah history, and in the history of the church” (Comprehensive History of the Church, vol. 4, p. 139). The details of the Mountain Meadows Massacre are as follows: In 1857 a company of emigrants led by Charles Fancher was passing through Utah. Joseph Fielding Smith states:

. . . —About the time the news arrived in Salt Lake City of the coming of an army, there was passing through the city under command of Captain Fancher, a company of emigrants from Arkansas and Missouri. This company consisted of about thirty families, numbering one hundred and thirty-seven persons. The Arkansas emigrants appeared to be respectable and well-to-do. With them there traveled a rough and reckless company calling themselves “Missouri Wild Cats,” who conducted themselves in keeping with the name. (Essentials in Church History, p. 513)

Juanita Brooks states:

This group all arrived in Salt Lake City on August 3 and 4, and knowing the fate of the Donner Party the year before, decided to take the southern route. They followed a few days behind President George A. Smith on his journey south ordering the people to keep their grain and not to sell a kernel to any gentiles. This, of course, was hard on travelers who faced the desert and had expected to replenish their stores in Utah. The Fancher train was well-to-do; they had cash to pay or goods to trade, but no one would sell. (John D. Lee, p. 203)

The Mormon writer William E. Berrett gives this information:

During this period of Utah's history there was a constant string of emigrant trains passing through the territory on their way to California. The feeling between such emigrants and the Saints was not always a wholesome one. . . .

A crisis in feeling was reached during the time that a large company of Arkansas emigrants were on their way to California via southern Utah, in 1857. . . .

The evidence concerning their actions in passing through the southern settlements is so conflicting that it is difficult to determine the entire truth. . . .

The Indians were thoroughly aroused. All the accumulated insults of the many caravans caused them to seek vengeance. . . .

Ordinarily the influence of the settlers was exerted to keep the peace, and at any cost prevent an attack upon emigrant trains. At this time it appears that this restraint was not used. (The Restored Church, 1956, pp. 466-467)

Brigham Young warned Captain Van Vliet that if the government persisted in sending the army he would "not hold the Indians by the wrist any longer":

"If the government persists in sending an army to destroy us, in the name of the Lord, we shall conquer them. If they dare to force the issue, I shall not hold the Indians by the wrist any longer, for white men to shoot at them; they shall go ahead and do as they please. If the issue comes, you may tell the government to stop all emigration across this continent, for the Indians will kill all who attempt it." (History of Brigham Young, Ms., September 9, 1857, as cited in Comprehensive History of the Church, vol. 4, p. 155, n. 32)

B. H. Roberts claims that this statement by Young was made a few days after the Mountain Meadows Massacre and therefore had nothing to do with the massacre. He also states that it "constituted a warning instead of a threat."

In a new edition of her book, The Mountain Meadows Massacre, Juanita Brooks calls attention to a very revealing entry in the journal of Brigham Young:

Recently I was given access to an electrostatic copy of the daily journal of Brigham Young. Under the date of September 1, 1857, the entry reads:

Kanosh the Pavaunt chief with several of his band visited me gave them some council and presents. A spirit seems to be taking possession of the Indians to assist Israel. I can hardly restrain them from exterminating the Americans.

This seems very significant . . . it seems that Kanosh was given private audience. He was the chief who had killed Captain John W. Gunnison and several of his men . . . on October 28, 1853. Whether or not Kanosh and his band were at the Mountain Meadows we do not know, but we can now be more certain that the Mormon war strategy was to use the natives as "the battle-ax of the Lord," . . . (The Mountain Meadows Massacre, University of Oklahoma Press, 1970, Author's Statement—II, pp. vii-viii)

As the company of emigrants passed through Utah, the feelings became very bitter. Juanita Brooks states:

At Parowan, the gates of that fort were closed and the company passed by the town. Here one man, William Leany, recognized a member of the company, William Aiden, as the son of a man who had befriended him while he was on a mission. He gave Aiden some vegetables from his garden, knowing well that he was acting in direct opposition to the official orders. A few days later he was called out of his house and struck over the head by one of the local police on the charge that he had rendered "aid and comfort to the enemy." He was left for dead, and indeed never did recover fully from the blow.

At Cedar City, the last place on the road where they could get provisions, the conduct of some of the Missourians was such that the local police tried to arrest them, only to be laughed at with scorn. Since the people would not sell nor trade any foodstuff at all, some of the emigrants proceeded to help themselves; thus as they left the town, a trail of hate and resentment remained behind them. (John D. Lee, p. 206)

Prior to the arrival of the emigrants, the Mormon leaders had been very strongly preaching the doctrine of "blood atonement." Juanita Brooks observes: "There was much preaching of 'blood atonement' . . ." (Ibid., p. 188). John D. Lee himself stated:

The Mormons nearly all, and I think every one of them in Utah, previous to the massacre at Mountain Meadows, believed in blood atonement. It was taught by the leaders and believed by the people that the Priesthood were inspired and could not give a wrong order. It was the belief of all that I ever heard talk of these things—and I have been with the Church since the dark days in Jackson County—that the authority that ordered a murder committed, was the only responsible party, that the man who did the killing was only an instrument, working by command of a superior, and hence could have no ill will against the person killed, but was only acting by authority and committed no wrong. In other words, if Brigham Young or any of his apostles, or any of the Priesthood, gave an order to a man, the act was the act of the one giving the order, and the man doing the act was only an instrument of the person commanding—just as much of an instrument as the knife that was used to cut the throat of the victim. This being the belief of all good Mormons, it is easily understood why the orders of the Priesthood were so blindly obeyed by the people. (Confessions of John D. Lee, pp. 279-280)

John D. Lee's statements with regard to the teachings of the early Mormon leaders are certainly true. As we have shown, Heber C. Kimball, First Counsellor to Brigham Young, definitely taught that the people should follow the leaders whether they were right or wrong:

. . . learn to do as you are told, . . . if you are told by your leader to do a thing, do it, none of your business whether it is right or wrong. (Journal of Discourses, vol. 6, p. 32)

Now, according to the teachings of Brigham Young, the emigrants had committed at least one sin which was deserving of death—i.e., they had stolen some food at Cedar City. Brigham Young made this statement concerning thieves:

If you want to know what to do with a thief that you may find stealing, I say kill him on the spot, and never suffer him to commit another iniquity. (Journal of Discourses, vol. 1, p. 108)

The Mormon Apostle Orson Hyde made these statements a few years before the Mountain Meadows Massacre:

Suppose the shepherd should discover a wolf approaching the flock, what would he be likely to do? Why, we should suppose, if the wolf was within proper distance, that he would kill him at once with the weapons of defense which he carries; in short, that he would shoot him down, kill him on the spot. If the wolf was not within shot, we would naturally suppose he would set the dogs on him; and you are aware, I have no doubt, that these shepherd dogs have very pointed teeth, and they are very active, very sensitive to know when the flock is in danger. It is sometimes the case, perhaps, that the shepherd has not with him the necessary arms to destroy the wolf, but in such a case he would set his faithful dogs on him, and by that means accomplish his destruction. . . .

Now don't say that brother Hyde has taught strong things, for I have only told you what takes place between the shepherd and the flock, when the sheep have to be protected.

If you say that the priesthood or authorities of the Church here are the shepherd, and the Church is the flock, you can make your own application of this figure. It is not at all necessary for me to do it.

It is all the same to me whether they want to destroy the flock, or destroy, steal, and carry off the property of the flock. . . . my feelings are these—the best way to sanctify ourselves, and please God our heavenly Father in these days, is to rid ourselves of every thief, and sanctify the people from every vile character. . . . It would have a tendency to place a terror on those who leave these parts, that may prove their salvation when they see the heads of thieves taken off, or shot down before the public. (Journal of Discourses, vol. 1, pp. 72-73)

Now, the emigrants had not only stolen some food from the Mormons, but they claimed they had persecuted them in Missouri and Illinois. Brigham Young made this statement concerning those who had persecuted the Mormons: “. . . in regard to those who have persecuted this people . . . we could take the same law they have taken, viz., mobocracy, and if any miserable scoundrels come here, cut their throats” (Journal of Discourses, vol. 2, p. 311). On another occasion Young stated:

I will tell you how much I love those characters. If they had any respect to their own welfare, they would come forth and say, whether Joseph Smith was a Prophet or not, “We shed his blood, and now let us atone for it,” and they would be willing to have their heads chopped off, that their blood might run upon the ground, and the smoke of it rise before the Lord as an incense for their sins. I love them that much. (Journal of Discourses, vol. 2, p. 186)

The reader will remember that the Mormon Apostle Abraham H. Cannon recorded in his journal that Joseph F. Smith, who became the sixth President of the Mormon Church, was about to murder a man with his “pocket knife” if he even expressed approval of the murder of Joseph Smith:

The cloud immediately lifted from Bro. Smith and he found that he had his open pocket knife grasped in his hand in his pocket, and he believes that had this man given his approval to that murder of the prophets he would have immediately struck him to the heart. (“Daily Journal of Abraham H. Cannon,” December 6, 1889, p. 206; see photograph on page 403 of this book)

In the same journal we find that George Q. Cannon, a member of the First Presidency, admitted that when “he had his endowments in Nauvoo that he took an oath against the murderers of the Prophet Joseph as well as other prophets, and if he had ever met any of those who had taken a hand in that massacre he would undoubtedly have attempted to avenge the blood of the martyrs” (Ibid., p. 205).

The Mormon historian B. H. Roberts admits that much of the boasting of the emigrants may have been “mere bravado,” but he states that these statements placed them in a dangerous position:

Though much of their boasting about participation in the Missouri and Illinois “Mormon” troubles may have been the mere bravado of the “Missouri Wildcats;” and their threats against the then presiding “Mormon” leaders, and their expressed intention to return in force and destroy the Latter-day Saint settlements, may have been but vain ranting of the reckless spirits of the camp, yet it was suicidal to indulge in that bravado and such ranting. . . . to make these boasts, and to indulge in these threats at a time when great excitement prevailed in the “Mormon” settlements, and the war spirit of the people was aroused by reports of the approach of an invading army . . . was, under all the circumstances, to invite calamity . . . fear became a weighty argument in determining the fate of the emigrant company. (Comprehensive History of the Church, vol. 4, pp. 154-155)

The reader will also remember that the Mormon leaders had told the people that the army was coming to destroy them and take their women, and that the Mormon Apostle George A. Smith went south preaching war. According to his own statement, when he preached at Harmony his “discourse partook of the military more than the religious.” He also stated that “one single sentence is enough to put every man in motion.”

What made it worse for the emigrants was that one of them boasted that he had a gun which was used to shoot Joseph Smith. Although this statement probably had no basis in fact, it helped to seal the fate of the emigrants.

Juanita Brooks states that after “the Sunday service at Cedar City on September 6” was over “a special priesthood meeting was called at which the problems connected with the Fancher Train were discussed.” Mrs. Brooks quotes part of the discussion as follows:

“. . . I think they should be done away with, at least the one that bragged that he carried the gun . . . I think that we are all bound by our covenants to see that he does not live to do any more damage.”

“There were others just as bad as he was.”

“But how will you get them? They are all well armed, and we would lose more than we would gain. Any attempt to take one of them would mean the lives of the posse that went after him.”

So the discussion went on, some in favor of “doing away with” the men who had been the chief offenders, others preferring to let them all go . . .

Thus events followed one another, leading inexorably to the final tragedy. . . . Strong hatred, deep-seated beliefs, and greed were all combined in the drama. That this was a wealthy train with good wagons and ox teams and horses; with a large herd of cattle; and with loads of household goods and necessities was without doubt a factor with some who were involved. Their own deep religious convictions increased in potency—that “the blood of the Prophet should be avenged” and that by their own covenants, taken in the Nauvoo Temple or in the Endowment House, they were bound to help carry out God’s will. (John D. Lee, pp. 207-208)

The Mormon historian B. H. Roberts admits that such a meeting was held:

It was customary for the local leading men at Cedar and from the smaller settlements in its vicinity to gather in a council meeting after the close of the regular Sunday services of the church, to consider the questions of local community interest. At such a meeting on the 6th of September the question concerning the conduct of, and what ought to be done with, the Arkansas emigrants was brought up and debated. Some in the council were in favor of destroying them, and others were not. (Comprehensive History of the Church, vol. 4, p. 149)

Juanita Brooks states that the Mormons wanted the Indians to attack the emigrant train:

Here again all the offenses of the emigrants, real and imagined, were gone over; here again was summarized all the evidence that those in authority in the church would approve of the destruction of the emigrant train, if it could be done by the Indians. Lee had accompanied George A. Smith in his travels through the southern settlements, and from the various conversations along the road as well as from the public speeches, convinced himself that this action would be in harmony with the course to be taken in the approaching war. . . .

As a result of the conversation that night, it was agreed that they would stir up the Indians further and encourage them to attack the company and rob them of their cattle and goods. At this point there was no decision to exterminate them. Everything was to be done by the Indians, under the direction of a few white men. (Mountain Meadows Massacre, p. 54; p. 77 of 1962 reprint)

On page 67 (page 95 of 1962 reprint) of the same book, Mrs. Brooks states:

Lee’s statement that the original plan was to stir up the Indians to the attack seems to be true, with the Mormons brought in later when it became evident that the Indians alone could not commit the crime. Certainly the final responsibility must rest squarely upon the Mormons, William H. Dame as commander, and those under him who helped to form the policy and to carry out the orders.

Garland Hurt made this statement concerning the Indians: “They acknowledged having participated in the massacre of the emigrants, but said that the Mormons persuaded them into it” (Senate Executive Document 42, 36 Cong., 1 sess., 94-95, as cited in The Mountain Meadows Massacre, p. 194; p. 252 of 1962 edition). On page 36 (pages 56-57 of 1962 reprint) of her book, Juanita Brooks states:

The Indians, being “the battle-ax of the Lord,” could logically do the work, for they had no qualms about shedding blood, even innocent blood. Since the Big Mormon Chief wanted them to help with this war, here was a good place to begin. So the natives had followed and annoyed the company, happy in the sense of Mormon approval; they sent out runners to other bands for reinforcements in this exciting and thrilling game.

Joseph Fielding Smith, the tenth President of the Mormon Church, gives this account of what followed:

. . . —Early in September the emigrant train of the Arkansas and Missouri companies camped in the little valley known as the Mountain Meadows. There they contemplated remaining for several days. In the meantime their conduct had aroused the Indian tribes who now surrounded their camp in hostile attitude. As near as can be ascertained, on the morning of the 7th of September at the break of day, the attack upon the emigrants began. . . . The Indians sent runners throughout the surrounding country calling for reinforcements from among their tribes and for John D. Lee, who had been in close touch with Indian affairs as their farmer, to come and lead them to victory. . . . Later, other white men appeared upon the scene, . . . Some of them remained, willingly or by coercion, to participate in the massacre which followed. . . . The victims discovered that white men were in league with the Indians, and this knowledge sealed their fate. It was determined by those making the attack that no emigrant should live who could tell the tale.

On the morning of Friday the 11th, Lee induced the emigrants to surrender under promise of protection and conveyance to a place of safety. They were led to a place where the Indians were in ambush, and at a given signal a volley of shots rang out, both Indians and white men participating in the outrage. Seventeen children of tender years—ranging in age from a few months to seven years—were all that were spared. (Essentials in Church History, pp. 515-516)

The Mormon writer William E. Berrett gives this description of the massacre:

It was a deliberately planned massacre, treacherously carried into execution. On the morning of September 11, a flag of truce was sent to the emigrant camp and terms of surrender proposed. The emigrants were to give up their arms. The wounded were to be loaded into wagons, followed by the women and children, and the men to bring up the rear, single file. Thus they were to be conducted by the whites to Cedar City. This was agreed to, and the march began. . . . the white men at a given signal, fell upon the unarmed emigrant men. . . . Only the smallest children were spared. (The Restored Church, pp. 468-469)

The pages which follow contain John D. Lee’s own account of the massacre as published in Mormonism Unveiled in 1880. The reader must keep in mind that John D. Lee was a Danite in Missouri and that he served in the Council of 50 under Brigham Young.

LAST CONFESSION AND STATEMENT OF JOHN D. LEE.

CHAPTER XVIII.

WRITTEN AT HIS DICTATION AND DELIVERED TO WILLIAM W. BISHOP, ATTORNEY FOR LEE, WITH A REQUEST THAT THE SAME BE PUBLISHED.

AS A DUTY to myself, my family, and mankind at large, I propose to give a full and true statement of all that I know and all that I did in that unfortunate affair, which has cursed my existence, and made me a wanderer from place to place for the last nineteen years, and which is known to the world as the Mountain Meadows Massacre.

I have no vindictive feeling against any one; no enemies to punish by this statement; and no friends to shield by keeping back, or longer keeping secret, any of the facts connected with the Massacre.

I believe that I must tell all that I do know, and tell everything just as the same transpired. I shall tell the truth and permit the public to judge who is most to blame for the crime that I am accused of committing. I did not act alone; I had many to assist me at the Mountain Meadows. I believe that most of those who were connected with the Massacre, and took part in the lamentable transaction that has blackened the character of all who were aiders or abettors in the same, were acting under the impression that they were performing a religious duty. I know all were acting under the orders and by the command of their Church leaders; and I firmly believe that the most of those who took part in the proceedings, considered it a religious duty to unquestioningly obey the orders which they had received. That they acted from a sense of duty to the Mormon Church, I never doubted. Believing that those with me acted from a sense of religious duty on that occasion, I have faithfully kept the secret of their guilt, and remained silent and true to the oath of secrecy which we took on the bloody field, for many long and bitter years. I have never betrayed those who acted with me and participated in the crime for which I am convicted, and for which I am to suffer death.

My attorneys, especially Wells Spicer and Wm. W. Bishop, have long tried, but tried in vain, to induce me to tell all I knew of the massacre and the causes which led to it. I have heretofore refused to tell the tale. Until the last few days I had intended to die, if die I must, without giving one word to the public concerning those who joined willingly, or unwillingly, in the work of destruction at Mountain Meadows.

To hesitate longer, or to die in silence, would be unjust and cowardly. I will not keep the secret any longer as my own, but will tell all I know.

At the earnest request of a few remaining friends, and by the advice of Mr. Bishop, my counsel, who has defended me thus far with all his ability, notwithstanding my want of money with which to pay even his expenses while attending to my case, I have concluded to write facts as I know them to exist.

I cannot go before the Judge of the quick and the dead without first revealing all that I know, as to what was done, who ordered me to do what I did do, and the motives that led to the commission of that unnatural and bloody deed.

The immediate orders for the killing of the emigrants came from those in authority at Cedar City. At the time of the massacre, I and those with me, acted by virtue of positive orders from Isaac C. Haight and his associates at Cedar City. Before I started on my mission to the Mountain Meadows, I was told by Isaac C. Haight that his orders to me were the result of full consultation with Colonel William H. Dame and all in authority. It is a new thing to me, if the massacre was not decided on by the head men of the Church, and it is a new thing for Mormons to condemn those who committed the deed. . . .

About the 7th of September, 1857, I went to Cedar City from my home at Harmony, by order of President Haight. I did not know what he wanted of me, but he had ordered me to visit him and I obeyed. If I remember correctly, it was on Sunday evening that I went there. When I got to Cedar City, I met Isaac C. Haight on the public square of the town. Haight was then President of that Stake of Zion, and the highest man in the Mormon priesthood in that country, and next to Wm. H. Dame in all of Southern Utah, and as Lieutenant Colonel he was second to Dame in the command of the Iron Military District. The word and command of Isaac C. Haight were the law in Cedar City, at that time, and to disobey his orders was certain death; be they right or wrong, no Saint was permitted to question them, their duty was obedience or death.

When I met Haight, I asked him what he wanted with me. He said he wanted to have a long talk with me on private and particular business. We took some blankets and went over to the old Iron Works, and lay there that night, so that we could talk in private and in safety. After we got to the Iron Works, Haight told me all about the train of emigrants. He said (and I then believed every word that he spoke, for I believed it was an impossible thing for one so high in the Priesthood as he was, to be guilty of falsehood) that the emigrants were a rough and abusive set of men. That they had, while traveling through Utah, been very abusive to all the Mormons they met. That they had insulted, outraged, and ravished many of the Mormon women. That the abuses heaped upon the people by the emigrants during their trip from Provo to Cedar City, had been constant and shameful; that they had burned fences and destroyed growing crops; that at many points on the road they had poisoned the water, so that all people and stock that drank of the water became sick, and many had died from the effects of poison. That these vile Gentiles publicly proclaimed that they had the very pistol with which the Prophet, Joseph Smith, was murdered, and had threatened to kill Brigham Young and all of the Apostles. That when in Cedar City they said they would have friends in Utah who would hang Brigham Young by the neck until he was dead, before snow fell again in the Territory. They also said that Johnston was coming, with his army, from the East, and they were going to return from California with soldiers, as soon as possible, and would then desolate the land, and kill every d—d Mormon man, woman and child that they could find in Utah. That they violated the ordinances of the town of Cedar, and had, by armed force, resisted the officers who tried to arrest them for violating the law. That after leaving Cedar City the emigrants camped by the company, or cooperative field, just below Cedar City, and burned a large portion of the fencing, leaving the crops open to the large herds of stock in the surrounding country. Also that they had given poisoned meat to the Corn Creek tribe of Indians, which had killed several of them, and their Chief, Konosh, was on the trail of the emigrants, and would soon attack them. All of these things, and much more of a like kind, Haight told me as we lay in the dark at the old Iron Works. I believed all that he said, and, thinking that he had full right to do all that he wanted to do, I was easily induced to follow his instructions.

Haight said that unless something was done to prevent it, the emigrants would carry out their threats and rob every one of the out-lying settlements in the South, and that the whole Mormon people were liable to be butchered by the troops that the emigrants would bring back with them from California. I was then told that the Council had held a meeting that day, to consider the matter, and that it was decided by the authorities to arm the Indians, give them provisions and ammunition, and send them after the emigrants, and have the Indians give them a brush, and if they killed part or all of them, so much the better.

I said, “Brother Haight, who is your authority for acting in this way?”

He replied, “It is the will of all in authority. The emigrants have no pass from any one to go through the country, and they are liable to be killed as common enemies, for the country is at war now. No man has a right to go through this country without a written pass.”

We lay there and talked much of the night, and during that time Haight gave me very full instructions what to do, and how to proceed in the whole affair. He said he had consulted with Colonel Dame, and every one agreed to let the Indians use up the whole train if they could. Haight then said:

“I expect you to carry out your orders.”

I knew I had to obey or die. I had no wish to disobey, for I then thought that my superiors in the Church were the mouthpieces of Heaven, and that it was an act of godliness for me to obey any and all orders given by them to me, without my asking any questions.

My orders were to go home to Harmony, and see Carl Shirts, my son-in-law, an Indian interpreter, and send him to the Indians in the South, to notify them that the Mormons and Indians were at war with the “Mericats” (as the Indians called all whites that were not Mormons) and bring all the Southern Indians up and have them join with those from the North, so that their force would be sufficient to make a successful attack on the emigrants.

It was agreed that Haight would send Nephi Johnson, another Indian interpreter, to stir up all the other Indians that he could find, in order to have a large enough force of Indians to give the emigrants a good hush. He said, “These are the orders that have been agreed upon by the Council, and it is in accordance with the feelings of the entire people.”

I asked him if it would not have been better to first send to Brigham Young for instructions, and find out what he thought about the matter.

“No,” said Haight, “that is unnecessary, we are acting by orders. Some of the Indians are now on the war-path, and all of them must be sent out; all must go, so as to make the thing a success.”

It was then intended that the Indians should kill the emigrants, and make it an Indian massacre, and not have any whites interfere with them. No whites were to be known in the matter, it was to be all done by the Indians, so that it could be laid to them, if any questions were ever asked about it. I said to Haight:

“You know what the Indians are. They will kill all the party, women and children, as well as the men, and you know we are sworn not to shed innocent blood.”

“Oh h—ll” said he, “there will not be one drop of innocent blood shed, if every one of the d—d pack are killed, for they are the worse lot of outlaws and ruffians that I ever saw in my life.”

We agreed upon the whole thing, how each one should act, and then left the iron works, and went to Haight’s house and got breakfast.

After breakfast I got ready to start, and Haight said to me:

“Go, Brother Lee, and see that the instructions of those in authority are obeyed, and as you are dutiful in this, so shall your reward be in the kingdom of God, for God will bless those who willingly obey counsel, and make all things fit for the people in these last days.”

I left Cedar City for my home at Harmony, to carry out the instructions that I had received from my superior.

I then believed that he acted by the direct order and command of William H. Dame, and others even higher in authority than Colonel Dame. One reason for thinking so was from a talk I had only a few days before, with Apostle George A. Smith, and he had just then seen Haight, and talked with him, and I knew that George A. Smith never talked of things that Brigham Young had not talked over with him before-hand. Then the Mormons were at war with the United States, and the orders to the Mormons had been all the time to kill and waste away our enemies, but lose none of our people. These emigrants were from the section of country most hostile to our people, and I believed then as I do now, that it was the will of every true Mormon in Utah, at that time, that the enemies of the Church should be killed as fast as possible, and that as this lot of people had men amongst them that were supposed to have helped kill the Prophets in the Carthage jail, the killing of all of them would be keeping our oaths and avenging the blood of the Prophets.

In justice to myself I will give the facts of my talk with George A. Smith.

In the latter part of the month of August, 1857, about ten days before the company of Captain Fancher, who met their doom at Mountain Meadows, arrived at that place, General George A. Smith called on me at one of my homes at Washington City, Washington County, Utah Territory, and wished me to take him round by Fort Clara, via Pinto Settlements, to Hamilton Fort, or Cedar City. He said,

“I have been sent down here by the old Boss, Brigham Young, to instruct the brethren of the different settlements not to sell any of their grain to our enemies. And to tell them not to feed it to their animals, for it will all be needed by ourselves. I am also to instruct the brethren to prepare for a big fight, for the enemy is coming in large force to attempt our destruction. But Johnston’s army will not be allowed to approach our settlements from the east. God is on our side and will fight our battles for us, and deliver our enemies into our hands. Brigham Young has received revelations from God, giving him the right and the power to call down the curse of God on all our enemies who attempt to invade our Territory. Our greatest danger lies in the people of California—a class of reckless miners who are strangers to God and his righteousness. They are likely to come upon us from the south and destroy the small settlements. But we will try and outwit them before we suffer much damage. The people of the United States who oppose our Church and people are a mob, from the President down, and as such it is impossible for their armies to prevail against the Saints who have gathered here in the mountains.”

He continued this kind of talk for some hours to me and my friends who were with me.

General George A. Smith held high rank as a military leader. He was one of the twelve apostles of the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter Day Saints, and as such he was considered by me to be an inspired man. His orders were to me sacred commands, which I considered it my duty to obey, without question or hesitation.

I took my horses and carriage and drove with him to either Hamilton Fort or Cedar City, visiting the settlements with him, as he had requested. I did not go to hear him preach at any of our stopping places, nor did I pay attention to what he said to the leaders in the settlements.

The day we left Fort Clara, which was then the headquarters of the Indian missionaries under the presidency of Jacob Hamblin, we stopped to noon at the Clara River. While there the Indians gathered around us in large numbers, and were quite saucy and impudent. Their chiefs asked me where I was going and who I had with me. I told them that he was a big captain.

“Is he a Mericat Captain?”

“No,” I said, “he is a Mormon.”

The Indians then wanted to know more. They wanted to have a talk.

The General told me to tell the Indians that the Mormons were their friends, and that the Americans were their enemies, and the enemies of the Mormons, too; that he wanted the Indians to remain the fast friends of the Mormons, for the Mormons were all friends to the Indians; that the Americans had a large army just east of the mountains, and intended to come over the mountains into Utah and kill all of the Mormons and Indians in Utah Territory; that the Indians must get ready and keep ready for war against all of the Americans, and keep friendly with the Mormons and obey what the Mormons told them to do—that this was the will of the Great Spirit; that if the Indians were true to the Mormons and would help them against their enemies, then the Mormons would always keep them from want and sickness and give them guns and ammunition to hunt and kill game with, and would also help the Indians against their enemies when they went into war.

This talk pleased the Indians, and they agreed to all that I asked them to do.

I saw that my friend Smith was a little nervous and fearful of the Indians, notwithstanding their promises of friendship. To relieve him of his anxiety I hitched up and started on our way, as soon as I could do so without rousing the suspicions of the Indians.

We had ridden along about a mile or so when General Smith said,

“Those are savage looking fellows. I think they would make it lively for an emigrant train if one should come this way.”

I said I thought they would attack any train that would come in their way. Then the General was in a deep study for some time, when he said,

“Suppose an emigrant train should come along through this southern country, making threats against our people and bragging of the part they took in helping kill our Prophets, what do you think the brethren would do with them? Would they be permitted to go their way, or would the brethren pitch into them and give them a good drubbing?”

I reflected a few moments, and then said,

“You know the brethren are now under the influence of the late reformation, and are still red-hot for the gospel. The brethren believe the government wishes to destroy them. I really believe that any train of emigrants that may come through here will be attacked, and probably all destroyed. I am sure they would be wiped out if they had been making threats against our people. Unless emigrants have a pass from Brigham Young, or some one in authority, they will certainly never get safely through this country.”

My reply pleased him very much, and he laughed heartily, and then said,

“Do you really believe the brethren would make it lively for such a train?”

I said, “Yes, sir, I know they will, unless they are protected by a pass, and I wish to inform you that unless you want every train captured that comes through here, you must inform Governor Young that if he wants emigrants to pass, without being molested, he must send orders to that effect to Colonel Wm. H. Dame or Major Isaac C. Haight, so that they can give passes to the emigrants, for their passes will insure safety, but nothing else will, except the positive orders of Governor Young, as the people are all bitter against the Gentiles, and full of religious zeal, and anxious to avenge the blood of the Prophets.”

The only reply he made was to the effect that on his way down from Salt Lake City he had had a long talk with Major Haight on the same subject, and that Haight had assured him, and given him to understand, that emigrants who came along without a pass from Governor Young could not escape from the Territory.

We then rode along in silence for some distance, when he again turned to me and said,

“Brother Lee, I am satisfied that the brethren are under the full influence of the reformation, and I believe they will do just as you say they will with the wicked emigrants that come through the country making threats and abusing our people.”

I repeated my views to him, but at much greater length, giving my reasons in full for thinking that Governor Young should give orders to protect all the emigrants that he did not wish destroyed. I went into a full statement of the wrongs of our people, and told him that the people were under the blaze of the reformation, full of wild fire and fanaticism, and that to shed the blood of those who would dare to speak against the Mormon Church or its leaders, they would consider doing the will of God, and that the people would do it as willingly and cheerfully as they would any other duty. That the apostle Paul, when he started forth to persecute the followers of Christ, was not any more sincere than every Mormon was then, who lived in Southern Utah.

My words served to cheer up the General very much; he was greatly delighted, and said,

“I am glad to hear so good an account of our people. God will bless them for all that they do to build up His Kingdom in the last days.”

General Smith did not say one word to me or intimate to me, that he wished any emigrants to pass in safety through the Territory. But he led me to believe then, as I believe now, that he did want, and expected every emigrant to be killed that undertook to pass through the Territory while we were at war with the Government. I thought it was his mission to prepare the people for the bloody work.

I have always believed, since that day, that General George A. Smith was then visiting Southern Utah to prepare the people for the work of exterminating Captain Fancher’s train of emigrants, and I now believe that he was sent for that purpose by the direct command of Brigham Young.

I have been told by Joseph Wood, Thomas T. Willis, and many others, that they heard George A. Smith preach at Cedar City during that trip, and that he told the people of Cedar City that the emigrants were coming, and he told them that they must not sell that company any grain or provisions of any kind, for they were a mob of villains and outlaws, and the enemies of God and the Mormon people.

Sidney Littlefield, of Panguitch, has told me that he was knowing to the fact of Colonel Wm. H. Dame sending orders from Parowan to Maj. Haight, at Cedar City, to exterminate the Francher outfit, and to kill every emigrant without fail. Littlefield then lived at Parowan, and Dame was the Presiding Bishop. Dame still has all the wives he wants, and is a great friend of Brigham Young.

The knowledge of how George A. Smith felt toward the emigrants, and his telling me that he had a long talk with Haight on the subject, made me certain that it was the wish of the Church authorities that Francher and his train should be wiped out, and knowing all this, I did not doubt then, and I do not doubt it now, either, that Haight was acting by full authority from the Church leaders, and that the orders he gave to me were just the orders that he had been directed to give, when he ordered me to raise the Indians and have them attack the emigrants.

I acted through the whole matter in a way that I considered it my religious duty to act, and if what I did was a crime, it was a crime of the Mormon Church, and not a crime for which I feel individually responsible.

I must here state that Klingensmith was not in Cedar City that Sunday night. Haight said he had sent Klingensmith and others over towards Pinto, and around there, to stir up the Indians and force them to attack the emigrants.

On my way from Cedar City to my home at Harmony, I came up with a large band of Indians under Moquetas and Big Bill, two Cedar City Chiefs; they were in their war paint, and fully equipped for battle. They halted when I came up and said they had had a big talk with Haight, Higby and Klingensmith, and had got orders from them to follow up the emigrants and kill them all, and take their property as the spoil of their enemies.

These Indians wanted me to go with them and command their forces. I told them that I could not go with them that evening, that I had orders from Haight, the big Captain, to send other Indians on the war-path to help them kill the emigrants, and that I must attend to that first; that I wanted them to go on near where the emigrants were and camp until the other Indians joined them; that I would meet them the next day and lead them.

This satisfied them, but they wanted me to send my little Indian boy, Clem, with them. After some time I consented to let Clem go with them, and I returned home.

When I got home I told Carl Shirts what the orders were that Haight had sent to him. Carl was naturally cowardly and was not willing to go, but I told him the orders must be obeyed. He then started off that night, or early next morning, to stir up the Indians of the South, and lead them against the emigrants. The emigrants were then camped at Mountain Meadows.

The Indians did not obey my instructions. They met, several hundred strong, at the Meadows, and attacked the emigrants Tuesday morning, just before daylight, and at the first fire, as I afterwards learned, they killed seven and wounded sixteen of the emigrants. The latter fought bravely, and repulsed the Indians, killing some of them and breaking the knees of two war chiefs, who afterwards died.

The news of the battle was carried all over the country by Indian runners, and the excitement was great in all the small settlements. I was notified of what had taken place, early Tuesday morning, by an Indian who came to my house and gave me a full account of all that had been done. The Indian said it was the wish of all the Indians that I should lead them, and that I must go back with him to the camp.

I started at once, and by taking the Indian trail over the mountain, I reached the camp in about twelve miles from Harmony. To go round by the wagon road it would have been between forty and fifty miles.

When I reached the camp I found the Indians in a frenzy of excitement. They threatened to kill me unless I agreed to lead them against the emigrants, and help them kill them. They also said they had been told that they could kill the emigrants without danger to themselves, but they had lost some of their braves, and others were wounded, and unless they could kill all the "Mericats," as they called them, they would declare war against the Mormons and kill every one in the settlements.

I did as well as I could under the circumstances. I was the only white man there, with a wild and excited band of several hundred Indians. I tried to persuade them that all would be well, that I was their friend and would see that they had their revenge, if I found out that they were entitled to revenge.

My talk only served to increase their excitement, and being afraid that they would kill me if I undertook to leave them, and I would not lead them against the emigrants, so I told them that I would go south and meet their friends, and hurry them up to help them. I intended to put a stop to the carnage if I had the power, for I believed that the emigrants had been sufficiently punished for what they had done, and I felt then, and always have felt that such wholesale murdering was wrong.

At first the Indians would not consent for me to leave them, but they finally said I might go and meet their friends.

I then got on my horse and left the Meadows, and went south.

I had gone about sixteen miles, when I met Carl Shirts with about one hundred Indians, and a number of Mormons from the southern settlements. They were going to the scene of the conflict. How they learned of the emigrants being at the Meadows I never knew, but they did know it, and were there fully armed, and determined to obey orders.

Amongst those that I remember to have met there, were Samuel Knight, Oscar Hamblin, William Young, Carl Shirts, Harrison Pearce, James Pearce, John W. Clark, William Slade, Sr., James Matthews, Dudley Leavitt, William Hawley, (now a resident of Fillmore, Utah Territory,) William Slade, Jr., and two others whose names I have forgotten. I think they were George W. Adair and John Hawley. I know they were at the Meadows at the time of the massacre, and I think I met them that night south of the Meadows, with Samuel Knight and the others.

The whites camped there that night with me, but most of the Indians rushed on to their friends at the camp on the Meadows.

I reported to the whites all that had taken place at the Meadows, but none of them were surprised in the least. They all seemed to know that the attack was to be made, and all about it. I spent one of the most miserable nights there that I ever passed in my life. I spent much of the night in tears and at prayer. I wrestled with God for wisdom to guide me. I asked for some sign, some evidence that would satisfy me that my mission was of Heaven, but I got no satisfaction from my God.

In the morning we all agreed to go on together to Mountain Meadows, and camp there, and then send a messenger to Haight, giving him full instructions of what had been done, and to ask him for further instructions. We knew that the original plan was for the Indians to do all the work, and the whites to do nothing, only to stay back and plan for them, and encourage them to do the work. Now we knew the Indians could not do the work, and we were in a sad fix.

I did not then know that a messenger had been sent to Brigham Young for instructions. Haight had not mentioned it to me. I now think that James Haslem was sent to Brigham Young, as a sharp play on the part of the authorities to protect themselves, if trouble ever grew out of the matter.

We went to the Meadows and camped at the springs, about half a mile from the emigrant camp. There was a larger number of Indians there then, fully three hundred, and I think as many as four hundred of them. The two Chiefs who were shot in the knee were in a bad fix. The Indians had killed a number of the emigrants' horses, and about sixty or seventy head of cattle were lying dead on the Meadows, which the Indians had killed for spite and revenge.

Our company killed a small beef for dinner, and after eating a hearty meal of it we held a council and decided to send a messenger to Haight. I said to the messenger, who was either Edwards or Adair, (I cannot now remember which it was), "Tell Haight, for my sake, for the people's sake, for God's sake, send me help to protect and save these emigrants, and pacify the Indians."

The messenger started for Cedar City, from our camp on the Meadows, about 2 o'clock P. M.

We all staid on the field, and I tried to quiet and pacify the Indians, by telling them that I had sent to Haight, the Big Captain, for orders, and when he sent his order I would know what to do. This appeared to satisfy the Indians, for said they,

"The Big Captain will send you word to kill all the Mericats."

Along toward evening the Indians again attacked the emigrants

This was Wednesday. I heard the report of their guns, and the screams of the women and children in the corral.

This was more than I could stand. So I ran with William Young and John Mangum, to where the Indians were, to stop the fight. While on the way to them they fired a volley, and three balls from their guns cut my clothing. One ball went through my hat and cut my hair on the side of my head. One ball went through my shirt and leaded my shoulder, the other cut my pants across my bowels. I thought this was rather warm work, but I kept on until I reached the place where the Indians were in force. When I got to them, I told them the Great Spirit would be mad at them if they killed the women and children. I talked to them some time, and cried with sorrow when I saw that I could not pacify the savages.

When the Indians saw me in tears, they called me “Yaw Guts,” which in the Indian language means “cry baby,” and to this day they call me by that name, and consider me a coward.

Oscar Hamblin was a fine interpreter, and he came to my aid and helped me to induce the Indians to stop the attack. By his help we got the Indians to agree to be quiet until word was returned from Haight. (I do not know now but what the messenger started for Cedar City, after this night attack, but I was so worried and perplexed at that time, and so much has happened to distract my thoughts since then, that my mind is not clear on that subject.)

On Thursday, about noon, several men came to us from Cedar City. I cannot remember the order in which all of the people came to the Meadows, but I do recollect that at this time and in this company Joel White, William C. Stewart, Benjamin Arthur, Alexander Wilden, Charles Hopkins and — Tate, came to us at the camp at the springs. These men said but little, but every man seemed to know just what he was there for. As our messenger had gone for further orders, we moved our camp about four hundred yards further up the valley on to a hill, where we made camp as long as we staid there.

I soon learned that the whites were as wicked at heart as the Indians, for every little while during that day I saw white men taking aim and shooting at the emigrants’ wagons. They said they were doing it to keep in practice and to help pass off the time.

I remember one man that was shooting, that rather amused me, for he was shooting at a mark over a quarter of a mile off, and his gun would not carry a ball two hundred yards. That man was Alexander Wilden. He took pains to fix up a seat under the shade of a tree, where he continued to load and shoot until he got tired. Many of the others acted just as wild and foolish as Wilden did.

The wagons were corraled after the Indians had made the first attack. On the second day after our arrival the emigrants drew their wagons near each other and chained the wheels one to the other. While they were doing this there was no shooting going on. Their camp was about one hundred yards above and north of the spring. They generally got their water from the spring at night.

Thursday morning I saw two men start from the corral with buckets, and run to the spring and fill their buckets with water, and go back again. The bullets flew around them thick and fast, but they got into their corral in safety.

The Indians had agreed to keep quiet until orders returned from Haight, but they did not keep their word. They made a determined attack on the train on Thursday morning about daylight. At this attack the Clara Indians had one brave killed and three wounded. This so enraged that band that they left for home that day and drove off quite a number of cattle with them. During the day I said to John Mangum,

“I will cross over the valley and go up on the other side, on the hills to the west of the corral, and take a look at the situation.”

I did go. As I was crossing the valley I was seen by the emigrants, and as soon as they saw that I was a white man they ran up a white flag in the middle of their corral, or camp. They then sent two little boys from the camp to talk to me, but I could not talk to them at that time, for I did not know what orders Haight would send back to me, and until I did know his orders I did not know how to act. I hid, to keep away from the children. They came to the place where they had last seen me and hunted all around for me, but being unable to find me, they turned and went back to the camp in safety.

While the boys were looking for me several Indians came to me and asked for ammunition with which to kill them. I told them they must not hurt the children—that if they did I would kill the first one that made the attempt to injure them. By this act I was able to save the boys.

It is all false that has been told about little girls being dressed in white and sent out to me. There never was anything of the kind done.

I staid on the west side of the valley for about two hours, looking down into the emigrant camp, and feeling all the torture of mind that it is possible for a man to suffer who feels merciful, and yet knows, as I then knew, what was in store for that unfortunate company if the Indians were successful in their bloody designs.

While I was standing on the hill looking down into the corral, I saw two men leave the corral and go outside to cut some wood; the Indians and whites kept up a steady fire on them all the time, but they paid no attention to danger, and kept right along at their work until they had it done, and then they went back into camp. The men all acted so bravely that it was impossible to keep from respecting them

After staying there and looking down into the camp until I was nearly dead from grief, I returned to the company at camp. I was worn out with trouble and grief; I was nearly wild waiting for word from the authorities at Cedar City. I prayed for word to come that would enable me to save that band of suffering people, but no such word came. It never was to come.

On Thursday evening John M. Higbee, Major of the Iron Militia, and Philip K. Smith, as he is called generally, but whose name is Klingensmith, Bishop of Cedar City, came to our camp with two or three wagons, and a number of men all well armed. I can remember the following as a portion of the men who came to take part in the work of death which was so soon to follow, viz.: John M. Higbee, Major and commander of the Iron Militia, and also first counselor to Isaac C. Haight; Philip Klingensmith, Bishop of Cedar City; Ira Allen, of the High Council; Robert Wiley, of the High Council; Richard Harrison, of Pinto, also a member of the High Council; Samuel McMurdy, one of the Counselors of Klingensmith; Charles Hopkins, of the City Council of Cedar City; Samuel Pollock; Daniel McFarland, a son-in-law of Isaac C. Haight, and acting as Adjutant under Major Higbee; John Ure, of the City Council; George Hunter, of the City Council; and I honestly believe that John McFarland, now an attorney-at-law at St. George, Utah, was there—I am not positive that he was, but my best impression is that he was there: Samuel Jukes; Nephi Johnson, with a number of Indians under his command; Irvin Jacobs; John Jacobs; E. Curtis, a Captain of Ten; Thomas Cartwright of the City Council and High Council; William Bateman, who afterwards carried the flag of truce to the emigrant camp; Anthony Stratton; A. Loveridge; Joseph Clews; Jabez Durfey; Columbus Freeman, and some others whose names I cannot remember. I know that our total force was fifty-four whites and over three hundred Indians.

As soon as these persons gathered around the camp, I demanded of Major Higbee what orders he had brought. I then stated fully all that had happened at the Meadows, so that every person might understand the situation.

Major Higbee reported as follows: "It is the orders of the President, that all the emigrants must be put out of the way. President Haight has counseled with Colonel Dame, or has had orders from him to put all of the emigrants out of the way; none who are old enough to talk are to be spared."

He then went on and said substantially that the emigrants had come through the country as our enemies, and as the enemies of the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter Day Saints. That they had no pass from any one in authority to permit them to leave the Territory. That none but friends were permitted to leave the Territory, and that as these were our sworn enemies, they must be killed. That they were nothing but a portion of Johnston's army. That if they were allowed to go on to California, they would raise the war cloud in the West, and bring certain destruction upon all the settlements in Utah. That the only safety for the people was in the utter destruction of the whole rascally lot.

I then told them that God would have to change my heart before I could consent to such a wicked thing as the wholesale killing of that people. I attempted to reason with Higbee and the brethren. I told them how strongly the emigrants were fortified, and how wicked it was to kill the women and children. I was ordered to be silent. Higbee said I was resisting authority.

He then said, "Brother Lee is afraid of shedding innocent blood. Why, brethren, there is not a drop of innocent blood in that entire camp of Gentile outlaws; they are set of cut-throats, robbers and assassins; they are a part of the people who drove the Saints from Missouri, and who aided to shed the blood of our Prophets, Joseph and Hyrum, and it is our orders from all in authority, to get the emigrants from their stronghold, and help the Indians kill them."

I then said that Joseph Smith had told us never to betray any one. That we could not get the emigrants out of their corral unless we used treachery, and I was opposed to that.

I was interrupted by Higbee, Klingensmith and Hopkins, who said it was the orders of President Isaac C. Haight to us, and that Haight had his orders from Colonel Dame and the authorities at Parowan, and that all in authority were of one mind, and that they had been sent by the Council at Cedar City to the Meadows to counsel and direct the way and manner that the company of emigrants should be disposed of.

The men then in council, I must here state, now knelt down in a prayer circle and prayed, invoking the Spirit of God to direct them how to act in the matter.

After prayer, Major Higbee said, "Here are the orders," and handed me a paper from Haight. It was in substance that it was the orders of Haight to decoy the emigrants from their position, and kill all of them that could talk. This order was in writing. Higbee handed it to me and I read it, and then dropped it on the ground, saying,

"I cannot do this."

The substance of the orders were that the emigrants should be decoyed from their strong-hold, and all exterminated, so that no one would be left to tell the tale, and then the authorities could say it was done by the Indians.

The words decoy and exterminate were used in that message or order, and these orders came to us as the orders from the Council at Cedar City, and as the orders of our military superior, that we were bound to obey. The order was signed by Haight, as commander of the troops at Cedar City.

Haight told me the next day after the massacre, while on the Meadows, that he got his orders from Colonel Dame.

I then left the Council, and went away to myself, and bowed myself in prayer before God, and asked Him to overrule the decision of that Council. I shed many bitter tears, and my tortured soul was wrung nearly from the body by my great suffering. I will here say, calling upon Heaven, angels, and the spirits of just men to witness what I say, that if I could then have had a thousand worlds to command, I would have given them freely to save that company from death.

While in bitter anguish, lamenting the sad condition of myself and others, Charles Hopkins, a man that I had great confidence in, came to me from the Council, and tried to comfort me by saying that he believed it was all right, for the brethren in the Priesthood were all united in the thing, and it would not be well for me to oppose them.

I told him the Lord must change my heart before I could ever do such an act willingly. I will further state that there was a reign of terror in Utah, at that time, and many a man had been put out of the way, on short notice, for disobedience, and I had made some narrow escapes.

At the earnest solicitation of Brother Hopkins, I returned with him to the Council. When I got back, the Council again prayed for aid. The Council was called The City Counselors, the Church or High Counselors; and all in authority, together with the private citizens, then formed a circle, and kneeling down, so that elbows would touch each other, several of the brethren prayed for Divine instructions.

After prayer, Major Higbee said, "I have the evidence of God's approval of our mission. It is God's will that we carry out our instructions to the letter."

I said, "My God! this is more than I can do. I must and do refuse to take part in this matter."

Higbee then said to me, "Brother Lee, I am ordered by President Haight to inform you that you shall receive a crown of Celestial glory for your faithfulness, and your eternal joy shall be complete." I was much shaken by this offer, for I had full faith in the power of the Priesthood to bestow such rewards and blessings, but I was anxious to save the people. I then proposed that we give the Indians all of the stock of the emigrants, except sufficient to haul their wagons, and let them go. To this proposition all the leading men objected. No man there raised his voice or hand to favor the saving of life, except myself.

The meeting was then addressed by some one in authority, I do not remember who it was. He spoke in about this language: "Brethren, we have been sent here to perform a duty. It is a duty that we owe to God, and to our Church and people. The orders of those in authority are that all the emigrants must die. Our leaders speak with inspired tongues, and their orders come from the God of Heaven. We have no right to question what they have commanded us to do; it is our duty to obey. If we wished to act as some of our weak-kneed brethren desire us to do, it would be impossible; the thing has gone too far to allow us to stop now. The emigrants know that we have aided the Indians, and if we let them go they will bring certain destruction upon us. It is a fact that on Wednesday night, two of the emigrants got out of camp and started back to Cedar City for assistance to withstand the Indian attacks; they had reached Richards' Springs when they met William C. Stewart, Joel White and Benjamin Arthur, three of our brethren from Cedar City. The men stated their business to the brethren, and as their horses were drinking at the Spring, Brother Stewart, feeling unusually full of zeal for the glory of God and the upbuilding of the Kingdom of God on earth, shot and killed one of the emigrants, a young man by the name of Aden. When Aden fell from his horse, Joel White shot and wounded the other Gentile; but he unfortunately got away, and returned to his camp and reported that the Mormons were helping the Indians in all that they were doing against the emigrants. Now the emigrants will report these facts in California if we let them go. We must kill them all, and our orders are to get them out by treachery if no other thing can be done to get them into our power.”

Many of the brethren spoke in the same way, all arguing that the orders must be carried out.

I was then told the plan of action had been agreed upon, and it was this: The emigrants were to be decoyed from their strong-hold under a promise of protection. Brother William Bateman was to carry a flag of truce and demand a parley, and then I was to go and arrange the terms of the surrender. I was to demand that all the children who were so young they could not talk should be put into a wagon, and the wounded were also to be put into a wagon. Then all the arms and ammunition of the emigrants should be put into a wagon, and I was to agree that the Mormons would protect the emigrants from the Indians and conduct them to Cedar City in safety, where they should be protected until an opportunity came for sending them to California.

It was agreed that when I had made the full agreement and treaty, as the brethren called it, the wagons should start for Hamblin's Ranch with the arms, the wounded and the children. The women were to march on foot and follow the wagons in single file; the men were to follow behind the women, they also to march in single file. Major John M. Higbee was to stand with his militia company about two hundred yards from the camp, and stand in double file, open order, with about twenty feet space between the files, so that the wagons could pass between them. The drivers were to keep right along, and not stop at the troops. The women were not to stop there, but to follow the wagons. The troops were to halt the men for a few minutes, until the women were some distance ahead, out into the cedars, where the Indians were hid in ambush. Then the march was to be resumed, the troops to form in single file, each soldier to walk by an emigrant, and on the right-hand side of his man, and the soldier was to carry his gun on his left arm, ready for instant use. The march was to continue until the wagons had passed beyond the ambush of the Indians, and until the women were right in the midst of the Indians. Higbee was then to give the orders and words, “Do Your Duty.” At this the troops were to shoot down the men; the Indians were to kill all of the women and larger children, and the drivers of the wagons and I were to kill the wounded and sick men that were in the wagons. Two men were to be placed on horses near by, to overtake and kill any of the emigrants that might escape from the first assault. The Indians were to kill the women and large children, so that it would be certain that no Mormon would be guilty of shedding innocent blood—if it should happen that there was any innocent blood in the company that were to die. Our leading men all said that there was no innocent blood in the whole company.

The Council broke up a little after daylight on Friday morning. All the horses, except two for the men to ride to overtake those who might escape, and one for Dan McFarland to ride as Adjutant, so that he could carry orders from one part of the field to another, were turned out on the range. Then breakfast was eaten, and the brethren prepared for the work in hand.

I was now satisfied that it was the wish of all of the Mormon priesthood to have the thing done. One reason for thinking so was that it was in keeping with the teachings of the leaders, and as Utah was then at war with the United States we believed all the Gentiles were to be killed as a war measure, and that the Mormons, as God's chosen people, were to hold and inhabit the earth and rule and govern the globe. Another, and one of my strongest reasons for believing that the leaders wished the thing done, was on account of the talk that I had with George A. Smith, which I have given in full in this statement. I was satisfied that Smith had passed the emigrants while on his way from Salt Lake City, and I then knew this was the train that he meant when he spoke of a train that would make threats and illtreat our people, etc.

The people were in the full blaze of the reformation and anxious to do some act that would add to their reputation as zealous Churchmen.

I therefore, taking all things into consideration, and believing, as I then did, that my superiors were inspired men, who could not go wrong in any matter relating to the Church or the duty of its members, concluded to be obedient to the wishes of those in authority. I took up my cross and prepared to do my duty.

Soon after breakfast Major Higbee ordered the two Indian interpreters, Carl Shirts and Nephi Johnson, to inform the Indians of the plan of operations, and to place the Indians in ambush, so that they could not be seen by the emigrants until the work of death should commence.

This was done in order to make the emigrants believe that we had sent the Indians away, and that we were acting honestly and in good faith, when we agreed to protect them from the savages.

The orders were obeyed, and in five minutes not an Indian could be seen on the whole Meadows. They secreted themselves and lay still as logs of wood, until the order was given for them to rush out and kill the women.

Major Higbee then called all the people to order, and directed me to explain the whole plan to them. I did so, explaining just how every person was expected to act during the whole performance.

Major Higbee then gave the order for his men to advance. They marched to the spot agreed upon, and halted there. William Bateman was then selected to carry a flag of truce to the emigrants and demand their surrender, and I was ordered to go and make the treaty after some one had replied to our flag of truce. (The emigrants had kept a white flag flying in their camp ever since they saw me cross the valley.)

Bateman took a white flag and started for the emigrant camp. When he got about half way to the corral, he was met by one of the emigrants, that I afterwards learned was named Hamilton. They talked some time, but I never knew what was said between them.

Brother Bateman returned to the command and said that the emigrants would accept our terms, and surrender as we required them to do.

I was then ordered by Major Higbee to go to the corral and negotiate the treaty, and superintend the whole matter. I was again ordered to be certain and get all the arms and ammunition into the wagons. Also to put the children and the sick and wounded in the wagons, as had been agreed upon in council. Then Major Higbee said to me:

“Brother Lee, we expect you to faithfully carry out all the instructions that have been given you by our council.”

Samuel McMurdy and Samuel Knight were then ordered to drive their teams and follow me to the corral to haul off the children, arms, etc.

The troops formed in two lines, as had been agreed upon, and were standing in that way with arms at rest, when I left them.

I walked ahead of the wagons up to the corral. When I reached there I met Mr. Hamilton on the outside of the camp. He loosened the chains from some of their wagons, and moved one wagon out of the way, so that our teams could drive inside of the corral and into their camp. It was then noon, or a little after.

I found that the emigrants were strongly fortified; their wagons were chained to each other in a circle. In the centre was a rifle-pit, large enough to contain the entire company. This had served to shield them from the constant fire of their enemy, which had been poured into them from both sides of the valley, from a rocky range that served as a breastwork for their assailants. The valley at this point was not more than five hundred yards wide, and the emigrants had their camp near the center of the valley. On the east and west there was a low range of rugged, rocky mountains, affording a splendid place for the protection of the Indians and Mormons, and leaving them in comparative safety while they fired upon the emigrants. The valley at this place runs nearly due north and south.

When I entered the corral, I found the emigrants engaged in burying two men of note among them, who had died but a short time before from the effect of wounds received by them from the Indians at the time of the first attack on Tuesday morning. They wrapped the bodies up in buffalo robes, and buried them in a grave inside the corral. I was then told by some of the men that seven men were killed and seventeen others were wounded at the first attack made by the Indians, and that three of the wounded men had since died, making ten of their number killed during the siege.

As I entered the fortifications, men, women and children gathered around me in wild consternation. Some felt that the time of their happy deliverance had come, while others, though in deep distress, and all in tears, looked upon me with doubt, distrust and terror. My feelings at this time may be imagined (but I doubt the power of man being equal to even imagine how wretched I felt.) No language can describe my feelings. My position was painful, trying and awful; my brain seemed to be on fire; my nerves were for a moment unstrung; humanity was overpowered, as I thought of the cruel, unmanly part that I was acting. Tears of bitter anguish fell in streams from my eyes; my tongue refused its office; my faculties were dormant, stupefied and deadened by grief. I wished that the earth would open and swallow me where I stood. God knows my suffering was great. I cannot describe my feelings. I knew that I was acting a cruel part and doing a damnable deed. Yet my faith in the godliness of my leaders was such that it forced me to think that I was not sufficiently spiritual to act the important part I was commanded to perform. My hesitation was only momentary. Then feeling that duty compelled obedience to orders, I laid aside my weakness and my humanity, and became an instrument in the hands of my superiors and my leaders. I delivered my message and told the people that they must put their arms in the wagon, so as not to arouse the animosity of the Indians. I ordered the children and wounded, some clothing and the arms, to be put into the wagons. Their guns were mostly Kentucky rifles of the muzzle-loading style. Their ammunition was about all gone—I do not think there were twenty loads left in their whole camp. If the emigrants had had a good supply of ammunition they never would have surrendered, and I do not think we could have captured them without great loss, for they were brave men and very resolute and determined.

Just as the wagons were loaded, Dan. McFarland came riding into the corral and said that Major Higbee had ordered great haste to be made, for he was afraid that the Indians would return and renew the attack before he could get the emigrants to a place of safety.

I hurried up the people and started the wagons off towards Cedar City. As we went out of the corral I ordered the wagons to turn to the left, so as to leave the troops to the right of us. Dan. McFarland rode before the women and led them right up to the troops, where they still stood in open order as I left them. The women and larger children were walking ahead, as directed, and the men following them. The foremost man was about fifty yards behind the hindmost woman.

The women and children were hurried right on by the troops. When the men came up they cheered the soldiers as if they believed that they were acting honestly. Higbee then gave the orders for his men to form in single file and take their places as ordered before, that is, at the right of the emigrants.

I saw this much, but about this time our wagons passed out of sight of the troops, over the hill. I had disobeyed orders in part by turning off as I did, for I was anxious to be out of sight of the bloody deed that I knew was to follow. I knew that I had much to do yet that was of a cruel and unnatural character. It was my duty, with the two drivers, to kill the sick and wounded who were in the wagons, and to do so when we heard the guns of the troops fire. I was walking between the wagons; the horses were going in a fast walk, and we were fully half a mile from Major Higbee and his men, when we heard the firing. As we heard the guns, I ordered a halt and we proceeded to do our part.

I here pause in the recital of this horrid story of man's inhumanity, and ask myself the question, Is it honest in me, and can I clear my conscience before my God, if I screen myself while I accuse others? No, never! Heaven forbid that I should put a burden upon others' shoulders, that I am unwilling to bear my just portion of. I am not a traitor to my people, nor to my former friends and comrades who were with me on that dark day when the work of death was carried on in God's name, by a lot of deluded and religious fanatics. It is my duty to tell facts as they exist, and I will do so.

I have said that all of the small children were put into the wagons; that was wrong, for one little child, about six months old, was carried in its father's arms, and it was killed by the same bullet that entered its father's breast; it was shot through the head. I was told by Haight afterwards, that the child was killed by accident, but I cannot say whether that is a fact or not. I saw it lying dead when I returned to the place of slaughter.

When we had got out of sight, as I said before, and just as we were coming into the main road, I heard a volley of guns at the place where I knew the troops and emigrants were. Our teams were then going at a fast walk. I first heard one gun, then a volley at once followed.

McMurdy and Knight stopped their teams at once, for they were ordered by Higbee, the same as I was, to help kill all the sick and wounded who were in the wagons, and to do it as soon as they heard the guns of the troops. McMurdy was in front; his wagon was mostly loaded with the arms and small children. McMurdy and Knight got out of their wagons; each one had a rifle. McMurdy went up to Knight's wagon, where the sick and wounded were, and raising his rifle to his shoulder, said: "O Lord, my God, receive their spirits, it is for thy Kingdom that I do this." He then shot a man who was lying with his head on another man's breast; the ball killed both men.

I also went up to the wagon, intending to do my part of the killing. I drew my pistol and cocked it, but somehow it went off prematurely, and I shot McMurdy across the thigh, my pistol ball cutting his buck-skin pants. McMurdy turned to me and said:

"Brother Lee, keep cool, you are excited; you came very near killing me. Keep cool, there is no reason for being excited."

Knight then shot a man with his rifle; he shot the man in the head. Knight also brained a boy that was about fourteen years old. The boy came running up to our wagons, and Knight struck him on the head with the butt end of his gun, and crushed his skull. By this time many Indians reached our wagons, and all of the sick and wounded were killed almost instantly. I saw an Indian from Cedar City, called Joe, run up to the wagon and catch a man by the hair, and raise his head up and look into his face; the man shut his eyes, and Joe shot him in the head. The Indians then examined all of the wounded in in the wagons, and all of the bodies, to see if any were alive, and all that showed signs of life were at once shot through the head. I did not kill any one there, but it was an accident that kept me from it, for I fully intended to do my part of the killing, but by the time I got over the excitement of coming so near killing McMurdy, the whole of the killing of the wounded was done. There is no truth in the statement of Nephi Johnson, where he says I cut a man's throat.

Just after the wounded were all killed I saw a girl, some ten or eleven years old, running towards us, from the direction where the troops had attacked the main body of emigrants; she was covered with blood. An Indian shot her before she got within sixty yards of us. That was the last person that I saw killed on that occasion.

About this time an Indian rushed to the front wagon, and grabbed a little boy, and was going to kill him. The lad got away from the Indian and ran to me, and caught me by the knees; and begged me to save him, and not let the Indian kill him. The Indian had hurt the little fellow's chin on the wagon-bed, when he first caught hold of him. I told the Indian to let the boy alone. I took the child up in my arms, and put him back in the wagon, and saved his life. This little boy said his name was Charley Fancher, and that his father was Captain of the train. He was a bright boy. I afterwards adopted him, and gave him to Caroline. She kept him until Dr. Forney took all the children East. I believe that William Sloan, alias Idaho Bill, is the same boy.

After all the parties were dead, I ordered Knight to drive out on one side, and throw out the dead bodies. He did so, and threw them out of his wagon at a place about one hundred yards from the road, and then came back to where I was standing. I then ordered Knight and McMurdy to take the children that were saved alive, (sixteen was the number, some say seventeen, I say sixteen,) and drive on to Hamblin's ranch. They did as I ordered them to do. Before the wagons started, Nephi Johnson came up in company with the Indians that were under his command, and Carl Shirts I think came up too, but I know that I then considered that Carl Shirts was a coward, and I afterwards made him suffer for being a coward. Several white men came up too, but I cannot tell their names, as I have forgotten who they were.

Knight lied when he said I went to the ranch and ordered him to go to the field with his team. I never knew anything of his team, or heard of it, until he came with a load of armed men in his wagon, on the evening of Thursday. If any one ordered him to go to the Meadows, it was Higbee. Every witness that claims that he went to the Meadows without knowing what he was going to do, has lied, for they all knew, as well as Haight or any one else did, and they all voted, every man of them, in the Council, on Friday morning, a little before daylight, to kill all the emigrants.

After the wagons, with the children, had started for Hamblin's ranch, I turned and walked back to where the brethren were. Nephi Johnson lies when he says he was on horse-back, and met me, or that I gave him orders to go to guard the wagons. He is a perjured wretch, and has sworn to every thing he could to injure me. God knows what I did do was bad enough, but he has lied to suit the leaders of the Church, who want me out of the way.

While going back to the brethren, I passed the bodies of several women. In one place I saw six or seven bodies near each other; they were stripped perfectly naked, and all of their clothing was torn from their bodies by the Indians.

I walked along the line where the emigrants had been killed, and saw many bodies lying dead and naked on the field, near by where the women lay. I saw ten children; they had been killed close to each other; they were from ten to sixteen years of age. The bodies of the women and children were scattered along the ground for quite a distance before I came to where the men were killed.

I do not know how many were killed, but I thought then that there were some fifteen women, about ten children, and about forty men killed, but the statement of others that I have since talked with about the massacre, makes me think there were fully one hundred and ten killed that day on the Mountain Meadows, and the ten who had died in the corral, and young Aden killed by Stewart at Richards' Springs, would make the total number one hundred and twenty-one.

When I reached the place where the dead men lay, I was told how the orders had been obeyed. Major Higbee said, "The boys have acted admirably, they took good aim, and all of the d—d Gentiles but two or three fell at the first fire."

He said that three or four got away some distance, but the men on horses soon overtook them and cut their throats. Higbee said the Indians did their part of the work well, that it did not take over a minute to finish up when they got fairly started. I found that the first orders had been carried out to the letter.

Three of the emigrants did get away, but the Indians were put on their trail and they overtook and killed them before they reached the settlements in California. But it would take more time than I have to spare to give the details of their chase and capture. I may do so in my writings hereafter, but not now.

I found Major Higbee, Klingensmith, and most of the brethren standing near by where the largest number of the dead men lay. When I went up to the brethren, Major Higbee said,

"We must now examine the bodies for valuables."

I said I did not wish to do any such work.

Higbee then said, "Well, you hold my hat and I will examine the bodies, and put what valuables I get into the hat."

The bodies were all searched by Higbee, Klingensmith and Wm. C. Stewart. I did hold the hat a while, but I soon got so sick that I had to give it to some other person, as I was unable to stand for a few minutes. The search resulted in getting a little money and a few watches, but there was not much money. Higbee and Klingensmith kept the property, I suppose, for I never knew what became of it, unless they did keep it. I think they kept it all.

After the dead were searched, as I have just said, the brethren were called up, and Higbee and Klingensmith, as well as myself, made speeches, and ordered the people to keep the matter a secret from the entire world. Not to tell their wives, or their most intimate friends, and we pledged ourselves to keep everything relating to the affair a secret during life. We also took the most binding oaths to stand by each other, and to always insist that the massacre was committed by Indians alone. This was the advice of Brigham Young too, as I will show hereafter.

The men were mostly ordered to camp there on the field for that night, but Higbee and Klingensmith went with me to Hamblin's ranch, where we got something to eat, and staid there all night. I was nearly dead for rest and sleep; in fact I had rested but little since the Saturday night before. I took my saddle-blanket and spread it on the ground soon after I had eaten my supper, and lay down on the saddle-blanket, using my saddle for a pillow, and slept soundly until next morning.

I was awakened in the morning by loud talking between Isaac C. Haight and William H. Dame. They were very much excited, and quarreling with each other. I got up at once, but was unable to hear what they were quarreling about, for they cooled down as soon as they saw that others were paying attention to them.

I soon learned that Col. Dame, Judge Lewis of Parowan, and Isaac C. Haight, with several others, had arrived at the Hamblin ranch in the night, but I do not know what time they got there.

After breakfast we all went back in a body to the Meadows, to bury the dead and take care of the property that was left there.

When we reached the Meadows we all rode up to that part of the field where the women were lying dead. The bodies of men, women and children had been stripped entirely naked, making the scene one of the most loathsome and ghastly that can be imagined.

Knowing that Dame and Haight had quarreled at Hamblin's that morning, I wanted to know how they would act in sight of the dead, who lay there as the result of their orders. I was greatly interested to know what Dame had to say, so I kept close to them, without appearing to be watching them.

Colonel Dame was silent for some time. He looked all over the field, and was quite pale, and looked uneasy and frightened. I thought then that he was just finding out the difference between giving and executing orders for wholesale killing. He spoke to Haight, and said:

"I must report this matter to the authorities."

"How will you report it?" said Haight.

Dame said, "I will report it just as it is."

"Yes, I suppose so, and implicate yourself with the rest?" said Haight.

"No," said Dame. "I will not implicate myself, for I had nothing to do with it."

Haight then said, "That will not do, for you know a d—d sight better. You ordered it done. Nothing has been done except by your orders, and it is too late in the day for you to order things done and then go back on it, and go back on the men who have carried out your orders. You cannot sow pig on me, and I will be d—d if I will stand it. You are as much to blame as any one, and you know that we have done nothing except what you ordered done. I know that I have obeyed orders, and by G—d I will not be lied on."

Colonel Dame was much excited. He choked up, and would have gone away, but he knew Haight was a man of determination, and would not stand any foolishness.

As soon as Colonel Dame could collect himself, he said:

"I did not think there were so many of them, or I would not have had anything to do with it."

I thought it was now time for me to chip in, so I said:

"Brethren, what is the trouble between you? It will not do for our chief men to disagree."

Haight stepped up to my side, a little in front of me, and facing Colonel Dame. He was very mad, and said:

"The trouble is just this: Colonel Dame counseled and ordered me to do this thing, and now he wants to back out, and go back on me, and by G—d, he shall not do it. He shall not lay it all on me. He cannot do it. He must not try to do it. I will blow him to h—l before he shall lay it all on me. He has got to stand up to what he did, like a little man. He knows he ordered it done, and I dare him to deny it."

Colonel Dame was perfectly cowed. He did not offer to deny it again, but said:

"Isaac, I did not know there were so many of them."

"That makes no difference," said Haight, "you ordered me to do it, and you have got to stand up for your orders."

I thought it was now time to stop the fuss, for many of the young brethren were coming around. So I said:

"Brethren, this is no place to talk over such a matter. You will agree when you get where you can be quiet, and talk it over."

Haight said, "There is no more to say, for he knows he ordered it done, and he has got to stand by it."

That ended the trouble between them, and I never heard of Colonel Dame denying the giving of the orders any more, until after the Church authorities concluded to offer me up for the sins of the Church.

We then went along the field, and passed by where the brethren were at work covering up the bodies. They piled the dead bodies up in heaps, in little gullies, and threw dirt over them. The bodies were only lightly covered, for the ground was hard, and the brethren did not have sufficient tools to dig with. I suppose it is true that the first rain washed the bodies all out again, but I never went back to examine whether it did or not.

We then went along the field to where the corral and camp had been, to where the wagons were standing. We found that the Indians had carried off all of the wagon covers, and the clothing, and the provisions, and had emptied the feathers out of the feather-beds, and carried off all the ticks.

After the dead were covered up or buried (but it was not much of a burial,) the brethren were called together, and a council was held at the emigrant camp. All the leading men made speeches; Colonel Dame, President Haight, Klingensmith, John M. Higbee, Hopkins and myself. The speeches were first—Thanks to God for delivering our enemies into our hands; next, thanking the brethren for their zeal in God's cause; and then the necessity of always saying the Indians did it alone, and that the Mormons had nothing to do with it. The most of the speeches, however, were in the shape of exhortations and commands to keep the whole matter secret from every one but Brigham Young. It was voted unanimously that any man who should divulge the secret, or tell who was present, or do anything that would lead to a discovery of the truth, should suffer death.

The brethren then all took a most solemn oath, binding themselves under the most dreadful and awful penalties, to keep the whole matter secret from every human being, as long as they should live. No man was to know the facts. The brethren were sworn not to talk of it among themselves, and each one swore to help kill all who proved to be traitors to the Church or people in this matter.

It was then agreed that Brigham Young should be informed of the whole matter, by some one to be selected by the Church Council, after the brethren had returned home.

It was also voted to turn all the property over to Klingensmith, as Bishop of the Church at Cedar City, and he was to take care of the property for the benefit of the Church, until Brigham Young was notified, and should give further orders what to do with it.

CHAPTER XIX.

CONFESSION CONTINUED AND CONCLUDED, MARCH 16, 1877,
SEVEN DAYS PRIOR TO HIS EXECUTION.

COLONEL DAME then blest the brethren and we prepared to go to our homes. I took my little Indian boy, Clem, on the horse behind me, and started home. I crossed the mountains and returned the same way I had come.

When I got in about two miles of Harmony, I overtook a body of about forty Indians, on their way home from the massacre. They had a large amount of bloody clothing, and were driving several head of cattle that they had taken from the emigrants.

The Indians were very glad to see me, and said I was their Captain, and that they were going to Harmony with me as my men. It was the orders from the Church authorities to do everything we could to pacify the Indians, and make them the fast friends of the Mormons, so I concluded to humor them.

I started on and they marched after me until we reached the fort at Harmony. We went into the fort and marched round inside, after which they halted and gave their whoop of victory, which means much the same with them as the cheers do with the whites. I then ordered the Indians to be fed; my family gave them some bread and melons, which they eat, and then they left me and went to their tribe.

I will here state again that on the field, before and after the massacre, and again at the council at the emigrant camp, the day after the massacre, orders were given to keep everything secret, and if any man told the secret to any human being, he was to be killed, and I assert as a fact that if any man had told it then, or for many years afterwards, he would have died, for some "Destroying Angel" would have followed his trail and sent him over the "rim of the basin."

From that day to this it has been the understanding with all concerned in that massacre, that the man who divulged the secret should die; he was to be killed, wherever he was found, for treason to the men who killed the emigrants, and for his treason to the Church. No man was at liberty to tell his wife, or any one else, nor were the brethren permitted to talk of it even among themselves. Such were the orders and instructions, from Brigham Young down to the lowest in authority. The orders to lay it all to the Indians, were just as positive as they were to keep it all secret. This was the counsel from all in authority, and for years it was faithfully observed.

The children that were saved were taken to Cedar City, and other settlements, and put out among different families, where they were kept until they were given up to Dr. Forney, the Agent of the United States, who came for them.

I did not have anything to do with the property taken from the emigrants, or the cattle, or anything else, for some three months after the massacre, and then I only took charge of the cattle because I was ordered to do so by Brigham Young.

There were eighteen wagons in all at the emigrant camp. They were all wooden axles but one, and that was a light iron axle; it had been hauled by four mules. There were something over five hundred head of cattle, but I never got the half of them. The Indians killed a large number at the time of the massacre, and drove others to their tribes when they went home from Mountain Meadows. Klingensmith put the Church brand on fifty head or more, of the best of the cattle, and then he and Haight and Higbee drove the cattle to Salt Lake City and sold them for goods that they brought back to Cedar City to trade on.

The Indians got about twenty head of horses and mules. Samuel Knight, one of the witnesses on my trial, got a large sorrel mare; Haight got a span of average American mules; Joel White got a fine mare; Higbee got a good large mule; Klingensmith got a span of mules. Haight, Higbee and Allen each took a wagon. The people all took what they wanted, and they had divided and used up much over half of it before I was put in charge.

The first time I heard that a messenger had been sent to Brigham Young for instructions as to what should be done with the emigrants, was three or four days after I had returned home from the Meadows. Then I heard of it from Isaac C. Haight, when he came to my house and had a talk with me. He said:

"We are all in a muddle. Haslem has returned from Salt Lake City, with orders from Brigham Young to let the emigrants pass in safety."

In this conversation Haight also said:

"I sent an order to Higbee to save the emigrants, after I had sent the orders for killing them all, but for some reason the message did not reach him. I understand the messenger did not go to the Meadows at all."

I at once saw that we were in a bad fix, and I asked Haight what was to be done. We talked the matter over again.

Haight then told me that it was the orders of the Council that I should go to Salt Lake City and lay the whole matter before Brigham Young. I asked him if he was not going to write a report of it to the Governor, as he was the right man to do it, for he was in command of the militia in that section of country, and next to Dame in command of the whole district. I told him that it was a matter which really belonged to the military department, and should be so reported.

He refused to write a report, saying:

"You can report it better than I could write it. You are like a member of Brigham's family, and can talk to him privately and confidentially. I want you to take all of it on yourself that you can, and not expose any more of the brethren than you find absolutely necessary. Do this, Brother Lee, as I order you to do, and you shall receive a celestial reward for it, and the time will come when all who acted with us will be glad for the part they have taken, for the time is near at hand when the Saints are to enjoy the riches of the earth. And all who deny the faith and doctrines of the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter Day Saints shall be slain—the sword of vengeance shall shed their blood; their wealth shall be given as a spoil to our people."

At that time I believed everything he said, and I fully expected to receive the celestial reward that he promised me. But now I say, Damn all such "celestial rewards" as I am to get for what I did on that fatal day.

It was then preached every Sunday to the people that the Mormons were to conquer the earth at once, and the people all thought that the millennium had come, and that Christ's reign upon earth would soon begin, as an accomplished fact.

According to the orders of Isaac C. Haight, I started for Salt Lake City to report the whole facts connected with the massacre, to Brigham Young. I started about a week or ten days after the massacre, and I was on the way about ten days. When I arrived in the city I went to the President's house and gave to Brigham Young a full, detailed statement of the whole affair, from first to last—only I took rather more on myself than I had done.

He asked me if I had brought a letter from Haight, with his report of the affair. I said:

"No, Haight wished me to make a verbal report of it, as I was an eye witness to much of it."

I then went over the whole affair and gave him as full a statement as it was possible for me to give. I described everything about it. I told him of the orders Haight first gave me. I told him everything. I told him that "Brother McMurdy, Brother Knight and myself killed the wounded men in the wagons, with the assistance of the Indians. We killed six wounded men."

He asked me many questions, and I told him every particular, and everything that I knew. I described everything very fully. I told him what I had said against killing the women and children.

Brigham then said:

"Isaac (referring to Haight) has sent me word that if they had killed every man, woman and child in the outfit, there would not have been a drop of innocent blood shed by the brethren; for they were a set of murderers, robbers and thieves."

While I was still talking with him, some men came into his house to see him, so he requested me to keep quiet until they left. I did as he directed.

As soon as the men went out, I continued my recital. I gave him the names of every man that had been present at the massacre. I told him who killed various ones. In fact I gave him all the information there was to give.

When I finished talking about the matter, he said:

"This is the most unfortunate affair that ever befel the Church.

I am afraid of treachery among the brethren that were there. If any one tells this thing so that it will become public, it will work us great injury. I want you to understand now, that you are never to tell this again, not even to Heber C. Kimball. It must be kept a secret among ourselves. When you get home, I want you to sit down and write a long letter, and give me an account of the affair, charging it to the Indians. You sign the letter as Farmer to the Indians, and direct it to me as Indian Agent. I can then make use of such a letter to keep off all damaging and troublesome enquiries.”

I told him that I would write the letter. (I kept my word; but, as an evidence of his treachery, that same letter that he ordered me to write, he has given to Attorney Howard, and he has introduced it in evidence against me on my trial.)

Brigham Young knew when he got that letter just as well as I did, that it was not a true letter, and that it was only written according to his orders to throw the public off of the right trail. He knew that it was written simply to cast all the blame on the Indians, and to protect the brethren. In writing that letter I was still obeying my orders and earning that Celestial reward that had been promised to me.

He then said, “If only men had been killed, I would not have cared so much; but the killing of the women and children is the sin of it. I suppose the men were a hard set, but it is hard to kill women and children for the sins of the men. This whole thing stands before me like a horrid vision. I must have time to reflect upon it.”

He then told me to withdraw and call next day, and he would give me an answer. I said to him,

“President Young, the people all felt, and I know that I believed I was obeying orders, and acting for the good of the Church, and in strict conformity with the oaths that we have all taken to avenge the blood of the Prophets. You must either sustain the people for what they have done, or you must release us from the oaths and obligations that we have taken.”

The only reply he made was,

“Go now, and come in the morning, and I will give you an answer.”

I went to see him again in the morning. When I went in, he seemed quite cheerful. He said,

“I have made that matter a subject of prayer. I went right to God with it, and asked Him to take the horrid vision from my sight, if it was a righteous thing that my people had done in killing those people at the Mountain Meadows. God answered me, and at once the vision was removed. I have evidence from God that He has overruled it all for good, and the action was a righteous one and well intended.

The brethren acted from pure motives. The only trouble is they acted a little prematurely; they were a little ahead of time. I sustain you and all of the brethren for what they did. All that I fear is treachery on the part of some one who took a part with you, but we will look to that.”

I was again cautioned and commanded to keep the whole thing as a sacred secret, and again told to write the report as Indian Farmer, laying the blame on the Indians. That ended our interview, and I left him, and soon started for my home at Harmony.

Brigham Young was then satisfied with the purity of my motives in acting as I had done at the Mountain Meadows. Now he is doing all he can against me, but I know it is nothing but cowardice that has made him turn against me as he has at last.

There is another falsehood generally believed in Utah, especially among the Mormons. It is this. It has generally been reported that Brigham Young was anxious to help Judge Cradlebaugh arrest all the guilty parties. There is not one word of truth in the whole statement. Brigham Young knew the name of every man that was in any way implicated in the Mountain Meadows Massacre. He knew just as much about it as I did, except that he did not see it, as I had seen it.

If Brigham Young had wanted one man, or fifty men, or five hundred men arrested, all he would have had to do would have been to say so, and they would have been arrested instantly. There was no escape for them if he ordered their arrest. Every man who knows anything of affairs in Utah at that time knows this is so.

It is true that Brigham made a great parade at the time, and talked a great deal about bringing the guilty parties to justice, but he did not mean a word of it—not a word. He did go South with Cradlebaugh, but he took good care that Cradlebaugh caught no person that had been in the massacre.

I know that I had plenty of notice of their coming, and so did all the brethren. It was one of Brigham Young’s cunning dodges to blind the government. That this is true I can prove by the statement of what he did at Cedar City while out on his trip with Judge Cradlebaugh to investigate the matter and arrest (?) the guilty parties.

Judge Cradelbaugh and his men were working like faithful men to find out all about it, but they did not learn very much. True, they got on the right track, but could not learn it all, for Brigham Young was along to see that they did not learn the facts.

While at Cedar City, Brigham preached one night, but none of the Judge’s party heard him. In his sermon, when speaking of the Mountain Meadows Massacre, he said:

“Do you know who those people were that were killed at the Mountain Meadows? I will tell you who those people were. They were fathers, mothers, brothers, sisters, uncles, aunts, cousins and children of those who killed the Saints, and drove them from Missouri, and afterwards killed our Prophets in Carthage jail. These children that the government has made such a stir about, were gathered up by the government and carried back to Missouri, to St. Louis, and letters were sent to their relatives to come and take them; but their relations wrote back that they did not want them—that they were the children of thieves, outlaws and murderers, and they would not take them, they did not wish anything to do with them, and would not have them around their houses. Those children are now in the poor house in St. Louis. And yet after all this, I am told that there are many of the brethren who are willing to inform upon and swear against the brethren who were engaged in that affair. I hope there is no truth in this report. I hope there is no such person here, under the sound of my voice. But if there is, I will tell you my opinion of you, and the fact so far as your fate is concerned. Unless you repent at once of that unholy intention, and keep the secret of all that you know, you will die a dog’s death, and be dammèd, and go to hell. I do not want to hear of any more treachery among my people.”

These words of Brigham Young gave great comfort to all of us who were out in the woods keeping out of the way of the officers. It insured our safety and took away our fears.

There has been all sorts of reports circulated about me, and the bigger the lie that was told the more readily it was believed.

I have told in this statement just what I did at the Mountain Meadows Massacre. The evidence of Jacob Hamblin is false in toto. Hamblin lied in every particular, so far as his evidence related to me. It is my fate to die for what I did; but I go to my death with a certainty that it cannot be worse than my life has been for the last nineteen years.

(Mormonism Unveiled: or the Life and Confessions of the Late Mormon Bishop, John D. Lee, 1880, pp. 213, 214, 218-254, 258, 259)

The Mormon historian B. H. Roberts admits that white settlers were involved in the Mountain Meadows Massacre:

The call, however, whatever its purport, brought to Mountain Meadows a number of white settlers from Cedar, on Thursday, the 10th of September, enough to swell the number of whites now there to between fifty and sixty, many of whom were but very young men. (Comprehensive History of the Church, vol. 4, p. 153)

After the discussion as to the disposition of the emigrants referred to ended, it appears that leading spirits among the white settlers who had assembled at Mountain Meadows determined upon the destruction of the emigrants; and in order that it might be accomplished without risk to themselves it was decided to decoy the emigrants from their fortified camp, disarm them and treacherously put them to death. (Ibid., p. 156)

After the Massacre

The historian Juanita Brooks gives this information:

In the meantime, before the civil authorities had been able to start an investigation, the church conducted a private one, if we are to trust their own records. The leaders had to know the truth of this affair, even though the group loyalty which they had always encouraged would not permit them to make public their findings. Through long years of experience they had developed the attitude that, right or wrong, they must stand together. . . .

Later, in his testimony at the first trial of John D. Lee, Klingensmith insisted that he visited Brigham Young in company with Lee and Hopkins, and that the three discussed the disposition of the spoil. "Let John D. Lee take care of it, in as much as he is the Indian Agent now. What you know of this affair, say nothing about it," he quoted Brigham Young as saying. (The Mountain Meadows Massacre, p. 120; pp. 161-162 of 1962 reprint)

While he did not order the massacre, and would have prevented it if he could, Brigham Young was accessory after the fact, in that he knew what had happened, and how and why it happened. Evidence of this is abundant and unmistakable, and from the most impeccable Mormon sources. . . . he understood well that their acts had grown out of loyalty to him and his cause, . . . (Ibid., pp. 161-162; p. 219 of 1962 reprint)

About two weeks after the massacre John D. Lee made his report to Brigham Young. Under the date of September 29, 1857, Wilford Woodruff recorded the following in his journal:

John D. Lee also arrived from Harmony with an express and an awful tale of blood. A company of California emigrants, of about 150 men, women and children, many of them belonging to the mob in Missouri and Illinois, had been massacred. . . . Brother Lee said that he did not think there was a drop of innocent blood in their camp, for he had two of the children in his house, and he could not get but one to kneel down in prayer-time, and the other would laugh at her for doing it, and they would swear like pirates. The scene of blood has commenced, and Joseph said that we should see so much of it that it would make our hearts sick. ("Woodruff's Journal," September 29, 1857, as cited in Comprehensive History of the Church, vol. 4, pp. 160-161)

While Woodruff claimed that the massacre was committed by Indians, Lee states that he "gave to Brigham Young a full, detailed statement of the whole affair, from first to last . . . I gave him the names of every man that had been present at the massacre. I told him who killed various ones. In fact I gave him all the information there was to give." Brigham Young, however, testified that he would not listen to all the details given by Lee:

Answer: Within some two or three months after the massacre he called at my office and . . . commenced giving an account of the massacre. I told him to stop, as from what I had already heard by rumor, I did not wish my feelings harrowed up with a recital of details.

(Court Record, the second Lee trial, September, 1876, Deposition of Brigham Young, as cited in Comprehensive History of the Church, vol. 4, p. 160)

The Mormon historian B.H. Roberts states: "According to Governor Young's deposition at the second trial of Lee, he (Governor Young) refused to hear the story in detail. . . . it is clear that Brigham Young, unfortunately, as I think, did not get the full account of the great crime" (Comprehensive History of the Church, vol. 4, pp. 160-161). Roberts, however, does admit that Jacob Hamblin—a very prominent Mormon—gave Brigham Young a full report of the massacre right after it took place:

But previous to this [the report of George A. Smith, dated August 17, 1858], and "soon after" the event, the presence of Lee and other white men at the massacre and even somewhat of their participation in it had been made known in Salt Lake City. . . .

Jacob Hamblin, a reputable witness, testified at the second Lee trial that "soon after it [the massacre] happened," he reported to Brigham Young and George A. Smith what Lee had told him of the affair; of the part that white men had taken in it; and that in greater detail than he had given it, or was able to give in his testimony in court, because he then more clearly remember it; and that Brigham Young said to him that "as soon as we can get a court of justice we will ferret this thing out, but till then, don't say anything about it." All this seems to have been forgotten in the Smith "report." (Comprehensive History of the Church, vol. 4, p. 166)

While B. H. Roberts suggests that George A. Smith may have "forgotten" this important conversation with Jacob Hamblin, we feel that it is much more reasonable to believe that Smith simply did not tell the truth in his report of August 17, 1858.

Jacob Hamblin's testimony makes it very plain that Brigham Young knew all about the fact that white men were involved, yet six years after the massacre took place Brigham Young was still trying to blame the whole thing on the Indians. In a sermon delivered March 8, 1863, Brigham Young made the following statements:

. . . a company of emigrants were traveling on the route to California. Nearly all of that company were destroyed by the Indians. That unfortunate affair has been laid to the charge of the whites. A certain judge that was then in this Territory wanted the whole army to accompany him to Iron county to try the whites for the murder of that company of emigrants. . . . but to this day they have not touched the matter, for fear the Mormons would be acquitted from the charge of having any hand in it, and our enemies would thus be deprived of a favorite topic to talk about, when urging hostility against us. "The Mountain Meadow massacre! Only think of the Mountain Meadow massacre!!" is their cry from one end of the land to the other. (Journal of Discourses, vol. 10, pp. 109-110)

Juanita Brooks gives this information concerning Judge Cradlebaugh's attempt to bring the guilty parties to justice:

In April, 1859, Judge Cradlebaugh and his military escort started south, . . . The court and its bodyguard had everything against them from the beginning, for word had traveled ahead and all the suspected had gone into hiding.

That both John D. Lee and Isaac C. Haight were warned in advance is shown clearly in their diaries. . . . the Judge made out writs for some thirty-six men, . . . Of all these thirty-six writs, not one was served, and the marshal, unable to make a single arrest, wrote a formal statement to justify his failure. . . .

Forced at last to admit that they could do nothing, the Judge and his escort started back to Salt Lake City, and the local leaders came out of hiding. (The Mountain Meadows Massacre, 1962, pp. 173, 174, 177, 178)

Although the Mormons opposed Judge Cradlebaugh's investigation, Brigham Young tried to make it appear that it was the other way around. On June 11, 1871, Charles Walker recorded in his diary that Brigham Young said “as to the Mountain Meadows Massacre if he had not been foiled by Judge Cradlebaugh and other federal officials, he would have hung every guilty person concerned in the bloody deed.” (“Diary of Charles Walker,” typed copy, page 30) The truth, of course, was that the Mormons under Brigham Young opposed Cradlebaugh’s investigation. Judge Cradlebaugh made the following statements concerning this matter:

Sitting as a committing magistrate, complaint after complaint was made before me of murders and robberies . . . and darkest in this appalling catalogue of blood, the cowardly, cold-blooded butchery and robbery at the Mountain Meadows. At that time there still lay all ghastly under the sun of Utah the unburied skeletons of one hundred and nineteen men, women, and children, the hapless, hopeless victims of the Mormon creed. . . . I was the first Federal judge in that part of the Territory after the occurrence. . . . I determined to visit that part of my district, and, if possible, expose the persons engaged in the massacre, which I did in the early part of the year 1859. . . . I was visited by the Indian chiefs of that section, . . . One of them told me, in the presence of the others, that after the attack had been made, a white man came to their camp with a piece of paper, which, he said, Brigham Young had sent, that directed them to go and help to whip the emigrants. . . . He said the Mormons were all painted. He said the Indians got a part of the clothing; and gave the names of John D. Lee, President Haight, and Bishop Higbee, as the big captains. . . .

While at Cedar City I was visited by a number of apostate Mormons, who gave me every assurance that they would furnish an abundance of evidence in regard to the matter, so soon as they were assured of military protection. In fact, some of the persons engaged in the act came to see me in the night, and gave a full account of the matter, intending, when protection was at hand, to become witnesses. They claimed that they had been forced into the matter by the bishops. . . .

A great portion of the property was taken to Cedar City, deposited in the tithing office, and then sold out; the bed clothes upon which the wounded had been lying, and those taken from the dead, were piled in the back room of the tithing office, and allowed to remain for so great a length of time that when I was there eighteen months after the room was still offensive.

What a commentary upon the condition of affairs in our country! Mormonism reveling upon the spoils obtained by murder, while seventeen orphan children are turned penniless upon the world. . . .

It has been said we have courts in Utah, and the question is frequently asked, why do not the courts act? The uniform testimony of the judges is to the effect that the courts are powerless. More than fifteen Federal judges who have gone to the Territory have so stated. They have again and again told you that the entire legislation of the Territory is to prevent the administration of the laws; that the Church authorities are determined that the laws shall not be enforced in the Federal courts; that the grand and trial jurors are Mormons, who are taught that the Mormon church laws are the higher laws, and should prevail, and who refuse, therefore, to discharge their sworn duties, and have invariably refused to punish any Mormon for an offense committed against an anti-Mormon. (“Utah and the Mormons,” a Speech of Hon. J. Cradlebaugh, in the House of Representatives, February 7, 1863, as printed in Appendix to the Congressional Globe, February 23, 1863, pp. 122-123)

John D. Lee stated that Brigham Young went south with Cradlebaugh to try to prevent him from finding out the truth about the massacre. We have found no evidence to support this, but we do know that Young offered to “accompany” Cradlebaugh (see Comprehensive History of the Church, vol. 4, p. 177). Two years after Cradlebaugh’s trip, Young visited the southern settlements. During this trip Young demonstrated that he approved of the massacre. Juanita Brooks gives this information concerning the visit:

Brigham Young rode first in his train . . . When he came to the stone monument at Mountain Meadows, he pulled out and stopped.

Everyone else stopped and all gathered around to hear what he had to say about this. At first he walked a short distance away and up the incline as though he wanted to look over the whole valley and visualize what had happened and where and how. Then he came back to the pile of stones, built into a rude pyramid some twelve feet high and crowned by a hewn cross of cedar upon which were painted the words Vengeance is mine saith the Lord, I will repay. A flat stone at the bottom bore the inscription, “120 men, women, and children murdered in cold blood early in Sept. 1857. From Arkansas.” And on another slab, “Erected by Company, 1st Dragoons May, 1859.”

Brigham Young walked around the monument, studied the inscriptions, and then raising his right arm to the square, he said impressively, “Vengeance is mine, saith the Lord, and I have taken a little of it.” Without another word, he returned to his wagon and rode on. Riding with the company were horsemen from the south who thought they understood what he meant. One immediately threw a lasso rope around the cross, and turning his horse suddenly, jerked it down and dragged it a short distance. The others dismounted quickly and began tearing down the stones, scattering them in every direction, until before the wagon train was well on the road, the monument was demolished. . . .

For Lee this had been a rewarding experience indeed. The President had expressed approval of his mill and praised him for his industry and foresight as it was shown in his homes, yards, corrals and fields. Best of all, he had seemed to approve of his efforts. Referring to the massacre, he lamented the death of the women and children, though “under the circumstances this could not be avoided.” “The men merited their fate,” he said. As for the people who would have betrayed their brethren into the hands of their enemies, he had not language strong enough to express his scorn.

“For that thing they will be damned and go down to hell,” he thundered. “I would be glad to see one of these traitors, though I don’t suppose there is any here now. They have run away.” (John D. Lee, by Juanita Brooks, pp. 265-268)

Lee’s Excommunication

John D. Lee not only served in the secret Council of 50 under Brigham Young, but he was also “adopted” into Young’s family years before the massacre took place (see Utah Historical Quarterly, Spring 1962, p. 112).

Juanita Brooks tells us that prior to 1870 “there had been a growing discontent among members of the church with the policy of the leaders.” Concerning one group of men she states:

Worse still, they said, Brigham Young gave public recognition to men who had participated in the Mountain Meadow massacre. The Utah Reporter, published in Corrine, ran a series of open letters addressed to Brigham Young, demanding that those guilty of that outrage be brought to justice. If the authorities had not specifically ordered the massacre, they were accessories after the fact by shielding the guilty. (John D. Lee, p. 288)

Finally, thirteen years after the massacre, Brigham Young was forced to excommunicate Lee (or at least claim that he was excommunicated). Joseph Fielding Smith, the tenth President of the Mormon Church, once made this statement concerning the excommunication of John D. Lee:

. . .—For several years the facts relating to the tragedy were unknown, but gradually the truth leaked out and an investigation was made of the affair. John D. Lee was excommunicated from the Church with injunction from President Young that under no circumstances should he ever be admitted as a member again. (Essentials in Church History, p. 516)

Strange as it may seem, however, in 1961 the Mormon Church leaders reinstated John D. Lee to membership and to his former blessings. Juanita Brooks states:

Through all the eighty-four years which have elapsed since the execution of John D. Lee, the dearest hope of his many descendants has been that his name should some day be cleared. An action taken on Thursday, April 20, 1961, has made that hope a reality for them.

On that day the First Presidency and Quorum of the Twelve of the Mormon Church met in a joint session and “It was the action of the Council after considering all the facts available that authorization be given for the re-instatement to membership and former blessings to John D. Lee.”

On May 8 and 9 following, the necessary ordinances were performed in the Salt Lake Temple. (John D. Lee, p. 376)

Trial and Execution

After John D. Lee was excommunicated from the Mormon Church, he was arrested and brought to trial. Speaking of the trial, Mrs. Brooks states:

So the evidence piled up. The attorneys were eloquent in their recital of the lurid and horrible details, the defense insisting that while Lee was present and might have participated, he was there by command of his superiors, both military and ecclesiastical, whose orders in this time of military rule it would be death to disobey. While they admitted the facts of the massacre and all its unbelievable horror, they placed the responsibility upon the Mormon Church and its doctrine that men were justified in “avenging the blood of the Prophets,” as a part of their duty to God.

For the Mormon audience, especially the group of converts who had joined the church and emigrated to Utah later, this was a shattering and soul-shaking experience. Not having shared the Missouri and Nauvoo experiences or felt the “spirit of the times,” they simply could not believe that the church with which they had become affiliated or any of the officers in it could condone such an outrage, much less be responsible for it.

In the end, the jury could not agree upon a verdict, the eight Mormons being for acquittal and the four gentiles for conviction. Now the whole thing must be gone over again, . . . (John D. Lee, pp. 340-341)

In the Church Chronology the following is found under the date of May 11, 1876:

Thus. 11.—After a long confinement Wm. H. Dane, John D. Lee and Geo. W. Adair were admitted to bail in the respective sums of $20,000, $15,000 and $10,000. (Church Chronology, p. 96)

Emma, John D. Lee’s wife, said that the authorities sent word for John D. Lee to jump his bonds:

Emma told that in late August a messenger arrived at Lonely Dell with word from the authorities counseling Lee to jump his bonds and leave the country. Rather than have this horrible affair rehearsed again, they would assume the full responsibility to his bondsmen. The messenger arrived too late. He came via Kanab, while Lee returned via Skutumpah, so they had missed each other and there was no way for them to get together. Thus the hand of fate reached out to cast the fatal die. (John D. Lee, p. 358)

In her book, The Mountain Meadows Massacre, Mrs. Brooks states:

The church leaders decided to sacrifice Lee only when they could see that it would be impossible to acquit him without assuming a part of the responsibility themselves. It was a case where the duties of a statesman were weighed against the loyalties of a personal friend, and the duties of the statesman, of necessity, were given precedence. To air the whole story would have done injury to the church, both among its own membership and in the eyes of the world, and this token sacrifice had to be made. Hence the farce which was the second trial of Lee. The leaders evidently felt that by placing all the responsibility squarely upon him, already doomed, they could lift the stigma from the church as a whole. (The Mountain Meadows Massacre, p. 162; pp. 219-220 of the 1962 edition)

At John D. Lee’s second trial, which Juanita Brooks calls a “farce,” he was convicted of murder in the first degree. On March 23, 1877, he was executed at the Mountain Meadows. Just before he was shot, he made this statement:

It seems I have to be made a victim—a victim must be had, and I am the victim. I am sacrificed to satisfy the feelings—the vindictive feelings, or in other words to gratify parties. . . .

I am a true believer in the gospel of Jesus Christ. I do not believe everything that is now being taught and practiced by Brigham Young. I do not care who hears it. . . .

I studied to make this man’s will my pleasure for thirty years. See, now, what I have come to this day!

I have been sacrificed in a cowardly, dastardly manner. I cannot help it. It is my last word—it is so.

. . . Sacrifice a man that has waited upon them, that has wandered and endured with them in the days of adversity, true from the beginnings of the Church! And I am now singled out and am sacrificed in this manner! What confidence can I have in such a man! I have none, and I don’t think my father in heaven has any. (The Mountain Meadows Massacre, p. 152; pp. 208-209 of the 1962 edition)

The teachings of Brigham Young certainly brought John D. Lee to a terrible end. Juanita Brooks observed that “John D. Lee lamented the fact that he must bequeath to his children a legacy of shame, but even he could not guess how this burden would grow with the years” (John D. Lee, p. 369). The Apostle Abraham H. Cannon recorded the following in his journal in 1894: “It was asked if John D. Lee, a son of the mountain meadows murderer, who is a good man, and is called on a mission, should go. It was decided that he should go to England, but assume his mothers’ maiden name” (“The Daily Journal of Abraham H. Cannon,” April 26, 1894, vol. 18, p. 89).

John D. Lee’s descendants were very happy to learn that the Mormon leaders had reinstated him “to membership and to former blessings.”

Responsibility For Massacre

William E. Berrett makes this statement concerning the Mountain Meadows Massacre:

For the deed at Mountain Meadows there is no excuse. The perpetrators were never held guiltless by the Church and the Church must not be condemned because of the vile deeds of a few of its members. (The Restored Church, p. 470)

In trying to clear the Mormon Church of any responsibility for the massacre, Mr. Berrett quotes a reference from the Doctrine and Covenants which states that it is wrong to kill. Mr. Berrett uses this quote to try to impress his readers with the idea that the Mormon Church has never sanctioned the shedding of blood. This, of course, is incorrect, for in our study of “Blood Atonement” many references were given which proved that the Mormon Church leaders were preaching the shedding of blood at the very time that the Mountain Meadows Massacre took place. The following are brief extracts from their sermons (“JD” stands for Journal of Discourses):

. . . have their blood spilt . . . (B. Young, JD, v. 4, p. 53)
 . . . atoned for by the blood of the man. (B. Young, JD, v. 4, p. 54)
 . . . your own blood must atone for it; . . . (B. Young, JD, v. 3, p. 247)
 . . . nearest relative must kill him! (George A. Smith, JD, v. 1, p. 97)
 . . . I say kill him on the spot, . . . (B. Young, JD, v. 1, p. 108)
 . . . you will be hewn down . . . (B. Young, JD, v. 3, p. 226)
 . . . the penalty . . . is death on the spot. (B. Young, JD, v. 10, p. 110)
 . . . their blood will surely be shed, . . . (H. C. Kimball, JD, v. 1, p. 375)
 Will you love that man or woman well enough to shed their blood?
 (B. Young, JD, v. 4, p. 219)
 . . . your blood should be spilled, . . . (B. Young, JD, v. 4, p. 220)
 . . . they will be destroyed . . . (H. C. Kimball, JD, v. 6, p. 126)
 . . . cut their throats. (B. Young, JD, v. 2, p. 311)
 . . . cutting people off from the earth . . . (B. Young, JD, v. 4, p. 53)

... put a javelin through both of them, ... (B. Young, JD, v. 3, p. 247)
 ... death to both male and female. (O. Pratt, The Seer, p. 223)
 ... we wipe them out of existence ... (H. C. Kimball, JD, v. 7, p. 19)
 ... the heads of thieves taken off, or shot down before the public ...
 (Orson Hyde, JD, v. 1, p. 73)
 ... shed their blood. (J. M. Grant, JD, v. 4, p. 49)
 ... have their blood shed, ... (J. M. Grant, JD, v. 4, p. 49)
 ... let your blood be shed, ... (J. M. Grant, JD, v. 4, p. 51)
 ... I will unsheath my bowie knife, ... (B. Young, JD, v. 1, p. 83)
 ... spill his blood on the earth ... (B. Young, JD, v. 4, p. 220)
 ... we will slay you, ... (H. C. Kimball, JD, v. 6, p. 351)
 ... we will slay them. (B. Young, JD, v. 2, p. 322)
 ... their heads chopped off, ... (B. Young, JD, v. 2, p. 186)

More references could be included, but these should be sufficient to prove that the leaders of the Mormon Church were not always opposed to the shedding of blood. Because of this they must share part of the blame for the Mountain Meadows Massacre. Juanita Brooks states: "1. While Brigham Young and George A. Smith, the church authorities chiefly responsible, did not specifically order the massacre, they did preach sermons and set up social conditions which made it possible" (The Mountain Meadows Massacre, p. 161; p. 219 of 1962 edition). On page 35 of the same book (1962 edition) Mrs. Brooks states:

Not only did George A. Smith carry significant orders to both the military and the Indians, but his preaching to the people in general was of such an inflammatory nature that it roused them to a high emotional pitch. Because of this, the fatal relationship between his visit and the massacre which followed scarcely a month later can hardly be overemphasized.

Church Opposes Study

In the preface to her book, The Mountain Meadows Massacre, Juanita Brooks states:

... I was born into the church and have been raised in it. ... and have always been a loyal and active member. ... When one has served in and sacrificed for a cause over a long period of years, that cause becomes dear, ... Hence, in trying to present this subject with a desire only to tell the truth, I believe that I am doing my church a service.

Juanita Brooks' desire to tell the truth about the Mountain Meadows Massacre has not been shared by the leaders of the Mormon Church. On page 216 of her book (1962 edition) Mrs. Brooks makes the following statement:

... Charles W. Penrose wrote the account which came to be the accepted story of the church, his whole purpose being to clear the name of Brigham Young from any implications of guilt. Since that time a number of reputable Mormon scholars have begun research on the subject, only to be turned away from it for one reason or another. Two of these men have said that they discontinued because they were "counseled" with such vigor to leave it alone that they felt sure that to continue would cost them not only their positions in church schools, but their membership in the church itself.

Mrs. Brooks even criticizes Joseph Fielding Smith, who became the tenth President of the Church, for not using the information he had available when he wrote an account of the massacre. She states:

An even better illustration, perhaps is Essentials in Church History, by Joseph Fielding Smith. In the 1945 edition Smith devotes one chapter to the massacre, in which, without mentioning names, he can hardly find language strong enough or words vigorous enough to condemn the participants. He quotes one footnote, and one only, Bancroft's statement that it "was the crime of an individual, the crime of a fanatic of the worst stamp." Yet in the collections of the historian's office of the L.D.S. Church, records of which he is the custodian, there is ample evidence that this was definitely not the crime of a single individual, nor the responsibility of only one man. Even the most superficial research would show the utter ridiculousness of such a statement.

It seems that, once having taken a stand and put forth a story, the leaders of the Mormon Church have felt that they should maintain it, regardless of all the evidence to the contrary. In their concern to let the matter die, they do not see that it can never be finally settled until it is accepted as any other historical incident, with a view only to finding the facts. To shrink from it, to discredit any who try to inquire into it, to refuse to discuss it, or to hesitate to accept all the evidence fearlessly, is not only to keep it a matter of controversy, but to make the most loyal followers doubt the veracity of their leaders in presenting other matters of history. This is especially true in dealing with college students and people trained in research. (The Mountain Meadows Massacre, pp. 160-161; pp. 217-218 of the 1962 edition)

In the new edition of her book (printed in 1970), Juanita Brooks gives this information concerning the site of the Mountain Meadows Massacre:

In April, 1966, representatives of the Mormon Church purchased from Mr. Ezra Lytle the two and one-half acres upon which the monument stands. At once the leaders adopted a policy of "discouraging" visitors. On June 2, 1966, the Forest Service sign and also the Old Spanish Trail sign on the opposite side of the road disappeared. Although forest rangers at both Enterprise and Cedar City were notified, the place was still unmarked as late as December 2, which meant that for one full season, tourists searched in vain for the monument.

Nor was any work at all done on the access road to the place, so that by January, 1967, it was totally impossible for any car to reach the site. Sometimes after August 4, 1966, the picnic table in the valley was lifted out by heavy equipment and hauled away, with a report to the forest ranger at Cedar City that it had been washed down by a flood. That this report was false was amply evident to every one of the several persons who went to investigate.

By early summer of 1967 the furor of tourist groups and traveling clubs forced the County Commission to repair the road and to keep it open and passable. This they continue to do. (The Mountain Meadows Massacre, 1970, Author's Statement—II, page xxiv)

Obviously, the Mormon Church leaders are trying to cover up the truth about the Mountain Meadows Massacre. J. Forney, who was Supt. of Indian Affairs for the Utah Territory, stated that the Mountain Meadows Massacre was "a crime that has no parallel in American history for atrocity." The Mormon Church does not want to take any responsibility for this crime, even though the leaders of the church were preaching at that time that it was not only acceptable but sometimes pleasing in the sight of the Lord for blood to be shed. Brigham Young even referred to this as a "doctrine." Brigham Young was sustained as the Prophet, Seer, and Revelator of the Mormon Church, and the people were told to follow his teachings "right or wrong." Is it any wonder, then, that after hearing Brigham Young's "doctrine" of Blood Atonement some members of the church did not see anything wrong with killing a company of emigrants?

For those interested in making a thorough study of the massacre we highly recommend Juanita Brooks' book, The Mountain Meadows Massacre.

34. Mormonism and Money

The Mormon Church requires 10 per cent of the income of its members for tithing. With this money the Mormon Church has become one of the richest churches in the world for its size. The Doctrine and Covenants threatens those who do not comply with the law of tithing with destruction. In section 64, verse 23, we read:

Behold, now it is called today until the coming of the Son of Man, and verily it is a day of sacrifice, and a day for the tithing of my people; for he that is tithed shall not be burned at his coming.

Ernest L. Wilkinson, formerly President of the Brigham Young University, threatened the members of the faculty as follows:

When I am called upon this year to pass on proposed promotions in academic rank for members of the faculty, I hope I do not have to refuse any on the ground that the nominee does not adhere in practice to one of the qualifications approved by the faculty of this institution for advancement in academic rank namely: "Adherence to the principles and teachings of the Gospel as taught by the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints," one of which is the payment of tithing. And I trust that such payment will be voluntary, for we do not want any person on this faculty to share his income with the Lord because of any coercion or compulsion. Should there be any member of the faculty who does not voluntarily desire to pay his tithing, the honorable and manly thing for that person to do is to resign his position. We shall be strong as individuals and collectively as a faculty only to the extent we exercise our free agency by freely choosing the commandments and revelations of the Lord. (The Principle and Practice of Paying Tithing, from an address made to the members of the B.Y.U. faculty, September 25, 1957, p. 24)

Brigham Young, the second President of the Mormon Church, made these statements concerning tithing:

We have said pay your Tithing. And we have said to the Bishops that if any man refuses to pay his Tithing, try him for his fellowship; and if he still refuses, cut him off from the Church . . .

In regard to the Law of Tithing, the Lord has given the revelation I have already referred to, and made it a law unto us, and let all who have gathered here and refuse to obey it, be disfellowshipped; . . . (Journal of Discourses, vol. 10, pp. 283, 285)

We have had trouble with men who refused to pay their Tithing, but the time has now come when a man that will not pay his Tithing is not fit to be in the Church. (Ibid., p. 309)

Joseph Smith would not allow a person to participate in the temple ceremony unless he paid tithing. Erastus Snow stated:

. . . the Prophet Joseph instructed the brethren in charge, to the effect that none should be allowed to participate in the privileges of the House of God excepting those who shall produce a certificate from the General Church Recorder, certifying to the fact that they had paid up their tithing. (Journal of Discourses, vol. 19, p. 337)

The Mormon bishops are still instructed to ask those who are seeking a temple recommend if they pay their tithing. This appears as question number three in the Temple Recommend Book.

Church Funds For Private Gain

It is a well known fact that a person who has money to invest stands a very good chance of becoming rich. Brigham Young and other Mormon Church leaders used the church funds and became wealthy. The Mormon writer Leonard J. Arrington stated:

Brigham Young and other church authorities, when need required it, drew on the tithing resources of the church, and at a later date repaid part or all of the obligation in money, property, or services. No interest seems to have been paid for the use of these funds. . . . This ability to draw, almost at will, on church as well as his own funds, was a great advantage to Brigham Young and was certainly one of the reasons for his worldly success...while Brigham Young was probably the largest borrower of funds from the trustee-in-trust, he was certainly not the only one. ("The Settlement of the Brigham Young Estate," 1877-1879, Reprinted from the Pacific Historical Review, vol. 21, number 1, February 1952, pp. 7, 8)

Brigham Young's practice of using church funds for private speculation may have led others to do the same. In a sermon delivered June 15, 1856, Brigham Young stated:

I have proof ready to show that Bishops have taken in thousands of pounds in weight of tithing which they have never reported to the General Tithing Office. We have documents to show that Bishops have taken in hundreds of bushels of wheat, and only a small portion of it has come into the General Tithing Office; they stole it to let their friends speculate upon. If any one is doubtful about this, will you not call on me to produce my proof before a proper tribunal? I should take pleasure in doing so, but we pass over such things in mercy to the people. (Journal of Discourses, vol. 3, p. 342)

An organization which takes in as much money as the Mormon Church is bound to present temptation to those who take care of the money. During the last few years a great deal of money has been stolen by employees of the Mormon Church. In one instance more than half a million dollars was stolen by two of the church's bookkeepers. On January 29, 1969, the Salt Lake Tribune printed an article which contained the following statements:

Preliminary hearing for two men charged in connection with the theft of more than half a million dollars from the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints started Tuesday, . . .

Kay and Darrow are accused of thefts occurring over a period from Sept. 18, 1967, to Oct. 10, 1968. Police have recovered more than $72,000 in cash and cancelled checks totaling $604,199.65.

On January 27, 1970, the Salt Lake Tribune reported that both these men were found guilty of taking "more than a half million dollars from the church offices. . . ."

At about this same time another theft of nearly $72,000 was reported. The Salt Lake Tribune for May 22, 1969, said that “the former manager of the credit union operated by the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints” was arraigned “on two charges of forgery and one of grand larceny in connection with the theft of nearly $72,000 from the LDS Church Office Credit Union.”

Young Becomes Rich

Just after Joseph Smith’s death, Brigham Young made this statement: “I want my support and living by the church hereafter, so that I can give my whole time to the business of the church” (History of the Church, vol. 7, p. 257). In 1851, however, Brigham Young claimed that he did not receive anything from the church. Hubert Howe Bancroft states:

In July 1859 Horace Greeley visited Brigham, who said: “I am the only person in the church who has not a regular calling apart from the church’s service, and I never received one farthing from her treasury. If I obtain anything from the tithing-house, I am charged with and pay for it, just as any one else would . . . I am called rich, and consider myself worth $250,000; but no dollar of it was ever paid me by the church, nor for any service as a minister of the everlasting gospel.” (History of Utah, p. 351)

Although Brigham Young claimed that his riches came because of his ability, the evidence shows that he used his position as President of the Church to become rich. We have already shown that he used tithing funds for purposes of speculation and did not pay interest to the church, and Orlando W. Powers, who served as associate justice of the supreme court of Utah, claimed that Young even had access to funds in the treasury of Salt Lake City:

After the Liberal Party had secured control of the city of Salt Lake, I procured an investigation to be made of the city records, which had been written up by the Mormon city recorders from the earliest time, . . .

The leading officials of the church seem to have had access to the city’s treasury. On one occasion Brigham Young borrowed from the city of Salt Lake $10,000 . . . In 1873 he borrowed $14,000. The records show that other leading church officials at times borrowed from the city. (The Reed Smoot Case, vol. 1, pp. 804-805)

John Cradlebaugh, who served as associate justice of the Second Judicial District in early Utah, made these comments about Brigham Young:

Brigham himself is king, priest, lawgiver, and chief polygamist. . . . He selects for himself the choicest spots of land in the Territory, and they yield him their productions, none daring to interfere.

The timber in the mountains for a great distance from Salt Lake City belongs to him, and it is only by delivering each third load, as he shall order, that the gates are open and the citizens allowed to pass up City creek canon to obtain it. . . . The cattle on a thousand hills exhibit his brand. He fixes his pay—he pays himself. (“Utah and the Mormons,” a Speech of Hon. J. Cradlebaugh, delivered in the House of Representatives, February 7, 1863, as printed in Appendix to the Congressional Globe, February 23, 1863, pp. 121-122)

The historian Hubert Howe Bancroft gives this information:

Perhaps the most remarkable feature in the proceedings of the assembly is the liberality with which valuable timber and pasture lands and water privileges were granted to favored individuals. By act of December 9, 1850, the control of City Creek and canon was granted to Brigham Young, who was required to pay therefor the sum of five hundred dollars. A month later the right to the timber in the canons of the mountain range that lay to the west of the Jordan was bestowed on George A. Smith. To Ezra T. Benson was granted the control of the timber in the canons and mountains at the entrance of Tooele Valley, of the canons between that point and Salt Lake Valley, and of the waters of Twin and Rock Springs in Tooele Valley. To Heber C. Kimball were given the waters of North Mill Creek canon—all these grants, with the exception of the first, being made without consideration. (History of Utah, p. 451)

On page 675 of the same book, Bancroft says that “Brigham was certainly a millionaire, . . .” On page 674 we find this interesting information: “In the records of the internal revenue office at Washington his total income for 1870 is stated at $25,500, in 1871 at $111,680, and in 1872 at $39,952.” Stanley P. Hirshon gives this information concerning Brigham Young: “In Utah he longed for more wives, additional converts, and greater power. In God’s and his church’s name he made the Great Basin his private possession” (The Lion of the Lord, p. 139).

On page 247 of the same book, Hirshon states:

Within months of his migrations to Utah a thousand dollars in debt, Young by his own admission was rich. “Before I had been one year in this place,” he bragged in 1850, “the wealthiest man who came from the mines, Father Rhodes, with seventeen thousand dollars could not buy the possessions I had made in one year!” During the 1860’s the prophet’s personal income averaged $32,000 a year, and in the 1870 census he declared personal property worth $102,000 and real estate valued at $1,010,600.

Brigham Young himself made the following statements:

In the early history of this Church, Joseph Smith was accused of being a speculator. So far as I am concerned, I never denied being a speculator; for in one sense of the word, it is one of the greatest speculations ever entered into by man. In building up the kingdom of God, I am decidedly for self, and so are you. If you wish to obtain wealth, power, glory, excellency, and exaltation of every kind, be for God and truth, and he will give to you more than your hearts can conceive of. (Journal of Discourses, vol. 9, p. 155)

I made a statement yesterday, which I can make again with all propriety—that in my judgment it would take more than I have got to pay my back Tithing, and I have got as much, probably, as any man in the Church. (Ibid., vol. 16, p. 70)

I have about as many buildings as anyone in this Territory, . . . (Ibid., vol. 17, p. 362)

Brigham Young once said:

I remarked that I should count myself a poor hand to dictate this people and hold the position I occupy in the providence of God, unless I was capable of maintaining myself and family without assistance from the Church, though I have had a great deal given to me by the members of the Church. (Journal of Discourses, vol. 6, p. 346)

While it is probably true that a great deal was given to Brigham Young by members of the church, there is evidence to show that Young could be very demanding in his request for gifts. In a letter to Samuel Brannan, Mr. Young stated:

If you want to continue to prosper, do not forget the Lord’s treasury, lest He forget you; for with the liberal; the Lord is liberal. And when you have settled with the treasury, I want you to remember, that Bro. Brigham has long been destitute of a home and suffered heavy losses and incurred great expense in searching out a location and planting the church in this place, and he wants you to send him a present of twenty thousand dollars in gold dust, to help him in his labors. This is but a trifle when gold is so plenty, but it will do me much good at this time.

I hope that Bro. Brannan will remember that, when he has complied with my request, my council will not be equal with me unless you send $20,000 more to be divided between Bros. Kimball and Richards, who like myself are straitened; a hint to the wise is sufficient, so when this is accomplished, you will have our united blessing, and our hearts will exclaim “God bless Bro. Brannan and give him four fold, for all he has given us.”

Now Bro. Brannan if you will deal justly with your fellows and deal out with liberal heart and open hands, making a righteous use of all your money, the Lord is willing you should accumulate the rich treasures of the earth and the good things of time in abundance; but should you withhold, when the Lord says give; your hopes and pleasing prospects will be blasted in an hour you think not of—and no arm can save” (Letter by Brigham Young, “Journal History,” April 5, 1849, pp. 3-4, as cited in Orrin Porter Rockwell; Man of God, Son of Thunder, p. 191).

Harold Schindler made this comment concerning Brigham Young’s letter to Samuel Brannan: “. . . Young’s letter smacked more of a demand than a request” (Ibid., p. 191).

Brigham Young’s worldly example with regard to riches has had a very bad effect on the Mormon leaders who have followed him.

Joseph F. Smith’s Testimony

In the Reed Smoot Case, Joseph F. Smith, the sixth President of the Mormon Church, gave the following testimony:

Mr. Tayler. What is your business?

Mr. Smith. My principle business is that of president of the church.

Mr. Tayler. In what other business are you engaged?

Mr. Smith. I am engaged in numerous other businesses.

Mr. Tayler. What?

Mr. Smith. I am president of Zion’s Cooperative Mercantile Institution.

Mr. Tayler. Of what other corporations are you an officer?

Mr. Smith. I am president of the State Bank of Utah, another institution.

Mr. Tayler. What else?

Mr. Smith. Zions Savings Bank and Trust Company.

Mr. Tayler. What else?

Mr. Smith. I am president of the Utah Sugar Company.

Mr. Tayler. What else?

Mr. Smith. I am president of the Consolidated Wagon and Machine Company.

Mr. Tayler. What else?

Mr. Smith. There are several other small institutions with which I am associated.

Mr. Tayler. Are you associated with the Utah Light and Power Company?

Mr. Smith. I am.

Mr. Tayler. In what capacity?

Mr. Smith. I am a director and president . . .

Mr. Tayler. A director and the president?

Mr. Smith. Yes, sir.

Mr. Tayler. Had you that in mind when you classified the others as small concerns?

Mr. Smith. No, Sir; I had not that in mind.

Mr. Tayler. That is a large concern?

Mr. Smith. That is a large concern.

Mr. Tayler. Are you an officer of the Salt Lake and Los Angeles Railroad Company?

Mr. Smith. I am.

Mr. Tayler. What?

Mr. Smith. President and director.

Mr. Tayler. Of what else are you president?

Mr. Smith. I am president of the Salt Air Beach Company.

Mr. Tayler. What else, if you can recall?

Mr. Smith. I do not recall just now.

Mr. Tayler. What relation do you sustain to the Idaho Sugar Company?

Mr. Smith. I am a director of that company and also the president of it.

Mr. Tayler. Of the Inland Crystal Salt Company?

Mr. Smith. Also the same position there.

Mr. Tayler. The Salt Lake Dramatic Association?

Mr. Smith. I am president of that and also a director.

Mr. Tayler. Are you president of any other corporation there?

Mr. Smith. I do not know. Perhaps you can tell me. I do not remember any more just now.

Mr. Tayler. It would seem that the number has grown so large that it would be an undue tax upon your memory to charge you with naming them all.

Mr. Tayler. What relation do you sustain to the Salt Lake Knitting Company? Did I ask you ask you about it?

Mr. Smith. No, sir; you did not.

Mr. Tayler. The Salt Lake Knitting Company?

Mr. Smith. I am president of it, and also a director.

Mr. Tayler. The Union Pacific Railway Company?

Mr. Smith. I am a director.

Mr. Tayler. Are you an official of any mining companies?

Mr. Smith. Yes, sir.

Mr. Tayler. What?

Mr. Smith. I am the vice-president of the Bullion, Beck and Champion Mining Company.

Mr. Tayler. The Deseret News?

Mr. Smith. No, sir.

Mr. Tayler. You have no business relation with that?

Mr. Smith. No, sir.

Mr. Tayler. Is the Deseret News the organ of the church?

Mr. Smith. Well, I suppose it is in some sense the organ of the church. It is not opposed to the church, at least.

Mr. Tayler. It has for years published, has it not, at the head of its columns, that it is the organ of the church, or the official organ of the church?

Mr. Smith. Not that I know of.

Mr. Tayler. Do you know who own it?

Mr. Smith. How is that?

Mr. Tayler. Do you know who own it?

Mr. Smith. I know who owns the building that it is in.

Mr. Tayler. Who owns the building in which it is published?

Mr. Smith. The church.

Mr. Tayler. The church?

Mr. Smith. Yes, sir.

Mr. Tayler. Tell us what you know about the owners of that newspaper.

Mr. Smith. It has been for a number of years past owned by a company—an incorporated company.

Mr. Tayler. What is the name of the company?

Mr. Smith. The Deseret News Publishing Company.

Mr. Tayler. Do you know who its officers are?

Mr. Smith. Now, it is not owned by that company.

Mr. Tayler. Oh, it is not?

Mr. Smith. No; it is not.

Mr. Tayler. What do you know—

Mr. Smith. But I say for years it was owned by a company of that kind.

Mr. Tayler. What do you know about its present ownership?

Mr. Smith. I presume that the present ownership is in the church.

Mr. Tayler. You suppose the present owner is the church?

Mr. Smith. Yes, sir; the church.

Mr. Tayler. I do not want to have any misconstruction put upon your use of the word “presume” because you do not know that it is so owned?

Mr. Smith. I really do not know so that I could tell you positively.

Mr. Tayler. Who would know?

Mr. Smith. I presume I could find out.

Mr. Tayler. Could you find out before you leave Washington?

Mr. Smith. Perhaps so.

(Reed Smoot Case, vol. 1, pp. 81, 82, 83, 86, 87, 88)

Some time later Joseph F. Smith testified as follows:

Mr. Tayler. In what form does your church have title to the Deseret News property?

Mr. Smith. It owns the deed.

Mr. Tayler. I am speaking now of the newspaper, not the building.

Mr. Smith. The press; yes. I would like to state that when I was asked that question before, Mr. Tayler, I was not aware of the fact that I have since learned from my counsel here that during the trusteeship of Lorenzo Snow the Deseret News plant was transferred from the Deseret News Company to Lorenzo Snow, trustee, in trust. . . .

Mr. Tayler. So that it is now in you as trustee in trust?

Mr. Smith. Now I own it as trustee in trust. Furthermore, I will say that I have discovered since yesterday that there is published on the second or third page of the Deseret News the statement that it is the organ of the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-Day Saints, . . . (The Reed Smoot Case, vol. 1, p. 158)

Over $1,000,000 a Day

Joseph F. Smith's testimony was given about seventy years ago. Since that time the Mormon Church has become even more involved in business. The following is taken from an article which appeared in Newsweek:

The biggest commercial enterprise in the West, excepting only the massive Bank of America in California, is a strictly non-commercial organization called the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-Day Saints, better known as the Mormons. . . . income pours in from the church's vast collection of business and real-estate investments, . . . All told, the cash flow reaches an estimated $1 million a day—enough to finance the Mormon's schools, missionary work, temple-building, and other church expenses, and still leave millions to plow back into other worthy commercial investments. . . .

But even true believers might be surprised by the latest investment, announced last week in New York. The Mormon church purchased (for $1.3 million) a plot of land in the heart of Mid-town Manhattan as a site for a "30-or 40-story" skyscraper—to include a chapel, auditorium, library, church administrative office, along with offices or apartments for public rental. . . . Moyle believes just as firmly that "the church can do anything anyone else can do" in the way of investing. . . . the church . . . is now putting up a brand-new $3.6 million suburban outlet for its Z C M I store. It is building a seventeen-story annex on the Hotel Utah, . . . (Newsweek, "Latter-Day Profits," January 22, 1962, pp. 67-68)

The Mormon writer John J. Stewart seems willing to admit that the church brings in more than a million dollars a day:

Today the LDS Church is in excellent financial condition, having one of the greatest incomes of any private organization in the United States. More than a million dollars per day in tithing and other funds pour continuously into its treasury. (Joseph Smith, The Mormon Prophet, p. 183)

The records which show where the tithing is spent are kept secret from the Mormon people. Dr. Sidney B. Sperry, of Brigham Young University, made this statement:

Dr. Talmage told me that he showed this man [R. C. Webb] even the records where the tithing money went, which is something even you cannot get, except for your own accounts, today, but he felt inspired to do it. (Pearl of Great Price Conference, December 10, 1960, 1964 ed., p. 6)

Neil Morgan wrote the following in an article entitled "Utah: How Much Money Hath The Mormon Church?":

The church has attained—through faithful tithes and shrewd investments and business operations—a spectacular wealth. It is becoming, if it is not already, the richest church of its size in the world. Unquestionably it controls the greatest aggregation of capital in the states of the Rocky Mountain area. . . . this thriving empire of Zion . . . encompasses at least seventy-one major pieces of downtown Salt Lake City commercial property owned by the church, and a hefty number of the city's businesses. . . . Until recent years, the annual public statement by the church itemized disbursements; they soared above $55,000,000. In more recent years disbursements have not been made public. The income of the church has not been announced in any recent public report. . . .

The reticence of the Mormon church to discuss its wealth is understandable. Most Mormons are people of modest income, whose rigid ten percent tithing is not the end of their financial obligation to the church. They give heavily of their time and remaining funds to the construction of temples and churches, and to the church welfare program. A poor Mormon farmer near the hamlets of Moroni, Ephraim or Manti—educated to the high standards of his church—might occasionally bristle at some family sacrifice necessary to meet his tithing if the extent of church wealth were known to him. (Esquire, August, 1962, pp. 86-91)

Bruce R. McConkie, of the First Council of the Seventy, tries to justify the church's involvement in business by stating:

Since the kingdom of God on earth is concerned with temporal as well as eternal salvation, there are of course banking, insurance, industrial, agricultural and other business enterprises in which the Church has an interest. (Mormon Doctrine, 1966, p. 141)

In 1960 the Mormon Church leaders announced some fantastic building plans. The headline of the Deseret News for October 7, 1960, read: "Pres. McKay Opens Conference; Vast Building Plans Disclosed." In the article which followed these statements appeared:

A dramatic multi-million dollar building program for the Church . . . was disclosed Friday.

The program, covering a period of many years, calls for:

—Erection of a 38-story office building on the administrative square bordered by State, South Temple, Main and North Temple Streets.

—Construction of a modernistic 11-story Archives Building on the northeast corner of the intersection of Main and North Temple Streets. . . .

—Building a larger . . . Temple Annex building . . .

—Addition of a 17-story annex to the Hotel Utah . . .

A plaza with a fountain will be centered in the block behind the new Administration Building.

A reflecting pool on an axis across Main Street from the Temple will mirror the historic building.

To tower 500 feet above ground level, the new office building will be the first structure on the block to go up, Mr. Mendenhall said. . . . the skyscraper will provide more than a million square feet of office space, with 30,000 square feet on each floor.

It will require about 20 elevators, Mr. Mendenhall said. . . . (Deseret News, October 7, 1960)

According to the Deseret News for May 6, 1961, the Mormon Church had even greater plans. Not only were they going to build a 38-story office building, but also a new Genealogical building which was "expected to be the largest genealogical research center in the world," and the 11-story Archives Building had been increased to 15 stories.

The church has gone ahead with the skyscraper, but some of the other plans appear to have been either postponed or canceled. The skyscraper is not as tall as originally announced, but it is certainly expensive. The Salt Lake Tribune for December 12, 1971, contained this information:

The new office building of the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints . . . is the biggest building in Utah, and certainly bigger than any building in Idaho or Wyoming . . .

The 28-story building cost $31 million. Setbacks at the 26th level will contain landscaped observation decks. . . . Gardens will be installed on the decks.

The reader will notice that this skyscraper cost over a million dollars a floor.

Wallace Turner gives this information regarding the church's involvement in business matters:

In all particulars, it is difficult to discuss the financial status of the LDS church. Precise information is lacking. The church has a policy of secrecy on financial matters that makes it difficult to check the accuracy of reports picked up from non-church sources. . . .

Most Mormons try hard to pay the tithe . . . They are a devout people, and their religion demands so much else of them that the sacrifice of the tithe can be carried without flinching.

The economic impact of paying is community-wide. Its meaning can be illustrated by one example given to me by a highly reliable source in Salt Lake City. He spoke of a small Mormon settlement with which he was acquainted. He said that of the two score families, seven were on relief and three or four tithed only occasionally, leaving about twenty-nine or thirty families to carry the load. Yet the tithing income to the general authorities in Salt Lake City from this village was about $9000 a year.

This is very important money. It is about all that the relatively poor people of that little settlement could afford for outside investment. When they surrendered this for the good of their souls, it meant that an equivalent amount of work was not going to be done somewhere in the social-economic structure of their village. It meant that they could not invest in new machines, new homes, or even in stock ownership. Such figures must be multiplied many times, and such examples repeated over and over as the church each year amasses its millions and millions.

What happens to all of this money? Only a dim picture filters through to the outside world of the decision-making process. Even the network of pipelines through which the money goes out is not well understood except in the top reaches of the LDS Establishment. . . .

No one outside the top administrative levels of the church can say in detail where the money goes. . . . It costs something to operate the bureaucracy in Salt Lake City, but not so much as might be expected, since so much work is done for nothing, and much of the rest is done at prices far below the going rate for the talent involved. . . .

There are many other church-owned properties in downtown Salt Lake City. By one reliable estimate, the church owns thirty acres of downtown property. Periodically, a struggle can be seen by which the Saints seek to recover a bit of land alienated from their control. The Zions Securities Corporation, a wholly owned subsidiary of the church, takes the lead in these operations. Spokesmen for the church always point out that Zions Securities pays taxes on what it earns.

In addition to the Hotel Utah, the church owns the Hotel Temple Square and the Hotel Utah Motor Lodge. Not long ago it turned the New Ute Hotel into a hostelry for missionaries. It owns the new Kennecott Building on the site of a bank which the church once owned . . .

In addition to the network of chapels, office buildings, and other real estate holdings which are the dominant realty interest of Salt Lake City, the Saints also have a set of business holdings that are essential to supplemental programs of the church. These include a newspaper, the Deseret News, . . . KSL radio and KSL-TV, both wholly owned by the church . . . and interests in KBOI-TV in Boise, KID in Idaho Falls, and KIRO radio and KIRO-TV in Seattle . . .

It is through the Deseret News that the LDS church holds 300,000 shares of stock in the Times Mirror Corporation, publisher of the Los Angeles Times, one of the nation's most important newspapers and by far the best published in the West. There are about 5,500,000 shares of common stock so that the church's ownership amounts to about 5.5 per cent. . . . The Mormon ownership traces back to the purchase by the Times and the News of the Hawley Pulp and Paper Company at Oregon City, Oregon, after World War II. This venerable paper plant was renamed Publishers' Paper, built up, and has become a major source of newsprint. Early in 1965 Times Mirror Corporation exchanged the large block of its stock for the 32.3 per cent of Publishers' Paper owned by the News. This made the LDS church an important stockholder in the Los Angeles Times. In early 1966, the stock was worth approximately $18,675,000. . . .

The church also owns the Deseret Bookstores which provide an outlet for the various publications of the church, as well as for commercially printed books of other publishers. . . . the nineteen-story Kennecott Building was opened in 1965, built by the church to be filled with offices of the copper mining company. . . . The church owns about 60 per cent of Utah and Idaho Sugar Company; . . . The church owned about 15 per cent of Amalgated and traded it for a block of U. & I. owned by Floyd Odum, the investor and business manager. Odum sold his Amalgated, but the church kept its U. & I. so that today it dominates the beet sugar company.

The Mormons own the Beneficial Life Insurance Company. . . . The church also has the Home Fire Insurance Company. . . .

Zion's Cooperative Mercantile Institution (ZCMI) goes back to the foundations of the religious colony in the desert. Today, it is one of the most progressive department stores in Salt Lake City . . . The church owns about a third of the stock, which is enough for control. But the management is not controlled by the church in the same sense that it controls, say, the Deseret News.

In 1952 the church took an interesting step to assure the News of a clear field in the afternoon newspaper market in Salt Lake City. It bought out the competing Telegram which had been operated by the morning Salt Lake Tribune, owned by generations of Catholics and once viciously anti-Mormon. . . . Soon after this purchase, the Tribune and the Deseret News formed a joint printing, circulation and advertising solicitation company—the Newspaper Agency Corporation . . .

At one time the church owned about two-thirds of the stock of the Hotel Utah. This other stock was called in and bought up a year or so before the hotel corporation borrowed $4 million from Salt Lake banks in the 1960s for a modernization program. . . .

Over the years, the Saints have acquired huge ranch properties, some of which are operated as a part of the welfare program, some of which are not. The Canadian ranches include about 80,000 acres near Cardston, Alberta, where thousands of head of feeding cattle are kept. The proceeds go toward costs of new chapels and other building programs in Canada. Originally, the ranches were bought because tithing money from the thousands of Canadian Saints could not be taken out of Canada. . . .

The Deseret Farms in Florida were bought in 1950. This amounted to about 220,000 acres of swampland. The land was drained. The insect pests were destroyed. About 30,000 head of cattle were put for feeding. (The Mormon Establishment, Boston, 1966, pp. 105-119)

However, no one should mistake the underlying truth that in Salt Lake City one must get along with the LDS church in order to be reasonably successful in big enterprise. It is unquestionably true that the major corporations doing business in Utah always have an eye cocked and an ear turned for messages from the First Presidency. . . . There are prominent men in the capital of the Saints who were born into the LDS church but have not set foot inside one of its chapels for decades. Yet, they daily deal in the currency of being Mormons. They would never withdraw from the church, for to do so would be disastrous to their business operations. . . .

When all of these things have been said; when the position of the church against credit and in favor of careful financial management has been enunciated from the top; when the glorious achievements in philanthropy, education and health care of the Saints have been set forth—

After all of these, there still remains a computation printed in the Salt Lake Tribune in May, 1965. Utah's bankruptcy rate jumped in a year by 38 per cent, while the national increase was only 10 per cent. The bankruptcy proceedings in Utah wiped out debts of about $10 million that year. There was one bankruptcy for every 714 persons, compared to one nationally for every 1100 persons. Almost all of these were filed for individuals who were overly extended in installment buying.

Finally, one of the financial experts I talked with said that he sees the Mormon country as a debtor area, kept that way by the heavy financial demands of the church on its people. . . .

One Mormon in an important administrative job said that one year he kept track of the demands on his money. He found that if he had met all of them, it would have amounted to 35 per cent of his income for the church and its related activities.

Another man of equal stature in the same field said he could not imagine such a figure would be accurate. He doubted if it could be much over 15 per cent. Certainly, he said, no higher than 20 per cent.

“Unless,” he qualified, “they were building some new meeting houses in his ward. He would be expected to contribute heavily.”

Yet a different Mormon told of borrowing $500 which it took him a long time to repay. This was the amount he was told to contribute to a new church building. It was proper for him to borrow his contribution but improper for the LDS ward to borrow.

He since has quit going to church. (Ibid., pp. 133-136)

On January 4, 1969, the Church Section of the Deseret News printed an article in which the following appeared:

An agreement in principle to purchase the corporate stock of Deseret Farms of Florida, Inc., has been entered into between The GAC Corp., a multi-million-dollar diversified eastern U.S. firm, and Zions Securities Corp., real estate arm of the Church. . . . The proposed purchase price would be in the neighborhood of $100 million.

The Church property consists of approximately 260,000 acres, including buildings, timberlands, citrus groves and 60,000 head of cattle, and has been up for sale almost three years.

The Deseret News, Church Section, for February 7, 1970, however, announced that the “sale of some 265,000 acres of land owned by Deseret Farms of Florida, Inc., in central Florida has been cancelled.”

The Salt Lake Tribune for November 15, 1970, gave this interesting information concerning the church’s Zions Securities Corporation:

In the founding days of Salt Lake City . . . the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints founded and funded many commercial enterprises.

By the 1920s, however, the church leadership deemed it wise to separate the ecclesiastical from the temporal.

Thus was created Zions Securities Corp., one of several semi-autonomous enterprises that conduct their dealings with the church—at arm’s length distance. . . .

Vice president and general manager of Zions Securities Corp. is 53-year-old J. Howard Dunn, . . .

As the chief operating officer, Mr. Dunn runs Zions as any other executive runs a corporation—more or less free to make his own operating decisions within certain guidelines set down by the church’s First Presidency. . . .

Zions Securities Corp. owns the Kennecott Building, the Salt Lake Industrial Center, the Eagle Gate Apartments and ZCMI and is the developer and owner of the new ZCMI Center. . . .

It owns 20,000 acres of farm land in Florida. It also is owner and manager of the Village of Laie in Hawaii, site of the Church College of Hawaii and the Polynesian Cultural Center.

It also owns substantial acreage in the downtown area of Salt Lake City, . . . Zions employs 130 persons locally. In addition it has about 25 to 30 employe[e]s in Hawaii. . . .

While the corporation is concerned with earnings, this is not an end in itself. Its ownership of lands in the downtown area is in part calculated to assure the qualitative land use and development that will complement the city—the world center for the church. (The Salt Lake Tribune, November 15, 1970)

Zions Securities Corp. recently purchased the fourteen-story J.C. Penney Building: “Though ZUB remains the landlord, it sold the $7.5 million building to Zions Securities Corp., real estate arm of the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints” (The Salt Lake Tribune, November 3, 1971).

On May 28, 1969, the Salt Lake Tribune printed the following concerning a shopping mall planned for the ZCMI block:

ZCMI President Harold H. Bennett Tuesday unveiled preliminary plans for a major downtown shopping mall in the ZCMI block. . . .

Mr. Bennett said ZCMI would be a tenant in the mall and that the development is being handled by Zions Securities Corp., the real estate arm of the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints.

The development will center about an interior mall and will have some 70 stores. It will also provide parking for 2,000 cars. . . . (Salt Lake Tribune, May 28, 1969)

ZCMI had a very good year in 1970. The Deseret News for May 1, 1971, reported:

ZCMI increased its sales by 17 per cent and its after-tax profits by 26.4 per cent last year, the department store’s annual report showed today.

The report said sales amounted to $36,440,268 compared with $31,147,168 in 1969. . . .

The company has main offices in downtown Salt Lake City and branch stores in Ogden, the Cottonwood Mall, and the Valley Fair Shopping Center. It plans to be in a new 163,000 square-foot store in an Orem shopping center by fall, 1972.

Concerning the downtown ZCMI project . . . the company said demolition of old structures should begin this June. . . .

The report was signed by President Joseph Fielding Smith of The Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints, who is board chairman, and by Harold M. Bennett, who is president. (The Deseret News, May 1, 1971)

The plans for expanding ZCMI had originally included “a 20-story office tower,” but the Salt Lake Tribune for August 31, 1971, says that it will be a 27-story building:

Zions Securities Corp. has decided to include construction of a 27-story high-rise office building as part of the ZCMI center construction plan, . . .

An apparent low bid of $36,652,000 for construction of the center, including the tower, was submitted . . .

The tower would provide about 300,000 square feet of office space for lease. Estimated cost of the tower would be about $9 million.

On August 7, 1970, the Salt Lake Tribune reported:

NORTH SALT LAKE—The Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints has signed a letter of intent to purchase the Valley Music Hall for an undisclosed sum. . . .

The theater-in-the-round was originally valued at $1.5 million . . . and was hailed as the largest of its kind in the world. . . .

If the sale is approved, the church would use the building for a regional meeting center of church-related programs, according to N. Eldon Tanner, . . .

The sale also would include 10 acres of land, including a 1,500-car parking lot, and option for 10 additional acres.

The Salt Lake Tribune for November 2, 1971, disclosed that the church’s Zions Securities Corp. owns the Lyric Theater: “The theatre and three adjacent structures housing an electric shop, antique shop and small hotel are owned by Zions Securities Corp.”

Several years ago the Mormon Church purchased the Forest Dale Golf Course property from Salt Lake City. This purchase caused a great deal of controversy at the time, and according to the Salt Lake Tribune, some city officials were displeased with the arrangement:

The Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints sent a check for $6,850 as final payment to Salt Lake City for the Forest Dale Golf Course property, 2400-9th East.

The golf course property was sold in an agreement with the city and Corporation of the President of the LDS Church Jan. 14, 1959. . . .

The golf course was sold to the church by the city because church officials had proposed construction of a junior college on the property. But since that time no construction was ever started and the church later leased the golf course to the city for $4,500 per year. . . .

Mayor J. Bracken Lee told the commission he had always desired that the city buy the golf course back. But, he said, it appears this is going to be impossible. . . .

Public Safety Commissioner James L. Barker Jr.

said the church should build a college or let the city repurchase the land for a similar amount for which it paid. He said it was sold to allow the church to build the college and it certainly would not have been sold to any private developers. (The Salt Lake Tribune, December 16, 1970)

The Salt Lake Tribune for December 16, 1971, announced that the Mormon Church had finally decided to sell the Forest Dale Golf Course back to the city:

The Church [sic] of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints has agreed to sell Forest Dale Golf Course back to the city for $750,000, . . .

The city has been attempting for years to repurchase the nine-hole course. The church bought it from the city in 1959 for $567,680 . . . The city has been renting the facility for $4,500 a year.

The Mormon Church has apparently had some coal properties for the Salt Lake Tribune, December 7, 1971, reported that “Utah Power & Light Co. disclosed Monday that it has signed an option agreement with the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints to buy church coal properties near Orangeville, Emery County.”

The Deseret News, Church Section, for January 9, 1971, printed an article which contains the following statements:

Purchase of a 25,000 square-foot building site near New York City’s Lincoln Center has been announced by the First Presidency. . . .

The First Presidency reported a study is currently in progress to determine the best structural use to make of the site in light of the needs for a church facility and the conditions in the real estate market in New York City in general and in Lincoln Center in particular. . . .

A visitor’s center to acquaint interested persons with the doctrines, practices, cultural activities, and history of the Church, together with the offices of the Eastern States Mission also may be included in the new church facility. . . . church leaders noted their pleasure at having obtained a location in the cultural center of New York City . . .

This is the second time the Church has purchased a parcel of land in downtown New York City. In . . . 1962, the First Presidency announced that the Church had purchased a parcel of land in downtown New York City . . .

The announcement then said a 35 to 40-story building would be constructed for use by the Church . . . as well as leasing the rest of the building for offices and apartments.

The plans for the building didn’t materialize and the property was later sold. (Deseret News, January 9, 1971)

The Mormon Church owns the majority of the stock in the Utah-Idaho Sugar Company, and the President of the Mormon Church also serves as chairman of the board. On January 25, 1971, the Wall Street Journal announced that the Utah-Idaho Sugar Company was to be involved in an antitrust suit:

Three sugar buyers have leveled civil antitrust charges against Amalgamated Sugar Co. and Utah-Idaho Sugar Co. Utah-Idaho Sugar is 50.5% owned by the Mormon Church.

The action was filed in Federal District Court in Salt Lake City . . .

The antitrust action accuses Amalgamated and Utah-Idaho of conspiring to fix the price of sugar and sustain and fix artificial freight charges, in violation of the Sherman Act. . . .

The suit further alleges that the defendant companies, in violation of the Robinson-Patman Act, discriminated, against buyers in 16 Western states by charging “phantom freight” on sugar shipments. Phantom freight is a term used to designate a freight charge that is higher than the actual delivery cost.

According to the complaint, the defendants used a “multiple-basing point system” whereby a buyer in Salt Lake City, for example, paid a prespecified freight charge regardless of where the shipment actually originated. (The Wall Street Journal, January 25, 1971)

The Salt Lake Tribune for June 30, 1971, gave the following information concerning the Utah-Idaho Sugar Co:

Utah-Idaho Sugar Co. announced Tuesday it will enlarge its Moses Lake, Wash., factory, making it the largest in the United States. . . .

Stockholders also approved acquisition of the Prior Land Co. in Yakima, Wash., in anticipation of long-range land development by the company, U-I now has diversified farming operations in Idaho and Washington which have proven profitable above expectations, Mr. Cannon said. . . .

He said that company counsel has not yet fully researched and answered the antitrust action on sugar pricing filed against U-I and Amalgamated Sugar Co., . . .

The company is held 52 percent by the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints. . . .

President Joseph Fielding Smith of the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints was re-elected chairman of the board. President Smith was not at the meeting, however. President N. Eldon Tanner, second counselor in the First Presidency, and U-I vice chairman, conducted the meeting in behalf of the chairman.

Business Week Magazine for March 14, 1970, gave this interesting information concerning Zions First National Bank:

At the intersection of Main and Temple in Salt Lake City stands a heroic-size statue of Brigham Young, arm outstretched. Mormon wags are fond of noting that while the statue’s back is to the temple grounds of the Church of Jesus Christ of the Latter-day Saints, the outstretched arm points to a bank.

The bank is Zions First National, started nearly a century ago by Brigham Young himself, to encourage thrift among the Mormons. With $263-million in assets, the bank is Utah’s third largest, still far behind First Security Bank of Utah . . . Zions First National is owned by Zions Utah Bancorporation, the state’s only one-bank holding company. . . . ZUB has carried diversification about as far as any one-bank holding company, anywhere. It does a modest real estate business in Salt Lake City, leases equipment (mostly to smaller businesses), has a stake in a local savings and loan association, runs a chain of small-loan offices in Utah and Colorado, and owns three industrial banks in Colorado. . . .

The very rich Mormon Church (just how rich is a closely-guarded secret) sold its controlling interest in Zions First National a decade ago to Zions Investment Co., which later became ZUB. It still has minority interest in ZUB, which helps in heavily-Mormon Utah. In rural Utah, where the population is 70% Mormon, Zions First National tends to be the No. 1 bank. And a big slice of church deposits wind up in the bank.

“It definitely gives them an edge on competition,” notes Willard L. Eccles, who with his half-brothers, heads First Security Corp., which owns First Security Bank. “They’ve got five Apostles on their board. We’ve only got two.” . . .

The bank Young founded in 1873 was Zion’s Savings Bank & Trust Co. In 1957, that bank merged with two other church-controlled banks to form Zions First National Bank. In 1960, the Mormon Church sold 50.1% of Zions First National to Zions Investment Co. for $10-million. “Because of the competitive nature of the banking business,” says Simmons, “the church was competing with its own members.” So the church got out of banking, though not out of big-time finance.

The church has an interest in office and apartment buildings, hotels, a department store, a newspaper, several radio and television stations, and even a “sizable” position in the Times-Mirror Corp. in Los Angeles. Next, the church will build a $30-million shopping center in Salt Lake City. . . .

Meanwhile, the bank keeps its close ties to the Mormon Church, doing among other things a fair international business for the church. In fact, the bank has a number of foreign customers, a holdover from the days when European converts deposited money in what was the church bank. “The sun,” quips Simmons, “never sets on a Zions customer.” (Business Week, March 14, 1970, pp. 110, 112)

The Salt Lake Tribune for February 13, 1971, reported that Zions First National “now has 25 banks spanning 350 miles from St. George to Centerville, . . .” Harold B. Lee, a member of the First Presidency of the Mormon Church, is Chairman of the Board of Zions First National Bank. An advertisement published in the Salt Lake Tribune on April 6, 1971, shows that six of the Mormon leaders serve on the board of directors. Their names are as follows: Joseph Fielding Smith (President of the Mormon Church), Harold B. Lee (a member of the First Presidency), Delbert L. Stapley (an Apostle), Ezra T. Benson (an Apostle), Hugh B. Brown (an Apostle), and Gordon B. Hinckley (an Apostle).

Tax Problems

During the past few years the Mormon Church has had some problems over taxation. The Deseret News, Church Section, printed an article which contained this information:

Several blocks from Temple Square . . . stands an undistinguished, flat-topped office building that houses the Church Legal Department.

In this unimposing building, Wilford W. Kirton, general counsel or head legal adviser, supervises a devoted team of lawyers and office personnel who perform a function vital to the advancement of the Church in this modern age. . . .

The Salt Lake office is headquarters for 13 attorneys who are primarily concerned with specialized areas within North America. Two other attorneys are on three-year tours of duty . . .

One of the principal functions of the department deals with the acquiring of property throughout the world in connection with Church buildings and chapel sites. . . .

An increasing field of activity for the department is in the area of taxation.

“The problems of taxation are now becoming an increasingly difficult problem for the Church,” explained Mr. Kirton. “Churches, heretofore, have been exempt from tax. But now, some aspects of tax are being applied to the Church. Laws are changing, making the Church subject to taxation.”

According to Mr. Kirton, the Church has always paid corporate taxes on its business holdings, while stake farms and other welfare projects, as charitable projects, have been exempt. Now, there are increasing cases where welfare farms are being assessed taxes under new laws. (Deseret News, Church Section, January 9, 1971, page 7)

Zions Securities Corp., which is owned by the Mormon Church, seems to be having a dispute with the Internal Revenue Service over taxes. The Salt Lake Tribune reported:

WASHINGTON—Zions Securities Corp., the financial arm of the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints, claims the church was overcharged by $2,825,174.26 by the Internal Revenue Service for the years 1962 through 1967.

A case filed in the U.S. court here involves differences between Zions Securities and IRS on allowances for such items as depreciation, interest, contributions, capital gains, capital loss carryover and property sales and exchanges. . . .

The 1970 IRS notice to Zions Securities also held that in 1962, 1963 and 1964 “you engaged in transactions either with your parent, corporation of the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints, relating to the sale or transfer of real property which were not arm’s length deals.”

Among the items at issue are also a claim that the Commissioner of Internal Revenue erroneously determined that interest paid by the taxpayer (Zions Securities) to the corporation of the president of the Church of Jesus Christ [sic] of Latter-day Saints and Corporation of the presiding bishop of the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints “did not represent interest paid on a bona fide indebtedness.” . . .

One of the biggest items of difference is depreciation deduction claims which for the six-year period are in excess of $1,500,000. (The Salt Lake Tribune, April 30, 1971)

On July 1, 1971, the Salt Lake Tribune printed the following:

BOISE (AP)—Use of land rather than ownership, determines whether it is exempt from the property tax in Idaho, the State Board of Tax Appeals ruled Wednesday.

It said that in the case of farms operated by the welfare program of the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints, the purpose is not simply to provide food for the needy.

“Very little of the commodities produced on the farms in question went directly to needy persons,” the board said.

By far most of them were sold and the proceeds used to pay for operating expenses and repayment of loans used to acquire the farms or cattle, with the balance going into general welfare funds of the church, which might be used to buy clothing or other necessities or for cash distribution to the needy.

The board affirmed action by boards of equalization in Bannock and Bingham counties, which had refused to grant tax exemption for four church-owned farms in Bannock County and six in Bingham County.

LDS Church officials in Salt Lake City said they had no comment on the matter pending further study of the decision.

The board’s ruling could be appealed to district court, either in Ada County or in the county where the owner of the land resides.

The board said that a 1970 law which granted tax exemption for property “directly related to the charitable purpose for which” a charitable organization was formed does not apply to the farms.

“The growing of crops,” the board said, “is not part of the charitable purpose for which the charitable corporations here involved exist, nor is it directly related to such purpose. The crops or the proceeds are, of course, revenue derived from the land.

“While it is indispensable that such revenue must be used exclusively for charity to gain exemption, this is not sufficient. It is the use to which the land is put that determines its status as exempt or non-exempt.

“Here the land was used for commercial purposes and unless such use was directly related to the charitable purposes of providing for the needy, it is not exempt.”

On October 1, 1971, the Salt Lake Tribune printed an article which contained the following:

TACOMA, WASH. (AP)—The question of a tax exemption for properties of the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints in Pierce County has been taken under advisement by the Board of Equalization after an extended hearing.

Jerry Fulton, director of the county assessor’s Exempt Properties Division, said the Mormons’ exemption was denied last May because both local church officials and those at the Salt Lake City, Utah, headquarters refused to report certain financial information.

The information sought would show whether the local properties are paid for and supported entirely by donations or in part by funds from commercial ventures, he said.

Atty. G. Perrin Walker developed testimony from church officers, notably Owen H. Dickson of Enumclaw, president of the Mount Rainier LDS Stake, that church rules forbid the disclosure of any information regarding tithing and welfare offerings . . .

Fulton said all other denominations represented in the county have provided the requested information.

As it stands, the assessor has placed all LDS property in Pierce County on the tax rolls, where it will remain unless the oBard [sic] of Equalization or the courts decide otherwise. (The Salt Lake Tribune, October 1, 1971)

Control of News Media

The Mormon Church's attempt to buy many radio and television stations has caused some concern among the Gentiles. The Deseret News for September 5, 1964, printed an article which contained the following:

A merger of the three electronic communications companies owned or controlled by The Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints into a single company to be called the Bonneville International Corporation, was announced Friday.

The new company includes KSL Television and Radio, Salt Lake City; KIRO Television and Radio, Seattle, Wash.; and WRUL International shortwave stations in New York. It will be headquartered in Salt Lake City. . . .

The Church owns approximately 82 per cent of the stock in KSL Inc., 99 per cent of KIRO, Inc., and 100 per cent of WRUL operations. (Deseret News, September 5, 1964)

Commissioner Robert T. Bartley, of the Federal Communications Commission, gave the following information in a letter written to a man in Utah in 1967:

I am pleased to furnish the following answers to your recent questions about broadcast facilities of the Mormon Church.

I voted against granting consent to the assignment of FM Station WRFM, New York City, from William H. Reuman to International Educational Broadcasting Corporation (of the Mormon Church), . . .

In my opinion, an adequate showing had not been made that operation of the station by the multiple, absentee owner would better serve the public interest than continued operation by the local, individual licensee.

Broadcast facilities in which the Mormon Church has ownership interest are as follows:

Salt Lake City, Utah

KSL (AM) 50,000 watts

KSL (FM) 13 kilowatts

KSL (TV) 33.1 kilowatts, visual
18.2 kilowatts, aural

Seattle, Washington

KIRO (AM) 50,000 watts

KIRO (FM) 16.5 kilowatts

KIRO (TV) 316 kilowatts, visual
158 kilowatts, aural

Idaho Falls, Idaho

KID (AM) 5,000 watts, day; 1,000 watts, night

KID (FM) 41 kilowatts

KID (TV) 100 kilowatts, visual
60.3 kilowatts, aural

Boise, Idaho

KBOI (AM) 5,000 watts

KBOI (FM) 17.5 kilowatts

KBOI (TV) 65 kilowatts, visual
33 kilowatts, aural

New York City, New York

WRFM (FM) 20 kilowatts

Scituate, Massachusetts

WNYW (International Station)

50,000 watts for each of its transmitters.

Pending is an application to move the station to New Jersey and increase power of each transmitter to 250,000 watts.

I have no record of proposed acquisitions by the Church.

The request of KSL for operation with 750,000 watts is involved in a basic policy determination by the Commission which has not been concluded. (Letter from Commissioner Robert T. Bartley, Federal Communications Commission, dated January 3, 1967)

Just a month after Commissioner Bartley wrote the letter cited above, the Salt Lake Tribune announced that the church was considering the purchase of two more radio stations in Kansas City:

Arch L. Madsen, president of Bonneville International Corp., Friday announced acquisition of two Kansas City radio stations pending approval by Federal Communications Commission.

Mr. Madsen said the corporation, broadcast arm of the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints, has contracted for the purchase of KMBC-AM and KMBR-FM. . . . Purchase price was $2,000,000. (Salt Lake Tribune, February 4, 1967)

On July 19, 1967, Dr. John J. Flynn, of the University of Utah, charged that the "public communications media in Salt Lake City is in the hands of a cartel":

WASHINGTON—A University of Utah law professor charged Wednesday that joint business operations of Salt Lake City daily newspapers resulted in "news suppression" and discourages competition by other newspapers.

Dr. John J. Flynn, associate professor of law, testified before the Senate Antitrust and Monopoly subcommittee in opposition to a bill which would grant limited anti-trust exemption to joint commercial operations of newspapers or mergers of competing newspapers. . . .

Since 1952, he said, the Deseret News and the Salt Lake Tribune, Utah's two major newspapers, "have been united in the Newspaper Agency Corporation, a combination the proposed legislation—S. 1312—would sanction." . . .

"The only honest description that can be applied to the Salt Lake City market—measured by the daily and Sunday newspapers, the commercial television stations, and the major network-affiliated radio stations, is that the public communications media in Salt Lake City is in the hands of a cartel," Dr. Flynn asserted. . . .

"The pessimism and fear expressed by this conclusion may seem paranoid, until one realizes the control the ownership of the Deseret News and Tribune exercise over other forms of news media," Dr. Flynn said.

"The Mormon Church-owned Deseret News also owns KSL-TV (Channel 5), a CBS affiliate, and KSL Radio, a CBS radio affiliate.

"The Tribune owns 50 per cent control of KUTV (Channel 2), an NBC affiliate. The remaining 50 per cent is owned by the Glasmann family, the owners of the sole newspaper in Utah's second largest city, Ogden. . . .

"The newspapers involved in the Newspaper Agency Corporation have interlocking ownership with three television stations and a community of economic interest with the other newspaper, the Ogden Standard-Examiner, and one other major radio station," Dr. Flynn charged. . . .

He noted that both newspapers "actively campaigned" editorially for the civic auditorium and sports arena. . . .

He said that several parcels of land in the area where the auditorium was to be constructed were owned by the Mormon Church, "owners of the Deseret News." The owners of The Tribune, he said, are also major landowners in the area and, he said, both papers had an economic interest in passage of the bond issue. (Deseret News, July 20, 1967, p. 12A)

On August 10, 1967, the Deseret News printed an article in which the following appeared:

WASHINGTON—Utah witnesses presented sharply divergent testimony Wednesday before the Senate Antitrust and Monopoly Subcommittee on a proposed bill to limit antitrust prosecutions of joint newspaper printing and business agencies.

Utah Atty. Gen. Phil L. Hansen charged that both Salt Lake City newspapers "have been above the law for some time" and said his office was instituting investigation of both papers.

DENY CHARGE

Both George L. Nelson, legal counsel for the Deseret News, and John W. Gallivan, publisher of the Salt Lake Tribune and president of the Newspaper Agency Corporation which prints both papers, denied Mr. Hansen's charges. . . .

"I think they (Salt Lake City newspapers) have been above the law for some time now," Mr. Hansen charged. He told the subcommittee that his office was instituting investigation of both papers, "with the firm and vigorous intention to bring state or U.S. antitrust cases" against them.

“DESPITE LOSSES”

The Utah attorney also criticized practices of The Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints, which he said would continue to run the Deseret News “despite losses” if the Newspaper Agency Corporation were dissolved. “Let’s keep the profits and the prophets separated,” he declared. . . .

Thursday, Mr. Hansen told a reporter his antitrust suit against Salt Lake City’s major newspapers would include efforts to obtain financial records of the Mormon Church.

Hansen—who claims the Deseret News and Salt Lake Tribune control a communications cartel—said he also will try to gain access through the courts to financial records of two other communications holdings. . . . (Deseret News, August 10, 1967)

Since Hansen is no longer Attorney General for the State of Utah, it is unlikely that anything more will come of this matter.

No Paid Ministry?

In 1851 the Mormon Church claimed that the church leaders did not receive a salary. We know, however, that by 1889 they were receiving a regular monthly salary. In the journal of L. John Nuttall, under the date of January 30, 1889, the following appears: “Bp Preston Called & submitted a report of the committee on Salaries & c. They now suggest that the Tithing of all the Church Employees also the Apostles and clerks be deducted from their salary monthly” (Journal of L. John Nuttall, pp. 349-350 of typed copy at Brigham Young University).

This reference may come as a shock to many members of the Mormon Church who believe that the Apostles do not receive any remuneration for their service to the church. The Book of Mormon condemns a paid ministry in the strongest terms, and for this reason many members of the church are led to believe the Apostles do not receive a salary. Several years ago a man who had worked in the Church Financial Department told us that the Apostles received $12,000 a year from the church. He did not know, however, how much the members of the First Presidency were paid. We would assume that it is somewhat more. Another man who had been employed in the Financial Department told us that the General Authorities could buy things and charge them to the church. He stated that one of the General Authorities had the ceiling lowered in his home and charged the bill, amounting to thousands of dollars, to the church. There seems to be no end to the advantages which the Mormon leaders receive. The Deseret News, Church Section, for May 22, 1971, printed an article which contained this interesting information:

High on the cliffs above Emerald Bay in Laguna Beach sits a modest, yet attractive white frame home.

The view of the Pacific Ocean from the sun deck is almost magnetic . . .

This is the home of the President of the Church when he is in California on Church business or for a needed rest. . . .

In early 1950, the Church purchased the home and an adjoining lot. . . . President David O. McKay used the home when on Church business in California, or just to relax from the heavy responsibilities . . .

Now, President Joseph Fielding Smith and his wife, . . . stay in the home while in the Golden State.

In April, President Smith, accompanied by his wife, his secretary, D. Arthur Haycock and his wife, flew to California for a 10-day working vacation.

Joseph Fielding Smith, the tenth President of the Mormon Church, denied that the Mormon leaders are becoming wealthy from their positions in the church:

The idea that ministers of religion should depend on a salary and donations furnished by their congregations comes out of a long practice in the religious world. It was not so in the beginning when ministers labored with their hands for a living and blessed the people by encouraging words and spiritual counsel. . . . The idea that in the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints the Authorities are breaking the rules and engaging in selfish enterprises for the purpose of getting wealthy, is an erroneous notion. (Answers to Gospel Questions, vol. 3, pp. 76-77)

In spite of this denial, we have good reason to believe that Joseph Fielding Smith and many other Mormon leaders have become very rich because of their positions in the church. Besides receiving a regular salary and other benefits from the church, the General Authorities appoint themselves to head the various businesses owned by the church. Writing in 1947, Joseph H. Weston stated:

Many of the higher officials of the church have risen to their present eminence via a route on which they found themselves handling business affairs of the church. . . .

Generally speaking, income from investments goes toward payment of what salaries the church officials get, . . .

Higher officials of the Mormon church are members of the Boards of Directors of several corporations of national scope, . . .

Against the advice of all his conferees in the church, President Wilford Woodruff again forcibly injected the church into the beet sugar business in 1890. . . .

That was the Utah-Idaho Sugar Company. Some of the General Authorities always have been officials or directors of the sugar firm, which is understandable, considering the holdings that the church has in the business. The church president usually has also been president of the sugar company. At the present time, J. Reuben Clark, a member of the first presidency, and Albert E. Bowen, one of the council of twelve apostles, are members of the company’s executive committee, while George Albert Smith, head of the church, is president of the sugar corporation. (These Amazing Mormons, pp. 49-50)

The positions held in the church by the Mormon leaders seem to have a definite influence on the positions they hold in businesses controlled by the church. For example, on January 24, 1970, the Salt Lake Tribune reported that Joseph Fielding Smith had become “the tenth President of the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints.” Just a month later the Deseret News printed an article which contains this statement: “The election of President Joseph Fielding Smith of The Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints as a director and chairman of the Utah-Idaho Sugar Co. board of directors was announced today” (Deseret News, February 26, 1970).

It is interesting to note that Joseph Fielding Smith was 93 years old at the time he was elected to this position with the Utah-Idaho Sugar Company. As if this is not enough to show the influence of the church upon this company, the same article contained these statements:

Harold B. Lee, first counselor in the First Presidency of the Church was elected a director and vice chairman of the board, according to Rowland M. Cannon, company president.

The board accepted the resignation of Elder Hugh B. Brown of the Council of the Twelve who had been a director and vice chairman. (Ibid.)

The reason for Hugh B. Brown’s “resignation” and Harold B. Lee’s appointment is probably related to a difference of opinion with regard to the church’s anti-Negro doctrine. Brown had served as First Counselor to David O. McKay, the ninth President of the Church, and had tried to get the church to change the anti-Negro doctrine so that Negroes could hold the Priesthood. Joseph Fielding Smith, on the other hand, has stated that Negroes are “an inferior race” (The Way to Perfection, 1931, pp. 101-102). On January 25, 1970, Wallace Turner wrote the following: “When the Mormon presidency passed this week to Joseph Fielding Smith, a 93-year-old strict theologian, it ended for a time the hope of church liberals for a change in the practice of refusing membership in the priesthood to Negroes” (New York Times, January 25, 1970). In the same article Mr. Turner stated: “Among the first acts taken by the new president was the selection of a set of councillors who do not include Hugh B. Brown, a councillor to Mr. McKay and the liberal voice in the hierarchy.”

Joseph Fielding Smith selected Harold B. Lee as his First Counselor, and Lee seems to have taken Brown's position as “a director and vice chairman of the board” at the Utah-Idaho Sugar Company. Joseph H. Weston admits that the leaders of the Mormon Church receive salaries, but he makes it appear that they are underpaid. On page 28 of his book, These Amazing Mormons, he states:

General authorities and officers of the church devote full time to its activities. The remuneration which they receive is a pittance compared with salaries that services of such a high order would command in any other field. . . . the first presidency and the twelve apostles receive salaries that are very small, compared to what similar duties would command in business or industry.

While this statement may have been true when Mr. Weston wrote his book in 1947, it is certainly not true today. In 1964 we published the following information in our book, Mormonism—Shadow or Reality?:

Insurance companies in Utah are required to submit a report showing the salaries that their officials receive. The general public are allowed to examine this report which is kept at the State Capital Building. The Mormon Church owns the Benefic[i]al Life Insurance Company, and many of the General Authorities of the Mormon Church are on the board of directors. We have copied some of the salaries received by leaders of the Mormon Church for the year 1963. They are as follows:

David O. McKay, President of the Church _____	$13,400.00
Hugh B. Brown, Member of First Presidency _____	9,200.00
Henry D. Moyle, Member of First Presidency _____	6,750.00
Nathan Tanner, Member of First Presidency _____	1,700.00
Joseph Fielding Smith, Apostle _____	6,200.00

Henry D. Moyle died during the year, and Nathan Tanner moved into the First Presidency. This is probably the reason that Henry D. Moyle's salary was not as high as it was in 1962 (in 1962 it was $9,200) and also why Nathan Tanner received only $1,700.

Upon the first visit we made to the State Capital Building, in regard to these salaries, we were informed by one of the employees that the salaries paid to the directors of the Beneficial Life Insurance Co. were “unusually high.” We were also told by another employee that insurance companies are the only companies that have to report the salaries received by their directors and officers. Therefore, to our knowledge, there is no way to find out how much the church authorities are being paid by the other companies owned by the church.

As we have already shown, Joseph F. Smith (the sixth President of the Mormon Church) testified that he was President of 12 companies. Now, if the President of the Mormon Church today received a salary from 12 companies, and that salary amounted to $13,400 (as David O. McKay receives from Beneficial Life) he could make $160,800. Then if we were to add on the monthly salary received from the church he could make over $170,000 a year. We are not saying that the President of the Mormon Church makes this amount, however, it would be very possible for him to make this much or even more under the present setup. A mimeographed sheet circulated in 1962 suggested that the Mormon Church may have the highest paid ministry on the face of the earth:

Inasmuch as their services to said institutions are but nominal, and they hold those positions solely because they are Church Officials, would it be presumptuous on our part to conclude that we in the LDS Church have the dubious distinction of having the highest paid ministry on the face of the earth.

(Mormonism—Shadow or Reality? Salt Lake City, 1964, pp. 384-385)

The same mimeographed sheet which we cited in Mormonism—Shadow or Reality? gives some interesting information concerning how the salaries of the Mormon leaders increased at Beneficial Life Insurance Co. For instance, in 1952 David O. McKay was receiving only $5,055.00. By 1957, however, his salary was increased to $7,025.00. In 1960 he received $10,066.00. The next year (1961) his salary jumped to $12,950.00. The mimeographed sheet ends at this point, but our investigation of the records reveals that in 1962 David O. McKay's salary was increased to $13,400.00. At this point we began to publish this information to the world, and in 1966 Wallace Turner included it in his book, The Mormon Establishment, page 104. We wondered if the Mormon leaders would dare to increase their salaries after this information became available to the general public. We have now examined the records for 1969 and find that in the seven year period between 1962 and 1969 the salaries have remained exactly the same. The figures are as follow:

David O. McKay, President of the Church _____	$13,400.00
Hugh B. Brown, Member of First Presidency _____	$9,200.00
Nathan Tanner, Member of First Presidency _____	$9,200.00
Joseph Fielding Smith, Member of First Pres. _____	$6,200.00

The fact that the Mormon leaders received raises in 1960, 1961 and 1962, but never received any after this would seem to show that they were embarrassed by the publication of this information.

In examining the list for 1969 we find that most of the Apostles are listed, and their salaries range from $1,400 to $6,200. The Assistant Apostles receive $1,400. Victor L. Brown, of the Presiding Bishopric, receives $5,000. We do not know how much work the Mormon leaders do for Beneficial Life Insurance Company to receive these salaries, but we doubt that David O. McKay could have done a great deal toward the end of his life. He was 96 years old at the time of his death. He had been very ill in 1969, yet he still received $13,400.00 for his services.

We have not had the time to find out just how many companies the Mormon leaders hold positions in, but we have clipped a few items from the local newspapers which are of interest. The Deseret News for September 5, 1964, stated that the Bonneville International Corporation was formed by a “merger of the three electronic communications companies owned or controlled by The Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints.” In the same article we find the following:

Office[rs] and directors of Bonneville International are President David O. McKay, chairman of the board; President Hugh B. Brown, vice president of the board; President N. Eldon Tanner, consultant; Arch L. Madsen, president; Elder Richard L. Evans, vice president; Elder Gordon B. Hinckley, vice president; Elder Thomas S. Monson, vice president; James B. Conkling, William F. Edwards, D. Lennox Murdoch, David Lawrence McKay, Edward M. Grimm, Stanley G. McAllister; Robert W. Barker, secretary; and Blaine W. Whipple assistant secretary and treasurer. (Deseret News, September 5, 1964)

The church's Hotel Utah also has a board of directors which includes Mormon leaders. In the Deseret News for June 2, 1967, we find the following:

Guiding the destiny of the Hotel Utah and the men behind the $3.1 million improvement program are the hotel's officers and directors.

President David O. McKay of the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints is chairman of the board with President Hugh B. Brown and President N. Eldon Tanner, counselors in the First Presidency, as vice chairmen. . . .

Members of the board of directors of the hotel include President McKay, President Brown, President Tanner, Mr. Backman, Mr. Adams, Bishop Brown, Mr. Lewis, Mr. Jones and Mr. Simmons.

Other directors are President Thorpe B. Isaacson of the First Presidency; LeGrand Richards, member of the Council of Twelve; Antoine R. Ivins of the First Council of Seventy, all of the LDS Church; . . . (Deseret News, June 2, 1967)

Church officials are also included on the board of directors for the church's Deseret News:

Four new members were elected to the board of directors of the Deseret News Publishing Co. Wednesday, said George L. Nelson, president.

They are:

- N. Eldon Tanner, second counselor in The First Presidency,...
- Bishop Victor L. Brown, . . .
- Elder Thomas S. Monson of the Council of the Twelve and former manager of the Deseret News Press.
- Elder Marvin J. Ashton, first assistant general superintendent of the Young Men's Mutual Improvement Association. (Deseret News, May 5, 1965)

On July 2, 1971, the Salt Lake Tribune gave this information:

The Deseret News Publishing Co.'s board of directors has announced the appointment of Gordon B. Hinckley, member, Council of Twelve...as president and chairman of the newspaper's executive committee.

He succeeds Mark E. Petersen, also on the Council of Twelve . . . Mr. Hinckley also replaces Mr. Petersen on the board of directors of Newspaper Agency Corp.

Thomas S. Monson, Council of Twelve, was named vice president and vice chairman of the executive committee, . . .

ZCMI also has a board of directors which includes Mormon leaders. In the Salt Lake Tribune for May 28, 1969, we find the following:

All officers and directors were re-elected. These include David O. McKay, president of the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints, chairman of the board; Hugh B. Brown and N. Eldon Tanner, first and second counselors in the First Presidency of the LDS Church, vice chairmen of the board.

The Mormon Church has also formed a corporation with a board of directors to operate their ranches in Florida and Georgia. The Deseret News, Church Section, January 16, 1965, contained the following:

President N. Eldon Tanner of the First Presidency returned to Salt Lake City Friday after a three-day visit to Melbourne, Fla., where he attended the board of directors meeting of Deseret Farms, Inc. The corporation operates the Church ranches in Florida and Georgia.

On February 7, 1970, the Deseret News, Church Section, reported that "President N. Eldon Tanner" was "vice president of Deseret Farms of Florida."

We have already shown that the Mormon leaders are on the board of directors at Beneficial Life Insurance Company and the Utah-Idaho Sugar Company. A careful examination of the business news reported in the Salt Lake Tribune or the Deseret News for the last ten years would, no doubt, reveal a great deal more about this subject. If the church continues to buy up businesses, there is probably no end to the riches which the Mormon leaders will be able to obtain.

Ralph L. Foster wrote the U.S. Treasury Department asking information regarding the salaries that the Mormon Church leaders receive. They replied that they could not furnish this information unless they had written permission from the persons who filed the returns. Mr. Foster wrote to the Mormon Apostle LeGrand Richards asking for this permission. LeGrand Richards replied on June 28, 1963:

This will acknowledge receipt of your letter of the 23rd. I have no authority to grant you the permission you asked in your letter to contact the Internal Revenue Service in Washington, D.C., to learn the income of the general authorities of the Church. . . . most of the general authorities have made great sacrifice financially in order to accept the call that has come to them to devote their entire time to Church work. We have many employees who are receiving more, considerably more, compensation than the general authorities since their's is a spiritual call. . . .

If the facts were known, there would be no intelligent, successful Latter-day Saint seek for an appointment as one of the general authorities of the Church because of the remuneration they receive as such. (Letter from Apostle LeGrand Richards to Ralph L. Foster, June 28, 1963, photomechanical reprint of the original letter in The Book of Mormon on Trial, between pages 20 and 21)

In a letter to Morris L. Reynolds, LeGrand Richards wrote:

I now have your letter without date just received, asking for information about the allowances to officers of the Church. This information I do not desire to give to you, nor any other information that smacks like it might be used against the Church, . . . (Letter from LeGrand Richards to Morris L. Reynolds, dated September 6, 1966)

It is interesting to note that in his book, A Marvelous Work and a Wonder, page 256, LeGrand Richards states that the "ministers of the churches of the day have justified themselves in preaching for hire, . . ." Now, we know that LeGrand Richards receives a salary from Beneficial Life Insurance Company and probably more from other church businesses. This is in addition to his regular salary from the church. How can he condemn the ministers of other churches when he receives far more compensation than they do? Is it any wonder that he refuses to give any information about "the allowances to officers of the church"?

Church or Business?

The great wealth of the Mormon Church is becoming very apparent. Neil Morgan made this statement:

In Boise, Idaho, a responsible citizen told me: "The Mormons aren't a church anymore; they're a business." (Esquire, August 1962, p. 91)

The Mormon leaders might do well to consider the following statement which was made by Jesus himself: "My kingdom is not of this world: . . ." (John 18:36)

The Bible does not say anything about Jesus trying to build a temporal kingdom or manage large business concerns; instead, it says that he had no place to lay his head.

Now $4 Million a Day?

On page 519 of this book we quoted the Mormon writer John J. Stewart as saying: “More than a million dollars a day in tithing and other funds pour continuously into its treasury.” Since we published this the church had become even more involved in business. Two reporters for the Associated Press, Bill Beecham and David Briscoe, were assigned to “investigate the business interests” of the Mormon Church. According to Utah Holiday, March 22, 1976, “the resulting story won an award from the Society of Professional Journalists—Sigma Delta Chi—as the best single piece of print journalism in Utah in 1975, the story was never carried in Utah newspapers. Utah Holiday Magazine asked Briscoe and Beecham to prepare a new story, using additional material.” We cite the following from that article:

Today, the LDS church is a religious and financial empire with a following approaching 3.5 million people throughout the world, assets in the billions of dollars and an income in contributions and in sales by church-controlled corporations estimated at more than $3 million a day. . . .

There has never been an accounting of modern church income or wealth. The church’s last disclosure of expenditures was made 17 years ago, when it was reported in a church General Conference that $72,794,306 was spent the previous year on the church’s far-reaching religious and social programs.

Asked by two Associated Press reporters why this information is now withheld, President N. Eldon Tanner of the church’s First Presidency said, “It was determined that continued publication of the expenditure was not desirable.” He did not elaborate. Asked about church income, he replied, “I don’t think the public needs to have that information.” President Tanner acknowledges that one of his assignments in the church as First Counselor is to oversee the church’s financial interests. . . .

Church holdings, as outlined in the Associated Press report, would rank the church among the nation’s top 50 corporations in total assets—those with $2 billion or more. Church property includes more than 5,000 mostly-religious buildings throughout the world, a 36-story apartment house in New York City, a 260,000 acre ranch near Disney World in Florida, a village in Hawaii and an estimated 65 acres of business and religious property in downtown Salt Lake City, including a $33 million headquarters building.

Most of the business property is held in the name of either Zions Securities Corp., a real-estate holding company, or the Corporation of the President of The Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints, which is tax-exempt. Zions is a subsidiary of Deseret Management Corp., which oversees several other church businesses. The church’s broadcasting interests are under Bonneville International Corp. Welfare farms and other religious properties are held by a corporation headed by the Presiding Bishop. Several other church corporations and holdings exist independently. . . .

Today, Mormon leaders have direct control of a business empire more extensive than that controlled from the headquarters of any other U.S. church. . . . evidence shows tithes, other contributions and business income from hotels, insurance companies, department stores, book stores, factories, media outlets and other holdings provide more than an estimated $1 billion a year for the church and corporations it controls.

The AP estimate, which does not attempt to measure the church’s net income or profits, includes $550 million in tax-exempt contributions and upwards of $450 million in business income. It is assumed the greater part of business income covers the corporations’ operating and other expenses. . . .

The AP calculations of contributions to the church are based on several different computations and appear to be conservative when compared with amounts received by other religions that tithe and release financial statements to their members. . . .

The AP estimate of gross business income (sales income) exceeding $450 million includes:

- $237 million in sales by Utah-Idaho, Inc., in which the church holds an approximately 50 per cent and controlling interest. Formerly called Utah-Idaho Sugar Co., the firm has controlling interest in Gourmet Food Products, Inc., . . .

- $57 million in sales by five ZCMI department stores, in which the church holds a controlling interest (about 30 percent). . . .

- $79 million in premium and interest income to three insurance companies wholly owned by the church—Beneficial Life Insurance Co. with $21.4 million in assets, Utah Home Fire and Insurance Co. with assets of $23.2 million. Beneficial has the industry’s top rating.

- $16 million in estimated income to the Deseret News as its theoretical share of sales by Newspaper Agency Corp., . . .

- $4 million estimated revenue for KSL Television, . . . Added to this, would be millions more in sales by the church’s other television station KIRO in Seattle, and 11 radio stations . . . owned by Bonneville International Corp., which also has other media-related interests.

- $10 million in sales by Deseret Book, which has seven stores in Utah and Southern California. . . .

- $10 million in estimated sales by Deseret Press, which has 360 employees . . .

- $6 million from Utah Hotel Co., which owns the 406-room Hotel Utah, 186-room Temple Square Hotel and 160-room Utah Motor Lodge. . . . based on current room rates and estimates of occupancy from hotel industry sources. . . .

- $4 million in sales by the non-profit Deseret Industries . . . It has stores in Utah, Idaho, Nevada, Southern California and Arizona and employs 1,340 handicapped persons.

Other church interests include:

- Deseret Gymnasium, a tax-free recreation complex in Salt Lake City, . . .

- Beehive Clothing Mills, with plants in Utah, England and Mexico that manufacture temple clothing and garments worn only by church faithful.

- A 260,000-acre ranch near Disney World, Florida, . . .

- A 36-story apartment building in New York City, which also contains religious facilities.

- A village in Hawaii.

The ZCMI Center, which unlike ZCMI itself is wholly owned by the church. The mall includes the 20-story Beneficial Life office tower.

- A computer firm, which handles church work and outside business.

- Dozens of commercial buildings in Salt Lake City, including the Kennecott, Union Pacific, J.C. Penney’s, Utah Power & Light, Constitution, Medical Arts and Beneficial Life buildings and a 10-story parking garage under construction.

- The total income figures for the church and its corporations reaches $1 billion without considering rental of commercial buildings and apartments, real estate transactions, interest and dividends from investments not made public, large individual donations, or royalties to the Tabernacle Choir for its record albums. . . .

Among the church’s largest holdings in Brigham Young University . . . The university has a campus in Hawaii . . . In addition, the church owns Ricks College...and LDS business college . . . It owns secondary schools with more than 16,000 students in Bolivia, Chile, Mexico, Peru, Paraguay, American Samoa, Western Samoa, Fiji, New Zealand, Tahiti, and Tonga. . . .

Among the church’s newest and least-known holdings is Deseret Trust Co., which has more than $47 million in donations to the church by wealthy individuals, many of them non-members. . . .

Since no accounting is given, it is as difficult to tell where Mormon money goes as to determine how much there is. . . .

The most recent change in the church's financial posture came last year when President Kimball stepped down from the boards of several church corporations, dividing chairmanships of the boards among his two counselors. President Tanner said at the time the move did not signal a decreased involvement of the church in business affairs but an increased need for its top leaders to devote more time to spiritual duties. (Utah Holiday, March 22, 1976, pp. 4-7, 9-11)

The Salt Lake Tribune for July 2, 1976, reported that Mormon President Spencer W. Kimball "was asked on the NBC Today show about an Associated Press estimate last year that the church and corporations it controls bring in more than $3 million a day. . . .

"He neither disputed nor confirmed the AP estimate that would place the church among the nation's top 50 corporations in total assets."

In 1980 Michael Parrish published an article which contained this statement:

. . . the AP came up with revenues of some $3 million a day in 1975. David Briscoe, of the AP news team, recently said he thought the figure would exceed $4 million today. (Rocky Mountain Magazine, January-February 1980, p. 23)

Only a "Modest Living Allowance"?

On page 525 of this book we pointed out that "Besides receiving a regular salary and other benefits from the church, the General Authorities appoint themselves to head the various businesses owned by the church." When Apostle Mark E. Petersen was asked if it was true that the General Authorities "receive a very good salary," he replied:

You ask if we receive "a very good salary." We receive no salary at all. Those of us who still do not operate our own private businesses do receive a very modest living allowance, in many cases not half of the amount that we pay to many of our hired office people. . . . I receive a small living allowance, only a fraction of the amounts paid to some of our hired help. (Letter written by Apostle Mark E. Petersen, dated June 17, 1977)

While we have no way of knowing about Mark E. Petersen's finances, new evidence has come to light which shows that the past two Presidents of the Church (Joseph Fielding Smith and Harold B. Lee) were very wealthy at the time of their deaths. Writing in New West, Jeffrey Kaye reveals:

. . . despite claims that the few paid officials are given mere "living allowances," records show that past church leaders were not exactly just "getting by" at the time of their deaths.

For instance, Harold B. Lee, the head of the church before Spencer Kimball, left an estate worth almost $711,000 when he died in December, 1973. At the time of his death, he was drawing payroll checks from the church, a church-owned insurance company and a church-controlled department-store chain. According to Salt Lake County probate files Lee's predecessor, Joseph Fielding Smith, left a Utah estate valued at just short of $1 million when he died in 1972. (New West, May 8, 1978, p. 39)

The Mormon scholar D. Michael Quinn has done some very interesting research concerning the wealth of the General Authorities. In his unpublished Ph. D. dissertation for Yale University he wrote:

. . . estate executor George Q. Cannon recorded in his journal that members of the Quorum of the Twelve Apostles were critical of Young's liberal use of church funds (even though some of that use may have been for church projects):

Some of my brethren, as I have since learned since the death of President Brigham Young, did have feelings concerning his course. They did not approve of it, and felt opposed, and yet they dare not exhibit their feelings to him, he ruled with so strong and stiff a hand, and they felt that it would be of no use. In a few words, the feeling seems to be that he transcended the bounds of the authority which he legitimately held. I have been greatly surprised to find so much dissatisfaction in such quarters. It is felt that the funds of the Church have been used with a freedom not warranted by the authority which he held . . .

That feeling finally resulted in a decision by the Quorum of the Twelve Apostles, ruling in the absence of an organized First Presidency, on January 4, 1882 to establish a fixed salary for every one because they did not want to allow "any man in the Church President or Apostle to draw funds from the Church without limit for their own use or any other purpose."

Although that decision was consistent with revelations providing for financial support of the hierarchy, it nevertheless challenged a strong antipathy to salaried ministers that dated back to the Joseph Smith era. . . . "Hireling priest" was an epithet the Mormons frequently hurled at the ministers of the rest of Christendom, and it was a designation the General Authorities were reluctant to have applied to themselves. . . .

Despite the discomfort of many of the General Authorities, a salary or allowance system continued without significant interruption from 1882 onward. . . .

Another source of personal income to the hierarchy derived from General Authority leadership in business corporations. It has been observed that men did not receive financial remuneration for serving as officers and directors of church business corporations during the Brigham Young period. Once the federal campaign destroyed Mormon political hegemony, however, it became more common for General Authorities to be paid for their services to church-owned, controlled, or affiliated business enterprises. By the twentieth century, financial remuneration for General Authorities serving as officers and directors in such firms was the general policy. . . .

The best illustration of the corporate side of General Authority finances is George Albert Smith, an apostle from 1903 to 1945, and President of the Church from then to his death in 1951. As a member of the Quorum of the Twelve in 1915, for example, he was a director of three church enterprises (Utah Savings and Trust Company, Utah Home Fire Insurance Company, and ZCMI) for which he received a total of $1,260 in directors fees out of his annual income of $5,088. His allowance from the church in that year was $1,800. This same general proportion continued throughout his service as an apostle, but in the first year of his service as President of the Church his income jumped more than 500%. This increase was a direct result of George Albert Smith's sudden advancement to corporate positions that were functions of his new role as President of the Church. An undated statement indicates that as President of the Church George Albert Smith's monthly income of $2,307.85 came from the following sources:

General Authority allowance	$650.00
Utah State National Bank	225.00
Zions Savings Bank	150.00
U-I Sugar Company	307.85
Beneficial Life Insurance Co.	300.00
Heber J. Grant & Company	150.00
Utah Home Fire Insurance Co.	200.00
Hotel Utah Company	75.00
ZCMI	250.00

Because corporate leadership in church business enterprises by General Authorities was a function of their position in the hierarchy, the opportunities for financial improvement were the highest for the President of the Church, and decreased at subordinate echelons.

A less stratified and less formal source of income became available to General Authorities because their positions in the hierarchy gave them a status of trust within the Mormon community. Many businesses that were not controlled by the church seemed to include General Authorities on boards of directors because of the prestige these men lent to the organizations, rather than because of the amount of stock the man held or his business acumen. Another source of income derived from the position of the General Authorities as doctrinal and ecclesiastical experts within Mormonism. . . . Not all General Authorities who did publish actually sought or received financial remuneration for their writings, but for those who did, the income could be substantial. When Joseph Fielding Smith died, after a publication career that had begun even before his appointment as an Apostle in 1910, his uncollected royalties (apparently for a six month period) were $9,636.48. Relatively few of the General Authorities obtained these indirect benefits, but membership in the Mormon hierarchy made such opportunities possible. (“The Mormon Hierarchy, 1832-1932: An American Elite,” unpublished Ph.D. dissertation, Yale University, May, 1976, pp. 127-133)

On page 149 of the same dissertation, Dr. Quinn reveals:

Although by now it is evident that extreme wealth for Presidents of the Church was almost axiomatic, there were still differences of degree. The greatest wealth in the period 1914-1972 centered in a father-son combination of direct descent from the founding Mormon family of Smiths. Joseph F. Smith (1918) died with a net worth of $415,180, and in consideration of the shrinking dollar over the century, his wealth was relatively greater than his son’s, Joseph Fielding Smith (1972), which was $509,030 (in liquid assets). Considering that both men were employed in clerical positions when they entered the hierarchy at twenty-six and thirty-three years of age, respectively, their rise to wealth was inseparably connected with the opportunities given them by their positions in the hierarchy.

In a footnote at the bottom of the same page, Quinn informs that “Joseph Fielding Smith gave a total of $210,000 in cash gifts during the two years prior to his death, which were subject to probate and inheritance tax due to Utah’s then current law about gifts in anticipation of death. See his estate file at Salt Lake County Probate Clerk’s office.”

Mormon Financial Empire Continually Expanding

On July 3, 1976, the Salt Lake Tribune published an article containing the following:

LAIE, Hawaii—The Polynesian Cultural Center here, the most popular paid tourist attraction in the Pacific, is enlarging its facilities to include a full 40 acres and three major new buildings.

A non-profit organization of The Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints, the complex was visited by more than 850,000 persons last year.

On December 10, 1980, the Tribune reported:

The Polynesian Cultural Center plans to file suit in federal court in Hawaii to challenge the Internal Revenue Service’s revocation of its tax-exempt status.

Under ownership of the Mormon Church, the center had been considered tax-exempt until the IRS revoked that status in spring 1979. . . . the suit seeks a refund of $591,000 in taxes and interest the center paid for the 1978 tax year alone.

On March 4, 1979, the Tribune revealed:

The purchase of the block immediately north of the Salt Lake City-

County Building for a proposed development project, first reported Jan. 25 in The Tribune, has been consummated.

The Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints, through its real estate arm, Zions Securities Corp., has announced purchase of the 6.9 acres within the block—now mostly a parking lot.

Cost of the acquisition was not disclosed, but the property is valued between $4 million and $5 million.

In January, The Tribune learned that partners Paul Mendenhall and David Horne of HOMCO Investment Corp. were near to closing a deal to purchase the block . . .

HOMCO was involved in the negotiations with an unnamed backer, now identified as Zions Securities Corp. . . .

Because the remaining 3.1 acres in the block are owned by several different parties, HOMCO has asked the Salt Lake City Redevelopment Agency to help it secure the rest of the block through the condemnation process, if necessary.

On September 17, 1980, this interesting item appeared in the Salt Lake Tribune:

The Mormon church will not grow tobacco on a 2,755-acre tobacco farm it bought near Hopkinsville for more than $4 million, outbidding Texas oil billionaire Nelson Bunker Hunt in the process.

The church offered $4,275,000 for the property, topping Hunt’s best offer by $25,000. . . .

Fears said the church will continue to raise wheat, soybeans and corn, with the profits going “to the church treasury in Salt Lake City.”

More on Control of Media

On page 524 of this book we printed a letter from Robert T. Bartley, of the Federal Communications Commission, which listed some radio stations owned by the church in Boise, Idaho. Al G. Vuylsteke, General Manager of KBOI AM & FM, has indicated that the church no longer owns these stations. This does not mean, however, that the church is getting out of the communications field; on the contrary, since 1972 it has bought stations in larger cities such as Kansas City and Los Angeles. The church owns its radio and television stations through a subsidiary known as Bonneville International Corp. On July 15, 1975, the New York Times carried a full-page advertisement concerning the Mormon Church’s radio and television stations. It was claimed in this advertisement that the church’s stations WRFM and KBIG were “the two most listened to FM’s in the nation.” A list of twelve radio and television stations appeared in this same advertisement.

By 1977 the church had acquired all of the FM stations that it was possible to legally hold. The Salt Lake Tribune for January 26, 1978, reported:

KSL-FM radio station formally became a property of Simmons Family Inc., Wednesday with its transfer from Bonneville International Corp. . . .

Bonneville International is a wholly owned subsidiary of the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints, . . .

Bonneville International sold the station to comply with FCC multiple ownership regulations which limit holdings by any one corporation to seven FM stations.

Bonneville wanted to buy KAFM in Dallas, Tex. It had seven FM stations. So, it put KSL-FM on the block last spring.

Mormon Church Historian Leonard J. Arrington and his assistant Davis Bitton give this important information:

Through a subsidiary corporation, Bonneville International, the church owns thirteen commercial radio and television stations. These include KSL-AM and KSL-TV in Salt Lake City; WRFM in New York; KBIG and KBRT-AM in Los Angeles; KIRO-AM and KIRO-TV and KSEA-FM in Seattle; WCLR in Chicago; KMBZ-AM and KMBR-FM in Kansas City; KAFM in Dallas; and KOIT-FM in San Francisco. In addition to the holdings of Bonneville International, the church owns three noncommercial educational stations. KBYU-TV and KBYU-FM are operated by Brigham Young University, and KRIC-FM by Ricks College. A subsidiary of Bonneville International, BEI Products Inc., with headquarters in Los Angeles evaluates, creates, and produces commercial entertainment films, television specials or packages, and other productions. Another subsidiary, Bonneville Productions, produces commercials and public service announcements.

The Public Communications Department, which is involved in Mormon broadcasting activities, is an international network, with 1,200 stake and mission public communications directors and coordinators. Charged with spotlighting the church—its people, programs, and beliefs—before the eyes of the world via the news media, motion pictures, and television and radio programming, the department designs and produces displays for the thirty or more Latter-day Saint visitors' centers, supports the production of church pageants and dramas, and sponsors a variety of television family programs.

Whether the church's system of communications—book publishing, periodicals, radio, television—is vast and powerful or moderate and reasonable depends on one's point of view and the basis of comparison. (The Mormon Experience, 1979, pp. 270-71)

Since the Mormon Church has almost unlimited funds to work with, it is able to exert a great deal of influence throughout the world. For example, the church has recently spent millions of dollars advertising in the Readers Digest. The following appeared in the San Francisco Chronicle, April 13, 1979:

It takes a lot of money to advertize in the Readers Digest—about $65,000 a page—but consider what you're getting: a shot at one-quarter of the homes in America. . . .

One advertiser that bought this message is the Mormon Church, which ran a 12-page detachable insert in the current issue of the Digest—the April issue—to explain the basic beliefs of the Mormons. The $800,000 ad expresses some thoughts which are close to the Digest's philosophy.

35. Speculation, Illegal Banking and Counterfeiting

In 1837 the Messenger and Advocate, a Mormon publication, reprinted an article written by S. A. Davis, Editor of The Glad Tidings, and Ohio Christian Telescope. In this article Mr. Davis said that the Mormons “seem to have too much worldly wisdom connected with their religion—too great a desire for the perishable riches of this world—holding out the idea that the kingdom of Christ is to be composed of ‘real estate, herds, flocks, silver, gold,’ &c. as well as of human things” (Messenger and Advocate, vol. 3, p. 490).

Speculation

Joseph Smith made the following statement concerning conditions in the church in 1837:

At this time the spirit of speculation in lands and property of all kinds, which was so prevalent throughout the whole nation, was taking deep root in the Church. As the fruits of this spirit, evil surmisings, fault-finding, disunion, dissension, and apostasy followed in quick succession, and it seemed as though all the powers of earth and hell were combining their influence in an especial manner to overthrow the Church at once, and make a final end. . . . many became disaffected toward me as though I were the sole cause of those very evils I was most strenuously striving against, and which were actually brought upon us by the brethren not giving heed to my counsel. (History of the Church, vol. 2, pp. 487-488)

While it is true that a “spirit of speculation” filled the church, this reference makes it appear that Joseph Smith was not involved. Actually, Smith was as deeply involved as anyone. Ebenezer Robinson made this statement:

A spirit of speculation was poured out, and instead of that meek and lowly spirit which we felt had heretofore prevailed, a spirit of worldly ambition, and grasping after the things of the world, took its place. Some farms adjacent to Kirtland were purchased by some of the heads of the church, mostly on credit, and laid out into city lots, until a large city was laid out on paper, and the price put up to an unreasonable amount, ranging from $100 to $200 each, according to location. (The Return, vol. 1, no. 7, July, 1889, typed copy)

Robert Kent Fielding made these comments in his Ph.D. dissertation for Indiana University:

Even as late as 1835, . . . in the Kirtland area, there were only twenty-one Mormons who held property of their own. . . . Some however, had evidently bought farms or sites with an eye open to the possible appreciation of land values as population grew. Joseph Smith invested in four acres containing twenty-four rods of road across from his store on the heights, . . . for four hundred dollars; . . .

The Mormon stress on gathering heightened the speculative fever.

. . . The most important sales in 1836, were made to five persons who evidently intended to profit by selling housing lots to the incoming Saints. It was for them a season of preparation. First to act was John Boynton, apostle of the Church. . . .

Next to act was Jacob Bump, the master mason, . . .

The third person to prepare himself for subdivision was John Johnson. . . .

Joseph Smith Jr., Prophet to the Church, was the next person to make preparations to sell inheritances to the incoming Saints. He already owned more than one hundred and forty acres of land adjoining the temple besides his four acres of business property on the Chillicothe Road. Now he associated himself with Jacob Bump and Reynolds Cahoon to make two more large acquisitions. The first was from Peter French. The old farmer, after selling out to the Mormons . . . had moved, . . . to a new site . . . On October 4, he again profited from the Church as he signed a contract with Smith and his associate, agreeing to sell his two hundred and forty acres of land for nine thousand seven hundred seventy-seven dollars and fifty cents. Barely two weeks passed before these associates bought again, this time from non-Mormon Alpheus Russell. . . . When he was offered twelve thousand nine hundred and four dollars for his one hundred and thirty-two acres, it was more than his puritanism could stand and the Yankee in him succumbed to the offer. The partners were evidently speculating, for both of these purchases were made on mortgage contracts which covered the full purchase price. Smith made two other smaller purchases by himself. He bought an eight-acre farm from Samuel Canfield for one hundred and sixty dollars and recorded it in the name of his wife, Emma, and an additional thirteen acres in a different location, from the same seller, for five hundred dollars.

The Prophet’s uncle, John Smith, in association with Jared Carter and Oliver Granger, was the last of the five big land purchasers. . . .

As the Saints gathered in Kirtland, the tempo of land sales gradually increased. There was no uniformity of prices; they ranged from a low of twenty dollars per acre to a high of thirty-five hundred dollars which Joseph Smith paid to Jacob Bump . . . One of the higher prices was the eight hundred dollars which Smith charged David Elliott for a half acre plot. Likely many lands were bargained for which never reached the stage of deed records. In view of the recorded prices, the Prophet’s warning to his congregation, delivered in December, to beware of falling victim to speculators and extortioners, was eminently justified. How he accounted for his own conduct is not a matter or [of?] record.

Through the early months of 1837, Smith was busy trying to effect the largest real estate promotion of them all in order to bring some kind of regularity into his rapidly growing but poorly organized city. (“The Growth of the Mormon Church in Kirtland, Ohio,” unpublished Ph.D. dissertation by Robert Kent Fielding, Indiana University, 1957, typed copy, pp. 202-204, 206-208, 211-212)

Fawn M. Brodie gives this interesting information:

To the chaos of Ohio’s banking system was now added Joseph’s Safety Society. . . . most of the subscribers paying in Kirtland boom-town lots at five and six times normal value. According to the Painesville Telegraph, Joseph estimated his own land in Kirtland at $300,000, and stated that the whole capital stock of the bank was comprised in land lying within two square miles. (No Man Knows My History, New York, 1957, p. 195)

The Mormon writer Max Parkin made these statements concerning the speculation in property:

This trend towards making excessive profit from speculation in the buying and selling of lands in Kirtland was indulged in by prominent leaders of the church as well as others, which became a factor in their dissidence and distrust. (Conflict at Kirtland, BYU, 1966, p. 286)

That Joseph Smith participated in the buying and selling of land in Kirtland there can be no doubt; . . . However, the point that is not clear is Smith's motive for doing so. . . . It could well be that Smith's land purchases were made for the Church or to provide for the needs of the Saints rather than for personal gain, as Fielding infers. (Ibid., p. 288, footnote)

The Mormon Apostle Parley P. Pratt evidently did not feel that Joseph Smith's motives were right in these transactions, for he wrote a letter to Joseph Smith in which he censured both Smith and Rigdon "in regard to certain business transactions." Max Parkin states:

The spirit of speculation—and the problems caused by it—also had an effect upon Parley P. Pratt, who admitted that a complaining spirit temporarily alienated him from the Prophet Joseph. . . .

While in the extreme of his anxiety and distrust on May 23, 1837, Parley wrote a letter to Joseph Smith severely criticizing him for the course he and Rigdon had taken in certain business matters associated with the current speculation in property. . . .

After his defection from the Church, Warren Parrish sent a copy of Pratt's letter to the editor of Zion's Watchman, . . . Richard Livesey, . . . had the letter reprinted in his anti-Mormon pamphlet in Preston, England, in 1838. (Conflict at Kirtland, pp. 287, 288, 290)

This letter was dated May 23rd, 1837. Max Parkin has reproduced it from Livesey's printing in his Conflict at Kirtland, pp. 372-373:

Pres. J. Smith, Jr.

Dear Brother,—As it is difficult to obtain a personal interview with you at all times, by reason of the multitude of business in which you are engaged, you will excuse my saying in writing what I would otherwise say by word of mouth.

Having long pondered the path in which we as a people, have been led in regard to our temporal management, I have at length become fully convinced that the whole scheme of speculation in which we have been engaged, is of the devil. I allude to the covetous, extortionary speculating spirit which has reigned in this place for the last season: which has given rise to lying, deceiving and taking advantage of one's neighbor, and in short, every evil work.

And being as fully convinced that you, and President Rigdon, both by precept and example, have been the principle means in leading this people astray, in these particulars, and having myself been led astray and caught in the same snare by your example, and by false prophesying and preaching, from your own mouths, yea, having done many things wrong and plunged myself and family, and others, well nigh into destruction, I have awoken to an awful sense of my situation, and now resolve to retrace my steps and get out of the snare, and make restitution as far as I can.

And now dear brother, if you are still determined to pursue this wicked course, until yourself and the church shall sink down to hell, I beseech you at least, to have mercy on me and my family, and others who are bound with me for those three lots (of land) which you sold to me at the extortionary price of 2000 dollars. For if it stands against me it will ruin me and my helpless family, as well as those bound with me: for yesterday president Rigdon came to me and informed me, that you had drawn the money from the bank, on the obligations which you held against me, and that you had left it to the mercy of the bank, and could not help whatever course they might take to collect it; not withstanding the most sacred promise on your part, that I should not be injured by those writings. I offered the three lots for the writings; but he wanted my house and home also.

Now, dear brother, will you take those lots and give me up the writings, and pay me the 75 dollars, which I paid you on the same? Or will you take the advantage of the neighbor because he is in your power? If you will receive this admonition of one who loves your soul, and repent of your extortion and covetousness in this thing, and make restitution, you have my fellowship and esteem, as far as it respects our dealings between ourselves.

But if not, I shall be under the painful necessity of preferring charges against you for extortion, covetousness, and taking advantage of your brother by an undue religious influence. For it is this kind of influence which led us to make this kind of trades in this society. Such as saying it was the will of God that lands should bear with such a price; and many other prophesyings, preachings and statements of a like nature.

Yours with respect,
P. P. Pratt

In August, 1838, the Mormon Church published a letter in which the Apostle Parley P. Pratt claimed that the letter cited above was "not a true copy" of the one he had written (see Elders' Journal, pp. 50-51). His statement can hardly be taken seriously, however, since he admits that he did "write a letter in great severity and harshness censuring them both [Joseph Smith and Sidney Rigdon], in regard to certain business transactions . . ." The Apostle Parley P. Pratt went on to state:

This letter was intended as a private admonition, it was never intended to be made public. But I have been long convinced, and have freely acknowledged both to these men and the public, that it was not calculated to admonish them in the spirit of meekness, to do them good, but rather to injure them and wound their feelings, and that I much regretted having written it, I have asked their forgiveness, and hereby do again. (Elders' Journal, pp. 50-51)

The Apostle Parley P. Pratt's original letter was dated May 23, 1837. It is interesting to note that just six days later the Apostle Orson Pratt (Parley P. Pratt's brother) and Lyman E. Johnson accused Joseph Smith of "lying and misrepresentation." Chad J. Flake, Special Collections Librarian at Brigham Young University, has published the following document:

To the Bishop & his council in Kirtland, the Stake of Zion.

We prefer the following charges against Pres. Joseph Smith, Jr. viz. for lying and misrepresentation. Also for extortion—And for speaking disrespectfully against his brethren behind their backs.

Lyman E. Johnson. Orson Pratt. Kirtland, May 29th 1837. (Brigham Young University Studies, Summer 1971, p. 327)

The Kirtland Bank

John Whitmer, one of the witnesses to the Book of Mormon, made this statement concerning conditions in Kirtland:

In the fall of 1836, Joseph Smith, Jun., S. Rigdon and others of the leaders of the Church at Kirtland, Ohio, established a bank for the purpose of speculation, and the whole Church partook of the same spirit; they were lifted up in pride, and lusted after the forbidden things of God, such as covetousness, and in secret combinations, spiritual-wife doctrine, that is plurality of wives, and Gadianton bands, in which they were bound with oaths, etc., that brought division and mistrust among those who were pure in heart, and desired the upbuilding of the Kingdom of God. (John Whitmer's History, chapter 20, pp. 21-22)

William E. McLellan, who had been an Apostle, made this statement concerning the Kirtland Bank:

Soon, therefore, it is determined that a Kirtland Bank must be established, to hold their treasures; and to aid them to get more. So eager were they, and so sanguine of success, that they did not even wait to get a charter from the State, but seemed to think that everything must bow at their nod—thus violating the laws of the land in which they live, which in the end brought upon them swift destruction. (Ensign of Liberty, Kirtland, Ohio, March, 1847, p. 7)

This statement concerning the Kirtland Bank appears in Joseph Smith's History:

On the 2nd of November the brethren at Kirtland drew up certain articles of agreement, preparatory to the organization of a banking institution, to be called the "Kirtland Safety Society." President Oliver Cowdery was delegated to Philadelphia to procure plates for the institution; and Elder Orson Hyde to repair to Columbus with a petition to the legislature of Ohio, for an act of incorporation, which was presented at an early period of their session. . . . (History of the Church, vol. 2, pp. 467-468)

Robert Kent Fielding says that "Even under the most advantageous conditions, the year 1837 was no proper time to start a bank. Even a cursory reading of the newspapers of the time indicates the fact that the country was far extended on credit and that there was a desperate shortage of specie—conditions portentous of depression."

However this may be, Oliver Cowdery "succeeded at a great expense in procuring the plates" which were to be used to print the bank money. Orson Hyde, however, was not successful in obtaining the charter. Joseph Smith made this statement concerning Hyde's failure to obtain it:

... because we were "Mormons" the legislature raised some frivolous excuse on which they refused to grant us those banking privileges they so freely granted to others. (History of the Church, vol. 2, p. 468)

Robert Kent Fielding, on the other hand, claims that the reason the Mormons did not obtain a charter was "by no means as simple as Smith indicated":

The reason the Mormons did not get their charter is by no means as simple as Smith indicated. As a matter of fact, the legislature did not refuse the charter; there is no evidence to sustain the idea that it was even asked to grant one. No bills to establish a Mormon bank were ever considered by the legislature. It is conceivable, as Smith suggests, that religious prejudice was present. It may have operated to prevent the introduction of a petition for a charter, but it is not likely. Prejudice seems more like a ready excuse than a valid reason. The county delegates to the legislature were Senator Ralph Granger of Fairport and Representatives Seabury Ford of Burton, and Timothy Rockwell of Painesville. . . . Political prejudice is another possible inference for refusal to ask for a charter. All of the delegates were Whigs whereas the Mormons were Democrats. However, the legislature itself had a Democrat majority in each house. It seems most likely that they persuaded Hyde of the uselessness of submitting a petition in view of the control of the legislature by the anti-bank Democrats. In any case, no new banking privileges were granted to any petitioners by the state legislature in its 1836-37 session.

Even if the legislature had been willing to grant charters to any of the seventeen applicants or to the Mormons, it is unlikely that they could have acted in time to help the Mormon situation. Their sessions commenced on the fifth day of December and ended the following April third. Under the best of circumstances it is not likely that a charter could have been obtained before late March when most bills were passed. The Mormons could not wait. ("The Growth of the Mormon Church in Kirtland Ohio", pp. 179-181)

Max Parkin states that Willis Thornton "said that there was one charter issued during that session by the legislature." But whether there was one charter granted or none—as Fielding indicates—Joseph Smith's statement that they were "freely granted to others" is certainly not true. And since at least sixteen applications were turned down, it seems unfair of Joseph Smith to charge the legislature with religious prejudice.

Be this as it may, the Mormons were in trouble when they found that they could not obtain the charter. Robert Kent Fielding makes this statement on page 181 of his dissertation:

When news came that no charter was to be had, the Mormon situation became desperate. The old problems remained and the expenses already undertaken in anticipation of forming a bank offered new ones. Quick action seemed necessary and a decision was made to put an end to [to?] the projected Kirtland Safety Bank Company and form, in its place, a joint stock association for the management of the common concerns of the Stock holders.

Max Parkin gives this interesting information:

To avoid wasting the money expended on the production of the bank plates the necessary prefix, "anti," and suffix, "ing Company," added to the name "Bank"—to read "Anti-Banking Company"—was stamped on the bills. This was more adaptable to the three dollar note than to the others which did not conveniently receive the alteration. (Conflict at Kirtland, page 214)

Below is a photograph of the three dollar note.

The Mormon historian B. H. Roberts makes this statement about the alteration of the notes:

In issuing their notes the "Kirtland Safety Society" doubtless made a mistake in that they used the notes printed from the plates prepared for their anticipated bank issue, using a stamp to make the notes read—Anti-Bank-ing Co., instead of "Kirtland Safety Society Bank." This to avoid the necessity of incurring the expense of making new plates; . . . (Comprehensive History of the Church, vol. 1, p. 401)

The Mormon writer Max Parkin gives this interesting information:

The firm was expected to grow to an enormous size, for it was established with a capital stock "not to be less than four millions of dollars." (Conflict at Kirtland, p. 214)

On page 301 of the same book, Mr. Parkin states:

At the time of the bank's inception, it was capitalized at four million dollars. Critics have found fault with this enormous figure because the capitalization of all the banks in the state of Ohio at that time was only nine and one third million.

The Mormon Apostle Willard Richards wrote the following in a letter to his sister:

If you had remembered it is written that the "Riches of the Gentiles shall be given to the Saints of the Most High," perhaps you would not have asked the question. . . . There is a banking co. here, $4,000,000 capital, and may be extended to an indefinite amount. Private property is holden & Kirtland bills are as safe as gold . . . (Intimate Disciple—A Portrait of Willard Richards, p. 155)

Robert Kent Fielding makes this statement concerning the four million dollar figure:

As it was projected, there was never the slightest chance that the Kirtland Safety Society anti-Bank-ing Company could succeed. Even though their economy was in jeopardy, it could scarcely have suffered such a devastating blow as that which they were themselves preparing to administer to it. There were many good reasons why banking—or anti-banking, was not the solution to their problems; proper notice of any one of them should have directed their efforts in more hopeful directions.

The Safety Society proposed no modest project befitting its relative worth and ability to pay. Its organizers launched, instead, a gigantic company capitalized at four million dollars, when the entire capitalization of all the banks in the state of Ohio was only nine and one third million. Such presumption could not have escaped the notice of bankers who would realize that such a capital could not be paid in, and would have been led to examine its capital structure more closely. They would have noted, upon exami[n]ation, that according to the articles of incorporation capital stock was to be paid in by subscription but that the amount of the first subscription was not stated and further payments were left to the discretion of the company managers. Furthermore, total issuance of notes was not prescribed, nor was the relation of notes to capital and assets. The members, to be sure, pledged themselves to redeem the notes and bound themselves individually by their agreement under the penal sum of one hundred thousand dollars. But there was no transfer of property deeds, no power of attorney, no legal pains and penalties. To a banker, the articles fairly shouted: "this is a wildcat, beware!" ("The Growth of the Mormon Church in Kirtland, Ohio," typed copy, pp. 182-183)

The Mormon writer Stanley B. Kimball gives this interesting information:

The Chicago Historical Society owns the original Stock Ledger (and Index to the ledger) of the Kirtland Safety Society, . . .

This source has been little used, if at all, and throws much light on this complicated phase of Mormon history. . . . The following cursory analysis of this ledger reveals that the 200 individuals subscribed for various numbers of shares (from 3,000 to 5) with the face value of from $150,000 to $50 and paid for them in cash amounts varying from $4,887.00 paid in by Joseph Smith to $.52 by Alex Valier.

The grand totals eloquently reveal the inherent weakness of the project—200 persons subscribed to 79,000 shares worth at face value approximately $3,854,000 at $50 par value per share which was paid for with only $20,725 in specie. Heber C. Kimball, for example, subscribed to $50,000 worth of shares for only $15 in cash. Other important Mormons paid in correspondingly small sums: Brigham Young, $7.00; Lorenzo Snow, $7.97; Wilford Woodruff, $5.25; Erastus Snow, $5.25. A few others, however, were able to come up with larger amounts: Parley P. Pratt, $102.00; Hyrum Smith, $169.00; Vinson Knight, $262.00; Emma Smith, $315.00; Joseph Smith, Sr., $323.00; and W. J. Peterson, $785.00. (Brigham Young University Studies, Summer 1971, pp. 531-532)

Stanley B. Kimball has found evidence to show that the Ohio Senate finally did consider and reject a request to establish the "Kirtland Safety Society Bank," but he gives the date as February 10, 1837. This is more than a month after the Mormons had given up the idea and had decided to start an "Anti-Banking Company" (see History of the Church, vol. 2, pp. 470-471).

Although the Gentiles may have been skeptical of Joseph Smith's bank, many of the Mormons believed that it could not fail. Max Parkin says that the "confidence that the Saints had in the Kirtland Safety Society Anti-Banking Company resulting from the solicitation of Joseph Smith and other leaders, no doubt prompted many to invest in it. The Saints demonstrated considerable optimism in the future of the bank and believed it would eventually become a great financial institution. The fact that this confidence was principally derived from the Prophet Joseph, unfortunately, led some Saints to make the unfounded conclusion that the bank could not fail because of its divine approbation" (Conflict at Kirtland, pp. 295-296).

On page 300 of the same book, Max Parkin says:

There can be no doubt that the Prophet and others encouraged the Saints to have confidence in the bank. Sidney Rigdon considered the Saints who refused to accept the bank currency as "covenant breakers," who by refusing "Kirtland Currency which was their temporal salvation" had put strength into the hands of their enemies.

Wilford Woodruff, who later became the fourth President of the Mormon Church, related the following:

Joseph then arose and like the lion of the Tribe of Judah poured out his soul . . . When speaking of those who had professed to be his friends and the friends of humanity but who had turned traitors, opposed the currency and consequently the prosperity of Kirtland, he proclaimed that the Lord would deal with them. ("Journal History," under the date of April 9, 1837, as quoted in "The Growth of the Mormon Church in Kirtland Ohio," typed copy, p. 236)

The Mormon writer Max Parkin says that "early in the year, word began to circulate that the bank was established by divine revelation" (Conflict at Kirtland, p. 297). In footnote 40 on the same page, Max Parkin states: "On January 27th the Painesville Telegraph printed a letter over the unidentified signature of 'Servantes' to the effect that the Kirtland bank was established by revelation."

In a meeting held September 3, 1837, John F. Boynton (who had been an Apostle in the Mormon Church) claimed that he understood that the bank was established because it was the will of God:

Elder Boynton again rose and still attributed his difficulties to the failure of the bank, stating that he understood the bank was instituted by the will of God, and he had been told that it should never fail, let men do what they would. (History of the Church, vol. 2, pp. 509-510)

Warren Parrish, who had been an officer in the bank and had apostatized from the church, made this statement:

I have listened to him [i.e. Smith] with feelings of no ordinary kind, when he declared that the audible voice of God, instructed him to establish a banking—anti banking institution, who like Aaron's rod shall swallow up all other banks (the Bank of Monroe excepted,) and grow and flourish and spread from the rivers to the ends of the earth, and survive when all others should be laid in ruins. (Painesville Republican, February 22, 1838, as quoted in Conflict at Kirtland, p. 297)

Wilford Woodruff, who remained true to the church and became the fourth President, confirmed the fact that Joseph Smith claimed to have a revelation concerning the bank. Under the date of January 6, 1837, he recorded the following in his journal:

I also herd [sic] President Joseph Smith, jr., declare in the presence of F. Williams, D. Whitmer, S. Smith, W. Parrish, and others in the Deposit office that he had received that morning the word of the Lord upon the subject of the Kirtland Safety Society. He was alone in a room by himself and he had not only [heard] the voice of the Spirit upon the Subject but even an audible voice. He did not tell us at that time what the Lord said upon the subject but remarked that if we would give heed to the commandments the Lord had given this morning all would be well. ("Wilford Woodruff's Journal," January 6, 1837, as quoted in Conflict at Kirtland, p. 296)

On page 297 of the same book, Max Parkin quotes Wilford Woodruff as saying:

May the Lord bless Brother Joseph with all the Saints and support the above named institution and protect it so that every weapon formed against it may be broaken [sic] and come to nought while the Kirtland Safety Society shall become the greatest of all institutions on earth.

In January, 1837, Joseph Smith published the following in the Messenger and Advocate:

In connexion with the above Articles of Agreement of the Kirtland Safety Society, I beg leave to make a few remarks to all those who are preparing themselves, and appointing their wise men, for the purpose of building up Zion and her Stakes. It is wisdom and according to the mind of the Holy Spirit, that you should call at Kirtland, and receive counsel and instruction upon those principles that are necessary to further the great work of the Lord, and to establish the children of the Kingdom, according to the oracles of God, as they are had among us. And further, we invite the brethren from abroad, to call on us, and take stock in our Safety Society. And we would remind them also of the sayings of the prophet Isaiah, . . . which are as follows: “Surely the isles shall wait for me, and the ships of Tarshish first, and to bring thy sons from far, their silver and their gold (not their bank notes) with them, unto the name of the Lord thy God, . . .”

J. SMITH jr.

(Messenger and Advocate, vol. 3, p. 443)

Disaster

The Mormon writer John J. Stewart states that the Kirtland Safety Society “became bankrupt” (Joseph Smith, The Mormon Prophet, 1966, p. 110). The Mormon historian B. H. Roberts made this comment: “The ‘Kirtland Safety Society’ enterprise ended disastrously” (Comprehensive History of the Church, vol. 1, pp. 401-402).

Under the date of July 7, 1837, we find the following statement in Joseph Smith’s History:

Some time previous to this I resigned my office in the “Kirtland Safety Society,” disposed of my interest therein, and withdrew from the institution; being fully aware, after so long an experiment, that no institution of the kind, established upon just and righteous principles for a blessing not only to the Church but the whole nation, would be suffered to continue its operations in such an age of darkness, speculation and wickedness. (History of the Church, vol. 2, p. 497)

In the Messenger and Advocate, July, 1837, we find the following:

1st Relative to the paper, purporting to be bank bills issued in this place, we say there is much of it in circulation, . . . We are aware that the currency of any paper circulating as money, depends on one simple fact, to make it so.—The public mind must be impressed with the belief that it can be converted into the precious metals, to the same amount that is stamped on the bill or bills; . . . What then is our duty under existing circumstances? Shall we all unite as one man, say it is good and make it so by taking it on a par with gold and silver? We will answer no, for the simple reason that we are few in number, compared with the world of mankind by whom we are surrounded. . . . Shall we then take it at its marked price for our property? We answer no. Our enemies far out number us, . . . if they receive any of our paper they receive it at a discount, and return it upon us again as soon as may be, and if we receive it at par we give them, voluntarily and with our eyes open, just that advantage over us, . . . (Messenger and Advocate, vol. 3, pp. 538-539)

In the August, 1837, issue of the Messenger and Advocate we find the following statement by Joseph Smith:

CAUTION

To the brethren and friends of the church of Latter Day Saints, I am disposed to say a word relative to the bills of the Kirtland Safety Society Bank. I hereby warn them to beware of speculators, renegades and gamblers, who are duping the unsuspecting and the unwary, by palming upon them, those bills, which are of no worth, here. I discountenance and disapprove of any and all such practices. I know them to be detrimental to the best interests of society, as well as to the principles of religion.

JOSEPH SMITH Jun.

(Messenger and Advocate, vol. 3, p. 560)

After the Kirtland Bank failed, the Mormon leaders tried to blame the apostates. In an article published in the Elders’ Journal (edited by Joseph Smith) Warren Parrish, who is referred to as “mamma Parrish,” was accused of stealing more than $25,000 from the bank:

But this is not all concerning mamma Parrish, The next business we find him in, is robbing the Kirtland Bank of twenty five thousand dollars at one time, and large sums at others, the managers had in the mean time, appointed him as Cashier, and F. G. Williams as President, and they managed the institution with a witness. Parrish stole the paper out of the institution, and went to buying bogus or counterfeit coin with it, . . . (Elders’ Journal, August, 1838, p. 58)

Fawn M. Brodie made this interesting observation concerning this matter:

If the bank needed a final blow to shatter what little prestige it still held among the faithful, it received it when Warren Parrish resigned as cashier, left the church, and began openly to describe the banking methods of the prophet. Parrish was later accused of absconding with $25,000, but if he took the sum it must have been in worthless bank notes, since that amount of specie in the vaults would have saved the bank, at least during Joseph’s term as cashier. (No Man Knows My History, p. 198)

Mrs. Brodie is probably correct in this matter because the Elders’ Journal said that it was “paper”—not specie—that Warren Parrish was accused of stealing.

Robert Kent Fielding stated:

A further excuse for failure was evolved... The story was told that Warren Parrish, . . . had stolen twenty five thousand dollars of the bank’s money, . . . It is most likely that the story is not true, for no valid record exists which charges him with culpability; . . . He may have retained possession of money printed by the society after it had declined in value. . . . It is known that Brigham Young, who had no official position in the bank, had large quantities of Kirtland notes, and that they were the official currency among the Saints soon after their arrival in Salt Lake Valley. Yet, he is not accused of fraud or theft. (“The Growth of the Mormon Church in Kirtland, Ohio,” Thesis, Indiana University, 1957, pp. 195-197)

By the year 1864 the Mormon Apostle George A. Smith had built up the story until it was absolutely ridiculous. He stated:

Warren Parrish was the teller of the bank, and a number of other men who apostatized were officers. They took out of its vault, unknown to the President or cashier, a hundred thousand dollars, and sent their agents around among the brethren to purchase their farms, wagons, cattle, horses and every thing they could get hold of. The brethren would gather up this money and put it into the bank, and those traitors would steal it and send it out to buy again, and they continued to do so until the plot was discovered and payment stopped. It was the cursed apostates—their stealing and robberies, and their infernal villainies that prevented that bank being conducted as the Prophet designed. If they had followed the counsel of Joseph, there is not a doubt but that it would have been the leading bank in Ohio, probably of the nation. (Journal of Discourses, vol. 11, p. 11)

Although the Mormon leaders tried to shift the blame for the failure of the bank onto the apostates, there is evidence that they themselves were to blame. Robert Kent Fielding said:

. . . the issuance of Kirtland Safety Society Anti-Bank-ing Company notes commenced on January 6. Smith advised his Church members to bring their silver and gold (not their bank notes) and take stock in the company; but with a commendable caution, he wisely went to Painesville the day prior to the opening of business, where he and Rigdon signed a note for three thousand dollars from the Bank of Geauga, payable in forty-five days. The bank was obviously begun on a shoe string, and a borrowed one at that, but no one knew how thin and worn the string was until it was revealed that even the plates from which the notes had been printed had been purch[a]sed on credit. (“The Growth of the Mormon Church in Kirtland, Ohio,” typed copy, p. 190)

In a footnote on the same page, Mr. Fielding tells that the engravers who had made the plates which were used to print the bank notes had to sue to recover their money:

Underwood, Bald, Spencer and Hufty, engravers, sued for recovery of $1450 and were awarded damages in April of 1839. The account was settled piecemeal by land sales under sheriff’s condemnations. Almon W. Babbitt, as agent for Joseph Smith, filed a “paid in full” receipt in April, 1841.

Robert Kent Fielding also states:

The Mormon Bank did not die a quick death. . . . The signal for its demise was given when Samuel D. Rounds entered suit for himself and for the State of Ohio, under the 1816 statute for illegal banking. In Separate suits he sought convictions against Sidney Rigdon, Warren Parrish and Newell K. Whitney on the same charge. Unless that case could be won, there was not a chance for survival of the bank. When Smith's demurrer to the d[e]claration of the plaintiff was overruled by the court in June, even though the case was continued for jury trial, he must have known that the bank was finished. Smith does not mention the trial in his journal, but likely it loomed large in his estimate of the total situation. . . . Even the faithful Saints refused to accept Kirtland notes at par after July, 1837. So far in ruin was the Kirtland bank, as early as May, that it was unable to benefit by the general suspension of specie payments which came at that time throughout the nation.

The causes for the failure of the Mormon bank are sufficiently apparent in the errors incident to its founding, and were freely admitted in the official paper of the Church at the time. Later, however, neither the Mormons nor their enemies were content to see the rise and fall of the bank in terms of these facts. There is little to support the claims of the opponents of the Church that there was deception and fraud in the bank from beginning to end. On the other hand, the tendency of the Church to find excuses for failure which do not reflect quite so strongly upon the poor judgment of its leaders lacks substantial factual foundation. It is alleged that the fall of the bank was caused by the poor business conditions and the bank failures of 1837. It is evident from a study of the situation that, although the causes are similar, they are not identical; and it seems most probable that, if there had been no panic of 1837, the Mormon bank, launched and operated as it was, could not have endured for long. . . . The Saints were not the victims of the folly of others, but of their own folly. . . .

There has been a natural, although regrettable, tendency among the Mormons, to try any device to clear Joseph Smith of blame for the failure of the Bank, but he cannot logically be freed from some responsibility. The decision to establish a bank and later an anti-bank had been partly his. The bank had failed during the period in which he was one of its chief directing officials. He did not protest, so far as preserved accounts record, nor withdraw, until the ruin of the bank became a part of the general national ruin and identified with it. ("The Growth of the Mormon Church in Kirtland, Ohio," typed copy, pp. 193-197)

When the Sheriff arrived in Kirtland on February 10, with his summons for Joseph Smith to answer to Samuel D. Rounds and to the State of Ohio on the charge of illegal banking, there was widespread belief that the notorious Mormon hater Grandison Newel was behind it, that it was trumped up. . . . The plaintiff entered his plea in April term of court and Smith was scheduled to reply in June.

Meantime, Smith knew the true condition of the bank, the three thousand dollars he and Rigdon had borrowed from the Bank of Geauga to furnish specie for their own bank was gone and at length the forty-five day note came due. Smith and Rigdon evidently had no money to redeem it, for the bank brought suit for recovery. Realizing the effect a lawsuit for debts would have on the future of the bank, Smith bestirred himself with sufficient vigor so that by the time the case came to court in the March 21 term, a settlement had been arranged. . . .

It was natural that blame for the entire situation should be charged against the Prophet. They had gathered to Kirtland at his command; the idea of purchasing housing lots in the great subdivision scheme had his full support; he had inferred that the bank would not only succeed, but would one day be the most powerful institution of its kind. . . . the Church populace was genuinely disillusioned when the bank failed. It was difficult for them to comprehend that a man who claimed to have divine revelation in religious matters could fail so miserably in economic affairs. . . . No amount of shifting of blame could obscure the fact that a prophet had failed in a grand project. . . . As the Sheriff appeared ever more regularly with summons and as the fortunes and anticipations of one after another of the leaders faced the humiliating prospect of publicly acknowledged incompetence and bankruptcy, the discipline and sense of responsibility, which are the heart of all organizations, broke completely and plunged Mormondom into ecclesiastical anarchy. (Ibid., pp. 233, 234, 237, 238)

In a thesis written at Brigham Young University, Gary Dean Guthrie stated:

The State legislature refused the Kirtland Safety Society its charter upon which the name of the bank was changed to Kirtland Anti-Banking Society. . . . Joseph and Sidney Rigdon were tried in court for violating the law, were found guilty and fined $1,000. They appealed on the grounds that the institution was an association and not a bank; the plea was never ruled upon as the bank suspended payments and closed its doors. Other lawsuits followed. . . .

During the summer of 1837, Joseph spent much of his time away from Kirtland to avoid these lawsuits. . . . Apostles Luke S. Johnson, Lyman E. Johnson, and John F. Boynton were rejected and disfellowshipped. . . .

The blame of the bank failure fell heavily on Joseph. He had issued a formal invitation to his followers to take stock in the venture and the institution had been organized outside the law. Heber C. Kimball later was to comment that at this moment, "there were not twenty persons on earth that would declare that Joseph Smith was a prophet of God." Six of the apostles came out in open rebellion. . . . Joseph first established the bank by revelation and then had to later admit that because of poor management and other internal and external conditions the project was a failure. ("Joseph Smith As An Administrator," M.A. thesis, Brigham Young University, May 1969, pp. 80, 81, 82, 85, 86, 88)

According to A. Metcalf, Martin Harris, one of the three witnesses to the Book of Mormon, said that "the Kirtland Bank was a swindle" and "About that time Harris began to lose confidence in Joe Smith, as a man of truth, honor and principle, yet he believed him to be a prophet of God" (Ten Years Before The Mast, as cited in A New Witness For Christ In America, vol. 2, p. 348).

Warren Parrish, who had been one of the bank's officers, charged Joseph Smith with deceit:

"I have been astonished to hear him declare that we had $60,000 in specie in our vaults and $600,000 at our command, when we had not to exceed $6,000 and could not command any more; also that we had but about ten thousand dollars of our bills in circulation when he, as cashier of that institution, knew that there was at least $150,000." (Letter to Zion's Watchman, printed March 24, 1838, as quoted in No Man Knows My History, p. 197)

Fawn Brodie made this observation concerning the Kirtland Bank:

From its beginning the bank had been operating illegally. A state law fixed the penalty for such an offense at a thousand dollars and guaranteed informers a share of the fine. . . . on February 8 a writ was sworn out by Samuel D. Rounds. When the court convened on March 24, Joseph's lawyers tried to prove that the statute had not been in force at the time of the bank's organization, but they lost the case and Joseph was ordered to pay the thousand-dollar penalty and costs. (No Man Knows My History, p. 198)

The Mormon writer Max Parkin says that "a fine of one thousand dollars each was executed upon Smith and Rigdon. A final decision was deferred on their defense that the Kirtland Safety Society was not a bank but a 'mutual savings association.' Inasmuch as some of the bank officials left the state within the next several months, the matter was never settled" (Conflict at Kirtland, p. 221).

Sidney Rigdon's son claimed that his father knew that it would not be legal to operate the bank without a charter but that Joseph Smith persuaded him to enter into the venture:

. . . Joseph Smith and Sidney Rigdon were forced to leave Kirtland on account of their starting of the Kirtland Bank. My father opposed it. He said it would not be legal as they had no charter. He did not wish to have anything to do with it, but Joseph Smith thought differently and persuaded Father to sign bills as president and Joseph signed them as cashier. They gave their notes for the bills; the bills came back to the bank faster than silver could be gotten to redeem them with. And the bank went down. (Dialogue: A Journal of Mormon Thought, Winter, 1966, pp. 27-28)

Regardless of who was to blame for starting the bank, both Smith and Rigdon were found guilty of illegal banking practices. For more information on the Kirtland Bank see our book, The Mormon Kingdom, vol. 1, pp. 11-20.

Bankruptcy

John Corrill made this statement:

And now I return to Kirtland with my story. After finishing the house of the Lord . . . the church found itself something like fifteen or twenty thousand dollars in debt, as near as I can recollect. . . . Notwithstanding they were deeply in debt, they had so managed as to keep up their credit, so they concluded to try mercantile business. Accordingly, they ran in debt in New York, and elsewhere, some thirty thousand dollars, for goods, and, shortly after, some fifty or sixty thousand more, as I was informed; . . .

During their mercantile and banking operations they not only indulged in pride, but also suffered jealousies to arise among them, and several persons dissented from the church, and accused the leaders of the church with bad management, selfishness, seeking for riches, honor, and dominion, tyrannising over the people, and striving constantly after power and property. (A Brief History of the Church of Christ of Latter Day Saints, 1839, pp. 26-27)

The Mormon historian B. H. Roberts admits that the Mormons had purchased a large stock of goods on credit and were living on borrowed money:

We must now consider the calamitous events which befell the saints in Kirtland. . . . The mercantile establishments were enlarged and an extensive stock of goods purchased on credit. . . . The saints, also, it must be admitted, lived extravagantly on borrowed money. They had entered into the spirit of reckless speculation which for several years had been rife throughout the United States, and which expressed itself chiefly in land speculations and in excessive banking, culminating in the disastrous financial panic of 1837. (Comprehensive History of the Church, vol. 1, p. 398)

Reed Peck made this statement concerning the debts:

These men likewise engaged in heavy speculations in Banking Merchandising and other branc[h]es of business—. . . issued a large quantity of their paper in payment of debts and purchases of property; bought on credit heavy stocks of goods in Cleaveland Buffalo and N. York, and being _____ most unskillful persons in the world in managing to pay debts, were finally compelled to flee to Missouri, leaving their creditors minus about 30000 (independent of what they owed to their brethren) and Thousands of the “Kirtland Safety Society Bank” Bills not redeemed. . . . (The Reed Peck Manuscript, 1839, pp. 4-5)

Max Parkin admits that some of Joseph Smith’s bills were left unpaid in Kirtland:

. . . when the Prophet left Kirtland the following winter, he left behind some unpaid bills resulting from his mercantile business for which he had not received sufficient income to liquidate the purchasing costs. Some of the faithful Saints assisted him, but insufficient funds were raised, and he was forced to leave without clearing up all his outstanding debts. (Conflict at Kirtland, p. 295)

Fawn M. Brodie gives this information:

The toppling of the Kirtland bank loosed a hornets’ nest. Creditors swarmed in upon Joseph armed with threats and warrants. He was terribly in debt. There is no way of knowing exactly how much he and his leading elders had borrowed, since the loyal Mormons left no itemized account of their own claims. But the local non-Mormon creditors whom he could not repay brought a series of suits against the prophet which the Geauga county court duly recorded. These records tell a story of trouble that would have demolished the prestige and broken the spirit of a lesser man.

Thirteen suits were brought against him between June 1837 and April 1839, to collect sums totaling nearly $25,000. The damages asked amounted to almost $35,000. He was arrested seven times in four months, and his followers managed heroically to raise the $38,428 required for bail. Of the thirteen suits only six were settled out of court—about $12,000 out of the $25,000. In the other seven the creditors either were awarded damages or won them by default.

Joseph had many additional debts that never resulted in court action. Some years later he compiled a list of still outstanding Kirtland loans, which amounted to more than $33,000. If one adds to these the two great loans of $30,000 and $60,000 borrowed in New York and Buffalo in 1836, it would seem that the Mormon leaders owed to non-Mormon individuals and firms well over $150,000. (No Man Knows My History, pp. 199-202)

Willis Thornton made this statement concerning the troubles that the Mormons had in Kirtland:

Their physical property, their homes, their farms, their stores and industries, their very temple itself, were all about to be lost by foreclosure. Church authorities have always described this as “legal persecution,” and there is no doubt that some of the creditors, like Grandison Newell, . . . got special pleasure out of enforcing their legal rights. On the other hand, the eastern merchants who had delivered thousands of dollars’ worth of goods which were sold at the Mormon stores, had a right to get such payment as they could, without the cry of persecution being raised. The plain fact is that the Mormons dissipated their physical “stake” in a riot of speculative excess. (The Ohio State Archaeological and Historical Quarterly, January, 1954, p. 32)

After the Mormons left Kirtland, C. E. Emery, who had just arrived in the area, wrote the following to his parents:

We visited the great Mormon Temple that was built by Joseph Smith & Sidney Rigdon . . . they have proved themselves so basely dishonest in their dealings that they have been under the necessity of leaving [sic] their Temple and Village. The leaders left in the night in order to evade pursuit. (Ibid., p. 30)

Joseph Smith admitted in his History that he fled from Kirtland in the night:

January, 1838.—A new year dawned upon the Church in Kirtland in all the bitterness of the spirit of apostate mobocracy; which continued to rage and grow hotter and hotter, until Elder Rigdon and myself were obliged to flee from its deadly influence, as did the Apostles and Prophets of old, and as Jesus said, “when they persecute you in one city, flee to another.” On the evening of the 12th of January, about ten o’clock, we left Kirtland, on horseback, to escape mob violence, which was about to burst upon us under the color of legal process to cover the hellish designs of our enemies, and to save themselves from the just judgment of the law. (History of the Church, vol. 3, p. 1)

Some years before the trouble in Kirtland, Joseph Smith gave a revelation in which the following appeared:

Behold, it is said in my laws, or forbidden, to get in debt to thine enemies;

But behold, it is not said at any time that the Lord should not take when he pleases, and pay as seemeth him good.

Wherefore, as ye are agents, ye are on the Lord’s errand; and whatever ye do according to the will of the Lord is the Lord’s business. (Doctrine and Covenants, Section 64, verses 27-29)

Joseph Smith’s enemies claimed that this revelation sanctioned the idea of borrowing from the Gentiles and not repaying the debts. The Mormon Apostle John A. Widtsoe, on the other hand, claimed that Joseph Smith was completely honest in his business transactions:

A favorite charge against the Prophet by enemies of the latter-day work has been that he was not honest in business. Naturally, he and the Church were in business. . . .

In the normal course of business, money was occasionally borrowed by Church members or by the Church itself to meet immediate needs, . . . Such dealings were of the usual, acceptable kind, wherever men do business with one another.

Joseph Smith, as the President of the Church, became of course, involved in all Church ventures, for which his signature was required. He also made purchases on his own account. . . .

One hundred years of diligent search by anti-Mormon writers have brought to light so few business clashes among Joseph Smith and the people of his day, as to be embarrassing to those who charge the Prophet with financial irregularity. No reliable evidence of dishonesty has yet been uncovered. There is no evidence that he at anytime attempted to escape his financial obligations. Instead, the evidence is that he sought to meet every honest obligation. For example, after leaving Kirtland where his life was in jeopardy, he made a list of his creditors and the amount he owed each. That was the method of an honest man. There was no subterfuge. (F. M. Brodie, No Man Knows My History, p. 201.) Sooner or later, his honest debts were paid. (Gospel Interpretations, Salt Lake City, 1947, pp. 139-141)

Now, while it is true that Joseph Smith made a list of his creditors, he apparently did not intend to pay them, for in 1842 he tried to take out bankruptcy. The Mormon writer John J. Stewart states:

In the summer of 1842 he had reluctantly availed himself of the bankruptcy law passed by Congress, to dispose of a staggering debt load, . . . (Joseph Smith, The Mormon Prophet, p. 183)

Fawn M. Brodie states:

In the spring of 1841 he catalogued a list of his outstanding liabilities and found them to total over $70,000, in addition to another $33,000 carried over from Kirtland days. It is not surprising, therefore, that he looked with interest upon the bankruptcy law that Congress passed in 1841 to relieve the straits of the debtor class. (No Man Knows My History, p. 266)

On April 14, 1842, Joseph Smith recorded the following in his history:

Thursday, 14.—Calvin A. Warren, Esq., lawyer, from Quincy, arrived, and commenced an investigation of the principles of general insolvency in my behalf according to the statutes; for the United States Congress had previously instituted a general bankrupt law, . . . the law was as good for the Saints as for the Gentiles, and whether I would or not, I was forced into the measure . . . (History of the Church, vol. 4, pp. 594-595)

On May 7, 1842, the following was published in The Wasp (a Mormon newspaper):

District Court of the United States, within and for the District of Illinois,

In the matter of the Petition of Joseph Smith, of Hancock County to be declared a bankrupt and to be discharged from his debts.

Notice is hereby given, that Joseph Smith, of Hancock county has filed his petition in this Court to be declared a Bankrupt and to be discharged from his debts under the Act of Congress, in such case made provided: and that an order has been duly entered in this Court appointing the 6th day of June next, at the District court room in the City of Springfield in this District, as the time and place for the hearing of said petition: all persons interested may then and there appear and show cause, if any they have, why the prayer of said Petition should not be granted.

Dated this 28th day of April A.D. 1842.

J. H. ROLSTON, WARREN & WHEAT, Solicitors for Petitioner.

Attest: James F. Owings Clerk.

Fraudulent Acts

Shortly after Joseph Smith petitioned to be declared a bankrupt, John C. Bennett published his book History of the Saints. In this book he charged that Joseph Smith fraudulently transferred some of his property to others to avoid losing it (see History of the Saints, 1842, pp. 96-98; also The Mormon Kingdom, vol. 1, pp. 23-24).

J. Butterfield, United States Attorney for the District of Illinois, saw John C. Bennett's charges printed in the Sangamo Journal on July 15, 1842. He felt that an investigation should be made to see if Bennett's accusations were true. In 1840 Joseph Smith and four others had signed a promissory note to the United States Government for $4866.38 which they had not paid off. Therefore, Butterfield proceeded to Nauvoo to make his investigation. After making the investigation, he wrote a letter to C. B. Penrose, Solicitor of the Treasury, in which he stated:

On the 8th day of Sept last I left Chicago for Nauvoo the place of residence of Joseph Smith & Hyrum Smith applicants for the benefit of the Bankrupt Act, in order to obtain the necessary evidence to oppose them as I informed you I should do in my letter of the 7th of Sept. last: Upon my arrival at Nauvoo I made a very full examination into the transfers of property made by Joseph Smith upon the eve of his application for the benefit of the said act, and I succeeded beyond my expectations; I found that after the passage of the Bankrupt Act, and after he had contracted the debt upon which the judg't. in favor of the United States was rendered against him, he made voluntary conveyances of real estate of an amount much more than sufficient to satisfy the said judgment to his wife and to his infant children and friends, without any consideration whatever: I found that all the statements made by Gen'l. Bennett in relation to Joseph Smith's fraudulent transfers of his property were true; and that there were several other fraudulent conveyances not mentioned by him.... I shall be ready to establish such fraudulent acts on the part of Joseph Smith as will prevent his discharge. (Letter by J. Butterfield, U.S. Attorney for the District of Illinois, to C. B. Penrose, Solicitor of the Treasury, dated Oct. 13, 1842, found in the National Archives of the United States, Records of the Solicitor of the Treasury, Record Group 206, microfilm copy)

The attempt to stop Joseph Smith from obtaining benefit of the Bankrupt Act was successful, for on August 6, 1844, Butterfield wrote C. B. Penrose a letter in which he stated: "I defeated Joseph Smith the Mormon Prophet from obtaining the benefit of the Bankrupt Act."

Since Joseph Smith died in 1844, the matter was not settled until after his death. In a "Reference Service Report" from the National Archives, dated Sept. 23, 1963, we find that a judgment "was rendered against the widow of Joseph Smith and 104 other defendants . . . in which the decree of the court was satisfied by sale of the defendants' lands."

The Mormons were apparently still in debt when they left Nauvoo, for Brigham Young wrote a letter to "Babbit, Heywood & Fullmer Trustees, etc., on September 27, 1846, in which he stated:

The Church here, in general council with us this day, voted that the Temple, and all Church property at Nauvoo be sold . . . but, let your funds be ever so great, pay no more money to the gentiles on old debts. ("Manuscript History of Brigham Young," Sept. 28, 1846, typed copy)

Counterfeiting

In this chapter we have shown that Joseph Smith was guilty of "illegal banking practices" and "fraudulent transfers of his property." One of the most serious charges against him, however, was that he engaged in counterfeiting. Joseph H. Jackson made these serious charges in a booklet published in Warsaw, Illinois:

In order to fathom the depths of Joe's villany, I was obliged to appear to him as an abandoned wretch and outcast. When I told him I was a fugitive from justice, and had committed the darkest crimes, it seemed to give him the greatest confidence, . . .

About two days after . . . He then pressed me to stay, and enter into the manufacture of bogus; to which I consented, hoping to be able to get a clue to another branch of his villany. . . . he sent two hundred dollars to St. Louis for German plate, and went to work in a remote part of the town to fit up for operation. . . . The first attempts at bogus-making were rather rough; but in October, Messrs. Barton and Eaton came on from Buffalo, . . . and brought with them a splendid press, . . . The press was put up in the south-east room, up stairs, of the house formerly occupied by Joe, being the same room where the Holy Order had previously met. The business was then rushed ahead in good earnest, and an excellent specimen of base coin produced. Soon the city was flooded with this money, . . . Joe had given out that the room occupied by the press, was rented to Messrs. Barton and Eaton, who were mechanics, and were making drafts for the machinery of a factory which they contemplated erecting. The press continued to run until they had manufactured about $350,000. . . . All the twelve apostles, except Orson Pratt, and Eben [Heber?] C. Kimball, were engaged in this business, and frequently visited the room where the press was, and took turns in working it. . . . Joe told me, that in Ohio, he, Dr. Boynton, Lyman Wight, Oliver Cowdry, and Hyrum, were engaged in a bogus establishment on Licking Creek, but that their operations were cut short by the bursting of the Kirtland Bank. (The Adventures and Experience of Joseph H. Jackson: . . . , Warsaw, Illinois, 1846, pp. 10-12, 15)

Joseph H. Jackson said:

In the spring of 1843 I told Harmon T. Wilson, that I was determined to head Joe and in order to do so that I would go to Nauvoo insinuate myself into his favor, win his affection and confidence, and that if he really was a villain I would find it out, and at a proper season I would disclose all to him, that as an officer of the Law, he might have an opportunity to bring the scamp to justice. . . . The fact that Joe is engaged in counterfeiting, also came to my knowledge while in his confidence; . . . (Warsaw Signal, June 5, 1844)

Since Joseph H. Jackson was an adventurer and admitted that he deceived Joseph Smith to obtain his information, his story is somewhat suspect. On the other hand, Jackson's charges cannot be completely dismissed. We know that he was acquainted with Joseph Smith. Under the date of May 20, 1843, we find this statement in Joseph Smith's History:

Mr. Joseph H. Jackson representing himself as being out of employment and destitute of funds, he desired I would employ him and relieve his necessities. I took compassion and employed him as a clerk to sell lands, so as to give him a chance in the world. (History of the Church, vol. 5, p. 400)

According to Joseph H. Jackson, he told Joseph Smith he was "an outlaw and fugitive from justice." That Smith felt that Jackson was a criminal is evident from a statement made by Brigham Young on January 27, 1845:

Cain was permitted to live, peradventure, he might repent . . . this is the reason that Brother Joseph bore so long with Jackson and others, that peradventure they might, notwithstanding they had been guilty of murder and robbery, come to the waters of baptism through repentance, and redeem a part of their allotted time. (History of the Church, vol. 7, p. 366)

Joseph H. Jackson's statement that Joseph Smith told him "that in Ohio, he, Dr. Boynton, Lyman Wight, Oliver Cowdry, and Hyrum, were engaged with others in a bogus establishment" is very interesting in light of the information found in the "Far West Record." As we have already shown, the Mormon leaders suppressed this record, but Leland Gentry, a Mormon scholar who was working on his thesis at the Brigham Young University, was permitted access to it. On page 117 of the "Far West Record," Leland Gentry found testimony given by Joseph Smith and Fredrick G. Williams that tends to link Oliver Cowdry, one of the three witnesses to the Book of Mormon, with the bogus business. Leland Gentry states:

[Fredrick G.] Williams, . . . testified that Oliver had personally informed him of a man in the Church by the name of Davis who would compound metal and make dies which could print money that could not be detected from the real thing. Oliver allegedly told

Williams that there was no harm in accepting and passing around such money, provided it could not be determined to be unsound.

Joseph Smith's testimony was similar. He claimed that a non-member of the Church by the name of Sapham had told him in Kirtland that a warrant had been issued against Oliver "for being engaged in making a purchase of bogus money and dies to make the counterfeit money with." According to the Prophet, he and Sidney Rigdon went to visit Oliver concerning the matter and told him that if he were guilty, he had better leave town; but if he was innocent, he should stand trial and thus be acquitted. "That night or next," the Prophet said, Oliver "left the country." (A History of the Latter-day Saints in Northern Missouri From 1836 to 1839, Brigham Young University, 1965, p. 146)

While this does not prove Jackson's charge that Joseph Smith was actually involved with Oliver Cowdry in the "bogus establishment," it certainly casts a shadow of doubt on Smith's character and makes the charge seem more believable. It would appear from Joseph Smith's own statement that he was almost an accessory after the fact, since he warned Oliver Cowdry to flee from the law if he was guilty.

Since we know that the Mormon leaders were engaged in "illegal banking practices" in Kirtland and that they were in serious financial trouble at the time, it is easy to see how they could become involved in counterfeiting. Reed Peck made this interesting observation:

These men . . . established a bank without a charter. . . . A bitter quarrel originated in these transactions between the Smith's and S. Rigdon on one part and the Cowderies Johnson and David Whitmer on the other. . . . Very many credible persons in the society have asserted that while the "money fever raged in Kirtland the leaders of the church and others were, more or less, engaged in purchasing and circulating" Bogas money or counterfeit coin and a good evidence that the report is not without foundation is that each of these contending parties accuses the other of this crime (The Reed Peck Manuscript—An Important Document Written in 1839, pp. 4, 5)

In a letter written by 84 Mormons in June, 1838, both Oliver Cowdry and David Whitmer were accused of selling bogus money:

Oliver Cowdry, David Whitmer, and Lyman E. Johnson, united with a gang of counterfeiters, . . . During the full career of Oliver Cowdry and David Whitmer's bogus money business, it got abroad into the world that they were engaged in it, and several gentlemen were preparing to commence a prosecution against Cowdry; he finding it out, took with him Lyman E. Johnson, and fled. . . . (Letter quoted in Senate Document 189, February 15, 1841, p. 8)

The reader will remember that Oliver Cowdry and David Whitmer were witnesses to the Book of Mormon. Now, if two of the three special witnesses to the Book of Mormon were involved in counterfeiting, and if Joseph Smith helped Cowdry to escape from the law as the "Far West Record" seems to show, how can we rely on their story concerning the "gold plates"?

At any rate, the charges of counterfeiting followed the Mormons to Nauvoo. Just before Joseph Smith's death, the Warsaw Signal contained a number of articles stating that the Mormons were involved in passing or making counterfeit coin:

There is a species of counterfeit, extensively circulated in this community, called Nauvoo Bogus. They are half dollars, dated 1828. They are a pretty good imitation of the genuine coin—so good, that some of our business men have been imposed upon by them. It is said they are manufactured in the City of the Saints. (Warsaw Signal, April 24, 1844)

COUNTERFEITING, &c.—On a former occasion, we stated that a species of counterfeit money—called Nauvoo Bogus, was extensively circulated in this vicinity. We have since heard the charge distinctly made by one who has had an opportunity of knowing the facts, that Joe Smith, . . . is engaged in this nefarious business. . . . the fact is notorious that bogus is made in Nauvoo. Here then, we have a band of counterfeiters in our midst, who can defy the laws under the protection of a pretended prophet. . . . An officer of justice might as well go to perogatory to find a culprit as to Nauvoo, if Joe has taken him in charge. . . . (Warsaw Signal, June 5, 1844)

The Nauvoo Bogus factories are in full blast, judging from the quantity of base, and counterfeit coin in the city. Since the Mormons have learned they are safe as regards punishment by our laws, they seem bold in talking about their Bogus operations, &c. (Ibid., June 12, 1844)

Apostles Indicted

After Joseph Smith's death the non-Mormons continued to accuse the Mormon leaders of counterfeiting. On December 25, 1844, we find this statement in the Warsaw Signal:

The Latter-Brethren have lately carried on their Bogus operations extensively. Not less than a dozen farmers who have taken their pork to Nauvoo, have been paid in spurious coin, or counterfeit bills.

On January 8, 1845, the Warsaw Signal reported the following:

We learn, that last week an officer having a warrant from Gov. Ford, issued on a requisition from the Governor of New York, for one Eaton, who is the king of the Nauvoo Bogus Factory, went to the Holy City to make the arrest. This, the officer did . . . About 11 o'clock, the prisoner having procured a pistol by some means unknown, presented it to the officer, and swore he was going. . . . The house being surrounded by Eaton's friends, he was carried off in triumph and the officer mocked. And this is Holy Nauvoo, the residence of Gov. Ford's peaceful saints. (Warsaw Signal, January 8, 1845)

The reader will probably remember that Jackson claimed that a man by the name of Eaton came from Buffalo and helped Joseph Smith in the counterfeiting operation. Joseph Smith's mother speaks of "a man named Eaton, who was our friend, . . ." (Biographical Sketches of Joseph Smith, London, 1853, p. 276).

The Mormon paper, Nauvoo Neighbor, admitted that some counterfeit coins might have been paid out in Nauvoo, but it denied that they were made by the Mormons:

Spurious.—The Burlington Gazette mentions spurious "half Eagles," and intimates that they came from Nauvoo. That such coin might pass through or be paid out in Nauvoo, we have no doubt;—for such tricks are as "plentiful as blackberries;" but they are made in other "diggings," and vended by some of the birds of passage, . . . (Nauvoo Neighbor, May 28, 1845)

Rumors of counterfeiting continued, and on December 2, 1845, the St. Louis American reported the following:

COUNTERFEITERS ARRESTED.—Two of the Nauvoo Saints were arrested in Burlington, Iowa on the 20th ult., for passing counterfeit money. Their names were Cyrus Chase and Rufus Adams, and each had passed on the same day a $10 bill on the Lafayette Bank of Cincinnati. Other counterfeit money was found upon them. They were both committed for trial. (St. Louis American, December 2, 1845, typed copy)

On December 27, 1845, the St. Louis American contained this information:

During the last week, twelve bills of indictment, for counterfeiting Mexican dollars, and American half dollars and dimes, were found by the Grand Jury, and presented to the United States Circuit Court, in session in this city, against different persons in and about Nauvoo.

On January 9, 1846, the St. Louis American reported that "some of the leaders of the Mormon Church" were among those indicted on the charge of counterfeiting. Brigham Young and several Mormon Apostles were included among those indicted for that reason. On January 7, 1846, the Warsaw Signal contained the following:

During the last week, twelve bills of indictment, for counterfeiting Mexican dollars, and American half dollars and dimes, were found by the Grand Jury, and presented to the United States Circuit Court, in session in this city, against different persons in and about Nauvoo, embracing some of the "Holy Twelve," and other prominent Mormons, and other persons in league with them. From incidental remarks made by some of the witnesses in private conversation (not before the jury,) we are led to believe that a large amount of counterfeit coin of the above description, is, and has been for a long time past, circulating in the western country. . . . It was said that the Mormons had three presses for counterfeiting the coin named, and that Joe Smith worked most industriously at the business. In fact, Joe used to bo[a]st of his "mint." A short time previous to his death, in speaking of the power of his establishment to imitate the coin above named, he was repeatedly heard to say that "it would beat the mint," and seemed, with others of his confidential advisers, to exult at their ability to manufacture "land office money"—that being the term by which the better quality of their issues were distinguished.

There are said to have been three qualities of the spurious money manufactured which were sold for 75, 50 and 25 cents for the dollar. That for which the highest price was asked, is said to be so perfect as to escape the most rigid scrutiny of the eye—the outer coat being of pure silver, and the alloy so completely covered as to prevent detection in any other way than by cutting. . . . An officer has since been sent to Nauvoo to make the arrests; but we apprehend there is no probability of his success; for, whatever crimes these Mormons commit, the rest are all ready and willing if not bound by an oath to secrete the culprit, or aid his escape, either by fraud or force. The Court, it is understood, will continue in session this week, to give time to the Marshal to make his return. If those indicted are brought before the Court, they will probably be tried the present term; if not, they will be likely to go "unwhipt of justice."—[Springfield Journal, Dec. 25.] (Warsaw Signal, January 7, 1846)

"Bogus Brigham"

Brigham Young had no intention of submitting to the law. The Warsaw Signal reported the following:

The best joke of the season was played off, last week, by the Saints, on the United States deputy Marshall for Illinois. It appears that Brigham Young and other Saints, were indicted at the late Term of the United States Circuit Court at Springfield, for Bogus making. On Tuesday of last week, the Deputy Marshall, accompanied by eight of the Hancock Guard, and Mr. Benson . . . went to the Temple, . . . and soon Mr. Benson pointed out Brigham, accompanied by some ladies, in the act of getting into a carriage. The Marshall immediately walked up and arrested him. The Saints learning what had been done assembled around the prisoner and swore that he should not be taken out of town. . . . After considerable bluster, the Saints began to cool off and the prisoner was taken to the tavern. The saints now began to show long faces and seemed very much affected. . . . As the officer and his posse left with their charge they broke out in such strains as these; "Farwell Brother Brigham." "We hope you will soon return." "May the Lord bless you Brother Brigham and grant you a safe deliverance." . . . On arriving at Carthage, the prisoner . . . was carefully watched. . . . G. W. Thatcher, Esq., went in to see him. Soon he returned with a very knowing look, and affirmed that there was no Brigham Young there, and the Prisoner was an entirely different personage.—An investigation was gone into and sure enough it turned out that the Saints had, by putting the cloak & cap of the apostle on a man who resembled him in figure and appearance, first deceived Mr. Benson, and then by playing well their part, had prevented any suspicion from arising in the minds of any of the company that they had got the wrong pig by the ear.—The Marshall on learning he had been hoaxed released the prisoner and now says the Saints may "have his hat." (Warsaw Signal, December 31, 1845)

Another article on the same page contained this information: “The U.S. Marshall, after being sadly humbugged in Nauvoo returned to the city to get the real Brigham, but it was no go. Of course Brigham could not be found.”

Although Brigham Young denied that he was guilty of counterfeiting, he admitted in the History of the Church that he had tricked the U.S. Marshal. Under the date of December 23, 1845, we find the following:

One-five p.m. Almon W. Babbitt came into the Temple and informed me that there were some federal officers from Springfield accompanied by several of the state troops in the city for the purpose of arresting some of the Twelve, especially Amasa Lyman and myself. . . .

William Miller put on my cap and Brother Kimball’s cloak and went downstairs meeting the marshal and his assistants at the door, as he was about getting into my carriage the marshal arrested him, on a writ from the United States court, charging him with counterfeiting the coin of the United States. . . .

The marshal put up at Hamilton’s Tavern, . . . William Backenstos was called in and he told them William Miller was not Brigham Young. . . .

Eight-twenty, I left the Temple disguised and shortly after Brothers Heber C. Kimball, Parley P. Pratt, George A. Smith and Amasa Lyman left, to elude the vexatious writs of our persecutors. (History of the Church, vol. 7, pp. 549-551)

Brigham Young felt that this was one of the “best jokes ever perpetrated.” In a discourse delivered July 23, 1871, he said:

I do not profess to be much of a joker, but I do think this to be one of the best jokes ever perpetrated. . . . I learned that a posse was lurking around the Temple, and that the United States Marshal was waiting for me to come down, . . . I saw brother William Miller leaning against the wall. . . . Said I to him, “Brother William, . . . will you go and do just as I tell you? If you will, I will serve them a trick.” . . .

Just as brother Miller was entering the carriage, the Marshal stepped up to him, . . . They both went to the Mansion House. There were my sons . . . and brother Heber C. Kimball’s boys, . . . all seemed at once to understand and partake of the joke. They followed the carriage . . . and gathered around brother Miller, with tears in their eyes, saying, “Father, or President Young, where are you going?” Brother Miller looked at them kindly, but made no reply, and the Marshal really thought he had got “Brother Brigham.” . . . So it continued, until an apostate Mormon, . . . asked the landlord where Brigham Young was. The landlord, pointing across the table to brother Miller, said, “That is Mr. Young.” Thatcher replied, “Where? I can’t see any one that looks like Brigham.” . . . the Marshal, in a rage, walked out of the room, followed by brother Miller, . . . and this is the real pith of the story of “Bogus” Brigham, as far as I can recollect. (Journal of Discourses, vol. 14, pp. 218-219)

The Whittlers

While the Mormons remained in Nauvoo, the Mormon leaders were constantly bothered by the law. They claimed they could not allow themselves to be arrested because they might meet the same fate as Joseph Smith. Brigham Young recorded the following statements in the History of the Church for 1845:

Tuesday, 13.—. . . at Brother Hunter’s where we had retired to keep out of the way of writs reported to have been issued against us. (History of the Church, vol. 7, p. 408)

Monday, 23.—The sheriff came in with writs for a number of brethren and succeeded in arresting O. P. Rockwell and J. P. Harmon, but Rockwell got away from him. A constable from LeHarpe came in with writs for Brother Taylor, myself and others, but we kept out of the way. (Ibid., p. 428)

Thursday, 23.—A detachment of the governor’s troops came in from Carthage to search for a bogus press. They searched Lucien Woodworth’s house in vain. (Ibid., p. 485)

Sheriff Backenstos informed me that the United States deputy marshal was in town with writs for the Twelve and Brother George Miller. . . . the United States Deputy Marshal Roberts, went to the Temple in company with Almon W. Babbitt and searched for the Twelve and others. (Ibid., p. 553)

The reader will notice that “Sheriff Backenstos” helped the Twelve escape from the U.S. Marshal. Robert Bruce Flanders states that Backenstos was “elected by Mormon votes” (Nauvoo—Kingdom on the Mississippi, p. 327). Flanders also states that Backenstos was “fiercely hated by the anti-Mormons both as a ‘corrupt bargain’ politician and a gentile traitor” (Ibid., p. 328, n. 46).

John Taylor, who became the third President of the Mormon Church, threatened the officers who attempted to serve writs with death. Brigham Young stated:

Saturday, 12. . . . the U.S. deputy marshal for the district of Illinois arrived in town with writs for myself and others.

Sunday, 13.—Meeting at the stand. Elders Heber C. Kimball and John Taylor preached. Several officers attended meeting. Elder Taylor gave them to understand that if they made an attempt to serve writs on him it would cost them their lives, . . . (History of the Church, vol. 7, pp. 395-396)

Hosea Stout recorded these interesting statements in his diary:

Thursday Feb. 12th 1846. . . . At two was informed that some of the Carthage troops were in the city with writs for some of the brethren and me among the rest whereupon I called out all the troops belonging to our camp and agreed that if any of them came across the river after any of us as we were informed they intended that we would put them to death rather than be Harrassed as we have been after we had started to leave their cursed & corrupt government and also established a line of skiffs across the river . . . (On The Mormon Frontier: The Diary Of Hosea Stout, vol. 1, p. 121)

On April 23, 1845, the Warsaw Signal reported: “On last Tuesday week, A. S. Headleston, Constable of Carthage, having visited Nauvoo in order to serve some subpoenas, was visited by the gang of ‘whistlers and whittlers’ and escorted from the city.” John D. Lee gives this information concerning the “whittlers”:

Thus things grew worse the longer the Saints remained at Nauvoo. It was an unfortunate matter, and much of the trouble that came upon the Church was brought on through the folly and fanaticism of the Saints. I have seen relentless cruelty practiced by those who directed this cattle stealing. I cannot call it anything else, though they called it getting back what had been taken from them. It caused many strangers to come to the city to look for traces of their cattle. A company was organized, called the “whittlers.” They had long knives, and when any of these strangers would come to town, they would gather around him, and whittle; none of them saying a word, no matter what question was asked. They would thus watch any stranger, gathering close to him, until they finally ran him out of town. (Confessions of John D. Lee, photomechanical reprint of 1880 edition, p. 168)

Oliver B. Huntington recorded the following in his journal:

“I belonged to the ‘Whittling Society’ and the 6th of April helped whittle doctor Charle of Warsaw out of town. . . . no one liked the sight of 1/2 dozen large knives whittling about their ears and not a word said.” (“Journal of Oliver B. Huntington,” vol. 1, p. 56, as quoted in On The Mormon Frontier, vol. 1, p. 33)

John Taylor, who became the third President of the Mormon Church, made these statements:

And that State robbed us of the rights of freemen; and the only chance we had then, when they sent their scamps and rogues among us, was to have a whittling society and whittle them out. We could not get them out according to law, and we had to do it according to justice; and there was no law against whittling,—so we whittled the scoundrels out.

I remember that one of the legislators who had annulled our charter, named Dr. Charles, went to President Young, and says he, "Mr. Young, I am very much imposed upon by the people around here; there are a lot of boys following me with long knives, and they are whittling after me wherever I go; my life is in danger."

Brother Young replied, "I am very sorry you are imposed upon by the people: we used to have laws here, but you have taken them away from us: we have no law to protect you 'your cause is just, but we can do nothing for you.'" Boys, don't frighten him, don't." . . .

[Voice: "We still have whittling societies."]

Yes, we still have whittling societies, as brother Kimball says. (Journal of Discourses, vol. 5, pp. 150-151)

It is obvious that the Mormon leaders used their "whittling society" to protect them from the law. For more information on this matter see The Mormon Kingdom, vol. 2, pp. 58-60.

Government Records

The United States Government has preserved some important records concerning the indictment of the Mormon leaders for counterfeiting. In a "Reference Service Report," dated December 11, 1963, Hardee Allen made these statements:

INQUIRY: Information about Records Relating to the Indictment in Illinois of Brigham Young, Mormon Leader, and Apostles of the Mormon Church, 1845-1848, for counterfeiting.

Report: The records of the Solicitor of the Treasury (National Archives Record Group 206) contain a few summary references to the indictment, and proceeding thereunder, of Brigham Young and eleven other men on the charge of counterfeiting, the indictment having been presented in December 1845 in the United States Circuit Court for the District of Illinois. These references appear in form reports on suits brought and pending and on cases decided that the United States Attorney and the Clerk of the United States Circuit Court for the District of Illinois made periodically to the Solicitor of the Treasury. The National Archives can furnish negative photostats of the pertinent United States Attorneys' reports (from Reports of the U.S. District Attorneys, From 1845 to 1850), as follows:

1. Report of Suits Pending in the Circuit Court of the United States for the District of Illinois at its December Term 1845, listing suits brought in that court on indictments for counterfeiting, dated December 17 and December 18, 1845, against Brigham Young and 11 other men, . . .

2. Report of Suits Pending at the June Term 1846, which identifies Brigham Young and most of the others charged with counterfeiting as "not arrested." 1 page; negative photostat, 75 cents.

Below is a photograph of a U.S. Government record which shows that Brigham Young and four of the other Mormon Apostles (Willard Richards, John Taylor, Parley P. Pratt and Orson Hyde) were indicted for counterfeiting.

OFFICE OF THE ATTORNEY OF THE UNITED STATES,
District of _____ day of _____ 18__
SIR: I herewith report the following SUITS PENDING at the _____ term of the _____ Court of the United States for the _____ District of _____ which term ended on the _____ day of _____ 18__

W. Williams, Secy. of the Circuit Court of the United States for the District of Illinois, is hereby notified to be a true and correct abstract of the proceedings and proceedings in said court at the said term. The report of said court is to be filed in the records of this office. Dated 3<sup>d</sup> 1846.

Wm. H. Clark, Clerk of the Court.

The United States Attorneys' reports in the records of the Solicitor of the Treasury do not show the disposition of the charges against Brigham Young and 10 others. These reports do not include any report for the December Term 1848, but the reports of the Clerk of the Circuit Court of the United States for the District of Illinois, which for the most part duplicate the United States Attorney's reports, do contain a report for the December Term 1848 which shows that the cases against Brigham Young and 10 others (not including Edward Bonney), indicted for counterfeiting, had been dismissed at that Term of the court. The National Archives can furnish negative photostats of the pertinent Clerks' reports (from Reports of the Clerks of the U.S. Courts, 1846 to 1850) . . .

In the same "Reference Service Report," Hardee Allen lists 16 reports that are related to these indictments and states that "The National Archives can supply negative photostats of any of these reports at the prices listed, or a 35 mm. microfilm of all of them (16 pages) for $2.50." We have obtained a copy of this microfilm and find it rather revealing.

According to these records, Brigham Young and four of the other Apostles (Willard Richards, John Taylor, Parley P. Pratt and Orson Hyde) were indicted "for counterfeiting the current coin of the U.S." Among the list of others indicted we find the name "Joseph H. Jackson." This is very interesting, for Jackson, as we have already shown, admitted that he "consented" to help Joseph Smith in "the manufacture of bogus." Jackson also stated that "Barton and Eaton" were in on the bogus operation in Nauvoo. Among the list of those indicted we find the names "Augustus Barton" and "Gilbert Eaton."

Theodore Turley was also indicted. This comment concerning Turley appears in a handwritten note on the record showing the indictment: "This is an indictment for counterfeiting the current coin of the U.S. The defendant, who is the chief manufacturer of dies &c resides at Nauvoo. From the testimony before the Grand Jury, it appeared that counterfeiting coin has been largely carried on at that place for some years. The defendant evades the service of process." It is interesting to note that when the Mormons condemned the Nauvoo Expositor, they relied upon the testimony of Theodore Turley:

. . . the Mayor [Joseph Smith]...called upon Theodore Turley, a mechanic, who being sworn, said that the Laws (William and Wilson,) had brought bogus dies to him to fix. (History of the Church, vol. 6, pp. 434-435)

Joseph Smith was certainly acquainted with Turley, for he made this statement in the History of the Church under the date of March 10, 1843: "I told Theodore Turley that I had no objection to his building a brewery" (History of the Church, vol. 5, p. 300).

Under Brigham Young's leadership, Theodore Turley became a member of the Council of Fifty (Quest for Empire, p. 224). Under the date of November 16, 1845, Brigham Young recorded that Turley had been arrested for counterfeiting: "I learned that Elder Theodore Turley has been arrested at Alton on a charge of bogus-making" (History of the Church, vol. 7, p. 525). On November 24, 1845, Brigham Young recorded: "The council wrote Elder Theodore Turley who is now in jail awaiting his examination" (History of the Church, vol. 7, p. 532). Turley apparently received help to pay his bail and then fled west with the Mormons. A U.S. Government record dated January 12, 1847, contains this statement concerning Turley: "The deft in this case is beyond the reach of process—proceeding against his bail have been had—further proceedings useless." Under the date of March 28, 1846, Brigham Young recorded the following in his "Manuscript History":

I met my captains of Tens at the Post Office at 3:40 p.m.; immediately after which Theodore Turley came into the Council and reported that Edward Bonney, Haight and another man had been in pursuit of him for two or three days, they had followed him from Richardson's Point within five or six miles of this place, but by several meanderings and disguises he had escaped them; that his family were at Richardson's Point, and had not team sufficient to bring them on. ("Manuscript History of Brigham Young," March 28, 1846, typed copy)

On November 28, 1847, Brigham Young recorded this statement in the History of the Church: "I met with the Twelve and high council in the forenoon, Theodore Turley and Joseph Fielding were voted members of the high council" (History of the Church, vol. 7, p. 620).

Among the list of those indicted we find the name "Peter Hawes." Klaus J. Hansen shows that he was a member of the "Council of Fifty under Joseph Smith" (Quest For Empire, p. 223). The "Manuscript History of Brigham Young" makes it very clear that Peter Haws was involved in the "bogus" business after the Mormons left Nauvoo, for Brigham Young wrote the following under the date of May 12, 1846:

While I was standing with Prest. Kimball at his tent, an outcry was heard from Peter Haws' Camp; we repaired thither and found that Haws and Thomas Williams and two others had a quarrel about some property, etc. that Haws had let Williams have some bogus money on shares and Williams had not paid him his share of the profits. I reproved them for dealing in base coin and told Haws he could not govern himself, his family, or a company; and unless he repented and forsook such dishonesty, the hand of the Lord would be against him and all those who partook of such corruption. ("Manuscript History of Brigham Young," May 12, 1846, typed copy)

In the History of the Church, the Mormon historian B. H. Roberts refers to this incident, but he does not tell that it was Peter Haws who was involved:

The matter of counterfeit money spoken of in the above remarks, is again referred to in the Manuscript History of Brigham Young. It appears that the man who had the counterfeit money in his possession had let another brother have some of it on shares, which he was to exchange among the settlers north and south of the line of march in exchange for goods, etc. This man had not shared the profits with the man who gave him the bogus and hence a quarrel between them. President Young being brought to the scene of the quarrel reproved them for dealing in base coin and told the originator of the trouble that he could not govern himself, his family or a company; and unless he repented and forsook such dishonesty the hand of the Lord would be against him and all those who partook of such corruption. (History of the Church, vol. 7, p. 609)

The fact that Brigham Young rebuked Peter Haws can hardly be taken very seriously, since Haws continued to serve in the "Council of Fifty in Colonial Utah, 1847-49" (Quest for Empire, p. 225). When we find that both Peter Haws and Brigham Young were under indictment for counterfeiting at the time this occurred, it throws a new light on the whole incident.

Another suspicious reference to counterfeiting which mentions Peter Haws is found in the "Manuscript History of Brigham Young," under the date of April 5, 1846. We will refer to this later.

A Rapid Exodus

According to the United States Government records, the Mormon leaders were indicted for counterfeiting on December 18, 1845. While they remained in Nauvoo they hid from the U.S. Marshal. In 1846 they fled from Nauvoo and headed west. While the anti-Mormons were demanding that the Mormons leave Illinois, the indictments for counterfeiting apparently speeded things up. The Mormon writer Kenneth W. Godfrey made this statement: "Warrants pending for the arrest of Brigham Young and other leaders on charges of counterfeiting were among the reasons for the early departure of the Saints from the 'city of Joseph' in February rather than in the spring as originally proposed" (Brigham Young University Studies, Winter 1968, p. 215). The Mormon historian B. H. Roberts gives this very interesting information:

This threat of the use of federal authority to affect the arrest of the church authorities, relative to alleged counterfeiting of United States money, and even to prevent the migration of the saints to the west, was wickedly put forth and fostered by Governor Ford (really to play upon the fears of the church and hasten its departure from Illinois) and quite widely discussed in the press of both state and nation.

Relative to the charge of counterfeiting and the threatened arrests of the twelve therefor, Governor Ford said:

Indictments had been found against nine of them in the circuit court of the United States for the district of Illinois, at its December term, 1845, for counterfeiting the current coin of the United States. The United States marshal had applied to me for a militia force to arrest them; but in pursuance of the amnesty agreed on for old offenses, believing that the arrest would prevent the removal of the Mormons, and that if arrested there was not the least chance that any of them would ever be convicted, I declined the application unless regularly called upon by the president of the United States according to law. It was generally agreed that it would be impolitic to arrest the leaders and thus put an end to the preparations for removal when it was notorious that none of them would be convicted; for they always commanded evidence and witnesses enough to make a conviction impossible. But with a view to hasten their removal they were made to believe that the president would order the regular army to Nauvoo as soon as the navigation opened in the spring. This had its intended effect; the twelve, with about two thousand of their followers, immediately crossed the Mississippi before the breaking of the ice. But before this the deputy marshal had sought to arrest the accused without success.

There is not the slightest evidence in existence that “the twelve” were in any way connected with alleged counterfeiting operations at Nauvoo, it was clearly a “trumped up charge,” so far as they were concerned. It appears that some counterfeiters had located at Nauvoo but were routed by the diligence of the church leaders against them and their illegal traffic. These were the parties who made the charges of counterfeiting against the brethren at Springfield. . . .

The passage from Ford’s History discloses that fact, that by the subterfuge of making the twelve believe—if they did believe it—the United States army would be sent to Nauvoo in the spring to make arrests... Governor Ford himself was a party to those annoyances . . . (A Comprehensive History of the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints, vol. 2, pp. 532-533)

On January 26, 1846, Samuel Brannan wrote Brigham Young a letter in which he stated:

Mr. Benson thinks the Twelve should leave and get out of the country first and avoid being arrested if it is a possible thing, but if you are arrested you will find a staunch friend in him, . . . (History of the Church, vol. 7, pp. 588-589)

We know that the Mormons left Nauvoo in February, 1846, and it seems obvious that the indictments for counterfeiting caused the early departure and much hardship to the Mormon people. The Mormons continued west until they were outside the territorial limits of the U.S. Klaus J. Hansen observed:

Likewise, there can have been no question that, in the fall of 1845, Brigham Young knew that the area to which he hoped to move the Saints was not part of the United States. In an “Epistle to the Brethren of the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints, Scattered Abroad Through the United States of America,” Young admonished his followers that removal beyond the boundaries of the United States was a test of orthodoxy: . . . This letter indicates that Young had not contemplated the possibility that the United States would take over in the near future the region where the Saints hoped to establish the kingdom of God. The Mexican War, however, changed these calculations. (Quest for Empire, pp. 114-115)

Of the twelve men indicted for counterfeiting, we know that at least seven of them went west. Five of these men were Apostles;

Brigham Young became the second President of the Church and John Taylor the third. All seven of the men who went west served in the secret Council of Fifty.

Bogus Makers Go West

On January 24, 1846, Brigham Young made these statements:

A set of bogus-makers who recently commenced operations in this city, who are determined to counterfeit coin here by wagonloads . . . are determined to be revenged upon us, because we would not permit them to pursue their wicked business in Nauvoo, they have scattered through the country circulating their bogus money and spreading lies and every species of falsehood, saying that we are engaged in bogus-making in order thereby to conceal their crimes, and screen themselves from observation and punishment, and at the same time be avenged upon us for not consenting to the establishment of their bogus mints at Nauvoo. (History of the Church, vol. 7, p. 574)

If the Mormons were not involved in counterfeiting, the exodus from Nauvoo should have ended the matter. We have already shown, however, that as they headed west the charges of counterfeiting continued, and Brigham Young frankly admitted that Peter Haws, a member of the Council of Fifty, was involved in this business. In a letter written April 5, 1846, Brigham Young stated: “. . . I have some men in the company that are thieves and bogus makers and bogus men any way you may put them, . . .” (“Manuscript History of Brigham Young,” typed copy). On April 12, 1846, Brigham Young stated:

But there had been some things done which were wrong. There were among us those who were passing counterfeit money and had done it all the time since we left Nauvoo. There were men among us who would steal; . . . (History of the Church, vol. 7, p. 608)

William Hall, who had been a member of the church, made these statements concerning counterfeiting among the Mormons:

The bogus money, as next in dignity, claims our consideration. In this brother Turley shone conspicuous. . . . at “bogus” he could not be surpassed. A press was prepared, and the money, composed of zinc, glass, etc., coated with silver, was executed in the best style. The people at large were liberally endowed with it; . . .

When leaving Illinois for Council Bluffs, I hauled in my wagon, for some distance on the way, a bogus press. The secret object of the leaders, even at that time, was the valley of the Salt Lake. The press was afterwards sold on a credit in Missouri, but the vender was afraid afterward to go for his money. (The Abominations of Mormonism Exposed, Cincinnati, 1852, p. 20-21)

During my sojourn among them, . . . I had occasion to seek employment among the farmers of Missouri, . . . I labored, a short time, for one who lived on the disputed territory, and one day he told me that he had just sold a yoke of oxen and a cow for, I think, thirty-five dollars. . . . He showed me the money (paper money) and asked me if I thought it was good. I inquired of whom he had received it, but he could not recollect the man. I asked him to describe him. He did so. I pronounced the name of Tom Williams. That was the name. I said if he got the money from him, I expected it was bad, as he was a notorious cheat, and seldom dealt in any other than counterfeit money. . . . I advised him to go down to the camp, and go right to Brigham Young, and demand from him the cattle, stating that he had got some bad money from Williams, . . . I told him he must never mention my name, and if he should see me in camp or elsewhere, not to recognize me, or I might be in danger. I told him, moreover, that he must not accept any thing like the former price, but exact sixty or sixty-five dollars for the oxen, and ten dollars for the cow. That they must have the cattle, and were then afraid of a fuss with the people of Missouri, and would give him a good price in specie, if he insisted on it.

He went down to camp, and went to Brigham Young and told him of the bad money, . . . Brigham Young sent for Williams, and after hearing what he had to say, told him to bring the cattle to him. He told him he had parted with them to Brother Hawks [Haws?]. Young told him peremptorily to go and get them of brother Hawks, and bring them to him. . . . The cattle were brought, and Young said he would give the price for them in good gold and silver. The man told him that would not do now, he would not take it. He was asked how much he would take. "Sixty-five dollars for the oxen, and ten for the cow," he replied. Young studied a few minutes: he did not want to raise a noise for fear of the Missourians, who threatened to stop them, and then continued: "You must be an honest man! I think you are an honest man; your countenance looks like an honest man's." He paid the money, and the man departed. . . .

At Garden Grove, in Southern Iowa, somewhere near or on the disputed territory, we buried two bogus presses, which I carried in my own wagon, with a barrel of rosin, and materials belonging thereto, amounting in weight to about one thousand pounds. The reason assigned for this proceeding was, that they would want them on their return, as they would be available to press good money. The inference was, that when they returned, it would be as conquerors of the United States, and that then, having the political power in their hands, they would coin good money. Garden Grove had its name given to it by the Mormons. (Ibid., pp. 79-81)

Notice that Hall claims that a man by the name of Tom Williams passed bogus money on a farmer, and that the farmer came to Brigham Young seeking justice. This seems to be confirmed by the "Manuscript History of Brigham Young." Under the date of April 5, 1846, we find the following:

SUNDAY, 5—Morning clear, ground white with frost. . . .
The following was received:

President Brigham Young:

Mr. Cochran an old acquaintance of mine from Kentucky sold Mr. Williams a yoke of oxen, cow and chain for which he received fifty dollars, part of which he apprehends is spurious, he wishes us to assist him in getting it changed, as he thinks the young man passed it without knowing the fact, will you please to give him such aid as is in your power to affect the object he has in view.

George Miller.

I replied as follows:

Brother George Miller:

What in the name of the Lord did you think when you referred Mr. Cochran to me to assist him or render him what assistance I could? I will tell you what assistance I might render him, it is this, I have some men in the company that are thieves and bogus makers and bogus men any way you may put them, and unless they can do something to bring distress upon the saints, they are in torment like a worm in the fire.

Now brother Miller you go to the man or send some one that did the trading and have him settle the matter forthwith, or we must suffer, and I pray my Heavenly Father in the name of Jesus Christ that the man or men who will persist in such things may be cursed henceforth and go down to hell speedily, that the saints may not be cursed by his or their wickedness any more.

Let Williams deliver the property to the old man Cochran and settle the matter forthwith. Brother P. Haws will attend to this matter; there is some one that knows about it and it will all come out.

N. B. Brother Miller I want you to explain the reason why you should refer old man Cochran to me for satisfaction when you knew at the same time he was swearing vengeance against the whole camp, unless he could get satisfaction. As much as to say that I was knowing as well as accessory to the game played by those thieves, bogus men and makers of your camp. I was told by some of the brethren that you were heard to describe my omnibus and that carriage that I ride in. I want you and all the brethren east to come up with the main camp as soon as the traveling will allow.

("Manuscript History of Brigham Young," April 5, 1846, typed copy)

Hall's statement that the Mormons "buried two bogus presses, which I carried in my own wagon" is very interesting. Although we have no other evidence that bogus presses were buried, it is interesting to note that Hosea Stout says that "cannon balls had been buried" on the way to Utah (see The Mormon Kingdom, vol. 2, p. 67).

Mrs. Mary Ettie V. Smith gives this information concerning counterfeiting:

It was well known to me, although young at the time, as it was to every Mormon at Nauvoo, that great numbers of cattle and hogs were in the habit of wandering from the surrounding country into the city, and were appropriated by the Saints; and the same with other property that could be concealed. Another thing that increased the prejudice against our community, was the great amount of bogus money afloat about that time, and in some cases traced directly to the Mormons. It so happened that while at Nauvoo, and afterwards, I had an opportunity to know something of this bogus manufacture.

When we were on the route through Iowa, it occurred, that one day, when one of the wagons was upset, the press for making bogus money rolled into sight, and was seen by many Mormons, who till then had not supposed they were one of a gang of counterfeiters. But there is no doubt about the fact that the business of counterfeiting was carried on extensively, and that too under the personal sanction and blessing of the Prophet Joseph, and of the Twelve. Most of these Twelve Apostles are now living at Salt Lake, and the same is true to day there, although not done openly, and justified as is the spiritual wife practice. Even this was denied at Nauvoo to the Gentiles, while it was taught us under the ban of secrecy. One thing is certain; this bogus press was carried, to my certain knowledge, to Salt Lake, and there is now a man living in Allegany county, by the name of Lewis Wood, who saw it between Nauvoo and Council Bluffs. (Mormonism: Its Rise, Progress, and Present Condition, Hartford, 1870, pp. 28-29)

While dressing the next morning, Wallace [her husband] accidentally left his belt in my room; it was the one he wore around his body under his clothing; which I examined without his knowing it, and found it to contain about three hundred dollars of bogus money. This did not surprise me, as I had suspected it before, and I knew the authorities of the Church, if they did not manufacture it themselves, directed it to be done by others. . . . The discovery I had made as to the bogus money in the belt of Wallace, sharpened my curiosity, and I took occasion to watch his movements and all connected with him. I made it convenient, as I had an opportunity a few days after this, to question Joseph Young, brother of the Prophet, about it. I commenced by telling him I thought he had given Wallace more than his share of bogus money. The men who had the management of such matters were generally very cautious about telling the women of [i]t. Brother Joseph, thrown off his guard, replied,

"Did he get me a span of horses?"

I told him I did not know but he bought one for himself.

"Yes, yes," said brother Joseph, thinking I knew all about it, as some of the wives of the Prophet did; "he can sell the bogus any time to the Missourians, if he wishes, and they cannot detect us. If they do, we shall soon be beyond their reach. We must help ourselves this year to a good outfit for crossing the plains; and, next spring and summer, we shall be off and beyond their reach, and they can whistle."

I thus ascertained positively what I had long suspected. I went home knowing that my husband was a thief and a counterfeiter, if not something worse than either; . . . soon after this, a man came to our house, who was unknown to me, and had a long conversation with Wallace. The subject of their interview seemed to be one of great importance and secrecy. After the stranger had left, Wallace told me it was necessary for us to move to St.

Joseph, Mo.; that he was going there by direction, and in the service of the Church, and was to keep a boardinghouse to accommodate the Mormons in that State, doing business disguised as “Gentiles.”

The reader will not be surprised to know, what I soon learned to be true, that this “business” was selling bogus money, and buying with it various kinds of property needed by the Church, and forwarding it to Council Bluffs. . . .

The notorious gamblers of this region, among the Gentiles, somewhat famed about this time, stood no chance with this band of Mormons; for while they were professedly strangers, they had a system of secret signs by which they were understood by each other, and they could thus play into the hands of their friends unsuspected.

The horses, and other booty purchased or stolen, was forwarded at once to Kaneshville, and was there received by Orson Hyde, who, after assorting it, forwarded it on to the plains, or made such disposition of it as would place it beyond the reach of the Gentiles, in case suspicion should be directed towards them. Orson Hyde is one of the “Twelve Apostles,” and is often in the States. There are now many persons living by whom these facts can be proved.

The bogus money used by these men, was mostly made at Nauvoo; but I have heretofore mentioned that the press used in its manufacture was taken west, and on to Salt Lake in the wagon of Peter Hawse, and was at this time at Kaneshville. This man, Hawse, is now living on Humbolt River, west of Great Salt Lake City. (Ibid., pp. 103-107)

Mrs. Smith’s statement that the Mormon Apostle Orson Hyde received stolen property at Kaneshville is very interesting, for we know that Orson Hyde approved of stealing from the Gentiles. In his journal for October 13, 1860, John Bennion recorded that “after meeting Bp council & Elder Hyde had a long talk in my house br Hyde said speaking of stealing that a man may steal & be influenced by the spirit of the Lord to do it that Hickman had done it years past said that he never would institute a trial against a brother for stealing from Gentiles but stealing from his brethren he was down on it . . .” (The reader will find the complete statement on page 433 of this volume.)

Mrs. Smith states that a bogus press was hauled west in the wagon of “Peter Hawse.” This seems very likely, since Peter Haws (a member of the Council of Fifty) was indicted along with the Mormon leaders for counterfeiting, and since even Brigham Young admitted that while the Mormons were coming west “Haws had let Williams have some bogus money on shares . . .” (“Manuscript History of Brigham Young,” May 12, 1846, typed copy).

After the Mormons arrived at their destination by the Great Salt Lake, they decided to mint some gold coins. Dr. Wyl made this statement concerning these coins:

Should you come to Utah, reader, some old Mormon or apostate will show you the gold coins of Zion, coined by Brigham Young. Even this official money of the Kingdom, now out of course, is counterfeit; it bears on its face “Five Dollars,” and is in reality only worth about $4.30. (Mormon Portraits, p. 37)

In his book, Counterfeit, Mis-Struck and Unofficial U.S. Coins, Don Taxay stated:

Among the most prominent newcomers were the Miner’s Bank, the Pacific Co., Ormsby & Co., and the Cincinnati Mining & Trading Co. In addition, gold pieces from other territories, including the famous Mormon issues, now poured into the motley circulation. As the weeks rolled by, a veritable avalanche of private coin resuscitated the moribund economy and business thrived as never before.

In the midst of the boom the citizens received a rude shock. A series of assay tests, taken by Eckfeldt and DuBois at the Philadelphia Mint, revealed that almost all of the coins in circulation were debased. The Mormon gold, whose coining was supervised by none other than Brigham Young, was found to be wanting by as much as twenty per cent, and that of the Pacific Co., by even more. . . .

In the panic that followed the publication of Eckfeldt and DuBois’ findings, the debased issues quickly depreciated, and those holding them suffered severe losses. One by one the firms were driven out of business, and at the end of 1849 Moffat & Co. alone survived. (Counterfeit, Mis-Struck, and Unofficial U.S. Coins, by Don Taxay, New York, 1963, p. 172)

In 1859 the Mormon people again found themselves in serious trouble because of the exposure of a counterfeiting operation. The Mormon historian B. H. Roberts gives this information regarding this matter:

Two incidents happened in the troublesome fall of 1859 that threatened for a time to bring on a conflict between citizens of Utah and the army at Camp Floyd. One of these is known . . . as the Spencer-Pike affair; the other was a plot to arrest Brigham Young in connection with a case of alleged counterfeiting of government drafts. . . .

The facts in the counterfeiting case referred to in the opening paragraph of this chapter, in which it was sought to involve President Young, are as follows: a party of men in Camp Floyd, prominent among whom were M. Brewer, and J. M. Wallace, conspired to counterfeit United States quartermaster orders on St. Louis and New York. In pursuance of this purpose they employed a young “Mormon” engraver of Salt Lake City to duplicate the quartermaster’s plate at Camp Floyd. This was skilfully accomplished and the counterfeit bills printed upon it. The forgery was soon discovered and the principal in the crime, Brewer, was arrested at Camp Floyd. He promptly turned state’s evidence by confessing and threw responsibility for the crime upon the young “Mormon” engraver; and implicated a person in Brigham Young’s office for having furnished the paper for the counterfeit notes. The engraver’s tools and engraving paraphernalia were all seized by Mr. Dotson, the United States marshal, and the young engraver was arrested. Afterwards, when visiting the engraver’s regular workshop, where he had done work for Brigham Young on the “Deseret currency plates,” these plates were also seized by Mr. Dotson and carried to Camp Floyd.

The confession and allegation of Brewer seemed to bring this crime so close to the premises at least of President Young that it was hoped at Camp Floyd that he could be implicated in it. . . .

In pursuance of this purpose to make the crime “stick” on Brigham Young, a plan for his arrest was arranged, . . . The plan was to issue a writ for the arrest of Brigham Young as well as the young “Mormon” engraver, and apprehending that there would be resistance to the arrest of the former, the army was to be ordered into Salt Lake City; Johnston’s artillery was to make a breach in the wall surrounding the ex-governor’s premises, then the troops would sally forth, seize Brigham Young by force and hurry him to Camp Floyd. (A Comprehensive History of The Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints, vol. 4, pp. 503, 505, 506)

B. H. Roberts goes on to show that Governor Cumming opposed the idea of the army “creeping through walls” to arrest Brigham Young. On pages 507-510 of the same volume, B. H. Roberts gives this information:

Word indeed was brought from Camp Floyd . . . by an express rider from Camp Floyd that two regiments would be ordered that night on a forced march to Salt Lake City to make arrests. Whereupon Governor Cumming, it is said, gave orders to General D. H. Wells of the Utah militia, to be ready with a force to repulse the federal troops. And this General Wells so promptly responded to that “by two o’clock on Monday morning, five thousand men were under arms.” . . .

The young “Mormon” engraver of the counterfeit plates of the foregoing incident was put on trial, found guilty, and sentenced to prison for two years. . . .

Marshal Dotson in taking forceful possession of the “currency” plates belonging to Brigham Young exceeded his duties as an officer; while in his charge they were marred to the point of ruining them. In this condition the marshal sought to return them to their owner, but President Young refused to receive them, and brought suit against Marshal Dotson for the illegal seizure and injury of the currency plates. After a long and tedious trial President Young obtained judgment of damages to the extent of $2,600, for which property in Salt Lake City was sold to satisfy. It was this circumstance which finally led to Marshal Dotson's resignation and removal from Utah.

Judge John Cradlebaugh, who served in Utah, made these statements in a speech delivered in the House of Representatives, February 7, 1863:

With the history of one more case, I will conclude. In the summer of 1858, David Machenzie was arrested, charged with engraving plates for counterfeiting Government drafts on the Treasury at St. Louis. The evidence showed that the engraving had been done in the upper part of the Deseret store, in Salt Lake City. This store is within the inclosure of Brigham Young's premises, the same being walled in with a stone wall some twelve or fourteen feet in height. Judge Eckels, who issued the warrant, directed the marshal, Peter K. Dotson, to seize the plates, and any other matter that might be found in the room where the engraving had been done which would establish the offense. The marshal accordingly went to the room and seized the plate. He also found another plate there, belonging, as it since appears, to Brigham Young, and used for striking off the Deseret currency; and, observing that the copper-plate upon which the counterfeit engraving had been made had been cut off one side of Brigham's Deseret currency plate, he brought away with him the currency plate. After the trial Brigham refused to take them back, but brought his action against the marshal, P. K. Dotson, in the probate court. Probate courts throughout the Territory, held in violation of the organic act, are dignified into courts of coequal jurisdiction with the Federal courts. It is one of Brigham's methods of destroying and nullifying the Federal courts. He installs into these probate courts his most devoted creatures. An appeal can be made from these courts to the district court, but the appeal is almost always refused. I defy the Delegate to show that Brigham ever brought an action in one of these creature courts of his in which he did not succeed. Of course he obtained a judgment against Marshal Dotson for some $2,600. It would have been as much more if he had only said the word. An appeal is refused; execution is issued; Dotson's property is sold, and he is turned out of his house—a property that would rent for $500 per annum—Brigham's agent having bought it in. Thus a good, efficient officer is ruined in Utah for having faithfully endeavored to prevent fraud upon the Government Treasury.

I have the plates here, [exhibiting them] I have shown them to engravers in the city, and they tell me the original cost of making them could not be more than five or six hundred dollars, and say that they can be put in as good order as ever they were for twenty-five dollars. No stronger evidence could be adduced showing the absolute control of Brigham Young over the courts of Utah. ("Utah and the Mormons," a Speech of Hon. J. Cradlebaugh, in the House of Representatives, February 7, 1863, as printed in Appendix to the Congressional Globe, February 23, 1863, p. 124)

On July 20, 1859, The Valley Tan, printed an article in which the following appeared:

On Wednesday morning at 10 o'clock, Judge Eckles held a court in the Theatre to make the primary examination in the case of the forgery of Quarter Master's Cheques on the Treasury. Judges Sinclair & Cradlebaugh were present.

Myron Brewer, who was admitted as State's evidence, was the first called. After being duly sworn he made the following statement:

Resided in Salt Lake City for 3 or 4 years; in the month of May met McKenzie on the street; in course of conversation a plate was mentioned, . . . about four weeks elapsed, . . .

Witness told McKenzie he would consult his friend Mr. J. M. Wallace—did so—seemed to coincide with the views of McKenzie, spoke to him, when McKenzie said the thing was quashed. McKenzie said he must get some other party; he said Mr. John Kay had spoken to him about it, did not understand the behavior of Wallace after his return from Camp Floyd, said he was resolved to carry the thing out at all hazards.

Court—Did he assign any reason?

He said he had scruples and must communicate with Mr. Young on the subject.—Young gave him short answers.

From this time the plate progressed . . . received the plate from McKenzie . . .

Court—You state that Young said so and so. What Young?

Wit.—Brigham Young. The Tithing office is on the west side of Young's house; is enclosed and belongs to the church.

McKenzie stated he could get some paper from a son-in-law of John Kay. George D. Watt got some of the paper for him, he lives in the city; he is the reporter for the church. Witness got a quire from the Valley Tan office, but thought it was not used.

Court—Was there any agreement in writing as to the disposal of the proceeds?

Wit.—McKenzie said he should exact a receipt from Wallace for two-thirds of the proceeds. Nothing less than $500.00 was to be issued, at first $1000 was mentioned.

Court—Did he assign any reason for so large an amount?

Wit.—That it might fall into the hands of the people of the territory—they wished the government to be the sufferers. . . . Had seen McKenzie at work, in the upper room of the Tithing office; he worked in the day time—every one can have access [i]n the room. There was some contrivance with the handle of the door which gave notice of the approach of any one, and the plate disappeared under a false sill in the window. McKenzie had made some plates for the church and The Deseret News office; he worked as a mechanic. . . . the impression was taken off the plates by a hand press in the office in the Tithing store; Mr. Wallace was engaged as agent.

Mr. J. M. Wallace next stated he had an [in]terview with McKenzie, who told him that Wallace) was recommended to him by Mr. Brigham Young as a man to be trusted.

Wallace entered into the scene, and no[t]ified Gen. Johnston of what was going on . . . (The Valley Tan, Great Salt Lake City, U.T., July 20, 1859)

Juanita Brooks states that the Mormon engraver McKenzie "refused to implicate Brigham Young or anyone else, but took his sentence of imprisonment for two years" (On The Mormon Frontier: The Diary of Hosea Stout, vol. 2, p. 699, n. 60). Mrs. Brooks also gives this interesting information concerning McKenzie:

David McKenzie was born in Edinburgh, Scotland, December 27, 1833. . . . On February 11, 1853, McKenzie was baptized into the Mormon Church and the next year came to Utah. On March 7, 1857, he was made a Seventy, . . . He was engaged to engrave the plates for the Deseret currency, and while thus engaged he lived with the family of Brigham Young in the Beehive House. On February 28, he married Mary Ann Crowther, and four months later was involved in the counterfeiting scandal. . . .

McKenzie was convicted and sentenced to a two-year prison term, at the end of which he became disbursing clerk at the tithing office. Later he became one of the most popular actors at the Salt Lake Theater. In 1868 McKenzie was made private secretary of Brigham Young; still later succeeded Horace K. Whitney in keeping the church books. He died March 10, 1912, in Salt Lake City. (Ibid., p. 698, n. 58)

Although the Mormon leaders always denied that they were involved in counterfeiting, there is so much evidence to the contrary that it cannot be easily dismissed (for more information see The Mormon Kingdom, vol. 2, pp. 50-70).

Mormon Scholars Look at Joseph Smith's Financial Difficulties

On page 535 of this book, we quoted a letter from J. Butterfield, U.S. Attorney for the District of Illinois, in which he accused Joseph Smith of making “fraudulent transfers of his property” at the time he attempted to take out bankruptcy. Joseph I. Bentley and Dallin H. Oaks, who served as president of Brigham Young University, took exception to this charge:

After a September trip to consult land records in Nauvoo and Carthage, Butterfield wrote the Treasury Solicitor on 11 October 1842 that he had found sufficient evidence to sustain Bennett’s accusations of fraud by Joseph Smith and had even found other deed conveyances to or from Joseph not mentioned by Bennett. Butterfield probably discovered some of the many conveyances Joseph Smith continued to execute or receive (probably on the advice of counsel) in his capacity as trustee for the Church after he had filed for bankruptcy in his personal capacity. In any event, Butterfield wrote that he had appeared at the 1 October hearings in Springfield, armed with certified copies of various deeds, and had successfully opposed the Smith’s discharges in bankruptcy.

Butterfield’s written objections to discharge, as formally filed with the court on 1 October, contained several general grounds for opposition: . . . Butterfield first charged that Joseph Smith in contemplation of bankruptcy transferred property to persons who were not bona fide creditors or purchasers for a valuable consideration. Butterfield did not identify any specific conveyances or include other supporting details for his general objections, other than by reference to Bennett’s published accusations. Bennett’s earlier attack had specified seven conveyances that he alleged were fraudulently made by Joseph Smith—one to his wife, Emma, four to his children, and two to himself as trustee for the Church. However, four of these conveyances were made by persons not related to Joseph Smith or his family and therefore would not qualify as conveyances “made or given by [a] bankrupt” within the prohibitions of the Act. As to the remaining three, the issue was whether Joseph made them “in contemplation of bankruptcy.” . . . Butterfield further charged that since 1 January 1841 Joseph Smith had made invalid transfers to some of his creditors in preference to other creditors in contemplation of the passage of the Bankruptcy Act. . . . unless Butterfield found proof that Joseph had made at least one conveyance to a creditor, this objection was ill-founded, even if, as is by no means certain, such conveyance could be shown to have been made “in contemplation of passage” of the Bankruptcy Act. . . .

Since John C. Bennett was then an implacable enemy of the Mormons, his charges of fraud carry little weight. But those of U.S. Attorney Justin Butterfield, one of the best lawyers of his day, are entitled to careful consideration. . . . There is no evidence that Joseph Smith had understood or even heard of the Bankruptcy Act until attorney Warren explained it to him in Nauvoo on 14 April 1842. As shown earlier, none of the Mormon newspapers carried any prior information concerning the new bankruptcy law, . . . there is abundant evidence, summarized above, to show that the deeds probably relied upon by Justin Butterfield at the 1 October bankruptcy hearing were executed according to a policy adopted prior to the Bankruptcy Act—and vigorously promoted by the Quorum of the Twelve—of separating Joseph’s personal properties from those held in trust and of making adequate provision for his family out of the latter. (Brigham Young University Studies, Winter 1979, pp. 182-184)

On page 174 of the same article, Oaks and Bentley concede that at one time Joseph Smith’s own financial dealings could not be separated from those of the church:

Nevertheless, when Joseph Smith prepared a list of his debts totalling $73,066.38 during the spring of 1842, he included the following entry at the top of the list on nine creditors: “To the United States of America, September 10, 1840—$4,866.38.”

Federal efforts to collect this admitted obligation ran into almost insurmountable difficulties largely because during the first two years of the Mormon settlement in Nauvoo the financial activities of the Church and the personal financial affairs of Joseph Smith were indistinguishable.

In his book, History of the Saints, pages 96-97, John C. Bennett claimed that a great deal of property had been transferred from Joseph Smith and his wife to “Joseph Smith, as sole Trustee in trust for the Church” to avoid paying debts owed. Bennett maintained that the law stipulated that trustees of Religious Societies in Illinois could not purchase more than “five acres.” Oaks and Bentley concede that there was a law limiting the property a trustee could receive (they give the limit as ten acres), but feel that Smith was ignorant of this law:

The Illinois statute which the Church had relied on in designating Joseph Smith as trustee-in-trust for the Church made it lawful for the trustee of any religious society “to receive by gift, devise or purchase, a quantity of land not exceeding 10 acres.” There is no evidence that Joseph Smith or other Church leaders were ever aware of this ten-acre limitation on church ownership of land. . . .

The judge who examined witnesses and land records found that although Joseph Smith was duly elected to the office of trustee-in-trust for the Church prior to his receipt of deeds to the properties at issue in this case, Joseph Smith as trustee had received earlier deeds for “more than ten acres of land situated in said Hancock County.” . . .

As a corollary of the court’s ruling that Joseph Smith owned all trustee-in-trust (Church) properties in excess of ten acres in his personal capacity, it followed that Emma Smith owned a one-sixth dower interest in all such properties. The court so decreed. As a result, persons who had purchased from the successor trustees what they thought were Church properties would now have those properties sold at a judicial sale, with one-sixth of the proceeds being paid to Emma Smith. This result must have been embarrassing to the Church and an unexpected windfall for Emma Smith, then Mrs. Lewis C. Bidamon. (Ibid, pp. 195-196)

On page 198 of the same article, Oaks and Bentley claim that “Although plagued by misfortune in business and bad advice about the law, Joseph Smith was nevertheless untainted by any wrongful conduct.”

Marvin S. Hill, C. Keith Rooker and Larry T. Wimmer have written another article in defense of Joseph Smith’s business dealings. These authors feel that Joseph Smith’s indebtedness has been exaggerated by anti-Mormon writers:

III. Meticulous research into court records and the papers of Joseph Smith indicate that Joseph’s total cumulative indebtedness over the period 1835-37 was a little over $100,000 rather than in excess of $150,000 as Brodie maintains. There is evidence that at least $60,000 of this debt was subsequently settled, possibly much more. Brodie ignores Smith’s assets. We have found that Smith owned land in conjunction with others worth $130,000. Assuming that this was bought entirely on credit (which is unlikely), Smith and company held $59,500 in equity as a result of rising land values. Thus Smith and other investors associated with him had assets in excess of their debts when they left Kirtland in early 1838. These assets would likely have been adequate to cover Smith’s business ventures had there been sufficient liquid capital and a continuing prosperity. (Brigham Young University Studies, Summer 1977, p. 459)

These authors feel that Joseph Smith's big financial mistake was setting up an "unchartered bank." They frankly admit that

While he may have been encouraged in his decision by various groups, and by bad professional advice from lawyers, ultimately the responsibility for the decision to proceed with the bank was his. . . . In the face of numerous lawsuits and threats upon his life, Joseph Smith chose the alternative of fleeing Kirtland—a personal defeat since he fled not only creditors, but also had to leave behind the temple and the community he had gathered. (Ibid., p. 458)

The reader will remember that Joseph Smith said that the legislature would not grant a charter for the bank "because we were 'Mormons'." Hill, Rooker and Wimmer, however, admit "There is little evidence that the Church in this instance was subject to religious persecution." The same writers freely admit that Joseph Smith was found guilty of violating the law:

The Smith and Rigdon cases were tried by a jury in October 1837, resulting in a judgment of $1,000 plus small costs against each.

These cases were filed under an Ohio statute adopted in 1816 that made conduct of the banking business by any persons or associations other than those duly incorporated by the legislature unlawful, . . . Examination of the court records establishes that Joseph Smith and Sidney Rigdon were properly charged, tried by jury, and found to have violated the statute. This finding, of course, implicitly held the entire Society activity wholly unlawful, and made it impossible for it to survive, even had survival been otherwise possible. (Ibid., pp. 437-38)

36. Blood Flows in Utah

In the chapter on “Blood Atonement” we showed that the early Mormon leaders taught that if men commit certain sins they should “have their blood spilt upon the ground, that the smoke thereof might ascend to heaven as an offering for their sins; and the smoking incense would atone for their sins. . . .” (Deseret News, 1856, p. 235)

We have demonstrated that even Gustive O. Larson, Professor of Church History at the Brigham Young University, is willing to admit that “Blood Atonement” was actually practiced, and that he cites a “verbally reported case of a Mr. Johnson in Cedar City who was found guilty of adultery with his stepdaughter by a bishop’s court and sentenced to death for atonement of his sins” (Utah Historical Quarterly, January 1958, p. 62, n. 39).

We have also shown that a “Dr. Vaun” was “shot and killed” for the same offense. There were many other cases of “Blood Atonement” in early Utah. On September 21, 1851, Hosea Stout wrote of another murder:

I learned to day that Howard Egan, who has returned from the gold mines lately, and upon learning that his wife had been seduced or in other word had had a child willingly by James M. Monroe . . . Egan drew a pistol and shot him dead which makes the second man who has been deliberately shot dead for the same offence in less than one year in the Territory. (On The Mormon Frontier, The Diary of Hosea Stout, vol. 2, p. 404)

The Mormon Apostle George A. Smith argued in behalf of the defendant. In the Journal of Discourses, published by the Mormon Church, we find the following statements by George A. Smith:

The principle, the only one that beats and throbs through the heart of the entire inhabitants of this Territory, is simply this: The man who seduces his neighbor’s wife must die, and her nearest relative must kill him! . . . When the news reached Iron County, that Egan’s wife had been seduced by Monroe, the universal conclusion was, “there has to be another execution;” and if Howard Egan had not killed that man, he would have been damned by the community for ever, and could not have lived peaceably, without the frown of every man. . . .

If Howard Egan did kill James Monroe, it was in accordance with the established principles of justice known in these mountains. That the people of this Territory would have regarded him as accessory to the crimes of that creature, had he not done it, is also a plain case. . . . he would have been damned in the eyes of this whole community. . . . I want the crocodile, the hyena, that would destroy the reputation of our females to feel that the mark is upon him; and the avenger upon his path, ready to pounce upon him at any moment to take vengeance; . . . (Journal of Discourses, vol. 1, pp. 97-99)

Hon. Z. Snow, Judge of the First Judicial District Court for the Territory of Utah, argued against the Apostle Smith’s contention that it was all right to kill in the name of the Lord: “If, as it is contended by the defendant’s attorney, he killed Monroe in the name of the Lord, it does not change the law of the case” (Ibid., p. 101). Since the Mormon Church supported Egan there was no chance for conviction, and therefore he was released.

Besides the death penalty the Mormon leaders used whipping and castration to keep their people in line. Brigham Young recorded the following in his history under the date of September 6, 1846:

Daniel Barnham, Pelatiah Brown and Jackson Clothier received thirty lashes each, administered by the Marshal with a hickory switch, upon the bare back, for illicit intercourse with females. (“Manuscript History of Brigham Young,” September 6, 1846, typed copy)

Under the date of September 12, 1846, Brigham Young wrote: “Some boys have been whipped in camp, and it is right.” The next day Brigham Young preached a sermon in which we find the following:

Prest. Young said, . . .

There have been some feelings of late in the camp because some unruly boys have been flogged by the Marshal for their wickedness; . . . The Marshal has not whipped the boys enough, if he had, they would not have spit out their revenge, he should have whipped it out of them. . . . such transgressors should be taken care of, in a manner that they would not whine. He said, he would whip any man that would sustain such corruption . . . (“Manuscript History of Brigham Young,” September 13, 1846)

Hosea Stout speaks of this same matter in his journal:

Friday September 4th 1846 . . . I saw Br Wilford Woodruff who informed me of the conduct of some young men towards some young women. . . . they and the girls had been out for fifteen nights in succession until after two o’clock and that it was his wish & the wish of the President that I should take the matter in hand and see that they had a just punishment by whipping them and for me to take my own course and use my own judgement in executing the same . . . The crimes of these men were adultery or having carnal communication with the girls which was well known to many and the legal punishment was death

Saturday Sept 5th 1846. I was busy in making preparation to execute the order of the President and Br Woodruff . . . one of these men was chopping wood. . . .

When we came he suspected our business and was uncommonly excited He began to plead . . . He had seen Woodruff & did not make satisfaction nor could he as Woodruff told him this side of hell for he told him that nothing short of fire & brimstone could cleanse them so when we came two of us having guns he never thought of anything else but to be killed forth with. This was what excited him so much At length I told in a few words that we must execute our orders . . . He was weeping & begging all the time. At length he exclaimed that he did not want to be taken off and killed this way. I then first discovered what he expected so I told him that he was not to be killed. He then expected we were going to put the next worst punishment on him [Juanita Brooks states that “The second worst punishment was emasculation.”] so then I told him that we were only going to give him a severe whipping . . . We took him to a good place and the Marshall gave him 18 hard lashes . . . after which we taught him the principles of the law and the just punishment for such crimes and what he need to expect if ever we had to visit him again now since we had declared to him the law of God. . . .

Sunday Sept 6th 1846. This morning a number of the Police and the Marshall went over into Heber camp and took Peletiah Brown . . . into the woods and give him 18 stripes which brought the blood in two places . . . we had now but one more case to attend to and that was A. J. Clothier . . .

We took him out of camp and gave him 23 stripes putting on five for his mean conduct while in our hands.

Monday September 7th 1846. Went to see President Young after breakfast and reported what [had] been done which he said was all right and perfectly satisfactory on his part . . .

Saturday September 12th 1846. At home all day Went to a council at Rockwoods tent at 7 o'clock P.M. Here President Young spoke with great power . . . of the whipping which those boys got . . . He sustained the whipping of them and gave them to understand what they might expect if the law of God came and we were disobedient to its mandates. (On The Mormon Frontier, The Diary of Hosea Stout, University of Utah, 1964, vol. 1, pp. 190-193)

The Mormon historian Juanita Brooks states that the Mormons not only practiced whipping but emasculation as well:

But there were some rogues among them who had to be dealt with, either by the whipping post, by public humiliation at the election polls, or by means even more drastic. If it were necessary to emasculate a man who was corrupting the morals of the community, it would serve as a warning to others that such things would not be tolerated here, and it would guarantee that the offender should be harmless thereafter. Public courts had their place, but differences settled between brethren at the Bishop's Courts or before the High Council were not determined by legal technicalities but by the broad principles of human rights. So the president did well to tell the world that in Zion there was no need of civil courts. (John D. Lee, by Juanita Brooks, Calif., 1962, p. 153)

Heber C. Kimball, a member of the First Presidency, made this statement on July 12, 1857:

. . . if I am not a good man, I have no just right in this Church to a wife or wives, or to the power to propagate my species. What, then, should be done with me? Make a eunuch of me, and stop my propagation. (Journal of Discourses, vol. 5, p. 29)

Hosea Stout wrote the following in his diary under the date of August 17, 1858:

Was invited by Judge Eckles to day to his room He gave me a letter from one Wm R Yancey to him stating that one John Beal had been castrated in Ogden lately for adultery with E. Lish's wife. (On The Mormon Frontier, The Diary of Hosea Stout, vol. 2, p. 663)

Judge Cradlebaugh, who had served in the United States Federal Court in the Utah Territory, wrote the following in a letter dated January 18, 1860:

Now to the end that the country may know the truth respecting these matters, . . . I assert—

1st. That the Mormon people are subject to a theocratic government, and recognizes no law as binding which does not coincide with their pretended revelations . . .

4th. That they teach the doctrine of "the shedding of human blood for the remission of sin," as defined by their own ecclesiastical code, and these teachings are carried into practice. . . .

5th. That they teach the doctrine that it is right and godly that Mormons should rob Gentiles whenever they can do so with facility and escape public exposure. . . .

6th. That they teach the doctrine and practice it, of castrating men, and have declared from their pulpit, with public acquiescence, that the day was near when their valleys would resound with the voice of eunuchs.

I am prepared here and now with proofs to sustain these charges, . . . (Letter from Judge Cradlebaugh, as printed in Valley Tan, February 22, 1860, p. 2)

John D. Lee related the following in his Confessions:

In Utah it has been the custom with the Priesthood to make eunuchs of such men as were obnoxious to the leaders. This was done for a double purpose: first, it gave a perfect revenge, and next, it left the poor victim a living example to others of the dangers of disobeying counsel and not living as ordered by the Priesthood.

In Nauvoo it was the orders from Joseph Smith and his apostles to beat, wound and castrate all Gentiles that the police could take in the act of entering or leaving a Mormon household under circumstances that led to the belief that they had been there for immoral purposes. I knew of several such outrages while there. In Utah it was the favorite revenge of old, wornou[t] members of the Priesthood, who wanted young women sealed to them, and many a young man was unsexed for refusing to give up his sweetheart at the request of an old and failing, but still sensual apostle or member of the Priesthood. . . .

Warren Snow was Bishop of the Church at Manti, San Pete County, Utah. He had several wives, but there was a fair, buxom young woman in the town that Snow wanted for a wife. . . . She . . . told him she was then engaged to a young man, a member of the Church, and consequently could not marry the old priest. . . . He told her it was the will of God that she should marry him, . . .

The girl continued obstinate. The "teachers" of the town visited her and advised her to marry Bishop Snow. . . . Then the authorities called on the young man and directed him to give up the young woman. This he steadfastly refused to do. He was promised Church preferment, celestial rewards, and everything that could be thought of—all to no purpose. He remained true to his intended, and said he would die before he would surrender his intended wife to the embraces of another.

. . . The young man was ordered to go on a mission to some distant locality, so that the authorities would have no trouble in effecting their purpose of forcing the girl to marry as they desired. But the mission was refused.

. . . His fate was left to Bishop Snow for his decision. He decided that the young man should be castrated; Snow saying, "When that is done, he will not be liable to want the girl badly, and she will listen to reason when she knows that her lover is no longer a man."

It was then decided to call a meeting of the people who lived true to counsel, . . . in Manti, . . . The young man was there, and was again requested, ordered and threatened, to get him to surrender the young woman to Snow, but true to his plighted troth, he refused to consent to give up the girl. The lights were then put out. An attack was made on the young man. He was severely beaten, and then tied with his back down on a bench, when Bishop Snow took a bowie-knife, and performed the operation in a most brutal manner, . . .

The party then left the young man weltering in his blood, . . . The young man regained his health, but has been an idiot or quiet lunatic ever since, . . . To make a long story short, I will say, the young woman was soon after forced into being sealed to Bishop Snow

Brigham Young, when he heard of this treatment of the young man, was very mad, but did nothing against Snow. He left him in charge as Bishop at Manti, and ordered the matter to be hushed up. This is only one instance of many that I might give to show the danger of refusing to obey counsel in Utah. (Confessions of John D. Lee, photo-reprint of 1880 edition, pp. 284-286)

On April 26, 1859, the Valley Tan, a non-Mormon newspaper published in Salt Lake City, told of the castration of _____ Lewis by a party, including a bishop of one of the southern settlements, who were bringing him up towards this city as a prisoner, and of _____ who was castrated in _____ the same season.

These two latter are still living in a condition, in comparison, to which death would have been a blessing. One of these was lately at Camp Floyd. The other lives in a hole in the ground near one of the settlements [in] San Pete Valley, and is perfectly crazy. (Valley Tan, April 26, 1859)

The reader will note that the incident which John D. Lee related occurred in "San Pete County," and that the man was "an idiot or quiet lunatic ever since." Since the Valley Tan stated that the man lived in "a hole in the ground near one of the settlements [in] San Pete Valley and is perfectly crazy,” we cannot help but believe this is referring to the same incident. Henry Jones was castrated and finally murdered because of the doctrine of “Blood Atonement.” Harold Schindler states that “Jones had been mutilated and put to death after being accused of incest with his mother, who shared his fate” (Orrin Porter Rockwell, p. 287). In a footnote on the same page, Mr. Schindler gives this information:

This incredibly bizarre crime caused a sensation among the Mormons. Henry Jones, according to Achilles: Destroying Angels of Mormonism, pp. 18-19, had only recently returned from California when the citizens of Great Salt Lake City spread gossip accusing him of having an unnatural relationship with his mother. Achilles continues:

Rockwell was despatched to administer justice. Jones was met in a saloon with some friends, and the Chief of the Danites joined the party, and participated in their hilarity. While under the influence of liquor, Rockwell and others enticed Jones out to the suburbs, where they bound and gagged him, and Rockwell castrated him. Jones made out to get home and recovered. Shortly afterwards, he and his mother started by the Southern route to come to California. About seventy miles out from Salt Lake city, they were overtaken at a place called Payson, and encamped in a “dug-out.” Rockwell and his party while they were asleep, entered the “dug-out,” and in opening the door awoke Jones, who broke through his assailants and ran for his life. The party then entered and killed his mother, cutting her throat. They then started in pursuit of Jones, and captured him about three miles out, and shot him. They then took his body and carried it back to the “dug-out,” and laid it beside his mother, and then pulled the building down upon the bodies, and there they lie to-day.

That Jones had been castrated two months before being murdered is verified by Hosea Stout’s diary:

Saturday 27 Feb 1858. This evening several persons disguised as Indians entered Henry Jones’ house and dragged him out of bed with a whore and castrated him by a square & close amputation. (On the Mormon Frontier; The Diary of Hosea Stout, vol. 2, p. 653)

On April 19, 1859, the Valley Tan printed an affidavit by Nathaniel Case which contained the following statements:

Nathaniel Case being sworn, says: that he has resided in the Territory of Utah since the year 1850; lived with Bishop Hancock (Charles Hancock) in the town of Payson, at the time Henry Jones and his mother were murdered, about the 15th of April, 1858.—The night prior to the murder a secret council meeting was held in the upper room of Bishop Hancock’s house; saw Charles Hancock, George W. Hancock, Daniel Rawson, James Bracken, George Patten and Price Nelson go into that meeting that night. Meetings had been held pretty regularly for three weeks before the last one a[t] the same place. I was not in any of the meetings; I boarded at the bishop’s. About 8 o’clock in the evening of the murder the company gathered at Bishop Hancock’s; the same persons I have named above were in the company. They said they were going to guard a corral where Henry Jones was going to come that night and steal horses; they had guns.

I had a good minnie rifle and Bishop Hancock wanted to borrow it; I refused to lend it to him. The above persons all went away together; I don’t know what time they got back. Next morning I heard that Henry Jones and his mother had been killed. I wnet (sic) down to the dug-out where they lived when the sun was about an hour high. The old woman was laying on the ground in the dug-out on a little straw, in the clothes in which she was killed. She had a bullet hole through her head, entering near the centre of the forehead. In about 15 or 20 minutes Henry Jones was brought there and laid by her side; they then threw some old bed clothes over them and an old feather bed and then pulled the dug-out on top of them. . . .

The next Sunday after the murder, in a church meeting in payson, Charles Hancock, the bishop, said, as to the killing of Jones and his mother he cared nothing about it, and it would have been done in daylight if circumstances would have permitted it.—This was said from the stand; there were 150 or 200 persons present. He gave no reasons for killing them. And further saith not.

Nathaniel Case.

Sworn to and signed before me this 9th day of April, 1859.

John Cradlebaugh,

Judge 2nd Judicial District.

Those who murdered Henry Jones and his mother may have very well remembered Brigham Young’s words which were delivered in a sermon just two years before:

Suppose you found your brother in bed with your wife, and put a javelin through both of them, you would be justified, and they would atone for their sins, and be received into the Kingdom of God. I would at once do so in such a case; and under such circumstances, I have no wife whom I love so well that I would not put a javelin through her heart, and I would do it with clean hands . . . (Journal of Discourses, vol. 3, p. 247)

Killing the Thieves

On December 10, 1858, the Valley Tan published this statement:

What has become of that deaf and dumb boy that used to be around the streets. He has been missing now for two or three weeks. We have heard it rumored that he had “gone under.” Do any of the police know anything about him? We ask for information.

The next issue of the Valley Tan contained two letters which were supposed to have been written by Mormons:

Salt Lake City,
Dec. 11, 1858.

Mr. Kirk Anderson:

You inquire in your last paper, the w[here]abouts of the “deaf and dumb boy.” That your impertinant inquiries may be satisfied, and we hear no more about the matter; I will inform you that he has been permanently and decently planted, about one and a half miles north east of your office; in a place called a Cemetery—where, if you desire, you can find him.

It was necessary for his salvation, that his existence on earth should be abbreviated, and consequently his sudden transition from this to a better world.

Having said this much, I would advise you, that it is not proper that you, hereafter notice such matters in your paper. It is one of the rights guaranteed to us by the Constitution of our Government; “to worship God according to the dictates of our own consciences;” with which right, it is to be hoped you will not again attempt to meddle.

I hope you will take the hint, it certainly will be to your advantage. You see our paper the “Deseret News,” does not make itself objectionable by heralding such things.

Kirk Anderson Esq:

Sir: —I have not the pleasure of your acquaintance, but I am very glad to see the course pursued by you in your paper; I think it will be approved of by many of our Church members at least by all those who are opposed to many acts of violence that are done under a pretended right and color of our faith. I never did and never can believe in the doctrine that it was right to take a persons life, for the purpose of saving him; yet many of my brothers differ with me on this—they think that when there is danger of Apostatizing they should by a premature transition from this world be secured the happiness of a better one.

You Inquire in your paper of last week about the deaf and dumb boy. For your information I will say that he was killed about three or four weeks ago about twelve miles east of here, in the Kanyon on the road to Bridger, and near the house of Ephraim Hanks. The person who killed him, is a Policeman of this City, his name is _____. The boy was shot through the arm, and also had a second shot through the breast, that not killing him his throat was cut. I am glad to see you notice these things, it may have a tendency to prevent such actions in future.

Not being much in the habit of putting my thoughts on paper, you will look over my disconnected kind of writing,

. . . I thought it was right to let you know that some of us approved of your paper, and thought it my duty to answer your inquiry. (Valley Tan, December 17, 1858, pp. 2-3)

Darwin Richardson, who saw the boy after he was murdered, testified that “The wound in the neck was a considerable one. It seemed to be a gash severing the Trachia, and, coming out on the other side, it was a complete throat cut; thinks the jugular was cut; saw a bullet hole on the right breast; . . .”

N. L. Christianson was arrested and charged with the murder. Brigham Young defended the policeman’s actions and stated that he “is a very good sober Dane” (Letter from Brigham Young, dated December 24, 1858, microfilm copy). He claimed that Christianson was attacked by the boy and that he “put an end to the conflict as well as the life of Dummy, by inflicting a severe wound in his neck.” It was only natural that Brigham Young would defend this cruel deed, since he publicly stated that he would “be perfectly willing to see thieves have their throats cut; . . .” (History of the Church, vol. 7, p. 597). On another occasion he stated:

If you want to know what to do with a thief that you may find stealing, I say kill him on the spot, and never suffer him to commit another iniquity. . . . If you will cause all those whom you know to be thieves, to be placed in a line before the mouth of one of our largest cannon, well loaded with chain shot, I will prove by my works whether I can mete out justice to such persons, or not. I would consider it just as much my duty to do that, as to baptize a man for the remission of his sins. (Journal of Discourses, vol. 1, pp. 108-109)

Since Brigham Young defended the murderer there was no chance that he could be convicted. Under the date of January 4, 1859, Hosea Stout recorded the following in his diary:

District Court met to day and the grand jury ignored the Indictment against Christensen for killing Dummy, which created much excitement among the outsiders. (On the Mormon Frontier; The Diary of Hosea Stout, vol. 2, p. 676)

For additional information concerning this matter see The Mormon Kingdom, vol. 2, pp. 137-138.

T.B.H. Stenhouse made this statement concerning the Mormon police in Brigham Young’s time:

Resistance to an officer, or the slightest attempt to escape from custody, was eagerly seized, when wanted, as the justification of closing a disreputable career, and in more than one case of this legal shooting, there is much doubt if even the trivial excuse was waited for. The Salt Lake police then earned the reputation of affording every desperate prisoner the opportunity of escape, and, if embraced, the officer’s ready revolver brought the fugitive to a “halt,” and saved the county the expenses of a trial and his subsequent boarding in the penitentiary. (Rocky Mountain Saints, p. 149, as quoted in Orrin Porter Rockwell; Man of God, Son of Thunder, p. 315)

J. H. Beadle gave the following information:

Soon after, three apostates named Potter, Wilson and Walker, were arrested at Coalville in Weber Valley, on a trumped up charge of stealing a cow. This Potter was a brother of those murdered at Springville in 1857, and had been pursued with unrelenting hatred. Several times he had been arrested on various charges and as often acquitted. His death was now determined upon, and one “Art” Hinckley, a “Danite” and Salt Lake policeman was sent for. Evidence afterwards obtained, shows that he was accompanied by another policeman, and joined by parties at different points on his way. They proceeded to the schoolhouse where the three men were confined, and took them out. Walker suspecting foul play, saw two of his guards level their guns at him, when he dodged down and the shots only slightly wounded him in the neck. At the same instant the contents of a heavily loaded shot-gun were fired into Potter’s body. Walker being an agile man escaped by jumping a near fence, receiving another slight wound in so doing, and made his way through canons and ravines to Camp Douglas. Wilson also ran a little way, but was shot dead. On the evidence of Walker the assassins were arrested, but by the connivance of Mormon officers escaped from the Territorial Marshal, who had them in charge. The Mormon papers labored to explain the affair, stating that the prisoners were shot in attempting to escape from custody; but it is the testimony of all who saw the corpse of Potter, that the gun must have been almost touching his body when fired, and that his throat was cut after death. This was no doubt in fulfilment of the penalty in the Endowment oath. Walker remained about Camp Douglas for some time, then suddenly disappeared, and has since never been heard of. Shortly after, a colored man generally known as “Negro Tom,” who had been brought to the Territory by the Mormons as a slave, . . . called upon some Federal officials and stated that he could give important evidence in regard to some of these murders. A few days after, his body was found upon the “bench” two miles east of the city, horribly mangled, his throat cut from ear to ear, and on his breast a large placard marked:

LET WHITE WOMEN ALONE.

(Life in Utah; or, The Mysteries and Crimes of Mormonism, pp. 210- 212)

Since Potter, Wilson and Walker had been charged with stealing, and since Brigham Young taught that thieves should “have their throats cut” (History of the Church, vol. 7, p. 597), the guards undoubtedly felt justified in committing this crime.

On January 19, 1862, Brigham Young made these comments:

I was sorry for an expression made by one of our officials in relation to the late killing of three thieves. He considered that they were dealt with by mob violence. . . . The three persons that were lately killed were notorious thieves, and resisted the officers in the discharge of their duty. . . . There has been enough said to such characters, and they must quit such practices. I say, If they will not reform, I wish they would resist the officers, and then there is an end of them and of their depredations upon the honest citizens of Utah

The best people in the world are in this Territory, and yet there is not another community, according to our numbers, so infested by thieves as we are. . . .

I mourn not that a thief is killed, but that any human being would so far debase himself as to become a mean, low, degraded thief. (Journal of Discourses, vol. 9, pp. 154-155)

R. N. Baskin made these observations concerning the attack on Potter, Wilson and Walker:

. . . the armed man discharged the gun against the body of Potter at a range so close as to cause his instant death. At the discharge of the gun, both Wilson and Walker broke away and ran for their lives. Wilson was overtaken and killed at the edge of the Weber river. As Walker made his escape, a charge from a shotgun grazed his breast and lacerated his hand and wrist. He was wearing neither coat nor vest, and the charge set his shirt on fire and as he ran he extinguished the fire by the blood from his wounds. . . . Several of the residents of Coalville testified that they were awakened by the shots fired, and rushed out to learn the cause of the disturbance; that they saw Potter dead upon the ground, with his throat cut from ear to ear. . . .

The only excuse ever claimed by any of the accused was that Potter, Wilson and Walker attempted to escape, and were shot while running away. In the light of the fact that Potter’s throat was cut and his clothes scorched by the charge which killed him, and that Walker’s shirt was set on fire by the shot which wounded him, such a claim is absurd. . . . (Reminiscences of Early Utah, pp. 9-12)

As to the killing of the Negro man, the early Mormon people could easily justify such an act. Brigham Young himself once stated: “Shall I tell you the law of God in regard to the African race? If the white man who belongs to the chosen seed mixes his blood with the seed of Cain, the penalty, under the law of God is death on the spot. This will always be so" (Journal of Discourses, vol. 10, p. 110).

Parrish Murders

On March 19, 1857, Hosea Stout reported the following in his diary: "Learned this morning that on last Sunday evening that Garder G. Potter, William Parrish and his son were killed at Springville. The circumstances and how I have not learned" (On The Mormon Frontier, The Diary of Hosea Stout, vol. 2, p. 624). The Mormon historian B. H. Roberts stated: "The victims were members of the Parrish family, and the deed was committed on the eve of the intended departure of the family for California" (Comprehensive History of the Church, vol. 4, p. 176, n. 26). On April 5, 1859, The Valley Tan printed an article which contained the following:

By testimony taken on a preliminary examination in the case pending . . . it appears that about the 1st day of March, 1857, a private council-meeting was held at Bishop Johnson's house in Springville. . . . the object was to talk about apostates and the disposition to be made of them.

About a week after this another meeting is held at the same place, at which time Duff Potter and Abraham Durfee are selected for the purpose of attending to the Parrishes and some person residing at the Indian farm.

The evidence does not disclose the names of all the persons there, the witness however, recollects the following named persons, as participating in both of those meetings: Aaron Johnson, the Bishop of Springville, Lorenzo Johnson, his brother, A. F. McDonald, Mayor of the city of Springville, Andrew Wiles, William Bird, Lorin Roundy, Simmons Curtis, Duff Potter, Abraham Durfee, and Joseph Bartholomew. . . . During the week following, the last meeting, Parrish was robbed of four horses and a carriage. The family, after the murder of the Parrishes, recovered two of the horses and the carriage. They were found in the stable of Kimball Bullock, present Mayor of Provo. . . .

Early in the week before the murder, William Johnson, a Mr. Metcalf and a person whose name is not recollected, came to the house of Mr. Parrish, professing to be religious teachers, and questioned him in regard to his faith.—His answer to them seems not to have been satisfactory. A short time after this, Alexander McDonald and Wilber J. Earl come to the house of Mr. Parrish about dusk in the evening, . . . he is taken across the street behind an unfinished house . . . Alvira Parrish, the wife of Mr. Wm. R. Parrish, passes over into this house, and from an open window hears a conversation which she states as follows:

McDonald told my husband that he should never see his grey horses any more, that he had stolen them from a widow woman. My husband said, that if he could go to Brigham Young's he could get papers to show that the horses were his own, and that he had honestly obtained them. McDonald or Earl replied: if you start to go to see Brigham you will never get there. My husband opened his bosom and said, you can kill me now, if you choose. McDonald replied, we don't wish to shed blood now. . . .

Abraham Durfee is at this time working for Mr. Parrish. Durfee and Potter pretend to Parrish that they are dissatisfied with the condition of affairs here, and impress him with the belief that they are desirous of getting to California; . . .

Arrangements are made that Durfee, Potter, Parrish and his two sons shall leave on Sunday night, the 14th of March . . . Parrish, the father and Durfee left about 2 o'clock in the day. Durfee returned again about dusk to get a gun belonging to Owen Parrish; went away with the gun; afterwards returned and said that he had come from where Parrish was. Upon being interrogated by Mrs. Parrish, he said that he was outside of the Fort, and would stay there for safety, and that he had told him to tell her to send the boys out, whether they were ready or not. Durfee and the two Parrish boys then leave, the boys carrying bundles of provisions and ammunition. . . .

Durfee and the boys start in the direction of the corner of the land fence where it had been arranged they all should meet after dark. After they had crossed the fence from the field into the road and got near the place, Durfee calls out, "Duff, Duff," (Potter's name) and stops and looks towards the fence on the east side of the road. Afterwards all proceed on, and when within fifteen or twenty feet of the corner of the fence, where all are to meet, some one called out, "Durfee," three times. Durfee answers, and immediately a gun or pistol is fired. Wm. B. Parrish, the eldest son, who is the farthest from Durfee, falls dead. Both of the sons are unarmed. Several shots are fired, one ball taking effect in a cartridge box that Owen Parrish had on.—Durfee drew up his gun, pointed it at Owen and bursted a cap, but the gun failed to go off.

Owen immediately jumped over the fence into the fields and made his escape into the city, climbing the city wall where it was low. While going through the streets he heard some person behind him say, "he went this way." . . . Upon the following day the widow of Parrish is allowed to go and see the bodies of her husband and son, and Orrin is taken to the school house at the same time; Durfee is found there. . . .

On the same Sunday that the murder is committed, after church services in the city of Provo, President Snow, of the Provo stake, desired to know if there was any one there who would carry a letter which he held in his hand to Bishop Johnson, of Springville, and place it in his hands. Nethercott stepped up and said he would take it. Snow charged him specially to deliver it safely to Bishop Johnson himself, saying at the same time, "dead men tell no tales."

The preaching that morning had been in regard to apostates and the proper disposition of them.

The body of old man Parrish was literally cut to pieces. His throat was cut on the left side, his fingers and arms, his back—in fact, his whole body was covered with knife-wounds of which he had received as is testified; at least fifteen. There were no wounds of pistol or rifle balls on his body.

Potter was killed by three balls, probably from a shot gun, which entered the body on the left breast, a little below the nipple.

Wm. Beason Parrish was shot through by four balls, . . .

Mrs. Parrish further testifies that her husband had a $500 Territorial order in his pocket book when he left home that day, which has never been returned. That she went to Salt Lake City in the month of July following the murder of her husband, to see Brigham Young: . . . she told him that Gee had possession of the horses, and that he said nothing, but an order from Brigham would get them. . . . Brigham said he would write to her, but never did. She went to see Brigham again between last Christmas day and New Year's; went into his office about 8 o'clock in the morning, and sat there till 4 o'clock in the afternoon. His clerks were present. At 4 o'clock they told her she could not see Brigham that day, but to call the next, between 8 and 11 o'clock in the morning. She went there the next morning about 8 o'clock, and was then told she could not see him. . . . She noticed Sharp and one of Brigham Young's clerks following her. One of them finally called her, and Sharp said to her, that if she wanted to get her horses back, she had better not go into court, but wait until the soldiers were gone, . . .

Several witnesses testify that about the time of the murder of the Parrishes, it was a very common thing to hear Bishops and Elders speak in their meetings about what was to be the fate of apostates, that as Brigham Young says, "Judgment was to be laid to the line and righteousness to the plummet;" which in plainer terms meant that apostates were to have their throats cut to save them. (Valley Tan, April 5, 1859, p. 1)

Alvira L. Parrish, the widow of the murdered man, testified as follows:

Alvira L. Parrash being sworn, says, . . . I heard a gun fire. . . . I remained in the house all night, much alarmed and very lonesome. I went to the door occasionally and saw some men fixing a wagon, and passing fre[q]uently with candles in their hands, . . . I saw the wagon move off in the direction that my sons went. It proved to be the wagon that brought in the dead bodies. G. McKenzie told me that he was ordered by the Bishop to drive the wagon out, but did not know at the time, what he was going after; that when they arrived at the place, they threw the dead bodies of my husband, my son and Mr. Potter, into the wagon like dead hogs, and said: "This is the way the damned apostates go." . . .

After the burial I was required to pay $48.00, for funeral expenses, before I could get back my husband's watch, and other things . . . I noticed that a knife had been drawn through my husbands left hand, the fore finger hung by the skin; his hand and left arm were all cut up with a knife, a large gash in the back of his head. One of his suspenders was cut off, the knife pierced his body, then another wound lower down and more in front. There was forty-eight holes in his coat all caused by stabs; examined and counted them myself. Mr. Parrish's throat was cut from ear to ear, his watch had saved him one stab, there was the mark of a knife on it. There was four bullet holes in the left side of my son. . . .

There had been public preaching at Springville, to the effect that no apostates would be allowed to leave, if they did, hogholes would be stopped up with them. I heard these sermons myself. Elder Hyde and President Snow, and others, preached that way. My husband was no believer in the doctrine of killing to "save," as taught by the teachers. (Valley Tan, April 19, 1859, p. 1)

On March 29, 1859, Joseph Bartholomew made an affidavit in which he stated:

Duff Potter came to me and notified me to attend a meeting at Bishop Johnson's, about the 1st of March, 1857. . . . In about a week after that they met again, and at that meeting Potter and Durfee were "dropped off" or selected for the purpose of finding out what was going on.

At the meeting the conversation was about the Parrishes and about persons at the Indian farm. . . . At this meeting it was not known what the Parrishes intended to do, and nothing was decided on in regard to them. Bishop Johnson made a remark, however, that some of us would yet "see the red stuff run." He said he had a letter, and the remark was made by some one that "dead men tell no tales." I do not know whether any other meetings were held or not.

The same night that the Parrishes were killed, at about nine o'clock, I was notified by Carnes to go home and get my gun. . . .

I went and got my gun and came back and was told to take my post and watch west of Parrish's house 3 rods; . . . I stayed there some 10 or 15 minutes when I was notified to repair to the school house; . . . When I got there, there was a company formed there with a wagon and team. . . . I did not know at that time for what purpose. When we got out at the south gate I learned then that what was up. . . . I saw the bodies of Potter and Wm. Parrish lying side by side. . . .

There has been several attempts to put me out of the way. . . . We went to Kinkead's store . . . He took us over to the Secretary's; . . . We claimed the Secretary's protection.

There was a gun fired close to us when we entered the city. . . . (The Valley Tan, April 19, 1859, pp. 1, 4)

Joseph Bartholomew was certainly afraid that he would lose his life for testifying as he did. Hosea Stout records in his diary that Bartholomew received "gentile protection":

Friday 25 March 1859. . . . Heard that A. Durfee & Joseph Bartholomew had gone to Great Salt Lake City and give themselves up to Secretary Hartnett claiming Gentile protection . . .

Sunday 27 March 1859. . . . Marshall Dotson returned from the city with Durfee & Bartholomew who have now got the gentile protection they so much sought for. (On The Mormon Frontier, The Diary of Hosea Stout, vol. 2, p. 692)

Under the date of April 1, 1859, Hosea Stout recorded the following in his diary:

Court met and was engaged till three in the after noon examining Durfee who like Bartholomew has turned states evidence and seeks to save his own neck by implicating others and criminales nearly the same persons as Bartholomew but is more specific and pointed. (Ibid., vol. 2, p. 693)

Although Durfee was probably protecting himself, his testimony contains some very revealing material concerning the whole affair:

Abraham Durfee, . . . this first day of April, A.D. 1859, comes before Judge Cradlebaugh, and makes the following confession, viz:

I am thirty-four years old, I have resided in Springville, Utah County, U.T., . . .

I was notified of a council by Wilber J. Earl in the month of January 1857; he told me he wanted me to come to the Bishop's house that evening . . . there were matters talked of concerning people going away. Some individuals were mentioned by the Bishop; he stated that he had instructions in regard to them. The Bishop said he had received a letter which he had in his hand; he said he supposed that was sufficient for us to know, . . .

There was another meeting in the neighborhood of a week or longer . . . The same persons were at this meeting that were at the first . . . Bishop Johnson presided. There was something mentioned at this meeting about the Parrishes, that they were going to leave the Territory. . . . the Bishop decided that both Potter and myself should try and learn when the Parrishes were going to leave the Territory. . . .

In the course of that week, Parrish's horses were taken, . . .

The next morning after the murder I heard Bishop Johnson and Bird talking together, and he blamed Potter and Bird for not going further away with them, the Bishop said he wanted I should be satisfied about the affair, and not tell who was in it, that if I did they would serve me the same way. . . .

In the second meeting, which I attended Bishop Johnson said there were some of them that would see the blood run. . . . (The Valley Tan, April 19, 1859, p. 4)

On March 26, 1859, Zephaniah J. Warren made an affidavit in which he stated:

Zephaniah J. Warren, being duly sworn says as follows: I am fifty-seven years old; . . . I settled in the town of Springville, Utah County, . . . On my way home from California in the spring of 1857, I heard of the murder of the two Parrishes and Potter; the day I arrived at Springville I saw the place where they were murdered. Seeing the place and the appearance of blood, I became somewhat excited and spoke very reproachfully of the leading men of Springville; . . . I heard of many threats being thrown out against me in the meeting house by the overseers, but I did not use much caution; I was thrown off my guard by supposing that they dare not touch me. . . . On the night of the 31st. of August 1857, . . . a person knocked at my door; I bade him come in. Two men come in. William Johnson and Oliver Mc'Bride. . . . they told me brother Earl wished to see me a few minutes . . . I went out into the street in company with these two men; I found six others standing in the street; there names were Wilber J. Earl, Sandford Fuller, Abraham Durfee, John Curtis, Lehi Curtis and Simmons P. Curtis. They were all armed with pistols, knives and guns. Earl told me to be still and go with them out of the city gate. I told them I would not go one step without the knowledge of the public. Earl seized me by the throat, saying damn your old heart if you speak another loud word, applying his knife to my throat; saying, "I will cut your throat on the spot." They then, Johnson and Earl, took me by force and dragged me on the ground most of the time for about sixty rods, through the gate; they then suddenly stopped, and some one said "there is some one coming; damn him, stop him, stop him," two ran back, and the other six threw me into a fence ditch. Earl then seized me by the throat, saying, you damned old American, you will never write or talk any more about people that have been murdered. They then all but one left me, . . . then six of them came back, and Earl said, we have concluded to let you live a few days, if you will now swear before us that you will never divulge what has been done to you to night to any person, and go within a day or two and settle up your tithing, as all men in these valleys have now got to be tithed; we have declared war against the whole world, and at any time we can put you aside very easy. . . . (Signed) Z. F. Warren

Sworn and subscribed before me this 26th day of March, A.D. 1859. John Cradlebaugh Judge. (The Valley Tan, April 19, 1859, p. 2)

Another resident of Springville made an affidavit which tended to link the Mormon Apostle Orson Hyde with the murders committed there. In this affidavit this man said he had “lived in Springville since 1853. Was there at the time the Parrishes and Potter were murdered; had a conversation a short time before the murder with Moses Daily, jr.; he said that they had been ordered never to let the Parrishes go out of Springville or the Territory. Said he called on me to join them. I told him I would not, that I did no such jobs. He then said, for God’s sake, not to tell of it. He said the orders were from Orson Hyde. Orson Hyde had just been preaching at Springville.”

On March 29, 1859, The Valley Tan reported:

Court met pursuant to adjournment.

The testimony of several witnesses in the Par[r]ish case was heard. . . . The evidence, as it now stands, implicates persons high in authority in the church; and so far as others may have been concerned, they only acted the part of slaves, doing the will of their masters.

It now appears that Bishop Hancock, of Payson, Johnson, of Springville, and Pres. J. C. Snow, of this place [Provo], have acted a conspicuous part in these bloody tragedies. Several attempts have been made to arrest two of them, but they have managed to elude the vigilance of officers.

Warrants have been issued for several others who are implicated, but they cannot be found. The town of Springville has been quite destitute of its male inhabitants for the last few days. This, as every other circumstance, goes to prove their guilt. . . . The most strenuous efforts have been made to suppress the testimony in these cases. The lives of witnesses have been threatened, and their property seized on some trifling pretext immediately after their testimony was given, and a degree of terrorism exercised, which can only be appreciated by those who fell it. (The Valley Tan, March 29, 1859, p. 2)

On March 29, 1859, Hosea Stout recorded the following in his diary: “A company of 56 dragoons and several deputy marshalls started to Springville this morning and before day surrounded Bp Johnson’s house expecting to arresting him but failed” (On The Mormon Frontier, The Diary of Hosea Stout, vol. 2, p. 693). On April 5, 1859, The Valley Tan reported:

Monday 28.

Court met pursuant to adjournment and adjourned to await the arrival of Mrs. Parrish and other witnesses. . . .

The marshal reports that he experienced the greatest difficulty in discovering the residences of any one for whom he sought, the inhabitants generally either refused to answer his questions or else telling him direct falsehoods, sending him away from the place for which he was seeking.

The Bishops of Springville, of Payson, of Lehi and of this city are all gone, as well as the President of this Stake.

The marshal searched the house of George Hancock, the Bishop of Payson at an early hour, but the bird had flown. Hancock was the principal actor in the murder of Jones and his mother.

Four of the grand jurors who had been selected by the county court to serve at this term of the district court, are known to have fled to escape arrest, they having been implicated in these murders.

. . . These facts form a striking commentary upon the working of the law prescribing that the juries shall be selected by the county court, . . . Recent advices from Cedar City and the other towns near the scene of the Mountain Meadow massacre, report them to be almost entirely depopulated. In Cedar City there remains but twelve families out of a population of between eight or nine hundred inhabitants. . . .

Tuesday, 29th.

This morning, at about 3 o’clock, Marshal Dotson, accompanied by Deputy Marshal Stone, and a civil posse of five men, and a company of the 2nd Dragoons, . . . left this city with the utmost secrecy and proceeded to the town of Springville, the scene of the murder of the Parrishes, of Potter, and of Forbes, . . .

Upon reaching the town it was immediately surrounded by details from the company of Dragoons who were so stationed that no one could leave the city unperceived of them.

The Marshal with his posse then entered the town, and at daybreak commenced the search of all those houses . . . The Bishop’s house was one of the first entered, but no one was found therein except his ten wives. . . .

After a thorough search, not one of the offenders could be found, and it was discovered that not only those who have been already implicated have run off, but also fully one half of the male inhabitants of the city have fled, leaving their numerous wives and families at home, . . . The connection of the church authorities with the murder is fully established by the testimony of Durfee and Bartholomew.

It was not until the arrest of these men that the mass of those who have left the southern settlements fled. As soon as they gave themselves up in Salt Lake City, an express was sent down from there, giving notice of that fact, and stating that they were going to turn States evidence, and this caused the general stampede. . . .

The following affidavit was this evening made by the witnesses for the prosecution . . .

We, Albert Parrish, Henry Higgins, James O’Bannion, Leonard Phillips, Orin Parrish and James Gammell, do solemnly swear . . . that we were summoned to appear as witnesses before the United States District Court . . . that we possessed certain knowledge of various crimes which had been in the past two or three years committed in said district, on account of which said knowledge we had been so summoned; that on account of the participation in, or sanction afterwards of the said crimes, by the community in which said crimes were committed, emanating as we believe from the authorities of the Mormon Church; we considered our lives and property in imminent peril from the Mormon community, should we appear and testify to the facts within our knowledge, unless a portion of the United States troops should (as they have been) be stationed in the town of Provo, near enough the Court room to guarantee safety, and that from the Mormon community we have received threats of intimidation, in case we should divulge the facts . . . and which threats we believe would have been carried into execution but for the timely aid afforded by the Commanding General in the stationing of troops, now in and near this city; and further, we believe our lives to be in danger henceforward without military protection from United States troops. (The Valley Tan, April 5, 1859, p. 3)

The evidence collected by Judge Cradlebaugh clearly shows that the Parrishes were victims of the Mormon doctrine of “Blood Atonement.” After Cradlebaugh’s investigation, J. M. Stewart, who conducted a pretended inquest at the time the Parrishes were murdered, admitted that he had been “swayed in my official duties by ecclesiastical dignitaries.” In a letter dated July 4, 1859, written from California, Stewart stated:

Sir: —

. . . during the notable “Reformation,” I think in the winter of 1857, I was, as one of the Bishop’s counselors, presiding and speaking in a ward meeting, . . . N. T. Guymon, came to the door, and said, “. . . the Bishop wishes to see you.” . . . As this was in the night, our movements were, perhaps, observed by but very few . . . the Bishop stated the object of the meeting, which was, that we might hear a letter which he had just received from “President Young.” He there read the letter, the purport of which was about this.

He, Brigham, had information that some suspicious characters were collecting at the “Indian Farm,” on Spanish Fork, and he wished him (Bishop Johnson) to keep a good look out in that direction; to send some one there to reconnoiter and ascertain what was going on, and if they (those suspicious characters) should make a break, and be pursued, which he required; he “would be sorry to hear a favorable report;” “but,” said he, “the better way is to lock the stable door before the horse is stolen.”

He then admonished the Bishop that he (the Bishop) understood those things, and would act accordingly, and “keep this letter close,” or safe.

This letter was over Brigham’s signature, in his own peculiarly rough hands, which we all had the privilege of seeing. . . .

The next Saturday night there was a council, . . . In this council were, as well as I remember, Bishop A. Johnson, J. M. Stewart, A. F. McDonald, N. T. Guyman, L. Johnson, C. Lanford, and W. J. Earl. . . . Potter and Durfee were present. . . .

In this council there was a good deal of secret talking done by two or three individuals getting close together, and talking in suppressed tones, . . . some things I could not help understanding. I understood when Potter requested of the Bishop the privilege to kill Parrish wherever he could find “the damned curse,” and the Bishop’s reply, “Shed no blood in Springville.”

During this council, to the best of my recollection, I scarcely spoke a word. I understood that blood would probably be shed, not in Springville, but out of it.

I did in my heart disapprove of the course, but I was in the current, and could not get out, and policy said to me, “Hold your tongue for the present.”

I knew nothing of the plan, nor of the deeds having been done, until near midnight, when I was awakened, and requested to go and hold an inquest over some dead bodies. W. J. Earl, one of the city aldermen, and my predecessor in the magisterial office, made this requirement of me, and undertook to dictate me in the selecting of a jury. I considered my position for a moment, and concluded to suffer myself to be dictated to, unless an attempt should be made to lead me to the commission of crime. In that case I felt that I would try “mighty hard” to back out.

I obeyed my manager, W. J. Earl, in selecting the jury . . . we proceeded along the main road, . . . to the corner of a field known as Childs’ corner. Here laid the bodies of Wm. R. Parrish and G. G. Potter, . . . I proceeded to fill up and qualify the jury. . . . I was told to take charge of the goods, chattels, and clothes of the murdered men; which I did, and in due time delivered every article to their families, except a butcher knife claimed by Mrs. Parrish, . . .

The law of the Territory made it my duty to make returns of my proceedings, in this case, to the County Court, but the Bishop told me not to do it, and I obeyed him.

Some considerable time, I don’t know how long after the murder, I spoke to Bishop Johnson concerning the above named knife. I supposed, from the fact that when the knife came into my possession it was all over bloody, that it had been used by the assassin; but the Bishop thought differently. During our chat about the knife, and the murder, the Bishop asked:

“Do you know who done that job?”

I replied, “No.” He then asked, “Have you any idea?”

“No.”

“Can’t you guess?”

I answered, “I guess I could.”

He then said, “Well, guess.”

“I guess William Bird.”

He replied, “you are pretty good at guessing.” . . .

H. H. Kearns, Captain of the Police, came to me on . . . the next day after the murder, and told me that I must hold Court sometime that afternoon, and examine Durfee and young Parrish in regard to the murder, as he had them prisoners on that account. I understood that it was only to be done as a show, or kind of a “put off.” . . .

Durfee made his statement first, which was about what has hitherto been revealed. . . . Parrish, . . . chose not to know anything of consequence. . . .

It would have been in order, while on the subject of the “knife,” to state that which I will now state:

Before the Bishop and I had got through with our chat, Bird came in sight, and the Bishop called to him; he came to us, and during our conversation, coolly and deliberately made the following statement:

“When Potter fell, I clinched Parrish, and killed him with my knife.” . . .

I am perfectly aware that that portion of community who have no knowledge of the under-currents and wire-workings of Mormonism will consider me a “poor concern,” for suffering myself to be swayed in my official duties by ecclesiastical dignitaries, for suffering myself, in the case above mentioned to be governed by the Bishop. But I perfectly understood that to act without counsel, or to disobey counsel, was to transgress; and if I had never understood it before I could not help but understand it then, by the example of the three dead bodies right before my eyes, that “The way of the transgressor is (was) hard.” . . .

I am, & c., your humble servant, J. M. Stewart. (The Valley Tan, August 24, 1859, p. 2)

The following statements are taken from “the remarks of Judge Cradlebaugh upon the occasion of his releasing the Grand Jury” from further service:

This day makes two weeks from the time you were impannelled . . . the court took the unusual course of calling your attention to particular crimes—the horrible massacre at the Mountain meadows. It told you of the murder of young Jones and his mother, and of pulling their house down over them and making that their tomb, it told you of the murder of the Parrishes and Potter, and Forbes, almost within sight of this court house. . . .

The court has had occasion to issue bench warrants to arrest persons connected with the Parrish murder; has had them brought before it and examined; the testimony presents an unparalleled condition of affairs. It seems that the whole community were engaged in committing that crime. Facts go to show it. There seems to be a combined effort on the part of the community to screen the murderers from the punishment due them for the murder they have committed.

I might call your attention to the fact that when officers seek to arrest persons accused of crimes they are not able to do so; the parties are screened and secreted by the community. Scarcely had the officers arrived in sight of the town of Springville before a trumpet was sounded from the walls around the town. This, no doubt, was for the purpose of giving the alarm. The officers were there to make arrests. The officers leave the town, and in a short time a trumpet sounds again from the wall for the purpose of announcing that the danger was over. Witnesses are screened; others are intimidated by persons in that community. . . .

Such acts and conduct go to show that the community there do not desire to have criminals punished, it shows that the Parrishes and Potter were murdered by counsel, that it was done by authority; . . .

By legislation we have no jails, no means to support prisoners, no means of paying witnesses or jurors, or other officers of this court. It would seem that the whole of the legislation of this Territory was to prevent the due administration of justice. . . . (The Valley Tan, March 29, 1859, p. 3)

On May 17, 1859, The Valley Tan published an article which contained the following statements:

Where are now the Presidents of Stakes, Bishops, Teachers and territorial officers who have fled to the mountains in fear of just punishment for their crimes? These are high authorities in the Church, against whom a chain of circumstances has been elicited by testimony, showing a confederacy in crime. All of us know that the Mormon church is a secret oath-bound organization, . . . All of us have a belief amounting almost to knowledge that if Brigham Young were to direct the surrender of Snow, Johnson, Earl and the whole list of fugitives from justice to-day it could be effected to-morrow. All of us know that the testimony taken implicate these men in crimes which makes humanity shudder. All of us conclude, therefore, that when the lawful process of the judge is running for the arrest of these murderers, the whole Mormon church is acting as an accessory after the fact to conceal them and prevent their arrest, if necessary, by force.

In his book, Desert Saints, Nels Anderson gives this information concerning the murders in Springville and their relationship to "Blood Atonement":

Brigham Young on September 21, 1856, made a speech upon which enemies of the church built a harsh case. He said there were some sins that could not be expiated by repentance; that, if sinners guilty of such acts could see their true condition, "they would be perfectly willing to have their blood spilt upon the ground, that the smoke thereof might ascend to heaven as an offering for their sins." Thus the idea got around that some sinners could only be saved by spilling their blood. As the idea spread, the stories began to travel that men had been slain; that "destroying angels" went about at night on their missions of death, thus to save the souls of Saints who had sinned. That was "blood atonement." . . .

In March, 1857, three men were killed in Springville: . . . The Parish family, against advice of counsel, planned to leave for California. Priesthood leaders, it was alleged, thought such a migration would do them no good and might be an evil example for others. Two years later Associate Justice John Cradlebaugh attempted to apprehend the murderers of the Springville brethren. Mormon leaders bitterly opposed him and denied all the allegations, but the fact remains that the Mormons in charge of the local government did nothing to find the murderers. (Desert Saints, 1966, pp. 153-154)

John D. Lee gives the following information concerning other murders committed in early Utah:

I remember an affair that transpired at the old distillery in Cedar City, just before the massacre . . . The facts are as follows: Three men came to Cedar City one evening; they were poor, and much worn by their long journey. They were on their way to California. They were so poor and destitute that the authorities considered they were dangerous men, so they reported that they were spies from Johnston's army, and ordered the brethren to devise a plan to put them out of the way, decently and in order. That the will of God, as made known through Haight and Klingensmith, might be done these helpless men were coaxed to go to the old distillery and take a drink. They went in company with John M. Higbee, John Weston, James Haslem and Wm. C. Stewart, and I think another man, but if so I have forgotten his name. The party drank considerable, and when the emigrants got under the influence of the whisky the brethren attacked them, and knocked the brains out of two of the men with the king-bolt of a wagon. The third man was very powerful and muscular; he fought valiantly for his life, but after a brief struggle he was overcome and killed. They were buried near Cedar City.

This deed was sustained by all the people there. The parties who did the killing were pointed out as true, valiant men, zealous defenders of the faith, and as fine examples for the young men to pattern after. . . .

Many such cases came under my observation. I have known the Church to act in this way and break up and destroy many, very many men. The Church was then, and in that locality, supreme. None could safely defy or disobey it. The Church authorities used the laws of the land, the laws of the Church, and Danites and "Angels" to enforce their orders, and rid the country of those who were distasteful to the leaders. And I say as a fact that there was no escape for any one that the leaders of the Church in Southern Utah selected as a victim. . . .

In 1854 (I think that was the year) there was a young man, a Gentile, working in Parowan. He was quiet and orderly, but was courting some of the girls. He was notified to quit, and let the girls alone, but he still kept going to see some of them. This was contrary to orders. No Gentile was at that time allowed to keep company with or visit any Mormon girl or woman. The authorities decided to have the young man killed, so they called two of Bishop Dames' Destroying Angels, Barney Carter and old man Gould, and told them to take that cursed young Gentile 'over the rim of the basin.' That was a term used by the people when they killed a person.

The destroying angels made some excuse to induce the young man to go with them on an excursion, and when they got close to Shirts' mill, near Harmony, they killed him, and left his body in the brush.

The Indians found the body, and reported the facts to me soon afterwards. I was not at home that night, but Carter and Gould went to my house and staid there all night. Rachel asked them where they had been. They told her they had been on a mission to take a young man, a Gentile, over the rim of the basin, and Carter showed her his sword, which was all bloody, and he said he used that to help the Gentile over the edge. Rachel knew what they meant when they spoke of sending him "over the rim of the basin." It was at that time a common thing to see parties going out of Cedar City and Harmony, with suspected Gentiles, to send them "over the rim of the basin," and the Gentiles were always killed.

This practice was supported by all the people, and every thing of that kind was done by orders from the Council, or by orders from some of the Priesthood. When a Danite or a destroying angel was placed on a man's track, that man died, certain, unless some providential act saved him, . . .

It frequently happened that men would become dissatisfied with the Church or something else in Utah, and try to leave the Territory. The authorities would try to convince such persons that they ought to remain, but if they insisted on going, they were informed that they had permission to do so. When the person had started off, with his stock and property, it was nearly always the rule to send a lot of Danites to steal all the stock and run it off into the mountains; so that in the majority of cases the people would return wholly broken up and settle down again as obedient members of the Church. It was a rare thing for a man to escape from the Territory with all of his property, until after the Pacific Railroad was built through Utah. It was the general custom to rob the persons who were leaving the country, but many of them were killed, because it was considered they would tell tales that should not be made public, in the event of their reaching Gentile settlements. (Confessions of John D. Lee, photomechanical reprint of 1880 Edition, pp. 273, 275, 278, 279, 286, 287)

R. N. Baskin, who served as mayor of Salt Lake City and as a Chief Justice of the Supreme Court of Utah, made these interesting observations concerning the murders committed in early Utah:

In the excavations made within the limits of Salt Lake City during the time I have resided there, many human skeletons have been exhumed in various parts of the city. The present City cemetery was established by the first settlers. I have never heard that it was ever the custom to bury the dead promiscuously throughout the city; and as no coffins were ever found in connection with any of these skeletons, it is evident that the death of the persons to whom they once belonged did not result from natural causes, but from the use of criminal means, and therefore the victims were not given a Christian burial. That the Danites were bound by their covenants to execute the criminal orders of the high priesthood against apostates and alleged enemies of the church is beyond question. . . . How many murders were secretly committed by that band of assassins will never be known, but an estimate may be made from the number mentioned in the confessions of Hickman and Lee, and the number of human skeletons which have been exhumed in Salt Lake City, the possessors of which were evidently murdered and buried without a knell, coffin, or Christian ceremony. (Reminiscences of Early Utah, by R.N. Baskin, pp. 154-155)

We could show many other cases where men were murdered, but these should be sufficient to convince the reader that Joseph Fielding Smith's claim that no person was ever "blood atoned" in early Utah is completely false. For additional information on these and other cases of murder in early Utah see our publication The Mormon Kingdom, vol. 2.

Young Indicted For Murder

It was obvious to many people in early Utah that Brigham Young was responsible for the death of many people, but with the power Brigham Young had it was almost impossible to convict him. Harold Schindler states:

As winter surrendered to spring in 1871, the combined efforts of Gentiles and apostates had failed to unsettle the church or its leadership. But in a shepherd's shack west of Nephi a confrontation was taking place which soon would have violent repercussions. At a table cluttered with dishes sat two men—one a federal marshal, the other a desperado reputed to have killed literally scores of men. Marshal Sam Gilson spoke earnestly and convincingly to the man he had spent weeks attempting to contact. What the lawman wanted was a full confession of the outlaw's misdeeds. He especially wanted knowledge of a major crime which could be linked to the Mormon hierarchy. In return, Gilson promised to use his influence in the informer's behalf. The marshal's impassioned arguments eventually prevailed, and the desperado nodded his assent. William A. "Bill" Hickman had decided to "unbosom myself where it would do some good." (Orrin Porter Rockwell; Man of God, Son of Thunder, p. 352)

Bill Hickman made this statement in his confessions:

He [Gilson] said he could not give me any hope of pardon for the many crimes in which I had participated, further than that he believed, if I made a clean breast of it, it would be greatly in my favor. . . . I found Gilson to be a man that had had much experience in his life in his line, and was well posted on the crimes of Utah. He was conversant on the most prominent cases, and held the correct theory, that the leaders of the Church were the guilty party, and not the laymen. He conversed about many cases with which I was connected; and finally elected the case of Yates as the one on which we could with the greatest safety rely for prosecuting Brigham Young. I then gave him a full statement of the case and the names of the witnesses that would make the circumstances complete. . . . Gilson assured me. . . . that I should have every protection that I needed. . . . On the last of September he came and arrested me and another man by the name of Flack. We were then taken before Chief Justice McKean for examination, which we waived, and were sent to Camp Douglass for safe keeping. After we had been there some two weeks we were taken before the Grand Jury, and I made a full statement of all the crimes committed in this Territory that I knew of—as I have related them in this history—which statement, together with that of Flack's and others, caused the Grand Jury to find indictments against several persons, and it has caused many threats to be made on me.

Several have said if I ever get out of here I will not be privileged to live but a short time; others have tried to get me out of camp under promise of any amount of money I wanted to make my escape; but it was too plain to be seen that I would not get far before I would be cared for in such a manner that I would not tell more stories. (Brigham's Destroying Angel, pp. 191-193)

Bill Hickman made these statements concerning the murder of Yates:

One Yates, a trader that had been in the country before, had returned with five or six thousand dollars' worth of Indian goods, and stopped on Green River. . . . He was sent to, to purchase his ammunition, but would not sell it without selling his other goods also. He came to Bridger twice, buying beef cattle for the Government. . . . We kept watch of the United States camps every day, . . . One day they moved up the creek about four miles, and we saw a vacancy between them and their cattle. We made a rush and drove off seven hundred and fifty head, taking all the fat cattle they had, and some mules. Horses and mules were taken several times after this.

About this time it was noised about that Yates had let the soldiers have his ammunition, and that he was acting the spy for them. . . . One of the Conover boys . . . saw a lone man traveling . . . after learning his name, Yates, he marched him to Bridger, where he was placed in the big stone corral and a guard placed over him. . . .

I will here state that the office I held was that of independent captain, amenable to none but the head commanding general or governor, Brigham Young, . . .

. . . I was asked to take the prisoner, Yates, to the city with me, and agreed to do so. . . . There was a common trace-chain on Yates' ankle, fastened with a padlock. He had a fine gold watch and nine hundred dollars in gold, all in twenty-dollar gold pieces. The money was given to me to bring into the city with the prisoner, but the watch was kept, and what became of it I never knew.

. . . The next morning we traveled about halfway down Echo Canon to where the general's headquarters were located, and got breakfast. I delivered General Wells some letters, reported myself, and told him who I had along, and asked him what I should do with my prisoner. He said: "He ought to be killed; but take him on; you will probably get an order when you get to Col. Jones' camp"—which was at the mouth of Echo Canon on Weber River. After breakfast we started for Jones' camp, some twelve miles distant, and when within three or four miles of the camp, we met Joseph S. Young, a son of Brigham's, going, as he said, to the general's camp to take orders. He hailed me (I being behind) and said his father wanted that man Yates killed, and that I would know all about it when I got to Jones' camp.

We got there about sundown, and were met outside by Col. Jones, . . . He then took me aside and told me he had orders when Yates came along to have him used up, . . . Supper was brought to us, and Yates soon went to sleep on his blankets. Flack and Meacham spread their blankets and soon went to sleep also. I told them to do it, as I would guard the prisoner until I called them. . . .

About this time all was still, and everybody supposed to be in their beds. No person was to be seen, when Col. Jones and two others, Hosea Stout and another man whose name I do not recollect, came to my campfire and asked if Yates was asleep. I told them he was, upon which his brains were knocked out with an ax. He was covered up with his blankets and left laying. Picks and spades were brought, and a grave dug some three feet deep near the camp by the fire-light, all hands assisting. Flack and Meacham were asleep when the man was killed, but woke up and saw the grave digging. The body was put in and the dirt well packed on it. . . .

The next day I took the nine hundred dollars, and we all went to headquarters. Flack and I had a talk, as we went, about the money. He said Brigham ought to give that to us as we had already been to more expense than that money amounted to, from horses used up and other losses, and urged me to get it. I told him I would try, saying to him: "You know how much I have been out, and can testify to it, and I think he will give us part of it, anyway."

Soon after dark Flack and I went to Brigham's office. He asked how things were going on out East, and I told him. He asked what had become of Yates? I told him. He then asked if I had got word from him? I told him that I had got his instructions at Jones' camp, and also of the word I had got from his son Jo [Joseph Young]. He said that was right, and a good thing. I then told him I had nine hundred dollars given me to bring in, that Yates had at the time he was captured. I told him of the expense I had been to during the war, and asked him if I might have part of the money? He gave me a reprimand for asking such a thing, and said it must go towards defraying the expenses of the war. I pulled out the sack containing the money, and he told me to give it to his clerk (I do not remember who he was now). The money was counted, and we left. (Brigham's Destroying Angel, pp. 122-126)

According to Stanley P. Hirshon, Brigham Young's son, Joseph A. Young, admitted he met Hickman but claimed that he gave instructions to save Yates:

The Saints argued about the remainder of the episode. In 1871 Joseph A. Young, the prophet's son, described to the New York Tribune how he met Hickman at the outskirts of the city and urged him to bring Yates in alive. Hickman, however, told the New York World a different story. Joseph said Young wanted the prisoner "taken care of," so Hickman waited until Yates was asleep and bashed his brains out with a rock. . . . The prophet warned Hickman to keep cool and say nothing about the incident to anyone. Significantly, neither Joseph nor Hickman denied that Mormons had murdered Yates. (The Lion of the Lord, pp. 176-177)

Joseph A. Young's statement certainly raises a very interesting question: if Joseph A. Young was really concerned about Hickman bringing in Yates alive, why didn't the Mormons punish Hickman when he came in without him? The fact that the Mormon leaders did not punish Hickman for this murder seems to show that they were accessories to the crime. That Hickman did not seem concerned about keeping Yates's death a secret is made plain by a statement written by Dan Jones:

"This Yates was a personal friend of mine, a kind-hearted, liberal man . . . I was camped with a small party about four miles west of Weber valley and ten or twelve miles from Echo. One very cold morning about sunrise, Hickman and two others came to my camp. They seemed almost frozen. . . . Hickman asked me if I had any whiskey. I told him I had not. He then asked if I had coffee. I replied that we had. 'Then make us a good strong cup.' While the coffee was being made he took me outside and asked me if I knew Yates. I told him I did. 'Well, we have just buried him,' he said." (Forty Years Among the Indians, as cited by Juanita Brooks in On The Mormon Frontier, The Diary of Hosea Stout, vol. 2, p. 643, n. 13)

Juanita Brooks gives this revealing information in the same footnote:

A contemporary account which establishes place and date is Lorenzo Brown's . . . On October 18 he noted: "Wm Hickman came in with a prisoner named Yates He had sold 3 or 400 lbs powder & some lead etc to the troops which he had promised to us." In that war climate, this would brand Yates as an enemy. "Journal," I, 290, 296. . . .

That some Mormons did confiscate Yates' property is shown in the diary of Newton Tuttle, at that time adjutant to Major John T. D. McAllister: "Sat 24 [October 18, 1857] . . . 6 teamsters have come in to camp from the enemy. Lewis Robinson got back from Green river he took 48 Horse & colts 36 pair of blankets & c that belonged to Yates . . ." . . .

Still another interesting sidelight comes from Albert Tracy, a member of the Johnston expedition. On April 10, 1860, as they were leaving the territory, he wrote: ". . . Yates! He has neither been seen by any of us since the day we purchased his powder. . . . The story of his horse ridden and his overcoat worn by Bill Hickman—'Destroyer'—a Springville as told me by the woman . . . affords beyond doubt the key to his fate." . . . This confirms the story that Yates actually did sell his powder to the soldiers rather than to the Mormons, thus branding himself an enemy spy. (On The Mormon Frontier, The Diary of Hosea Stout, vol. 2, p. 643, n. 13)

In Appendix E of Brigham's Destroying Angel, J. H. Beadle gives this information concerning the murder of Yates:

Through the indefatigable labors of United States Marshals and detectives, the entire history of Yates has been made known. His wife, residing at present in Nevada and married again, has written to Salt Lake enclosing photographs of the murdered man, taken a short time before his death. She had always supposed he was killed by the Indians. His remains have been disinterred from the spot named by Hickman, and the chain of evidence is complete. Hosea Stout, a Mormon lawyer of considerable prominence, who was arrested for complicity in this murder, and on Hickman's testimony, admits that Yates was killed as a spy; but insists that he was not present and had no knowledge of the transaction; that Yates was delivered to Hickman to be taken to the city, and neither he nor any other officer saw him again.

There is little doubt that Hosea Stout would resort to violence towards a man suspected of being a spy, for the reader will remember that he recorded the following in his diary for January 9, 1846:

When we came to the Temple some what a considerable number of the guard were assembled and among them was William Hibbard son of the old man Hibbard. He was evidently come as a spy. When I saw him I told Scott that we must "bounce a stone off his head." to which he agreed we prepared accordingly & I got an opportunity & hit him on the back of his head which came very near taking his life. (On The Mormon Frontier, The Diary of Hosea Stout, vol. 1, p. 103)

The Salt Lake Herald for October 29, 1871, reported that Daniel H. Wells, a member of the First Presidency of the Mormon Church, had also been indicated for the murder of Yates:

Another link in the chain of conspiracy aimed at the very existence of the Mormon people was revealed yesterday afternoon, in the arrest of Mayor Wells, for the alleged crime of murder. Hosea Stout, Esq., was also arrested at the same time, on the same charge; and Col Wm. H. Kimball on a similar charge. The indictment charges Daniel H. Wells and Hosea Stout, among others, with having on the 15th of November, 1857, killed one Richard Yates at the mouth of Echo canon, in Summit county. There is little doubt that Yates was killed, and it is generally conceded that the notorious Bill Hickman committed the crime, for which, however, there is little prospect of his suffering punishment under existing circumstances, as it is believed that upon his testimony the indictment was found. (The Salt Lake Herald, October 29, 1871)

Juanita Brooks points out the fact that "the date given, November 15, was nearly a month later than the actual date of October 18, 1857, greatly helped the case for Stout" (On The Mormon Frontier, vol. 2, p. 739). The date of October 18, 1857, was undoubtedly the correct date, for it was on October 18, 1857, that Lorenzo Brown recorded in his journal that "Wm Hickman came in with a prisoner named Yates . . ." Hosea Stout was certainly on the scene at the time of the murder, for he recorded the following in his diary:

Sunday 18 Oct 1857. Visit from Col Little. H. P. Kimball arrived with a party of Col Burton's command . . . Some 700 head of the captured cattle passed to day being driven by teamsters who left the enemy. At dark W. A. Hickman came in with Mr. Yates a prisoner. (On The Mormon Frontier, The Diary of Hosea Stout, vol. 2, p. 643)

After Bill Hickman confessed that he committed murders for the Mormon leaders, Brigham Young himself was indicted. The Mormon historian B. H. Roberts gives this information:

It was not to meet the petty charge of "lascivious cohabitation" that this journey of President Young's was made; but, as already suggested, he had learned that there existed a more serious charge against him, that of "murder." In the previous November he had been jointly indicted with D. H. Wells, mayor of Salt Lake City, and others, for the “murder” of one Yates, during the “Echo Canon War.” Mayor Wells, Hosea Stout, formerly attorney-general of the territory, and W. H. Kimball, had been arrested on the 28th of October, on the same charge. . . . Acting United States District Attorney Baskin planned the indictment and arrest of Brigham Young on this charge of “murder,” on the strength of the confessions of the notorious “Bill Hickman,” who had confessed to some eighteen or twenty murders . . . Hickman at the request of Mr. Baskin consented to go before the grand jury, and Baskin handed to Major Hempstead the statement of the self-confessed murderer, with the announcement that Hickman was ready to go before the grand jury. It was at this point that Hempstead resigned and Baskin was appointed by McKean to fill the vacancy. By becoming acting United States district attorney, Mr. Baskin had the opportunity of doing what he had urged upon his predecessor to do, and hence the indictments for murder against Brigham Young et al., upon the confessions of Hickman, . . . the coup de main in the arrest of Brigham Young on the charge of “murder” was ordered for Monday, the 20th of November, but President Young by that time was in St. George, and the coup de main was a failure. . . .

It was a dramatic incident when, in the afternoon of the 2nd of January, 1872, Brigham Young...walked into the court presided over by Judge McKean. . . . A certificate of Dr. W. F. Anderson—stating that he was the attending physician of Brigham Young, and that confinement would in all probability prove fatal to him in the present feeble state of his health, and at 71 years of age—was read. . . . The judge declined to admit the defendant to bail; but granted him the privilege of selecting one of his own houses, . . . and defendant might be detained there under custody of the marshal until the time of trial. (Comprehensive History of the Church, vol. 5, pp. 404-408)

The historian Hubert Howe Bancroft speaks of Brigham Young’s indictment for murder, but claims that it was for the murder of the last member of the Aiken Party at Warm Springs rather than for the murder of Yates (see History of Utah, pp. 663-664, n. 20). R. N. Baskin, who was responsible for the indictment of Brigham Young, gives this information:

One evening in 1872, . . . Hickman, . . . came to my office. . . . he said that during his seclusion his mind had been greatly disturbed by the matter, and that he had finally concluded to reveal the facts to me, although in doing so he would acknowledge his own guilt. . . . Having become satisfied that Hickman told me the truth, and at my request he having consented to go before the grand jury and tell what he had revealed to me, I placed the statements which I had so written in the hands of Major Hempstead, who was the United States district attorney, and informed him that Hickman was ready to go before the grand jury and testify to the matters therein set forth. In a few days afterwards I saw him, and, while talking the matter over, asked him if he intended to have Hickman appear before the grand jury. He replied that in view of the recent assassination of Doctor Robinson it would be hazardous to indict Brigham Young and the other persons implicated by Hickman. In reply, I said that in any other place than Utah such a confession would cause an investigation by the grand jury, and that I thought he would be derelict in the discharge of his duties if he failed to move in the matter. He returned the statements and nothing further passed between us on the subject.

A grand jury had, in accordance with the decision of Judge McKean, been summoned for the approaching term of the district court. Upon entering the courtroom on the morning that court was opened at that term, I was informed by the Judge that Major Hempstead had resigned as district attorney, . . . and he said he intended to appoint me if I would accept the position. . . .

Upon entering upon the discharge of my duties I determined to procure indictments against the officers of the Mormon church for their violations of the law against polygamy, but I soon found that it could not be done because it was necessary to prove both the first and plural marriages. I was unable to prove the latter because they were entered into in the secret precincts of the “endowment house” of the Mormon church, and were not made public, but carefully concealed. (Reminiscences of Early Utah, by R. N. Baskin, Salt Lake City, 1914, pp. 36-38)

The grand jury that indicted Thomas Hawkins also indicted Brigham Young and other high officials among the privileged Mormon ranks. They were charged with having violated Section 32 of the statute against lewd and lascivious cohabitation, . . . and by virtue of the confession of Bill Hickman, Brigham Young and those implicated by Hickman were also indicted for murder. . . .

I knew that the indictment of Brigham and others would cause great excitement, especially among the polygamic element of the Mormon church, and if a collision occurred it [sic] would be at the time Brigham was arrested on the charge of murder. To meet such a contingency the United States marshal had appointed about one hundred deputies, . . . I knew that the arrest of anyone except Brigham would not be resisted. I therefore had Hawkins arrested and tried before taking any steps in the other cases. During that trial the street in front of the courtroom was daily crowded by hundreds of men, many of whom were armed and whose demeanor was most threatening towards the court. . . . Brigham was then arrested on the charge of lewd and lascivious cohabitation, and brought into court. He gave bonds, just as others were required to do. No special demonstration was made upon that occasion. In a few days later I had a warrant issued for his arrest on the murder charge. . . . Evidently some of the marshal’s deputies betrayed him, as Brigham learned of his intended arrest. . . . Brigham finally decided that instead of resisting he would make a journey to “the south” for his health. . . . In the height of the excitement, and when the armed mob was menacing the court, a number of prominent Gentiles called upon me and stated that they had reliable information that, unless the prosecutions were stopped, the prominent Gentiles who had taken an active part in opposing the Mormon “system” would be assassinated; that they had been appointed a committee to advise me of the fact and request me to dismiss the cases. I told the spokesman he would make a splendid angel, and as I did not intend to grant the request, he had better prepare to go to Abraham’s bosom. He replied that the matter was “too serious to treat facetiously.” . . . This was not the only time I had been subjected to a fire from the rear by men who should have encouraged instead of opposed me. (Ibid., pp. 54-56)

Stanley P. Hirshon gives this information:

Then, on October 2, 1871, Young was arrested for lewd and lascivious cohabitation with sixteen of his wives, a charge the government expected to prove by bringing into court his children by these women. Although the marshal allowed the prophet to remain at home, Brigham Young, Jr., at the church conference on October 5, denounced the federal appointees as tools of the devil and called down on them heaven’s curse. “Trust to God,” he advised his people, “keep your powder dry, and don’t fail to have on hand a good supply of fixed ammunition.” Loud cheers greeted his remarks. . . . Young heard that Hickman had implicated him in several murders. He panicked and fled. Fortunately for him, however, the sympathetic George C. Bates now replaced Baskin. “The counsel of Brigham Young, indicted for murder and lewd and lascivious cohabitation, have proposed to me, that he is perfectly willing to come in at once, surrender himself, and give bail in the sum of $200,000,” Bates informed his superiors. “His counsel also state that Young left, not to avoid trial, but to escape confinement in the garrison here and for fear of his life.”

Early in 1872 Young submitted to arrest for murder, but Salt Lake City had no federal jail and McKean allowed him to return home. . . . Attorney General, McKean argued that he had treated the Saints humanely. “I permitted Brigham Young, though indicted for murder, to occupy his own house, and take exercise in his own carriage, surrounded by his friends, and but nominally in the custody of the Marshal. I permitted Mayor Wells, also indicted for murder, to go on bail. . . .

The Saints, on the other hand, ceaselessly harassed McKean. One day during the trials the door of the hayloft suddenly flew open, and twenty to thirty armed men dashed inside the courtroom. "They stood for some minutes in a menacing and insulting group near the middle of the room, but as they seemed not to be noticed, they gradually took seats. They were of the organization known as 'Danites.'" Several times these sinister men returned to the hayloft, but they failed to intimidate McKean. (The Lion of The Lord, pp. 305-308)

Unfortunately, the case against Brigham Young for murder never came to trial. Harold Schindler states that "the United States Supreme Court handed down a decision in the Englebrecht case which set aside all legal proceedings in Utah during the previous eighteen months and declared null and void indictments found against nearly one hundred and forty persons. The landmark opinion resulted in all charges being dropped against Young, Wells, Stout, Kimball, and, ironically, Hickman himself" (Orrin Porter Rockwell; Man of God, Son of Thunder, pp. 355). Thomas G. Alexander gives this information concerning this matter:

Almost as soon as Judge McKean arrived in Salt Lake City, . . . he found himself involved in a conflict between the federal government and territorial officials over the relative areas of their jurisdiction. . . . McKean and his fellow judges ruled that the territorial courts were United States district courts. Consequently, from then until April, 1872, the United States marshal empaneled juries by open venire. In a decision which was possibly the biggest blot on McKean's career, the United States Supreme Court overruled him by decreeing that the courts were merely legislative courts of the territory created by federal statute and thus subject to territorial law. The case involved a judgment of $59,063.25 against Alderman and Justice of the Peace Jeter Clinton for the abatement of a saloon in Salt Lake City which refused to pay a city liquor license tax that it considered exorbitant. The federal decision in Clinton V. Englebrecht provided the legal basis for throwing out 130 indictments found by grand juries drawn in accordance with the practice in United States courts rather than the territorial statutes. This solved nothing, however, because the disputes over the appointment of the territorial marshal tied the hands of the court; the courts became little more than boards of arbitration, and by June, 1874, a backlog of ninety-five cases had built up in Third District Court.

McKean and other Gentiles believed that the Mormons were afraid to allow trials of their brethren accused of murder and other crimes before impartial juries. The judge wrote U.S. Attorney General George H. Williams in the fall of 1873 complaining that he could neither convict the guilty nor protect the innocent and that Utah had become a "theocratic state, under the vice regency of Brigham Young." (Dialogue: A Journal of Mormon Thought, Autumn 1966, pp. 86-87)

R. N. Baskin, who had pressed for the indictment of Brigham Young, made the following statement:

Later, the judgment in the Englebrecht case was reversed by the supreme court of the United States, and as the grand jury which had found the indictments against Brigham and others was held by that court to be invalid, the criminal cases in question were dismissed. I regret that those cases were not tried, because their trial would have exposed, as did the first trial of Bishop John D. Lee, the deplorable conditions which then existed in the Territory; and the examination of Hickman, in my opinion, would have convinced the public that his confession was true, especially if he had been subjected to a rigid cross-examination. (Reminiscences of Early Utah, by R. N. Baskin, p. 57)

No Protection in Utah

In a sermon delivered June 19, 1853, Brigham Young stated: "It is true, as it is said in the Report of these officers, if I had crooked my little finger, he would have been used up, but I did not bend it. . . . Apostates, or men who never made any profession of religion, had better be careful how they come here, lest I should bend my little finger" (Journal of Discourses, vol. 1, pp. 186-187).

The people of early Utah knew that this was no idle threat, and that their lives and property were in danger if they opposed Brigham Young's rule. On February 4, 1849, Hosea Stout recorded the following in his diary:

Went to meeting on the warm side of the Fort wall. President B. Young spoke giving us general instructions & advice. He said that none should leave here & carry off the gold & silver &c without he pleases to let them that they can not get away unless he sees fit & those who go away contrary to council he will confiscate their property, for he is boss &c. (On The Mormon Frontier; The Diary of Hosea Stout, vol. 2, p. 341)

Heber C. Kimball, a member of the First Presidency, made these statements in a discourse delivered September 2, 1860:

The moment a young man leaves the Church, he is then a traitor to the law of laws. You know the law of nations is that when a man becomes a traitor to the law of the land, all he has is confiscated, and he is punished accordingly; and so it is in the Church and kingdom of God. (Journal of Discourses, vol. 8, p. 213)

Jedediah M. Grant, also a member of the First Presidency, plainly and openly taught that traitors to the Church were "worthy of death" (Deseret News, July 27, 1854).

We can only begin to imagine the fear that must have gripped the inhabitants of early Utah. Nels Anderson gives this interesting information:

A month later Burr wrote another letter to Hendricks, reporting that he had made a contract with a man named Mogo to survey Sanpete Valley. When Mogo got ready to leave the city, he found that ten of his oxen had been stolen. "Suspicion falls on a noted character who stands high in the councils of the Church, but to convict or punish him would be impossible, and it is but another instance that the laws afford no protection to life or property." Burr advised that two persons who could testify feared to talk lest their lives should be in danger. . . .

The "Reformation" was an occasion for every Saint to purge his soul and to be rebaptized, to rededicate himself to the church. . . . Thousands were rebaptized. Repentant backsliders confessed and begged forgiveness of the congregations. There were allegations that many were dragged from their homes and beaten and their property destroyed. Burr did not exaggerate. Some of the Gentiles were in danger.

An example of reformation zeal was reported in a letter sent by Dr. Garland Hurt, sometime in the autumn of 1856, to Brigham Young. With General Burr and other members of the land survey he had visited central Utah. They were on their way to Corn Creek, near Fillmore, to visit the government farm of the Pahvante tribe. As they approached the farm, they noticed two men riding full speed ahead of them. They noticed also, on reaching the farm, that some Indians were riding away in the opposite direction. Later they learned that the riders were Mormons going to warn the Indians that the "Americans were coming to their camp to arrest the murderers of Captain Gunnison." As previously mentioned, some of the Indians of this tribe had been tried and convicted for the murder of Gunnison, but they escaped and were still at large.

Hurt and his party returned to Fillmore and stopped during the evening at the home of a Mr. Peter Robison. In the course of the evening a Mr. Edwin Pugh, a neighbor, stepped in and invited two young men of the party to visit at his house. No sooner did they enter Pugh's house than some persons began to stone the place. "Mr. Pugh ran out and asked what they meant. They asked what he was doing with those damned Americans about his house." Apparently the two men visiting with Mr. Pugh, although working for Hurt or Burr, were not "Americans," but Mormons. Pugh so stated. The voices of the attackers responded from the darkness: “They are no better than Americans, or they would not be with them.”

The incident reported by Hurt reflected the prevailing attitude of the Saints toward the Gentiles. There were other reports of stoning at night the houses of Gentiles and apostates. Thus Utah Mormons in 1856 were conducting themselves like Missouri Gentiles in 1833, when Mormon houses were stoned in Jackson County. (Desert Saints, pp. 149-153)

The feud between the Governor Cumming faction and the Judge Eckles faction of Utah’s carpetbag government is traced to the poison-pen letters of the latter. On July 9, 1858, Eckles wrote to Secretary of State Lewis Cass that “Brigham Young is de facto governor of Utah, whatever Governor Cumming may be de jure. His reign is one of terror. His unbridled will is king. Every apostate Mormon and every Gentile here, who has hitherto lived in the Territory is in constant fear of personal violence. To me the future is dark and gloomy.” In this letter Eckles expressed regret that all the federal officials in Utah were not united in what he considered the proper course in dealing with the Mormons. (Ibid., p. 195)

Those who were appointed to enforce the law in early Utah found themselves in a very difficult and dangerous situation. The U.S. Marshal P. K. Dotson wrote a letter to Judge Cradlebaugh in which he stated:

I have received from you certain warrants of arrest against many persons, in your Judicial district, charged with murder, including one against J. D. Lee, John Higbee (a bishop), Hoyte (his counselor), and thirty-six others, for the murder of one hundred and nineteen men, women and children, at Mountain Meadows, also one against Porter Rockwell, John A. Wolf, president of the Seventies . . . for the murder of the Aiken Brothers and two others; one against Lewis Bentz and three others for stealing six mules, the property of the United States. . . .

I regret to inform you that it is not in my power to execute any of these processes, I have made repeated efforts by the aid as well of the military, as of the civil posse, to execute the warrants last alluded to, but without success. So great is the number of persons engaged in the commission of these crimes, and such the feeling of the Mormon Church, and the community in their favor, that I cannot rely on a civil posse to aid me in arresting them. . . . (“Journal History,” June 3, 1859, as cited in Orrin Porter Rockwell; Man of God, Son of Thunder, pp. 292-293)

Thomas G. Alexander gives this information:

As the conflict evolved, a considerable degree of violence took place between Mormons and Gentiles in which McKean or his court was directly involved. . . . A body of what McKean thought were either Danites or members of the Nauvoo Legion tried to intimidate the judge in court. In October, 1874, a group of armed men knocked Marshal George R. Maxwell down and hurt him while he was trying to serve a writ on Brigham Young to secure his testimony before a grand jury. (Dialogue: A Journal of Mormon Thought, Autumn 1966, p. 95)

J. M. Grant, a member of the First Presidency of the Mormon Church, frankly admitted that Brigham Young interfered with the grand jury and claimed that the Mormons did not need courts:

Last Sunday, the President chastised some of the Apostles and Bishops who were on the grand jury. Did he fully succeed in clearing away the fog which surrounded them, and in removing blindness from their eyes? No, for they could go to their room and again disagree, though, to their credit, it must be admitted that a brief explanation made them unanimous in their action. . . .

Several had got into the fog to suck and eat the filth of a Gentile law court, ostensibly a court of Utah, though I call it a Gentile court. . . .

A brief examination will soon convince a person, of only ordinary observation, that the laws of Utah are not administered in our courts, and that the judges must know that fact, and that they have been seeking from the first, with but few exceptions, to overrule them. . . .

I want the Gentiles to understand that we know all about their whoredoms and other abominations here. If we have not invariably killed such corrupt scoundrels, those who will seek to corrupt and pollute our community, I swear to you that we mean to, and to accomplish more in a few hours, towards clearing the atmosphere, than all your grand and traverse juries can in a year. . . . we are determined to do right, and to set at defiance wickedness and wicked men, and to send them to hell across lots, as quick as we can. (Journal of Discourses, vol. 3, pp. 233-235)

John Cradlebaugh, who served as associate justice of the Second Judicial District in early Utah, made these revealing statements in a speech delivered before the House of Representatives:

Mr. Speaker, having resided for sometime among the Mormons, . . . I feel that I would not be discharging my duty if I failed to impart such information as I have acquired in regard to this people . . .

Mormonism . . . not only permits, but orders, the commission of the vilest lusts, in the name of the Almighty God himself, and teaches that it is a sacred duty to commit the crimes of theft and murder. . . . And, as if to crown its achievements, it establishes itself in the heart of one of the greatest and most powerful Governments of the world, establishes therein a theocratic government overriding all other government, . . . They teach the shedding of blood for the remission of sins, or, in other words, that if a Mormon apostatizes his throat shall be cut, and his blood poured out upon the ground for the remission of his sin. They also practice other revolting doctrines, such as are only carried out in polygamous countries, which is evidenced by a number of mutilated persons in their midst. . . . they teach that it is a duty to rob and steal from Gentiles. . . . the picture, true to life as it is, has yet darker shades. Murder is openly commanded, . . . In the few extracts I have to give you, . . . the right and duty of the church to “spill blood” is asserted in the plainest and coarsest words that our Anglo-Saxon language affords. . . . Brigham himself is king, priest, lawgiver, and chief polygamist. Is treason hatched in Utah—Brigham is the head traitor. Are rebel troops mustered against the United States—Brigham is their commander-in-chief. Is a law to be enacted—Brigham’s advice determines it. Is an offending “Gentile” or an apostate Mormon to be assassinated—the order emanates from Brigham. . . . His deluded followers yield him implicit obedience, and a church organization known as “Danites” or “destroying angels,” stand ready to protect his person, to avenge his wrongs, and to execute his pleasure.

Brigham is both Church and State. True, the atrocities committed in Utah are not committed by him with his own hands, but they are committed by his underlings, and at his bidding. He claims that he is not a criminal, because his hand is not seen in the perpetration of crime. He pleads an “alibi,” when he is known to be everywhere present in the Territory. He seeks to avert censure by feigning ignorance of the atrocities of his underlings. Such ignorance can only be supposable on the hypothesis that Mormonism is not a system and Brigham is not its head; that he is a despot without power, or a prophet without the ability to forsee.

Now, Brigham is either complete ruler in Utah, or he is nothing. The complicity of the church dignitaries, mayors of cities, and other territorial officials, in the crimes that have been committed, demonstrates that those crimes were church crimes, and Brigham is the head of the church. . . . Mormon punishment for Mormon apostasy is like the old curse of former Popes; it extends from the soles of the feet to the hairs of the head. It separates husband and wife; it reaches from the confiscation of property to the severance of the windpipe. . . . Brigham not only controls the legislation, but he controls the courts. . . .

This attempt of the Mormons to interfere with the administration of the law, and control the courts, has been one of the chief causes of difficulty between the judges sent by the Federal Government to Utah and the Mormon people. From almost twenty judges sent to the Territory, with the exception of two—Judge Zerubbabel Snow, a Mormon, and J. F. Kinney, the present chief justice, the only territorial judge who has not been removed by the present Administration, and who bears the unenviable reputation of being the “creature and tool of Brigham Young”—the testimony has been uniformly to the effect that the laws could not be enforced. Not one of these judges, with the exception of the two named above, have been enabled to serve out the short term of four years. Some have left in disgust, while others were driven away by force.

As one of the associate justices of the Territory of Utah, in the month of April, 1859, I commenced and held a term of the district court for the second judicial district in the city of Provo, about sixty miles south of Salt Lake City. Upon my requisition, General A. S. Johnston, in command of the military department, furnished a small military force for the purpose of protecting the court. A grand jury was impaneled, and their attention was pointedly and specifically called to a great number of crimes that had been committed in the immediate vicinity, . . . The jury thus instructed, though kept in session two weeks, utterly refused to do anything, and were finally discharged as an evidently useless appendage of a court of justice.

But the court was determined to try a last resource to bring to light and to punishment those guilty of the atrocious crimes which confessedly had been committed in the Territory, and the session continued. Bench warrants, based upon sworn information, were issued against the alleged criminals, and United States Marshal Dotson, a most excellent and reliable officer, aided by a military posse, procured on his own request, had succeeded in making a few arrests. A general stampede immediately took place among the Mormons; and what I wish to call your attention to as particularly noticable, is the fact that this occured more especially among the church officials and civil officers. Why were these classes so peculiarly urgent and hasty in flight? The law of evidence, based on the experience of ages, has but one answer. It was the consciousness of guilt which drove them to seek a refuge from the avenging arm of the law, armed at last, as they supposed, with power to vindicate its injured majesty. It is a well-known fact that many of the bishops and presidents of “stakes” remained secreted in the mountains until the news was confirmed beyond doubt which announced the retrograde course of the Administration at Washington. . . .

Marshal Dotson, holding warrants for the arrest of almost a hundred murderers, including the participators in the horrible butcheries at the Mountain Meadows, is compelled to return those warrants unexecuted, for the reason, as he solemnly states, that he has not the ability to serve them. In utter disgust he resigns his office; and in this connection his letter of resignation, addressed to the President, is worthy of perusal:

GREAT SALT LAKE CITY, UTAH TERRITORY,

August 1, 1859.

Sir: I hereby tender to your excellency my resignation as United States marshal of the Territory of Utah, to take effect from the 20th instant. . . .

The courts of the United States in the Territory, powerless to do good, in dreadful mockery of justice, are compelled to lend the power and majesty of the law to subserve the evil designs of the very criminals they seek to punish. Impotent to protect innocence, they encourage crime. . . .

Though willing to serve the Administration from which I received my appointment, I cannot remain an officer of the Government without the power to maintain its dignity. . . .

I am, sir, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

P. K. DOTSON, . . .

(“Utah and the Mormons,” a Speech of Hon. J. Cradlebaugh, in the House of Representatives, February 7, 1863, as printed in Appendix to the Congressional Globe, February 23, 1863, pp. 119-125)

Although John Cradlebaugh presented an accurate picture of conditions in early Utah, conditions have certainly changed. The police in Salt Lake City give full protection to both Mormons and Gentiles, and an apostate no longer has to fear for his life or property. Wallace Turner makes this interesting observation:

A modern apostasy can be understood through the story of the Tanner couple. The fact that today they can live comfortably in Salt Lake City, relatively unmolested by the LDS church (beyond a letter or so from anguished apostles) demonstrates as much as anything could the way the church has changed. In the old days, those who disagreed had better be able to defend themselves. (The Mormon Establishment, p. 163)

37. Miscellaneous History and Doctrine

In this chapter we will deal with a few doctrines and other matters not mentioned in the rest of the book.

Birth Control

We have previously shown that the Mormon Church teaches that all men pre-existed as spirits before they were born in the flesh. Because many of God's spirit children are still "waiting to take tabernacles," the Mormon leaders teach that Mormons should have large families and that birth control is evil. Brigham Young, the second President of the Church, said that "there are multitudes of pure and holy spirits waiting to take tabernacles, now what is our duty?—to prepare tabernacles for them; to take a course that will not tend to drive those spirits into the families of the wicked, . . . It is the duty of every righteous man and woman to prepare tabernacles for all the spirits they can; . . ." (Journal of Discourses, vol. 4, p. 56).

Joseph Fielding Smith, the tenth President of the Mormon Church, made this statement:

Birth Control is wickedness. The abuse of this holy covenant has been the primary cause for the downfall of nations. . . .

When a man and a woman are married and they agree, or covenant, to limit their offspring to two or three, and practice devices to accomplish this purpose, they are guilty of iniquity which eventually must be punished. Unfortunately this evil doctrine is being taught as a virtue by many people who consider themselves cultured and highly educated. . . .

It should be understood definitely that this kind of doctrine is not only not advocated by the authorities of the Church, but also is condemned by them as wickedness in the sight of the Lord.

President Joseph F. Smith has said in relation to this question:

"Possibly no greater sin could be committed by the people who have embraced this gospel than to prevent or to destroy life in the manner indicated." President Brigham Young has this to say about birth control, an abomination practiced by so-called civilized nations, but nations who have forsaken the ways of life:

"There are multitudes of pure and holy spirits waiting to take tabernacles, now what is our duty? . . . It is the duty of every righteous man and woman to prepare tabernacles for all the spirits they can."

. . . Moreover, may we not lose our own salvation if we violate this divine law?

Birth control leads to damnation. Instructing the mothers of the Church, President Joseph F. Smith said in June, 1917: "I regret, I think it is a crying evil, that there should exist a sentiment or a feeling among any members of the Church to curtail the birth of their children. I think that is a crime wherever it occurs. I have no hesitancy in saying that I believe that is one of the greatest crimes of the world today, this evil practice. (Doctrines of Salvation, vol. 2, pp. 87-89, 1960 ed.)

The following appeared in the Church Section of the Deseret News on May 2, 1970:

It is earnestly to be hoped that Latter-day Saints will not be misled by the ridiculous philosophy now being widely advocated that families are to be limited to one, or at most two, children. . . .

The doctrine of one or two children to the family is contrary to the revealed instruction of God.

The "population explosionists" are misleading both the nation and the world, and we should not be deceived by them.

. . . it is God who determines how many people will be born into this world, and each one of them is His own child in the spirit. . . .

God has commanded us to "multiply and replenish the earth." At no time has He abrogated that law.

. . . are we to believe also that He is so blind and thoughtless that He will over-populate this earth? Where is our faith?

Have not the prophets of the Church taught from the beginning of our history that large families are to be desired? Shall we repudiate them? . . .

To limit the size of families means contraception, and what have the modern prophets said about contraception? Has anyone heard them advocate one or two to a family? Has anyone heard them endorse the use of the "pill"— . . .

. . . This earth will not survive long enough in its present state to become so overpopulated that we will all starve to death. . . .

It is His prophets to whom we should look—not to the unbelieving "population explosionists" with their meaningless mathematical calculations which will have no significance as the judgments of God come upon a faithless world. (Deseret News, Church Section, May 2, 1970, p. 16)

The teaching that many spirits are awaiting tabernacles and that Mormons should have large families has caused some problems for faithful Mormons. Laurel Thatcher Ulrich stated:

It isn't easy these days to be a Mormon mother of four. In the university town where I live, fertility is tolerated but not encouraged. . . .

Open a woman's magazine and I'm told that the most responsible step I can take is to limit the size of my family. . . . Open the Ensign and I am warned of the woeful consequences should I "wall up the path of life over which new spirits must cross to enter a mortal body." Clearly, to prevent the birth of a fifth child would be sinful.

I apparently have two choices. I can selfishly gobble up more of the earth's scarce resources by having another child when I know that in the time it takes you to read those words four children will have died from starvation; or, I can selfishly refuse to bear more children when I know that there are spirits languishing in the pre-existence waiting to enter mortality. . . .

While the "anti-explosionists" argue that the U.S. growth rate, 17.6 births to 9.6 deaths per thousand, is not excessive and can be managed, what would they say of the Mormon performance—28.41 births to 4.78 deaths per thousand, giving us a population increase on a par with most of Asia and only a few percentage points under Africa and Latin America, a rate of growth which, if applied universally, could only result in disaster?

. . . the First Presidency, in a signed statement dated 14 April 1969, has urged Latter-day Saints not to limit their families. One might assume that in the Lord's eyes there is no population problem. . . .

. . . the First Presidency addressed themselves to Latter-day Saints through their Bishops, not to the world at large. Unlike the Catholic hierarchy our leaders have made no attempt to fight world population control; they have simply ignored it, directing their pronouncements to their own people.

To a haggard mother of four in a fledgling stake in the mission field, the reason seems obvious. While there are unquestionably too many Indians in India and too many commuters on Boston's Route 128, there are simply not enough Mormons. . . . we don't need more people in New Hampshire, just more Mormons. That explains why having babies is not enough. We've got to persuade other people to stop having them. . . . Assuming a constant conversion rate and a constant rate of natural increase, there could be twenty-three million Mormons in forty years. In just ninety years we could number 300 million, . . .

Will I have more children? I might. Yet right now four seems like a nice, independent number—just twice too many for Zero Population Growth and only half enough to fill a row in Sacramento Meeting. All things considered, I think I can be quite comfortable just where I am, as long as Mormons keep having babies and the rest of the country stops. (Dialogue: A Journal of Mormon Thought, Summer 1971, pp. 41-45)

The Mormon leaders teach that the faithful will continue to have children throughout eternity. Brigham Young stated:

Many of the sisters grieve because they are not blessed with offspring. You will see the time when you will have millions of children around you. If you are faithful to your covenants, you will be mothers of nations. (As quoted in Dialogue: A Journal of Mormon Thought, Summer 1971, p. 14)

Compressed Spirits

The Mormon Apostle Orson Pratt made the following statements:

A great many people have supposed that the spirit which exists in the tabernacle, for instance, of an infant, is of the same size as the infant tabernacle when it enters therein. No one will dispute that it is of the same size when it is enclosed therein; but how large was the spirit before it entered the tabernacle? . . . the Lord Jesus, who was one of these spirits, . . . a full-grown spirit, thousands of years before he came to take his infant tabernacle. . . .

When all these spirits were sent forth from the eternal worlds, they were, no doubt, not infants; but when they entered the infant tabernacle, they were under the necessity, the same as our Lord and Savior, of being compressed, or diminished in size so that their spirits could be enclosed in infant tabernacles. If their bodies die in infancy, do their spirits remain infants in stature between death and the resurrection of the body? I think not. (Journal of Discourses, vol. 16, pp. 333-334)

Orson Pratt also claimed that when a spirit was compressed it caused a loss of memory:

When Jesus was born into our world, his previous knowledge was taken from Him: this was occasioned by His spiritual body being compressed into a smaller volume than it originally occupied. . . . when this spirit was compressed, so as to be wholly enclosed in an infant tabernacle, it had a tendency to suspend memory; . . . So it is with man. When he enters a body of flesh, his spirit is so compressed and contracted in infancy that he forgets his former existence, . . . (The Seer, p. 21)

According to Joseph Fielding Smith a baby that dies has its spirit compressed twice. The spirit is compressed in order to enter the child's body. When the child dies the spirit leaves the body and expands to its full size, but before the body is resurrected the spirit must be compressed again to the size of the infant's body.

CHILDREN IN THE RESURRECTION. When a baby dies, it goes back into the spirit world, and the spirit assumes its natural form as an adult, for we were all adults before we were born.

When a child is raised in the resurrection, the spirit will enter the body and the body will be the same size as it was when the child died. It will then grow after the resurrection, to full maturity to conform to the size of the spirit. (Doctrines of Salvation, vol. 2, p. 56)

Vegetable Spirits

The Mormon Apostle Orson Pratt, writing in 1853, made these statements:

The spirit of a vegetable is in the same image and likeness of its tabernacle, and of the same magnitude, for it fills every part thereof. . . . If the spirit of an apple tree were rendered visible when separated from its natural tabernacle, it would appear in the form, likeness, and magnitude of the natural apple tree; . . . When the spiritual vegetable withdraws, the natural one decays and returns to its original elements; but its spirit, being a living substance, remains in its organized form, capable of happiness in its own sphere, and will again inhabit a celestial tabernacle when all things are made new . . . we are compelled to believe that every vegetable, whether great or small, has a living intelligent spirit capable of feeling, knowing, and rejoicing in its sphere. (The Seer, 1853, pp. 33, 34)

When a world is redeemed from its fallen state, and made into a Heaven, all the animal creation are raised from the dead, and become celestial and immortal. The food of these animals is derived from the vegetables, growing on a celestial soil; consequently, it is not converted into blood, but into spirit which circulates in the veins of these animals; therefore, their offspring will be spiritual bodies, instead of flesh and bones. . . .

. . . when planted in a celestial soil, each vegetable derives its nourishment therefrom; and the fluid thus derived, circulates in the pores and cells of the vegetable tabernacle, and preserves it from decay and death; this same fluid, thus circulating, forms a spiritual vegetable; this differs from the parent vegetables in Heaven. . . . Thus the spirits of both vegetables and animals are the offspring of male and female parents which have been raised from the dead, or redeemed from a fallen condition, with the world upon which they dwelt. (Ibid., pp. 37-38)

Admitting the eternity of the capacities, then the materials of which our spirits are composed, must have been capable of thinking, moving, willing, &c., before they were organized in the womb of the celestial female. . . . If they were once organized in the vegetable kingdom, and then disorganized by becoming the food of celestial animals, and then again reorganized in the form of the spirits of animals which is a higher sphere of being, then, is it unreasonable to suppose that the same particles have, from all eternity, been passing through an endless chain of unions and disunions, organizations and disorganizations, until at length they are permitted to enter into the highest and most exalted sphere of organization in the image and likeness of God? A transmigration of the same particles of spirits from a lower to a higher organization, is demonstrated from the fact that the same particles exist in a diffused scattered state, mingled with other matter; next, they exist in a united form, growing out of the earth in the shape of grass, herbs, and trees; and after this, these vegetables become food for celestial animals, and these same particles are organized into their offspring, and thus form the spirits of animals. Here then, is apparently a transmigration of the same particles of spirit from an inferior to a superior organization, wherein their condition is improved, and their sphere of action enlarged. Who shall set any bounds to this upward tendency of spirit? . . . who shall say that it will not progress until it shall gain the very summit of perfection, . . . the image of God? (Ibid., pp. 102-103)

A Year's Supply of Food

In the November 1968 issue of the Improvement Era, page 101, we found an advertisement in which this statement appeared: “Hunger Hurts!” Under such a title one might expect to find something concerning the people who are starving in India or Africa; instead, however, we found this question: “Is your year’s supply important?” This was not a plea for the hungry, but an advertisement for a “food storage booklet.”

For many years the Mormon leaders have counseled their people to store at least a year’s supply of food in case of an emergency. The following appeared in the Church Section of the Deseret News in 1971:

First, provide for one’s own. Then help one’s kin, one’s priesthood quorum members, one’s brothers and sisters in the Gospel, one’s fellowmen. . . . For 34 years, Church members have been specifically counseled to store enough of the necessities of life to provide for the family for at least a year. . . . these are programs inspired of the Lord. . . . The keynote to personal welfare was given by President J. Reuben Clark Jr. in April Conference, 1937. It has never been changed. President Clark said:

“First, and above and beyond everything else, let us live righteously, . . .

“Let every head of every household see to it that he has on hand enough food and clothing, and, where possible, fuel also, for at least a year ahead. You of small means put your money into foodstuffs and wearing apparel. . . .” (Deseret News, Church Section, February 20, 1971)

John Whitmer’s History

John Whitmer was one of the eight witnesses to the Book of Mormon. In the year 1831 Joseph Smith gave a revelation commanding John Whitmer to keep a history of the church:

Behold, it is expedient in me that my servant John should write and keep a regular history, and assist you, my servant Joseph, in transcribing all things which shall be given you, until he is called to further duties. . . . And again, I say unto you that it shall be appointed unto him to keep the church record and history continually, for Oliver Cowdery I have appointed to another office. (Doctrine and Covenants, Sec. 47:1, 3)

Again we read in section 69:

Wherefore, I, the Lord, will that my servant, John Whitmer, should go with my servant Oliver Cowdery; And also that he shall continue in writing and making a history of all the important things which he shall observe and know concerning my church; . . . let my servant John Whitmer travel . . . that he may the more easily obtain knowledge—Preaching and expounding, writing, copying, selecting, and obtaining all things which shall be for the good of the church, and for the rising generations that shall grow up on the land. . . . (Doctrine and Covenants, Sec. 69:2, 3, 7, 8; Reorganized LDS ed. 69:1a, b, 2b)

Strange as it may seem, Joseph Smith did not agree with the God of the Doctrine and Covenants, for he said that John Whitmer was not capable of writing a history. In a letter to John Whitmer, which was signed by Joseph Smith and Sidney Rigdon, the following was stated: “Indeed, sir, we never supposed you capable of writing a history, but were willing to let it come out under your name, notwithstanding it would really not be yours but ours” (History of the Church, vol. 3, p. 15).

Sidney Rigdon and Joseph Smith also told John Whitmer that his history could not come forth unless they were allowed to censor it:

We were desirous of honoring you by giving publicity to your notes on the history of the Church of Latter-day Saints, after making such corrections as we thought would be necessary, knowing your incompetency as a historian, and that writings coming from your pen, could not be put to press without our correcting them, or else the Church must suffer reproach. (History of the Church, vol. 3, p. 15)

The Living Earth

On November 8, 1857, Heber C. Kimball, who was a member of the First Presidency, stated:

. . . blessing be to God that I live on an earth that lives . . . well, it is truth. . . . Do you believe that a dead woman can conceive from a live man and bring forth a live child? . . . No, you know better. Well, if a woman will not produce when she is dead, then the earth cannot produce living things if it was dead. . . . Where did the earth come from? From its parent earths. (Journal of Discourses, vol. 6, pp. 35-36)

On another occasion Heber C. Kimball stated that the “earth” has a “spirit as much as any body has a spirit” (Ibid., vol. 5, p. 172). Mormon leaders still teach that the earth is alive. Bruce R. McConkie, of the First Council of Seventy, said:

. . . this earth was created first as a spirit, and that it was thereafter clothed upon with tangible, physical element. (Mormon Doctrine, 1966, pp. 210-211)

. . . the earth itself is passing through a plan of salvation. It was created (the equivalent of birth); it fell to its present mortal or telestial state; it was baptized by immersion, when the universal flood swept over its entire surface . . . it will be baptized by fire . . . in the day when it is renewed and receives its paradisiacal glory; it will die; and finally it will be quickened (or resurrected) and become a celestial sphere. (Ibid., pp. 251-252)

Joseph Fielding Smith, the tenth President of the Mormon Church, states:

This earth is living and must die, but since it keeps the law it shall be restored through the resurrection by which it shall become celestialized . . . The earth, as a living body, will have to die and be resurrected, for it, too, has been redeemed by the blood of Jesus Christ. (Doctrines of Salvation, vol. 1, pp. 73-74)

Changing the Blood

One of the oddest doctrines that Joseph Smith taught was that a Gentile must literally have his blood changed so that he is a actually of the seed of Abraham:

. . . as the Holy Ghost falls upon one of the literal seed of Abraham, it is calm and serene; . . . while the effect of the Holy Ghost upon a Gentile, is to purge out the old blood, and make him actually of the seed of Abraham. (History of the Church, vol. 3, p. 380)

Brigham Young, the second President of the Church, said:

Again, if a pure Gentile firmly believes the Gospel of Jesus Christ, and yields obedience to it, in such a case I will give you the words of the Prophet Joseph—“When the Lord pours out the Holy Ghost upon that individual he will have spasms, and you would think that he was going into fits.”

Joseph said that the Gentile blood was actually cleansed out of their veins, and the blood of Jacob made to circulate in them; and the revolution and change in the system were so great that it caused the beholder to think they were going into fits. (Journal of Discourses, vol. 2, p. 269)

According to this doctrine we would expect that a Jew would have the proper blood, but Brigham Young taught that even a Jew must have his blood changed:

If a Jew comes into this Church, and honestly professes to be a Saint, a follower of Christ, and if the blood of Judah is in his veins, he will apostatize. He may have been born and bred a Jew, . . . and have openly professed to be a Jew all his days; but I will tell you a secret—there is not a particle of the blood of Judaism in him, if he has become a true Christian, a Saint of God; for if there is, he will most assuredly leave the Church of Christ, or that blood will be purged out of his veins. We have men among us who were Jews, . . . here is brother Neibaur; do I believe there is one particle of the blood of Judah in his veins? No, not so much as could be seen on the point of the finest cambric needle, through a microscope with a magnifying power of two millions. (Journal of Discourses, vol. 2, p. 142)

38. Facing Reality

Reality is sometimes very hard to face. For instance, on July 26, 1969, the Salt Lake Tribune printed an article which contained the following:

Forget the Apollo 11 NASA has got it all wrong about the moon, the earth and most everything else in the universe, according to the International Flat Earth Research Society.

The moon is not 240,000-odd miles away . . . It is less than 2,700- miles away, said Flat Earthist Secretary Samuel Shenton. The distance to the sun is 2,700 miles, he explained, and obviously the moon is closer. . . .

Nor is the moon 2,100 miles in diameter. It's slightly smaller than the sun, which is only 32 miles across, according to Shenton, . . .

The 66-year-old iconoclast has not wavered in his beliefs despite astronauts orbiting the earth and flying to the moon. All that, including moon landing he said, is just part of a great deception by NASA and its contractors and the manufacturers of globe maps who have a vested interest in perpetuating the globite teaching. . . .

Shenton . . . is very serious about his ideas and irate at the multitude of ways the public is being hoodwinked every day. . . .

"Once you get your teeth in it, it turns your stomach over that such deception can go perhaps to your children," he said.

The astronauts are hypnotized into believing they go into space, Shenton contended.

It is easy to look at this and smile, but those who are honest with themselves must admit that they have sometimes had difficulty facing reality.

One of the most difficult encounters we ever had with reality was when we discovered that the Book of Mormon was untrue. We found it very difficult to tell our friends that we no longer believed that it was translated from gold plates.

One man, who had taught at the Brigham Young University for many years, made an extensive study of Mormon Church history, but after spending much time and money to make this study, he was afraid to release his findings. He told us that the reason he would not disclose his findings was that he feared too many people would apostatize from the church.

James R. Harris, who wrote a thesis for the Brigham Young University on the changes in the Book of Moses, made this comment concerning the inability of the members of the church to face reality:

During the writing of this thesis an occasional inquisitive friend would ask about the nature and extent of changes in the contents of the Book of Moses. Encouraged by their interest, a variety of examples were pointed out. The reaction varied in emotional intensity but always ended with a caustic question or prediction, such as: "Why did you pick such a subject?" or "This will disturb a lot of people." . . . Our well-meaning friends were so fearful of doing injury to the Church that they would abandon the search for truth. ("A Study of the Changes in the Contents of the Book of Moses From the Earliest Available Sources to the Current Edition," typed copy, p. 237)

Jesus once stated: "And ye shall know the truth, and the truth will set you free" (John 8:32). Why is it, then, that we fear the truth if the truth will make us free? Why do we stop our ears when the truth is proclaimed? It is because we love the bondage of our own preconceived ideas. We do not like to admit that we have been wrong.

Frances Lee Menlove, a Mormon psychologist, has appealed to the Mormon leaders to be more realistic in their presentation of Mormon history:

But the story of Joseph Smith, the early Church, the hejira across the plains, and the consequent establishment of Zion is more than just history. It is the story of God directing His People to a new Dispensation. Perhaps because the history is so fraught with theological significance, it has been smoothed and whittled down, a wrinkle removed here and sharp edge there. In many ways it has assumed the character of a myth. That these courageous and inspired men shared the shortcomings of all men cannot be seriously doubted. That the Saints were not perfect nor their leaders without error is evident to anyone who cares to read the original records of the Church. But the myths and the myth-making persist. Striking evidence for this is found in the fact that currently one of the most successful anti-Mormon proselyting techniques is merely to bring to light obscure or suppressed historical documents. Reading these documents arouses a considerable amount in incredulity, concern, and disenchantment among Mormons under the spell of this mythological view of history. That individuals find these bits and pieces of history so shocking and faith-shattering is at once the meat of fundamentalistic heresies and an indictment of the quasi-suppression of historical reality which propagates the one-sided view of Mormon history.

The relevance of this to honesty is obvious. The net result of mythologizing our history is that the hard truth is concealed. It is deception to select only congenial facts or to twist their meaning so that error becomes wisdom, or to pretend that the Church exists now and has existed in a vacuum, uninfluenced by cultural values, passing fashions, and political ideologies.

There are other temptations to public dishonesty in the Church, temptation to use pretense and distortion to forward the work of the Church. This is the dishonesty of the missionary who presents only those facts or arguments which tend to support his purpose or who takes a scripture out of context or distorts its meaning a little to add to the evidence marshalled for the point he is making. Invoking a higher law or greater truth can also be a form of dishonesty. This occurs when someone's views are suppressed or historical manuscripts censored, not because they are false but because they might cause dissension or disturb the faithful or imperil unity. . . . Another motive behind some kinds of public dishonesty is the belief that the naked truth would be harmful to the simple believer. The assumption here is simply that the believer remains better off with his delusions intact, that faith suffers when it bumps into reality. The reasoning of those who distort or suppress reality or alter historical manuscripts to protect the delusions of the simple believer is similar to that of the man who murders a child to protect him from a violent world.

The very nature of the Church demands both personal and public honesty, . . . the Church's leaders must demonstrate for its members the quest for honesty, . . . Because of the tremendous power the Church has in molding and teaching its members, it has an especially sacred responsibility not to misuse this power. . . . The appearance of the Church should never be enhanced at the expense of reality. To distort the reality of the Church as it is understood, to use tricks of manipulation or "salesmanship," to distort arguments by taking them out of context or by skillful omissions, no matter how noble the aim, is to provide the participants with practice in deception and the observers with a blueprint for dishonesty.

Secondly, the Church must avoid any discrepancy between the appearance and the reality. The human failings and occasional misdirections must not be suppressed or omitted from our books, but recognized as the manifestations of those who are less than perfect struggling within the limitations of their understanding. Not only does failure to do this provide an example of dishonesty, but when individuals discover that the Church they have been shown is not the Church as it is in actuality, they may feel that they have uncovered some dark, dangerous secret, a secret that had better be pushed to the back of the mind and forgotten—or a secret that provides evidence for abandoning their faith. There should be nothing based on fact that anyone can say about the Church that the Church has not already said about itself. (Dialogue: A Journal of Mormon Thought, Spring 1966, pp. 49-52)

Exalts the Pride of Man

The Mormon Church, which professes to teach the true way of salvation, teaches many things that are not compatible with the teachings of Christ. For instance, Christ taught that a man must be meek and lowly:

. . . Verily I say unto you, Except ye be converted, and become as little children, ye shall not enter into the kingdom of heaven. (Matthew 18:3)

Jesus also said:

And he spake this parable unto certain which trusted in themselves that they were righteous, and despised others:

Two men went up into the temple to pray; the one a Pharisee, and the other a publican.

The Pharisee stood and prayed thus with himself, God, I thank thee, that I am not as other men are, extortioners, unjust, adulterers, or even as this publican.

I fast twice in the week, I give tithes of all that I possess.

And the publican, standing afar off, would not lift up so much as his eyes unto heaven, but smote upon his breast, saying, God be merciful to me a sinner.

I tell you, this man went down to his house justified rather than the other: for every one that exalteth himself shall be abased; and he that humbleth himself shall be exalted. (Luke 18:9-14)

Mormonism, on the other hand, exalts the pride of man. Joseph H. Weston, who joined the Mormon Church three days after writing his book, made this statement:

Mormons don't grovel before God, prating their unworthiness and imploring mercy. They are not slaves! They are men, made in the image of God! They proudly stand, hold their heads high, and put out their hands to shake that of God in greeting, as any worthy son would be expected to respectfully but proudly stand before a wise and good father. (These Amazing Mormons, 1961, p. 82)

The reader should compare this with the following statement made by Jesus:

So likewise ye, when ye shall have done all those things which are commanded you, say, We are unprofitable servants: we have done that which was our duty to do. (Luke 17:10)

Speaking of a Mormon Sacrament meeting, Mr. Weston remarked:

The meeting opened with the ancient hymn, "How Firm a Foundation." Then the leader made a simple announcement to the sacramental service. There was no long harangue as to who could or could not partake of the communion sacrament. There was no group confession of sins. There was no groveling and humbling of the dignity of man, either mentally or physically. . . .

Sitting erect in the pride and dignity of being a human being, each member took a piece of bread . . .

The almost starting [startling?] effect, psychologically, of this ultra-simple communion service was to completely obliterate the feeling of supplication and meekness engendered at such a time in many other churches. A man didn't feel that he drew nigh—"Unworthy as to so much as gather up the crumbs from His table"—not at all! He felt that he sat as an equal and guest at Jesus' table, and after he had eaten and drunk, he went away with a greater appreciation of his own table, his own body, his own life—all Godlike if he would make and keep them so. (These Amazing Mormons, p. 21)

In his thesis, "The Social Psychological Basis of Mormon New-Orthodoxy," Owen Kendall White, Jr., made these interesting observations concerning Mormon theology:

This dual nature of Mormonism often obscures its liberalism so that many Mormons and nonMormons alike misunderstand its subtle implications. Because of a commitment to biblical literalism, Mormon theology is frequently regarded as another expression of conservative orthodox Christianity. This popular notion is fundamentally inaccurate, for it fails to recognize that the basic liberal doctrines in Mormon theology oppose the central doctrines of orthodox Christianity. . . . The basic Mormon doctrines of God, man, and salvation are radical departures from traditional Christian thought. . . .

In contrast with the sovereign God of Christian orthodoxy and neo-orthodoxy, the Mormon God is finite. This is indicated in the fact that God is not the only reality with necessary existence. That is, He is not the Creator of all that is. ("The Social Psychological Basis of Mormon New-Orthodoxy," M.A. thesis, University of Utah, 1967, pp. 85-86)

From the above description of God, it should be apparent that the Mormon God is a heretical departure from traditional Christianity, and the traditional Christian terminology of omnipotence and omniscience are not justifiably applied to the Mormon God. . . .

The Mormon conception of man is an even more heretical departure from Christian orthodoxy than the doctrine of God. . . . this very claim that the human predicament is not really a predicament in the traditional sense, that man's natural state, present state, is really more good than bad, is a radical denial of traditional Christian theology. . . .

Mormonism rejects the notion that man's condition is best described by "depravity." Nowhere within Mormon theology is its optimism concerning man's natural condition more clearly apparent than in this denial of the Christian doctrine of original sin . . . to the Mormon the fall is a fall upward rather than downward. . . .

Even to the present, Mormonism, at least in most of its religious discourse, affirms the good nature of man. . . . In the April session of the 1964 General Conference, Hugh B. Brown, first counsellor to the President of the church, summarized much of what has been said in this chapter. He spoke:

Our doctrine of man is positive and life affirming. . . . We refuse to believe, with some churches of of Christendom, that the biblical account of the fall of man records the corruption of human nature or to accept the doctrine of original sin. We do not believe that man is incapable of doing the will of God or is unable to merit the reward of Divine approval; that he is therefore totally estranged from God and that whatever salvation comes to him must come as a free and undeserved gift. . . .

. . . the Mormon doctrine of salvation not only provides further evidence of Mormon optimism, but it also argues for a claim that Mormon theology, in opposition to traditional Christian theology, is man-centered rather than God-centered. . . .

Nowhere is the man-centered character of Mormon theology more clearly evident than in the Mormon conception of salvation. For, Mormon doctrines of salvation are radically different from the doctrine of salvation by grace which permeates Christian orthodoxy. . . . There is an almost complete dearth of Pauline theology within Mormonism. Generally, Mormons only refer to Paul on the subject of the resurrection or in his ethical exhortations. Seldom do they quote him on the subject of salvation, and, when they do, they distort his concept of grace to mean man will be physically resurrected by the gracious act of God. Mormonism denies traditional doctrines of grace. . . . Because of this emphasis upon salvation by merit and the idea that man's destiny is Godhood, the Mormon doctrine of salvation, along with the doctrines of God and man, stand as rank heresy within the orthodox Christian world. . . . Mormon theology on the doctrines of God, man, and salvation is a radical departure from Christian orthodoxy.

While the God of Christian orthodoxy is absolute, the God of Mormonism is finite. . . . the Mormon doctrine of salvation emphasizes merit instead of grace. Although the theology has a doctrine of grace in the notion that Christ overcame physical and spiritual death, it is not to be confused with orthodox Christian conceptions of grace. For exaltation, the real salvation of man, is dependent upon works. . . .

If the author were to describe the fundamental difference between Mormon theology and orthodox Christianity in one sentence, he would suggest that while orthodox Christianity is God-centered, Mormon theology is man-centered. . . . Mormon theology is much more concerned with the similarities between God and man than the differences between them. . . . it is the notion that God has a physical body that leads to Mormon claims that man is literally, not figuratively, the offspring of God. Through its entire history, Mormonism has employed its extremely anthropomorphic conception of God to illustrate the similarities rather than the differences between God and man. ("The Social Psychological Basis of Mormon New-Orthodoxy," pp. 95, 96, 98, 100, 101, 103, 107, 108, 110, 111, 112, 118, 119, 120, 122)

In the conclusion to his thesis (page 174), Owen Kendall White, Jr., makes this statement:

Mormon theology sharply dissents from orthodox and neo-orthodox Christianity. While Christian orthodoxy and neo-orthodoxy proclaim a conception of an absolute God, a pessimistic assessment of man, and a doctrine of salvation by grace, Mormon theology boldly affirms a conception of a finite God, an optimistic assessment of man, and a doctrine of salvation by works. Pertaining to these crucial doctrines, Mormonism, when viewed from the perspective of orthodox Christianity, is a radical heresy.

It is certainly strange that the Mormon leaders have rejected so many of the basic doctrines of Christianity, for these same doctrines are found in the Book of Mormon. As an example, the Book of Mormon teaches that man of himself is an enemy to God:

For the natural man is an enemy to God, and has been from the fall of Adam, and will be, forever and ever, unless he yields to the enticings of the Holy Spirit, and putteth off the natural man and becometh a saint through the atonement of Christ the Lord, . . . (Book of Mormon, Mosiah 3:19)

President Brigham Young, on the other hand, taught that the natural man is a friend of God:

It is fully proved in all the revelations that God has ever given to mankind that they naturally love and admire righteousness, justice and truth more than they do evil. It is, however, universally received by professors of religion as a Scriptural doctrine that man is naturally opposed to God. This is not so. Paul says, in his Epistle to the Corinthians, "But the natural man receiveth not the things of God," but I say it is the unnatural "man that receiveth not the things of God." . . . The natural man is of God. (Journal of Discourses, vol. 9, p. 305)

. . . the orthodox divines . . . say that man is naturally prone to evil. . . . but if man had always been permitted to follow the instincts of his nature, had he always followed the great and holy principles of his organism, they would have led him into the path of life everlasting. . . . (Ibid., vol. 10, p.189)

John Taylor, who became the third President of the Mormon Church, remarked: "In fact, as the President stated here not long ago, it is not natural for men to be evil" (Journal of Discourses, vol. 10, p. 50).

Thus we see that while the Book of Mormon plainly teaches that "the natural man is an enemy to God," the Mormon leaders have taught that "The natural man is of God."

As Owen Kendall White, Jr., indicated present-day Mormonism rejects the doctrine that salvation is by grace. The Book of Mormon, however, teaches this doctrine. In 2 Nephi 10:24 we read: ". . . it is only in and through the grace of God that ye are saved." The fact that the Book of Mormon teaches salvation by grace has caused some division in the church, and there are a few Mormon writers who are going back to the teaching of the Book of Mormon on this subject. Owen Kendall White, Jr., gives this information:

In contrast with the Mormon denial of traditional doctrines of grace as reflected in Mormonism's aversion to Pauline theology, Mormon new-orthodoxy grounds much of its theology in Paul and peculiar Mormon scriptures reflecting a similar theological position. Glenn Pearson, while speaking at a "Know Your Religion" series, suggested that he would not quote from Paul to illustrate God's grace in saving man. He was afraid that his Mormon audience might reject a doctrine of grace if it were taken from the Bible, so he first referred to the Book of Mormon and then quoted from Paul. He said:

You know that we very often in the church nowadays think that Paul meant that the grace brought about the resurrection and that everybody would be resurrected by grace, but you notice that Paul said you are saved by grace through faith and you don't have to have faith to have the resurrection and so we know Paul was speaking of another salvation other than the resurrection.

The reader must recognize that Pearson acknowledges the fact that Mormons generally suppose that God's grace refers to the resurrection of man. Typical Mormon theology, when it emphasizes grace, tends to refer to the resurrection, while new-orthodox theology, when it emphasizes grace, usually refers to release from the human predicament. ("The Social Psychological Basis of Mormon New-Orthodoxy," pp. 146-147)

For more information concerning grace and works see our book, A Look at Christianity, pages 8, 17, 18.

When the Mormon leaders proclaim that man is naturally good, they not only reject the teachings of the Bible and the Book of Mormon, but they are simply refusing to face reality about the nature of man. Dr. Carl Jung, who has been called one of the “three great pioneers in modern psychiatry,” made these observations:

Quite apart from the barbarities and blood baths perpetrated by the Christian nations among themselves throughout European history, the European has also to answer for all the crimes he has committed against the dark-skinned peoples during the process of colonization. In this respect the white man carries a very heavy burden indeed. It shows us a picture of the common human shadow that could hardly be painted in blacker colors. The evil that comes to light in man and that undoubtedly dwells within him is of gigantic proportions, so that for the Church to talk of original sin and to trace it back to Adam’s relatively innocent slip-up with Eve is almost a euphemism. The case is far graver and is grossly underestimated.

Since it is universally believed that man is merely what his consciousness knows of itself, he regards himself as harmless and so adds stupidity to iniquity. He does not deny that terrible things have happened and still go on happening, but it is always “the others” who do them. And when such deeds belong to the recent or remote past, they quickly and conveniently sink into the sea of forgetfulness, and that state of chronic woolly-mindedness returns which we describe as “normality.” In shocking contrast to this is the fact that nothing has finally disappeared and nothing has been made good. The evil, the guilt, the profound unease of conscience, the obscure misgiving are there before our eyes, if only we would see. Man has done these things; I am a man, who has his share of human nature; therefore I am guilty with the rest and bear unaltered and indelibly within me the capacity and the inclination to do them again at any time. Even if, juristically speaking, we were not accessories to the crime, we are always, thanks to our human nature, potential criminals. In reality we merely lacked a suitable opportunity to be drawn into the infernal melee. None of us stands outside humanity’s black collective shadow. . . . only the fool can permanently neglect the conditions of his own nature. In fact, this negligence is the best means of making him an instrument of evil. . . . We therefore prefer to localize the evil with individual criminals or groups of criminals, while washing our hands in innocence and ignoring the general proclivity to evil. This sanctimoniousness cannot be kept up, in the long run, because the evil, as experience shows, lies in man . . . one must ask oneself how it is that, for all our progress in the administration of justice, in medicine and in technology, for all our concern for life and health, monstrous engines of destruction have been invented which could easily exterminate the human race. (The Undiscovered Self, by Carl Jung, pp. 107-111)

Karl A. Menninger, one of the world’s leading psychiatrists, made these very revealing observations:

But today, after a long digression, we have in a measure come back to the sinfulness theory. For, in repudiating this theological tenet, modern science had reverted to the philosophy that man is the hapless prey, the potential victim of solely external forces, which is the philosophy of primitive man as well as the helpless child; whereas to conceive of disease as related to sin recognizes the partial responsibility of the individual for his own fate. Instead of referring all danger to the outside world, or to the devil, it acknowledges the presence of danger from within. (Love Against Hate, p. 199)

For more information concerning this matter see our book, A Look at Christianity, pages 3-5.

The reader will remember that Joseph Fielding Smith, the tenth President of the Mormon Church, says that the Mormons are the best people in the world. I do not say that boastfully, for I believe that this truth is evident to all who are willing to observe for themselves. We are morally clean, in every way equal, and in many ways superior to any other people. (Doctrines of Salvation, vol. 1, p. 236)

In a letter dated July 12, 1960, the Mormon Apostle LeGrand Richards made this statement:

There is no people in this world that are evidencing their love of God by doing his will like the Latter-Day Saints are.

Actually, the Mormons are very much like other people. The Mormon writer John J. Stewart stated:

. . . Satan, the father of all lies, . . . is wrecking havoc among us in the sacred matter of marriage and morals, . . . the frequency of adultery, through unwarranted divorce and otherwise, and the number of illegitimate births, among teenagers and older adolescents as well, have reached an appalling figure. (Brigham Young and His Wives, p. 12)

Stanton L. Hovey wrote:

A quick survey was made of marriage and divorce statistics in Vital Statistics of the U.S. for the most recent year available, 1962. Although no definite conclusions can be made on the basis of only one year’s statistics, there were indications that Utah (which is roughly seventy percent L.D.S.) has a bad divorce record, especially for early marriages. (Dialogue: A Journal of Mormon Thought, Autumn 1967, p. 58)

Joseph H. Weston, an apologist for the Mormons, admitted that Mormons were getting their share of the divorces:

At first, loyal Mormons were prone to attribute the unprecedented rise in divorces to the fact that they were being obtained by non-Mormon “transients,” or “temporary residents.” But this was only whistling in the dark. An examination of the court records shows that Mormons are getting their proportionate share of divorces. . . . After his first thrill at being on Temple Square has somewhat subsided, the Mormon convert who comes to Zion often is disappointed. (These Amazing Mormons, p. 18)

A convert to the Mormon Church from Germany told us that he was very disappointed upon his arrival in Utah. When he was in Germany he had a difficult time living a righteous life because of the bad influence of his associates. He decided to come to Utah where he would, as he thought, be with the righteous “saints.” He said, however, that since he arrived in Utah, he has had a harder time living a good life than when he was in Germany.

James L. Clayton admitted:

. . . except for the distinctive personal habits prescribed by the Word of Wisdom (including an implied proscription against narcotics), there is really little quantitative evidence to distinguish Mormon behavior today from that of comparable groups. Distinctions are usually asserted, for example, between Mormons and non-Mormons in the areas of sexual morality, education, crime, patriotism, and sobriety. Statistical data, however, clearly shows that in 1960 Utah’s rate of illegitimate births was higher than the rate of illegitimacy for the white population of Alabama, Mississippi, New Jersey, and Pennsylvania, and was comparable with the rate for the white population of South Carolina, South Dakota, and Kansas. Even in Provo the rate of illegitimacy is not much different than it is in Dubuque, Iowa. . . . Regarding crime, according to the most recent data, Chicago is safer than Salt Lake City (total 1966 crime index 2172 vs. 2349). . . . In short, we are no longer so much a peculiar people as typical Americans with a peculiar history. (Dialogue: A Journal of Mormon Thought, Autumn 1968, p. 71)

In Newsweek Magazine for March 15, 1971, we read the following:

. . . much of the Mormons’ current edginess about things violent stems from a dawning awareness that the City of Saints is in the midst of something of a crime wave. . . . But it is characteristic of the Mormons’ reluctance to recognize the grimmer realities that church officials like [N. Eldon] Tanner blame the upsurge in crime on “drifters and transients.” The Mormon hierarchy was accused of taking a similar stance when a state study estimated that the city contained hundreds of hard-core heroin addicts and a substantial number of teen-agers well into the drug bag. They just shrugged and said, “none of our kids is doing it,” reports Bill Wilson, a community health official. (Newsweek, March 15, 1971, p. 106)

While the Mormon leaders do not like to admit it publicly, a letter from the First Presidency to “Stake Presidents, Bishops, and Branch Presidents,” dated December 23, 1970, shows that even the young missionaries are having problems. In this letter we find the following:

We frequently hear complaints from mission presidents about the apparent failure of many bishops, stake presidents, and branch presidents carefully to interview prospective missionaries. . . . This recurring problem was called to our attention again recently by a letter from a mission president which mentioned the following problems involving missionaries which he had discovered but which did not come to light when the missionaries were interviewed before their missions:

1. One Elder had been on about 100 “trips” with drugs before coming into the mission field.

2. Another Elder had been on marijuana and LSD for two years before his call. According to this Elder, neither his bishop nor stake president asked direct questions about his moral qualifications but only whether he thought he was worthy to go into the mission field.

3. Five other Elders admitted to having committed fornication before their mission calls. Each stated that in the pre-mission interviews, they were not asked if they had committed fornication but only whether or not they were morally clean.

. . . .
It is not sufficient merely to ask a prospective missionary, “Are you morally clean?” Instead, you must ask direct questions to ascertain whether a candidate is guilty of any serious moral offense involving fornication, adultery, homosexuality, masturbation, heavy petting, or drug use. (Letter from the First Presidency, dated December 23, 1970)

Church Not Lost

The Mormon leaders have made the tragic mistake of pointing their people toward a church instead of toward the Savior. They claim that their church is the only true church and that all others are false and have no authority. This tends to make people more concerned about an organization than about their relationship with Christ.

Mormonism teaches that after the death of Christ, the whole Christian world fell into a state of apostasy. In the Bible, however, Jesus said:

And I say also unto thee, That thou art Peter, and upon this rock I will build my church; and the gates of hell shall not prevail against it. (Matthew 16:18)

The Mormon Apostle Orson Pratt did not seem to believe the words of Jesus for he stated:

Jesus . . . established his kingdom on the earth. . . . the kingdoms of this world made war against the kingdom of God, established eighteen centuries ago, and they prevailed against it, and the kingdom ceased to exist. (Journal of Discourses, vol. 13, p. 125)

. . . the former-day kingdom no where exists on the earth, but has been prevailed against and overcome, and nothing is left but man-made churches and governments among all kindreds, tongues, and nations. If this had not been the case—if the kingdom had continued on the earth during the last eighteen centuries, there would have been no necessity for its being set up. (Pamphlets by Orson Pratt, p. 116)

The Apostle Pratt’s words are in direct contradiction to Jesus’ statement that “the gates of hell shall not prevail” against His church. While it is true that there was a great apostasy throughout the Christian world, we do not believe that there was ever a time when there were not true Christians upon the earth. In John 1:12 we read: “But as many as received him, to them gave he power to become the sons of God, even to them that believe on his name.” We believe that in all ages some people have believed in Jesus and have “become the sons of God,” and these people were members of His church. Although at times the numbers may have been small, Jesus promised that “where two or three are gathered together in my name, there am I in the midst of them.” (Matthew 18:20)

Hal Hougey made these interesting observations:

While Acts 20:29-30 and other passages teach that there would be false teachers and apostasy, the Bible does not teach that the true church would be completely lost. Instead, Jesus said the gates of hell would not prevail against his church (Matt. 16:18). . . . Daniel said the kingdom would never be destroyed (Dan. 2:44), and the New Testament says we have received that kingdom which cannot be shaken (Heb. 12:28). Though we might not know the names or addresses of true Christians throughout the ages, this does not mean they did not exist. Elijah thought he was the only faithful one, but there were 7,000 others he did not know about (1 Kings 19:13-18). (Review of Mormon Missionary Handbook, p. 32)

The Mormon idea concerning the need for a restoration is not only out of harmony with the Bible, but it also contradicts the Mormon teaching that three of the Nephites and the Apostle John were to remain on the earth until the return of Christ. Hal Hougey states:

3. Joseph Smith’s angel usurped authority, since Mormon doctrine teaches that men with authority have always been present on the earth.

a. The Apostle John and three Nephite disciples are still tarrying on the earth until Christ returns . . . These all have authority; therefore, the authority has never been lost from the earth, and a restoration through an angel is unnecessary.

b. “As long as there are apostles on the earth, true to their callings, the true church will exist on the face of the earth.” (Letter to the writer by Mormon Apostle Joseph Fielding Smith, April 17, 1956.)

c. LDS would brand as a heretic any person who claimed to have received the priesthood from an angel. They say God does not work that way; that if the authority is on the earth, God will not give it through an angel. If this is so, the angel who gave the priesthood to Joseph Smith and Oliver Cowdery was not from God, since John and the three Nephites are still on the earth!

(Latter-Day Saints—Where Did You Get Your Authority? p. 2)

According to the Book of Mormon the three Nephites and the Apostle John were supposed to continue the Lord’s work until He returned. Speaking to the three Nephites, Jesus was supposed to have said:

. . . ye have desired the thing which John, my beloved, . . . desired of me. . . . ye shall never taste of death; . . . for ye have desired that ye might bring souls of men unto me, while the world shall stand. (Book of Mormon, 3 Nephi 28:6, 7, 9)

If these four men continued to live and bring souls to Christ, as the Mormons maintain, then there was no need for a restoration.

As we have already shown, the Mormons believe that John the Baptist (not to be confused with the Apostle John) restored the Aaronic Priesthood to Joseph Smith and Oliver Cowdery. Joseph Fielding Smith explains:

1. The reason John the Baptist was sent from the heavens to confer the Priesthood of Aaron is that there was no one among mortals with the keys of that authority. Had there been, then there would have been no necessity for a restoration of this authority, and John would not have been sent. (Doctrines of Salvation, vol. 3, p. 88)

Joseph Fielding Smith seems to have overlooked the fact that there were supposed to have been four men holding the authority left on the earth since the time of Christ. From this it would appear that “there would have been no necessity for a restoration.”

Our Own Testimony

Statement by Jerald Tanner. I was born and raised in the Mormon Church, and before I was eight years old I felt that it was the only true church. I remember being told that a certain man who was excommunicated from the church was possessed with the devil. I can remember walking past this man's house and being afraid of him because I firmly believed that he was possessed of the devil. I believed that a person would almost have to be possessed of the devil to leave "the true church." So strong was my conviction that I was greatly shocked to hear a boy in Sunday School say that he didn't know for certain that the church was true. I felt that it was strange indeed for a person to be a member of the Mormon Church and yet not know it was the only true church.

I believed very strongly that Joseph Smith was a prophet of God and that I belonged to the only true church. When I was about eighteen years old I had to face reality. I can remember that the first time I saw David Whitmer's pamphlet, An Address to All Believers in Christ, I threw it down in disgust. After throwing it down, however, I began to think that perhaps this was not the right way to face the problem. If David Whitmer was wrong in his criticism of Joseph Smith, surely I could prove him wrong. So I picked up the pamphlet and read it through. I found that I could not prove David Whitmer wrong, and that the revelations Joseph Smith gave had been changed. I later went to Independence, Missouri, and saw a copy of the original Book of Commandments, which confirmed David Whitmer's statement that the revelations had been changed.

Since that time I have found more and more proof that the church in which I was raised is in error. The most important thing that I found, however, was not that the church was in error, but that I myself was in error. I found that I was a sinner in need of a Savior. The Mormon Church had taught me good morals, but they had not taught me much concerning the power of Christ which could change my life. There was much talk about Joseph Smith, but very little talk about Christ. Consequently, I began to think I had the power within myself to overcome sin. I didn't see how much I needed the help of God to overcome it. So I turned from one sin to another until I was deeply in bondage to sin. I found no help in the Mormon Church; they were too busy preaching about the glory of the church, Joseph Smith, etc. They were too busy singing "praise to the man who communed with Jehovah" and "We thank thee oh God for a prophet" to tell me about the Savior I needed so badly. They were too busy talking about missions, tithing, the welfare plan, etc. to talk about the Savior. Consequently, there was almost nothing in the services that could give life and peace to my dying soul. Perhaps I should mention, however, that there was one thing that really touched my heart, and that was when we sang the following song:

OH, IT IS WONDERFUL!

I stand all amazed at the love Jesus offers me,
Confused at the grace that so fully he proffers me,
I tremble to know that for me He was crucified—
That for me, a sinner, He suffered, He bled, and died.

Chorus—

Oh, it is wonderful that He should care for me,
Enough to die for me!
Oh, it is wonderful, wonderful to me!

I marvel that He would descend from His throne divine,
To rescue a soul so rebellious and proud as mine;
That He should extend His great love unto such as I;
Sufficient to own, to redeem, and to justify.

When we sang this song my heart burned within me. I have since learned, however, that even this song was borrowed from the Protestant faith. But regardless of where it came from, it touched me very deeply. It made me think of my Savior and the great debt I owed to him. If there had been more songs like this in the Mormon Church and if Christ had been preached instead of Joseph Smith I would, perhaps, have received Christ into my life in the Mormon Church. As it was, however, I was nineteen years old before I heard the true message of Christ preached, and that was in another church. A short time later I received Christ into my life and found peace, joy and deliverance from sin. Or as the Apostle Paul expressed it:

Therefore if any man be in Christ, he is a new creature; old things are passed away; behold, all things are become new. (2 Corinthians 5:17)

Jerald Tanner

Statement by Sandra Tanner. Since I was born and raised in the Mormon Church, and am a great-great-grandchild of Brigham Young, I had very strong ties to the Mormon faith. I was about 17 before I ever attended another church. As a teenager my life centered around the Mormon Church. Because I was active and paying my tithing I thought I was in pretty good standing with God. I knew I sinned but I felt my activity in church would somehow outweigh what I did wrong. I believed (as the Mormons teach) that I was inherently good. I had no fear of God's judgment. Besides the things that were wrong in my own life, I began to have doubts about my church. Could it really be the only true church? Was polygamy really right? Why couldn't the Negro hold the priesthood? Was temple marriage really so important? Why were its rites kept such a secret? Did God actually command Mormons to wear special undergarments? I had many questions going through my mind.

When I started college I enrolled in the Mormon Institute of Religion class. I started asking questions in class, trying to find answers to my doubts. But one day my Institute teacher took me aside and told me to please stop asking questions in class. There was a girl attending the class who was thinking of joining the church and I was disturbing her with my questions. What a surprise! I had hoped to find answers to the many things that were bothering me and now I had been silenced.

Shortly after this I met Jerald and we began studying the Bible and Mormonism together. As we studied I began to see the contradictions between the Bible and the teachings of the Mormon Church.

I had grown up thinking that Brigham Young was one of the greatest men that ever lived. He was always presented to me as such a holy man—God's Prophet, Seer, and Revelator. Then Jerald had me read some of Brigham Young's sermons in the Journal of Discourses on Blood Atonement. I was shocked! I knew what Brigham Young was saying was wrong but I couldn't reconcile these sermons with the things I had always been taught concerning him. I knew these were not the words of a Prophet of God.

Jerald also showed me the changes that had been made in Joseph Smith's revelations. The thought kept coming to me that if God had actually given those revelations to Joseph Smith why would they need rewriting? Surely the Creator of the universe could say it right the first time!

As I studied I not only found errors in Mormonism, I also began to comprehend there was something wrong in my own life. As I studied God's word I realized I was a sinful hypocrite. In spite of my sins I had thought I was right with God. Yet the Bible says:

For the wages of sin is death; but the gift of God is eternal life, through Jesus Christ our Lord. (Romans 6:23)

After Jerald and I were married we started visiting the different Protestant churches. As I listened to the sermons I began to realize that God was not concerned with peoples' church affiliations, but with a personal relationship. Christ taught a way of love, not a religious system. He stated: "By this shall all men know that ye are my disciples, if ye have love one to another" (John 13:35). Paul taught that we should "walk in love, as Christ also hath loved us, and hath given himself for us . . ." (Ephesians 5:2).

God reaches out to man, not because he deserves it, but because God loves him. John wrote: "Herein is love, not that we loved God, but that he loved us, and sent his Son to be the propitiation for our sins" (1 John 4:10). Paul wrote: "But God, who is rich in mercy, . . . even when we were dead in sins, hath quickened us together with Christ, . . . For by grace are ye saved through faith; and that not of yourselves: it is the gift of God: not of works, lest any man should boast" (Ephesians 2:4, 5, 8, 9).

I now want to share with you the particular events of the day I surrendered my heart and life to Jesus Christ:

Early one morning (October 24, 1959) I decided to listen to the radio for a while. I turned to the Christian radio station and listened to a sermon. The minister was preaching on the great love of God and the mercy offered to us through Jesus Christ. Nothing ever struck me with such force. I opened my heart to God and accepted Christ as my own personal Savior. The Holy Spirit flooded my soul with such joy that I wept for over an hour. After the sermon the station played this song—

I love the Christ who died on Calv'ry,
For He washed my sins away;
He put within my heart a melody,
And I know it's there to stay.
In my heart there rings a melody,
There rings a melody with heaven's harmony;
In my heart there rings a melody,
There rings a melody of love.

This song fully describes the way I felt. How glorious to know Christ died for my sins so I could have a new life in Him.

Our lives testify to all we meet whether or not we are truly Christians. Paul wrote:

But the fruit of the Spirit is love, joy, peace, long-suffering, gentleness, goodness, faith, meekness, temperance: against such there is no law. (Galatians 5:22-23)

Mormonism A Shadow

Hal Hougey stated: “The LDS use the Bible to try to prove the Book of Mormon; then they leave the Bible behind, and urge the prospect to read the Book of Mormon. Does not the Bible tell anything about Christ’s mission?” (Review of Mormon Missionary Handbook, p. 66).

The Mormon Church is certainly not built upon the teachings of the Bible. The Mormon Apostle LeGrand Richards has said that “the everlasting gospel could not be discovered through reading the Bible alone...this is the only Christian church in the world that did not have to rely upon the Bible for its organization and government;” (A Marvelous Work And A Wonder, 1979, p. 40).

Mormonism is not even based upon the Book of Mormon. The Mormon writer John Henry Evans made these statements:

There are two points here that deserve consideration.

The first is the bishop’s queer blunder that the whole body of the “Mormon” belief is build upon the Book of Mormon. . . . As a matter of fact, the Book of Mormon bears no more basic a relation to the work known as “Mormonism” than the other visions and revelations given in this dispensation. . . . If the Nephite record had not been revealed at all, in this dispensation, it is doubtful whether the body of “Mormon” belief would in any essential particular be different from what it is. I do not say this in disparagement of the Book of Mormon, nor in a spirit of criticism of the way in which our dispensation was ushered in, . . . but I call attention to the fact as showing how little the whole body of belief of the Latter-day Saints really depends on the revelation of the Nephite record. . . . it is far from being the structural foundation of our body of belief that the bishop’s words require. (Improvement Era, vol. 16, pp. 344-345)

The Mormon writer Robert J. Matthews made this interesting observation:

What did the faithful convert of the Church in 1830-1831 accept as essential “Mormonism”? Was he instructed concerning marriage for time and eternity? Of the three degrees of glory in the resurrection? Was he taught concerning the temple endowment, of baptism for the dead, of patriarchal blessings, or of the word of wisdom? Was he instructed in detail concerning the various offices and quorums in the priesthood from the deacons up through the teachers, priests, elders, seventies, and high priests? Was he taught concerning the quorums of the Presiding Bishopric, the First Council of Seventy, the Patriarch to the Church, the Council of the Twelve, and the First Presidency? To each of these questions the answer must be “No” for the simple reason that these matters had not yet been revealed in this dispensation and were known, if at all, only by the scant mention of some of them in the Bible and the Book of Mormon. (Brigham Young University Studies, Summer 1971, p. 401)

Today converts are swarming into the Mormon Church, but very few of them really know much about Mormonism. We feel safe in saying that many of them are converted to the social program of the church rather than to its doctrines. Those who were born in the church in many cases “know” it is true but don’t know why it is true. Joseph H. Weston stated:

A great weakness of the church lies in the fact that so many who have been born and brought up within it are in high positions. These, too, often, are unable to grasp the significant differences between the Mormon church and the many sects and denominations of faith. Not having personally experienced membership in these other groups, they have no deep-seated emotional basis for contrast or comparison. They know that their church is better because they have been taught so from infancy—not because they themselves have compared it and come to that conclusion under their own power. (These Amazing Mormons, p. 26)

Many Mormons will stand up and dogmatically assert that Joseph Smith was a Prophet and that they belong to “the only true church,” but very few of them check to make sure that their faith is based on reality. The Bible warns:

For the time will come when they will not endure sound doctrine; but after their own lusts shall they heap to themselves teachers, having itching ears;

And they shall turn away their ears from the truth, and shall be turned unto fables. (2 Timothy 4:3-4)

Many members of the Mormon Church prefer to let their leaders do their thinking (“When our leaders speak, the thinking has been done.”); it is so easy to let someone else do our thinking. It is reported that one woman said that she didn’t need to fear the church leaders taking her astray. If they did, she said, all of the blame would come upon them and not her. How false can anything be? As the Bible says:

Thus saith the Lord; Cursed be the man that trusteth in man, and maketh flesh his arm, and whose heart departeth from the Lord. (Jeremiah 17:5)

We sincerely hope and pray that the Mormon people will begin to awaken to the true message of Christ, realizing that in him, and him alone, can we have salvation.

Questions About Our Work

Since many people have asked us concerning our work we have decided to include some answers to questions that we are frequently asked.

1. How did you begin this work? Although we both grew up as members of the Mormon Church, we found the teachings of the church to be so inconsistent that we decided we must leave it.

Our work really began in 1960 when we purchased a small hand-operated mimeograph machine with the hope that we could enlighten our Mormon friends who were still in the church. We distributed small mimeographed pamphlets free of charge, and had no intention of making this a full-time occupation.

In the fall of 1960 we had an interview with the Mormon Apostle LeGrand Richards which we will never forget. When Mr. Richards learned of our intention to examine the Mormon faith, he emphatically stated:

I'm warning you! Don't start anything against this church!

After this interview we were convinced that the Mormon leaders dreaded the thought of an investigation being made of their church. When LeGrand Richards found that we were going to use his great grandfather's journal in our investigation he wrote us a letter in which he threatened to sue us (see photograph of this letter on page 12 of this book).

We decided to write a book concerning the Mormon Church. We purchased a larger, power-operated, mimeograph machine and ran our first edition of Mormonism on it.

Although we had access to many rare documents and books concerning the Mormon Church, we felt that there must be a way of getting access to other documents which were suppressed or hidden from the general public.

We found an answer to this problem by the use of microfilm. Microfilm looks very much like the film used in motion picture cameras. One of the advantages of using microfilm is that an entire page of printed matter can be reduced down to about the size of a postage stamp. Thus a great deal of material can be filmed on a small roll of film, and with a microfilm viewer the image can be enlarged to its original size. By the use of microfilm we have been able to read many rare documents which we probably would not have had access to otherwise. For instance, we have read microfilms of rare documents from the Mormon Church Historians Office, the Huntington Library, the Yale University Library, the New York Public Library, and from other institutions. By the use of microfilm we were able to read the newspapers which were published in Palmyra, New York, in the early 1800's.

Since the use of microfilm appeared to be the answer to making the documents more readily available, we decided to buy a microfilm camera of our own. The price was $1,200.00 for a used camera, and we did not have the money to make the down payment. Fortunately, a friend liked the idea so well that he decided to lend us the money to make the down payment.

Later on we were informed of a process by which metal plates or masters could be made from a microfilm. From these plates or masters thousands of copies of a document could be reproduced by offset-printing. We looked at an offset-printing press, but the price was almost $2,000.00. We had no money for a down payment but decided that if our income tax refund came in the mail the next day we would buy the machine. The next day the refund arrived in the mail and we were in business. Within three years we were able to photographically reprint almost fifty different books relating to the subject of Mormonism. Many of these books had not been in print for over 100 years. Joseph Smith's Egyptian Alphabet and Grammar and his strange account of the First Vision had never been published before.

The fact that we were making these early documents available caused a great deal of concern to the leaders of the Mormon Church. Ralph W. Hansen, formerly the Manuscript Librarian at the BYU, made this comment:

Microfilm, Xerox and other forms of photo-duplication have made possible inexpensive reproductions of out-of-print or rare books and newspapers. As far as the L.D.S. Church is concerned, such photo-publications are a mixed blessing. Jerald Tanner of Modern Microfilms (Salt Lake City, Utah) has used photo-publications to reproduce early Church and anti-Church works in wholesale lots. Mr. Tanner's object is to embarrass the Church to which he at one time gave allegiance. His reproductions are often as weak as his motives for doing them. (Dialogue: A Journal of Mormon Thought, Spring 1966, p. 154)

Although the Mormon leaders opposed the publication of these documents, teachers at the BYU, LDS Institutes of Religion and Mormon Seminaries were more than happy to get the material. One teacher in the Department of Religion at the BYU bought 21 copies of one of the books which we reproduced. We understand that he was reprimanded for distributing our books, but his reply was "where else can I get this material?"

Within the last few years we have had a large number of students come to us desiring material who claim that our work was recommended by a Seminary teacher, an Institute instructor, or a teacher at the BYU.

2. Is your work effective in reaching Mormons? We feel that the work has been very effective and we believe it will be even more effective as time goes on. Below are extracts from a few of the many letters we have received:

It may be some satisfaction to you that you have in me another success. I was born and raised in the Mormon church...your publications have helped me greatly and I have accordingly made the decision to abandon my church and my faculty appointment at B.Y.U. (Letter dated May 5, 1968)

I must add I owe you two the thanks for seeing the error in the Mormon religion.

What a difference to really know God & know he hears me. (Letter sent December 1971)

I have never read such a complete study on Mormonism.

My eyes have been opened & I feel it my duty to open others.
(Letter dated December 14, 1966)

Have enjoyed tremendously your many books you have published.

Thanks to you people and through our own studies my husband and I are no longer mormons. We thought you might be interested in knowing how good of Missionaries you are. (Letter dated October 13, 1966)

I should take this chance to thank you for the personal note you wrote me in 1967 when I was in the LDS investigation program and was about to be railroaded in. Now I am enrolled at a Methodist seminary and will become a minister in Oregon after 3 years of study. (Letter dated October 23, 1969)

The Mormon writer Stanley B. Kimball dismisses our work as being of no real importance:

... Jerald and Sandra Tanner's Archaeology and the Book of Mormon (1969), should be mentioned. As with all the rest of this company's fascinating publications, it is a joy to read the esoterica they come up with and a sorrow to note their wrong-headedness and unwarranted conclusions. The work of the Tanners—two clever and industrious but negative and untrained people—however, poses small threat to the Church. This new book's section on the Anthon Transcript, pages 12-22, a compendium of interesting but out-of-context snippets compiled for the purpose of discrediting the Church, is quite unconvincing. (Newsletter and Proceedings of the Society for Early Historic Archaeology, BYU, August 1971, p. 5)

Reed Durham, Director of the LDS Institute of Religion at the University of Utah, has an entirely different opinion concerning this matter. In a speech given March 7, 1972, he admitted that our work does pose a threat to the church. While Dr. Durham still claims that he has a testimony to the Mormon Church, he made these very startling statements in his speech:

There has been a lot written about the Tanners. And anyone here who perhaps has not heard of the Tanners perhaps hasn't done enough reading to be aware of what's going on in Mormon history, because the Tanners represent the most prolific production of anti-Mormon literature on the whole history of this Church. They are the most prolific producers of Mormon literature, anti-Mormon literature, we've ever had in the history of this Church. And their company, called the Modern Microfilm Company, is here in Salt Lake City, which makes it all very close to home. And they've done perhaps the greatest pieces of research for and putting together sources and research that's been done by other people than anybody that I know of in all of Church history. So they've become very important in understanding our Church history. . . .

Their first big work, the one that they felt was their first great tome was this one, Mormonism—Shadow or Reality? That was their first big work. This seemed to incorporate all that they had done, all these publications, for these years since '59 to '64. They incorporated it all in one great anti-Mormon piece of literature. . . .

Presently Sandra and Jerald informed me that they are working on their big tome, the summum bonum of everything they have done to date. That's right up to 1972; they're going to wrap it together in a huge volume. . . . they may even . . . call it Mormonism—Shadow or Reality? The same title as their first important work . . . they really believe . . . that the Mormon people have not had a chance to make a real intelligent decision as to where the truth is because the facts have never been given to them. . . . they feel that the Mormons have been blinded by tradition to such a point that its hard for them ever to be released. The freedom must come when Jesus emerges. . . . Mormonism, the institution of Mormonism, chokes, they believe, what is the true Christianity. . . . they feel that they have been God-prompted in what their doing. . . . they bear testimony that they feel

God has been with them in their work. . . . they feel that very keenly, . . . They believe that any Latter Day Saint should keep all the great Christian ethical moral principles which were taught in Mormonism, keep those and then leave all the rest alone, and come to Christ. . . . that's their purpose, to liberate, to free. Now, how can they do that? To go to the Mormon sources and let you see what the Church was like from start to finish, and oftentimes that will be a comparison—what it was like then and what it is like now. And there's a lot of interesting things that occur when you show the contrast. . . . things that were going on in Joseph's day as versus the things and teachings that go on today. One of the best ways to let you Mormons know what really was taught or/and practiced and believed in the early Church is to reprint documents of your own faith—that is, go to the primary sources and reproduce them for the Mormons, because by in large Mormons don't operate on primary sources. They operate on secondary sources, secondary, secondary, secondary sources. Indeed, if you were to pick up a manual of a Sunday School class in Church history you wouldn't know what a primary source was, it is so secondary. And so one of the main things they've done is to reproduce primary sources—primary documents. They aren't anti-Mormon stuff, they're our stuff.

Now, a poor teacher, like I am, teaching for the Church does not have the money to buy primary sources . . . You know, the originals of these documents that are my heritage . . . so comes along the Modern Microfilm Company, who reproduces, not retypes (they have a process . . . where you photo a page in a book and it makes a plate, and they just run the plate off), so you have the exact source. It's a photomechanically reproduced original. So I have to spend my money to buy these originals, because I want my primary sources. But it's true, if I study my primary sources I'm in another world when I compare with my Church today. Some of you may disagree, but I can take the time and show you that in so many regards we're in another world today. We do not live in the church of Brigham Young today or any one of the Presidents. We live only in the church today with Joseph Fielding Smith, and it's different today than it was with David O. McKay. And it will be like that all the time. It's just totally different. And so if you're going to make comparisons, of course you could shake some people up.

Now, let me show you . . . here are the Millennial Stars, . . . the great piece of literature in England. They have the first seven volumes reproduced. I can't go buy an original Millennial Star. . . . So I pay the Tanners for the Millennial Star, because I want to study the original Millennial Stars. It's part of my heritage . . . there's the first Pearl of Great Price. . . . I buy it from the Tanners 'cause I can't pay for an original edition of the Pearl of Great Price. This is my first Pearl of Great Price, in my Church. I want the first one. I want to study it. I want to compare it with my present Pearl of Great Price . . . all kinds of changes, but I want to understand the changes. I want to know what they are. So do they want me to know what they are! . . . the first time I could get an Evening and Morning Star was from Jerald and Sandra, a photomechanically reproduced Evening and Morning Star. That's my first newspaper; that's my first Church Section; that's my first Improvement Era . . . and by darn, I'm going to get it if I'm a student of Mormonism, and if they're the only ones producing it I'm going to buy it from them. Shame! Shame on me! The Confessions of John D. Lee, . . . I never had one, . . . now I do, photomechanically reproduced. I don't have to worry about any hanky-panky in the reproduction . . .

Lucy Mack's history of the Church...which was condemned by Brigham Young and revamped by Brigham Young, reproduced in 1901, reproduced in 1921, with changes . . . and deletions all the way down through time. I want to see what the original looked like. I'd like to see the stuff we took out, just for the kicks, just for my interest and for my information. The first edition of Lucy Mack's history was reproduced verbatim by the Tanners. . . . The Temple Lot Case, that whole case from the documents of the court and all the testimony that was there have all been reproduced for me . . . Here's the Messenger and Advocate. That was my second newspaper, or official journal in the Church . . . and the Elders' Journal. All of these primary sources of my church . . . have been reproduced by them for me to read. The idea is that if I read the primary sources and see all the differences with today, I'm supposed to lose my testimony . . .

Now, in order to get their licks in even stronger than simply letting you read for yourself, they will pull out of these primary sources quotes on all the going problems. So you have books on the Negroes, . . . The Negro in Mormon Theology, Joseph Smith's Curse Upon the Negro, Joseph Smith and Polygamy (a great big one, that's a good one, my, that's really a good one), Falsification of Joseph Smith's History, Joseph Smith's 1826 Trial, Joseph Smith and Money Digging (that's one of their latest), The Bible and Mormon Doctrine, and then—this is one they like, they like to show you the changes . . . so they'll take the Key to Theology as we used to print it and show you how we print it now, and we have really doctored the Key to Theology. They like to show you that. That's supposed to really shake you up. We've doctored some other man's book after he's all dead and gone. . . . Changes in Joseph Smith's History, Changes in the Pearl of Great Price, . . . they photo the Pearl of Great Price and mark all the changes out in the margin for you to look at . . . 3,913 Changes in the Book of Mormon, this is an original 1830 photomechanically reproduced Book of Mormon, an 1830 Book of Mormon, and then in the margins they've pointed out all the changes that were there. Well, on and on they go. . . .

Lehi said "there must needs be opposition in all things." I can't help but think that what they're doing, though it has done damage—I've had people in my office who've been just totally devastated with things they raised. A Mormon who had never heard of Blood Atonement. And so now comes Blood Atonement crashing through the pages of primary sources, from the words of our own General Authorities, our own Presidents of the Church and it's devastating to lots of Mormons. Some Mormons don't even believe Joseph Smith was a polygamist. We have come so far from those days to the present time. And then all of the evidence about polygamy and all of the issues, and then to get crushed with actually seeing the changes in Joseph Smith's History or in the Book of Mormon or the Pearl of Great Price. I tell you, though you may not believe it, I have seen people get utterly crushed, almost devastated, with some of the material that the Tanners have reproduced. They have made their mark in many of our people. I wouldn't be in a group like this, but I could name to you professors . . . and some of their wives who read this and eat it up and have lost totally their testimony on this kind of thing. I will tell you, there was an Institute teacher here, not long ago, . . . who lost his testimony and went out of the Church on the basis of this stuff. Oh, this stuff is dynamite!

I can't help but think that when they raise these issues it does something to us to have to defend. . . . When I see something that counters what I've been taught or what I know or what I understand or what I feel, the way to counter research...unpleasant to me is not by sticking my head in the sand like an ostrich, but by more research. I may have to revamp, and knowledge sometimes is a dangerous thing. But I will revamp, and I will understand better my heritage. And in a sense, what I'm trying to say is that they have become, in a sense, catalysts to sharpen our own historical understanding. We've had to get on the stick and do some study, and do some homework that sometimes we haven't done. If we don't do the homework that will kill us. "Leave it alone, don't touch it," see that's a kind of philosophy. . . . All right, you leave it alone, but in this world of knowledge and mass communications lots of other people are going to read it, and you'll be exposed to it somewhere. I think if you're going to be exposed to it, where's the best place to be exposed to it? Over there, next door, some meeting, some well meaning friend, or maybe right here to be exposed to it. Bring the issues up here. Weigh them carefully. Do research. Have it in a framework of testimony and faith. That's where I think we should be exposed to it. (Speech by Reed Durham, Director, Salt Lake Institute of Religion, March 7, 1972)

After we published the first edition of our book, Mormonism—Shadow or Reality? a prominent Mormon scholar told us he was thinking of writing a rebuttal to our work. We did not hear from him again until 1966. At that time he confessed that he had given up the idea of a rebuttal. When he was pressed for the reason, he admitted that the truth concerning the church was even worse than what we had presented in our book. He stated that the problems we had found with the church and its history were minor compared with the problems he had found in his research. This man has now been excommunicated from the church.

Speaking of our work, Wallace Turner wrote: "The campaign is effective, too, and of this there is no doubt" (The Mormon Establishment, p. 162).

3. Is there any opposition to your work? The Mormon Apostle Orson Pratt once said:

. . . convince us of our errors of doctrine, if we have any, by reason, by logical arguments, or by the word of God, and we will be ever grateful for the information, and you will ever have the pleasing reflection that you have been instruments in the hands of God of redeeming your fellow beings from the darkness which you may see enveloping their minds. (The Seer, pp. 15-16)

While there have been a number of Mormons who have been "grateful" for the evidence we have presented, the great majority are opposed to our work. We have meet with opposition from Mormons, those who belong to apostate Mormon groups, and even from those who profess to be non-Mormons. We have received many letters criticizing our work. For instance, on March 12, 1970, we received this letter:

Both you and your wife are nothing but trash, trying to pollute the minds of other people, just as yours are polluted. You make me sick to my stomach with your feeble-mindedness and filthy lies.

After reading some of your publications and doing some research of my own I find you utterly repulsive, but I'm sure you've been told this by everyone you've met.

You're nothing but degenerates looking for cheap thrills at someone else's expense. (Letter dated March 12, 1970)

On one occasion we received a letter from a person who professed to be a non-Mormon. The envelope was filled with ashes. Two pieces of paper were also enclosed. On the one sheet the following was scribbled:

Look closely at the burned paper. It's the trash you sent us, so I burned it for you. This should & probably [will] happen to your company.

The other sheet contained a short letter in which the following statements appeared:

Dear Sir (or whatever you are)

Please stop sending your crummy bunch of make shift lies to our home. . . . Anybody should have the right to sue you and a lot more than that should be done. . . .

P.S. You're a bunch of hostile liars. May the devil take ya!

When we first began our work we were afraid that we would not be allowed to continue. As we indicated earlier, the Mormon Apostle LeGrand Richards threatened us as follows: "I'm warning you! Don't start anything against this church!" Since that time people have asked us such questions as: "Do you have a gun to protect yourself?" or "Do you have fire insurance on your equipment?" One man stated: "I would like to see you succeed, but I know they will burn you out."

Fortunately, the Mormon leaders have not tried to destroy our press (as they did the Nauvoo Expositor), nor have they sent the Danites in the night (as Brigham Young used to do). Except for the threats to sue us, and a man who threatened to punch Sandra “in the nose,” things have been rather peaceful. The church has not used violence against us, as many people thought they would, but instead they have used silence as their chief weapon against us. But why silence? It is our sincere belief that the church leaders have no satisfactory answers to the charges of fraud and deceit that we have brought against them, and therefore they have used the “silent treatment” on us. This treatment seemed to work fairly well for the first few years, however, it has become less and less effective as time goes on.

4. What is the purpose of your work and what do you hope to accomplish? While we oppose the errors of Mormonism, we feel that our work is actually a work on behalf of the Mormon people. We feel that we owe our Mormon brothers the truth that God has revealed to us. We have always had a great deal of faith in our cause, and we believe that the truth will eventually prevail. H. A. Ironside once wrote:

Objection is often raised, even by some sound in the Faith, regarding the exposure of error as being entirely negative and of no real edification. . . . But the brethren who assume this attitude forget that a large part of the New Testament, both of the teaching of our blessed Lord Himself and the writings of the apostles, is made up of this very character of ministry . . .

Our Lord prophesied, “Many false prophets shall rise, and shall deceive many.” Within our own day, how many false prophets have risen; and oh, how many are the deceived! . . . It is as important in these days as in Paul’s—in fact, it is increasingly important—to expose the many types of false teaching that, on every hand, abound more and more.

We are called upon to “contend earnestly for the Faith once for all delivered to the Saints,” while we hold the truth in love. . . .

This does not imply harsh treatment of those entrapped by error—quite the opposite. If it be objected that exposure of error necessitates unkind reflection upon others who do not see as we do, our answer is, it has always been the duty of every loyal servant of Christ to warn against any teaching that would make Him less precious, or cast reflection upon His finished redemptive work and the all-sufficiency of His present service as our great High Priest and Advocate. . . .

Error is like leaven, of which we read, “A little leaven leaveneth the whole lump.” Truth mixed with error is equivalent to all error, except that it is more innocent looking, and therefore more dangerous. God hates such a mixture! Any error, or any truth-and-error mixture, calls for definite exposure and repudiation. To condone such is to be unfaithful to God and His Word, and treacherous to imperiled souls for whom Christ died.

Exposing error is most unpopular work. But from every true standpoint, it is worth-while work. . . . And to souls “caught in the snare of the fowler”—how many of them God only knows—it may mean light and life, abundant and everlasting. (A tract published by Religion Analysis Service Inc., Minneapolis, Minn.)

In Dialogue: A Journal of Mormon Thought, Autumn 1968, James L. Farmer criticized “apostate-Mormon and non-Mormon critics of the Church” for devoting so much time and energy to their cause. In reply Duane Stanfield wrote a letter in which he stated:

James Farmer . . . wonders why so many apostate-Mormons spend so much time “lamenting and exposing,” and why they feel such activity is of any importance. Maybe I can help explain it a little, as I have just entered that category, and so am still “fresh” on my feelings.

I would say it’s because the apostates feel the truth is important; in fact nothing really matters in life but the truth. They felt they had found the truth, and they gave it their heart, might, mind and strength; and then found themselves to be, as they felt, in error. And when you have been deceived on such a scale, you want others to know about it, just as one so dedicated and committed wants others to know about the Gospel. . . .

When I see the large amount of New Testament material in the Book of Mormon; when I see the outrageous tampering that has been done with the so-called revelations since their first printing; . . . when I see the varied and conflicting accounts of the first vision and the three witnesses; . . . when I see the biographical glimpses of Joseph Smith through other than “approved” eyes (and such things as his giving a translation of the Kinderhook plates that were later found to be a hoax; which brings up the current Book of Abraham imbroglio); when I see all this and more, I begin to wonder at the integrity and legitimacy of the church, . . .

You condemn the critics. Yet honest searchers for truth owe a large vote of thanks to such as the Tanners for the work they have done to help men see behind the books that the church gives them to read in for their answers. The Church owes them a vote of thanks, too, and should acknowledge it at the time of reckoning. For such endeavor has not been so much destructive as constructive . . . if you’re going to go out and set up the New Jerusalem and expect the righteous to rally to your flag, you’ve got to know exactly whereof you speak, and how solid the ground is you’re standing on. Check your premises, is all I for one am asking. And, after doing so, set your own house in order, before you start on the world’s. (Dialogue: A Journal of Mormon Thought, Winter 1968, pp. 10-11)

While we would like to see the entire church turn away from the errors and false doctrines Joseph Smith established, we realize that this would be almost impossible. It is realistic, however, to believe that many members of the Mormon Church will turn from this man-made system and find peace and joy in Jesus Christ. We agree with Hal Hougey when he stated:

There is much that is good in Mormonism, and this review of the errors in Mormon doctrine should not be construed to be a rejection of whatever is true or good in Mormonism. How much better, though, to get the true and good from the Bible where it is not adulterated with the erroneous teachings of the false prophet Joseph Smith!

The writer also has no feelings of animosity toward LDS people. They are a good people, and there is much in them to admire, not the least of which is their zeal to share their faith with others. It is the conviction of the writer that their zeal is worthy of a better cause, . . . (Mormon Missionary Handbook—With Refutation, by Hal Hougey, 1969, p. 4)

Since the Mormon leaders send thousands of missionaries throughout the world telling other people that their church is false, it is only fair that they submit to some examination of their history and doctrine.

5. Is it true that you were excommunicated from the LDS Church?

Lauritz G. Petersen, of the LDS Church Historian’s Office, made this statement in a letter: “Jerald Tanner was excommunicated from the church some time ago. How can the light shine when the switch has been turned off?”

Although it is true that we were excommunicated from the Mormon Church, we feel that the reader should understand that it is impossible to withdraw from membership in the Mormon Church without excommunication, and that we were excommunicated at our own requests. Actually, it is very difficult for a person to have his name removed from the membership rolls of the Mormon Church. The situation is almost like a worker telling his boss that he intends to quit, and having his boss reply, “You can’t quit unless we fire you.”

Wallace Turner stated:

Only by excommunication can a person leave the church. This may be had for the asking, but few ask, even when disenchanting with their religion.

Two who did request it are Jerald Tanner and his wife, Sandra who run a small printing operation here that distributes such things as anti-Mormon books that have been out of print and pamphlets attacking the validity of the “Book of Mormon” as a divinely revealed work. (The New York Times, December 27, 1965, p. 18)

It may be of interest to the reader to know something concerning our “trials”; therefore, we will both make a brief statement concerning them:

Statement by Jerald Tanner: When I was about nineteen years of age I requested that my name be withdrawn from the LDS Church membership records. A member of the Stake Presidency promised me that he would see that this was taken care of. Two years later, however, I found that no action had been taken. At this time I wrote to the President of the LDS Church, and on August 9, 1960, I received a “summons” from my Bishop. The reader will find a photograph of this on page 575 of this book.

Notice that the “summons” states that I was the one who requested my name withdrawn from the records, and that I was to bring witnesses. On August 14, 1960, I appeared before the “Bishop’s Court” with my “witnesses.” My “witnesses” were told, however, that they could not come into the room where the excommunication was to take place because I had voluntarily requested my name removed. Unless I wished to contest the removal of my name the witnesses were not needed and would not be allowed into the room. So I walked into the room alone, and they shut the door. They asked me if I would mind if they made a tape recording of the proceedings. I permitted them to make the recording but asked if I could also make a recording. The answer was no. They asked me if I wanted to plead guilty to the “alleged wrong doing” of requesting my name to be removed from the church records and teaching doctrines not in harmony with the church. I replied that I did not believe my actions were “wrong” in these regards, and therefore could not plead guilty, but that I wanted my name removed without the use of the expression “wrong doing.” This caused a great deal of confusion among the members of the “Bishop’s Court,” and they did not know how to proceed. After conversing among themselves they decided to proceed without the admission of “wrong doing” on my part. On August 28, 1960, the Bishopric sent me a letter concerning the decision of the court. The reader will find a photograph of it on page 575 of this book.

Statement by Sandra Tanner: In June of 1960 I wrote a letter to my Bishop requesting him to remove my name from the membership of the Mormon Church since I no longer believed Joseph Smith to be a prophet or the unique doctrines of the Mormon Church. Shortly after this two Mormon Elders delivered a letter to me stating the date that the Bishop’s Court would meet to consider my excommunication (see letter on page 575).

On July 7, 1960 I went to the Ward. The Bishop, his two counselors, and the Ward Clerk were there. The Ward Clerk took notes of the proceedings. The Bishop proceeded to establish my “guilt” by presenting evidence that I was in a state of apostasy. After this had been established he then stated that from that moment on I was no longer a member of the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-Day Saints, and as such I forfeited my right to the blessings of the church and the church would no longer accept my tithing. He then stated I was forfeiting my right to the Kingdom of God. I asked him for a definition of the term “Kingdom of God”; did he mean the Celestial Kingdom, the Terrestrial Kingdom, the Testial Kingdom, or all three kingdoms. (The Mormons believe heaven is divided into three kingdoms.) At this he became disturbed and said we weren’t there to argue. I stated that I felt I had a right to know specifically what he believed I was giving up. He then stated I was forfeiting my right to the Celestial Kingdom.

The Bishop was visibly shaken by the proceeding. He was almost tearful. I was the first person he had excommunicated and he obviously believed he was literally sentencing me to spend eternity outside the presence of God. I tried to comfort him by telling him I felt no sorrow about being excommunicated and I was fully ready to face God as an ex-Mormon since I was trusting in Christ, not church membership, to save me. I thanked the men for removing my name from the church records and left.

While it is true that we were excommunicated, the reader will notice from the photographs that we requested the action. We feel, therefore, that when Mormons mention our excommunication they should also explain that it was at our request. All sorts of false rumors have been circulated concerning our excommunication. We have been accused of adultery, polygamy, etc. For instance, in a letter dated May 18, 1971, we find the following:

I recently appeared on a Symposium with a Mormon professor . . . He spoke on the subject, “Why I Am A Mormon”. . . . After the two speeches, the Mormon professor . . . said . . . there is a couple in Salt Lake City who were disfellowshipped from the church because they wanted to continue to preach and practice polygamy. He said their names were Jerry and Sandra Tanner, and that they have been doing a lot of printing of untruths to try to get even. He also stated that the Tanners had started a new church. I had never run into that charge before, so thought I would ask you to please tell me what really happened, so if I run into that again, I will be able to intelligently answer the charges.

The reader can plainly see from the photographs on page 575 that there is absolutely no truth to these charges.

We have never regretted for a moment that we left the Mormon Church. In fact, we have had a real peace concerning this matter and would do it again if necessary.

6. How do you feel about the Mormon people? We have a feeling of love toward the Mormons, and pray only for their good. While we fight a system which we feel enslaves the minds of many people, we have no animosity toward any member of the Mormon Church. We are not in sympathy with those who hate the Mormon people and spread lies about them. We do not feel that it is right to make fun of the Mormons. They have a right to their beliefs, and while we may disagree with them, we have no right to mock them or to force them to believe otherwise.

Many times people have come to us with long stories of how their Mormon neighbors have “persecuted” them. When we hear these tales of persecution, we sometimes wonder if these people might in some way bring the persecution upon themselves. Now, while it is probably true that some people have suffered persecution in predominantly Mormon areas, we must not be carried away to the point of believing that it is impossible to live with the Mormons. Actually, we have been able to get along very well with our Mormon neighbors in Salt Lake City. It is true that a Gentile in Utah sometimes has a hard time renting an apartment or finding a job, and we have heard of cases where Mormon bishops have advised women to leave their husbands because they have apostatized from the church. Nevertheless, we must not look for offenses. If we are going to have any influence on the Mormon people we must learn to love and understand them. Jesus said that we are to “Love your enemies, bless them that curse you, do good to them that hate you, and pray for them which despitefully use you, and persecute you” (Matt. 5:44). Before we can have any real effect upon others we must be sure that our own hearts are right with God.

Perhaps we can all learn a lesson from a Negro who became a Christian. Tom Skinner grew up in Harlem and became the leader of “the Harlem Lords”—a gang of over 100 young men. He had “led the fellows in more than fifteen large scale gang fights.” In his book, Black and Free, he states:

Just as the racist convinces himself that his racial prejudice is really good for both races, I had gotten to the place where I could take a bottle, bash it across a fellow’s head and be undisturbed about it. I could take that same bottle, break it in half, and shove the glass in the man’s face and twist it without even batting my eye.

By the time I left the gang I had twenty-two notches on the handle of my knife which meant that my blade had gone into twenty-two different fellows. (Black and Free, Michigan, 1969, pp. 40-41)

One night Tom Skinner was “preparing strategy for a

In the Cannon 7th Ward of the Cannon Stake of Zion

To Jerald D. Tanner:

Dear Brother

You are hereby requested to appear before the bishop's court of this ward in the bishop's office on the 14th day of August 1960 at 2:00 PM for alleged wrong doing on your part as follows:

voluntary request for your name to be stricken from the records and teaching doctrines which are not in harmony with the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-Day Saints.

You should be present, with witnesses, if you desire them, at the place and time specified. If there is any good reason why you cannot be present, please notify the undersigned in due time. In the event of your absence, without excuse, action must necessarily be taken in accordance with the evidence and the established procedure of the Church in such matters.

Dear Mrs. Tanner

You are hereby notified of your excommunication from the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-Day Saints. This action was taken at a Bishop's Court held in the North Hollywood Ward on July 7, 1960.

Your name is no longer on the records of the church.

Reason for excommunication: Apostasy, and engaging in activities contrary to the best interests of the church.

Sincerely Yours

gang fight.” This was to be “the largest gang rumble ever to take place in the city of New York.” Five gangs “were going to unite together to fight a coalition of gangs from the other side of the city.” Over “3,000 fellows” were to be involved in this fight. While planning this gang war, Tom Skinner was listening to a rock and roll program on the radio. At nine o’clock that night an “unscheduled gospel program came on.”

Mr. Skinner was converted to Christianity and decided to leave the gang. On pages 68-69 of his book, Mr. Skinner gives this interesting information:

If I had not been reached by Jesus Christ I would either be dead, in prison, or graduated to a higher form of hoodlumism. . . . Jesus Christ is alive in me. My life has new meaning and purpose because of Him.

The tremendous work that the Spirit of God had done in my life in transforming me soon became evident to me. He took the bigotry, hate and violence out of my life. I had reached the place where I hated white people and blamed them for all the atrocities, immorality and social injustices that were brought against the Negro. Now that hate was gone.

In a football game several weeks later, my new-found Christian love met another test. . . . I pulled out and blocked the defensive end, knocking him out of play. . . . The kid that I happened to block got up and was furious. He jumped in front of me and slammed me in the stomach. As I bent over from the blow he hacked me across the back. I hit the ground as he kicked me, shouting, “You dirty black nigger! I’ll teach you a thing or two!”

Under normal circumstances the old Tom Skinner would have jumped up and pulverized this white boy. But instead, I got up from the ground and found myself looking this fellow in the face. A smile broke across my face and I said to him, “You know, because of Jesus Christ, I love you anyway.” . . . I was a new person! Here was Tom Skinner who, six weeks before, would have tried to kill this white bigot, barehanded. Now I was able to look into the face I normally would have smashed, and tell him that I loved him in Christ.

The kid threw his helmet down to the ground, ran off the field, and couldn’t play for the rest of the game. When the game was over he met me in the locker room and said to me, “Tom, you’ve done more to knock prejudice out of me by telling me that you loved me than you would have if you’d socked my jaw in.”

I became convinced that the only answer to the prejudice, the bigotry, and the hate that exists in our world today is that people allow the love of God through the Person of Jesus Christ to be expressed through them. (Black and Free, pp. 68-69)

7. Dr. Nibley has stated that your publication “The Case Against Mormonism is based largely on stolen microfilms; . . .” Is it true that you have stolen films from the Church Historian’s Office? This charge is completely false; we have never stolen any document or film, neither have we encouraged nor advised any person to steal from the Mormon Church. We disapprove of this type of thing, and have obtained all of our information and microfilms in an honorable way. Although it has taken longer to obtain the material in this manner, we have the satisfaction of a clear conscience.

Some of the Mormon Church’s own scholars have gained access to rare microfilms and have had them duplicated without the knowledge of the Church Historian. We have been given copies of films the Church Historian’s Office did not want to be made public, but we have never advised anyone to steal films from the Church Historian’s Office. In fact, in one instance a member of the Mormon Church told us that it would be very easy for him to “borrow” a very important film from the Historian’s Office, and that it could be duplicated and returned without anyone knowing what had happened. As much as we wanted a copy of the film, we told him that this would not be right and we advised him against doing this. We felt that no matter how much we wanted copies of these documents, we could not encourage anyone to “borrow” them from the Historian’s Office without their knowledge.

The reader may be interested in knowing how we obtained a photograph of Elijah Abel’s grandson’s ward membership record. (This is the record that proves that the Negro blood in Abel’s descendants has not prevented them from holding the Priesthood.) The LDS Genealogical Library had a microfilm of this record, but they had a policy which stated that they could not make photocopies of membership records. We felt that we must have a copy of this record, but we did not want to remove the microfilm from the Genealogical Library without permission. Therefore, we brought a number of large negatives (which were not very sensitive to light) to the Genealogical Library in a purse. They allowed us to look at the film in one of their readers. We set our own negatives in the microfilm reader and let the light shine down upon them. We timed each exposure with our watch. When we had made a number of different exposures we put our negatives back in the purse, and later developed them at home. Thus, although the negatives cost a few dollars and it took us a number of hours to complete the process, we ended up with a perfect photograph of the record.

We have been accused of stealing Paul Cheesman’s thesis—i.e., the thesis which contains the “strange account” of the First Vision—from the Brigham Young University Library. This accusation has absolutely no foundation in fact. Actually, we obtained a Xerox copy of this thesis from a student at the BYU. This man had special privileges there and obtained a copy. We, of course, had to pay for the Xeroxing of the thesis. This copy was made on the Brigham Young University Library’s own machine, and the thesis was never taken from the building.

All of the documents we have obtained from the Mormon Church have been obtained in an honest way, and we can truthfully say that we have never stolen nor encouraged anyone to steal anything from the church.
